The convention center main ballroom at the Hong Kong Disneyland Hotel is 888 square meters, a lucky number in the Chinese culture.

Feng Shui orientation played an important role in the design and building of Hong Kong Disneyland. For example, the placement of cash registers (placed along the wall or near the corners, to ensure prosperity); the “no fire zones” in hotel kitchens (not able to light fires in certain areas of the kitchen); and the orientation of the park walkways (a bend in the entrance walkway so that positive energy or “chi” does not flow into the waters of Penny’s Bay).

There is no fourth floor in either the Hong Kong Disneyland Hotel or the Hollywood Hotel in Hong Kong because the Chinese word for “four” sounds similar to the Chinese word for “death” and therefore is considered unlucky.

Hong Kong Disneyland is situated on 250 hectares (one hectare equals 2.47 acres), 200 of which were reclaimed from the sea by filling sand behind a sea-wall up to 30 meters.

When the car-themed Autopia opens in Tomorrowland at Hong Kong Disneyland (scheduled for 2006), it will be the first all-electric version of the popular attraction.

At the Walt Disney World Resort in Orlando, more than 2,500 different Cast Member costume designs make up a working wardrobe of about 1.8 million pieces. Approximately 13,000 costume pieces are manufactured each year.

There are enough of the famous “Mouse Ear” hats sold each year at the Walt Disney World Resort in Orlando to cover the head of every man, woman and child in Portland, Oregon.

The Walt Disney World bus fleet covers more than 15 million miles every year.
