Introduction

The present volume constitutes the eleventh supplement to the Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council, 1946-1951, which was issued in 1954. It covers the proceedings of the Security Council from the 2835th meeting, on 5 January 1989, to the 3154th meeting, on 20 December 1992.

The Repertoire was mandated by the General Assembly in its resolution 686 (VII) of 5 December 1952, entitled “Ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available”. It is a guide to the proceedings of the Council and sets forth in a readily accessible form the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse. The Repertoire is not intended as a substitute for the records of the Council, which constitute the only comprehensive and authoritative account of its deliberations.

The categories employed to arrange the material are not intended to suggest the existence of procedures or practices that have not been clearly or demonstrably established by the Council itself. The Council is at all times, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, its own provisional rules of procedure, and practice established through notes by the President of the Security Council, master of its own procedure.

In recording the Council’s practice, the headings under which the practices and procedures of the Council were presented in the original volume have been largely retained. Where necessary, however, adjustments have been made to better reflect the Council’s practice. The use of double asterisks () to denote topics not considered anew by the Council has been discontinued. For ease of reference, the studies contained in chapter VIII are organized according to region or general issues. In addition, this introduction now contains a table indicating the membership of the Security Council during the period under review.

The agenda items considered by the Council during 1989-1992, and the meetings at which they were considered, are presented in a table hereunder in the order in which the items were initially taken up during the period.

Symbols of United Nations documents are composed of capital letters combined with figures. A symbol such as S/23244 indicates a Security Council document. References to the verbatim records of meetings of the Council are given in the form S/PV.3154, p. 2. As in the previous volume, reference is made in this Supplement only to the provisional verbatim records of Security Council meetings, as the practice of publishing the meeting records in the Official Records has been discontinued.

The resolutions adopted by the Security Council and most of the statements by the President are published in the yearly volumes of Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council. Resolutions are identified by a number followed by the year of adoption in parentheses, for example, resolution 646 (1989). Statements by the President not included in the yearly volumes are recorded in the relevant verbatim records.

Readers who wish to consult the full record of a meeting or the text of a Security Council document referred to in the Repertoire may do so on the official United Nations Documentation Centre website, <http://www.un.org/documents/>. Security Council documents can be accessed on the website by selecting “Official Document System of the United Nations (ODS)” or one of the direct links to specific categories of documents. The volumes of resolutions and decisions may be accessed by symbol (S/INF/45, for 1989; S/INF/46, for 1990; S/INF/47, for 1991; and S/INF/48, for 1992). Other volumes of the Repertoire may be consulted at <http://www.un.org/Depts/dpa/repertoire/index.html>.

Introductory note

The present chapter contains material bearing upon the practice of the Security Council in relation to the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council arranged as follows: part I, Meetings (rules 1-5); part II, Representation and credentials (rules 13-17); part III, Presidency (rules 18-20); part IV, Secretariat (rules 21-26); part V, Conduct of business (rules 27-36); part VI, Languages (rules 41-47); part VII, Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57).

The practice of the Council in relation to some of the provisional rules of procedure are more appropriately dealt with in other chapters of this Supplement, as follows: rules 6 to 12, in chapter II (Agenda); rule 28, in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council); rules 37 and 39, in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council); rule 40, in chapter IV (Voting); rules 58 to 60, in chapter VII (Practice relative to recommendations to the General Assembly regarding membership in the United Nations); and rule 61, in chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

As in previous Supplements, the major headings under which the material is entered in this chapter follow the successive chapters of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, with the exceptions noted above.

The material in this chapter relates to questions that arose regarding the application of a certain rule, especially when there was a discussion regarding variations from the Council's usual practice. The case histories presented here do not constitute cumulative evidence of the practice of the Council, but are indicative of special problems or issues that have arisen in the proceedings of the Council under its provisional rules of procedure.

During the period under review, the Council did not consider the adoption or amendment of its provisional rules of procedure.

Part I Meetings (rules 1-5)

Note

The material assembled in this section reflects the provisions of Article 28 of the Charter of the United Nations, and indicates special instances of the interpretation or application of rules 1 to 5 on the convening and place of Security Council meetings. During the period under review, there were cases falling under rules 1 to 3 (cases 1 to 5), rule 4 (case 6) and rule 5 (case 7).

In four instances, dealt with under rules 1 to 3, complaints were made about delays in convening meetings.

The meeting of the Security Council held at the level of Heads of State and Government, on 31 January 1992, has been included under rule 4, although it was not convened explicitly under that rule or Article 28 (2) of the Charter.¹

During the period under review, the Security Council met away from Headquarters on one occasion (case 7). A communication was also received that called for a meeting of the Council to be held away from Headquarters.²

The members of the Council continued to meet frequently in the format of informal consultations of the whole.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 1-5

Rule 1

Meetings of the Security Council shall, with the exception of the periodic meetings referred to in rule 4, be held at the call of the President at any time he deems necessary, but the interval between meetings shall not exceed fourteen days.

Rule 2

The President shall call a meeting of the Security Council at the request of any member of the Security Council.

Rule 3

The President shall call a meeting of the Security Council if a dispute or situation is brought to the attention of the Security Council under Article 35 or under Article 11 (3) of the Charter, or if the General Assembly makes recommendations or refers any question to the Security Council under Article 11 (2), or if the Secretary-General brings to the attention of the Security Council any matter under Article 99.

Case 1

By a letter dated 20 November 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representatives of Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia and Yemen requested a meeting on Wednesday, 21 November 1990, to put to the vote a draft resolution they had sponsored in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories.⁴

At the 2959th meeting, on 27 November 1990, the representative of Cuba, speaking on a point of order prior to the adoption of the agenda, said that it was exactly one week since four members of the Council had formally requested the convening of a meeting to consider the draft resolution. Their request, which was fully in accordance with the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, had received no response, and the Council had not yet been able to meet to consider the draft resolution.⁵

The President (United States of America) proposed that informal consultations be held immediately after the meeting to consider the matter raised by the representative of Cuba. He noted that the revised draft resolution had just been circulated and that, in the tradition of the Security Council, delegations were extended a courtesy period to consider such drafts.

The representative of Cuba wondered whether an informal meeting was needed in order to consider the official request of the four delegations that the draft resolution, already in the possession of the members of the Council, be considered. Noting that there had been three weeks of consultations on the draft resolution, the representative of Yemen, one of its co-sponsors, officially moved that the Council meet at 3 o'clock that afternoon to consider the issue and the draft resolution. The representative of Malaysia believed that there was a definite majority in the Council in favour of considering now in a formal way the item mentioned by Cuba and Yemen, and of taking a vote on it. He therefore appealed to the President to take immediate steps to act accordingly.

The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland suggested that the President, who had expressed his willingness to schedule informal consultations, should propose a time for those consultations. His delegation had a number of observations that it would wish to make on the text that had just been circulated. He therefore thought that the Council should follow the normal practice where texts were concerned, and have informal consultations. The representative of Finland voiced his delegation's support for the idea of having informal consultations that day, as early as possible, in order to see where members stood on the matter.

The President repeated his invitation to the Council to meet in informal consultations immediately following the present meeting. He hoped that through that process the Council would be able to reach an early decision on what it would be doing next in regard to that item.

The representative of Cuba accepted the President's proposal on the understanding that, as a result of the informal consultations, the Council would be able to take action on the draft resolution.⁶

At the 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, the representative of Cuba, referring to the request for a meeting of the Council in connection with the same draft resolution, stated that the President had ignored that request, "bypassing the established rules and procedures".⁷ At the same meeting, the representative of Malaysia expressed his deep disappointment with the Council over its inability for more than three weeks to address properly the question of Palestinians in the occupied territories. All attempts to bring about a proper consideration of the matter, including a vote, had been deliberately thwarted, raising questions on the procedure and conduct of the Council.⁸

At the 2966th meeting, held on 8 December 1990, in connection with the occupied Arab territories, the representative of Colombia, opposing the proposal to adjourn the meeting,⁹ recalled that more than 15 days had passed since a request had been made for a Security Council meeting to consider formally the above-mentioned draft resolution.¹⁰

By a letter dated 23 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹ the representatives of Algeria, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco and Tunisia requested that the President convene "an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the grave situation in the Gulf region". By a letter dated 23 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹² the representative of the Sudan stated that his country supported the request made by the States members of the Arab Maghreb Union. By a letter dated 24 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ the representative of Yemen requested "an immediate meeting of the Security Council to examine the grave situation in the Gulf region". By a letter dated 25 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴ the representative of Jordan stated that his country supported the request made by Yemen and the States members of the Arab Maghreb Union for the convening of an immediate meeting of the Security Council. By a letter dated 28 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵ the representative of Cuba requested that the President “call a formal meeting of the Security Council as soon as possible”. He concluded his letter by saying that he would be grateful if the President “would immediately call a formal meeting of the Security Council”.

At the outset of the 2976th meeting, held on 31 January in connection with the situation between Iran and Iraq, the representative of Cuba said that his delegation was unable to vote in favour of the provisional agenda listing that item without voicing its deep dissatisfaction that the Council had failed to consider a serious problem that was of concern to the entire world. Despite the fact that for more than one week a group of “Council members”¹⁶ had been asking for a meeting on an urgent basis and despite the fact that two members of the Council had requested that the Council meet to consider the war situation in the Gulf region, thus far the Council had not done so, “notwithstanding the clear and categorical provisions set forth in the Council’s provisional rules of procedure”.¹⁷

Speaking after the adoption of the agenda, the representative of Yemen stated that it was regrettable that the Security Council had, to date, been unable to accede to his request to convene a meeting under rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure. He said that it was “the first time in the history of the Security Council” that a request of this kind had not been accepted.¹⁸ The representative of Cuba considered it ironic that, while the Council was considering the end of the conflict that had so long divided Iran and Iraq, it had not yet been able to meet, as required by its provisional rules of procedure, to fulfil its responsibilities in the case of the Gulf conflict. He stated that “the members of the Council must not be deprived of the right under the Charter to be heard. Above all, the Council must not be placed in a situation in which it could be found to be ignoring the norms governing its activities”.¹⁹

At the close of the meeting, the President (Zaire) responded to the representative of Yemen as follows: “[A]ll members of the Council are aware that rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure was duly applied by the President. He has thus received a mandate from all members of the Council to conduct consultations. It is clearly understood that the members of the Council are unanimous in supporting the principle of convening a formal meeting of the Council. The President has therefore received a mandate to convene [consultations] to agree on the date of that meeting.” He concluded by saying that the President for February would continue the consultations and prepare for the formal meeting.²⁰

In a letter dated 31 January 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,²¹ the representative of Yemen referred to his letter of 24 January 1991, quoted rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council and deplored the fact that the President of the Security Council had not yet acceded to his request for an immediate meeting of the Council. This was, in his view, a “dangerous precedent for the conduct of the work of the Council in accordance with its provisional rules of procedure”. He added that: “Rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council is abundantly clear, and the request of any member of the Council for a meeting of the Council is not subject to or linked with any prior conditions. The grave precedent established by the procrastination and delay in acceding to our request will give the opportunity for the Council to be accused of employing double standards in the positions that it adopts.”

A meeting was eventually convened on 13 February 1991. At its 2977th meeting, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council included in its agenda the letter dated 23 January 1991 from representatives of the States members of the Arab Maghreb Union,²² the letter dated 24 January 1991 from the representative of Yemen,²³ and the letter dated 28 January 1991 from the representative of Cuba.²⁴

During the debate, the representative of Cuba, in connection with what he termed “the inexplicable delay in convening the Security Council”, quoted from a letter dated 21 April 1966, from the representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council.²⁵ He stated that the Council was meeting for the first time on the twenty-eighth day of the war, despite the efforts that had been made and the specific requests that had been put forward for some time, not only by members of the Security Council, but also by other Members of the United Nations, on whose behalf it was to be assumed the members of the Council act.²⁶

The representative of the United States said that the Council should meet when it was in a position to advance its objectives and to take action. That did not seem to be the case given the continuing refusal of Iraq to acknowledge the validity of the Council’s demands.²⁷

The representative of India noted that the Council had kept the matter under review through informal consultations. That practice ought to continue. However, the informal meetings could not be a permanent substitute for official meetings of the Council. The Council’s failure to meet formally since the expiry on 15 January of the deadline set by resolution 678 (1990) had not reflected well on the prestige of the Council and the United Nations.²⁸

The representative of Austria observed that one of the considerations motivating his country’s idea of holding a formal private meeting was to uphold rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure, a rule that was of particular importance in protecting the rights of members of the Security Council who found themselves in a minority.²⁹

In a letter dated 14 February 1991, addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁰ the representatives of the States members of the Arab Maghreb Union stated that they regretted that it had taken the Security Council three weeks to act on their request for a meeting.

By a letter dated 27 April 1992, addressed to the President of the Security Council,³¹ the representative of Cuba requested the convening of a meeting of the Council as soon as possible to consider the “terrorist activities being carried out against the Republic of Cuba”. By a letter dated 8 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³² the representative of Cuba reiterated his request, stressing that it was “a formal request, made by a State Member of the United Nations exercising its right under Article 35 of the San Francisco Charter, bearing in mind the obligation of the Council under Article 24 of the Charter”. He noted that, on the basis of that right and that obligation, there had been a well-established and generally respected practice since the inception of the United Nations. By a letter dated 13 May 1992, addressed to the President of the Security Council,³³ the representative of Cuba reiterated his country’s request for a meeting. At its ²⁵ S/7261. The representative of Cuba read out four paragraphs of the letter, including the following:

“Even if a majority of Council members are opposed to a meeting, the meeting must be held. Those members opposed to the meeting may express their views on the agenda when the meeting is convened may seek to adjourn the meeting, or to defeat proposals submitted to it, but the President is bound to convene the Council on a request under rule 2, unless that request is not pressed.

“Subject to rule 2, the President is given, under rule 1, the authority and responsibility to set the time of a meeting. In so doing, the President acts not as a representative of his country but as a servant of the Council, and he does not exercise an arbitrary or unfettered discretion. His decision must be related to the requirements of Articles 24 and 28 of the Charter and of rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure, and to the urgency of the request and situation. A request for an urgent meeting must be respected and decided upon on an urgent basis, and the timing established responsive to the urgency of the situation.” (S/PV.2977 (Part I), p. 22)

3080th meeting, on 21 May 1992, the Council included Cuba's letter of 27 April in its agenda and considered the matter at the same meeting.

By a letter dated 5 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁴ the members of the Contact Group of the Organization of the Islamic Conference³⁵ called for an immediate meeting of the Security Council to consider the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At the 3135th meeting, held on 13 November 1992 to consider the item, the representative of Malaysia regretted the delay in convening the meeting. He added that: "The right of Member States to ask for an emergency meeting of the Security Council, with formal debate, to consider such a serious situation, involving a breach of international law and threatening international peace and security, has always to be respected by the Council."³⁶

At the 3136th and 3137th meetings, on 16 November 1992, the representatives of Pakistan and the Comoros expressed satisfaction that the meeting had finally been convened.³⁷

By a letter dated 15 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁸ the Secretary-General expressed deep concern about the tragic events in Lebanon, and reported that the violence in and around Beirut had escalated to a level unprecedented in 14 years of conflict. He concluded by stating: "In my opinion, the present crisis poses a serious threat to international peace and security. Accordingly, in the exercise of my responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, I ask that the Security Council be convened urgently in order to contribute to a peaceful solution of the problem." Looking back at the end of 1989 on these events in Lebanon, the Secretary-General recalled that in August he had "felt compelled, for the first time in [his] tenure as Secretary-General, to invoke Article 99 of the Charter".³⁹ In response to the Secretary-General's urgent appeal, the Security Council met on the same day, 15 August 1989, to consider the item entitled "The situation in the Middle East: letter dated 15 August 1989 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council".⁴⁰

Periodic meetings of the Security Council called for in Article 28 (2) of the Charter shall be held twice a year, at such times as the Security Council may decide.

Case 6

At its 3046th meeting, on 31 January 1992, the Security Council convened for the first time in its history at the level of Heads of State or Government,⁴¹ to consider an item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security".

In his introductory statement, the President (United Kingdom) described the meeting as "unique" and "extraordinary". In convening the meeting he had intended that the discussion could serve, among other things, to reaffirm the principle of collective security, to consider anew the means by which it is upheld through the United Nations, and as an opportunity for renewed commitment to international peace and security through reinforced arms control.⁴²

In the course of the debate, the Secretary-General suggested that the Council meet at the “summit level periodically to take stock of the state of the world”. This would “strengthen the tone of authority” that the United Nations needed and help ensure its transformation before its fiftieth anniversary in 1995.⁴³

In letters relating to the 3046th meeting, Member States variously referred to the “special meeting of the United Nations Security Council to be held at the highest political level”,⁴⁴ the “unprecedented summit level session of the Council”,⁴⁵ “this historic meeting”,⁴⁶ “the summit meeting of the Security Council”,⁴⁷ and “the meeting of the Security Council held at the level of Heads of State and Government”.⁴⁸

In his report entitled “An Agenda for Peace” dated 17 June 1992,⁴⁹ the Secretary-General recommended that the Heads of State and Government of the members of the Council meet in alternate years, before the general debate in the General Assembly.⁵⁰

Meetings of the Security Council shall normally be held at the seat of the United Nations.

Any member of the Security Council or the Secretary-General may propose that the Security Council should meet at another place. Should the Security Council accept any such proposal, it shall decide upon the place, and the period during which the Council shall meet at such place.

By a letter dated 21 May 1990, addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵¹ the representative of Bahrain in his capacity as Chairman of the Arab Group requested an immediate meeting of the Security Council in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories. In accordance with the understanding reached during informal consultations on 22 May 1990, the Council held its 2923rd meeting at the United Nations Office at Geneva on 25 May 1990.⁵²

Part II

Representation and credentials (rules 13-17)

Note

Since 1948, the reports of the Secretary-General on the credentials of the representatives of members of the Security Council have been circulated to the delegations of all members of the Council and, in the absence of a request that they be considered by the Council, have been considered approved without objection. In practice, however, the credentials under rule 13 have been submitted and reported on by the Secretary-General only at times when changes in the representation of members of the Council have been made and when, at the beginning of each year, the representatives of the newly elected non-permanent members of the Council have been designated. That practice was followed during the period under review.

By a letter dated 24 December 1991,⁵³ the Secretary-General requested the President of the Security Council to bring to the attention of the members of the Council the text of a letter of the same date from the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, transmitting to the Secretary-General a letter, also of the same date, from the President of the Russian Federation. In his letter, the President of the Russian Federation informed the Secretary-General that the membership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Nations, including the Security Council, was being continued by the Russian Federation, and requested the Secretary-General to consider that letter as confirmation of the credentials to represent the Russian Federation in the United Nations organs for all the persons currently holding the credentials of representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the United Nations.⁵⁴

In one instance, during the period under review, the Council received two requests to participate on behalf of a Member State and asked the Secretary-General to prepare a report on credentials under rule 15 (case 8).

⁵³ Not issued as a Security Council document. See note to membership of the Security Council in Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1991, p. v.

Special cases concerning the application of rules 13-17

Rule 15

The credentials of representatives on the Security Council and of any representative appointed in accordance with rule 14 shall be examined by the Secretary-General who shall submit a report to the Security Council for approval.

By a letter dated 20 December 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁵ the representative of Nicaragua requested a meeting of the Council to consider the situation in Panama.

At its 2901st meeting, on 21 December 1989, the Council, at the request of the United States, voted on the proposal to invite Panama to participate in the discussion.⁵⁶ Speaking in explanation of vote, the United States stated that, although it had abstained, it had no objection to the State of Panama being represented in the debate. The problem was that the Council was being asked to decide the question of participation in a way that did not permit it to consider the question of who would represent Panama.⁵⁷ Other members of the Council underlined that their vote did not prejudge that question.⁵⁸ The President (Colombia) informed the Council that he had received two requests for participation in the debate as representative of Panama. It was his understanding that the Council wished to ask the Secretary-General to prepare a report on credentials under rules 14 and 15 of its provisional rules of procedure.⁵⁹

At its 2902nd meeting, on 23 December 1989, the Council took note of the report on credentials submitted by the Secretary-General in accordance with rule 15.⁶⁰ The President then informed the Council that both requests to participate had been withdrawn in writing.

In his report, the Secretary-General recalled the provisions of the Charter and the provisional rules of procedure applicable to the invitation of non-members of the Security Council and the submission of credentials for their representatives. He then quoted rule 15 and added: "It follows from that rule that the credentials have to be reported upon by the Secretary-General but that the determination as to their approval has to be made by the Council itself. It may be added here that invitations under rule 37 have become so frequent that, in the practice of the Council, the procedure foreseen in rule 15 is not always observed and the Secretary-General is not regularly requested to report on credentials of representatives of States invited under rule 37. That does not mean, however, that the procedure foreseen under rule 15 has become obsolete. In case of doubt, it can be and is applied. The criteria which the Secretary-General must apply when examining a credential under rule 15 are formal in nature. Under international law a credential is a document which certifies that one or several persons are entitled to represent a given State. Such documents must be issued by the Head of the State to be represented, by the Head of its Government or by its Minister for Foreign Affairs, that is, one of the three persons which are presumed under international law to represent their country without having to produce a credential. The Secretary-General, therefore, must examine whether the document contains a clear authorization to represent a country and whether it is signed by one of the persons cited above."⁶¹

Examining the two requests received, the Secretary-General concluded that, from a formal point of view, both met the technical requirements of a credential, albeit a provisional one since they had reached him in telefaxed form. However, the two communications emanated from contending authorities on the ground. As the Secretary-General was not in a position to clarify the factual situation on the ground, he was not able to formulate an opinion as to the adequacy of the provisional credentials that had been submitted.

Noting that the General Assembly had approved at its forty-fourth session credentials issued by the Government of Panama in which the signatory of the first request had later assumed the post of Foreign Minister, the report of the Secretary-General referred to General Assembly resolution 396 (V), which is designed to avoid conflicting practice of the various organs in matters of recognition of the representation of Member States. It quoted paragraph 3 of that resolution, in which the Assembly recommended that "the attitude adopted by the General Assembly ... concerning any such question should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies".⁶²

Part III Presidency (rules 18-20)

Note

Part III of the present chapter deals with proceedings of the Security Council directly related to the Office of the President. Material relevant to the exercise by the President of his functions in connection with the agenda is dealt with in chapter II. Material pertaining to the exercise by the President of his functions in the conduct of meetings is included in part V of this chapter.

During the period under review, there was no special case concerning the application or interpretation of rule 18, which provides for the monthly rotation of the presidency in the English alphabetical order of the names of the members of the Council. No exception was made to that rule when, on two occasions, States members of the Council changed their names. In the first instance, the application of rule 18 caused a Council member to hold the presidency twice in one year, while in the second instance the order of the rotation of the presidency was not affected. Democratic Yemen, which had been elected to the Council for a term of office starting on 1 January 1990, held the presidency of the Council in March 1990. On 22 May 1990, Democratic Yemen merged with Yemen to form a single State with the name “Yemen”. As a result, Yemen held the presidency in December 1990, after the United States. By a letter dated 24 December 1991, during the presidency of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the President of the Russian Federation informed the Secretary-General that the membership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Nations, including the Security Council, was being continued by the Russian Federation.⁶³ He requested that the name “Russian Federation” be used in the United Nations in place of the name “Union of Soviet Socialist Republics”. Owing to the composition of the Council, the change of name did not affect the order of rotation according to rule 18.⁶⁴

There were no special instances concerning rule 19, which deals with the conduct of the presidency. On one occasion, the President represented the Security Council in ascertaining Iraq’s irrevocable and unqualified acceptance of resolution 687 (1991) and noting, on behalf of the members of the Council, that the conditions in paragraph 33 of that resolution had been met and that the formal ceasefire referred to in that paragraph was therefore effective.⁶⁵

There was one instance of the application of rule 20, which deals with the temporary cession of the chair by the President (case 9).

During the period under review, the members of the Council continued to use informal consultations as a procedure for reaching decisions. On many occasions, the President presented the results of such consultations to the Council in the form of a statement of consensus made on behalf of the members,⁶⁶ or as a draft resolution, which the Council then adopted without further debate.⁶⁷ In other instances, the

For instance, the outcome of reviews of the various measures imposed against Iraq carried out pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)⁶⁹ was communicated by the President of the Security Council in statements to the media or presidential statements issued as documents of the Security Council. Case 9

At the 2907th meeting of the Council, on 9 February 1990, convened at Cuba's request to consider the item entitled "Letter dated 2 February 1990 from the Permanent Representative of Cuba to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/21120)", the President (Cuba) stated that the item on the agenda directly involved the interests of Cuba and the United States. He quoted rule 20 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council and noted that it placed the decision whether or not to vacate the Chair — provided that the circumstances envisaged by the rule existed — entirely within the discretion of the President. The precedents he had examined revealed that Presidents of the Council had not made it a habit to vacate their seats because the Council was considering situations with which their Governments were directly concerned. In fact, he had found only two precedents in the Council's practice over the past 25 years. Nonetheless, he had decided that it would be appropriate for him to exercise the discretion given to the President under rule 20 and to vacate the Chair while the item was under discussion.⁷¹ Consequently, in accordance with rule 20, he invited the representative of Democratic Yemen to preside over the meeting for the consideration of that item.

Part IV Secretariat (rules 21-26)

Note

Part IV relates to rules 21 to 26 of the provisional rules of procedure, which set out the specific functions and powers of the Secretary-General in connection with the meetings of the Security Council.⁷² These rules reflect the provisions of Article 98 of the Charter insofar as they concern the requirements of the Security Council.

There were no special instances of the application of rules 21 to 26 during the period under review.

Instances in which the Secretary-General was requested or authorized by the Security Council to carry out other functions, in accordance with Article 98 of the Charter, are dealt with in chapter VI (Relations with other United Nations organs).

⁷² Under rule 24 the Secretary-General has provided not only the required staff to service meetings of the Council, but also made available staff for subsidiary organs of the Council both at Headquarters and in the field.

Part V Conduct of business (rules 27-36)

Note

Part V sets out the cases bearing on rules 27 and 29 to 36. Material relating to rule 28 can be found in chapter V (Subsidiary organs of the Security Council). Material relating to rules 37 to 39 is included in chapter III (Participation in the proceedings of the Security Council).

As in previous volumes of the Repertoire, the cases assembled here are indicative of the special problems that arose in the application of the rules on the conduct of business, rather than the routine practice of the Council. They relate to such matters as:

(a) Rule 27, on the order of intervention in the debate (cases 10-12);

(b) Rule 30, on the extent to which the President rules on a point of order (case 13). Those instances in which representatives, having asked to be recognized on a point of order, made statements in which no ruling was required have not been included in the present study;⁷³

(c) Rule 33, on the suspension and adjournment of meetings (cases 14-16).

An instance of the application of rule 36, on the order in which amendments are put to the vote, has also been included for its illustrative value (case 17).

During the period under review there were no special instances of the application of rules 29, 31, 32, 34 and 35.

The provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council do not contain a rule permitting the President to call speakers to order if their remarks are not relevant to the item under discussion.⁷⁴ However, there have been instances where Presidents have expressed their regret or displeasure at the language used by a speaker. At the 2981st meeting, held on 3 April 1991 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Iraq referred to the representative of Kuwait as “a man with no identity, personal or national”.⁷⁵ The President (Belgium) stated that he regretted “the manner in which the representative of Iraq had referred to his colleague from Kuwait”.⁷⁶

Rule 27

The President shall call upon representatives in the order in which they signify their desire to speak.

Case 10

At the 2898th meeting of the Council, held on 14 December 1989 in connection with the situation in Cyprus, the representative of Greece, who had been invited to participate under rule 37, suggested that the President of the Security Council might wish to place before the members of the Council a proposal — in the light of Security Council resolutions 541 (1983) and 550 (1984), and bearing in mind rules 27, 29, 37 and 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure — that precedence should be given to representatives of Member States who wished to address the Council over persons entitled to address the Council under rule 39.⁷⁷ No action was taken in response to the proposal at that meeting.

At the 2938th meeting, held on 25 August 1990 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Iraq stated that he had asked to speak before the vote in order to show the “illegality” under the Charter of the resolution just adopted by the Council.⁷⁸ He noted that the President, “without citing a precedent or procedure”, had denied him that privilege.

At the 2977th meeting, held on 14 February 1991 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of the United States, speaking after the representative of Kuwait, addressed a number of questions to the representative of Kuwait “in full knowledge of, and in keeping with, our provisional rules of procedure”.⁷⁹ The next speaker, the representative of Saudi Arabia, expressed his willingness, if the President so wished, to let the representative of Kuwait answer the questions put to him before making his own statement. The President (Zimbabwe) called on the representative of Kuwait, who was interrupted by the representative of Yemen on a point of order. The representative of Yemen recalled that members of the Security Council had agreed to abide strictly by the provisional rules of procedure and affirmed that the representative of Kuwait had every right to answer the questions addressed to him, but “should do so in accordance with the list of speakers”. In other words, he should inscribe his name at the end of the list.⁸⁰

⁷³ For example, at the 2970th meeting, held on 19 December 1990 in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the representative of the United Kingdom requested on a point of order that the President call on the representative of Finland to report on his contacts with members of the Council on the matter before it. The President called on the representative of Finland, who presented his report.

The representative of the United States, speaking on the point of order raised by the representative of Yemen, stated that it was clear that the representative of Saudi Arabia, who was next on the list of speakers, had “yielded his priority to the representative of Kuwait, in accordance with rule 27 of the provisional rules of procedure”. He noted that, normally, members of the Council exerted “their right to priority to appear on the list” without prior clearance by the other Council members. In fact, he had inscribed his name only hours before in the second place on the list, without seeking the permission of eight other Council members. In the absence of objection on the part of other members, there should be “no reason why, in the careful following of the rules of procedure”, the Council should not proceed to hear the response of the representative of Kuwait.⁸¹

The representative of Cuba underlined that his delegation had no objection to any representative who had “requested to participate in our deliberations, doing so as many times as he or she feels necessary”. However, the meeting was to be conducted in accordance with the rules of procedure. In his view, “the representative of the United States [had] the right to propose that the relevant rule not be applied, but not that a new list of speakers be drawn up”. If the representative of Saudi Arabia did not wish to speak, but preferred to yield his place on the list, the next speaker on that list ought to follow him. The representative of Cuba noted that “the Council should follow the order of the list of speakers, or it should determine that the United States has raised a point of order and proposed that the rule not be applied and that a different order be followed. In that event, the Council would have to take a decision, and if the majority of members [did] not agree with the proposal, the letter of rule 27 must be observed”.⁸²

The representative of Zaire was of the opinion that the representative of Saudi Arabia “could, under rule 27, yield his place to the representative of Kuwait if he wish[ed] to do so”. He questioned whether the Council could prevent the representative of Kuwait from speaking, even if he had to do so several times, in order to inform the Council on all aspects of the conflict, which primarily concerned Kuwait. He also pointed out that the closed meeting had been convened to permit a frank exchange of views. The representative of Kuwait should therefore be allowed to answer the questions put to him by the representative of the United States.⁸³ The representative of the United Kingdom agreed “that the right thing [was] to allow the representative of Kuwait, who [was] a party to this dispute, to answer the questions”. It would be better to allow the President to “apply the rules of procedure as they are and to allow the representative of Kuwait to reply to the questions”.⁸⁴ The representative of Cuba proposed that the Council respect rule 27 of its rules of procedure and that if necessary a vote should be taken.⁸⁵

The President then explained that it had been his understanding that the representative of Saudi Arabia had ceded his place on the list to the representative of Kuwait. If that had not been the intention of the representative of Saudi Arabia, there had been a misunderstanding. He had called on the representative of Kuwait on the basis that the representative of Saudi Arabia was willing to wait until a later stage to make his presentation, and to have a new place on the list of speakers.⁸⁶ The representative of Saudi Arabia explained that he had not intended to cede his position on the list of speakers. He had been, and still was, prepared to wait while the representative of Kuwait spoke, before making his own presentation. The President stated that, in the light of this explanation, the representative of Saudi Arabia had the floor; the representative of Kuwait could reply to the questions at a later stage.⁸⁷

If a representative raises a point of order, the President shall immediately state his ruling. If it is challenged, the President shall submit his ruling to the Security Council for immediate decision and it shall stand unless overruled.

Case 13

At the 2976th meeting, held on 31 January 1991 in connection with the situation between Iran and Iraq, the representative of Cuba took the floor before the adoption of the agenda, voicing his delegation's "deep dissatisfaction" that the Council had not been able to consider a "serious problem" of concern to the entire world.⁸⁸ The representative of the United States, speaking on a point of order, submitted that, unless the representative of Cuba had a proposal to make with respect to the provisional agenda, the debate into which he was entering was out of order.⁸⁹ The President (Zaire) noted that the Council had before it a provisional agenda. If the representative of Cuba wished to raise a point of order under rule 30, the President would be obliged to ask the members of the Council to take an immediate decision on his ruling with regard to the adoption of the provisional agenda.⁹⁰ The President reminded the Council that it was proceeding according to rule 9 of the provisional rules of procedure. If a member objected to the adoption of the provisional agenda he would be obliged to put that challenge to the vote. Speaking on the point of order, the representative of Yemen contended that rule 9 did not preclude a statement by a member of the Council before the adoption of the agenda. The President reiterated that the agenda had to be adopted first. If his ruling were challenged, he would request the Council to take a decision on that challenge. Those who voted against that challenge would be in favour of the strict application of rule 9. The representative of Yemen clarified that he had not challenged what the President had said about rule 9. The provisional agenda was adopted without objection.⁹¹

Rule 33

The following motions shall have precedence in the order named over all principal motions and draft resolutions relative to the subject before the meeting:

1. To suspend the meeting;
2. To adjourn the meeting;
3. To adjourn the meeting to a certain day or hour;

⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 3.

⁹¹ See also chapter II.

4. To refer any matter to a committee, to the Secretary-General or to a rapporteur;

5. To postpone discussion of the question to a certain day or indefinitely; or

6. To introduce an amendment.

Any motion for the suspension or for the simple adjournment of the meeting shall be decided without debate.

At the 2966th meeting, held on 8 December 1990 in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics moved, under rule 33.3, that the Council should adjourn the meeting until Monday, 10 December, at 3 p.m.⁹²

Following statements by several representatives, the representative of Zaire expressed his surprise that the Council had engaged in a discussion although rule 33 stated quite clearly in its last paragraph that any motion for the suspension or simple adjournment of the meeting should be decided without debate.⁹³ In reply, the President (Yemen) explained that the applicable rule was rule 33.3, concerning the adjournment of the meeting to a certain day or hour, and that, under point 3, discussion was permitted.⁹⁴ The proposal to adjourn the meeting was put to the vote and adopted.⁹⁵

At the 2970th meeting, held on 19 December 1990 in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the representative of the United Kingdom proposed the suspension of the meeting, in accordance with rule 33.1 of the provisional rules of procedure.⁹⁶ After reading out the applicable rule, the President (Yemen) noted that it did not specify whether a vote was necessary on the motion to suspend. In the absence of objection, the meeting would be suspended to a further time to be decided by the President.⁹⁷ Following an objection from the representative of Malaysia, the motion to suspend the meeting was put to the vote and adopted by 9 votes to 6.

At the 2972nd meeting, held on 22 December 1990 in connection with the letter dated 7 December 1990 from the President of the Trusteeship Council addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Cuba proposed that the meeting be adjourned until Tuesday, 8 January 1991 at 3 p.m., in accordance with rule 33.3. He stated that the Council had not had an opportunity to consider in depth the situation that was the subject of the agenda item, and that there were very specific requests from the representatives of the people whose destiny the Council would be deciding, asking the Council not to take a hasty decision.⁹⁸ The representative of the United States opposed the proposal to adjourn for several reasons and expressed the view that, in accordance with the agreement reached in informal consultations the day before, the Council should proceed to the vote on the agenda item before it.⁹⁹ The Cuban motion to adjourn the meeting was put to the vote but was not adopted.¹⁰⁰

⁹⁹ S/PV.2972, pp. 3-7.

¹⁰⁰ The vote was 2 in favour, 9 against, and 4 abstentions.

Rule 36

If one or more amendments to a motion or draft resolution are proposed, the President shall rule on the order in which they are to be voted upon. Ordinarily, the Security Council shall first vote on the amendment furthest removed in substance from the original proposal and then on the amendment next furthest removed until all amendments have been put to the vote, but when an amendment adds to or deletes from the text of a motion or draft resolution, that amendment shall be voted on first.

Case 17

At its 2978th meeting, held on 2 March 1991, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council had before it a draft resolution submitted by the United States.¹⁰¹ Members also had before them 18 amendments submitted by Cuba.¹⁰² After quoting rule 36 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, the President (Austria) set out the order in which he intended to put the amendments to the vote.¹⁰³ The Council proceeded to vote on the amendments in that order.

Part VI Languages (rules 41-47)

During the period under review, there were no special cases concerning the application of rules 41 to 47.

Part VII Publicity of meetings, records (rules 48-57)

Note

Rule 48 provides that, unless it decides otherwise, the Security Council shall meet in public. In accordance with rule 49, the verbatim records of each meeting are made available in the working languages to the representatives on the Security Council, as well as to the representatives of any other States that participated in the meeting — not later than 10 a.m. of the first working day following the meeting. A note is incorporated in the copies of the record showing the time and date of distribution. Corrections, in the same language as the text to which they refer, may be submitted and are issued as corrigenda to the published verbatim record. In one instance during the period under review, there was an agreed waiver of the requirement laid down in rule 49 regarding the time of issuance of the verbatim record of the meeting (case 19).

The Council has opted on occasion to discuss certain matters in private. During the period under review, the Council held five private meetings.¹⁰⁴ The deliberations leading to the holding of a private meeting in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait are considered below (case 18). At the close of each meeting, the Council issued a communiqué through the Secretary-General, in accordance with rule 55 of the provisional rules of procedure. In one instance, it also released the record of the private meeting (case 20).

Rule 48

Unless it decides otherwise, the Security Council shall meet in public. Any recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General shall be discussed and decided at a private meeting.

¹⁰⁴ The five private meetings were the following:

Meeting	Date	Agenda item
2892	17 November 1989	Consideration of the draft report of the Security Council to the General Assembly
2958	23 November 1990	Consideration of the draft report of the Security Council to the General Assembly
3017	21 November 1991	Recommendation regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations
2977 (Part II), resumed 5 times	14, 15, 16, 23 and 25 February and 2 March 1991	The situation between Iraq and Kuwait
3020	29 November 1991	Consideration of the draft report of the Security Council to the General Assembly

Case 18

At the 2977th meeting of the Council, held on 13 February 1991, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of the United Kingdom proposed that, in accordance with rule 48 of the provisional rules of procedure, the Council should meet in private to consider the item on the agenda. He noted that, as a general rule, the Council should meet in public, as envisaged by the provisional rules of procedure. However, the rules of procedure also provided for private meetings in exceptional circumstances. In the view of his delegation, the circumstances were indeed exceptional. The Council should do nothing that could detract from its unity of purpose or blur the signal sent to the outside world. The present occasion called for serious and careful consideration of all developments away from the glare of immediate publicity. The representative recalled that, in the context of Western Sahara in 1975, the Council had decided that a private meeting would best assist the exploratory discussion on that issue. It had chosen a format that had enabled it to enter into a dialogue with the participants. The speaker believed that that format offered the right model for the current meeting. He explained that his proposal was not intended to limit participation or restrict knowledge of the proceedings: all Members of the United Nations would be free to attend and participate, and the verbatim record would be taken and circulated. He believed, however, that the Council would carry out its functions better if the public aspect of the meeting — the presence of the media — did not influence or even distort the course and nature of its debate.¹⁰⁵

The representative of Yemen opposed the proposal put forward by the United Kingdom. He argued that since the Council represented the entire membership of the United Nations and all the peoples of the world, it was — save in exceptional circumstances — expected to meet in public, and in a clear and transparent manner. Recalling three exceptions to that established tradition, he stated that the purpose of holding the present meeting in private was not to put questions to a delegation, or to listen to the parties concerned, or to hear new information from any quarter, as in previous cases, but solely to exclude the media. He contended that no problem was created by difference of opinion, pointing out that the situation in the Gulf had been debated in public for over six months and that public opinion deserved to be informed. In fact, it was in the interest of the Council and the United Nations that the Council should be constantly scrutinized by other Members of the United Nations and public opinion.¹⁰⁶

The representative of Cuba also opposed the proposal. He regretted that the representative of the United Kingdom had not pointed to the very valuable precedent of the first private meeting held in 1956. On that occasion, the Council had heard statements in public meetings before holding a private meeting. He also wondered how the Council could avoid giving the impression that it was divided or lacked cohesiveness when it met three weeks after being requested to do so. The Council, he said, had been considering the same subject, with full publicity, for six and a half months and differences of opinion had been expressed. The representative believed that the Council must meet in public, in keeping with the requests made by a number of sovereign Member States. It must also meet in public because the war was of legitimate concern to all Member States and peoples of the world who had the right to know the views of the Council.¹⁰⁷

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was of the view that a public debate might hinder the efforts made by the Soviet Union and other countries to achieve a peaceful settlement, whereas a “comprehensive and businesslike” discussion in a private meeting might provide these efforts with the necessary additional impetus.¹⁰⁸

The representative of the United States supported the holding of a private meeting because it would enable those delegations that wished to do so to express their views and to exchange ideas in an appropriate setting. He hoped that it would “offer the opportunity for a serious and constructive discussion, free from the glare of instantaneous publicity and the misinterpretation and misuse to which [the] meeting might be subject”.¹⁰⁹

The representative of India stated that informal consultations, although they were useful and should continue, could not be a permanent substitute for official meetings. In his delegation’s view, it would be proper and desirable for the meeting to be public, in accordance with the Council’s normal practice. A decision to depart from this normal practice should be taken only in very special circumstances. His delegation was not convinced that the present circumstances justified such an exception but would respect the Council’s decision, should it decide, by majority, to convert the meeting into a private one. This was provided for by the Council’s rules of procedure, but it would be the first time that such an important decision would be taken by vote. His delegation expected that, in the near future, the Council would revert to its traditional method of meeting in public.¹¹⁰

The proposal to continue the meeting in private was put to the vote and adopted.¹¹¹

In a letter dated 14 February 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹² the representatives of the States members of the Arab Maghreb Union, who had requested the meeting, expressed regret that the Council had created a precedent by deciding that the general debate would be held in closed session. They confirmed that they would not be participating in the closed meetings.

Rule 49

Subject to the provisions of rule 51, the verbatim record of each meeting of the Security Council shall be made available to the representatives on the Security Council and to the representatives of any other States which have participated in the meeting not later than 10 a.m. of the first working day following the meeting.

Case 19

A note by the President of the Security Council dated 22 May 1990,¹¹³ referred to the understanding reached in informal consultations among the members of the Council that a meeting of the Council would be held at the United Nations Office at Geneva on 25 May 1990, and stated that the members of the Council had also agreed to waive the requirement laid down in rule 49 regarding the time of issuance of the verbatim record of the meeting. The verbatim record would, accordingly, be issued in New York at a later date.¹¹⁴

The Security Council may decide that for a private meeting the record shall be made in a single copy alone. This record shall be kept by the Secretary-General. The representatives of the States which have participated in the meeting shall, within a period of ten days, inform the Secretary-General of any corrections they wish to have made in this record.

Case 20

At its 2977th meeting, held on 13 February 1991 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council decided to continue the meeting in private, without having resort to the provisions of rule 51. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation's proposal to continue the meeting in private was not intended "to limit participation or restrict knowledge of the proceedings", adding that "the normal verbatim record would be taken and circulated".¹¹⁵ Opposing the proposal, the representative of Yemen pointed out that the verbatim record would in any event be available on the day after the meeting.¹¹⁶ Supporting the proposal, the representative of the United States noted that it would permit all who wished to do so to express their views in an appropriate setting, while allowing them to get their statements on record.¹¹⁷

The verbatim record of the second part of the 2977th meeting, held in private, was prepared and distributed in the same way as the record of a public meeting.¹¹⁸

The present chapter concerns the interpretation and application of rules 6 to 12 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council, relating to the agenda. The chapter is divided into three parts: Part I, The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and rule 12); Part II, Adoption of the agenda (rule 9); and Part III, The agenda: matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11).

Part I provides information concerning the preparation of the provisional agenda (rule 7). No material was found relating to the circulation of communications by the Secretary-General (rule 6) or the communication of the provisional agenda (rules 8 and 12).

Part II contains material relating to the precedence of the decision on the adoption of the agenda. During the period under review, no other material was found for inclusion under rule 9.

Part III relates to the list of matters of which the Council is seized. There was no discussion concerning the application of rule 10 during the period under review. The table appearing under rule 11 supplements those contained in the previous volumes of the Repertoire. It indicates the changes that have since occurred in the list of matters of which the Council is seized.

Part I

The provisional agenda (rules 6-8 and 12)

Note

The provisional agenda, prepared by the Secretary-General and approved by the President of the Security Council in accordance with rule 7, includes those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. Under that rule, “the Secretary-General shall immediately bring to the attention of all representatives on the Security Council all communications from States, organs of the United Nations, or the Secretary-General concerning any matter for the consideration of the Security Council in accordance with the provisions of the Charter”. Effect is normally given to this rule by the distribution of communications as documents in the S/— series. Communications from regional arrangements or agencies received pursuant to Article 54 of the Charter are also circulated in the S/— series of documents. During the period under review, no material was found for inclusion under rule 6.¹

Rule 7 entrusts the drawing up of the provisional agenda for each meeting to the Secretary-General, subject to the approval of the President of the Security Council. The Secretary-General’s discretion with respect to the inclusion of new items is restricted to those items that have been brought to the attention of the Council under rule 6. In addition to the express provisions of rule 7, the Secretary-General also has to take into account whether a specific request to include the item has been made. During the period under review, there was one instance in which the subject of

Rule 8 concerns communication of the provisional agenda, and rule 12, paragraph 1, concerns such communication for periodic meetings. No material relating to these rules was found during the period under review.

Preparation of the provisional agenda (rule 7)

Case 1

The provisional agenda for the 2959th meeting of the Security Council,² held on 27 November 1990 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, read as follows:

- “1. Adoption of the agenda
- “2. The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”.

Speaking on a point of order at the outset of the meeting, the representative of Cuba proposed that an additional item be added to the provisional agenda, so that the Council could consider a draft resolution on the situation in the territories occupied by Israel.³ He explained that his delegation was obliged to submit this proposal at the formal meeting of the Council since, contrary to the Council’s usual practice, the meeting had not been preceded by informal consultations to consider the provisional agenda. He added that it had been a week since four members of the Council had asked the President to convene a meeting to consider the draft resolution in question, and that they had not yet received a response.

The President (United States) stated that no informal meeting had been held in the present case because the Council was resuming consideration of an item. In such circumstances, it was the Council’s standard practice to hold meetings without prior consultations. The President added that, as he had indicated to a representative of the group sponsoring the draft resolution to which Cuba referred, he was prepared to hold informal consultations on the matter immediately after the presentation that morning by the representative of Kuwait. There followed a discussion concerning the delay in convening a meeting to discuss the draft resolution.⁴ The original agenda was thereupon adopted without objection.

³ Draft resolution submitted by Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia and Yemen (S/21933/Rev.1).

⁴ See also chapter I, case 1.

Part II Adoption of the agenda (rule 9)

Note

Under rule 9, the first item on the provisional agenda for each meeting of the Security Council is the adoption of the agenda.⁵ It has been the practice of the Council to adopt the provisional agenda without a vote, either with or without amendments, unless an objection is raised. As in previous volumes of the Repertoire, this part is devoted to the proceedings of the Council on those occasions when objection was raised to the adoption of the agenda or other discussion took place in connection with the adoption of the agenda.

Two case histories have been included concerning the precedence of the decision on the adoption of the agenda (cases 2 and 3).

During the period under review, participation in discussions related to the adoption of the agenda was limited to members of the Council.

⁵ During the period under review, there were instances in which, in accordance with past practice, the President of the Council made preliminary remarks before the adoption of the agenda. These included expressions of thanks, congratulations, tributes and expressions of sympathy (see S/PV.2835, S/PV.2885, S/PV.2886, S/PV.2894 and S/PV.3019). At the 2922nd meeting, on 23 May 1990, the President called attention to a note verbale from the Secretary-General regarding the formation of a single sovereign State called the Republic of Yemen and expressed, on behalf of the Council, congratulations and best wishes to the Republic of Yemen on its unification (see S/PV.2922, p. 2). At the 2870th meeting on 6 July 1989, following a tribute by the President, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics made a statement (see S/PV.2870, pp. 3-5). At the 2989th meeting, on 24 May 1991, following a tribute by the President, the representative of India made a statement (see S/PV.2989, pp. 2-3).

Precedence of the decision on adoption of the agenda

At the 2970th meeting (part I), held on 20 December 1990 in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the President called upon the representative of the United Kingdom immediately following the adoption of the agenda. The representative of the United Kingdom noted that he had actually asked to speak on a point of order before the adoption of the agenda.⁶

Case 3

The provisional agenda for the 2976th meeting,⁷ held on 31 January 1991 in connection with the situation between Iran and Iraq, read as follows:

- “1. Adoption of the agenda
- “2. The situation between Iran and Iraq

“Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group”.

Prior to the adoption of the agenda, the representative of Cuba stated that his delegation could not vote in favour of adopting the provisional agenda without voicing its deep dissatisfaction that the Council had not been able to consider a serious problem that was of concern to the entire world.⁸ In agreeing to consider item 2 of the provisional agenda, his delegation wished to express its view that the Council had a basic obligation to discuss the war situation prevailing in the Gulf and to hear the ideas and proposals Member States wished to put forth.

⁸ For the concerns expressed concerning the delay in convening a formal meeting on the situation in the Gulf, see chapter I, case 2.

The representative of the United States, speaking on a point of order, said that unless the representative of Cuba wished to make a proposal with respect to the provisional agenda currently before the Council, the debate into which he was entering was “completely out of order”.

The President (Zaire) stated that, if the representative of Cuba wished to raise a point of order, he would be obliged to ask the members of the Council to take an immediate decision on his ruling with regard to the adoption of the provisional agenda.

The representative of Cuba replied that he was addressing item 1 of the provisional agenda, entitled “Adoption of the agenda”, and that his delegation had “every right to express its disagreement with the manner in which attempts [were] being made to muzzle the Council”. That was the point of order that should be before the members of the Council.

The President reminded the Council that it was now proceeding pursuant to rule 9 of the provisional rules of procedure, which stipulated: “The first item of the provisional agenda for each meeting of the Security Council shall be the adoption of the agenda”. If a member objected to the adoption of the provisional agenda, he would be obliged to put that challenge to the vote.

On the point of order raised by the representative of the United States, the representative of Yemen remarked that there was nothing in rule 9 or any other rule that precluded any delegation’s request to make a statement before the adoption of the agenda.

The President reiterated that, if the representatives of Yemen and Cuba were challenging the agenda, he would be obliged to put that challenge to the vote.

The representative of Yemen repeated his view that rule 9 did not preclude a statement by any member of the Council before the adoption of the agenda, and that the representative of Cuba had the right to make a statement. He added that he also wished to make a short statement.

The President noted that: “Nowhere in the provisional rules of procedure [was] it stipulated that statements may be made before the agenda is adopted”. The Council therefore had to adopt the agenda first, and then, if there were any challenge to his ruling, he would request members to take a decision on that challenge.

The representative of Yemen indicated that he had not challenged what the President had said about rule 9. The Council could therefore proceed and adopt the provisional agenda. Nonetheless, the representative of Cuba believed that he had been “entirely in order”.⁹

The agenda was adopted without objection.

Part III

The agenda: matters of which the Security Council is seized (rules 10 and 11)

Note

Rule 10 of the provisional rules of procedure was designed to enable the Security Council to continue, at its next meeting, the consideration of an item of unfinished business without subjecting that item to renewed debate in connection with the adoption of the agenda. No discussion concerning the application of that rule occurred during the period under review. On many occasions, separate consecutive meetings were held on the same agenda item. In other instances, the meeting was suspended and resumed until the Council had completed that stage of its consideration of the item.¹⁰

In previous volumes of the Repertoire, it was noted that items on the agenda of the Council had remained on the summary statement by the Secretary-General on matters of which the Security Council is seized and on the stage reached in their consideration (rule 11) when the tenor of the Council's discussion or its specific decisions revealed a continuing concern with the matter. Additional evidence supporting such retention was provided when the President of the Council announced, upon conclusion of the debate, that the Council remained seized of a question.

During the period under review, all items remained on the list of matters of which the Security Council was seized unless the Council had formally concluded its consideration of them or the Secretary-General deleted them at the request of the parties concerned and with the consent of the Council members.

¹⁰ See 2970th meeting on the situation in the occupied Arab territories, held on 19 December 1990 and resumed on 20 December; 2977th meeting on the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, held in public on 13 February 1991, and resumed in private on 14, 15, 16, 23 and 25 February and 2 March; and 3059th meeting on the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, held on 11 March 1992 and resumed on 11 and 12 March.

The table appearing under rule 11 supplements those contained in the previous volumes of the Repertoire. It indicates the changes that have since occurred in the list of matters of which the Council is seized.

Retention and deletion of items from the summary statements by the Secretary-General on matters of which the Security Council is seized (rule 11)

This table follows the format adopted in the Supplement for the period 1969-1971 and in subsequent Supplements. Section A indicates items added to the list of matters of which the Council was seized during the period under review; section B indicates items appearing on previous lists for which new action by the Security Council was reported in the summary statements during that period; and section C indicates items deleted from the list during the same period. The table shows that, during the period under review, the Council included 64 new items in the list of matters of which it was seized and deleted 6 items. Of the deleted items, one was deleted by the Secretary-General, with the consent of the Council, pursuant to a request by the Member States parties to the issue in question. The five other items were deleted after conclusion of their consideration by the Council.

Introductory note

This chapter considers the Security Council's practice in extending invitations to participate in its proceedings. Part I concerns the basis on which invitations were extended. Part II considers procedures relating to participation after an invitation was extended.

Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter and rules 37 and 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council provide for invitations to be extended to non-members of the Security Council in the following circumstances: (a) when a Member of the United Nations brings a dispute or situation to the attention of the Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter (rule 37); (b) when a Member of the United Nations or a State that is not a member of the United Nations is "a party to a dispute" (Article 32); (c) when the interests of a Member of the United Nations are "specially affected" (Article 31 and rule 37); and (d) when "members of the Secretariat or other persons" are invited to supply information or give other assistance (rule 39). Only in the second instance ((b) above) does the Security Council have an obligation to extend an invitation.

In practice, in extending invitations, the Council has continued to refrain from referring explicitly to the relevant Charter articles. It has continued to make no distinction between a complaint involving a "dispute" within the meaning of Article 32, a "situation", or a matter of another nature. Invitations during the period 1989-1992 were usually extended "under the relevant provisions of the Charter" and either rule 37 or rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. The classification of invitations in part I reflects this practice. It is based on the relevant rules of procedure where this was indicated. Those instances in which the Council decided to extend invitations to participate in its proceedings without pronouncing itself on the basis for such invitations are treated separately. Part II — on procedures relating to participation — includes several cases concerning the stage at which invited States and representatives were heard and the order in which they were called upon to speak.

Basis of invitations to participate

Note

The Council's practice in connection with the extension of invitations is dealt with in this part in four sections. Section A deals with invitations extended under rule 37 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, which was the basis on which Member States not members of the Council were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings. The section describes the Council's general practice in this regard. It also includes one case in which there was a vote and discussion concerning a proposal to extend an invitation, and another unusual case in which the delegation of an invited participant was joined by a number of witnesses who spoke. Section B considers the Council's practice in extending invitations under rule 39. This was the basis on which "members of the Secretariat or other persons" were invited to provide the Council with information or other assistance. The section focuses on identifying the "other persons" invited to participate under rule 39. They included the following: representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies or agencies;¹ representatives of regional and other international organizations; and other individuals. Section C concerns those invitations that were not expressly extended under either rule 37 or rule 39. Such invitations were extended to two individuals. This practice is described in two case studies. Lastly, section D considers requests for invitations denied or not acted upon.

A. Invitations extended under rule 37 (States Members of the United Nations)

During the period under consideration, States Members of the United Nations not members of the Security Council who were invited to participate in the Council's proceedings were usually invited "under the relevant provisions of the Charter and rule 37 of the ¹ The term "agencies" is used broadly in the present context, to include specialized agencies, United Nations programmes and funds, and affiliated autonomous organizations, such as the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Council's provisional rules of procedure", without explicit reference being made to the relevant Charter articles. Rule 37 provides:

Any Member of the United Nations which is not a member of the Security Council may be invited, as the result of a decision of the Security Council, to participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council when the Security Council considers that the interests of that Member are specially affected, or when a Member brings a matter to the attention of the Security Council in accordance with Article 35 (1) of the Charter.

In practice, such invitations were usually extended as a matter of course and without discussion. They were requested in letters from the State concerned addressed to the President of the Council. The President informed the Council at the beginning or during the course of its meetings of the receipt of such letters and proposed that, with the consent of the Council, the invitations be extended. Usually, there being no objection, it was so decided. A table showing invitations extended under rule 37 is contained in annex I to this chapter.

There was one instance during this period when the decision to extend an invitation to a Member State was taken by vote, and gave rise to discussion. The circumstances concerned the extension of an invitation to a Member State before it was known who would represent that State. This is included as a case below (case 1). Also included as a case is an unusual instance in which an invited participant announced, in the course of his statement, that his delegation was joined by a number of witnesses, who subsequently spoke (case 2).

At the 2901st meeting, held on 21 December 1989 in connection with the situation in Panama, the President stated that it was his understanding, on the basis of prior consultations, that members of the Council wished to invite Panama to participate in the discussion.² At the request of the representative of the United States of America, the proposal to invite Panama was put to the vote. It was adopted by 14 votes in favour to none against, with 1 abstention (United States). Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States explained that, while his country had no objection to the State of Panama being represented in the debate on this particular issue, it considered that, before dealing with the question of participation, they should know who would be representing Panama before the Council. The representatives of Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland stressed that their favourable votes were without prejudice to the question of who should represent Panama. The representative of France noted that his delegation's approval of Panama's participation was meaningful only if agreement were subsequently reached on the appointment of a legitimately validated representative to speak on behalf of the Government of Panama.³ The President then informed Council members that he had received two separate requests to participate in the Council's debate in the capacity as representative of Panama. He stated his understanding that the Council wished to ask the Secretary-General to prepare a report on credentials under rules 14 and 15 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. It was so decided. At the 2902nd meeting, on 23 December 1989, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.⁴ The President then informed the Council that both requests for participation had been withdrawn.⁵

At the 2959th meeting, held on 27 November 1990, to consider the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Kuwait, who had been invited under rule 37, announced in the course of his statement that his country's delegation had been joined by "some brothers and sisters who [would] speak before the Council of their experiences under the occupation, and its effects on individuals, the economy and virtually everything in Kuwait". He then introduced a number of "witnesses", who subsequently spoke.⁶

B. Invitations extended under rule 39 (members of the Secretariat or other persons)

During the period under review, the Security Council invited a wide range of individuals to participate in its proceedings, to brief it on issues under consideration. These invitations were extended under rule 39, which states:

The Security Council may invite members of the Secretariat or other persons, whom it considers competent for the purpose, to supply it with information or to give other assistance in examining matters within its competence.

During this period, those senior Secretariat officials invited to participate under rule 39 included the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, who gave a briefing in connection with the item "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait".⁷ The "other persons" invited to participate under rule 39 included the following:

Representatives of United Nations organs, subsidiary bodies,⁸ or agencies;⁹

Representatives of regional or other international organizations;

Other individuals — such as experts, representatives of certain organizations or entities, or individuals specifically invited in their "personal capacity".

⁷ 3139th meeting, 23 November 1992.

Tables showing invitations under rule 39 are contained in annex II to this chapter.

Some general aspects of the Council's practice under rule 39 may be noted. Invitations to representatives of United Nations organs and subsidiary bodies were extended as a matter of course and without any formal discussion.¹⁰ Letters of request from the body concerned were read into the record of the meeting by the President of the Council and were not issued as documents of the Security Council.

The period under consideration saw the first invitations extended to the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the Executive Chairman of the United Nations Special Commission — both at Council meetings on the situation between Iraq and Kuwait;¹¹ and, in the humanitarian sphere, to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.¹² In the case of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission — a subsidiary organ of the Council itself — an invitation was issued in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's informal consultations prior to the meeting. The invitations to the Director General of IAEA and the High Commissioner were extended on the same basis.

Invitations to representatives of regional and other international organizations, on the other hand, were extended at the request of a Member State, on behalf of the proposed participant. Such requests were invariably granted without any formal discussion.¹³

Other individuals, too, were invited at the request of a Member State. In some instances, the President made it clear at the start of the formal meeting of the Council that members of the Council had agreed in prior consultations to extend an invitation to a particular individual. That was the practice followed by the Council in extending invitations to, for example, two individuals to participate in meetings regarding the situation in Cyprus,¹⁴ and to the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia to participate in a meeting concerning the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁵

The capacity in which individuals were invited gave rise to comment or discussion in the following three cases, which involved the representatives of certain South African organizations or entities (case 3), and two special rapporteurs of the Commission on Human Rights (cases 4 and 5).

At the 3095th meeting held on 15 July 1992 in connection with the question of South Africa, the Council extended invitations under rule 39, at the request of the representative of South Africa, to, among others, Mr. Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi, Mr. Lucas M. Mangope and Mr. Oupe J. Gqozo. At the 3096th meeting, held on 16 July 1992 in connection with the same item, an invitation was also extended under rule 39, at the request of the representative of India, to Mr. Bantu Holomisa. Before giving the floor to Mr. Buthelezi, the President (Cape Verde) stated that Mr. Buthelezi would be "speaking in his personal capacity" and that the invitation extended to him "did not in any way entail the recognition by the Council or any of its members of the organization or entity he claimed to represent".¹⁶ The President made similar remarks when he called on Messrs. Mangope, Gqozo and Holomisa to speak.¹⁷

By separate letters dated 7 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸ the representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the repression of the civilian population in parts of Iraq. They stated that their Governments were of the view that the work of the Council would be greatly assisted by the participation of Mr. Max van der Stoel under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council, and therefore requested that the Council extend an invitation to him under rule 39. One of the representatives noted that Mr. van der Stoel's interim report on the human rights situation in Iraq had been distributed as a document of the Security Council.¹⁹

At the 3105th meeting, held on 11 August 1992 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the President of the Council (China) drew attention to this request by the four Council members. He stated that the question to be decided by the Council was "an invitation under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure to Mr. van der Stoel in his personal capacity".²⁰ The representatives of India, Ecuador, Zimbabwe and China expressed reservations about the appropriateness of the Security Council extending an invitation to Mr. van der Stoel, on the ground that matters relating to human rights did not fall within the competence of the Security Council. They believed that such matters should be discussed by the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly.²¹ They pointed out that Mr. van der Stoel had been appointed as Special Rapporteur on the human rights situation in Iraq and that his appointment had been made by the Commission on Human Rights, a subsidiary body of the Economic and Social Council. As the Security Council did not have competence in the matter, it would not be possible for it either to examine his report or to take a stand on it. At the same time, however, the representatives of India, Ecuador and Zimbabwe noted the explanations given by the sponsors of the request, as well as the statement made by the President of the Council, to the effect that Mr. van der Stoel was being invited strictly in his personal capacity and not in any representative capacity. The President stated that the observations that had been made would be reflected in the records of the Security Council.²² The Council then decided to extend an invitation to Mr. van der Stoel to participate in the meeting under rule 39.

A similar discussion took place in connection with a proposed further invitation to Mr. van der Stoel to participate in the 3139th meeting, held on 23 November 1992 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. The representatives of China and Zimbabwe reiterated their reservations.²³ The President of the Council (now Hungary) noted that the observations that had been made would appear in the records of the Security Council.²⁴ Mr. van der Stoel was then invited to participate under rule 39, without the President mentioning that he was invited in his personal capacity.

A similar discussion had occurred earlier in November 1992, in relation to a proposal by the representatives of Belgium and France²⁵ that Mr. Tadeusz Mazowiecki (also a Special Rapporteur appointed by the Commission on Human Rights) should be invited to participate in the 3134th meeting of the Council, held on 23 November 1992 to consider the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. One of the requesting States noted that Mr. Mazowiecki was the author of two reports on the human rights situation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, the first of which had already been distributed as a document of the Security Council.²⁶ At the same meeting, the representatives of China and Zimbabwe expressed their reservations about the appropriateness of inviting Mr. Mazowiecki to address the Council, for the same reasons as they had cited in relation to participation by Mr. van der Stoel.²⁶ The President (Hungary) noted the observations, and stated that they would be reflected in the verbatim records of the Security Council.²⁸ The Council then extended an invitation to Mr. Mazowiecki under rule 39, without the President mentioning that he was invited in his personal capacity.

C. Invitations not expressly extended under rule 37 or rule 39

During the period under review, there were two instances of the Council extending an invitation to participate in its proceedings without referring to either rule 37 or rule 39: it did so in inviting the Permanent Observer of Palestine (case 6); and Mr. Ilija Djukic, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) — at a time when that State was not a Member of the United Nations (case 7).

Case 6

In January 1989, the Permanent Observer of Palestine for the first time directly submitted a request to participate in the proceedings of the Security Council — instead of, as previously, a Member State conveying a request on behalf of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).²⁹ The occasion was the 2841st meeting of the Council, held on 11 January 1989 in connection with an agenda item relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.³⁰ The President (Malaysia) informed the Council that he had received a letter dated 9 January 1989 from the Alternate Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations³¹ in which he requested that, in accordance with its previous practice, the Security Council invite him to participate in the consideration of the item. The President stated: “The request is not made pursuant to rule 37 or rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council but, if it is approved, the Council will invite the Alternate Permanent Observer of Palestine to participate, not under rule 37 or rule 39, but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37”.³²

The representative of the United States raised two objections to the terms of the proposed invitation. First, it was a long-standing practice that observers did not have the right to speak in the Security Council at their own request; rather, a request had to be made on the observer’s behalf by a Member State. His Government saw no justification for any departure from existing practice. Second, the only legal basis on which the Council might grant a hearing to persons speaking on behalf of non-governmental entities, such as the PLO, was rule 39. For four decades, the United States had supported a generous interpretation of rule 39 and would not have objected had this matter been appropriately raised under that rule. It was opposed, however, to special ad hoc departures from orderly procedure. The United States consequently opposed extending to the PLO the same rights to participate in the proceedings of the Security Council as if that organization represented a State Member of the United Nations.

The request of the Alternate Permanent Observer of Palestine was thereupon put to the vote. It was approved by 11 votes in favour, 1 against (United States) and 3 abstentions (Canada, France and the United Kingdom). Speaking in explanation of vote, the representative of Canada stated that he had abstained because the request did not conform to the procedure followed in the past, when the proposal was made by a sponsor country. Drawing attention to General Assembly resolution 43/177 on the question of Palestine,³³ he stated that that resolution did not change the procedure; its paragraph 3 was explicit in that respect. He stressed that while Canada did not oppose the Observer of Palestine’s being heard in United Nations bodies, it believed that the past procedure should continue to be followed. He and the

³⁰ The item was entitled “Letter dated 4 January 1989 from the Chargé d’affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council; and letter dated 4 January 1989 from the Chargé d’affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Bahrain to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council”. It concerned the question of the downing of two Libyan reconnaissance aircraft over international waters.

representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that their abstention did not mean that their respective countries had recognized the State of Palestine proclaimed on 15 November 1988 in Algiers. The representative of Finland, speaking in support of the proposal, observed: "For good or ill, the practice of granting an invitation to participate in Council debates without the right to vote has been given very wide application in recent years. In our view, it should follow from today's decision that States which are not Members of the United Nations must also be entitled to have their requests to participate submitted to the Council for a decision without intermediaries".³⁴

Invitations were thereafter extended, throughout the period under review, to the Permanent Observer of Palestine, on his direct request. They were explicitly granted "not under rule 37 or rule 39, but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37". Prior to December 1992, the invitations were granted in each instance after a procedural vote on the matter.³⁵

At the 3135th meeting, held on 13 November 1992 in connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the President (Hungary) stated that he had received a request dated 11 November 1992 from "His Excellency Foreign Minister Ilija Djukic" to address the Council. He continued: "With the consent of the Council, I would propose to invite him to address the Council in the course of the discussion of the item before it."³⁶ There being no objection, it was so decided. That meeting was adjourned before Mr. Djukic was called upon to speak. The Council continued its consideration of the item at the 3137th meeting, on 16 November 1992. In accordance with the decision taken at the 3135th meeting, the President invited "His Excellency Mr. Ilija Djukic, Minister for Foreign Affairs, to take a place at the Council table and to make his statement."³⁷ Mr. Djukic began his statement by saying, "As the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, I have been entrusted by my Government with the task of addressing today's Security Council meeting".³⁸ At that time, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was not a Member of the United Nations.³⁹

D. Requests for invitations denied or not acted upon

No request from a Member State for an invitation to participate in the proceedings of the Security Council was formally denied during the period under consideration. However, such requests were not acted upon in circumstances where the Council did not hold a formal meeting. A request by the representative of Azerbaijan, for example, to participate in a meeting on the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict was not acted upon, as the Security Council did not convene a formal meeting (case 8). In another instance, the Council convened a private meeting, not a public meeting, as requested. One of the requesting States, Mauritania, transmitted the text of a statement it would have made had the Council agreed to the holding of a public meeting (case 9).

By a letter dated 11 June 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰ the representative of Azerbaijan requested that, as the initiator of the sending of a United Nations fact-finding mission to the region of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict, he should be afforded, "in accordance with Article 32 of the Charter of the United Nations the opportunity of participating in and addressing the Security Council meeting to discuss the report on the results of the visit". In the event, the Security Council did not formally convene to discuss the report of the mission of experts, which was transmitted by the Secretary-

³⁹ By its resolution 777 (1992) of 19 September 1992, the Security Council stated that it considered that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had ceased to exist; and that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations. The Council therefore recommended to the General Assembly that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it should not participate in the work of the General Assembly. General in a note to the Security Council dated 24 July 1992.⁴¹

In a letter dated 23 January 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴² the representative of Mauritania, together with the other States members of the Arab Maghreb Union (Algeria, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Tunisia), requested the convening of “an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the grave situation in the Gulf region”. In a letter dated 15 February 1991,⁴³ the representative of Mauritania referred to that request for “an official, public meeting”. Noting that it had not met with a positive response from the Council, he transmitted “the text of the statement that we would have made had the Council agreed to the holding of such a public meeting”. At its 2977th meeting, on 13 February, the Council had included in its agenda the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, including the above-mentioned letter dated 23 January 1991. The Council then decided to hold private meetings to consider this item, with the understanding that attendance and requests for participation would be treated in the normal manner for public meetings, that rule 51 of the provisional rules of procedure would not be involved and that the normal verbatim record of the meeting would be taken and circulated. Upon the resumption of its 2977th meeting on 14 February, the Council met in six private sessions, on that day and on 15, 16, 23 and 25 February and 2 March. Neither Mauritania, nor the other States members of the Arab Maghreb Union, made a formal request to participate in the discussion.

Part II

Procedures relating to participation

Note

Part II is concerned with procedures relating to the participation of invited States or individuals after an invitation has been extended. Section A concerns the stage at which those invited to participate are heard. The Council has generally followed the practice whereby the parties to the conflict situation under consideration speak first, immediately after the adoption of the agenda. One case included here relates to the question of not hearing an invited representative before the vote on a draft resolution (case 10). Another case concerns a proposal put forward by a non-member of the Council concerning the speaking order (case 11). Also included, although they do not fit neatly, are two instances in which non-members of the Council, whether formally invited or not, submitted in writing the statements they would have made at the meetings had there been a general debate (cases 12 and 13). Section B deals with limitations on participation. It includes such matters as the duration of participation of those invited to participate; the right to submit proposals and draft resolutions, but not to have them put to a vote (rule 38 of the provisional rules of procedure); and limitations on the matters invited participants may discuss.

A. Stage at which those invited to participate are heard

Case 10

At the 2938th meeting, held on 25 August 1990 in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the representative of Iraq was called upon to speak after the vote on a draft resolution which was adopted as resolution 665 (1990). He stated that he had asked to speak before the vote in order to show the “illegality” of the resolution in question under the Charter, but that the President, “without citing a precedent or procedure”, had denied him that privilege.⁴⁴ The point was not discussed further.

Case 11

At the 2898th meeting, held on 14 December 1989 in connection with the situation in Cyprus, the representative of Greece, who had been invited to participate under rule 37, suggested that the President of the Security Council might wish to place before the members of the Council a procedural proposal: namely, that — in the light of Security Council resolutions 541 (1983) and 550 (1984), and bearing in mind rules 27, 29, 37 and 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure — precedence should be given to representatives of Member States who wished to address the Council over persons entitled to address the Council under rule 39.⁴⁵ The speaking order in the discussion had been as follows: the representative of Cyprus; the representative of Greece; Mr. Ozer Koray, under rule 39; the representative of Turkey; and the representative of Greece making his procedural proposal. No action was taken in response to the proposal at that meeting.

In a letter dated 10 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁶ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requested an “urgent emergency meeting of the Security Council, with formal debate”, to consider the situation in his country. At the 3106th meeting, held on 13 August 1992 to consider items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the President referred to a letter from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requesting an invitation to participate in the discussion; with the consent of the Council, he extended the invitation.⁴⁷

Council members had previously met informally in consultations and had convened the 3106th meeting for the purpose of voting on two draft resolutions (which were adopted as resolutions 770 (1992) and 771 (1992)). At the meeting, the Council thus proceeded directly to the vote, without debate, and consequently only Council members spoke, in explanation of vote. A letter dated 13 August 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President,⁴⁸ transmitting the text of a speech he had prepared for delivery to the Security Council but had not delivered “due to the fact that I have not been asked to speak before the Security Council today”, was circulated to the members of the Council.

At the same meeting, the representative of Venezuela, a member of the Council, read out a portion of the speech that the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina “would have wished to make at this meeting”.⁴⁹

The President of the Council also drew attention to letters from the representatives of Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Pakistan, which similarly contained the texts of speeches that the respective representatives said they would have delivered had there been a “general debate”.⁵⁰

In a letter dated 21 September 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵¹ the representative of Yugoslavia transmitted the text of the statement that he “unfortunately could not deliver” at the 3116th meeting of the Security Council held on 19 September 1992. At that meeting — at which the Council met to consider the item entitled “the draft resolution contained in document S/24570” concerning membership in the United Nations of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia — no invitations to participate were extended and the Council agreed to proceed to the vote on the draft resolution before it.⁵² In a statement before the vote, the representative of Zimbabwe noted that “one would have thought that the elementary principles of fairness demand that when the Council is about to take such a momentous decision on the fate of a State, that State should at least be afforded the opportunity to state its case.”⁵³

B. Limitations on participation

During the period under review, no discussion arose regarding the question of duration of the participation of those invited to participate. The practice was generally maintained whereby the President, when consideration of a question was extended over several meetings, renewed the invitation at each consecutive meeting immediately after the adoption of the agenda.

With regard to limitations on the scope of participation, one of the cases mentioned above (case 11) demonstrates the right of a non-member of the Council to make a proposal, but not to have it put to the vote (rule 38 of the provisional rules of procedure). The Council continued to follow its general practice of not permitting invited representatives to discuss procedural matters, such as the adoption of the agenda, the extension of invitations and the postponement of consideration of a question. No question arose during the period under review concerning such limitations.

The present chapter contains material relating to the practice of the Security Council on voting under Article 27 of the Charter and rule 40 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council.¹ The arrangement of the material basically follows that of the corresponding chapter in earlier volumes of the Repertoire.

Part I presents evidence relating to the distinction between procedural and non-procedural matters. Most votes in the Council do not indicate by themselves whether the Council considers the matter voted upon as procedural or non-procedural: this is the case, for instance, when a proposal is adopted by a unanimous vote; when all permanent members vote in favour of a proposal; or when a proposal fails to obtain the necessary nine votes in its favour. Part I lists those instances in which the vote did indicate, respectively, the procedural or non-procedural nature of the decision. Part II contains no entries, as during the period 1989-1992 there was no material relating to the practice of the Council in voting upon the question whether a matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27 (2). Part III is concerned with the abstention, non-participation or absence of a Council member in relation to the requirements of Article 27 (3). Part IV deals with decisions adopted without a vote.

Article 27

1. Each member of the Security Council shall have one vote.
2. Decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members.
3. Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

¹ Material relating to voting in connection with the election of judges under Article 10 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice is included in chapter VI, part IV. Material on the voting procedure employed by the Council in connection with the applications for admission to membership in the United Nations is contained in chapter VII.

Part I Procedural and non-procedural matters

Note

Part I is divided into two sections. Section A comprises instances in which the vote indicated the procedural character of the matter under consideration. Section B lists instances in which the vote indicated the non-procedural character of the matter. There was no discussion on the procedural or non-procedural nature of the questions under consideration.

The record of voting may be conclusive where a proposal obtained nine or more votes, with one or more permanent members casting a negative vote. Adoption by the Council in such circumstances indicates the procedural character of the matter; rejection by the Council in such circumstances indicates the non-procedural character of the matter.

Part II

Proceedings of the Security Council regarding voting upon the question whether the matter was procedural within the meaning of Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Charter

Note

On certain occasions the Security Council has found it necessary to decide, by vote, the question whether or not the matter under consideration was procedural within the meaning of Article 27 (2). This question has come to be termed, after the language used in the San Francisco Statement on Voting Procedure, “the preliminary question”.

There were no instances of voting on the preliminary question during the period under review.

Part III

Abstention, non-participation or absence in relation to Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter

Note

According to Article 27 (3) of the Charter, the affirmative vote of nine members for decisions on non-procedural (substantive) matters must include “the concurring votes of the permanent members”. Part III concerns the application of this requirement: (a) in the light of the proviso to Article 27 (3) (requiring abstention); and (b) in circumstances when a permanent member voluntarily abstains, does not participate in the vote, or is absent at the time of the vote.

A. Obligatory abstention

The proviso to Article 27 (3) states:

provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

In the period under review, there were no cases in which members abstained in accordance with the proviso to Article 27 (3). In three instances, however, the issue of obligatory abstention was considered (see cases 1-3 below).

Consideration of abstention in accordance with the proviso to Article 27, paragraph 3

At the 2949th meeting, held on 24 October 1990 to consider the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the representative of Cuba commented on the definition of a “party to the dispute” within the meaning of Article 27 (3). Speaking before the vote on a draft resolution, which he urged be adopted unanimously, he stated that the permanent members of the Security Council had only one special prerogative under the Charter of the United Nations, and that came at the time of a vote. Even so, the Charter was careful to specify that that special authority did not prevail in all circumstances. It did not prevail on procedural issues, or when a permanent member was a party to a dispute. If a permanent member considered that a question the Council was about to take up was particularly important and close to it, its prerogative could not be interpreted as meaning that it could block the effective action required of the Council under Article 24. If a member of the Council had such an intimate connection with a particular issue, that would come closest to the definition of “a party to a dispute” and, in that case, it would have neither the special power of the veto nor, strictly speaking, the right to take part in the vote. As Article 27 (3) stated, it should abstain from voting.² In the event, the resolution in question was adopted unanimously.³

At the 3033rd meeting, held on 21 January 1992 to consider items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the legality of the Security Council’s work was subject to its observance and proper implementation of the provisions of the Charter. He maintained that that could not be achieved if the parties to the dispute in question were to participate in the voting on the draft resolution before the Council, submitted by France, the United Kingdom and the United States. He remarked: “[t]o disregard the legal nature of the dispute and to treat it as a political matter would constitute a flagrant violation of the explicit provisions of Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter.”⁴ In the event, all Council members did participate in the vote on the draft resolution in question, which was adopted unanimously as resolution 731 (1992). At the 3063rd meeting, on 31 March 1992, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya claimed that the procedure the Council had followed in adopting that resolution had not taken into account the correct implementation of Article 27 (3), which provided that in the case of decisions adopted under Chapter VI, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting. He contended that that was applicable to France, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵

³ Resolution 673 (1990).

⁵ S/PV.3063, p. 7.

By contrast, speaking after the vote at the 3033rd meeting, at which resolution 731 (1992) was adopted, the representative of the United States stated that the issue at hand was “not some difference of opinion or approach that could be mediated or negotiated”. It was, as the Security Council had just recognized, conduct threatening to all, and a direct threat to international peace and security. The mandate of the Council required that it squarely face up to its responsibilities in the case. It must not be distracted by Libyan attempts to convert what was an issue of international peace and security into one of bilateral differences.⁶ The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the Council was not, in the words of article 14 of the Montreal Convention, dealing with a dispute between two or more contracting parties concerning the interpretation or application of the Montreal Convention. It was concerned, rather, with the proper reaction of the international community to the situation arising from the failure of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, thus far, to respond effectively to the most serious accusations of State involvement in acts of terrorism.⁷

Case 3

At the 3046th meeting, on 31 January 1992, the Security Council convened for the first time at the level of Heads of State or Government to consider the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”. Addressing this issue, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe and Personal Emissary of the President of Zimbabwe stated that, as the principles of the Charter must govern the global order, the process of creating a new world order should begin with a re-examination of the Charter itself in the context of the changing international circumstances. A new world order could best be created by rectifying the flaws in the Charter, closing the gaps that had been revealed by recent developments, and updating those of its provisions that had been rendered obsolete. The Minister for Foreign Affairs observed, for example, that his country believed that a collective security system liable to veto by one or a few States was not reliable. It meant that the Security Council could not take any action in a conflict in which one of the permanent members had a direct interest. While that had undoubtedly been one of the considerations at San Francisco, he wondered whether it had not been overtaken by events. In that regard, Zimbabwe suggested that consideration could be given to extending Article 27 (3), of the Charter — which provided that, in decisions relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes under Chapter VI, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting. Its proposal was that this limitation should also apply to Chapter VII, so that those who wielded the veto power could not block the imposition of sanctions or any other collective enforcement action when they were parties to a conflict.⁸

B. Voluntary abstention, non-participation or absence in relation to Article 27, paragraph 3

This section lists those instances in which permanent members voluntarily abstained from voting. In each case, in conformity with its consistent practice, the Security Council considered the resolution in question to have been adopted notwithstanding the abstention. During the period under review, there were no instances of non-participation of permanent members or of votes taken in their absence.

Part IV Adoption of resolutions and decisions without a vote

Note

Most procedural motions during this period were approved without a vote.⁹

Certain decisions of substance were also taken without a vote, as shown in the case of resolutions, in the table in section A below. In these particular cases, which all concerned the admission of new Members, the President, in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations, proposed “that the Council adopt without a vote” the draft resolution contained in the relevant report of the Committee on the Admission of New Members.

No votes were taken on decisions that took the form of statements by the President on behalf of the Council or on behalf of the members of the Council. These “presidential statements” were issued after having been agreed upon by members of the Council during consultations. In some cases, they were announced at a formal meeting of the Council (section B.1); in others, they were simply issued in written form (section B.2).

In yet other instances, Security Council decisions were recorded in letters or notes from the President of the Council (section C), with no reference to a vote having been taken.

⁹ Exceptions were the votes on the suspension of a meeting and on certain invitations to participate; see the instances cited in part I above.

Introductory note

This chapter covers procedures of the Security Council relating to the establishment and control of subsidiary organs deemed necessary for the performance of its functions under the Charter of the United Nations. The Council's power to establish subsidiary organs is set out in Article 29 of the Charter and reflected in rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure as follows:

Article 29

The Security Council may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions.

Rule 28

The Security Council may appoint a commission or committee or a rapporteur for a specified question.

The period 1989 to 1992 saw a considerable expansion in the number of subsidiary organs established by the Council. The Council mandated the establishment of 11 new peacekeeping operations and established four new committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41 of the Charter. It also created a number of ad hoc commissions in the aftermath of the Iraq-Kuwait conflict. In addition, the Council authorized the establishment of a commission of experts to examine reported violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia.

Part I of this chapter considers these new organs, together with those established prior to 1989 and continuing during part or all of the period under review. The organs are divided into five main categories, reflecting their main character or functions: standing and ad hoc committees; investigative bodies; peacekeeping missions; committees to oversee the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41; and ad hoc commissions. Six peacekeeping missions were terminated during the period under review. This is reflected in Part II. Part III considers four instances in which a subsidiary organ was formally proposed but not established.

Part I

Subsidiary organs of the Security Council established or continuing during the period 1989-1992

A. Standing committees/ad hoc committees

During the period from 1989 to 1992, the Committee of Experts on Rules of Procedure and the Committee on Council Meetings away from Headquarters continued to exist but did not meet.

The Committee on the Admission of New Members was asked to consider the applications for admission to membership in the United Nations of 22 States, referred to it by the Council under rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure. The recommendations made by the Committee and the Council concerning admission are considered in chapter VII. Another body concerned with membership, the Committee of Experts established by the Council at the 1506th meeting, concerning the question of associate membership, continued to exist but did not meet.

Other ad hoc subsidiary organs established prior to 1989 which continued to exist during the period under review included the Committee established by Security Council resolution 446 (1979), concerning the situation in the occupied Arab territories; and the Ad Hoc Committee established under Security Council resolution 507 (1982), concerning the Seychelles. There was no activity during the period under review on the part of either body.

B. Investigative bodies

During the period under review, the Security Council authorized the Secretary-General to establish a Commission of Experts to investigate grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.

Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 780 (1992) to examine reported violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 780 (1992) of 6 October 1992, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse evidence relating to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.¹ The Council also requested the Secretary-General to report to it on the establishment and conclusions of the Commission of Experts, and to take account of those conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps called for by resolution 771 (1992).

On 14 October 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the establishment of the Commission of Experts.² He noted that the Council's request to establish such a Commission to some extent duplicated an initiative of another United Nations organ, the Commission on Human Rights, which had requested its Chairman two months earlier to appoint a special rapporteur for the former Yugoslavia.³ Therefore, in establishing the Commission of Experts, he had taken into account the mandate and work of the Special Rapporteur, with a view to minimizing duplication, maximizing the efficient use of scarce resources, and reducing costs. The Secretary-General stated that the Commission, which would be located at the United Nations Office at ¹ Prior to the adoption of that resolution, the Security Council, by resolution 771 (1992) of 13 August 1992, had called upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them related to such violations and to make that information available to the Council. In resolution 780 (1992), the Council again requested States, United Nations bodies and other relevant organizations to make such information available, and to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts.

Geneva, would consist initially of five members serving in their personal capacity and would be assisted by a small secretariat, which would rely on the resources already made available to the Special Rapporteur.⁴

By resolution 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, the Security Council welcomed the establishment of the Commission of Experts and requested it to pursue actively its investigations with regard to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular the practice of “ethnic cleansing”.⁵

C. Peacekeeping missions

During the four years under review, the Security Council mandated the establishment of 11 new peacekeeping missions — in Western Sahara, Angola, Somalia, South Africa, Mozambique, Central America, El Salvador, Iraq/Kuwait, the former Yugoslavia, Namibia and Cambodia — of which the two last mentioned were complex, integrated missions. It also authorized significant changes and expansion in some of their mandates. In a presidential statement made at the conclusion of the Council’s summit meeting on 31 January 1992, the members of the Council noted the increased breadth of the tasks assigned to peacekeeping missions:

“The members of the Council note that United Nations peacekeeping tasks have increased and broadened considerably in recent years. Election monitoring, human rights verification and the repatriation of refugees have in the settlement of some regional conflicts, at the request or with the agreement of the parties concerned, been integral parts of the Security Council’s efforts to maintain international peace and security. The members of the Council welcome these developments.”⁶

The Council also continued to oversee the work of a number of peacekeeping missions established during an earlier period,⁷ most of which served the more traditional role of an interposition force or military observers.

Those peacekeeping missions are considered below, by geographic region, in the order in which they were established.⁸

Africa

1. United Nations Angola Verification Mission established pursuant to Security Council resolution 626 (1988)

The United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM I) was established on 20 December 1988 by Security Council resolution 626 (1988) to monitor the withdrawal of Cuban troops and equipment from Angola in accordance with a timetable agreed between the Governments of Angola and Cuba.⁹ Beginning with an advance party of 18 military observers deployed to Luanda on 3 January 1989, UNAVEM I reached a strength of 70 military observers by 25 May 1991, the date on which, according to a final report by the Secretary-General dated 6 June 1991,¹⁰ the Mission completed its task. In his report, the Secretary-General observed that thereafter, all of the resources of UNAVEM I would be concentrated on the new tasks assigned by resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission, which was thereafter to be known as UNAVEM II.¹¹

⁴ On 26 October 1992, the Secretary-General appointed Professor Frits Kalshoven (Netherlands) as Chairman of the Commission of Experts, and Professor M. Cherif Bassiouni (Egypt), Mr. William J. Fenrick (Canada), Judge Kéba Mbaye (Senegal) and Professor Torkel Opsahl (Norway) as its members.

2. United Nations Transition Assistance Group established pursuant to Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 629 (1989)

Establishment

When the Security Council sought to implement the settlement plan for the independence of Namibia, through free elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations, it established the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) to assist the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in that endeavour. The Council created UNTAG by resolution 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978, in which it approved the Secretary-General's report of 29 August 1978 and his explanatory statement of 28 September 1978.¹² As the peace plan of 1978 failed, however, UNTAG did not become operational at that time. Following progress in the peace process in 1988,¹³ the Council, on 16 January 1989, unanimously adopted resolution 629 (1989), by which it decided that 1 April 1989 would be the date on which the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) would begin. The Council called upon South Africa to reduce the size of its police forces in Namibia with a view to achieving a reasonable balance between those forces and UNTAG so as to ensure effective monitoring by the latter. It also requested the Secretary-General to prepare an updated report on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978), taking into account all relevant developments since the adoption of that resolution, and seeking cost-saving measures which would not prejudice the effectiveness of the operation.

In a report dated 23 January 1989,¹⁴ the Secretary-General set out his recommendations for the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) with effect from 1 April 1989, and the requirements for UNTAG. He noted that a number of agreements and understandings which had been reached by the parties since the adoption of resolution 435 (1978) now also formed part of the United Nations plan for Namibia. They included a 1982 agreement that UNTAG would monitor the bases of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) in Angola and Zambia, and obligations on the part of South Africa to ensure free and fair elections in Namibia. In an explanatory statement of 9 February,¹⁵ the Secretary-General addressed concerns raised by various parties about some of the recommendations contained in his report. By resolution 632 (1989) of 16 February 1989, the Security Council approved the Secretary-General's report and his explanatory statement, and decided to implement resolution 435 (1978) "in its original and definitive form". The Council requested the Secretary-General to keep it fully informed on the implementation of the resolution.

Mandate/composition

The mandate of UNTAG, as set out in resolution 435 (1978), was to assist the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to carry out the mandate conferred upon him, namely, "to ensure the early independence of Namibia through free elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations".

Under the plan approved by the Council in 1978,¹⁶ it was envisaged that UNTAG would consist of a civilian component and a military component, both of which would be under the overall direction of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.¹⁷ The civilian component would consist of two elements: an electoral element and police monitors. The electoral element would assist the Special Representative in implementing the various stages of the electoral process. He would have to satisfy himself at each stage as to the fairness and appropriateness of all measures affecting the political process before such measures took effect. In his report of 23 January 1989,¹⁸ the Secretary-General proposed to maintain the initial complement of 800 electoral supervisors. He proposed an increase, on the other hand, in the number of police monitors from the 360 stipulated in 1978 to 500, in the light of the increase in the size of the South African police forces in Namibia.

With regard to the military component, the Secretary-General referred to the serious concern which had been expressed to him, particularly by the permanent members of the Security Council, regarding its size and likely cost. Under the plan approved by the Council in 1978, the military component would have accounted for more than 75 per cent of the cost of the mission. The Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Organization of African Unity (OAU), front-line States and SWAPO, on the other hand, had told him of their strong opposition to any reduction in its size. In those circumstances, the Secretary-General proposed that the authorized upper limit for the military component of UNTAG should remain at 7,500 but that the force should initially be deployed with a strength of only 4,650.¹⁹ If his Special Representative reported a real need for additional military personnel, the Secretary-General would deploy as many of the reserve battalions as he judged to be necessary, subject to there being no objection from the Security Council. In the meantime, the Secretary-General proposed a concept of operations under which the military component would concentrate on certain specific tasks, namely: monitoring the disbandment of the citizen forces, commando units and ethnic forces, including the South West African Territorial Force; monitoring South African Defence Force troops in Namibia, as well as SWAPO forces in neighbouring countries; and securing installations in the northern border area. Other tasks approved under resolution 435 (1978), such as monitoring the cessation of hostile acts by all parties, and keeping the borders under surveillance and preventing infiltration, would not, however, be eliminated. Some of them would instead be done by military monitors or observers, whose numbers were to be increased from 200 to 300.

The estimated cost of the civilian and military components of UNTAG would thus be approximately $416 million, excluding the cost of the repatriation and resettlement operation of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), for which a separate appeal would be launched.

In an explanatory statement of 9 February 1989,²⁰ the Secretary-General stated that, following representations made to him by a number of delegations, he had decided to make an exception to standard peacekeeping practice; he had given the Force

Commander of UNTAG discretion to authorize the military observers to carry weapons of a defensive character, as and when necessary. As approved in resolution 435 (1978), the military component of UNTAG would not use force except in self-defence.²¹

Implementation/enlargement

On 16 March 1989, in an addendum to his 23 January report,²² the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the text of the agreement signed in New York on 10 March between the United Nations and the Republic of South Africa, on the status of UNTAG. On 30 March, in a second addendum,²³ he reported that both South Africa and SWAPO had agreed in writing to his proposal that a formal ceasefire should commence on 1 April 1989.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council, dated 24 and 26 May 1989,²⁴ the members of the Council agreed to the Secretary-General's proposal to increase the number of UNTAG civilian police monitors to 1,000, on the recommendation of his Special Representative in Namibia.

By resolution 640 (1989) of 28 August 1989, the Security Council demanded strict compliance by all parties concerned, especially South Africa, with the terms of resolutions 435 (1978) and 632 (1989). It also demanded the disbandment of all paramilitary and ethnic forces and commando units, in particular Koevoet, as well as the dismantling of their command structures, as required by resolution 435 (1978). The Council called upon the Secretary-General to review the actual situation on the ground with a view to determining the adequacy of the military component of UNTAG in relation to its ability to carry out its responsibilities as authorized under resolutions 435 (1978) and 632 (1989) and to inform the Security Council. It also invited him to review the adequacy of the number of police monitors in order to undertake the process for any appropriate increase that he might deem necessary for the effective fulfilment of the responsibilities of UNTAG. In addition, the Council requested the Secretary-General, in his supervision and control of the electoral process, to ensure that all legislation concerning the electoral process was in conformity with the provisions of the settlement plan; that all proclamations conformed with internationally accepted norms for the conduct of free and fair elections and, in particular, that the proclamation on the Constituent Assembly also respected the sovereign will of the people of Namibia; and that strict impartiality was observed in the provision of media facilities to all parties for the dissemination of information concerning the election. The Council requested the Secretary-General to report to it before the end of September on the implementation of the resolution.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 26 and 28 September 1989,²⁵ the members of the Council agreed to the Secretary-General's proposal to further increase the number of UNTAG civilian police monitors to 1,500. Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 10 and 17 October 1989,²⁶ the members of the Council also agreed to the Secretary-General's proposal to increase the number of electoral supervisors to 1,395. In doing so, they expressed their concern that expenditures for UNTAG should continue to be carefully monitored at a time of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources.

In a report dated 6 October 1989,²⁷ the Secretary-General addressed the various issues raised in resolution 640 (1989), as well as some other important aspects of the implementation of the settlement plan. In his concluding observations, the Secretary-General stated that he had continuing concerns about the presence of ex-members of the counter-insurgency unit known as Koevoet in the South West Africa Police and referred to the problems concerning the latter's cooperation with UNTAG police monitors. He also referred to the difficulties encountered by UNTAG in verifying the confinement to base of SWAPO combatants in Angola. He stressed that the continuing cooperation of all the parties involved was essential, not least because UNTAG had no powers to enforce the provisions of the settlement plan.

By resolution 643 (1989) of 31 October 1989, the Council reiterated its demand for the complete disbandment of all remaining paramilitary and ethnic forces and commando units, in particular Koevoet and the South West African Territorial Force, as well as the complete dismantling of their command structures, and requested the Secretary-General to pursue his efforts to ensure the immediate replacement of the remaining South African Defence Force personnel. The Council also demanded that the South West Africa Police fully cooperate with the UNTAG civil police in carrying out the tasks assigned to it under the settlement plan, and invited the Secretary-General to keep under constant review the adequacy of the number of UNTAG police monitors. The Council mandated the Secretary-General to ensure that all necessary arrangements were made in accordance with the settlement plan to safeguard the territorial integrity and security of Namibia in order to ensure a peaceful transition to national independence, and to assist the Constituent Assembly in the discharge of responsibilities entrusted to it under the settlement plan. It also requested him to prepare appropriate plans for mobilizing all forms of assistance for the people of Namibia during the period following the elections for the Constituent Assembly until the country's accession to independence. The Council requested the Secretary-General to report on the implementation of the resolution as soon as possible.

In a report dated 3 November 1989,²⁸ the Secretary-General addressed the issues raised in resolution 643 (1989) and described the latest developments relating to certain other aspects of the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia. He observed that after a careful evaluation of the situation, his Special Representative had concluded that, on balance, he was satisfied that conditions existed that would permit the holding of free and fair elections in Namibia at that time. Based on all the information available to him, the Secretary-General had endorsed that conclusion. On 14 November 1989, the Secretary-General submitted a further report on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978).²⁹ The report contained the results of the elections held in Namibia from 7 to 11 November 1989, which had been certified by his Special Representative as free and fair, thus paving the way for the convening of a Constituent Assembly and Namibia's independence.

In a statement made on 20 November 1989 by the President of the Council on behalf of its members,³⁰ Council members welcomed the successful conclusion of the elections in Namibia certified by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as free and fair. They reaffirmed the continuing role of the United Nations during the transition period in ensuring the full implementation of the settlement plan until independence and adoption by the Constituent Assembly of a Constitution that would accord sovereignty to Namibia. They also requested the Secretary-General to provide the Constituent Assembly with all necessary assistance to carry out its responsibility. On 16 March 1990, the Secretary-General submitted an addendum to his further report,³¹ which contained the full text of the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia approved by the Constituent Assembly on 9 February 1990. He informed the Council that the Constitution would enter into force on Independence Day, 21 March 1990.

Termination

On 28 March 1990, the Secretary-General submitted a final report on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978),³² in which he concluded that, with the accession of Namibia to independence on 20/21 March 1990, the mandate entrusted to UNTAG by the Security Council had come to an end.

3. United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara established pursuant to Security Council resolution 690 (1991)

Establishment

In a report dated 18 June 1990,³³ the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) to implement the settlement proposals that he had made jointly with the Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU³⁴ and which had been accepted in principle by Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (Frente Polisario) on 30 August 1988. The main elements of the proposed settlement were a ceasefire and a referendum by which the people of Western Sahara would choose between independence and integration with Morocco. The implementation plan contained in the report was based on recommendations made by a Technical Commission established on 30 June 1989. It provided for a transitional period, lasting from the entry into force of the ceasefire to the announcement of the results of the referendum, during which the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Western Sahara would have sole responsibility over all matters relating to the referendum. The Special Representative would be assisted in his tasks by an integrated group of United Nations civilian, military and civil police personnel, to be known as MINURSO. By resolution 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, the Security Council approved the report of the Secretary-General; welcomed his intention to dispatch a technical mission to Western Sahara and neighbouring countries, to refine the administrative aspects of the outlined plan; and requested him to transmit as soon as possible a further detailed report, containing in particular an estimate of the cost of MINURSO, on the basis of which it would authorize the establishment of the Mission.

On 19 April 1991, the Secretary-General submitted a further report,³⁵ containing detailed proposals with regard to the composition, strength and duration of the Mission, and recommending that the Mission should now be established and should be operational by the start of the transitional period, approximately 16 weeks after the General Assembly approved the MINURSO budget. By resolution 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991, the Council decided to establish MINURSO, under its authority, in accordance with the Secretary-General's report of 19 April 1991; decided that the transitional period would begin no later than 16 weeks after the General Assembly approved the budget for the Mission; and requested the Secretary-General to keep it regularly informed of the implementation of his settlement plan.

Pursuant to resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991), by which the Council approved the Secretary-General's reports of 18 June 1990 and 19 April 1991,³⁶ MINURSO would undertake the following tasks: (a) monitor the ceasefire; (b) verify the reduction of Moroccan troops in Western Sahara; (c) monitor the confinement of Moroccan and Frente Polisario troops to designated areas; (d) take steps with the parties to ensure the release of all Western Saharan political prisoners or detainees; (e) oversee the exchange of prisoners of war under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross; (f) implement the repatriation programme under the auspices of UNHCR; (g) identify and register qualified voters; and (h) organize and ensure a free and fair referendum and proclaim the results.

MINURSO would consist of three units: a civilian unit of approximately 900 personnel, including the personnel of an Identification Commission,³⁷ a Referendum Commission and a component to implement the repatriation programme; a security unit of about 300 police officers; and a military unit with a strength of approximately 1,700 personnel, including 550 military observers, an infantry battalion of 700, an air support unit of 110 and a logistics battalion of 200.³⁸

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, dated 21 and 24 June 1991,³⁹ the Council approved the Secretary-General's proposal to appoint Major General Armand Roy (Canada) as the force commander of the military unit of MINURSO. Through a further exchange of letters, dated 3 and 9 July 1991,⁴⁰ the Council agreed to the composition of the military unit proposed by the Secretary-General.

The mission area included the Territory of Western Sahara and designated locations in neighbouring countries, where a number of Western Saharans were known to be living. In accordance with the timetable proposed by the Secretary-General, MINURSO would complete its main tasks within 36 weeks.⁴¹

As recommended by the Secretary-General in his report of 19 April 1991, the overall cost of the operation, estimated at approximately $200 million, was to be considered an expense of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter, except for the cost of the repatriation programme, estimated at some $35 million, which would be funded through voluntary contributions.

Implementation

By a letter dated 8 July 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴² the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had written to Morocco and the Frente Polisario proposing that a formal ceasefire should commence on 6 September 1991, to which both parties had agreed. By a letter dated 3 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴³ the Secretary-General transmitted a note regarding the implementation of the ceasefire. He stated that, concerned at recent developments along the international frontier, he had decided that all efforts of the Mission should be concentrated, at that stage, in the areas referred to in the note. He intended to deploy, as of 6 September 1991, about 100 military observers to verify the ceasefire and the cessation of hostilities in those areas. By a letter dated 4 September 1991,⁴⁴ the President informed the Secretary-General that the members endorsed his action. Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 13 and 17 September 1991,⁴⁵ it was agreed that 100 additional military observers and the staff necessary for command and control functions, logistical support, communications, air transport and medical transport should be deployed to those areas.

In a report dated 19 December 1991,⁴⁶ the Secretary-General reported that the Mission's timetable had to be adjusted. The parties had divergent views and different interpretations of some of the key elements of the settlement plan, including those with regard to the question of criteria for eligibility to vote in the referendum. There was likely to be a delay of some months while consultations continued with the parties on those matters. During that time, efforts would be made to reduce costs. In particular, the civilian and military staff not required to support the consultations and verify the ceasefire would be withdrawn. The Security Council approved the report in resolution 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, and requested the Secretary-General to submit a further report as soon as possible, but in any event within two months.

In a report dated 28 February 1992,⁴⁷ the Secretary-General underlined that the primary function of MINURSO in its current limited deployment was to monitor the ceasefire. He stressed that the persistence of differences between the parties regarding the interpretation of the settlement plan made it difficult to establish a realistic timetable for the conduct of the referendum. He recommended that, if the outstanding issues could not be resolved within the next three months, alternative courses of action should be considered; he would accordingly report further to the Security Council before the end of May. In the meantime, he recommended maintaining the current level of MINURSO activity. He reported that a further streamlining of MINURSO was being undertaken to achieve maximum economy.

In a report dated 29 May 1992,⁴⁸ the Secretary-General reiterated that the role of the MINURSO military unit was limited to monitoring the ceasefire. Noting that both parties had agreed to reactivate the settlement plan, he recommended that the MINURSO mandate be extended for a further period of three months. By a letter dated 3 June 1992,⁴⁹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council shared his view on the necessity of maintaining in place the existing deployment of MINURSO and requested him to submit a further progress report on the implementation of the plan at the earliest possible date.

In a report dated 20 August 1992,⁵⁰ the Secretary-General noted that there had been a considerable decline in the number of ceasefire violations and that his Special Representative had undertaken talks with both sides aimed at overcoming the remaining obstacles to the holding of the referendum. The Secretary-General stated his intention to submit a further report before the end of September to inform the Council about the outcome of those talks. He recommended that the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO be maintained until the end of that month. By a letter dated 31 August 1992,⁵¹ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the Council members agreed with his proposal.

By a letter dated 2 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵² the Secretary-General stated that the talks between his Special Representative and the parties had been inconclusive. He therefore proposed to postpone for six to eight weeks the submission of the report mentioned in his earlier report, pending further consultations. He recommended that, in the meantime, the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO be maintained. By a letter dated 8 October 1992,⁵³ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council reiterated their full support for his efforts to overcome the obstacles which were impeding the implementation of the settlement plan and approved his proposal to maintain the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO.

By a letter dated 16 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁴ the Secretary-General stated that his report would have to be further postponed until the second week of December in order to await the results of a consultative meeting of tribal chiefs of Western Sahara to be held in Geneva. However, in a letter dated 22 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁵ the Secretary-General stated that, due to the persisting differences among the parties, it had not been possible to hold the consultative meeting. He also stated that, despite the absence of agreement among all concerned on the major aspects of the settlement plan, he felt obliged to take concrete steps towards the holding of the referendum, in the expectation that both parties would fully cooperate with him. He would outline those steps in his forthcoming report, which he would submit to the Council in the second half of January 1993.

4. United Nations Angola Verification Mission established pursuant to Security Council resolution 696 (1991)

Establishment

By resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, the Security Council entrusted a new mandate to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (hereafter to be known as UNAVEM II), which had completed its task of overseeing the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola on 25 May 1991. The Council approved the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General dated 20 and 29 May 1991,⁵⁶ including that the mandate of UNAVEM be enlarged and prolonged in order to enable the Mission to carry out new verification tasks arising from the Peace Accords recently concluded by the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA).⁵⁷ The tasks arising for the United Nations from the Peace Accords would include: (a) verification of the monitoring of the ceasefire and (b) participation in the monitoring of the Angolan police during the ceasefire period. The Secretary-General had further recommended that the new UNAVEM mandate last from 31 May 1991, the date on which the ceasefire was to enter into force, until the day following the completion of presidential and legislative elections, to be held between 1 September and 30 November 1992. In addition, the Secretary-General recommended that the full cost of the operation, approximately $132.3 million, should be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

The Secretary-General had issued his report after having received a letter dated 17 May 1991 from the representative of Angola transmitting a letter dated 8 May from the Minister for External Relations of Angola.⁵⁸ The Minister had requested the Secretary-General to take action to ensure the participation of the United Nations in verifying the implementation of the Peace Accords, as agreed by both sides, and accordingly to inform the Security Council of the need to prolong the presence of UNAVEM in the country until the general elections had been held.

Mandate/composition

In his report of 20 and 29 May 1991,⁵⁹ the Secretary-General stated that UNAVEM II military observers would work closely with, but remain separate from, the joint ceasefire monitoring groups composed of representatives of the two Angolan parties.⁶⁰ UNAVEM II would closely observe their functioning, provide support in the investigation and resolution of alleged violations of the ceasefire, and assist in resolving problems that might arise within the monitoring groups. In accordance with the Peace Accords timetable, the monitoring groups would be operational by 15 June 1991, and United Nations verification capability would be fully deployed by 30 June, whereupon the troops of the two sides would begin to move to assembly areas. Such troop movements were to be completed by 1 August 1991. As regards the monitoring of the Angolan police, notwithstanding section III, paragraph 2.1 of the Estoril Protocol,⁶¹ UNAVEM II police observers, like their military colleagues, would work closely with the joint Angola-UNITA monitoring teams while maintaining a separate identity and remaining under the United Nations chain of command.

⁵⁹ S/22627 and Add.1.

⁶⁰ In accordance with the Peace Accords (see S/22609), such groups would be subordinate to a Joint Verification and Monitoring Commission, composed of representatives of the two Angolan parties and representatives of Portugal, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States as observers. A representative of the United Nations would be invited to the meetings of the Commission. That Commission would report to a Joint Political-Military Commission which would have a similar composition. A representative of the United Nations could be invited to the meetings of the Joint Political-Military Commission.

⁶¹ S/22609, p. 49.

It was envisaged that UNAVEM II would be under the overall command of the Chief Military Officer and consist of 350 military observers, up to 90 police observers, 14 military medical personnel, approximately 80 civilian personnel drawn from the Secretariat together with a similar number of locally recruited staff, and an air unit.⁶² The security of the United Nations personnel, who would be unarmed, would be the responsibility of the party that controlled the zone where they were present. As to the composition of the Mission, in his report of 20 and 29 May 1991,⁶³ the Secretary-General stated that after consultations with the two sides, his intention was to request the 10 Member States already contributing military observers to UNAVEM⁶⁴ to increase substantially the size of their contingents. However, given the proposed strength of the Mission, it would also be necessary to find additional contributors of military observers as well as of support units. In a letter dated 13 June 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁵ the Secretary-General proposed that 24 States provide military observers for UNAVEM II.⁶⁶ In a reply dated 18 June,⁶⁷ the President informed the Secretary-General that Council members had agreed with his proposal.

Implementation/enlargement

Pursuant to Security Council resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report dated 4 June 1991 on the implementation of the mandate of UNAVEM II.⁶⁸ He informed the Council that following the signature of the Peace Accords in Lisbon on 31 May 1991, advance parties of United Nations observers had been deployed to five of the six regional headquarters of UNAVEM on 2 June 1991. By a report dated 6 June 1991,⁶⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that UNAVEM I had fully implemented the mandate entrusted to it by Council resolution 626 (1988) of 20 December 1988 and that henceforth, all its resources would be concentrated on the new tasks assigned to the Mission, redesignated UNAVEM II, by resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991.

On 31 October 1991, the Secretary-General, in his report on the activities of UNAVEM II from 31 May to 25 October 1991,⁷⁰ informed the Security Council that by 30 September 1991, UNAVEM II had completed its deployment in all 46 areas at which the forces of the two sides were assembling, although not in the four assembly areas not yet in use. In addition, all 18 provincial capitals had a UNAVEM II police presence by the end of September. However, there had been serious delays in the movement of both sides' forces to the assembly areas. Moreover, owing to the delay in the establishment of the joint monitoring groups foreseen in the Peace Accords, UNAVEM II had increasingly taken the initiative, with the encouragement of both parties, of itself monitoring some aspects of the Accords, such as the regular counting of troops and weapons in the assembly areas. The failure of the two sides to establish the police monitoring teams foreseen in the Accords had prevented UNAVEM police monitors from carrying out the functions ascribed to them. It had been necessary to stress in this connection that United Nations police monitors were not responsible for the maintenance of law and order. As to the conditions in which UNAVEM II was fulfilling its mandate, the Secretary-General described them as being, in some cases, "among the most difficult that have ever been faced by United Nations peacekeeping personnel".

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 3 and 9 December 1991,⁷¹ Council members agreed with the Secretary-General's proposal to temporarily redeploy 25 Finnish military personnel to UNAVEM II from peacekeeping operations in the Middle East in order to carry out certain construction tasks which were urgently needed to improve the working and living conditions of the members of the Mission.

In a letter dated 6 February 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁷² the Secretary-General referred to the statement which his predecessor had made at an informal meeting of the Council, on 20 December 1991, about the request which he had received from the Government of Angola⁷³ that the United Nations should: (a) provide technical assistance to the Government to help prepare for the elections which were scheduled to take place in September 1992 and (b) send United Nations observers to follow the Angolan electoral procedure until its completion. The Secretary-General stated that, pursuant to that request, an agreement on technical assistance had already been signed with the Government of Angola. Regarding the monitoring of the elections, he would shortly be submitting the necessary operational plan to the Council, together with a recommendation to enlarge UNAVEM II to include an electoral division. He also informed the President that he would appoint Margaret Joan Anstee as his Special Representative for Angola and Chief of UNAVEM II to coordinate current and projected Mission activities. In a reply dated 7 February,⁷⁴ the President stated that the Council members had welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to appoint Ms. Anstee.

On 3 and 20 March 1992, the Secretary-General submitted a further report to the Security Council on UNAVEM II⁷⁵ recommending an operational plan for the observation of the elections in Angola and the enlargement of the Mission. The recommendations were based on the report of his Special Representative and a survey team which visited Angola from 17 to 20 February 1992. The Secretary-General noted that internationally supervised elections constituted a central element in the implementation of the Peace Accords and in accordance with the Accords, "the United Nations role would be to observe and verify the elections, not to organize them". The monitoring would cover the entire electoral process, including the voter registration, electoral campaign and polling. In view of the expanded responsibilities of UNAVEM, he recommended that the Mission be enlarged to include an office of the Special Representative in Luanda; an Electoral Division, with six regional offices, headed by a Chief Electoral Officer; and approximately 141 international and 68 local staff. One hundred of the 400 electoral observers required during polling would come from the Mission's existing staff.⁷⁶ The Secretary-General estimated that the additional cost for the Mission's expanded activities, for the period from 15 March to 31 October 1992, would be approximately $18.8 million.

At its 3062nd meeting, on 24 March 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 747 (1992), whereby it approved the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 3 and 20 March and decided to enlarge the mandate of UNAVEM II for the remainder of its existing mandate period. The Council underlined the necessity, recalled in paragraph 18 of the report, for the United Nations electoral mission to have the explicit agreement of the two parties to the Peace Accords for Angola. It urged the parties to establish as soon as possible a precise timetable for the electoral process in Angola so that elections could take place at the date fixed, and requested the Secretary-General to extend his cooperation to that end. In addition, the Council requested the Secretary-General to keep it informed of developments and to submit a further report within three months of the adoption of the resolution.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 14 and 20 May,⁷⁷ Council members agreed with the Secretary-General's recommendation to increase the UNAVEM police strength from 90 to 126 officers and to expand the tasks assigned to the police contingent to include a role in the Mission's electoral functions.

Pursuant to resolution 747 (1992) of 24 March, the Secretary-General submitted a further report, dated 24 June 1992, on the activities of UNAVEM II.⁷⁸ He reported that a timetable for the electoral process had been established. His Special Representative was coordinating all United Nations technical assistance on electoral matters to the Government of Angola as well as the humanitarian assistance, which, although outside the mandate of UNAVEM, was vital to the success of the peace process. UNAVEM II military observers were continuing to perform their verification tasks. However, confinement of both sides' troops to assembly areas continued to suffer from problems, as did the demobilization of troops, which was also running behind schedule. While the joint police monitoring teams were finally established in all 18 provinces, the police monitoring system was almost entirely dependent on UNAVEM II resources for transport and communication, which were not intended, or sufficient, for those purposes. In his concluding observations, the Secretary-General noted that the Security Council might wish to keep under review the need for continuing support for Angola during what would inevitably be "a difficult and delicate period of political transition after the elections".

At the 3092nd meeting of the Council, on 7 July 1992, following consultations, the President made a statement on behalf of the Security Council,⁷⁹ whereby, inter alia, the Council looked forward to a further report by the Secretary-General at the beginning of the electoral campaign.

On 9 September 1992, pursuant to the statement made by the President on 7 July, the Secretary-General reported that UNAVEM II had started verifying the voter registration process which had ended on 10 August, monitoring the electoral campaign which had officially begun on 29 August, and putting into place an operational plan for observing the voting on 29 and 30 September 1992. Regarding the doubts expressed by one party about the effectiveness and impartiality of the Mission, he had given his assurance that all the matters raised would be thoroughly investigated. The specific examples obtained by his Special Representative mainly reflected a misunderstanding of the role of UNAVEM and an overestimation of the United Nations capacity and mandate. The Secretary-General also noted that the Government of Angola and UNITA had referred publicly to the possibility of UNAVEM II being asked to remain in Angola during the period of transition after the elections.⁸⁰

At the 3115th meeting on 18 September 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Security Council,⁸¹ by which the Council expressed concern at the doubts expressed in Angola about the effectiveness and impartiality of UNAVEM and welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to investigate thoroughly all matters raised in that regard. The Council expressed strong support for the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and UNAVEM II personnel. In addition, it took note of a reported agreement between the Government of Angola and UNITA that the United Nations should be asked to extend the UNAVEM presence in Angola and indicated that it would be prepared to consider such a request if it was based on wide support in Angola and if it proposed for UNAVEM a mandate which was clearly defined in scope and time. The Council looked forward to a further report by the Secretary-General after the elections.

By a letter dated 24 September 1992,⁸² the representative of Angola transmitted to the Secretary-General a letter from the Minister for External Relations of Angola, requesting an extension of the mandate of UNAVEM II, which would expire on 30 October 1992, until 31 December 1992, in view of the possibility of a second electoral round in the presidential elections and a delay in the conclusion of the democratization process under way in Angola.

Following presidential and parliamentary elections in Angola on 29 and 30 September 1992, the Security Council, at its 3120th meeting on 6 October, included in its agenda an oral report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM II. At the same meeting, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,⁸³ in which the Council expressed concern at the reports it had received, according to which one of the parties to the Peace Accords was contesting the validity of the elections, and at the announcement made by certain Generals belonging to that same party of their intention to withdraw from the new Angolan armed forces. Council stated that it had decided to send to Angola as quickly as possible an ad hoc commission composed of its members to support the implementation of the Peace Accords, in close cooperation with the Special Representative. In a note dated 8 October 1992,⁸⁴ the President stated that, following consultations, the members of the Council had agreed that the ad hoc commission would comprise Cape Verde, Morocco, the Russian Federation and the United States.

The ad hoc commission visited Angola from 11 to 14 October 1992 and presented an oral report to the members of the Council on 19 October. On the same day, the President made a statement to the media on behalf of the members of the Council,⁸⁵ by which they welcomed the Commission's contribution to reducing the tension in Angola and to finding a solution to the difficulties that had arisen after the elections. The members of the Council noted with satisfaction that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General had certified that, with all deficiencies taken into account, the elections could be considered to have been generally free and fair, and also that the leaders of the two parties to the Peace Accords had agreed to start a dialogue with a view to the completion of the presidential elections. They looked forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General on the contribution of the United Nations to ensuring the completion of the presidential elections and expressed their readiness to act without delay on the basis of those recommendations.

At the 3126th meeting on 27 October 1992, following consultations, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,⁸⁶ in which the Council stated that it had taken note of the letter of the same date from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Council,⁸⁷ and called on UNITA and the other parties in the electoral process to respect the results of the elections, which the Special Representative had certified as being generally free and fair. The Council strongly condemned "the attacks and baseless accusations" made by the UNITA radio station against the Special Representative and UNAVEM II, called for the immediate cessation of those attacks and accusations, and reiterated its full support for the Special Representative and for the Mission. It urged the leaders of the two parties to engage in a dialogue without delay so as to enable the second round of the presidential elections to be held, and reiterated its readiness to act without delay on the basis of recommendations that the Secretary-General might make concerning the contribution of the United Nations to the completion of the electoral process.

In a letter dated 29 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁸ the Secretary-General recalled that on 22 September 1992 the Government of Angola had conveyed its request⁸⁹ for an extension of the activities of UNAVEM II until 31 December 1992. However, he had deferred making a recommendation to the Council about the request in view of the "uncertainties" that had arisen following the elections. In the present circumstances, the Secretary-General stated he saw no alternative but to recommend the extension of the existing UNAVEM mandate for an interim period of 31 days, until 30 November. The Secretary-General expressed his hope that, with the cooperation of the two parties to the Peace Accords, he would then be in a better position to make a substantive recommendation on the future mandate and strength of UNAVEM II.

At its 3130th meeting, on 30 October 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 785 (1992), whereby it approved the recommendation contained in the Secretary-General's letter and endorsed the statement by the Special Representative that the elections had been generally free and fair. In addition, the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit by 30 November a detailed report on the situation in Angola together with long-term recommendations, accompanied by the financial implications thereof, on the mandate and strength of the Mission.

On 25 and 30 November 1992, pursuant to the statement made by the President of the Council on 18 September⁹⁰ and resolution 785 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted a further report,⁹¹ in which he informed the Council that since the elections UNAVEM II had undertaken a number of tasks which extended beyond its original mandate. Following the outbreak of heavy fighting between the Government and UNITA forces, the Mission had kept its military, police and civilian presence intact at 67 locations throughout the country and worked to maintain a newly brokered ceasefire, patrolling trouble spots and using its good offices to foster dialogue between the parties.⁹² On 5 November, the Secretary-General had sent the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Mr. Marrack Goulding, to assist his Special Representative in her continuing efforts to help implement the ceasefire, put the peace process back on track, and explore what the future role of UNAVEM might be. Both sides had agreed on the need for an enlarged UNAVEM presence in order to create, over a period of six months or so, conditions in which the second round of presidential elections could take place and the peace process could be brought to a successful conclusion.

In his report, the Secretary-General stressed that he had made clear to both sides that he would not be prepared to recommend an enlargement of the mandate of UNAVEM or an increase of its strength, or even its continuation at its present strength, unless they could convince him of their genuine adherence to and fulfilment of the Peace Accords, especially the key provisions relating to the dissolution of the existing armies and the creation of unified and non-partisan military and police forces. It would also be necessary for the parties to agree on a clear timetable and on formal evaluation at regular intervals of their fulfilment of their commitments. Therefore, he was not yet in a position to provide the Security Council with the long-term recommendations requested in resolution 785 (1992). He recommended the extension of the Mission's existing mandate for a further period of two months, until 31 January 1993, and stated that he would submit a further report before that date. In the meantime, he proposed to take urgent steps, with the cooperation of the Member States concerned, to restore the Mission's strength of military and police observers, which had fallen to 210 and 77, respectively, to the authorized levels of 350 and 126, in expectation of the termination of the Mission's mandate. This would both demonstrate the international community's continuing commitment to the peace process and be a practical measure to improve the security of the Mission's personnel in the field and strengthen their ability to consolidate the ceasefire. The Secretary-General estimated that the additional cost associated with the two-month extension of the Mission's mandate would amount to some $12.4 million, which should be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

At its 3144th meeting on 30 November 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 793 (1992), by which it approved the above recommendation of the Secretary-General. The Council appealed to the two parties to engage in a dialogue aimed at national reconciliation and at the participation of all parties in the democratic process, and to agree on a clear timetable for the fulfilment of their commitments under the Peace Accords. In addition, it requested the Secretary-General to submit by 31 January 1993 a further report on the situation in Angola together with his longer-term recommendations for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process, which it said should be clearly defined in scope and time and based on a wide degree of support in Angola.

In a letter dated 18 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹³ and pursuant to resolution 793 (1992) of 30 November 1992, the Secretary-General stated that unless the situation in Angola rapidly improved, he would not be in a position to recommend the enlargement of the United Nations presence in Angola, which both sides said they wanted. He added that although the two sides had agreed in principle on the need to enlarge the mandate of UNAVEM II and increase its strength on the ground, including the provision of armed troops, differences still existed between them, especially on the extent to which the Mission should in future exercise a good offices or mediation function, and the extent to which it should be involved in the organization and conduct of the second round of presidential elections. In that context and in an effort to get the peace process back on track, he suggested that the Council might wish to appeal to the two leaders to accept his invitation to a joint meeting in Geneva, or in another United Nations location such as Addis Ababa.

At the 3152nd meeting on 22 December 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,⁹⁴ by which the Council expressed its full support for the action of the Secretary-General aimed at resolving the crisis and appealed to President dos Santos and Dr. Savimbi to accept the Secretary-General's invitation to attend, under his auspices, a joint meeting at an agreed location, to confirm that real progress had been made in the reactivation of the Bicesse [Peace] Accords with a view to their full implementation and that agreement had been reached on a continuing United Nations presence in Angola.

5. United Nations Operation in Somalia established pursuant to Security Council resolution 751 (1992)

Establishment

On 3 March 1992, the Interim President, Ali Mahdi Mohamed, and General Mohamed Farah Aidid signed an Agreement on the Implementation of a Ceasefire, by which they agreed to "the implementation of measures aimed at stabilizing the ceasefire by means of a United Nations monitoring mechanism".⁹⁵ The two sides also agreed that a United Nations technical team would visit Mogadishu to formulate such measures.

In a report to the Security Council dated 11 March 1992,⁹⁶ the Secretary-General stated his intention to dispatch a technical team as soon as possible to prepare an operational plan for a United Nations monitoring mechanism. He added that he intended to request the technical team to also look into possible mechanisms to ensure the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to the displaced persons in and around Mogadishu. Observing that the latter exercise represented an innovation that might require careful consideration by the Security Council, he noted that its objective had already been anticipated by the understanding reached with the two factions that United Nations civilian police would be required to assist in the delivery of humanitarian aid in and around Mogadishu. By resolution 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, the Security Council strongly supported the Secretary-General's decision urgently to dispatch a technical team to Somalia. It asked that the technical team also develop a "high priority plan to establish mechanisms to ensure the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance".

On 27 and 28 March 1992, agreements were signed with the two parties in Mogadishu to (a) deploy United Nations observers to monitor the ceasefire; and (b) deploy United Nations security personnel to protect its personnel and safeguard its activities in continuing to provide humanitarian and other relief assistance in and around Mogadishu. In a report to the Council dated 21 April 1992,⁹⁷ the Secretary-General recommended the establishment of a United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM), for an initial period of six months, along the following lines. The mission would comprise 50 unarmed military observers to monitor the ceasefire, and a 500-strong infantry unit to "provide the United Nations convoys of relief supplies with a sufficiently strong military escort to deter attack and to fire effectively in self-defence if deterrence should not prove effective". The security personnel would be based on a ship at the Mogadishu port. The infantry would be lightly armed and would undertake patrols in light vehicles, with a small armoured car element held in reserve for use in emergencies. Administrative and support services would be provided by a civilian component of 79 staff. The mission would be established under the authority of the Security Council. The commanding officer of UNOSOM would be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the two parties and with the consent of the Security Council, and would report to the Secretary-General through the Special Representative. The Special Representative would provide overall direction to United Nations activities in Somalia and assist the Secretary-General in reaching a peaceful resolution to the conflict.⁹⁸ In an addendum to his report,⁹⁹ the Secretary-General recommended that the cost of the operation be considered an expense of the Organization to be borne by Members States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

By resolution 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, the Council decided to establish UNOSOM under its authority, and in support of the Secretary-General's continuing mission in Somalia. The Council requested the Secretary-General immediately to deploy 50 military observers to monitor the ceasefire in Mogadishu. It also agreed in principle to establish, under the overall direction of the Special Representative, a United Nations security force to be deployed as soon as possible to provide security for United Nations personnel, equipment and supplies at the Mogadishu port and airport, and to escort deliveries of humanitarian supplies to distribution centres. The Council requested the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with the parties in Mogadishu regarding the proposed United Nations security force and, in the light of those consultations, to submit his further recommendations to the Council for its decision as soon as possible.

Mandate

By resolution 751 (1992), UNOSOM was mandated to monitor the ceasefire in Mogadishu, and a decision was taken in principle that it should provide security for humanitarian assistance activities in and around Mogadishu.

Implementation/enlargement

In a letter dated 23 June 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁰ the Secretary-General reported that, having secured the agreement of the two principal factions in Mogadishu, he was taking immediate steps to deploy the military observers. In response to a second letter of the same date from the Secretary-General, the President of the Council informed him that the members of the Council agreed with his proposal to appoint Brigadier-General Imtiaz Shaheen of Pakistan as the Chief Military Observer of UNOSOM.¹⁰¹

The next month, in the face of a complex and deteriorating situation in Somalia, the Secretary-General proposed, in a report dated 22 July 1992,¹⁰² that the United Nations should enlarge its efforts to help bring about an effective ceasefire throughout the country, while at the same time pressing forward with parallel efforts to promote national conciliation. In his view, the Organization should establish a presence in all regions and adopt a comprehensive approach dealing with all aspects of the Somalia situation — humanitarian relief and recovery, the cessation of hostilities and security, the peace process and national reconciliation — in a consolidated framework. To that end, he proposed to establish four operational zones in the country, in each of which a consolidated United Nations operation would carry out the activities envisaged in resolution 751 (1992), namely, humanitarian activities, monitoring of the ceasefire and maintaining security while helping combatants demobilize and disarm. He also stated his intention to dispatch a technical team to Somalia to examine, inter alia, (a) the possible monitoring of ceasefire arrangements in parts of the country other than Mogadishu; (b) the possible deployment of military observers in the south-west region on the border with Kenya; (c) the feasibility of an “arms for food” exchange programme; (d) the need for security forces to escort and protect humanitarian aid activities and personnel in other parts of the country; and (e) a possible role for the United Nations in assisting the re-establishment of local police forces. By resolution 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, the Security Council approved the Secretary-General’s proposal to establish four operational zones and strongly supported his decision to dispatch a technical team to Somalia.

In a letter dated 12 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰³ the Secretary-General reported that both principal factions in Mogadishu had agreed to the immediate deployment of the 500-strong security force as part of UNOSOM. He proposed that the force be composed of a contingent from Pakistan, to which the members of the Council agreed.¹⁰⁴

In a report dated 24 August 1992,¹⁰⁵ the Secretary-General requested an increase in the authorized strength of UNOSOM to create the four security zones. For each zone, he proposed that UNOSOM be provided with a unit of 750. In addition to the two agreed areas (Bossaso in the north-east and the Gedo region along the border with Kenya), he proposed that units be posted to Berbera and Kismayo as soon as consultations with leaders there made it possible. The total strength of United Nations security personnel envisaged for Somalia would thus reach 3,500. By resolution 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, the Council authorized the increase in strength of UNOSOM and the subsequent deployment as recommended. In a letter dated 1 September 1992 to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁶ the Secretary-General requested the Council to extend the applicability of the authorization in resolution 775 (1992) to cover also the logistics support unit included in the enlargement of the Operation. The total strength of the Operation would then be 4,219 all ranks. By a letter dated 8 September 1992,¹⁰⁷ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that Council members agreed with that proposal.

In a further exchange of letters, the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the Council members agreed with his proposal that the military elements of the operation comprise contingents from Austria, Bangladesh, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Fiji, Finland, Indonesia, Jordan, Morocco and Zimbabwe (S/24177 and S/24178 of 22 and 25 June 1992, respectively).

In a letter dated 24 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁰⁸ the Secretary-General stated that the conditions that had developed in Somalia made it exceedingly difficult for UNOSOM to implement the mandate entrusted to it by the Council. He added that he was giving urgent consideration to the situation and did not exclude the possibility that it might become necessary to review the basic premises and principles of the United Nations effort in Somalia.

The members of the Security Council concluded that the situation that the Secretary-General had described was intolerable. On 25 November, they expressed strong support for his view that it was time to move into Chapter VII of the Charter and asked him for specific recommendations on what the United Nations could do to remedy the situation.¹⁰⁹

In a letter dated 29 November 1992 to the President of the Council,¹¹⁰ the Secretary-General set out five options for action. Two options did not involve the use of force. However, the Secretary-General dismissed them as inadequate, noting that the Security Council had “no alternative but to decide to adopt more forceful measures to secure the humanitarian operations in Somalia”. He offered three options involving the use of force to ensure that the violence against the international relief effort was brought to an end: (1) a show of force in Mogadishu by UNOSOM troops, to deter factions and other armed groups there and elsewhere in Somalia from withholding cooperation from UNOSOM; (2) a countrywide enforcement operation by a group of Member States authorized by the Security Council to carry one out; (3) a countrywide enforcement action undertaken under United Nations command and control. In explaining the second option, the Secretary-General informed the Council of the offer by the United States to take the lead in such an operation. He suggested that, in the event that the Council chose that option, the enabling resolution could state, inter alia, that the purpose of the operation was to resolve the immediate security problem and that it would be replaced by a conventional United Nations peacekeeping operation as soon as the irregular groups had been disarmed and the heavy weapons of the organized factions brought under international control.

By resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, authorized the Secretary-General and Member States cooperating with the Member State which had offered to establish an operation to create a secure environment for relief operations in Somalia to use “all necessary means” to do so. The Council also decided that the operations of UNOSOM and any further deployment of the 3,500 UNOSOM personnel authorized by resolution 775 (1992) should proceed at the discretion of the Secretary-General in the light of his assessment of conditions on the ground. The Council requested the Secretary-General to report to it within 15 days on the implementation of the resolution and the attainment of the objective of establishing a secure environment so as to enable the Council to make the necessary decision for a prompt transition to continued peacekeeping operations. It also asked him to submit an initial plan within the same time frame to ensure that UNOSOM would be able to fulfil its mandate after the withdrawal of the unified command.

In a report dated 19 December 1992,¹¹¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that after the adoption of resolution 794 (1992), further deployment into Somalia had been put on hold pending assessment of conditions on the ground. However, on 18 December, on the advice of his Special Representative and the force commander, he had authorized deployment of 100 additional personnel to strengthen the UNOSOM headquarters. In addition, a liaison team from UNOSOM had been deployed to the headquarters of the Unified Task Force. The Secretary-General set out his ideas on the kind of mandate UNOSOM would require to maintain the secure environment for humanitarian relief operations after it had been established by the Unified Task Force. In his view, however, it was premature to determine how and when the Unified Task Force should be replaced, and he therefore recommended that the Council defer a decision in that regard until the situation on the ground in Somalia became clearer.

6. United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa established pursuant to Security Council resolution 772 (1992)

Establishment

By resolution 765 (1992), adopted unanimously on 16 July 1992, the Security Council condemned the escalating violence in South Africa and invited the Secretary-General to appoint, as a matter of urgency, a Special Representative for South Africa in order to recommend, after discussions with the parties, “measures which would assist in bringing an effective end to the violence and in creating conditions for negotiations leading towards a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa”. The Council requested him to submit a report to it as early as possible.

In a report dated 7 August 1992,¹¹² the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of the outcome of his Special Representative’s mission to South Africa from 21 to 31 July 1992. The Secretary-General recommended a number of measures to bring an effective end to the violence and to create the conditions for the resumption of negotiations envisaged in resolution 765 (1992). With respect to the many serious requests made to the United Nations to dispatch monitors to South Africa, he had concluded that, given the mechanisms already established by the National Peace Accord,¹¹³ to which all parties had agreed, the wisest course of action would be to strengthen and reinforce those mechanisms. He recommended, accordingly, that the United Nations make available some 30 observers to serve in South Africa, in close association with the National Peace Secretariat, in order to further the purposes of the Accord. The observers would be stationed in agreed-upon locations, in various parts of South Africa. As necessary, their numbers could be supplemented by other appropriate international organizations such as OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Community. He considered that the practical arrangements stemming from this recommendation should be the subject of early and detailed discussions between the United Nations, the Government and the parties concerned. He believed, in that connection, that the experience gained from the dispatch of 10 United Nations observers to cover the recent mass demonstrations could serve a valuable purpose in defining the tasks and methods of functioning of the proposed larger group.

By resolution 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992, the Security Council authorized the Secretary-General to deploy, as a matter of urgency, United Nations observers in South Africa, in such a manner and in such numbers as he determined necessary to address effectively the areas of concern noted in his report, in coordination with the structures set up under the National Peace Accord; and requested him to report to it quarterly or more frequently if necessary, on the implementation of the resolution. The Council also invited international organizations, such as OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Community to consider deploying their own observers in South Africa in coordination with the United Nations and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord. Following the adoption of the resolution, the President of the Council made a statement¹¹⁴ in which he indicated that it was the understanding of the members of the Council that the Secretary-General would consult the Council on the number of observers he intended to deploy from time to time.

Mandate

The mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa (UNOMSA), as reflected in resolution 772 (1992) and the Secretary-General’s report of 7 August 1992, was to help quell violence in the country in coordination with the structures set up under the National Peace Accord.

¹¹² S/24389.

¹¹³ The National Peace Accord, signed on 14 September 1991, established a comprehensive framework, agreed to by all major parties, organizations and groups of South Africa, to end violence and facilitate socio-economic development and reconstruction (S/24389, para. 73).

¹¹⁴ S/24456.

Implementation

Following consultations with the Security Council, the Secretary-General announced on 9 September 1992 the decision to deploy a mission of up to 50 United Nations observers in South Africa in implementation of resolution 772 (1992).¹¹⁵ On 10 September, he informed members of the Council of his decision to dispatch an advance party of 13 observers to South Africa, as part of the complement of 50 observers to be deployed in the country.¹¹⁶ On the same day, in a statement made by the President of the Council on its behalf,¹¹⁷ the members of the Council emphasized the need to put an end to the violence and create conditions for negotiations leading to the establishment of a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa, and welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to deploy an advance party in the country.

In a report dated 22 December 1992,¹¹⁸ the Secretary-General informed the Council that by the end of October, UNOMSA observers had been deployed in all 11 regions of South Africa, and that by the end of November, they had reached the full complement of 50 observers. The headquarters of the Mission was in Johannesburg, with a regional office in Durban.

He reported that UNOMSA personnel observed demonstrations, marches and other forms of mass action, noting the conduct of all parties, and endeavoured to obtain information indicating the degree to which the parties' actions were consistent with the principles of the National Peace Accord and the Goldstone Commission guidelines for marches and political gatherings. Observers supplemented their field observations by establishing and maintaining informal contacts at all levels with established governmental structures, political parties and organizations, as well as civic associations and other groups. Several members of the UNOMSA team had been assigned to the Goldstone Commission of Enquiry into Public Violence and Intimidation in addition to their other duties. The observer teams in various parts of the country also attended the hearings of the Commission held in their respective locations. UNOMSA observers had been joined by 17 observers from the Commonwealth, 14 from the European Commission and 11 from OAU. The international observer teams had worked closely together, exchanging information and frequently observing events and meetings as mixed teams.

In his concluding observations in the same report,¹¹⁹ the Secretary-General stated that the international observers had been welcomed by all concerned and had been credited with having had a salutary effect on the political situation in general. Some nevertheless had contended that UNOMSA needed to be strengthened, while others were of the view that its mandate should be expanded. Given the delicate situation prevailing in South Africa, characterized by unacceptable and, in some locales, rising levels of violence, he intended to modestly reinforce UNOMSA with an increment of 10 additional observers.

7. United Nations Operation in Mozambique established pursuant to Security Council resolution 797 (1992)

Establishment

By a letter dated 10 August 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²⁰ the representative of Mozambique transmitted the text of the joint declaration signed in Rome on 7 August 1992 by the President of the Republic of Mozambique and the President of the Mozambique National Resistance Movement (RENAMO). Under the declaration, both parties agreed, inter alia, to "accept the role of the international community, and especially that of the United Nations, in monitoring and guaranteeing the implementation of the General Peace Agreement, in particular the ceasefire and the electoral process".

By a letter dated 6 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²¹ the representative of Mozambique transmitted two documents: the text of the General Peace Agreement, signed in Rome on 4 October 1992, establishing the principles and modalities for the achievement of peace in Mozambique; and a letter of the same date from the President of Mozambique addressed to the Secretary-General. In his letter, the President requested the Secretary-General to take appropriate action to ensure the participation of the United Nations in monitoring and ensuring the implementation of the General Peace Agreement and in assisting the Government of Mozambique by providing technical assistance for the general elections and in monitoring those elections. In that regard, he requested the United Nations to chair the following Commissions: the Supervisory and Monitoring Commission for the implementation of the General Peace Agreement; the Ceasefire Commission provided for in Protocol VI; and the Reintegration Commission provided for in Protocol IV. He also asked the Secretary-General to inform the Security Council of the need to send a United Nations team to Mozambique to monitor the General Peace Agreement until elections were held — in principle, one year after the signing of the Agreement.

On 9 October 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the proposed United Nations role in Mozambique.¹²² In essence, the United Nations had been asked to undertake certain specific functions in relation to the ceasefire, the elections and humanitarian assistance. He recommended an immediate plan of action and stated his intention, subject to the Council's approval, to appoint an interim Special Representative who would be in overall charge of United Nations activities in support of the Agreement. As soon as appointed, the interim Special Representative would proceed to Maputo to assist the parties in setting up the joint machinery which was to be chaired by the United Nations, in finalizing the modalities and conditions for the military arrangements and in carrying out other preliminary work. He would be supported in those initial tasks by a team of up to 25 military observers, drawn from existing peacekeeping missions. The Special Representative would be asked to send the earliest possible report, on which the Secretary-General would base recommendations to the Security Council for the deployment of a United Nations operation in Mozambique. By resolution 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992, the Security Council approved the appointment by the Secretary-General of an interim Special Representative for Mozambique, and the dispatch to Mozambique of a team of up to 25 military observers. It also indicated that it looked forward to the report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ), including in particular a detailed estimate of the cost of the operation.

The Secretary-General appointed Aldo Ajello of Italy as his interim Special Representative for Mozambique. The latter arrived in Maputo with a team of 21 military observers on 15 October, the date on which the General Peace Agreement entered into force. On 20 October 1992, two teams of military observers were also deployed to the provincial capitals of Beira and Nampula.¹²³

In a statement made by the President of the Council on its behalf on 27 October 1992,¹²⁴ the Council expressed its deep concern over reports of major violations of the ceasefire, called upon the parties to halt such violations and urged them to cooperate fully with the interim Special Representative. The Council stressed that full respect for the ceasefire was a necessary condition for the speedy establishment and successful deployment of ONUMOZ.

In a report to the Council dated 3 December 1992,¹²⁵ the Secretary-General presented a detailed operational plan for ONUMOZ. Describing the difficulties of the operation, he referred to the size of the country, the devastated state of its infrastructure, the disruption of its economy by war and drought, the limited capacity of the Government to cope with the new tasks arising from the Agreement and the complexity of the processes envisaged in the Agreement. He stated that he felt obliged to recommend that very substantial resources should be made available for that purpose, especially on the military side. That reflected his conviction that it would not be possible to create the conditions for successful elections in Mozambique unless the military situation had been brought fully under control. He cautioned, moreover, that the Agreement would not be implemented unless the Mozambican parties made a determined effort in good faith to honour their commitments. On that basis, he recommended the establishment and deployment of ONUMOZ as set out in his report.

By resolution 797 (1992) of 16 December 1992, the Council approved the Secretary-General's report and the recommendations contained therein. The Council decided to establish ONUMOZ, as proposed by the Secretary-General and in line with the General

Peace Agreement for Mozambique, for a period until 31 October 1993. It requested the Secretary-General to keep it informed of developments and to submit a further report by 31 March 1993.

Mandate

In accordance with the General Peace Agreement, the mandate of ONUMOZ, as proposed by the Secretary-General and approved by the Security Council, consisted of four interrelated components: (a) political: to facilitate impartially the implementation of the Agreement, in particular by chairing the Supervisory and Monitoring Commission and its subordinate commissions; (b) military: to monitor and verify the ceasefire, the separation and concentration of forces, their demobilization and the collection, storage and destruction of weapons; to monitor and verify the complete withdrawal of foreign forces, and the disbanding of private and irregular armed groups; to authorize security arrangements for vital infrastructures; and to provide security for United Nations and other international activities in support of the peace process, especially in the corridors; (c) electoral: to provide technical assistance and monitor the entire electoral process; and (d) humanitarian: to coordinate and monitor all humanitarian assistance operations, in particular those relating to refugees, internally displaced persons, demobilized military personnel and the affected local population and, in that context, to chair the Humanitarian Assistance Committee.

In his report of 9 December 1992, the Secretary-General stated that, while the Agreement did not provide a specific role for United Nations civilian police in monitoring the neutrality of the Mozambican police, experience elsewhere suggested that such monitors could be a valuable addition to ONUMOZ. He therefore intended to ask his interim Special Representative to seek the concurrence of the parties with incorporating a police component into the Mission.

Composition and structure

The Operation was to be composed of the following: (a) an office of the interim Special Representative for Mozambique, including up to 12 international professional staff; (b) a military component, headed by a Force Commander and including a headquarters company and military police platoon; 354 military observers; 5 infantry battalions, each composed of up to 850 personnel; 1 engineer battalion; 3 logistic companies; and air, communications, medical and movement control support units; (c) a civilian technical unit to support the logistic tasks relating to demobilization; (d) a police component, if the parties agreed, headed by a Chief Police Observer, with up to 128 police officers to monitor civil liberties and provide technical advice to the National Police Affairs Commission; (e) an Electoral Division, with up to 148 international electoral officers and support staff and 1,200 international election observers to be deployed at the time of the elections and the periods immediately preceding and following them; (f) a United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance, headed by a Humanitarian Affairs Coordinator, with 16 international professional staff; and (g) an administrative component, comprising up to 28 international professional staff, up to 100 United Nations volunteers, up to 124 international support staff and an adequate number of local staff.

Regarding the costs of the Operation, the Secretary-General estimated that $331.8 million would be required for the period from its inception to 31 October 1993.¹²⁶ He recommended that the cost relating to the establishment and deployment of ONUMOZ be considered as an expense of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter of the United Nations.

8. United Nations Observer Group in Central America established pursuant to Security Council resolution 644 (1989)

Establishment

By a letter dated 24 February 1989, addressed to the Secretary-General,¹²⁷ the representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua transmitted the text of the Joint Declaration of the Central American Presidents,¹²⁸ in which they entrusted the United Nations, inter alia, with the task of assisting in the establishment of an international mechanism for the on-site verification of the security commitments which they had entered into under the Esquipulas II Agreement,¹²⁹ namely (a) the cessation of aid to irregular forces and insurrectionist movements, and (b) the non-use of the territory of one State for attacks on other States.

In a report dated 26 June 1989,¹³⁰ submitted to the Security Council pursuant to resolutions 530 (1983) and 562 (1985), the Secretary-General informed the Council that the five Central American Presidents had addressed to him a letter dated 31 March 1989,¹³¹ asking him to take the necessary steps to establish a United Nations Observer Group in Central America (ONUCA). However, in view of the reservation formulated by one of the signatories, he had not been able to take those steps.¹³²

At its 2871st meeting, on 27 July 1989, the Council adopted resolution 637 (1989), by which it, inter alia, called upon the Presidents to continue their efforts to achieve a firm and lasting peace; lent its full support to the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices in consultation with the Security Council; and requested him to report regularly on the implementation of the resolution.

On 11 October 1989, in accordance with resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report¹³³ in which he explained that, at the meeting of the five Central American Presidents at Tela, Honduras, on 7 August 1989,¹³⁴ the way had become clear for him to send to the region a reconnaissance mission,¹³⁵ on the basis of whose findings he could now formulate a recommendation to the Council for the establishment of ONUCA. The operational concept of ONUCA would be based on the working paper that had been agreed earlier with those Governments. The Secretary-General recommended that ONUCA be established forthwith for an initial period of six months. His report contained detailed proposals regarding the mandate, composition and deployment of the mission as well as a preliminary estimate with regard to its financial requirements.

At its 2890th meeting, on 7 November 1989, the Council adopted resolution 644 (1989), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General of 11 October 1989; decided to set up immediately, under its authority, a United Nations Observer Group in Central America for a period of six months; and requested the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments. At the same meeting, the President made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council noting that, in any consideration of the renewal of the mandate of ONUCA, the Council members would wish to assure themselves that the presence of ONUCA was continuing to contribute actively to the achievement of a firm and lasting peace in Central America.¹³⁶

Pursuant to resolution 644 (1989), by which the Council approved the Secretary-General's report of 11 October 1989,¹³⁷ ONUCA was to undertake the on-site verification of: (a) the cessation of aid to irregular forces and insurrectionist movements; and (b) the non-use of the territory of one State for attacks on other States.

To perform these tasks, ONUCA would consist of a total of 260 military observers; about 115 air-crew and support personnel; about 50 personnel for the naval unit; up to 14 medical personnel; about 104 international staff to perform political and administrative functions; and about 82 locally recruited civilians.¹³⁸ The military observers of ONUCA, like those of other such United Nations missions, would not be armed. However, the five Governments would be asked to undertake that if, in an exceptional case, an armed escort were to be requested by the Chief Military Officer to protect ONUCA personnel during the exercise of their functions, such escort would be provided by the Government concerned. Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, dated 16 and 21 November 1989,¹³⁹ the Council agreed to the Secretary-General's proposal to appoint Major General Agustín Quesada Gómez (Spain) as Chief Military Observer of ONUCA.¹⁴⁰

ONUCA was established on 7 November 1989 for an initial period of six months. As recommended by the Secretary-General in his report of 11 October 1989, its costs, estimated at $41 million for this initial period, would be considered as expenses of the Organization to be borne by the Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

Implementation/extensions and changes of mandate

In a report dated 15 March 1990,¹⁴¹ the Secretary-General sought the urgent approval of the Council, on a contingency basis, for an enlargement of the ONUCA mandate and the temporary addition of armed personnel to its strength to enable it to play a part in the voluntary demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance. Under its enlarged mandate, ONUCA would be responsible for implementing the military aspects of the joint plan for the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance,¹⁴² which had been agreed at Tela, Honduras, on 7 August 1989, while the International Support and Verification Commission,¹⁴³ set up pursuant to the joint plan, would be in charge of civilian matters.

At its 2913th meeting, on 27 March 1990, the Council adopted resolution 650 (1990), by which it approved the report of the Secretary-General; decided to authorize, in accordance with that report, an enlargement of the mandate of ONUCA and the addition of armed personnel to its strength; and requested the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed of further developments regarding the implementation of the resolution.

In a letter dated 19 April 1990 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴⁴ the Secretary-General referred to a statement he had made during the Council's informal consultations on the same day¹⁴⁵ in relation to a series of agreements signed by the parties earlier that day in Managua, Nicaragua, on the voluntary demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance (the Managua Agreements). As a consequence of those agreements, the parties had requested that ONUCA monitor both the ceasefire that had come into effect on the same day and the separation of forces which would result from the Government's withdrawal from the security zones which were to be established to facilitate the demobilization process. Noting that the Managua Agreements constituted an important step forward in the Central American peace process, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council approve a further expansion of the ONUCA mandate to include the above tasks.

At its 2919th meeting, on 20 April 1990, the Council adopted resolution 653 (1990), by which it approved the Secretary-General's proposals concerning the addition of new tasks to the mandate of ONUCA and requested him to report on all aspects of the Group's operations before the expiry of its mandate on 7 May 1990.

In accordance with resolution 653 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted a report on 27 April 1990,¹⁴⁶ giving an account of operations during the first six months of its existence. He recalled that the Group's original mandate was to verify compliance by the five Central American Governments with their security commitments under the Esquipulas II Agreement. Following the elections in Nicaragua, there had been two enlargements of the Group's mandate at the request of the Nicaraguan parties. An account of the Group's performance of its new functions, which had only just begun, would be set out in an addendum to the report. He recommended that the mandate and military observer strength of ONUCA be left unchanged and extended for a further period of six months, on the understanding that its tasks of monitoring the ceasefire and the separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing the resistance would lapse with the completion of demobilization, not later than 10 June 1990.

On 2 May 1990, in an addendum¹⁴⁷ to his report of 27 April 1990, the Secretary-General observed, as a matter of grave concern, that the demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance had not begun on 25 April, as stipulated in the Managua Agreements. He believed that serious efforts should now be made by all concerned to get the demobilization back on track.

At its 2921st meeting, on 4 May 1990, the Council adopted resolution 654 (1990), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General of 27 April and 2 May 1990; decided to extend the mandate of ONUCA for a further period of six months until 7 November 1990, as recommended by the Secretary-General, on the understanding that its tasks of monitoring the ceasefire and the separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing the resistance would lapse with the completion of demobilization, not later than 10 June 1990; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the Group's operations before the expiry of the mandate period and in particular to report on the completion of the demobilization process not later than 10 June 1990.

At the 2922nd meeting, on 23 May 1990, the President made a statement in which the members of the Council expressed concern at the slow pace of demobilization and requested the Secretary-General to continue to observe the situation on the ground through a senior representative and to report to the Council by 4 June 1990.¹⁴⁸

Pursuant to that presidential statement, the Secretary-General submitted a report on 4 June 1990,¹⁴⁹ briefing the Council on the developments on the ground relevant to the tasks entrusted to ONUCA and informing the Council that, at a meeting of the parties on 29 and 30 May 1990, the resistance had proposed that ONUCA be given the additional tasks of collecting weapons that might have remained in civilian hands, training a new national police force and verifying the proposed reduction in the strength of the army.

On 8 June 1990, the Secretary-General submitted a report to update the Council specifically on the demobilization process,¹⁵⁰ in accordance with resolution 654 (1990). The Secretary-General informed the Council that there had been rapid progress in this process, but considered it doubtful whether it would be possible to complete demobilization by 10 June 1990, as envisaged in his report of 27 April 1990. He recommended that the Council extend the tasks of ONUCA related to monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces and to demobilizing the resistance until 29 June 1990.

At its 2927th meeting, on 8 June 1990, the Council adopted resolution 656 (1990), by which it, inter alia, decided to extend the ONUCA tasks mentioned above, on the understanding that those tasks would lapse with the completion of the demobilization process not later than 29 June 1990, and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council by that date.

In accordance with resolution 656 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted a report on 29 June 1990,¹⁵¹ informing the Council that demobilization had essentially been completed. On 26 October 1990, pursuant to resolution 654 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council an additional report containing an account of ONUCA operations since 7 May 1990.¹⁵² He stated that, after the cessation of the involvement by ONUCA in the demobilization process, the Government of Nicaragua had assumed responsibility for the demobilization of any remaining members of the resistance, while the International Support and Verification Commission continued to handle the civilian aspects of that process. Following consultations with the Government of Nicaragua it was decided that ONUCA would continue, on a temporary basis, to maintain a presence in those areas in which large numbers of demobilized members of the resistance and their dependants were being resettled. ONUCA had now reverted to its original mandate as approved by the Council in resolution 644 (1989), namely to verify compliance by the Central American Governments with their security commitments under the Esquipulas II Agreement. Noting the importance of maintaining a United Nations military presence in the region to support the peace process, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the mandate of ONUCA, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for a further period of six months, until 7 May 1991. The Secretary-General also informed the Council of his intention to reduce the strength of military observers to 158 by mid-December.

At its 2952nd meeting, on 5 November 1990, the Council adopted resolution 675 (1990), by which it, inter alia, approved the Secretary-General's report; decided to extend the mandate of ONUCA as defined in resolution 644 (1989) for a further period of six months; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the operations of ONUCA before the expiry of the new mandate period.

In accordance with resolution 675 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted a report on 29 April 1991,¹⁵³ containing an account of the organization and operational activities of ONUCA since 27 October 1990. Based on the advice of the Chief Military Observer, the Secretary-General recommended the reduction of the Group's strength to 130 military observers and the extension of its mandate, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for an additional period of six months, until 7 November 1991.

At its 2986th meeting, on 6 May 1991, the Council adopted resolution 691 (1991), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General; decided to extend the mandate of ONUCA, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for a further period of six months; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the Group's operations before the expiry of the mandate period.

On 28 October 1991, pursuant to resolution 691 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted a report,¹⁵⁴ informing the Council that the five Central American Governments had indicated their wish that the mandate of ONUCA be extended for a further period of six months. For accounting purposes only, the Secretary-General recommended that the mandate be extended for a period of five months and 23 days, rather than six months, so that the mandate could end on the last date of a calendar month, namely on 30 April 1992.

At its 3016th meeting, on 6 November 1991, the Council adopted resolution 719 (1991), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General; decided to extend the mandate of ONUCA, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), until 30 April 1992; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the Group's operations before the expiry of the mandate period, and in particular to report to the Council within three months about any developments which would indicate that the size or the future of ONUCA should be reconsidered.

Termination

In a report dated 14 January 1992,¹⁵⁵ submitted pursuant to resolution 719 (1991), the Secretary-General informed the Council that there had been major progress in negotiations on a settlement to the armed conflict in El Salvador, and recommended that the Council terminate the mandate of ONUCA with effect from 17 January 1992. At its 3031st meeting, on 16 January 1992, the Council adopted resolution 730 (1992), by which it approved the report of the Secretary-General of 14 January 1992 and, in accordance with the recommendation contained therein, decided to terminate the mandate of ONUCA with effect from 17 January 1992.

9. United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador established pursuant to Security Council resolution 693 (1991)

Establishment

In a statement made in informal consultations on 3 August 1990,¹⁵⁶ the Secretary-General recalled that, on 4 April 1990, representatives of the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) had signed at Geneva, in his presence, an agreement to launch a negotiating process under his auspices in order to end the armed conflict in El Salvador through political means. On the basis of the negotiations held since that date, the Secretary-General envisaged that the responsibilities devolving upon the United Nations in pursuance of the objectives established in the agreement would include the verification of a ceasefire, the monitoring of the electoral process and the verification of respect for human rights. The Secretary-General expressed his view that these tasks would most appropriately be carried out as an integrated operation under the authority of the Security Council.

By a letter dated 29 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁵⁷ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, as a result of the most recent round of direct talks just concluded in Costa Rica, it had emerged that the parties shared the wish that preparations for carrying out the above responsibilities should be initiated at the earliest possible date. While there had been no formal and verifiable cessation of combat, the Secretary-General believed that steps should be taken to enable the United Nations to assess the situation and initiate preparations. Accordingly, the Secretary-General sought the concurrence of the Council to his making the necessary arrangements, including the possible establishment of a small preparatory office in El Salvador for a verification mission to be set up at the appropriate time. By a letter dated 6 September 1990,¹⁵⁸ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had concurred with his proposal.

In a report dated 8 November 1990,¹⁵⁹ submitted pursuant to resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General stated that, as a first substantive result of the negotiation process, the parties had signed on 26 July 1990, at San José, Costa Rica, an Agreement on Human Rights,¹⁶⁰ which not only contained detailed commitments to guarantee unrestricted respect for human rights in El Salvador but provided for the establishment of a United Nations verification mission, which was to be given powers to take whatever legally permissible action it might consider appropriate to protect and promote human rights in the country.

In a report dated 21 December 1990,¹⁶¹ also submitted pursuant to resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General informed the Council that, while the schedule of negotiations agreed to at Caracas had envisaged a series of synchronized agreements, both parties in El Salvador had signified their desire to have the human rights mechanism in place without waiting for the conclusion of other agreements. Accordingly, he intended shortly to request the Council's authorization to establish a United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL), with the task of monitoring agreements concluded between the parties. The Secretary-General recommended that, as a first step towards establishing this integrated operation, the human rights verification component should be established as soon as possible. For that purpose, he would dispatch a technical mission to El Salvador to assist him in preparing an operational plan. He would also, at the appropriate time, seek the Council's authorization for the deployment of other components of ONUSAL, charged with the verification of further political agreements that might be arrived at and a ceasefire, in keeping with the concept of a single, integrated operation in El Salvador.

On 16 April 1991, pursuant to resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted a report¹⁶² in which he recommended that the human rights component of ONUSAL be established as soon as possible. Once there was agreement on a ceasefire and the United Nations was called upon to play the broader role envisaged for it, the corresponding resources could be included in the Mission's structure to enable it to operate effectively as an integrated whole. The Secretary-General also made proposals with regard to the mandate, composition, deployment and duration of the human rights component of ONUSAL and provided a preliminary estimate with regard to its financial requirements.¹⁶³

At its 2988th meeting, on 20 May 1991, the Council adopted resolution 693 (1991), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General of 16 April 1991; decided to establish, under its authority, a United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador to monitor all agreements concluded between the parties, whose initial mandate would be to verify the compliance by the parties with the Agreement on Human Rights signed at San José on 26 July 1990; decided that ONUSAL would be established for an initial period of 12 months; and requested the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on the implementation of the resolution.

Mandate

The United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador was established on 20 May 1991 for an initial period of 12 months and became operational on 26 July 1991.¹⁶⁴

Pursuant to resolution 693 (1991), by which the Council approved the Secretary-General's report of 16 April 1991,¹⁶⁵ the initial mandate of ONUSAL comprised the following tasks: (a) active monitoring of the human rights situation; (b) investigation of specific cases of alleged violations of human rights; (c) promotion of human rights; and (d) providing recommendations to eliminate violations of, and to promote respect for, human rights.

In assuming those tasks before a ceasefire, ONUSAL was to adopt a progressive approach. While in the first phase, expected to last 60 to 90 days, it was to concentrate on monitoring the human rights situation and the processing by the parties of cases involving alleged violations of human rights, it would exercise all the functions assigned to it under the Human Rights Agreement in the second phase. During the first phase, ONUSAL would be composed of approximately 70 international professional personnel, 28 police personnel and 15 military liaison officers. Approximately 20 professional personnel and 38 police personnel would be added during the second phase.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council dated 26 June and 1 July 1991,¹⁶⁶ the Council agreed to the composition of the ONUSAL military component proposed by the Secretary-General.

As recommended by the Secretary-General, the cost of the Mission, estimated at $32 million for an initial period of 12 months, would be considered an expense of the Organization to be borne by the Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

Implementation/extension/changes of mandate

By notes dated 16 September and 15 November 1991,¹⁶⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council initial progress reports of ONUSAL, informing the Council of the Mission's structure and activities during the period from 26 July to 31 October 1991.

On 3 January 1992, in a statement made by the President of the Security Council,¹⁶⁸ the members of the Council welcomed the signing by the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, on 31 December 1991, of the "Act of New York",¹⁶⁹ which recorded, inter alia, that the parties had concluded a number of further agreements whose implementation would put a final end to the armed conflict in El Salvador. The Council members also welcomed the Secretary-General's intention, stated on the same day, to submit a written report and proposals with a view to Council action required in relation to the content of those agreements, in particular the Agreement on the Cessation of the Armed Conflict and the Agreement on the Establishment of a National Civil Police, which were to be signed as part of the final Peace Agreement¹⁷⁰ in Mexico City on 16 February 1992 and which envisaged verification and monitoring functions to be performed by the United Nations.

On 10 January 1992, pursuant to resolution 693 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report¹⁷¹ recommending the enlargement of the mandate of ONUSAL and an immediate and substantial increase in its strength to enable it to undertake the additional functions desired of it by the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, in particular verifying all aspects of the ceasefire and the separation of forces and monitoring the maintenance of public order pending the establishment of a new national police force. If the mandate were to be enlarged to fulfil those new tasks, it would be necessary to add two new divisions — a Military Division and a Police Division — to the existing Human Rights Division. The core strength of the Military Division, which would be required until the cessation of the armed confrontation was completed, would be 244 observers. Another 128 observers would be needed to enable ONUSAL to carry out the extensive responsibilities entrusted to it during the 30-day period when the separation of forces would be implemented. The core strength of the Police Division would be 631 officers. In addition, 95 civilian staff would be required to provide administrative, transport, communication and procurement support. As envisaged under the Agreement on the Cessation of the Armed Conflict,¹⁷² the process of ending the armed confrontation would be completed by 31 October 1992. Accordingly, the Secretary-General would submit a further report to the Council in mid-October 1992, which would include his recommendations concerning the Mission's continuing operations and strength in the period following the end of that month.

In an addendum to his report,¹⁷³ the Secretary-General provided an estimate with regard to the cost implications of the expansion of the Mission's mandate. Should the Council decide to approve the expansion, it was estimated that the cost of the Mission would be approximately $58.9 million for the period from 1 January to 31 October 1992. The Secretary-General recommended that the cost of the Mission be considered an expense of the Organization to be borne by the Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

At its 3030th meeting, on 14 January 1992, the Council adopted resolution 729 (1992), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General of 10 January 1992; decided to enlarge the mandate of ONUSAL to include the verification and monitoring of the implementation of all the agreements concluded between the parties once they were signed, in particular the Agreement on the Cessation of the Armed Conflict and the Agreement on the Establishment of a National Civil Police; also decided to extend the mandate of ONUSAL until 31 October 1992; and requested the Secretary-General to report on the Mission's operations before the expiry of the new mandate period.

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council dated 16 and 17 January 1992,¹⁷⁴ the Council agreed to the Secretary-General's proposal to appoint Brigadier General Victor Suanzes Pardo of Spain as Chief Military Observer and Commander of the Military Division of ONUSAL. Through a further exchange of letters dated 3 and 5 February 1992,¹⁷⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council and the Council took note of the composition of the Military Division of ONUSAL.¹⁷⁶

On 25 February 1992, pursuant to resolutions 693 (1991) and 729 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report informing the Council that both the Military Division and the Police Division had been established and that the Military Division had begun its verification activities.¹⁷⁷

In a report dated 26 May 1992,¹⁷⁸ submitted to the Security Council pursuant to resolution 729 (1992), the Secretary-General described the Mission's activities since the entry into force of the ceasefire on 1 February 1992 and the progress made by the parties in the implementation of the agreements concluded between them. While commending the parties for their success in maintaining the ceasefire, the Secretary-General expressed concern about the delays in implementing the agreements.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁶ Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, dated 15 and 20 May 1992 respectively, the Council agreed with the Secretary-General's recommendation to temporarily maintain the strength of the Military Division and extend until 1 September the services of 39 military observers who were due to leave ONUSAL on 1 June (S/23987 and S/23988).

¹⁷⁹ On 3 June 1992, the President of the Council made a statement to the media in which the Council, inter alia, urged both parties to demonstrate good faith in implementing the agreements fully and reminded them of their obligation to take all necessary measures to guarantee the safety of the Mission and its members.

¹⁷² For the text of this Agreement, see chapter VII of the final Peace Agreement signed in Mexico City on 16 January 1992 (S/23501, annex).

By a letter dated 19 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁸⁰ the Secretary-General reported that he did not believe it would be possible to complete the demobilization of FMLN by 31 October 1992, as provided for in the Peace Agreement of 16 January 1992. By a letter dated 28 October 1992,¹⁸¹ the Secretary-General informed the President of the Council that he had made proposals to both parties for overcoming the difficulties in dismantling the military structures of FMLN and that consultations were continuing. In the meantime, he recommended that the Council extend the mandate of ONUSAL for an interim period of one month, until 30 November. The Secretary-General anticipated that, by that date, he would be able to make a specific recommendation on the mandate and strength that ONUSAL would need in order to verify implementation of the final phase of the peace process in El Salvador.

At its 3129th meeting, on 30 October 1992, the Council adopted resolution 784 (1992), by which it, inter alia, approved the Secretary-General's proposal to extend the mandate of ONUSAL until 30 November 1992 and requested him to submit, by that date, recommendations on the period of extension of the mandate, on the mandate itself and on the strength that the Mission would need to verify the implementation of the final phase of the peace process.

By a letter dated 11 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁸² the Secretary-General informed the Council that the parties had agreed to his proposal of formally bringing the armed conflict to an end on 15 December 1992. As requested in resolution 784 (1992), he would present to the Council a report on the progress of the peace process and his recommendations regarding the extension of the ONUSAL mandate.

On 23 November 1992, pursuant to resolutions 729 (1992) and 784 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report recommending the extension of the mandate of ONUSAL for a further six months, until 31 May 1993.¹⁸³ He reported that ONUSAL continued to carry out all the verification functions assigned to it under the various agreements signed by the Government of El Salvador and FMLN. He noted that the Mission's mandate, as provided for under resolution 693 (1991), was "to monitor all agreements concluded between the two parties". Since certain major undertakings, such as the reduction of the armed forces and the deployment of the National Civil Police, extended into 1994, the Secretary-General intended to submit to the Council at regular intervals his recommendations on the future activities and strength of the Mission. He anticipated that ONUSAL would complete its work by mid-1994. In an addendum to his report,¹⁸⁴ the Secretary-General recommended that the cost relating to the extension of the Mission's mandate should be considered as an expense of the Organization to be borne by the Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

At its 3142nd meeting, on 30 November 1992, the Council adopted resolution 791 (1992), by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General of 23 November 1992; decided to extend the mandate of ONUSAL, as defined in resolutions 693 (1991) and 729 (1992), until 31 May 1993; and requested the Secretary-General to report, as necessary, on all aspects of the Mission's operations, at the latest before the expiry of the new mandate period.

In a report dated 23 December 1992,¹⁸⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the armed conflict between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN had formally been brought to an end on 15 December. The Secretary-General noted, however, that much remained to be done to ensure the punctual implementation of the remaining provisions of the peace accords under the supervision of ONUSAL.

11. United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan established pursuant to Security Council resolution 622 (1988)

In April 1988, the Geneva Agreements on the Settlement of the Situation relating to Afghanistan were concluded.¹⁸⁷ In letters dated 14 and 22 April 1988, the Secretary-General informed the Security Council of the role requested of him in monitoring their implementation.¹⁸⁸ He stated his intention to dispatch 50 military observers to the area, subject to the concurrence of the Council. By resolution 622 (1988) of 31 October 1988, the Security Council confirmed its agreement to the measures envisaged in the letters, in particular the arrangement for the temporary dispatch to Afghanistan and Pakistan of military officers from existing United Nations operations to assist in the mission of good offices. The Mission was initially established for a period of 20 months from May 1988.

By resolution 647 (1990) of 11 January 1990, the Security Council extended the mandate of the United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan for a further two-month period, until 15 March 1990, in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary-General.¹⁸⁹ Subsequently, in his letter dated 12 March 1990 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁹⁰ the Secretary-General noted that his consultations with the signatories to the Geneva Agreements had indicated that another extension of the existing arrangements would not “meet with the necessary consensus”. He therefore intended to redeploy a small number of military officers as military advisers to his Personal Representative in Afghanistan and Pakistan to assist in the further implementation of the responsibilities entrusted to him by the General Assembly to facilitate the early realization of a comprehensive political settlement agreement.¹⁹¹ The Council accordingly allowed the mandate of the Mission to expire on 15 March 1990.¹⁹²

12. United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia established pursuant to Security Council resolution 717 (1991)

Establishment

By resolution 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, the Security Council endorsed the framework for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict;¹⁹³ welcomed the acceptance of the framework by all the Cambodian parties and their agreement to form a Supreme National Council as the legitimate body and source of authority in Cambodia during the transitional period;¹⁹⁴ and encouraged the Secretary-General to continue, within the context of preparations for reconvening the Paris Conference on Cambodia and on the basis of the resolution, preparatory studies to assess the resource implications, timing and other considerations relevant to the United Nations role in Cambodia.

By a letter dated 8 August 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁹⁵ the Secretary-General drew attention to a number of important decisions taken by the Supreme National Council, in particular, its agreement to an immediate and unlimited ceasefire and to undertake to stop receiving outside military assistance, and its decision to request the United Nations to dispatch a survey mission to

Cambodia. He added that in a letter dated 16 July, Prince Sihanouk, on behalf of the Supreme National Council, had formally requested the United Nations to dispatch a survey mission to Cambodia in order to evaluate the modalities of control and an appropriate number of United Nations personnel to control the ceasefire and the cessation of foreign military aid in cooperation with the Military Working Group of the Supreme National Council. The Secretary-General also noted that in a communiqué issued on 18 July 1991,¹⁹⁶ the five permanent members of the Security Council and Indonesia had reiterated that the withdrawal of foreign military forces, the ceasefire and the cessation of outside military assistance must be verified and supervised by the United Nations. To that end, they had welcomed the proposal made by the Supreme National Council that a United Nations survey mission should be sent to Cambodia. They had agreed to recommend the dispatch of such a mission, to begin the process of preparing for the military aspects of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC), and consider how the good offices of the Secretary-General could be used to maintain the ceasefire. In the light of the foregoing, the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention to proceed with the necessary arrangements for the dispatch of a survey mission to Cambodia. By a letter dated 14 August 1991,¹⁹⁷ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council agreed with his proposal.

In a report dated 30 September 1991,¹⁹⁸ the Secretary-General stated that, in the light of the survey mission's report, the United Nations could assist the Cambodian parties to maintain the ceasefire by deploying in Cambodia a small advance mission consisting mainly of military liaison officers, in order to help the parties address and resolve any violations or alleged violations of the ceasefire. Such an advance mission could be envisaged as the first stage of the good offices mechanism foreseen in the draft peace agreements. On that basis, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council authorize the establishment of a United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia (UNAMIC), to become operational as soon as the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodian conflict were signed.

UNAMIC would be absorbed into UNTAC once UNTAC was established by the Security Council. The Secretary-General recommended that UNAMIC operate under the authority of the Security Council and United Nations command.

By its resolution 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991, the Council decided to establish UNAMIC under its authority, as recommended by the Secretary-General, immediately after the signing of the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodian conflict. The Council requested the Secretary-General to report by 15 November 1991 on the implementation of the resolution, and to keep the Council fully informed of further developments.

Mandate/composition

The mandate of UNAMIC, as recommended by the Secretary-General and approved by the Council in resolution 717 (1991), was to assist the four Cambodian parties to address and resolve any violations or alleged violations of the ceasefire, and to carry out mine-awareness training of civilian populations.

UNAMIC was to function in the field as an integrated operation under the overall responsibility of a civilian Chief Liaison Officer, appointed by the Secretary-General.¹⁹⁹ In addition to his duties in relation to UNAMIC, the Chief Liaison Officer would have responsibility for maintaining contacts with the Supreme National Council on preparations for the deployment of UNTAC and on other matters related to the role of the United Nations in the implementation of the peace agreements. A Senior Military Liaison Officer, appointed by the Secretary-General with the consent of the Security Council, was to exercise command over the military elements of UNAMIC and report to the Secretary-General through the Chief Liaison Officer.²⁰⁰ The Secretary-General would, in turn, report regularly to the Security Council on the operations of UNAMIC.

The Mission was estimated to require 8 civilian liaison staff, 50 military liaison officers, 20 other military personnel to form the mine-awareness unit, and approximately 75 international and 75 local civilian support personnel. There would also be a military communications unit of some 40 persons, provided by Australia as a voluntary contribution, and an air unit. The military personnel of UNAMIC would be unarmed and provided by Member States at the request of the Secretary-General.²⁰¹ It was envisaged that UNAMIC would be deployed progressively and in phases. The cost of the Mission, estimated at $19.9 million for a six-month period of operation, was to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

Implementation/expansion of mandate

In a note dated 30 October 1991,²⁰² the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Security Council to the instruments adopted at the Paris Conference on Cambodia on 23 October 1991 (the Paris Agreements). In a report dated 14 November 1991,²⁰³ he informed the Council that following the signing of the Paris Agreements, the arrangements for the establishment of UNAMIC had entered into force and the Mission had become operational. Deployment of all civilian and military personnel was expected to be completed on schedule by mid-December 1991.

In a further report dated 30 December 1991,²⁰⁴ the Secretary-General recommended that the UNAMIC mandate be expanded to include training of Cambodians in mine clearance and the initiation of a mine-clearance programme, in addition to the existing mine-awareness programme. He noted that while the total eradication of mines would necessarily be a long-term endeavour, the initial programme would enable UNAMIC to reduce the threat posed by mines to the civilian population and to prepare the ground for a safe and orderly repatriation of the refugees and displaced persons under United Nations auspices. It would also facilitate the timely deployment of UNTAC and the discharge of its responsibilities throughout Cambodia. The proposed expansion of the UNAMIC mandate called for some additional 1,100 personnel, including a 700-person field-engineering battalion, and entailed financial and administrative implications.

By resolution 728 (1992) of 8 January 1992, the Council approved the Secretary-General's report of 30 December, "especially the provision of assistance in mine clearing by Cambodians"; called upon the Supreme National Council and all the Cambodian parties to continue to cooperate fully with UNAMIC, including in the discharge of its expanded mandate; and requested the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of further developments.

Termination

In his first progress report on the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia,²⁰⁵ submitted to the Council on 1 May 1992, the Secretary-General stated that the arrival of his Special Representative for Cambodia, Mr. Yasushi Akashi, in the country on 15 March 1992 had marked the initial deployment of UNTAC, which had thereupon absorbed UNAMIC.

13. United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia established pursuant to Security Council resolution 745 (1992)

Establishment

By a note dated 30 October 1991,²⁰⁶ the Secretary-General, in accordance with the request in paragraph 12 of the Final Act of the Paris Conference on Cambodia, drew the attention of the Security Council to the instruments adopted at the Paris Conference on 23 October 1991,²⁰⁷ including the Agreements on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict (the Paris Agreements), which invited the Council to establish the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and to provide it with the mandate set out in the Agreements.

²⁰¹ In accordance with normal practice, the contributing countries were to be selected in consultation with the parties and with the concurrence of the Security Council, bearing in mind the principle of geographical equity. For the list of countries that contributed personnel to the UNAMIC military component, see the following exchanges of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council: S/23186 and S/23187; S/23216 and 23217; S/23414 and S/23415.

At its 3015th meeting, on 31 October 1991, the Council adopted resolution 718 (1991) by which it, inter alia, expressed full support for the Paris Agreements; authorized the Secretary-General to designate a Special Representative for Cambodia to act on his behalf, as provided for in the Agreements; welcomed his intention to send a survey mission to Cambodia to prepare a plan for implementing the mandate envisaged in the Agreements; and requested the Secretary-General to submit a report containing his implementation plan, including in particular a detailed estimate of the cost of UNTAC, on the understanding that the report would be the basis on which the Council would authorize the establishment of UNTAC and the budget of which would subsequently be considered and approved in accordance with the provisions of Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

Through an exchange of letters dated 14 and 15 January 1992 between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,²⁰⁸ the members of the Council welcomed the appointment of Under-Secretary-General Yasushi Akashi (Japan) as Special Representative for Cambodia.

By a letter dated 18 January 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁰⁹ the Secretary-General noted the widely recognized need for the urgent deployment of UNTAC. He informed the Council that in order to prepare for phase I of the deployment, he had decided to submit to the General Assembly a proposal for the provision of an initial appropriation of $200 million, which, upon the approval by the Council of his report on the implementation plan, would become available immediately to cover the initial expenses. By a letter dated 24 January 1992,²¹⁰ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that members had taken note of his intention and welcomed the assurance that a detailed breakdown would be provided for the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the Fifth Committee when they considered the question.

Pursuant to resolution 718 (1991), on 19 February 1992 the Secretary-General submitted a report containing his plan for implementing the Paris Agreements.²¹¹ He proposed that UNTAC consist of seven distinct components: human rights, electoral, military, civil administration, police, repatriation and rehabilitation. The level of the activities of the different components would vary during the course of the transitional period and would be coordinated, as necessary, in order to allow for the most efficient and cost-effective use of resources. Noting that the elections were the focal point of the comprehensive settlement, he recommended that they should be scheduled for late April or early May 1993.

At its 3057th meeting, on 28 February 1992, the Council adopted resolution 745 (1992) by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General containing his plan; established UNTAC, under its authority, for a period not to exceed 18 months; decided that elections should be held in Cambodia by May 1993; and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council at stated intervals on progress made in the implementation of the resolution and on tasks still to be performed in the operation, with particular regard to the most effective and efficient use of resources.²¹²

During the transitional period,²¹³ the Supreme National Council of Cambodia was to delegate to UNTAC all powers necessary to ensure the implementation of the Paris Agreements, including those relating to the conduct of free and fair elections and the relevant aspects of the administration of Cambodia. The mandate given to UNTAC included the promotion and protection of human rights; the organization and conduct of free and fair general elections; the establishment of military arrangements to stabilize security and build confidence among the four Cambodian parties to the conflict; the setting up of a civil administration to ensure a neutral political ²¹² The United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia, established immediately after the signing of the Agreements in October 1991, continued to operate until UNTAC became operational, at which time UNAMIC and its functions were subsumed by UNTAC.

²¹³ The transitional period was defined as the period beginning with the entry into force of the Paris Agreements (on 23 October 1991) and terminating when the constituent assembly elected in conformity with the Agreements had approved the new Cambodian Constitution and transformed itself into a legislative assembly, and thereafter a new Cambodian Government had been created.

environment conducive to free and fair elections; the maintenance of law and order; the repatriation and resettlement of the Cambodian refugees and displaced persons; and the rehabilitation of essential Cambodian infrastructures.²¹⁴

The Special Representative of the Secretary-General was to head UNTAC and maintain an ongoing dialogue with the Supreme National Council regarding the Authority's activities in implementing its mandate. The number of international civilian staff required was estimated at 1,149. Additionally, the military component, headed by a Force Commander, was to have a strength of about 15,900 all ranks. It was further estimated that UNTAC components would be assisted by 7,000 locally recruited support personnel, including some 2,500 interpreters and additional temporary staff as might be required.

The estimated costs of UNTAC, inclusive of the initial appropriation of $200 million, were approximately $1,900 million. The estimate excluded the cost of the repatriation programme, for the financing of which a separate appeal was to be launched.

Implementation

Through an exchange of letters dated 8 and 11 March 1992 between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,²¹⁵ the members of the Council agreed to the appointment of Lieutenant General John M. Sanderson (Australia) as Force Commander and Brigadier General Michel Loridon (France) as Deputy Force Commander of the military component of UNTAC. In a further exchange of letters dated 31 March and 2 April 1992,²¹⁶ the Council members agreed to the composition of the military contingents of UNTAC.

Pursuant to resolution 745 (1992), on 1 May 1992 the Secretary-General submitted to the Council the first progress report on the operations of UNTAC²¹⁷ on the basis of his visit to Cambodia from 18 to 20 April 1992. He reported that the arrival of his Special Representative on 15 March 1992 in Cambodia, accompanied by his senior aides, marked the initial phase of the mission's deployment and the absorption of UNAMIC into it. He cautioned that while every effort was being made to discharge the Authority's complex tasks within the time frames envisaged in the implementation plan, the difficulties and delays encountered in its deployment, if not remedied, could have an adverse impact on its ability to maintain its tight schedule of operations. In his concluding remarks, the Secretary-General noted that the experience of mounting such a large and complex operation had pointed to the possible need of re-examining the manner in which existing financial and administrative regulations of the Organization were applied to such operations.

By a letter dated 14 May 1992,²¹⁸ the President of the Council, on behalf of the Council members, thanked the Secretary-General for his report and welcomed a subsequent announcement that phase II of the ceasefire arrangements (the cantonment, disarmament and demobilization phase) would begin on 13 June 1992.

On 12 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted a special report to the Security Council.²¹⁹ He noted that the implementation of phase II of the ceasefire, scheduled to begin on 13 June 1992, was being seriously compromised by lack of cooperation from the Party of Democratic Kampuchea (PDK). However, after careful consideration, he had concluded that phase II of the ceasefire should commence on 13 June as scheduled to avoid losing the momentum and jeopardizing the ability of UNTAC to organize and conduct the elections by April or May 1993. He stressed that all efforts should be made to persuade PDK to join the other parties in implementing the comprehensive political settlement and suggested that the Security Council itself might wish to consider appropriate action to achieve that objective.

At the 3085th meeting, on 12 June 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,²²⁰ in which the Council stressed the need for phase II of the military arrangements to begin on 13 June 1992 and urged the Secretary-General to accelerate the deployment to Cambodia and within the country of the full UNTAC peacekeeping force. The Council called upon all parties to comply strictly with the commitments they had accepted, including cooperation with the Authority.

On 14 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a second special report on the difficulties UNTAC was facing in implementing the Paris Agreements.²²¹ Despite the continued lack of cooperation of PDK, he considered it more appropriate to press forward with phase II of the ceasefire than to suspend the operation. He underscored the need to address the question of how the full and active support of the signatories of the Paris Agreements could be obtained for the Authority's efforts to carry out its mandate.

At its 3099th meeting, on 21 July 1992, the Council adopted resolution 766 (1992) by which it, inter alia, urged all States, in particular neighbouring States, to provide assistance to UNTAC; approved the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue to implement the Paris Agreements despite the difficulties and invited them to accelerate the deployment of the Authority's civilian components, especially the component mandated to supervise or control the existing administrative structures; demanded that PDK permit, without delay, the deployment of UNTAC in the areas under its control and implement fully phase II of the plan as well as the other aspects of the Paris Agreements; and requested the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to ensure that international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Cambodia would benefit only the parties which were fulfilling their obligations under the Paris Agreements and cooperating fully with UNTAC.

Pursuant to resolution 745 (1992), on 21 September 1992 the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his second progress report on UNTAC.²²² He reported that despite the constraints imposed by the refusal of PDK to fully participate in the peace process, UNTAC had made substantial strides towards its goals and was close to its full deployment throughout almost the whole territory of Cambodia. Therefore, he remained determined that the electoral process should be carried out in accordance with the timetable laid down in the implementation plan. He noted that was examining a proposal to hold a presidential election simultaneously with the election for a constituent assembly. However, since a presidential election was not provided for in the Paris Agreements, the authorization of the Security Council as well as the provision of additional resources would be required. The Secretary-General recommended an increase in the number of checkpoints within the country and along its borders.

By a letter dated 29 September 1992,²²³ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General that members of the Council needed more time to study his report of 21 September 1992 and to determine what further action was required.

At its 3124th meeting, on 13 October 1992, the Council adopted resolution 783 (1992) by which it, inter alia, approved the report of the Secretary-General; confirmed that the electoral process should proceed in accordance with the timetable laid down in the implementation plan; supported the intention of the Secretary-General concerning the checkpoints in the country and along its borders with neighbouring countries; demanded that PDK fulfil immediately its obligations under the Paris Agreements, facilitate without delay full deployment of UNTAC in the areas under its control and implement fully phase II of the plan, particularly cantonment and demobilization; called upon all parties in Cambodia to cooperate fully with UNTAC to identify minefields and facilitate UNTAC investigations of reports of foreign forces, foreign assistance and ceasefire violations within the territory under their control; reiterated that all parties take all necessary measures to ensure the safety and security of United Nations personnel; encouraged the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue their efforts to create a neutral political environment for the election and in that context requested that an UNTAC radio broadcast facility be established without delay and with access to the whole territory of Cambodia; encouraged the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to make use fully of all possibilities offered by the UNTAC mandate to enhance the effectiveness of existing civil police in resolving the growing problems relating to the maintenance of law and order in Cambodia; and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council as soon as possible, and no later than 15 November 1992, on the implementation of the resolution.

On 15 November 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his report on the implementation of resolution 783 (1992).²²⁴ He reported that PDK had continued to refuse to cooperate with UNTAC in the implementation of the Paris Agreements or to heed the appeals of the Security Council contained in resolutions 766 (1992) and 783 (1992). The difficulties encountered in implementing phase II of the ceasefire had led to the effective suspension of the cantonment, disarmament and demobilization process. In light of those developments, and an increase in ceasefire violations and attacks on UNTAC personnel, an adjustment in the activities of the military component of UNTAC had been made necessary. The Secretary-General indicated that he concurred with the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference that the implementation of the peace process had to continue and that the timetable leading to the holding of free and fair elections by May 1993 had to be upheld. He noted that he had already approved the adjustments that should be made in the deployment of the military component, with a view to fostering a general sense of security and enhancing the ability to protect the voter registration as well as, subsequently, the polling process, particularly in remote or insecure areas. It had meant that the projected reduction of the military component envisaged in his implementation plan of 19 February 1992²²⁵ was no longer feasible. Furthermore, having weighed the proposal of the Co-Chairmen for election by universal suffrage of a Cambodian Head of State, he agreed that a presidential election would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and reinforce stability during the period when the Constituent Assembly would have the task of drafting and adopting the new Cambodian constitution. He had, therefore, asked his Special Representative to draw up contingency plans for the organization and conduct of such an election by UNTAC, on the understanding that it would require, in due course, the authorization of the Security Council and the provision of additional resources.

At its 3143rd meeting, on 30 November 1992, the Council adopted resolution 792 (1992) by which it, inter alia, endorsed the report of the Secretary-General; determined that UNTAC should proceed with preparations for free and fair elections to be held in April/May 1993 in all areas of Cambodia to which UNTAC had full and free access as at 31 January 1993; requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Council for decision any recommendations for the organization and conduct by UNTAC of a presidential election to be held in conjunction with the planned election for the constituent assembly; demanded that PDK fulfil immediately its obligations under the Paris Agreements; called upon those concerned to ensure that measures were taken, in accordance with the Agreements, to prevent the supply of petroleum products to the areas occupied by any Cambodian party not complying with the Paris Agreements and requested the Secretary-General to examine the modalities of such measures; invited UNTAC to establish all necessary border checkpoints and requested neighbouring States to cooperate fully in the establishment, operation and maintenance of those checkpoints; supported the decision of the Supreme National Council, dated 22 September 1992, to set a moratorium on the export of logs from Cambodia in order to protect Cambodia's natural resources and requested UNTAC to take appropriate measures to secure the implementation of such a moratorium; requested UNTAC to continue to monitor the ceasefire and to take effective measures to prevent the recurrence or escalation of fighting in Cambodia, as well as incidents of banditry and arms smuggling; demanded also that all parties take all action necessary to safeguard the lives and the security of UNTAC personnel throughout Cambodia and report their action to the Special Representative; and requested the Secretary-General to report to the Council as soon as possible and no later than 15 February 1993 on the implementation of the resolution, and on any further measures that might be necessary and appropriate to ensure the realization of the fundamental objectives of the Paris Agreements.

14. United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus established pursuant to Security Council resolution 186 (1964)

established pursuant to Security Council resolution 186 (1964), continued to perform its task of conflict control. Accordingly, the Secretary-General reported to the Council, at the end of every six-month mandate period, that in the light of the situation on the ground and of political developments, the continued presence of UNFICYP remained indispensable, both in helping to maintain calm on the island and in creating the best conditions for his good offices efforts.²²⁶ For its part, the Council regularly extended the mandate of the Force for six-month periods.²²⁷

UNFICYP continued to be the only United Nations peacekeeping operation not financed from assessed contributions by States Members of the Organization. In accordance with resolution 186 (1964), the costs of the Force were met by the Governments providing the military contingents, by the Government of Cyprus, and by voluntary contributions. In resolution 682 (1990) of 21 December 1990, the Security Council expressed its concern about “the chronic and ever-deepening financial crisis” facing UNFICYP and decided to consider “alternative arrangements for meeting the costs of the Force for which the United Nations is responsible, in order to place the Force on a sound and secure financial basis”. On the basis of an extensive series of consultations with members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and others concerned, the Secretary-General, who had been asked to look into the question, reiterated his recommendation that a system of assessed contributions be adopted as the most viable means for placing UNFICYP on a sound and secure financial footing.²²⁸ At the end of 1991, however, the President of the Council made a statement to the media on behalf of the members of the Council, noting that in the light of the discussion in informal consultations, it had been concluded that the necessary agreement did not exist in the Council for a decision to be adopted on a change in the financing of UNFICYP.²²⁹ In a report dated 1 December 1992, the Secretary-General informed the Council that as a result of decisions by 15. United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslavia established pursuant to Security Council resolution 743 (1992)

Establishment

In response to requests by the principal Yugoslav parties for the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia,²³¹ the Security Council, by resolution 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, decided that a small group of personnel, including military personnel, be sent to Yugoslavia to carry forward preparations for the possible deployment of such an operation.²³²

By resolution 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, the Council endorsed the Secretary-General’s plan²³³ to send immediately to Yugoslavia a group of up to 50 military liaison officers, which was to be followed by a larger operation when the necessary conditions for the deployment of a peacekeeping force were met.

By resolution 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, the Council welcomed the continuing efforts of the

Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for Yugoslavia to remove the remaining obstacles to the deployment of a peacekeeping operation,²³⁴ and requested the Secretary-General to expedite his preparations for such an operation so as to be prepared to deploy immediately once the Council decided to do so.

In accordance with the Secretary-General's subsequent recommendations²³⁵ and the peacekeeping plan of 11 December 1991,²³⁶ the Security Council, by resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, decided to establish a peacekeeping operation as an "interim arrangement to create the conditions of peace and security required for the negotiation of an overall settlement of the Yugoslav crisis".²³⁷ The operation was to be known as the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR).²³⁸ The Council requested the Secretary-General immediately to deploy those elements of the Force which could assist in developing an implementation plan for the earliest possible full deployment of the Force.²³⁹

After having received an implementation plan from the Secretary-General on 2 April 1992,²⁴⁰ the Security Council, by resolution 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, authorized the earliest possible full deployment of UNPROFOR.

Mandate and composition

As recommended by the Secretary-General,²⁴¹ UNPROFOR was established for an initial period of 12 months. The Force would maintain its headquarters in Sarajevo and be deployed in three areas in Croatia designated as "United Nations Protected Areas". These were areas in which the Secretary-General judged that special arrangements were required to ensure that a lasting ceasefire was maintained. Such special arrangements would be of an interim nature and would not prejudice the outcome of political negotiations for a comprehensive settlement of the Yugoslav crisis. For United Nations purposes, the Protected Areas were divided into four sectors — East, West, North and South — in the areas of Eastern Slavonia, Western Slavonia and Krajina. In addition, military observers would be deployed in certain parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina adjacent to Croatia.

The tasks of UNPROFOR would include the following: (a) to ensure that the Protected Areas were demilitarized, and that all persons residing in them were protected from fear of armed attacks; (b) to ensure that the local police forces carried out their duties without discriminating against persons of any nationality; and (c) to assist the United Nations humanitarian agencies in the return of all displaced persons who so desired to their homes in the Protected Areas.

To fulfil the above tasks, UNPROFOR would consist of military, police and civilian components, and an air unit. The overall command in the field would be exercised by the Force Commander.²⁴² The military component would consist of 12 enlarged infantry battalions totalling 10,400 all ranks, headquarters, logistics and other support elements totalling about 2,840 all ranks, and 100 military observers.²⁴³ The normal rules in United Nations peacekeeping operations for the bearing and use of arms would apply. The police component would consist of approximately 530 unarmed police personnel, of which 320 would be deployed at the initial stage. The civilian component, which would perform a range of political, legal, public information and administrative functions, was initially to consist of some 500 personnel drawn largely from existing United Nations staff.

The Secretary-General estimated that the cost associated with the emplacement and maintenance of UNPROFOR, for an initial period of 12 months, would be approximately $600 million. This cost was to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter. In addition, some gratis goods and services were made available by the Yugoslav parties to the United Nations.

Implementation and enlargement

(a) Croatia

(i) Feasibility of peacekeeping in Croatia

In a report dated 12 May 1992,²⁴⁴ the Secretary-General observed that developments since the Council's approval of the plan for the United Nations peacekeeping force in Croatia had raised new doubts about the practicability of that operation. In particular, the Secretary-General drew the Council's attention to the decision of the Belgrade authorities, following the declaration on 27 April 1992 of the new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to withdraw Yugoslav People's Army personnel from republics other than Serbia and Montenegro and to renounce authority over those who remained. He observed that this in effect removed a party to the peacekeeping plan whose cooperation was essential to its success, while substituting for it a new element or elements which were not formally bound by the Belgrade authorities' acceptance of the plan. Refusal by the much-enlarged local forces to demobilize would undermine the very basis of the plan that UNPROFOR had been mandated to implement. However, he saw no alternative but for the Force to assume its responsibilities in the United Nations Protected Areas in accordance with the peacekeeping plan, while appealing to the Yugoslav People's Army and the Serbian authorities to use their influence to calm the fears of the Serb communities who would find themselves outside the Protected Areas.

(ii) Initial deployment

By resolution 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, the Security Council noted the progress made thus far in the deployment of UNPROFOR, welcomed the fact that the Force had assumed the responsibility called for by its mandate in Eastern Slavonia, and requested the Secretary-General to ensure that it would assume its full responsibilities in all the United Nations Protected Areas as soon as possible.

On 26 June 1992, the Secretary-General reported²⁴⁵ that UNPROFOR had assumed its full responsibilities in Sectors East and West. However, the Force Commander had assessed that until a solution was found to the question of certain areas of Croatia adjacent to Sectors North and South,²⁴⁶ which had been controlled by the Yugoslav People's Army and populated largely by Serbs, but which were outside the agreed United Nations Protected Area boundaries, it would prove extremely difficult for UNPROFOR to assume its full responsibilities in those sectors. While the Belgrade authorities had pressed strongly for those areas to be included in the United Nations Protected Areas, the Croatian authorities had resisted any changes in the Protected Area boundaries. In such circumstances, in order to stabilize the situation, the Secretary-General proposed (a) that a joint commission be established under the chairmanship of UNPROFOR, consisting of representatives of the Government of Croatia and the local authorities in the region, to oversee and monitor the process of the restoration of authority in those areas by the Government of Croatia; (b) that an appropriate number of United Nations military observers be deployed along the line of confrontation and within those areas; and (c) that United Nations civilian police be deployed throughout the areas in order to monitor the maintenance of law and order by the existing police forces, with particular regard to the well-being of any minority groups. The Secretary-General indicated that implementation of these measures would require the strengthening of UNPROFOR by the addition of some 60 military observers and 120 civilian police.

(iii) Implementation and expansion of mandate

By resolution 762 (1992) of 30 June 1992, the Security Council urged the Government of Croatia and others concerned to follow the course of action outlined in the report of the Secretary-General and appealed to all parties to assist the Force in its implementation. It recommended the establishment of the Joint Commission described in the report, which was to consult with the Belgrade authorities in performing its functions. It also authorized the strengthening of the Force, as proposed in the report, to perform the functions envisaged therein, with the agreement of the Government of Croatia and others concerned.

In a report dated 27 July and 6 August 1992,²⁴⁷ the Secretary-General informed the Council that UNPROFOR had achieved a number of successes since its assumption of responsibility in the four sectors, including the elimination of ceasefire violations involving the use of heavy weapons, the lessening of tension and the withdrawal of most elements of the Yugoslav People's Army. Problems nevertheless remained, especially with regard to the excessive armament of the local police in the United Nations Protected Areas and the continuing persecution of non-Serbs in some areas. Conditions did not therefore exist for the voluntary return of displaced persons to their homes, an important aspect of the United Nations peacekeeping plan. Moreover, since the peacekeeping plan had been accepted by the parties and approved by the Council, the Republics in the area had acquired an international legal personality and three had become States Members of the United Nations. The Croatian authorities had raised the issue of the control of the Protected Area boundaries where those coincided with what were now international borders.

The Secretary-General presented his Force Commander's recommendations that the Force's existing mandate be further enlarged to control the entry of civilians into the United Nations Protected Areas and to perform immigration and customs functions at the Protected Area borders where these coincided with international frontiers. The strength of the civil affairs component would also have to be increased. Observing that the evolution of the situation in the former Yugoslavia was drawing UNPROFOR into quasi-governmental functions which went beyond normal peacekeeping practice, the Secretary-General nevertheless believed that the assumption of those functions was necessary if the effort already invested by the Council in Croatia was not to be undermined.²⁴⁸

The Secretary-General estimated that the cost associated with the further enlargement of the mandate and strength of UNPROFOR, as recommended above, would amount to some $30 million and, thereafter, approximately $6 million per month.

By resolution 769 (1992) of 7 August 1992, the Security Council approved the report of the Secretary-General and authorized the proposed enlargement of the mandate and strength of UNPROFOR.

On 28 September 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report,²⁴⁹ in which he noted that an agreement had been reached on the withdrawal of the remaining elements of the Yugoslav Army from Croatia and the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula. Detailed arrangements for the implementation of the agreement were being finalized. In the meantime, he recommended that the Security Council authorize UNPROFOR to assume responsibility for monitoring the agreed arrangements.

By resolution 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, the Security Council approved the report of the Secretary-General and authorized the Force to assume responsibility for monitoring the arrangements agreed for the complete withdrawal of the Yugoslav Army from Croatia, the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula and the removal of heavy weapons from neighbouring areas of Croatia and Montenegro.

(b) Bosnia and Herzegovina

(i) Feasibility of peacekeeping in Bosnia and Herzegovina

By a report dated 24 April 1992,²⁵⁰ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, at a meeting with the Foreign Minister of Bosnia and Herzegovina on 10 April 1992, the latter had asked for the deployment of United Nations peacekeeping forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In response to that request, the Secretary-General had emphasized the division of labour between the United Nations, whose peacekeeping mandate was limited to the situation in Croatia, and the peacemaking role of the European Commission for Yugoslavia as a control of the United Nations Protected Area boundaries where these coincided with international borders of the Republic of Croatia until the conditions for their full control by the Croatian authorities were fulfilled.

whole.²⁵¹ The Secretary-General's Personal Envoy had informed the President that, in the light of all the factors bearing on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including in particular the current widespread violence, and in view of the limitations on human, material and financial resources, the deployment of a peacekeeping operation was not feasible.²⁵² The Secretary-General decided, though, to advance the dispatch to Bosnia and Herzegovina of unarmed military observers, whose deployment, according to the concept paper for UNPROFOR,²⁵³ had originally been envisaged for the time after the demilitarization of the Protected Areas.²⁵⁴

The decision to dispatch military observers to Bosnia and Herzegovina was welcomed by the Council in a statement made by its President on 24 April 1992.²⁵⁵ The Council believed that the presence of such observers, like that of the monitors of the European Commission, should help the parties to implement their commitment, undertaken on 23 April 1992, to respect the ceasefire agreement signed in Sarajevo on 12 April.

On 30 April 1992, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he had decided to dispatch the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Marrack Goulding, to examine the evolving situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to look into the feasibility of a United Nations peacekeeping operation there,²⁵⁶ which initiative was also welcomed by the Council.²⁵⁷

Following Mr. Goulding's visit to the region, the Secretary-General, on 12 May 1992, submitted to the Council a report²⁵⁸ stating that, according to Mr. Goulding's findings, it had proved impossible to implement the ceasefire agreement signed on 12 April. The Secretary-General did not believe, therefore, that in the present phase of the conflict it was feasible to undertake peacekeeping activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina beyond the existing limited involvement of UNPROFOR military observers in Sarajevo and the Mostar region. The Secretary-General noted that one option that had been explored was the feasibility of deploying United Nations peacekeeping forces in a more limited role — as had been requested by President Izetbegovic of Bosnia and Herzegovina — to control the Sarajevo airport, protect humanitarian aid deliveries and keep open roads, bridges and border crossings.

By resolution 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to keep under active review the feasibility of protecting international humanitarian relief programmes and of ensuring safe and secure access to Sarajevo airport, but also, in light of the evolving situation, the possibility of deploying a peacekeeping mission.

On 26 May 1992, the Secretary-General reported²⁵⁹ that the military observers deployed in the Mostar region had left the area on 14 May, when risks to their lives had reached an unacceptable level. About two thirds of UNPROFOR headquarters personnel had also withdrawn from Sarajevo on 16 and 17 May, leaving behind some 90 personnel who were lending their good offices to promote local ceasefires and humanitarian activities. Regarding the feasibility of protecting international humanitarian relief programmes, the Secretary-General believed that a determined effort to persuade warring parties to conclude and honour agreements permitting the unimpeded delivery of relief supplies might be the most promising course of action. He expressed some optimism that conditions might now be more propitious for the conclusion of such agreements. The Chief Military Observer of UNPROFOR, who was leading the sole remaining international presence in Sarajevo, would continue his efforts to arrange and assist the necessary negotiations.

(ii) Sarajevo Airport Agreement

In a report dated 6 June 1992,²⁶⁰ the Secretary-General noted that, on the previous day, the parties in Bosnia had signed an agreement which inter alia envisaged that UNPROFOR would take over full operational responsibility for the functioning and security of the Sarajevo airport, which was to be reopened for the delivery of humanitarian supplies, under the exclusive authority of the United Nations. On the basis of that agreement (the Airport Agreement), the Force Commander of UNPROFOR had proposed a concept of operations according to which, as a first measure, United Nations military observers would be deployed to Sarajevo to create the necessary security conditions. It was estimated that the following additions to the Force's strength would be required: (a) a reinforced infantry battalion of some 1,000 persons; (b) 60 military observers; (c) military and civilian staff for an UNPROFOR sector headquarters to be established at Sarajevo; (d) 40 civilian police; and (e) possibly some technical personnel, engineers and airport staff, if the existing airport personnel required reinforcement.²⁶¹

The Secretary-General estimated that the additional cost of the enlargement, for a four-month period until mid-October 1992, would amount to some $20 million and, thereafter, approximately $3 million per month. He recommended that this additional cost be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

By resolution 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, the Council decided to enlarge the mandate and strength of UNPROFOR in accordance with the Secretary-General's report. The Council authorized the Secretary-General to deploy, when he judged it appropriate, the military observers and related personnel and equipment required for the implementation of the first phase of activities.

On 29 June 1992, the Secretary-General informed the Council that considerable progress had been made towards the assumption by UNPROFOR of responsibility for the airport.²⁶² Although an absolute ceasefire had not yet been achieved, he endorsed the recommendation of his Force Commander that UNPROFOR seize the opportunity offered by these developments. He therefore requested the Council to grant the authorization foreseen in resolution 758 (1992) to deploy the additional elements of UNPROFOR necessary to secure the airport and make it operational.²⁶³

On the same day, the Security Council adopted resolution 761 (1992), by which it granted such authorization.

In a report dated 10 and 13 July 1992,²⁶⁴ the Secretary-General stated that the airport had now reopened, under UNPROFOR control, for the delivery of humanitarian assistance. However, as the operation had taken shape, it had become apparent that the strength of UNPROFOR was inadequate. He recommended that it be increased by some 1,600 additional personnel, to ensure the security and functioning of the airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance. He estimated that the revised cost of the enlargement, for a four-month period until mid-October 1992, would amount to some $22.7 million and, thereafter, approximately $3.8 million per month.²⁶⁵ The Secretary-General also noted that, despite an encouraging start, some basic conditions stipulated in the Airport Agreement had not been complied with by either side.²⁶⁶

By resolution 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992, the Security Council authorized the Secretary-General to immediately deploy additional elements of UNPROFOR, in accordance with the recommendation contained in his above report.

(iii) Supervision of heavy weapons

By a letter dated 17 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁶⁷ the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom transmitted the text of an agreement between the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina, signed at London, in which the parties had, inter alia, agreed to a ceasefire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina for a period of 14 days, and asked the Security Council to make arrangements for the international supervision of all heavy weapons.

²⁶¹ In his report, the Secretary-General also noted that he had asked the Force Commander to pursue negotiation of a broader security zone encompassing the city of Sarajevo as a whole, as a second phase of negotiations with the parties.

On the same date, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,²⁶⁸ stating that the Council had decided in principle to respond positively to the request for the United Nations to make arrangements for the supervision of all heavy weapons in accordance with the London Agreement.

On 21 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report, annexed to which was a concept of operations for the supervision of heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Secretary-General observed, however, that, after having carefully considered the London Agreement and the circumstance in which it was concluded, as well as the advice of his Force Commander, he could not at the present time recommend that the Council accept the request of the three parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina that the United Nations supervise the heavy weapons which they had agreed to place under international supervision.²⁶⁹

On 24 July 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,²⁷⁰ in which the latter expressed its concurrence with the Secretary-General's view. The Council invited the Secretary-General to contact all Member States, particularly the States members of the relevant regional organizations in Europe, to ask them to make urgently available to the Secretary-General information about the personnel, equipment and logistic support which they would be prepared to contribute to the supervision of heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In the light of the outcome of those contacts, the Secretary-General would undertake further preparatory work.

(iv) Support for delivery of humanitarian assistance

On 10 September 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report²⁷¹ in which he presented proposals on how the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina could be facilitated through the provision of protective support by UNPROFOR.²⁷²

The proposals envisaged that this function could be added to the Force's mandate and carried out by military personnel, under the command of the Force Commander. The task of UNPROFOR, under its enlarged mandate, would be to support the efforts of UNHCR to deliver humanitarian relief throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina and, in particular, to provide any necessary protection. In providing support to UNHCR-organized convoys, the UNPROFOR troops concerned would follow normal peacekeeping rules of engagement. They would thus be authorized to use force in self-defence, which, in that context, was deemed to include situations in which armed persons attempted by force to prevent United Nations troops from carrying out their mandate.²⁷³ The Secretary-General suggested that UNPROFOR could also be authorized to provide protection to convoys of released detainees, if the International Committee of the Red Cross so requested and if the Force Commander agreed that the request was practicable.²⁷⁴

By resolution 770 (1992), adopted on 13 August under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Security Council called upon States to use all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina. By resolution 776 (1992) of 14 September 1992, the Council authorized the mandate and strength of UNPROFOR to be expanded in implementation of that decision, thus linking the mandate of the Force to Chapter VII, and incorporating the authorization for the use of "all measures necessary" in the mandate of the Force.²⁷⁵

(v) Monitoring of military flight ban

The UNPROFOR mandate was again expanded on 9 October 1992, when the Security Council, by ²⁷³ See S/24540, para. 9.

²⁷⁴ Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 10 and 12 September 1992 (S/24549 and S/24550), Council members agreed with the Secretary-General's proposal that, pending the Council's approval of the recommendation in his report, UNPROFOR use its existing resources to protect detainees expected to be released shortly from two Serbian detention camps in the northern part of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

resolution 781 (1992), decided to establish a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina and provided that UNPROFOR was to monitor compliance with the ban. Effective monitoring was to be achieved, inter alia, through the placement of observers at airfields in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and through the establishment of an appropriate mechanism for the approval and inspection of flights.²⁷⁶

In a report dated 5 and 9 November 1992,²⁷⁷ the Secretary-General presented a concept of operations for monitoring by UNPROFOR, which envisaged the establishment of a Monitoring Coordination and Control Centre at UNPROFOR headquarters in Zagreb; the inspection of all flights with destinations in Bosnia and Herzegovina; and the monitoring of all flight movements into and out of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Monitoring and inspections tasks were to be carried out in cooperation with the European Community Monitoring Mission and NATO. It was estimated that 75 additional military observers would be required, and that the associated cost would amount to some $5 million for the six-month period from 1 November 1992 to 30 April 1993 and, thereafter, to approximately $500,000 per month. The additional cost was to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter.

By resolution 786 (1992) of 11 November 1992, the Security Council endorsed the concept of operations and approved the Secretary-General's recommendation concerning the increase in the strength of the Force. The Council called upon all parties and others concerned henceforth to direct all requests for authorization of flights other than those banned to UNPROFOR, with special provisions being made for flights in support of United Nations operations.

(vi) Border control

By resolution 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, by which it inter alia strengthened the sanctions imposed by resolution 713 (1991) and 757 (1992) and reaffirmed the demand that all interference from outside the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately, the Council decided that observers were to be deployed on the border of Bosnia and

Herzegovina to facilitate the implementation of its relevant resolutions. The Council requested the Secretary-General to present his recommendations on the matter as soon as possible.²⁷⁸

The Secretary-General presented his recommendations on 21 December 1992, including a recommendation for the enlargement of UNPROFOR with some 10,000 additional troops, which would enable UNPROFOR personnel to patrol between all border crossing points, search vehicles and people and deny any cross-border movement of people or goods which would violate decisions of the Council.²⁷⁹

(c) The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

(i) Feasibility of preventive deployment

By a letter dated 25 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁸⁰ the Secretary-General stated that the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had conveyed to him a request for the deployment of United Nations observers in that country, in view of the possible impact which the fighting elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia could have on it. The Secretary-General proposed to dispatch forthwith a group of about a dozen military, police and civilian personnel to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia in order to explore the feasibility of a more substantive deployment of UNPROFOR in that country. In a reply dated 25 November 1992,²⁸¹ the President informed the Secretary-General that Council members agreed with his proposal.

On 9 December 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report²⁸² on the outcome of the exploratory mission to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.²⁸³ The mission had recommended that a small UNPROFOR presence be established on the Macedonian side of that republic's borders with Albania and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), with an "essentially preventive mandate" of monitoring and reporting any developments in the border areas which could undermine confidence and stability in that republic. It had further recommended that a small group of United Nations civilian police be deployed in the border area to monitor the Macedonian border police, as incidents arising from illegal attempts to cross the border had recently led to increased tension on the Macedonian side. Unlike the military deployment, however, the latter proposal had not yet received the consent of the Macedonian authorities.

It was envisaged that the UNPROFOR presence would consist of military, civilian police and civil affairs components. It would comprise a battalion of up to 700 all ranks, 35 military observers, 26 civilian police monitors, 10 civil affairs staff, 45 administrative staff, and local interpreters. The headquarters would be in Skopje.²⁸⁴ Emplacement and start-up costs would be met initially from the resources already made available for UNPROFOR by the General Assembly at its current session.

(ii) Authorization of deployment

By resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992, the Security Council authorized the Secretary-General to establish a presence of UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, as recommended by him in his report, and so to inform the authorities of Albania and of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). The Council requested the Secretary-General to deploy immediately the military, civil affairs and administrative personnel recommended in his report, and to deploy the police monitors immediately upon receiving the consent of the Government of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. It urged the Force presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to coordinate closely with the mission of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Middle East

16. United Nations Truce Supervision Organization established pursuant to Security Council resolution 50 (1948)

Between 1989 and 1992, the military observers of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) continued to assist and cooperate with the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), in accordance with the ceasefire and disengagement agreements of 1973/74, and with the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) established in 1978, in accordance with its terms of reference.

17. United Nations Disengagement Observer Force established pursuant to Security Council resolution 350 (1974)

The United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, stationed at the armistice line between Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, continued to serve as an interposition force between the parties. During the period under review, the Council extended its mandate eight times²⁸⁵ following consideration of the Secretary-General's regular progress reports.²⁸⁶

18. United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon established pursuant to Security Council resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978)

Pursuant to resolution 425 (1978), by which the Security Council decided, at the request of the Government of Lebanon, to establish under its authority a United Nations interim force for southern Lebanon, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon continued to fulfil its mandate of "confirming the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restoring international peace and security and assisting the Government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area".

Between 1989 and 1992, the Secretary-General submitted a number of reports on UNIFIL,²⁸⁷ and the Council adopted eight resolutions which successively extended the Force's mandate.²⁸⁸ In those resolutions, the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other concerned parties on the full implementation of the mandate of UNIFIL.

²⁸⁸ The mandate of the Force was extended by resolutions 630 (1989), 639 (1989), 648 (1990), 659 (1990), 684 (1991), 701 (1991), 734 (1992) and 768 (1992).

²⁸⁴ See S/24923, annex.

During the period under review, several members of UNIFIL were killed, wounded or kidnapped in attacks against the Force. The Council addressed such attacks in two presidential statements made at successive meetings held on 31 July 1989.²⁸⁹ In the second statement, after expressing profound concern over the safety and security of UNIFIL personnel, Council members noted with appreciation that significant efforts had been undertaken to improve the Force's security. They called upon all parties to do their utmost to ensure effective reinforcement of the Force's security and to enable it to carry out its mandate as laid down in resolution 425 (1978).

Further to a request made by Council members on 31 July 1990 for a review of the scale and deployment of UNIFIL,²⁹⁰ the Secretary-General recommended certain measures to streamline UNIFIL, which would permit a reduction of some 10 per cent in the Force's military strength.²⁹¹ The Council subsequently approved some of the measures recommended by the Secretary-General.²⁹²

19. United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group established pursuant to Security Council resolution 598 (1987)

From 1989 to February 1991, the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group (UNIIMOG) continued to fulfil its mandate under resolution 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, namely, "to verify, confirm and supervise the ceasefire and withdrawal". Following consideration of progress reports submitted by the Secretary-General,²⁹³ the Security Council adopted six resolutions successively extending the mandate of UNIIMOG.²⁹⁴

In a report dated 29 January 1991,²⁹⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that the activities of the Group had been considerably affected by developments in the Gulf region, where the outbreak of hostilities had effectively prevented UNIIMOG from continuing operations in Iraq. During the conflict, the elements of UNIIMOG which had operated in Iraq were temporarily withdrawn from Iraq and relocated to Cyprus. The operations continued on the Iranian side only.

Termination

Reporting to the Security Council on 26 February 1991,²⁹⁶ the Secretary-General described the general situation along the border between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq as very calm. He also reported that the forces of the two sides had withdrawn fully to the internationally recognized boundaries, and that the military provisions of resolution 598 (1987) could thus be considered implemented. The remaining tasks under that resolution were essentially political and therefore the Secretary-General recommended replacing UNIIMOG with small civilian offices in Baghdad and Tehran. Accordingly, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council take no action to extend the mandate of UNIIMOG beyond its expiration date of 28 February 1991.

By a letter dated 28 February 1991,²⁹⁷ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that Council members agreed with his recommendations and concurred with the proposed arrangements. They expressed their gratitude to the Secretary-General and their appreciation to the members of UNIIMOG for the successful completion of their important task.

20. United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission established pursuant to Security Council resolution 687 (1991)

Establishment

At its 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991, the Security Council adopted resolution 687 (1991)

28 November 1990 and 685 (1991) of 31 January 1991.

whereby, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, it established the terms and conditions for a formal ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990). Section B of the resolution established a demilitarized zone along the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, and requested the Secretary-General to submit a plan for the immediate deployment of a United Nations observer unit to monitor the Khor Abdullah and the demilitarized zone.

On 5 April 1991, pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Council²⁹⁸ containing a plan for the deployment of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM) and the estimated cost of the Mission for the first six months (approximately $83 million). He recommended that the costs should be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter. In an addendum to his report, dated 9 April 1991,²⁹⁹ the Secretary-General informed the Council of the acceptance of his proposed plan by the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait.

At its 2983rd meeting, on 9 April 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, adopted resolution 689 (1991) by which it approved the Secretary-General's plan for setting up UNIKOM. It noted that UNIKOM could only be terminated by a formal decision of the Council; therefore, the Council would review the question of the Mission's modalities, termination or continuation every six months.

Mandate and composition

The mandate of UNIKOM, as proposed by the Secretary-General³⁰⁰ and approved by the Council, consisted of three components: to monitor the Khor Abdullah and the demilitarized zone between Iraq and Kuwait;³⁰¹ to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the demilitarized zone; and to observe any hostile action mounted from the territory of one State against the other. In his report, the Secretary-General stated that, as an observation mission, UNIKOM would be required to monitor and observe only; it would not take physical action to prevent the entry of military personnel or equipment into the demilitarized zone nor assume responsibilities that fell within the competence of the host Governments.³⁰² UNIKOM and its personnel would be authorized to use force only in self-defence.

UNIKOM would be headquartered in Umm Qasr within the demilitarized zone. Command in the field would be exercised by a Chief Military Observer. To carry out the tasks outlined in the Mission's concept of operations, the Secretary-General suggested that a group of 300 military observers would be required initially and that that number would be reviewed as the Mission gained experience. Regarding support for the observers, he proposed assigning temporarily to UNIKOM five infantry units drawn from existing peacekeeping operations in the region, with the agreement of the troop-contributing Governments concerned. Those units would provide essential security for UNIKOM during the setting-up phase. If, after four weeks from the beginning of the operation, the Chief Military Observer foresaw a continuing need for an infantry element, the Secretary-General would seek the Council's authorization to replace the temporary units with one or more battalions on a more permanent basis. The maximum initial strength of UNIKOM, comprising military observers and infantry, engineer, air, logistics (including medical care) and headquarters units, would be approximately 1,440 all ranks, of which 680 would be infantry.

Implementation

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council dated 9 and 10 April 1991,³⁰³ the members of the Council agreed with the proposal to appoint Major General Günther Greindl (Austria) as Chief Military Officer of UNIKOM.³⁰⁴ Through a further exchange of ³⁰² The responsibility for the maintenance of law and order in the demilitarized zone rested with the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait, which maintained police posts in their respective parts of the zone. For further details, see S/22454, para. 6.

³⁰⁴ After Major General Günther Greindl (Austria) relinquished his command to return to his country, through a similar exchange of letters (S/24097 and letters dated 11 and 12 April 1991,³⁰⁵ the members agreed with the proposed list of countries contributing military personnel to UNIKOM.

On 9 May 1991, pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the deployment and operations of UNIKOM.³⁰⁶ He informed the Council that the Mission's deployment had been completed on 6 May with a total strength of 1,385 military personnel. The Mission had then monitored the withdrawal of the armed forces that were still deployed in its assigned zone. Following complete withdrawal, the demilitarized zone had come into effect on 9 May 1991 and UNIKOM had assumed in full the observation responsibilities entrusted to it by the Council. On 12 June 1991, the Secretary-General submitted a further progress report on UNIKOM.³⁰⁷ He stated that the overall strength of the Mission had been reduced to 963 all ranks since three of the five infantry companies temporarily assigned from UNIFIL and UNFICYP had been returned to their parent missions after the completion of the setting-up phase and the absence of the security risks perceived in early April.

By a letter dated 9 August 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,³⁰⁸ the Secretary-General proposed to the Council a reduction of some 45 per cent in the strength of UNIKOM based on a further review and the recommendations of the Chief Military Officer. With a view to achieving greater efficiency and economy, he proposed a reduction in the number of military observers from 300 to 250 and in the size of the medical unit; a consolidation and reassignment of the tasks performed by the logistics units, with a small reduction in their strength; and reduction in the strength of the engineer unit from 293 to 85, with a subsequent reduction to 50 after the completion of work in support of the Boundary Demarcation Commission. However, in a subsequent letter dated 23 August 1991,³⁰⁹ the Secretary-General noted that in view of the increased level of activity on the Iraq-

Kuwait border he considered it advisable not to proceed with the planned reduction in the number of military observers. He intended to monitor the situation closely and, if necessary, would report to the Council.

In an interim report dated 3 September 1991,³¹⁰ the Secretary-General informed the Council that UNIKOM continued to monitor the demilitarized zone along the Iraq-Kuwait border, which had generally been respected. The number of violations had decreased. In view of the implications of the incidents that had occurred, UNIKOM continued to maintain a high level of vigilance in the performance of the tasks entrusted to it by the Council.

On three subsequent occasions during the period under review, pursuant to resolution 689 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted reports³¹¹ providing the Council, prior to its biannual review of UNIKOM, with an overview of the activities of the Mission covering a period of six months. In each case, he recommended that the Mission be maintained for an additional period of six months. The members of the Council concurred with his recommendations via letters addressed to him by the President of the Council.³¹²

In his report dated 2 October 1992,³¹³ the Secretary-General, inter alia, noted that UNIKOM continued to provide technical support to other United Nations missions in Iraq and Kuwait. In particular, it assisted the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission with air transport and communications and by clearing mines at the border marker sites. It gave further support to the United Nations Coordinator for the return of property from Iraq to Kuwait and provided movement control in respect of all United Nations aircraft operating in the area. UNIKOM remained deployed in the demilitarized zone and its concept of operations remained based on a combination of patrol and observation bases, observation points, ground and air patrols investigation teams and liaison with the parties at all levels. While the situation in the demilitarized zone had continued to be calm during the first weeks of the period under review in the report, it had since been marked by a gradual heightening of tensions. The main source of tension was the issue of the status and property rights of the Iraqi farmers who would be affected by the demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. During one of the related incidents, a UNIKOM military observer had been injured while trying to restore calm. In view of all the circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued functioning of UNIKOM as an indispensable factor in maintaining the demilitarized zone, preventing or containing further incidents and reducing tensions.

By a letter dated 3 November 1992,³¹⁴ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council fully shared his concerns related to the threats to security linked to the presence of Iraqi and Kuwaiti military equipment in six bunkers within the demilitarized zone, near the Mission headquarters.³¹⁵ As recommended by the Mission Commander, they deemed it necessary for the bunkers to be emptied of their contents. They also expressed the view that the military equipment should be destroyed; if the equipment fell into the categories mentioned in paragraph 8 of resolution 687 (1991) (relating to chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres), it should be destroyed by the United Nations Special Commission in coordination with the Mission.

D. Security Council committees

During the period from 1989 to 1992, the Council established four new Security Council committees to supervise the implementation of measures adopted pursuant to Article 41 against Iraq, the former Yugoslavia, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Somalia. During the same period, the previously established Security Council Committee established by resolution 421 (1977) concerning the question of South Africa continued its work. These committees are considered below in the order in which they were established.

³¹⁴ The letter was annexed to a special report on UNIKOM, dated 10 January 1993, submitted by the Secretary-General to the Council. See S/25085, annex III.

³¹⁵ The concerns in question were expressed by the Secretary-General in a letter dated 23 September 1992 which was not issued as a Council document.

1. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 421 (1977) concerning the question of South Africa

The Security Council Committee established by resolution 421 (1977) continued its efforts to ensure the effective implementation of the mandatory arms embargo against South Africa imposed by resolution 418 (1977) of 4 November 1977. It reviewed a number of cases involving alleged violations of the arms embargo, and continued to consider the question of legislative and other implementing measures adopted by States. The Committee cooperated with various intergovernmental and non-governmental bodies and individuals with expertise in the field to promote more effective implementation of the arms embargo, and in September 1989, held closed hearings on the subject. On 11 December 1989, the Committee submitted to the Council a report on its activities from 1980 to 1989.³¹⁶ In the concluding paragraphs, the Committee observed that although the arms embargo had had a considerable effect on the South African defence establishment, the cases reported to the Committee made it clear that arms and related materiel continued to reach South Africa in violation of its provisions. The Committee appealed to States to tighten their scrutiny and to increase their vigilance with regard to licensing procedures for the export or re-export of military equipment, to ensure that none of it reached South Africa in violation of Security Council resolutions.

2. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Establishment

By resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter and in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council to monitor the implementation of the mandatory comprehensive sanctions imposed against Iraq by the same resolution. The Committee was to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations: (a) to examine the reports on the progress of the implementation of the resolution, which would be submitted by the Secretary-General; and

(b) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the sanctions.

Implementation/expansion of mandate

In an interim report dated 15 August 1990 on the implementation of resolution 661 (1990), the Secretary-General reported that the Committee had held its first meeting on 9 August 1990.³¹⁷

By resolution 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, the Council authorized the use of such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as might be necessary to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990). The States concerned were requested to submit reports in that regard to the Security Council and the Committee.

By resolution 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided that the Committee should keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under constant review. For that purpose, the Secretary-General was requested to seek, on a continuing basis, information from relevant United Nations and other appropriate humanitarian agencies and all other sources on the availability of food in Iraq and Kuwait, and communicate such information to the Committee regularly. On the basis of the reports from the Secretary-General, if the Committee determined that circumstances had arisen in which there was an urgent humanitarian need to supply foodstuffs to Iraq or Kuwait, it would report promptly to the Council its decision as to how such need should be met.

By resolution 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, the Council entrusted the Committee with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter and making recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.³¹⁸ confirmed that resolution 661 (1990) applied to all means of transport, including aircraft. No flights other than those undertaken in circumstances defined in resolution 670 (1990) were to be permitted to or from Iraq or occupied Kuwait. The Committee was vested with specific responsibilities in regard to authorizing such flights. The Council also reminded all States of their obligations under resolution 661 (1990) with regard to the freezing of Iraqi assets and the protection of the assets of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and its agencies located within their territory, and to report to the Committee regarding those assets. It also called upon all States to report to the Committee on action taken by them to implement the provisions laid down in resolution 670 (1990).

In a statement made by the President of the Council on its behalf on 3 March 1991,³¹⁹ the Security Council welcomed the decisions taken to date by the Committee relating to food and medical needs, including those taken to facilitate the provision of humanitarian assistance; called upon the Committee to continue to act promptly on requests submitted to it for humanitarian assistance; and urged the Committee to pay particular attention to the findings and recommendations of the relevant humanitarian agencies on critical medical/public health and nutritional conditions in Iraq.

At its 36th meeting, on 22 March 1991, the Committee adopted a decision with regard to the determination of humanitarian needs in Iraq.³²⁰ The Committee decided to make, with immediate effect, a general determination that humanitarian circumstances applied “with respect to the entire civilian population of Iraq in all parts of Iraq’s national territory”. The Committee also concluded that civilian and humanitarian imports to Iraq, as identified in the report prepared by Under-Secretary-General Martti Ahtisaari following his visit to Iraq from 10 to 17 March 1991,³²¹ were integrally related to the supply of foodstuffs and supplies intended strictly for medical purposes (which were exempt from sanctions under the provisions of resolution 661 (1990)), and that such imports should also be allowed with immediate effect. The Committee decided upon a simple notification procedure for foodstuffs supplied to Iraq and a “no objection” procedure for those civilian and humanitarian imports. Subject to prior notification of the flight and its contents, the Committee granted general approval for all flights that would be transporting only foodstuffs, supplies intended for medical purposes or humanitarian imports.

By a letter dated 22 March 1991,³²² the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council, in informal consultations of the whole on 22 March 1991, had taken note of the Committee's decision with regard to the determination of humanitarian needs in Iraq.

By resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established the terms and conditions for a formal ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990). Section F of the resolution dealt with the sanctions imposed on Iraq. By paragraph 20 of the resolution, the Council decided that the prohibitions against the sale or supply to Iraq of commodities or products, other than medicine and health supplies, and prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 661 (1990), would not apply to foodstuffs notified to the Committee or to materials and supplies for essential civilian needs approved by the Committee under the simplified and accelerated "no objection" procedure. By paragraph 23, the Council also empowered the Committee to approve exceptions to the prohibition against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq, when required to assure adequate financial resources to provide for essential Iraqi civilian needs. By paragraph 28, the Council decided upon a review mechanism for the sanctions regime against Iraq.

In a report dated 2 June 1991, submitted pursuant to resolution 687 (1990), the Secretary-General set out draft guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of the arms embargo and related sanctions against Iraq imposed by resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent related resolutions.³²³ Under the draft guidelines, the Committee would be the organ of the Security Council responsible for monitoring the prohibitions against the sale or supply of arms to Iraq and related sanctions and would carry out its functions in accordance with the mandate provided in resolutions 661 (1990), 665 (1990) and 670 (1990). The Committee would work in close cooperation with the Special Commission established under resolution 687 (1991) and with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

By resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, approved the guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq annexed to the report of the Secretary-General, and entrusted the Committee with the responsibility for monitoring the prohibitions against the sale or supply of arms to Iraq and related sanctions.

Pursuant to paragraph 6 of the guidelines approved by the Council under resolution 700 (1991), the Committee submitted five reports, at 90-day intervals, to the Council on the implementation of the arms embargo and related sanctions against Iraq.³²⁴

By resolution 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized all States to permit the import, for a period of six months, of a quantity of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products sufficient to create a sum to meet essential Iraqi civilian needs and finance United Nations operations mandated by resolution 687 (1991), subject to the following conditions: (a) approval by the Committee of each such purchase following notification by the State concerned; (b) payment of the proceeds into an escrow account to be established by the United Nations; and (c) approval by the Council of a scheme for the purchase of supplies for essential civilian needs and for appropriate United Nations monitoring and supervision.

By resolution 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, confirmed $1.6 billion as the sum authorized for limited Iraqi oil sales, as mentioned in resolution 706 (1991), and invited the Committee to authorize immediately the release by the Secretary-General from the escrow account of the first one-third portion of the sum, subject to the availability of funds in the account.

Since resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) were not implemented during the period under review, however, the measures described above did not take effect.

By resolution 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, requested the Committee, the Special Commission and IAEA to develop in cooperation a mechanism for monitoring any future sales or supplies to Iraq of dual-use items that could assist Iraq in the production or acquisition of the weapons proscribed under section C of resolution 687 (1991).³²⁵

In a statement made by the President of the Council to the media on behalf of the members of the Council on 20 December 1991,³²⁶ Council members requested the Committee to study immediately those materials and supplies for essential civilian and humanitarian needs as identified in the Ahtisaari report,³²⁷ with the purpose of drawing up a list of items which might, with the Council's approval, be transferred from the "no objection" procedure to a simple notification procedure. The members of the Council also noted that, although resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) gave to Iraq the possibility for oil sales to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs for the purpose of providing humanitarian relief, that possibility had not yet been used.

In a statement made by the President of the Council to the media on behalf of the members of the Council on 5 February 1992,³²⁸ the Council members took note of the report of the Chairman of the Committee on the above request for a study, and encouraged him to continue his consultations with the members of the Committee on the study and to report to the Council at an early date.³²⁹ At its 66th meeting on 6 March 1992, the Committee reached the understanding that, while there would be no change in the procedure, certain categories of items would generally receive favourable consideration.³³⁰

3. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia

Establishment

In a report dated 25 October 1991, submitted pursuant to resolution 713 (1991), the Secretary-General noted that his Personal Envoy, Mr. Cyrus R. Vance, had heard credible assertions from many parties in Yugoslavia that the embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to the country, imposed by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, in resolution 713 (1991), was being violated.³³¹ He observed that, given the gravity of this apparent violation of the Council's decision, its members would no doubt wish to respond appropriately.

By resolution 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, and in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council to monitor the implementation of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991). The Committee was to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations: (a) to examine the reports submitted by States on the measures they had instituted to implement the embargo; (b) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the embargo; (c) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and in that context to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo; and (d) to recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the embargo and to provide information on a regular basis to the

On 13 April 1992, the Committee submitted to the Council a report on its activities to date.³³³ In the concluding paragraph, the Committee noted that it had received a limited amount of information on violations of the arms embargo, and that it was still searching for means through which it could obtain the requisite additional information.

The scope of the Committee's mandate was expanded on 30 May 1992, when the Security Council, by resolution 757 (1992), imposed a comprehensive sanctions regime against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), consisting of measures that interrupted economic, financial, diplomatic, scientific, sporting and cultural relations, as well as air travel, with certain exemptions. The Council requested the Committee to monitor the implementation of that regime, in addition to the arms embargo. It also asked the Committee to prepare guidelines for exemptions relating to the trans-shipment of certain commodities and products through the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia;³³⁴ and to consider and decide upon any applications for the approval of flights for humanitarian or other purposes consistent with the relevant resolutions of the Council.

By resolution 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992, the Council decided that the Committee was also to approve, under a simplified "no objection" procedure, exemptions from the sanctions regime for the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of commodities and products for essential humanitarian need.

By resolution 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, the Council decided to prohibit the trans-shipment of crude oil, petroleum products, coal, energy-related equipment, iron, steel, other metals, chemicals, rubber, tyres, vehicles, aircraft and motors of all types — unless such trans-shipment was specifically authorized on a case-by-case basis by the Committee under its "no objection" procedure.

On 30 December 1992, the Committee submitted to the Council a report in which it provided an overview of its activities in relation to the implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 713 (1991) and the sanctions regime imposed by resolution 757 (1992).³³⁵ The Committee outlined the general principles it had applied in approving exemptions; highlighted a number of decisions it had taken relating to the implementation of the sanctions, including two decisions which had subsequently been reinforced by the Council;³³⁶ and provided information concerning its consideration of specific cases of actual or suspected violations of the sanctions.

In the concluding paragraphs of its report, the Committee emphasized the complexity of the tasks entrusted to it, and noted that the absence of an independent monitoring mechanism had sometimes inhibited the ability of the Committee to obtain original information and to follow up on requested ³³² By resolution 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, the Council reaffirmed the arms embargo and decided that it would continue to apply to "all areas that have been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding" (resolution 727 (1992), para. 6, and para. 33 of the Secretary-General's report dated 5 January 1992 (S/23363)).

³³⁴ The resolution provided for an exemption from the relevant sanctions for the trans-shipment through the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of commodities and products originating outside the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and temporarily present in the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) only for the purpose of such trans-shipment.

³³⁵ S/25027.

³³⁶ By resolution 787 (1992), paragraph 10, the Council decided, acting under Chapter VII, that any vessel in which a majority or controlling interest was held by a person or undertaking in or operating from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) would be considered a vessel of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) regardless of the flag under which the vessel sailed. By paragraph 13 of the same resolution, the Council reaffirmed the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube was in accordance with resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992), including such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as might be necessary to halt such shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure the strict implementation of those resolutions. These provisions reflected the position taken earlier by the Committee, on both issues (S/25027, para. 18).

investigations. The Committee considered, however, that the gap had to some extent been redressed by resolution 787 (1992), by which the Council had authorized States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to stop and search vessels in order to establish the bona fides of their cargoes.³³⁷ The Committee also noted the adverse impact which the implementation of sanctions had had on the economies of a number of neighbouring countries, some of which had addressed the Committee on the matter.³³⁸

4. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 748 (1992) concerning the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter and in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, decided to establish a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council to monitor the implementation of the sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by the same resolution. In particular, the Committee was to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations: (a) to examine the reports submitted pursuant to paragraph 8 of the resolution, whereby the Council requested all States to report to the Secretary-General by 15 May 1992 on the measures they had instituted for meeting their obligations concerning the sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; (b) to seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; (c) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of those measures and, in that context, to make recommendations to the Council on ways to increase their effectiveness; (d) to recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States; (e) to consider and to decide expeditiously upon any application by States for the approval of flights on grounds of significant humanitarian need; and (f) to give special attention to any communications in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter from any neighbouring or other States with special economic problems that might arise from the carrying out of the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

5. Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 751 (1992) concerning Somalia

In a report dated 21 April 1992 submitted pursuant to resolution 746 (1992), the Secretary-General suggested that the Security Council might wish to consider putting into place appropriate arrangements for monitoring the arms embargo on Somalia imposed by resolution 733 (1992), in light of various reports indicating that arms continued to flow into the country.³³⁹

By resolution 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, the Security Council decided to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of its provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations: (a) to seek from all States information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992); (b) to consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the embargo, and in that context to make recommendations to the Council on ways of increasing the effectiveness of the embargo; and (c) to recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the embargo and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States.

E. Ad hoc commissions/Coordinator for the Return of Property

In the aftermath of the Iraq-Kuwait conflict, the Security Council established a number of ad hoc commissions: the United Nations Boundary Demarcation Commission; the United Nations Special Commission; and the United Nations Compensation Commission. The Council also appointed a United Nations Coordinator for the return of property. During the same period, the Council created an ad hoc commission concerning Somalia, and was asked to consider establishing a military component of the International Support and Verification Commission in Central America.

1. International Support and Verification Commission

At a summit meeting held at Tela, Honduras, from 5 to 7 August 1989, the Presidents of the five Central American countries reached agreement on a Joint Plan for the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance and their families, as well as assistance for the demobilization of all those involved in armed actions in the countries of the region when such persons voluntarily request it.³⁴⁰ In accordance with the provisions of that Plan, the permanent representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua, by a letter dated 14 August 1989,³⁴¹ officially requested the Secretary-General to set up, together with the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, an International Support and Verification Commission, which would be entrusted with implementing the Plan.

By a letter dated 28 August 1989,³⁴² the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that, at a meeting on 25 August 1989, he had agreed with the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States to establish the International Support and Verification Commission as from 6 September 1989. He stated that the tasks entrusted to the Commission comprised components of interest to various United Nations programmes and agencies, but that the question of demobilization concerned the Security Council, in particular, since it was an operation of a military nature. In that regard, he noted that the Commission was asked to collect the weapons, materiel and military equipment of members of the Nicaraguan resistance and to keep them in its custody until the five Presidents decided where they should be sent. In his view, that task should be entrusted to military units equipped with defensive weapons. The launching of such an operation was, he said, clearly within the competence of the Security Council. He would revert to the Council to ask it to take steps to establish such a force once he was in a position to estimate its needs in terms of personnel and equipment.

In a letter dated 20 September 1989,³⁴³ the Council noted with approval the steps taken by the Secretary-General to form the Commission and welcomed with satisfaction his intention to ask the Council to adopt in due course the measures needed to establish its military component.

However, in a report on the United Nations Observer Group in Central America submitted to the Security Council on 15 March 1990,³⁴⁴ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in consultations with the Government of Nicaragua and opposition held at Managua during March 1990, it had been agreed that responsibility for the military aspects of the implementation of the Joint Plan would be assumed by ONUCA, while the Commission would be responsible for implementing the civilian aspects of that process, i.e. the repatriation, or relocation elsewhere, of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance, and for their resettlement. In a further report on ONUCA submitted to the Security Council on 26 October 1990,³⁴⁵ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, after the cessation of involvement by ONUCA in the demobilization process on 26 June 1990, the Government of Nicaragua had assumed responsibility for the demobilization of any remaining members of the resistance, while the Commission continued to handle the civilian aspects of that process.

2. United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

Establishment and mandate

By resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established the terms and conditions for a formal ceasefire between Iraq and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait. Section A of the resolution addressed the question of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. The Council demanded that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands set out in an agreement between them of 4 October 1963;³⁴⁶ called upon the Secretary-General to assist in making arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate that boundary, drawing on appropriate material,³⁴⁷ and to report back to the Security Council within one month; and decided to guarantee the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary.

In a report dated 2 May 1991,³⁴⁸ submitted pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), the Secretary-General set out the arrangements he had made with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between them. Having consulted with both Governments, he proposed to establish an Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, to be composed of one representative each of Iraq and Kuwait and three independent experts appointed by the Secretary-General, one of whom would serve as the Chairman. The Commission's mandate would be to demarcate in geographic coordinates the international boundary set out in the Agreed Minutes of 4 October 1963. The Commission would also make arrangements for the physical representation of the boundary, through the erection of boundary pillars or monuments. The coordinates established by the Commission would constitute the final demarcation of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait in accordance with the Agreed Minutes. They would be lodged in the archives of both Governments and a certified copy would be submitted to the Secretary-General, which he would communicate to the Security Council and retain for safekeeping in the archives of the United Nations.

Both Governments expressed their readiness to cooperate with the Secretary-General and to participate in the proposed Boundary Demarcation Commission.³⁴⁹

Through an exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,³⁵⁰ dated 6 May and 13 May 1991, the members of the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report and expressed support for his efforts in that regard.

Implementation

In a letter dated 17 May 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁵¹ the Secretary-General reported that the Boundary Commission had been established and that its first meeting would take place on 23 May 1991.

In a report dated 7 March 1992 on the status of Iraq's compliance with the obligations placed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions,³⁵² the Secretary-General reported that Iraq had fully participated in the work of the Boundary Commission. He added that the first stage of surveying and mapping had been concluded in November 1991 without any hindrance on the part of Iraq.

In a statement made on 17 June 1992 by the President of the Council on their behalf,³⁵³ the members of the Council took note of a letter of 17 April 1992 from the Chairman of the Boundary Commission to the Secretary-General,³⁵⁴ and expressed their complete support for the work of the Commission. They recalled in that connection that, through the demarcation process, the Commission was not reallocating territory between Kuwait and Iraq, but was simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate the precise coordinates of the boundary for the first time. They looked forward to the completion of the Commission's work.

In the same presidential statement, the members of the Council noted with particular concern a letter of 21 May 1992 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the Secretary-General concerning the work of the Commission,³⁵⁵ which appeared to call into question Iraq's adherence to resolution 687 (1991). They expressed concern that the letter might be interpreted as rejecting the finality of the Commission's decisions, notwithstanding the terms of resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's report of 2 May 1991, both of which had been formally accepted by Iraq. They stressed to Iraq the inviolability of the international boundary being demarcated by the Commission and guaranteed by the Council pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), and the grave consequences that would ensue from any breach thereof.

By resolution 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992, the Council welcomed the Commission's land boundary demarcation decisions.³⁵⁶ The Council also welcomed the Commission's decision to consider the eastern section of the boundary, which included the offshore boundary, and urged the Commission to demarcate that part of the boundary as soon as possible and thus complete its work. In addition, the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to carry out the realignment of the demilitarized zone referred to in resolution 687 (1991) to correspond to the international boundary demarcated by the Commission, with the consequent removal of the Iraqi police posts.

In a statement made on 23 November 1992 by the President of the Security Council,³⁵⁷ the Council noted that Iraq had not participated in the work of the Commission at its July 1992 and October 1992 sessions. The Council noted, moreover, that Iraq had thus far refused to withdraw a number of its police posts, as required.³⁵⁸

3. United Nations Special Commission established pursuant to resolution 687 (1991)

Establishment

By resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established the terms and conditions for a formal ceasefire between Iraq and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait. Section C of the resolution called for the elimination, under international supervision, of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres, together with related items and production facilities. It also called for measures to ensure that the acquisition and production of the prohibited items were not resumed. The Secretary-General was asked to develop and submit to the Council for approval a plan for the establishment of a special commission which would implement the non-nuclear-related provisions of the resolution and assist IAEA in the nuclear areas. On 18 April 1991, after Iraq had formally accepted the provisions of resolution 687 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report containing a plan for setting up the United Nations Special Commission.³⁵⁹ By a letter dated 19 April 1991,³⁶⁰ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that Council members agreed with the proposals contained in his report.

Mandate

The mandate of the Special Commission, as set out in resolution 687 (1991), was (a) to carry out immediate on-site inspections of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the Special Commission itself; (b) to take possession from Iraq, for destruction, removal or rendering harmless, of all chemical and biological weapons and all stocks of agents and all related subsystems and components and all research, development, support and manufacturing facilities related thereto, including items at the additional locations designated by the Special Commission itself; (c) to supervise the destruction by Iraq of all its ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres and related major parts, and repair and production facilities; and (d) to assist the Director General of IAEA, who, under the same resolution, was requested to undertake activities similar to those of the Commission but specifically in the nuclear field. The Council also requested the Secretary-General to develop a plan for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its obligations not to use, develop, construct or acquire any of the items specified above.

Structure/composition

In his report of 18 April 1991 concerning the structure of the Special Commission,³⁶¹ the Secretary-General stressed the need for an efficient and effective executive body. He proposed that the Commission ³⁵⁶ The Commission's decisions were set out in a further report of the Commission transmitted to the President of the Security Council by a letter from the Secretary-General dated 12 August 1992 (referred to in resolution 773 (1991), but not issued as documents of the Council).

³⁵⁸ By letter dated 21 May 1993 to the President of the Security Council, the Secretary-General transmitted the final report of the Commission (S/25811 and Add.1). By resolution 833 (1993) of 27 May 1993, the Council welcomed the successful conclusion of the work of the Commission and reaffirmed that the decisions of the Commission regarding the demarcation of the boundary were final.

consist of an Executive Chairman, a Deputy Executive Chairman and five groups, each under a head of group and each consisting of a small number of experts. The major areas of responsibility would be biological and chemical weapons; ballistic missiles; nuclear-weapons capabilities; future compliance; and operations support. Thus the formal membership of the Commission would be about 20 to 25 persons. In carrying out its various tasks, the Special Commission would be assisted by a number of technical experts serving as inspectors, disposal teams and field support officers. These experts would be either specially engaged for this purpose or made available to the Commission by Member States. While their total number could be fully assessed only after the baseline field inspections had been completed by the Commission, the Secretary-General foresaw that the personnel involved would number in the several hundreds. In a further report dated 17 May 1991,³⁶² the Secretary-General stated that he had appointed 21 experts as members of the Commission, and that Mr. Rolf Ekéus (Sweden) was to serve as its Executive Chairman. He added that, following consultations with the Governments concerned, a field operations office was being set up in Bahrain and would become fully operational by the end of May 1991; a support office was being established in Baghdad. Regarding the general concept of operations, the Secretary-General stated that under the guidance of its Executive Chairman, the Commission would use a small staff at United Nations Headquarters in New York to prepare detailed plans for field operations in Iraq with regard to all items related to chemical and biological weapons and to ballistic missiles, and together with IAEA with regard to items related to nuclear weapons and nuclear-weapons-usable materials.

Implementation/expansion of mandate

In his report of 17 May 1991, the Secretary-General set out a plan for the implementation of the provisions of section C of resolution 687 (1991) relating to Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.³⁶³ The plan had been drawn up, as requested, in consultation with appropriate Governments and, where appropriate, with IAEA and the World Health Organization, and with the assistance of the Special Commission. The plan consisted of a three-stage implementation procedure: (a) a gathering and assessment of information phase; (b) a disposal of weapons and facilities phase; and (c) long-term monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its obligations not to reacquire banned capabilities. By resolution 699 (1991), of 17 June 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, approved the plan contained in the Secretary-General's report and requested him to submit progress reports on its implementation every six months after the adoption of the resolution. During the period under review, four such progress reports were submitted, commencing in October 1991. These are considered further below.

In the face of Iraq's failure to cooperate in the inspection of the locations identified by the Special Commission and to present for inspection items that might have been transported from those locations, and its failure to make full disclosure of all aspects of its proscribed weapons programmes, the Council adopted resolution 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, by which, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, it condemned Iraq's serious violations of a number of its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) and of its undertakings to cooperate with the Special Commission and IAEA, which it found constituted a material breach of the relevant provisions of that resolution. The Council demanded that Iraq (a) provide full, final and complete disclosure of proscribed weapons and programmes; (b) allow the Special Commission, IAEA and their inspection teams unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation they wished to inspect; (c) cease immediately any attempt to conceal, move or destroy any relevant material or equipment without notification to and prior consent of the Commission; (d) make available immediately to the Commission, IAEA and their inspection teams any items to which access had previously been denied; (e) allow the Commission, IAEA and their inspection teams to conduct flights throughout Iraq for all relevant purposes, without any interference, and to make full use of their own aircraft; (f) halt nuclear activities of any kind; (g) ensure the complete enjoyment by the Commission and IAEA representatives of the privileges, immunities and facilities accorded to them, and guarantee their complete safety and freedom of movement; (h) immediately provide or facilitate the provision of transportation, medical or logistical support requested by the Commission, IAEA and their inspection teams; and (i) respond fully, completely and promptly to any questions or requests from the Commission, IAEA and their inspection teams. By a letter dated 25 September 1991,³⁶⁴ the President of the Council informed the representative of Iraq that the Council had noted the terms of his letter of 24 September 1991 concerning the implementation of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions,³⁶⁵ and considered that those terms constituted acceptance by Iraq without reservation of resolution 707 (1991) and that the Government of Iraq was thus giving its unconditional consent to the use by the Special Commission of its own aircraft.

On 2 October 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report,³⁶⁶ pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), containing a plan for the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its unconditional obligation not to use, develop, construct or acquire any of the weapons and weapons-related items proscribed in that resolution. The plan envisaged that monitoring and verification would cover not only military but also civilian sites, facilities, material and other items that could be used or activities that could be involved in contravention of Iraq's obligations under resolution 687 (1991). It also incorporated monitoring and verification activities corresponding to Iraq's additional obligations under resolution 707 (1991).³⁶⁷ The Secretary-General stated that, bearing in mind that resolutions 687 (1991) and 707 (1991) had been adopted by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, it was assumed that the task of monitoring and verification would be entrusted to an executive body under the authority of the Council. That was particularly important should any situation arise of Iraq's non-compliance with its obligations. Moreover, as set out in resolution 687 (1991), such a body would have to make direct use of the expertise, the information gathered and assessed and the experience gained by the Special Commission. In the light of those considerations, the Secretary-General proposed that a compliance unit be organized under the Special Commission to carry out the monitoring and verification tasks provided for under the plan.

By resolution 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, approved the plans submitted by the Secretary-General and the Director General of IAEA and demanded that Iraq meet unconditionally all its obligations under those plans and cooperate fully with the Commission and IAEA in carrying them out. The Council decided that the Special Commission, in the exercise of its responsibilities as a subsidiary organ of the Security Council, should (a) continue to have the responsibility for designating additional locations for inspections and overflights; (b) continue to render assistance and cooperation to the Director General of IAEA, by providing him by mutual agreement with the necessary special expertise and logistical, informational and other operational support for the carrying out of the plans submitted by him; and (c) perform such other functions, in cooperation in the nuclear field with the Director General of IAEA, as might be necessary to coordinate activities under the plans, including making use of commonly available services and information to the fullest extent possible. The Council requested the Secretary-General and the Director General of IAEA to submit reports on the implementation of the plans to the Council, when so requested and in any event at least every six months after the adoption of the resolution.

By a note dated 25 October 1991,³⁶⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council a report by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, which provided the first comprehensive account of the work undertaken to implement section C of resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent related resolutions. The report touched upon the establishment, composition, organization, mandate and financing of the Special Commission, as well its operational activities in the chemical, biological and ballistic missile fields and its responsibilities in the nuclear field. It also gave the Executive Chairman's assessment of the results achieved, the difficulties encountered and what remained to be done to secure full implementation of the requirements of the Council's resolutions.

By a letter dated 4 December 1991,³⁶⁹ the Executive Chairman of the Special Committee submitted to the Secretary-General a second report covering the work of the Commission for the period from 15 October to 4 December 1991. He reported that in respect of sites and activities declared by Iraq and the issue of Iraq's participation in the destruction of chemical weapons, cooperation at the field level had been forthcoming. However, in respect of sites designated by the Special Commission, where the Commission and IAEA were acting on their own sources of information regarding possible clandestine conduct of proscribed activities, non-cooperation and obstruction continued to be encountered. There was thus no progress to report which would indicate a change of policy on the part of Iraq to one of candour, transparency and cooperation at all levels. He stated further that, if the Commission and IAEA were to be in a position to carry out their functions in connection with ongoing monitoring and verification, it was of great importance that Iraq expressly recognize its obligations under resolution 715 (1991) and the two plans approved thereunder. Such express recognition was still awaited.

By a note dated 18 February 1992,³⁷⁰ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a report by the Executive Chairman of the Commission, which was based on information received from a special mission dispatched to Baghdad on 27 January 1992. In the report, the Executive Chairman observed that Iraq recognized only its own understanding of obligations imposed on it by certain provisions of resolution 687 (1991), which fell far short of what was necessary for the implementation of the plans for ongoing monitoring and investigation approved by resolution 715 (1991). That was a matter of great importance to the Special Commission as it now had to commence ongoing monitoring and verification activities. However, such activities could only be carried out effectively if Iraq acknowledged and abided by its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). In the prevailing circumstances, the Commission felt that it had no alternative but to report the matter immediately to the Council for its instructions.

On 19 February 1992, the President of the Council issued a statement on behalf of the members of the Council,³⁷¹ in which the members stated that Iraq's failure to acknowledge its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), its rejection up until then of the two plans for ongoing monitoring and verification, and its failure to provide full, final and complete disclosure of its weapons capabilities constituted a continuing material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991). The members of the Council supported the decision of the Secretary-General to dispatch a special mission headed by the Executive Chairman of the Commission to visit Iraq immediately to meet with the highest levels of the Government of Iraq for the purpose of securing the unconditional agreement by Iraq to implement all its relevant obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). The mission was to stress the "serious consequences" if that agreement was not forthcoming. The Secretary-General was requested to report on the results of the special mission upon its return.

By a note dated 26 February 1992,³⁷² the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a report by the Executive Chairman of the Commission on the special mission's visit to Baghdad from 21 to 24 February. The Executive Chairman concluded that, at that stage, he was not able to report to the Council that he had secured Iraq's unconditional agreement to implement all its relevant obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). With regard to resolution 707 (1991), Iraq had given no undertaking to provide full, final and complete disclosure, as required, of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles, and of all holdings of such weapons. Instead, it had expressed the opinion that it had provided all the "necessary information" required of it. With respect to resolution 715 (1991), Iraq had accepted only the "principle" of ongoing monitoring and verification, and that was subject to considerations of "sovereignty, territorial integrity, national security and non-infringement on Iraq's industrial capabilities". On 28 February 1992, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council,³⁷³ by which the members approved in full the conclusions of the special mission and in particular its finding that Iraq was not prepared to give its unconditional agreement to implement all of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). They reaffirmed that it was for the Special Commission alone to determine which items should be destroyed under resolution 687 (1991), and stated that Iraq's refusal to implement the determinations of the Special Commission constituted a further material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991).

On 10 April 1992, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council,³⁷⁴ concerning developments that appeared to call for a halt in and constituted a threat to the safety and security of the Special Commission's aerial surveillance flights over Iraq. The members of the Council reaffirmed the Commission's right to conduct such flights, called upon Iraq to take all the necessary measures to ensure the safety and security of the flights and its personnel, and warned Iraq of serious consequences which would ensue from any failure to comply with these obligations.

By a note dated 16 June 1992,³⁷⁵ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the third report submitted by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, on the activities of the Commission for the period from 4 December 1991 to 10 June 1992. The report concluded that the conduct of Iraq confirmed the invariable experience of the Special Commission that only a resolute and determined attitude by the Commission, backed up by the Security Council, was likely to achieve the necessary cooperation from Iraq in the many areas covered by section C of resolution 687 (1991), and by resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), where such cooperation had yet to be forthcoming. The Special Commission's repeated calls for a change in the attitude of Iraq to one of candour, transparency and cooperation at all levels remained largely unanswered. On 6 July 1992, the President issued a statement on behalf of the members of the Council, concerning the refusal by Iraq to permit a team of Commission inspectors to enter certain premises designated by the Special Commission for inspection.³⁷⁶ The members of the Council stated that this refusal constituted a material and unacceptable breach of a provision of resolution 687 (1991) and demanded that Iraq immediately agree to the admission of the inspectors to the premises concerned so that the Commission might establish whether or not any documents, records, materials, or equipment relevant to its responsibilities were located therein.

In a report dated 19 October 1992,³⁷⁷ submitted to the Council pursuant to resolution 715 (1991), the Secretary-General concluded that the conditions for the initiation in full of the Commission's plan for ongoing monitoring and verification had not yet been met. There had been no movement in Iraq's underlying position on the plan and resolution 715 (1991) to suggest a change in the Commission's assessment that Iraq was seeking to ensure that implementation of the plan proceeded on the basis of its interpretation of its obligations, rather than on the basis of Security Council resolutions. Thus, for the time being, the Commission remained constrained from going beyond preparatory work into full-scale monitoring and verification.

By a note dated 17 December 1992,³⁷⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the fourth report submitted by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, on the activities of the Commission for the period from 10 June to 14 December 1992. The Executive Chairman concluded that, despite progress in many areas, no major breakthrough had been achieved which would make it possible to change the conclusion of the previous report to the Council.

4. United Nations Coordinator for the return of property from Iraq to Kuwait pursuant to resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991)

Establishment

By resolution 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, demanded that Iraq immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property, the return to be completed in the shortest possible period.

By a letter dated 19 March 1991,³⁷⁹ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council were of the view that the modalities for the return of property from Iraq should be arranged through the Secretary-General's office, in consultation with the parties. He added that this procedure had the agreement of Iraq and Kuwait.

In response, the Secretary-General informed the Security Council, in a letter to the President dated ³⁷⁴ S/23803.

26 March 1991,³⁸⁰ that he had designated Assistant Secretary-General Richard Foran as the official responsible for coordinating the return of property from Iraq to Kuwait.

By paragraph 15 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, the Council requested the Secretary-General to report on the steps taken to facilitate the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, including a list of any property that Kuwait claimed had not been returned or had not been returned intact.

Mandate

Under the procedures established by the Secretary-General pursuant to the Council's request, the role of the Coordinator was to receive, register and submit to Iraq claims presented by Kuwait and to facilitate the return of property declared by Iraq to be in its possession.³⁸¹ The Coordinator, who would be assisted by a small group of United Nations staff, including a representative in the field, would also act as registrar and certifier during the hand-over operations, but would not take custody of any property.

Implementation

In a report dated 7 March 1992 on Iraq's compliance with the obligations placed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions,³⁸² the Secretary-General noted, in connection with the return of Kuwaiti property by Iraq, that since the appointment of the Coordinator, a number of discussions and meetings had taken place with the responsible Iraqi and Kuwaiti officials. The return of property had commenced and, to date, properties of the Central Bank of Kuwait, the Central Library of Kuwait, the National Museum of Kuwait, the Kuwait News Agency, the Kuwait Airways Corporation and the Kuwait Air Force had been returned. A number of additional items were ready for return and the process was continuing. In addition, Kuwait had submitted lists of properties from other ministries, corporations and individuals that were being pursued. Both the Iraqi and the Kuwaiti officials involved with the return of property had closely cooperated with the Coordinator.

In a statement made by the President of the Council on 11 March 1992,³⁸³ the Council made a number of observations on Iraq's compliance with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions. In connection with the return of Kuwaiti property, the members of the Council noted with satisfaction the cooperation extended to the Coordinator by Iraqi officials to facilitate the return.

However, in a statement made by the President of the Council on 23 November 1992,³⁸⁴ it was noted that much property, including military equipment and private property, remained to be returned.

5. United Nations Compensation Commission established pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991)

Establishment/mandate

By resolution 687 (1991), of 3 April 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, established the terms and conditions for a formal ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990). Section E of the resolution addressed the issue of compensation. The Council reaffirmed that Iraq was liable under international law for "any direct loss, damage — including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources — or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations" as a result of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait. The Council decided to create a fund to pay compensation for such claims and to establish a commission that would administer the fund; and asked the Secretary-General to develop and present to the Security Council recommendations for the implementation of those decisions.

On 6 April 1991, three days after the adoption of resolution 687 (1991), the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, in identical letters to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,³⁸⁵ accepted the terms of the resolution, thereby accepting legal responsibility for damage directly caused to Governments, nationals and corporations by its invasion and occupation of Kuwait.

In a report dated 2 May 1991,³⁸⁶ the Secretary-General presented to the Council his recommendations regarding the institutional framework that would be required for the implementation of the compensation provisions in resolution 687 (1991). He recommended that the proposed Compensation Commission take the form of a claims resolution facility that would verify and value the claims and administer the payment of compensation. He emphasized the political rather than the legal nature of the task:

The Commission will not be a court or an arbitral tribunal before which the parties appear; it will be a political organ that performs an essentially fact-finding function of examining claims, verifying their validity, evaluating losses, assessing payments and resolving disputed claims. It is only in this last respect that a quasi-judicial function may be involved.³⁸⁷

He added that it was, accordingly, all the more important that “some element of due process” be built into the procedure. The Secretary-General recommended that the Commission function as a subsidiary organ of the Security Council, and that it comprise a 15-member Governing Council composed of the current members of the Security Council at any given time; panels of Commissioners; and a secretariat.

By resolution 692 (1991) of 20 May 1991, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, decided to establish the United Nations Compensation Fund and the United Nations Compensation Commission, in accordance with section I of the Secretary-General’s report, and to locate the Governing Council of the Commission at the United Nations Office at Geneva. The Council requested the Secretary-General to take the necessary action to implement its decision, in consultation with the members of the Governing Council of the Commission; directed the Governing Council to proceed to implement the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991), taking into account the recommendations in the Secretary-General’s report; and requested the Governing Council to submit periodic reports to the Secretary-General and the Security Council.

³⁸⁷ Ibid., para. 20.

Implementation

In a letter dated 30 May 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁸⁸ the Secretary-General recommended that compensation to be paid by Iraq, through the Fund, should not exceed 30 per cent of the value of its exports of petroleum and petroleum products. By resolution 705 (1991), of 15 August, the Security Council decided to accept the Secretary-General’s recommendations. By resolution 706 (1991), adopted on the same day, the Council authorized the import by Member States of oil products originating from Iraq for a six-month period, up to a value of $1.6 billion, in order to finance the United Nations operations mandated by resolution 687 (1991), including the Compensation Fund. As the resolution was not implemented, however, the measures contained therein did not take effect. By resolution 778 (1992), of 2 October 1992, the Council decided that the Compensation Fund would receive a percentage of the funds representing frozen Iraqi assets.

6. Ad Hoc Commission of the Security Council established pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) concerning Somalia

In a letter dated 29 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁸⁹ the Secretary-General set out options for the Council’s consideration aimed at creating conditions for the uninterrupted delivery of relief supplies to the starving people of Somalia. He advised that, if the members of the Council were to favour the option of a countrywide enforcement operation undertaken by a group of Member States authorized to do so by the Security Council, the Council should seek to agree with those Member States on ways of recognizing the fact that the operation had been authorized by the Security Council and that the Security Council therefore had a legitimate interest in the manner in which it was carried out. In that context, he suggested that one possibility would be for the Council to appoint an ad hoc commission of some of its members, which would visit the operation in the field from time to time.

By resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized an enforcement operation along the lines of the above, and decided to appoint an ad hoc commission composed of members of the Security Council to report to the Council on the implementation of the resolution.

No activity on the part of the Ad Hoc Commission was recorded during the period under review.

Subsidiary organs of the Security Council proposed but not established

Note

During the period under review, there were four instances in which a subsidiary organ was formally proposed but not created. The suggestions were submitted in the form of draft resolutions. Three of the proposals were in relation to the situation in the occupied Arab territories; the fourth was in relation to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. These are described below.¹

¹ Those few instances in which members of the Council during Council proceedings, or Member States in

Proposal submitted at the 2887th meeting of the Council, on 6 November 1989, with respect to the situation in the occupied Arab territories draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia,² by which the Council would have requested the Secretary-General to conduct on-site monitoring of the current situation in the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, by all means available to him, and to submit periodic reports thereon, the first such report as soon as possible.

The revised draft resolution was put to the vote at the 2889th meeting on 7 November 1989, and received 14 votes in favour and 1 against; it was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Proposals submitted at the 2926th meeting of the Council, on 31 May 1990, and in a communication of 9 October 1990, with respect to the situation in the occupied Arab territories

At the 2926th meeting of the Security Council, on 31 May 1990, during consideration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the President of the Council drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution submitted by Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Yemen and Zaire,³ by which the Council would have established a Commission consisting of three members of the Council, to be dispatched immediately to examine the situation relating to the policies and practices of Israel, the occupying Power, in the Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, occupied by Israel since 1967; requested the Commission to submit its report to the Council by 20 June 1990, containing recommendations on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation; requested the Secretary-General to provide the Commission with the necessary facilities to enable it to carry out its mission; and decided to keep the situation in the occupied territories under constant and close scrutiny and to reconvene to review the situation in the light of the findings of the Commission. The draft resolution was put to the vote at the same meeting and received 14 votes in favour and 1 against; it was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

On 9 October 1990, the same Member States circulated a draft resolution⁴ by which the Security Council would have decided to establish a Commission consisting of three members of the Council, to be dispatched immediately to examine the current situation in Jerusalem. The remaining provisions of the operative part of the text were identical to those of the above-mentioned draft resolution of 31 May, with the exception of the expected submission date of the Commission's report and minor editorial changes. The draft resolution was not put to the vote.

Proposal submitted on 15 November 1990 with respect to the situation in the occupied Arab territories

On 15 November 1990, Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia and Yemen circulated a draft resolution,⁵ by which, as subsequently revised, the Security Council would have requested the Secretary-General to monitor and observe the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories on an urgent basis, using the United Nations personnel stationed there and appointing the necessary staff to accomplish this task, and to keep the Security Council continuously apprised; and requested further the Secretary-General to report on the fulfilment of the above provisions, within one month, and decided to reconvene as necessary to consider the situation. The draft resolution was not put to the vote.

Proposals submitted at the 2977th meeting of the Council, on 15 February 1991, with respect to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 2977th (Part II) (closed) meeting on 15 February 1991, during consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, Cuba introduced two draft resolutions proposing the establishment of subsidiary organs.

By the first draft resolution,⁶ the Council, "mindful of the provisions of Article 29 of the Charter of the United Nations" and "acting in accordance with Rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council", would have decided "to establish an

By the second draft resolution, as subsequently revised,⁷ the Council would have noted the suspension of offensive combat operations in the Gulf region; requested the Secretary-General “to dispatch immediately a United Nations military observer mission to supervise the suspension of combat operations in the Gulf region and contribute to the speedy and effective conclusion of a definitive ceasefire”; and also requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Council “a plan for the urgent establishment of a peacekeeping force, in consultation with the countries in which the peacekeeping force will be stationed, for the purpose of re-establishing international peace and security in the Gulf region”.

The two draft resolutions were not put to the vote.

⁷ S/22232/Rev.3. The original draft resolution (S/22232) and the first revised text (S/22232/Rev.1) contained no relevant provisions. By the second revised text (S/22232/Rev.2), the Council would have decided to declare a ceasefire immediately; requested the Secretary-General to dispatch immediately a United Nations military observer mission to supervise the ceasefire; and requested also the Secretary-General to submit to the Council a plan for the urgent establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force for the purpose of re-establishing international peace and security in the Gulf region.

Introductory note

This chapter deals, in parts I to V, with relations of the Security Council with the other principal organs of the United Nations. It also includes, in part VI, material relating to the Military Staff Committee, which has been placed, by Articles 45, 46 and 47 of the Charter, in a special relationship with the Security Council.

Part I Relations with the General Assembly

Note

Part I concerns various aspects of the relationship between the Security Council and the General Assembly. It begins with a new section A, on the election by the Assembly of non-permanent members of the Council. Section B considers the General Assembly's practice in making recommendations to the Council under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter, and calling its attention under Article 11 (3) to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Section C concerns the limitation imposed by Article 12 (1) on the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations with respect to any dispute or situation while the Council is exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter in respect of that dispute or situation. It also describes the procedure under Article 12 (2) by which the Secretary-General notifies the Assembly of matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Council, and when the Council ceases to deal with such matters.

Section D considers those instances in which a decision by the Council must be taken before that of the General Assembly, for example, the appointment of the Secretary-General and the admission, suspension, or expulsion of Members. One case concerning the appointment of the Secretary-General is treated in this section (case 1).

Section E describes the annual and special reports submitted by the Council to the General Assembly.

Section F considers other Council practice bearing on relations with the General Assembly: constitutional discussion within the Council (case 2) and Council decision-making (cases 3, 4 and 5).

Lastly, section G concerns relations between the Security Council and those subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly which have reported to or otherwise played a part in the work of the Council. There was no constitutional discussion bearing on these relations during the period under review. As in previous Supplements, entries under this heading are presented in tabular format.

A. Election by the General Assembly of non-permanent members of the Security Council

Note

During the period under review, in accordance with Article 23 of the Charter, the General Assembly, at each regular session, elected five non-permanent members to the Security Council for a two-year term to replace those members whose terms of office were to expire on 31 December of the respective year. In each instance, the Assembly elected the five non-permanent members in the course of one plenary meeting. A table of those elections is set out below.

B. Recommendations by the General Assembly to the Security Council in the form of resolutions under Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter

Article 10

The General Assembly may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the present Charter, and except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations to the Members of the United Nations or to the Security Council or to both on any such questions or matters.

Article 11

1. The General Assembly may consider the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security, including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments, and may make recommendations with regard to such principles to the Members or to the Security Council or to both.

2. The General Assembly may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations, or by the Security Council or by a state which is not a Member of the United Nations in accordance with Article 35, paragraph 2, and, except as provided in Article 12, may make recommendations with regard to any such questions to the state or states concerned or to the Security Council or to both. Any such question on which action is necessary shall be referred to the Security Council by the General Assembly either before or after discussion.

3. The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

4. The powers of the General Assembly set forth in this Article shall not limit the general scope of Article 10.

Note

During the period under consideration, the General Assembly made a number of recommendations — in the form of resolutions — to the Security Council regarding the maintenance of international peace and security. Several of those recommendations were of a general nature, touching upon the “powers and functions” of the Council under the Charter and/or upon “the general principles of cooperation in the maintenance of international peace and security”. As such, they may be seen to be illustrative of the General Assembly’s recommendation-making powers under Articles 10 and 11 (1), respectively, of the Charter. A table of those recommendations is set out in section 1 below.¹

In other resolutions, the General Assembly made recommendations to the Security Council either with regard to specific questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security or requesting action from the Council with regard to such questions, in accordance with Article 11 (2). Those recommendations all concerned items already on the Council’s agenda. Examples of the General Assembly requesting action from the Council include its resolutions urging the Council to take action under Chapter VII of the Charter in relation to the policies of apartheid of the Government of South Africa and the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. A table of the recommendations relating to Article 11 (2) is set out in section 2.

The General Assembly also drew the attention of the Security Council to certain situations in accordance with Article 11 (3). These are dealt with in section 3.

44/126 15 December 1989	Review of the implementation of the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security	Stresses that there is a need further to enhance the effectiveness of the Security Council in discharging its principal responsibility of maintaining international peace and security and to enhance the preventive role, authority and enforcement capacity of the Council in accordance with the Charter.
45/13 7 November 1990	Cooperation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity	Calls upon the United Nations organs — in particular the Security Council ... — to continue to associate closely the Organization of African Unity with all their activities concerning Africa.
46/59, annex 9 December 1991	Declaration on Fact-finding by the United Nations in the Field of the Maintenance of International Peace and Security	The Security Council should consider the possibility of undertaking fact-finding to discharge effectively its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in accordance with the Charter. The Security Council should, wherever appropriate, consider the possibility of providing in its resolutions for recourse to fact-finding. The Security Council and the General Assembly should, in deciding to whom to entrust the conduct of a fact-finding mission, give preference to the Secretary-General, who may, inter alia, designate a special representative or a group of experts reporting to him. Resort to an ad hoc subsidiary body of the Security Council or the General Assembly may also be considered.

General Assembly resolution	Title of agenda item	Recommendation

The report should be limited to a presentation of findings of a factual nature.
47/71 14 December 1992	Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects	Believes ... that the closest attention needs to be paid to the issue of applying the preventive potential of the United Nations more broadly and considers that the responsibilities of the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General in this regard should be strengthened in accordance with the framework and provisions of the Charter.
47/72 14 December 1992	Protection of peacekeeping personnel	Recommends that, in appropriate cases, the Security Council might make it clear to the parties when authorizing a new peacekeeping operation that it is prepared to take further steps in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations should the purpose of the operation systematically be frustrated by provocative attacks against United Nations personnel. Also recommends that the Security Council continue, in collaboration with the Secretary-General, to collect and, where appropriate, to disseminate reliable information about attacks on the safety of peacekeeping and other United Nations personnel.
47/120 A ² 18 December 1992	An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy and related matters	Encourages the Security Council to utilize fully the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter on procedures and methods for peaceful settlement of disputes and to call upon the parties concerned to settle their disputes peacefully.

3. Situations drawn to the attention of the Security Council

The General Assembly did not refer any matters to the Security Council explicitly invoking Article 11 (3) during this period. However, in a number of resolutions, adopted from April 1989 to December 1992, the Assembly requested the Security Council to consider or examine “the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory”.⁴ It specifically requested the Council to consider “measures needed to provide international protection to the Palestinian civilians in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem”. Those resolutions were adopted in connection with several related agenda items: the question of Palestine; the uprising (intifada) of the Palestinian people; the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East; and the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories.

C. Practice in relation to Article 12 of the Charter

Article 12

1. While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendation with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests.

2. The Secretary-General, with the consent of the Security Council, shall notify the General Assembly at each session of any matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council and shall similarly notify the General Assembly, or the Members of the United Nations if the General Assembly is not in session, immediately the Security Council ceases to deal with such matters.

Note

During the period under review, there was no discussion in the Security Council of the nature of the limitation placed by Article 12 (1) upon the authority of the General Assembly to make recommendations. Neither did the Council request that the General Assembly make a recommendation in respect of a dispute or situation in accordance with the exception provided for in Article 12 (1).

In accordance with Article 12 (2), the Secretary-General continued to notify the General Assembly of “matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council” and of matters with which the Council had ceased to deal.⁵ These notifications were based upon the summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration, circulated each week to the members of the Security Council, in accordance with rule 11 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council.⁶ The items in the notifications were the same as those in the summary statements for the relevant period, apart from the omission of those items not considered to relate to the maintenance of international peace and security.

The matters being dealt with by the Security Council have been listed in the notifications since 1951 in two categories: (a) matters discussed during the period since the last notification; and (b) other matters of which the Council remained seized, but which it had not discussed since the last notification. The notifications also indicated those instances in which the Council had concluded its consideration of a particular item.⁷ When the Council subsequently ceased to deal with a matter listed in a notification, the Secretary-General so informed the General Assembly by circulating an addendum to the relevant notification.⁸

The consent of the Council, required by Article 12 (2), was obtained through the circulation by the Secretary-General to the members of the Council of copies of the draft notifications. The General Assembly formally took note of the various notifications.

D. Practice in relation to provisions of the Charter involving recommendations by the Security Council to the General Assembly

Note

On a number of matters, the Charter of the United Nations provides for joint decision-making by the Security Council and the General Assembly, but requires the decision by the Council to be taken first. This is the case, for instance, with respect to the appointment of the Secretary-General (Article 97), the admission, suspension, or expulsion of Members (Articles 4, 5 and 6), and the conditions under which a State which is not a Member of the United Nations may become a party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice (Article 93 (2)).⁹

This section considers briefly the Council's practice during the period under review in relation to the first two such matters. No question arose concerning the conditions of accession to the Statute of the Court.

1. Appointment of the Secretary-General

Article 97

... The Secretary-General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council. ...

Rule 48

... Any recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General shall be discussed and decided at a private meeting.

Note

In accordance with rule 48 of the provisional rules of procedure, the meetings of the Security Council to consider the question of a recommendation to the General Assembly regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General have been held in private. The Council has voted by secret ballot. A communiqué circulated at the end of each meeting, in accordance with rule 55, has indicated the stage reached in the consideration of the recommendation. During the period under review, the Council considered and unanimously adopted a recommendation of this kind (case 1).

⁶ Rule 11 reads as follows: "The Secretary-General shall communicate each week to the representatives on the Security Council a summary statement of matters of which the Security Council is seized and of the stage reached in their consideration."

⁸ See, for example, A/44/528/Add.1.

⁹ The Security Council also makes recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the conditions under which a State which is a party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice but is not a Member of the United Nations may participate in electing members of the Court, and in making amendments to the Statute (Articles 4 (3) and 69 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice).

Case 1

At its 3017th meeting, held in private on 21 November 1991, the Security Council considered the question of the recommendation regarding the appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Following a vote by secret ballot, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 720 (1991), recommending to the General Assembly that Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali be appointed Secretary-General of the United Nations for a term of office from 1 January 1992 to 31 December 1996.¹⁰ By letter dated 21 November 1991, the President of the Council transmitted the recommendation to the President of the General Assembly.¹¹ Acting in accordance with this recommendation, the General Assembly formally appointed Mr. Boutros-Ghali as Secretary-General of the United Nations on 3 December 1991.¹²

2. Membership in the United Nations

Note

The admission of a State to membership in the United Nations, and the suspension or expulsion of a Member State from the Organization, is effected by “the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council” (Articles 4 (2), 5 and 6 of the Charter). In accordance with rule 60 of its provisional rules of procedure, the Council submits to the General Assembly within specified time limits its recommendation concerning each application for membership together with a record of its discussion of the application.

During the period under review, the Council recommended the admission of 22 States to membership in the United Nations.¹³ It made no negative recommendations, requiring it to submit a special report to the General Assembly. The Council did not discuss or recommend the suspension or expulsion of any Member.

In the case of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Council, in resolution 777 (1992) of 19 September 1992, considered that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, and therefore recommended to the General Assembly “that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly”. The General Assembly so decided.¹⁴

E. Reports of the Security Council to the General Assembly

Article 24, paragraph 3

The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

Article 15, paragraph 1

The General Assembly shall receive and consider annual and special reports from the Security Council; these reports shall include an account of the measures that the Security Council has decided upon or taken to maintain international peace and security.

review to submit annual reports to the General Assembly.¹⁵ Each report covered the period from 16 June of one year to 15 June of the next. The format of the report remained unaltered during this period. It comprised four main parts: Part I provided a summary of the questions considered by the Security Council under its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; Part II dealt with “other matters” considered by the Council, such as the admission of new Members, the appointment of the Secretary-General, and the Council’s responsibilities regarding the election of members of the International Court of Justice; Part III provided an account of the work of the Military Staff Committee; and Part IV contained matters that were brought to the attention of the Council but not discussed during the period covered by the report. During the period under consideration, the reports continued to be adopted at private meetings of the Security Council. The General Assembly took note of the reports with little or no discussion.¹⁶

During the period covered by this Supplement, the Council did not submit any special reports to the Assembly (as, for example, under rule 60 (3) of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure).¹⁷

F. Other Council practice bearing on relations with the General Assembly

Note

During the period under review, there was a brief constitutional discussion concerning the importance of the Council’s restricting its deliberations and actions within its sphere of competence, as defined under the

Charter, and not encroaching on the competence of the General Assembly. This occurred during the Council’s consideration in 1992 of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. An account of this discussion is given in case 2 below.

The Security Council adopted several decisions addressing or revealing the interplay between the Council and the General Assembly. These included: (a) a letter dated 5 October 1990 from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General as part of an exchange of letters concerning Haiti, in which Council members reserved their positions on the competence of the organs of the United Nations on electoral assistance; (b) presidential statements dealing with general issues, such as disarmament and fact-finding, and with the process of coordinating with the Assembly consideration of the Secretary-General’s report entitled “An agenda for peace”; and (c) a resolution on the question of South Africa, recalling the Assembly’s Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa and providing for an operational element. These decisions are considered in cases 3, 4, 5 and 6 below.

Respective competencies of the Council and the Assembly

The issue of the respective competencies of the Security Council and the General Assembly was addressed by some Council members when they commented on proposals made at three meetings in 1992 to extend invitations to participate to two individuals who had been appointed as special rapporteurs of the Commission on Human Rights. At the Council’s 3105th and 3139th meetings, on 11 August and 23 November, respectively, it was proposed that Mr. Max van der Stoep, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iraq, be invited to participate in the Council’s consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. At the 3134th meeting, on 13 November, it was proposed that Mr. Tadeusz Mazowiecki, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, be invited to participate in the Council’s consideration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Following a brief discussion in each case, the Council decided to extend those invitations.¹⁸

¹⁸ On the question of participation under rule 39 of the

Some Council members expressed reservations in that regard. They stressed that the various organs of the United Nations should restrict their deliberations and actions within their respective spheres of competence under the Charter. In their view, the Council had primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; it should exercise caution in the manner in which it interpreted that mandate, and not encroach on the functions of the other organs. As they saw it, the Council could not discuss human rights situations per se or make recommendations in that regard; matters pertaining to human rights fell within the purview of the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly. These speakers considered it inappropriate, therefore, that the Security Council should invite those individuals — who had been appointed by, and reported to, the Commission on Human Rights — to participate in the meetings of the Council.¹⁹

While sharing some of these concerns, another Council member stated that the invitation to Mr. van der Stoep did not in any way affect or increase the normal authority of the Council as it fell within the scope of a resolution already adopted, and should be understood to reflect all the limitations inherent in that resolution. He recalled, in that regard, that the Council, on 5 April 1991, had adopted resolution 688 (1991), in which it had condemned the acts of repression committed by Iraq against the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of the country. The Council had adopted that resolution because it considered that the mass violations of human rights and the resulting flow of refugees across international borders endangered international peace and security in the region. In other words, the Council had decided to act on that matter, which was not normally part of its competence, because of a phenomenon that could affect international peace and security, the maintenance of which was its primary responsibility. The speaker noted, further, that the four countries, in requesting the meeting in question, had invoked resolution 688 (1991). Mr. van der Stoep would thus be providing information on matters that were within the purview of the Council.²⁰

Exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council concerning Haiti

By letters dated 7 and 17 September 1990,²¹ the Secretary-General informed the President of the Security Council that he had received a request from the President of the Interim Government of Haiti requesting the assistance of a United Nations observer mission in connection with forthcoming elections in Haiti. By the letter of 7 September, the Secretary-General requested the President of the Council to transmit to the members of the Council certain information that he intended to convey to the General Assembly when the Assembly considered a draft resolution on the matter. This included the fact that, if the General Assembly adopted the draft resolution, he would establish an observer mission, to be known as the United Nations Observer Group for the Verification of Elections in Haiti, to provide assistance in the observation and verification of the electoral process and in drawing up electoral security plans and observing their implementation, as requested by the President of Haiti.

By a letter dated 5 October 1990,²² the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General as follows:

I have informed the members of the Council of your letter of 7 September concerning possible United Nations assistance in connection with the forthcoming elections in Haiti, and your letter of 17 September clarifying the Haitian Government's request.

The members of the Council, without prejudice to their positions on the competence of the organs of the United Nations on electoral assistance if requested by a Member State and without prejudice to the right of any member of the Council to raise the matter at any later time in the Council for further consideration, concur that it is important that you respond positively to the request for assistance from the Government of Haiti on an urgent basis. They note that the proposed assistance to its electoral process, as requested by the President of the Interim Government of Haiti, which involves, inter alia, the provision of advisers, observers and experts on electoral security matters, but does not include the use of any peacekeeping forces, will be considered in its entirety by the General Assembly. They express the hope that the General Assembly will take urgent action so that the United Nations assistance can be extended within the time frame required by Haiti to hold its elections.

Case 4*The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security*

At its 3046th meeting, held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992, the Council discussed the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”. At the conclusion of the meeting, the President made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council.²³ Commenting on the subject of “disarmament, arms control and weapons of mass destruction”, he stated:

The members of the Council, while fully conscious of the responsibilities of other organs of the United Nations in the fields of disarmament, arms control and non-proliferation, reaffirm the crucial contribution which progress in these areas can make to the maintenance of international peace and security. They express their commitment to take concrete steps to enhance the effectiveness of the United Nations in these areas.

On conventional armaments, they note the General Assembly’s vote in favour of a United Nations register of arms transfers as a first step, and in this connection recognize the importance of all States providing all the information called for in the General Assembly’s resolution.²⁴

Case 5*Agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping*

In considering the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled “An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping”,²⁵ the Council touched on its own approach to examining the report and how it would coordinate its consideration with the discussions carried out in the General Assembly. It did so in two presidential statements, made in each case at a meeting of the Council, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Council. At the 3089th meeting, on 30 June 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council,²⁶ which reads in the relevant part:

In reading the report, the Council has noted a set of interesting proposals addressed to the various organs of the United Nations and to Member States and regional organizations. The Council therefore trusts that all organs and entities, in particular the General Assembly, will devote particular attention to the report and will study and evaluate the elements of the report that concern them.

Within the scope of its competence, the Security Council will, for its part, examine in depth and with due priority the recommendations of the Secretary-General.

At the 3128th meeting, on 29 October 1992, the President made a further statement on behalf of the Council,²⁷ which reads in the relevant part:

Pursuant to the President’s statement of 30 June 1992, the Council has begun to examine the Secretary-General’s report entitled “An agenda for peace”.

This consideration of the report of the Secretary-General ... by the Council will be coordinated with the discussions carried out in the General Assembly. The Council welcomes in this regard the contact already established between the Presidents of the two organs and invites the President of the Council to continue and intensify such contacts.

The Council has followed with close interest the views expressed by Member States in the General Assembly during the general debate as well as during the discussion on item 10 of the agenda of the General Assembly. It has also noted the report²⁸ of the special session of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations.

Commenting on the substance of the report in a further statement made on behalf of the members of the Council on 30 November 1992,²⁹ the President cited the Declaration on Fact-Finding that had recently been adopted by the General Assembly:

The members of the Council welcome and support the proposals in paragraph 25 of the report of the Secretary-General on fact-finding. They are of the view that an increased resort to fact-finding as a tool of preventive diplomacy, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the United Nations Declaration on Fact-Finding for International Security and Peacemaking,³⁰ particularly its guidelines, can result in the best possible understanding of the objective facts of a situation which will enable the Secretary-General to meet his responsibilities under Article 99 of the Charter and facilitate Security Council deliberations. ...

The question of South Africa

At its 3096th meeting, held on 16 July 1992 to consider the question of South Africa, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 765 (1992). In a preambular paragraph, the Council recalled the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa³¹ adopted by consensus by the General Assembly at its sixteenth special session, on 14 December 1989, which called for negotiations in South Africa to take place in a climate free of violence. In paragraph 4, the Council invited the Secretary-General to appoint, as a matter of urgency, a Special Representative for South Africa to recommend measures which would assist in bringing an effective end to the violence and in creating conditions for negotiations leading towards a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa.

G. Relations with subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly

Note

Certain subsidiary organs established by the General Assembly have played a part in the work of the Security Council, either because they have been placed in a special relationship to the Council by resolutions of the General Assembly, or because the Council has made use of the services of a subsidiary organ or invited its officers to participate in its meetings.

³¹ General Assembly resolution S-16/1 of 14 December 1989, annex.

During the period under review, there was no constitutional discussion bearing on the relations between such subsidiary organs and the Security Council. Those subsidiary organs still active included the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; the Special Committee against Apartheid; the United Nations Council for Namibia; the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People; and the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa. Those entities submitted reports and recommendations to the Security Council — and/or to the General Assembly, as appropriate — pursuant to a request by the General Assembly. The United Nations Council for Namibia submitted its last communication in April 1990; this was a declaration by which the Council for Namibia decided to recommend to the General Assembly its own dissolution as a result of Namibia's attainment of independence. The United Nations Council for Namibia and some of the other subsidiary organs also participated in meetings of the Council.³² The tables below give an account of the communications from these organs to the Council.

During the period under consideration, no decisions adopted by the Security Council contained references to these entities. The Council did, however, mention another subsidiary organ established by the General Assembly. In a presidential statement of 29 October 1992, adopted in connection with its consideration of the Secretary-General's report entitled "An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping", the Council noted the report on the special session of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations on the same subject.³³

The Special Committee also recommended to the General Assembly that it urge the Council to take immediate action, under Chapter VII of the Charter, with a view to applying comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the regime (para. 275 (h)); and that it take concrete steps for the strict implementation of its resolutions 418 (1977) and 558 (1984), and that it urge those States, which directly or indirectly infringe the arms embargo and continue to collaborate with South Africa in the military intelligence and technology fields, to cease such acts (para. 275 (i)). S/20634	16 May 1989	Letter dated 11 May 1989 transmitting the report of the Panel on the Hearings on the Oil Embargo Against South Africa, held in New York on 12 and 13 April 1989, which concluded (para. 18) that the Security Council's decision to adopt a mandatory oil embargo against South Africa, under Chapter VII of the Charter, was the most appropriate means to complement the arms embargo imposed under resolution 418 (1977), and recommended (para. 19) measures for tightening the oil embargo.
S/20926 and Add.1	31 October 1989 20 June 1990	Transmitting the report of the Intergovernmental Group, which reaffirmed that a mandatory oil embargo against South Africa was urgently needed to assist its people in the struggle against apartheid, and recommended once again that the General Assembly request the Security Council to impose a mandatory embargo on the supply and shipping of oil and petroleum products to South Africa (para. 61) under Chapter VII of the Charter.

Part II

Relations with the Economic and Social Council

Practice in relation to Article 65 of the Charter

Article 65

The Economic and Social Council may furnish information to the Security Council and shall assist the Security Council upon its request.

Note

During the period under consideration, the Security Council did not formally address a request for information or assistance to the Economic and Social Council or mention Article 65 in its decisions. In 1992, however, the Security Council received information from the Economic and Social Council through one of its subsidiary bodies, the Commission on Human Rights, about grave human rights abuses and violations of international humanitarian law identified by the Security Council as being of concern in two situations before it, the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the situation in the former Yugoslavia. In the first instance, the Security Council referred to the information thus provided in two of its resolutions. This practice is considered in case 7 below. In relation to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Security Council subsequently specifically requested the “relevant United Nations bodies” to make available information relating to the violations of humanitarian law being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The Security Council also requested those United Nations bodies to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts to be established, at its request, by the Secretary-General. This instance is discussed in case 8.

In his report entitled “An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping”,³⁴ submitted in June 1992 at the request

³⁴ S/24111. The report of the Secretary-General was submitted pursuant to the presidential statement dated 31 January 1992 (S/23500), by which the Council invited the Secretary-General to report “on ways of strengthening and making more efficient within the framework and provisions of the Charter the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, for of the Security Council, the Secretary-General touched upon the potential relevance of Article 65 as part of an early warning system. He recommended “that the Security Council invite a reinvigorated and restructured Economic and Social Council to provide reports, in accordance with Article 65 of the Charter, on those economic and social developments that may, unless mitigated, threaten international peace and security”.³⁵ This recommendation was not formally discussed or commented upon by the Council in 1992 in the course of its consideration of the Secretary-General’s report.

Situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, the Security Council “condemn[ed] the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish-populated areas, the consequences of which threaten[ed] international peace and security in the region”. It demanded that Iraq, “as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end this repression”, and expressed the hope that an open dialogue would take place to ensure that the human and political rights of all Iraqi citizens were respected.

When the Council reviewed this matter at its 3059th meeting, on 11 March 1992, several Council members referred to the findings contained in the report on the situation of human rights in Iraq dated 18 February 1992 prepared by Max van der Stoep, Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights.³⁶⁻³⁷ That report had been circulated to the members of the Security Council at the request of the Permanent Representative of Belgium.³⁸ The covering peacemaking and for peacekeeping”.

³⁵ S/24111, para. 26.

³⁶ For the relevant statements by Council members, see S/PV.3059, p. 22 (Austria), p. 30 (United Kingdom), pp. 45-46 (United States), pp. 51-52 (Russian Federation) and p. 67 (Belgium).

³⁸ Letter dated 9 March 1992 from the Permanent letter drew attention to paragraph 159 of the report, in which the Special Rapporteur, after referring to resolution 688 (1991), stated that, inasmuch as the repression continued, he could only conclude that the threat to international peace and security in the region mentioned in that resolution remained. At the same meeting, the President of the Security Council made a statement on behalf of the Council,³⁹ concerning the status of Iraq's compliance with the various obligations imposed upon it by resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. With respect to the implementation of resolution 688 (1991), the presidential statement referred to a resolution of the Commission on Human Rights and both the findings and conclusion contained in the Special Rapporteur's report. Thus, it stated:

33. The Security Council remains deeply concerned at the grave human rights abuses that, despite the provisions of resolution 688 (1991), the Government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population, in particular in the northern region of Iraq, in southern Shi'a centres and in the southern marshes (Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/71 of 5 March 1992). The Security Council notes that this situation is confirmed by the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights (E/CN.4/1992/31, also to be circulated in document S/23685) ...

34. The members of the Council are particularly concerned at the reported restrictions on the supplies of essential commodities, in particular food and fuel, which have been imposed by the Government of Iraq on the three northern governorates of Dohuk, Erbil and Suleimaniyya. In this regard, as the Special Rapporteur has noted in his report, inasmuch as the repression of the population continues, the threat to international peace and security in the region mentioned in resolution 688 (1991) remains.

At an urgent follow-up meeting held on 11 August 1992, the Council had before it the interim report on the human rights situation in Iraq prepared by the Special Rapporteur⁴⁰ which, as in the case of his first report, had been circulated as a Security Council document at the request of the Permanent Representative of Belgium.⁴¹ At the request of four Council members, the Council decided to extend an invitation to Mr. van der Stoel to participate in the meeting under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. Several Council members expressed reservations about the appropriateness of the Security Council inviting Mr. van der Stoel, on the ground that questions of human rights ought to be dealt with by the Commission on Human Rights, the body which had appointed him rapporteur.⁴² Mr. van der Stoel made a statement in which he reported on the Government of Iraq's continued policy of repression against the Kurdish population in the north and the Shiites in the southern marshes, in violation of resolution 688 (1991).

The Council renewed its consideration of this item at its 3139th meeting, on 23 November 1992. Once again, Mr. van der Stoel was invited to participate in the meeting. Some Council members had reiterated their reservations, for the same reasons as cited at the August meeting. At the 3139th meeting, the President of the Council read out a statement on behalf of the Council concerning the status of Iraq's compliance with the various obligations placed upon it by the Council.⁴³ In relation to resolution 688 (1991), the statement referred to a resolution of the Commission on Human Rights, the Special Rapporteur's reports and the public meeting held with Mr. van der Stoel. It did so in the following terms:

30. The Security Council remains deeply concerned at the grave human rights abuses that, despite the provisions of resolution 688 (1991), the Government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population, in particular in the northern region of Iraq, in southern Shi'a centres and in the southern marshes (Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/71 of 5 March 1992). The Security Council notes that this situation is confirmed by the reports of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights (E/CN.4/1992/31, also circulated as document S/23685 and Add.1, and part I of the interim report circulated as document S/24386). The members of the Council recall their public meeting with Mr. Max van der Stoel on 11 August 1992.

Situation in the former Yugoslavia

On 13 August 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 771 (1992), concerning continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Recalling its presidential statement of 4 August 1992,⁴⁴ the Council called upon “States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations” to collate substantiated information on violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and to make that information available to the Council.

At about the same time, the Commission on Human Rights, meeting in its first special session, adopted a resolution on 14 August on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia,⁴⁵ in which it took note of the statement by the President of the Security Council on 4 August 1992, and requested its Chairman to appoint a special rapporteur to investigate at first hand the human rights situation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular within Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Commission requested the Special Rapporteur to report his findings and recommendations to the Commission on Human Rights as well as to the General Assembly, and requested the Secretary-General to make the reports of the Special Rapporteur available also to the Security Council.⁴⁶

At its meeting on 6 October 1992, the Security Council had before it the first report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.⁴⁷ In his recommendations, the Special Rapporteur noted the need to prosecute those responsible for serious human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law. He recommended that a commission should be created to assess and further investigate specific cases in which prosecution might be warranted.⁴⁸ At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 780 (1992), in which it requested “States, relevant United Nations bodies, and relevant organizations” to make available “information relating to the violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions ... being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia”. The Council also requested those entities “to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts” which it requested the Secretary-General to establish to examine and analyse the information submitted pursuant to resolutions 771 (1992) and 780 (1992). In their explanations of vote, several Council members elaborated on their interpretation of paragraph 1 of the resolution. They stated their understanding that the Council’s request to “relevant United Nations bodies” included the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, and that the Special Rapporteur’s report should be taken into account by the impartial Commission of Experts.⁴⁹

The Security Council considered the matter further, under the item entitled “The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina”, at its 3134th to 3137th meetings, from 13 to 16 November 1992. At its 3134th meeting, the Council invited the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights to participate under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. Some Council members reiterated their reservations concerning the appropriateness of inviting the Special Rapporteur to participate in a meeting of the Security Council, on the ground that, as he had been appointed by the Commission on Human Rights, he should report to that body.⁵⁰ The Council had before it the first report, and a further report,⁵¹ prepared by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.

At its 3137th meeting, on 16 November 1992, the Security Council adopted resolution 787 (1992). In a preambular paragraph of that resolution, the Council “not[ed] with grave concern the reports⁵² of the Special Rapporteur for Yugoslavia ... which ma[de] clear that massive and systematic violations of human rights and grave violations of international humanitarian law continue[d] in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina”. In the operative paragraphs, the Council, inter alia, condemned all violations of international law, including in particular the practice of “ethnic cleansing” and the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and reaffirmed that the perpetrators of such acts would be held individually responsible. It also welcomed the establishment of the Commission of Experts, and asked the Commission to actively pursue investigations with regard to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.⁵³

Relations with the Trusteeship Council

Note

This part of chapter VI concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council in relation to those trust territories designated as “a strategic area or areas” under Articles 77 and 82 of the Charter. Article 83 (1) provides that “all functions of the United Nations” relating to strategic areas, “including the approval of the terms of the trusteeship agreements and of their alteration or amendment”, are to be exercised by the Security Council. Article 83 (3) further provides that the Security Council shall avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council to “perform those functions of the United Nations under the trusteeship system relating to political, economic, social and educational matters in the strategic areas”. Those supervisory functions are specified in Articles 87 and 88 of the Charter. Only one Administering Authority designated a Trust Territory as a strategic area: the United States so designated the Pacific Islands, and a draft trusteeship agreement was approved by the Security Council in April 1947. In March 1949, the Security Council approved a proposal by which the Trusteeship Council was asked to exercise the above-mentioned supervisory functions in relation to this Trust Territory, and to submit to the Security Council its reports and recommendations thereon.

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted resolution 683 (1990), by which it terminated the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands with respect to three of the entities covered by the Agreement: the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands. The Council’s practice in this regard is considered in case 9 below. That left Palau as the sole remaining Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. As it has done since 1949, the Trusteeship Council continued to submit reports annually to the Security Council on the Trust Territory. Those reports are listed in section B.

A. Practice relating to the partial termination of a trusteeship agreement under Article 83, paragraph 1, of the Charter

By letter dated 7 December 1990,⁵⁴ the President of the Trusteeship Council transmitted to the President of the Security Council a draft resolution on the status of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. The draft resolution highlighted, inter alia, the following:

- The Council’s responsibility relating to strategic areas, as set forth in Article 83 (1) of the Charter.
- The Administering Authority’s obligation to promote the development of the inhabitants of the Trust Territory towards self-government or independence.
- The negotiations between the Administering Authority and representatives of the Trust Territory, which had begun in 1969 and had resulted in the conclusion of a Compact of Free Association in the case of the Federated States of Micronesia and the Marshall Islands, and a Commonwealth Covenant in the case of the Northern Mariana Islands.

- The Council's satisfaction that the peoples of these entities had freely exercised their right to self-determination in approving their respective new status agreements in plebiscites observed by visiting missions of the Trusteeship Council, and that the legislatures of these entities had adopted resolutions approving the respective new status agreements.
- Trusteeship Council resolution 2183 (LIII) of 28 May 1986 and subsequent reports of the Trusteeship Council to the Security Council.

In an operative paragraph of the draft resolution, the Council would determine — in the light of the entry into force of the new status agreements for the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands — that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement had been fully attained, and that the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement had terminated, with respect to those entities.

At its 2972nd meeting, on 22 December 1990, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Letter dated 7 December 1990 from the President of the Trusteeship Council addressed to the President of the Security Council". Following the adoption of the agenda, the representative of Cuba proposed that the meeting should be adjourned for three days. He did so on the ground, inter alia, that the Governor of the Northern Mariana Islands had requested that the consideration of the question of termination of the Trusteeship Agreement be delayed to give the representatives of the peoples of that Territory an opportunity to present to the members of the Council their position against termination.⁵⁵ In support, he contended that it was "perfectly reasonable" — even obligatory — before taking a decision to terminate the Trusteeship Council's mandate over this Territory to listen to the representative of its people.⁵⁶

Speaking in opposition to the proposal to adjourn the meeting, the representative of the United States of America said that the issues raised in the Governor's letter concerned the Compact of Free Association entered into between the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands and the United States. He explained that a condition of the Compact was that it would replace the Trusteeship Agreement, which had been terminated by the Trusteeship Council in 1986, an act which had been recognized by the United States. The differences that had arisen from the Compact were being worked on and resolved under the terms of the Compact, through negotiations. It was important that the negotiations continue. As the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas had chosen conclusively, through an act of its own legislature, to join the United States, it had become part of the United States. Its relationship to the United States was therefore clearly covered by Article 2 (7) of the Charter. As a result, he believed that the Council should move to accept immediately the original wishes of the people of the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas, as expressed through their legislature and through a plebiscite held under United Nations supervision.⁵⁷ The Cuban proposal to adjourn the meeting was then put to the vote, but not adopted.⁵⁸

The Security Council proceeded to vote on a draft resolution⁵⁹ submitted by China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The draft resolution was identical to the one submitted and recommended for adoption by the Trusteeship Council. It was adopted, without amendment, as resolution 683 (1990), by 14 votes in favour, to 1 against (Cuba). By the resolution, the Security Council, inter alia, determined, "in the light of the entry into force of the new status agreements for the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands, that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement have been fully attained, and that the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement has terminated, with respect to those entities".

Speaking after the vote, the five sponsors of the resolution — all of whom, as permanent members of the Security Council, were also members of the Trusteeship Council⁶⁰ — welcomed its adoption as giving effect to the results of the exercise by the peoples of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands of their right to self-determination. Several of them underlined that the peoples of those Territories had approved in referendums, monitored by the United Nations, agreements defining the new status of each Territory. The Trusteeship Council had then decided, by its resolution 2183 (LIII) of 23 May 1986, that the necessary conditions to terminate the trusteeship over the three Territories had been met.⁶¹ While some described the action just taken by the Security Council as an endorsement of the Trusteeship Council action, others stressed that, under the Charter, it was for the Security Council to take the final decision on ending the trusteeship status: it had the important task of ensuring that United Nations responsibilities with respect to strategic Trust Territories were carried out.⁶²

In explanation of his country's negative vote, the representative of Cuba expressed the view that the Security Council had not properly discharged its responsibilities with regard to this question. He maintained that the Council ought to have afforded the representatives of the peoples of the Territories concerned an opportunity to explain their reasons for not wanting the Council to take the action it had just taken.

B. Transmission of reports to the Security Council by the Trusteeship Council

From 1 January 1989 to 31 December 1992, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council the following reports of the Trusteeship Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, which continued to be the only Territory designated as a strategic area:

(a) Forty-first report, covering the period from 20 July 1988 to 1 August 1989;⁶³

(b) Forty-second report, covering the period from 2 August 1989 to 28 November 1990;⁶⁴

(c) Forty-third report, covering the period from 29 November 1990 to 19 December 1991;⁶⁵

(d) Forty-fourth report, covering the period from 19 December 1991 to 21 December 1992;⁶⁶

(e) Forty-fifth report, covering the period from 22 December 1992 to 18 January 1994.⁶⁷

Part IV Relations with the International Court of Justice

Note

This part concerns the relationship between the Security Council and the International Court of Justice. Section A deals with the election of members of the Court, which depends upon action to be taken by the Security Council in conjunction with the General Assembly, both organs proceeding independently. During the period under review, three elections were held to elect seven members to fill ad hoc and regular vacancies (see cases 10, 11 and 12). Section B notes the discussion that arose in the Security Council in 1992 regarding the respective roles of the Council and the Court, in connection with the situation concerning the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals in the destruction of two civilian airliners (see case 13).

A. Practice in relation to the election of members of the International Court of Justice

The procedure for the election of members of the Court is set out in Articles 4 and 8 and 10 to 14 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice; rules 40 and 61 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council; and rules 150 and 151 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. In each instance under consideration here, the Security Council began the election procedure to fill a vacancy by fixing the date of the election, in accordance with Article 14 of the Court's Statute. The Security Council and the General Assembly then proceeded independently with the elections. At the Security Council meetings, the President of the Council drew attention to a memorandum by the Secretary-General describing the composition of the Court and setting out the procedure to be followed in the conduct of the election.⁶⁸ He reminded the Council that, under Article 10 (1) of the Court's Statute, "those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly and in the Security Council shall be considered as elected". He explained further that the voting would be by secret ballot.

At its 2854th meeting, on 18 April 1989, the Council met to elect a member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of one of its members. On the first ballot, one candidate obtained the required majority of votes in the Council.⁶⁹ The President stated that he would communicate the result of the vote to the President of the General Assembly, and requested the Council to remain in session until the result of the voting in the General Assembly had been received. Subsequently, he informed the members of the Council that he had received a letter from the President of the General Assembly informing him that the same candidate had received an absolute majority in the General Assembly at the 91st plenary meeting of its forty-third session. The candidate in question was therefore elected a member of the Court. As the new member was elected to replace a member whose term of office had not expired, he was elected to the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 1991.

Case 11

At its 2955th meeting, on 15 November 1990, the Council proceeded with the election of five members of the International Court of Justice, to fill the seats which would become vacant on 5 February 1991. The election required three rounds of voting, and a second meeting.⁷⁰ On the first ballot, three candidates obtained the required majority of votes in the Council. Since fewer than five candidates had received the required majority, the Council proceeded to a second ballot for the remaining two vacancies, in accordance with rule 61 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. On the second ballot, two more candidates obtained the required majority. The Council then remained in session until the result of the voting at the 38th plenary meeting of the forty-fifth session of the General Assembly had been received. The results, when compared, revealed that the Security Council and the General Assembly had agreed on four candidates. Those four candidates had therefore been elected as members of the Court for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 1991. The President of the Council then stated that, in accordance with Article 11 of the Statute of the Court, the Council would proceed to hold another meeting to elect one candidate, by further ballot, for the seat remaining to be filled. He accordingly adjourned the first meeting and immediately called to order the second meeting — the 2956th meeting. On the first ballot, one candidate received the required majority of votes in the Council. At the 39th plenary meeting of the General Assembly, the same candidate obtained an absolute majority of votes in the Assembly. As both the Security Council and the General Assembly had agreed on the same candidate, the candidate in question was elected to the International Court of Justice for a term of office of nine years, beginning on 6 February 1991.

⁶⁸ See, for example, memorandum by the Secretary-General of 12 April 1989 (S/20551).

Case 12

At its 3021st meeting, on 5 December 1991, the Council proceeded with the election of one member of the International Court of Justice, to fill a vacancy that had occurred due to the recent death of one of the members of the Court. On the first ballot, no candidate received the required majority.⁷¹ The Council thus proceeded to a second ballot, in accordance with rule 61 of the provisional rules of procedure. On the second ballot, one candidate received the required majority of votes. The candidate in question, having also obtained an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly, was accordingly elected a member of the Court for the remainder of his predecessor's term of office, expiring on 5 February 1994.

B. Consideration of the relationship between the Security Council and the Court

During consideration by the Council of the item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 (S/23306, S/23307, S/23308, S/23309 and S/23317)",⁷² concerning the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals in the destruction of two civilian aircraft (Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988 and UTA flight 772 over the Niger in 1989), discussion arose concerning the respective roles of the Security Council and the International Court of Justice.

At the end of 1991, the Governments of France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America presented to the Security Council the reports of judicial and police investigations which implicated officials of the Libyan Government in the bombings of the two airliners. The three Governments also presented specific demands to the Libyan authorities relating to the legal procedures that were under way: these included the demand that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya surrender for trial the two Libyan officials charged with the destruction of Pan Am flight 103, that it accept responsibility for their actions, and that it pay appropriate compensation.

At its meeting on 21 January 1992, the Security Council considered the matter and unanimously adopted resolution 731 (1992), which urged the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately to provide a full and effective response to the requests of the three Governments to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts against the two aircraft.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya maintained that the issue before the Council was a legal one — "a dispute over the legal determination to be made in connection with a request for extradition". The Security Council was not, therefore, competent to consider the matter. Instead, it should recommend settlement through the diverse legal channels that were available — in particular, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971 (the Montreal Convention), which provided for arbitration. The Council should bear in mind, moreover, that under Article 36 (3) of the Charter, "legal disputes should as a general rule be referred to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court". He added that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had formally requested that the dispute be referred to arbitration under the Montreal Convention and intended, if no agreement was reached on arbitration, to bring the matter before the Court.⁷³ A number of other speakers, who were not Council members, shared the view that the matter before them was essentially a legal one, and thought it inappropriate for the Security Council to consider it. They encouraged the Council to allow the question to be dealt with in a legal framework.⁷⁴

The representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, stressed that the Council was confronted with a situation of State-sponsored terrorism, to which standard procedures were clearly inapplicable. The former stated that the issue at hand was not a difference of opinion or approach that could be mediated or negotiated. It was, as the Council had just recognized in adopting resolution 731 (1992), conduct that constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁷⁵ The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that it was the exceptional circumstance of government involvement in the destruction of the two flights which had made it appropriate for the Council to adopt a resolution urging the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with the requests that the accused be made available for trial in Scotland or the United States and to cooperate with the French judicial authorities. Under the circumstances, it was clear that the State which was itself implicated in the acts of terrorism could not try its own officials. Nor was the suggestion of a trial before an international tribunal practical, as there was no international tribunal with criminal jurisdiction.⁷⁶ Several other speakers who supported the adoption of resolution 731 (1992) concurred that the attacks on the two aircraft were acts of terrorism that threatened international peace and security. They considered it entirely appropriate, therefore, for the Security Council — the United Nations body entrusted with the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security — to consider these terrorist acts.⁷⁷ A number of those speakers noted that this was not the first time that the problem of terrorism against civil aviation had appeared on the Council's agenda, and recalled that the Council's most recent resolution on the subject, resolution 635 (1989) of 14 June 1989, had condemned all acts of unlawful interference with the security of civil aviation.

On 3 March 1992, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya instituted separate proceedings against the United Kingdom and the United States before the International Court of Justice, in respect of "a dispute" between them "over the interpretation or application of the Montreal Convention", arising from the aerial incident at Lockerbie. In its applications, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya contended that the acts alleged in the indictment constituted an offence under the 1971 Montreal Convention and should be dealt with in the framework of that Convention, and that the United Kingdom and the United States were in breach of the Convention by virtue of the pressure they were applying on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to surrender the two Libyan nationals for trial. Later on the same day, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya also filed a request for provisional measures to preserve the rights of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and to cause the United Kingdom and the United States "to abstain from any action capable of having a prejudicial effect on the Court's decision in the case, and to refrain from taking any step that might aggravate or extend the dispute, as would surely happen if sanctions were imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya or force were employed".⁷⁸ In the course of the oral proceedings before the Court, the United Kingdom and the United States contended, inter alia, that the provisional measures sought by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya should be refused as they were designed to fetter the Security Council in the exercise of its proper powers and to preclude the Security Council from acting in relation to a wider dispute involving allegations that the Libyan State was guilty of State terrorism.

On 31 March 1992 — three days after the close of the hearings and before the Court had rendered its decision on the request for provisional measures — the Security Council adopted resolution 748 (1992). Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council imposed aviation and diplomatic sanctions and an arms embargo on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, on the basis of its determination that the failure of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism, and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests in resolution 731 (1992), constituted a threat to international peace and security.

At the Council meeting at which resolution 748 (1992) was adopted, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had questioned the appropriateness of the Security Council once again considering this item. He contended that it was doing so without taking into consideration the framework in which the issue should be examined, namely, the legal framework; and without awaiting the final word on the subject from a neutral and objective jurisdiction. Why, he asked, was there such haste? Why did the other parties refuse to await the decision of the Court on the question? Why were they exerting pressure on the Council to consider the question at the same time as the Court was considering it?⁷⁹ Several speakers, including three Council members who abstained in the voting, expressed the view that the Council should have avoided adopting any resolution imposing sanctions pending a decision by the Court.⁸⁰ Some speakers also observed that, although nothing in the Charter precluded the parallel consideration of the dispute by the Court and the Security Council, these two principal organs should complement each other's efforts rather than proceed in a manner that could produce contradictory results.⁸¹

The representative of Zimbabwe contended that, by invoking Chapter VII while the matter was still pending before the Court, the Security Council was “risking a major institutional crisis”.⁸²

Speaking in support of resolution 748 (1992), on the other hand, the representative of the United States stressed that the evidence of involvement by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the acts of terrorism under consideration indicated a serious breach of international peace and security, which fully justified the adoption by the Council of measures pursuant to Chapter VII. The message sent by the resolution was the surest guarantee that the Security Council, using its specific, unique powers under the Charter, would preserve the rule of law and ensure the peaceful resolution of threats to international peace and security, then and in the future.⁸³ The representative of the United Kingdom rejected the Libyan suggestion that compliance with the requests in resolution 731 (1992) should await the outcome of the proceedings instituted by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in the Court. He believed that the Libyan application to the Court, while purporting to enjoin action by the United Kingdom against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, was in fact directed at interfering with the exercise by the Security Council of its rightful functions and prerogatives under the Charter. He stressed that the Security Council was fully entitled to concern itself with issues of terrorism and the measures needed to address acts of terrorism in any particular case or to prevent it in the future. Any other view, he stated, would undermine the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security conferred on the Council by Article 24 of the Charter.⁸⁴ A number of other Council members similarly stressed that terrorism was a threat to international peace and security, and stated that the Security Council had acted appropriately in taking enforcement action.⁸⁵ The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Venezuela, observed that both the Council and the Court were independent of each other, and that each of these organs in the United Nations system must exercise its jurisdiction autonomously. It was important, however, that public opinion should understand that, although it would have been desirable for there to be a simultaneous decision by the two forums, the absence of such a simultaneous decision could not inhibit the actions which one or the other might take, and that their actions did not imply a disregard for their respective responsibilities.⁸⁶

Following the adoption of resolution 748 (1992), the Court invited the parties to submit their views on the possible implications of the resolution for the proceedings before it. After receiving these views, the Court found that the obligation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the United Kingdom and the United States to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with Article 25 of the Charter extended to the decision contained in resolution 748 (1992); and that, in accordance with Article 103 of the Charter, the obligations of the parties in that respect prevailed over their obligations under any other international agreement, including the Montreal Convention. Emphasizing that it was not at this stage called upon to determine definitively the legal effect of resolution 748 (1992), the Court considered that “whatever the situation previous to the adoption of that resolution, the rights claimed by Libya under the Montreal Convention cannot now be regarded as appropriate for protection by the indication of provisional measures”. It declined, therefore, to indicate provisional measures.⁸⁷

This part is concerned with the functions other than those of an administrative nature entrusted to the Secretary-General by the Security Council under Article 98 of the Charter,⁸⁸ and with the Secretary-General's power of initiative under Article 99.

Article 98

The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity [as the chief administrative officer of the Organization] in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, of the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council, and shall perform such other functions as are entrusted to him by these organs. ...

Article 99

The Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

A. Functions entrusted to the Secretary-General by the Security Council

Note

During the period under review, the Secretary-General was requested or authorized by the Security Council to carry out a broad range of actions, particularly in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes and peacekeeping. Those actions included the following:⁸⁹

⁸⁹ The practice cited is illustrative and does not purport to be comprehensive. For details of these and other instances of the Security Council entrusting functions to the Secretary-General, see the case studies in chapter VIII.

Measures to ascertain the facts

In a number of instances, the Secretary-General was asked to investigate the facts of a particular situation or his efforts to do so were endorsed:

(a) In relation to the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the Council welcomed the decision of the Secretary-General to send a mission to the region to "look into the circumstances surrounding the recent tragic events in Jerusalem and other similar developments in the occupied territories" and requested him to submit a report containing his findings and recommendations on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation;⁹⁰

(b) In relation to the same item, the Council requested the Secretary-General to "monitor and observe the situation regarding Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, making new efforts in this regard on an urgent basis";⁹¹

(c) In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council requested the Secretary-General to "report forthwith, if appropriate on the basis of a further mission to the region, on the plight of the Iraqi civilian population, and in particular the Kurdish population, suffering from the repression in all its forms inflicted by the Iraqi authorities";⁹²

(d) With regard to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council requested the Secretary-General to collate the information submitted to the Council by States and international humanitarian organizations "relating to the violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia", and to submit a report summarizing the information and recommending additional measures that might be appropriate in response to it;⁹³

(e) With regard to the same issue, the Council subsequently requested the Secretary-General to establish an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse the information submitted pursuant to resolutions 771 (1992) and 780 (1992), together with such further information as the Commission of Experts might obtain through its own investigations or efforts, with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The Council requested the Secretary-General to report to it on the Commission's conclusions;⁹⁴

(f) Also in relation to the situation in the former Yugoslavia, and specifically the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council invited the Secretary-General to inform it of the findings of the inquiry into the circumstances of a fatal attack carried out against personnel of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) near Sarajevo and similar incidents involving the United Nations activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and of any information which he could gather on the responsibility for those incidents.⁹⁵

Good offices

The Secretary-General was often requested to exercise or continue to exercise his "good offices" function — his independent political role in preventing or mediating conflicts between or within States — or his role in this regard was endorsed:

(a) In relation to the situation in Cyprus, the Secretary-General was requested to "continue to exercise his mission of good offices" to assist the two communities to reach a negotiated settlement of all aspects of the Cyprus problem. He acted on the basis of Security Council authorization, renewed semi-annually,⁹⁶ and in the context of a long-standing United Nations peacekeeping operation (UNFICYP). In March 1990, the Council requested the Secretary-General "toward this end, to assist the two communities by making suggestions to facilitate the discussions".⁹⁷

(b) In connection with the item "Central America: efforts towards peace", the Council lent "its full support to the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, in consultation with the Security Council, in support of the Central America Governments, in their effort to achieve the goals set forth in the Guatemala agreement".⁹⁸ It subsequently reiterated its full support for his mission of good offices in the region.⁹⁹ In the case of El Salvador, the Council "welcomed the efforts of the Secretary-General to promote the achievement of a negotiated political solution to the conflict in El Salvador".¹⁰⁰ It later commended the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative for Central America "for their efforts at good offices, and express[ed] its full support for their continuing efforts to facilitate a peaceful settlement to the conflict".¹⁰¹

(c) With regard to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, shortly after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the Council "welcomed the Secretary-General's use of his good offices to advance a peaceful solution based on the relevant resolutions of the Council".¹⁰² More specifically, by resolution 674 (1990), the Council "repose[d] its trust in the Secretary-General to make available his good offices and, as he consider[ed] appropriate, to pursue them and to undertake diplomatic efforts in order to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis caused by the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait, on the basis of resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990)".¹⁰³

¹⁰³ Resolution 674 (1990), para. 12. In the resolutions cited, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, had, inter alia, demanded Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal.

(d) In connection with the same item, the Secretary-General was also requested to “use his good offices to facilitate the delivery and distribution of foodstuffs” to the civilians in Kuwait and Iraq;¹⁰⁴ and to continue to exercise his good offices concerning the safety and well-being of third-State nationals in Iraq and Kuwait.¹⁰⁵

(e) In connection with items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council requested the Secretary-General “to seek the cooperation of the Libyan Government to provide a full and effective response” to the requests addressed to the Libyan authorities by France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America for the extradition of the suspects involved in two airline bombings.¹⁰⁶ The Secretary-General sent an Under-Secretary-General as his Special Envoy to Tripoli, emphasizing in his personal message to the Libyan leader, Colonel Muammar Al-Qadhafi, that he was “acting under the terms of paragraph 4 of resolution 731 and not as a mediator between the Security Council and the Libyan authorities”.¹⁰⁷

(f) At the conclusion of the first meeting of the Security Council held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council in which they invited the Secretary-General “to consider how greater use might be made of his good offices”.¹⁰⁸

Joint efforts to promote a political settlement

In several instances, the Secretary-General was asked to undertake diplomatic efforts in conjunction with regional arrangements or other actors:

(a) In the context of the situation in the Middle East, with regard to the situation in Lebanon, the members of the Council, in a presidential statement, invited the Secretary-General — in collaboration with the Ministerial Committee of the League of Arab States — “to make all possible efforts and to make all contacts which could be deemed useful” for putting an end to the loss of human lives, alleviating the suffering of the Lebanese people and achieving an effective ceasefire indispensable for a settlement of the Lebanese crisis.¹⁰⁹ The members of the Council subsequently invited the Secretary-General to pursue all appropriate contacts, in liaison with the Tripartite High Committee set up to resolve the Lebanese crisis, to ensure observance of the ceasefire;¹¹⁰ welcomed the contacts he had maintained with the members of the Tripartite High Committee, and invited him to pursue those contacts.¹¹¹

(b) In relation to the situation concerning Western Sahara, the Council expressed its full support to the Secretary-General “in his mission of good offices, pursued jointly with the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, with a view to settling the question of Western Sahara”.¹¹²

(c) In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, in September 1991, the Council invited the Secretary-General “to offer his assistance” in relation to the Croatian aspect of the conflict, in consultation with the Government of Yugoslavia and those promoting the efforts to restore peace and dialogue in Yugoslavia, namely, the States members of the European Community with the support of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.¹¹³

(d) In connection with the same item, in April 1992, the Council expressed alarm at the rapid deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It invited the Secretary-General “to dispatch urgently to the area his Personal Envoy for Yugoslavia to act in close cooperation with representatives of the European Community” whose efforts were “aimed at stopping the fighting and at bringing about a peaceful solution to the crisis”.¹¹⁴ The Council subsequently requested the Secretary-General to “keep close contacts with the developments within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia and to

(e) With regard to the situation in Somalia, the Council, early in 1992, requested the Secretary-General, together with the Secretaries-General of the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States, “to contact all parties involved in the conflict, to seek their commitment to the cessation of hostilities in order to permit the humanitarian assistance to be distributed, to promote a ceasefire and compliance therewith, and to assist in the process of a political settlement of the conflict in Somalia.”¹¹⁶

(f) In relation to the same item, the Council also called upon the Secretary-General to continue, in close cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, “his consultations with all Somali parties, movements and factions towards the convening of a conference for national reconciliation and unity in Somalia”.¹¹⁷ This call was reiterated in several subsequent resolutions.¹¹⁸

Peacekeeping and implementation of peace agreements

The Secretary-General was also entrusted with a leading role in dispatching and directing a number of peacekeeping missions authorized by the Council.¹¹⁹ Some of these missions, such as those in Cyprus, the Middle East, and along the Iraq-Kuwait border, involved the interposition of military forces to monitor ceasefire lines. Other missions during this period were multifaceted operations, which assisted the parties in the implementation of complex peace agreements. They verified troop demobilizations, supervised elections, monitored human rights, and repatriated refugees. This was the case, for example, in the sizeable operations in Namibia, Cambodia, Mozambique and Central America.

B. Matters brought to the attention of the Security Council by the Secretary-General

Note

The period under consideration saw an explicit invocation of Article 99 by the then Secretary-General, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar. It occurred in August 1989 in connection with events in Lebanon and is considered briefly in case 14 below. At the end of 1992, the members of the Council formally endorsed the Secretary-General’s role in taking the initiative to draw potential conflicts to the attention of the Security Council, as an element of conflict prevention. They did so in a presidential statement of 30 November 1992, adopted in connection with their examination of the report of the Secretary-General entitled “An agenda for peace”. This is dealt with in case 15 below.

Case 14

By a letter dated 15 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²⁰ the Secretary-General expressed deep concern about the tragic events in Lebanon, and reported that the violence in and around Beirut had escalated to a level unprecedented in 14 years of conflict. He stressed that the United Nations had a responsibility to prevent further bloodshed in Lebanon and to support the wider efforts, led by the Tripartite Committee,¹²¹ for a resolution of the conflict. As a step in that direction, an effective ceasefire was imperative. What was required, he believed, was a concerted effort by the Council as a whole to impress upon the parties to the conflict that there was an immediate need to halt all military activities and to adhere to a ceasefire so that the efforts of the Tripartite Committee might continue unimpeded. The Secretary-General concluded as follows: “In my opinion, the present crisis poses a serious threat to international peace and security. Accordingly, in the exercise of my responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, I ask that the Security Council be convened urgently in order to contribute to a peaceful solution of the problem.” Looking back at the end of ¹²¹ The Tripartite Committee comprised King Hassan II of Morocco, King Fahd bin Abdul-Aziz Al Saud of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, and President Chadli Bendjedid of Algeria.

1989 on these events in Lebanon, the Secretary-General recalled that in August he had “felt compelled, for the first time in [his] tenure as Secretary-General, to invoke Article 99 of the Charter”.¹²²

In response to the Secretary-General’s urgent appeal, the Security Council met immediately¹²³ and adopted a presidential statement¹²⁴ in which it appealed to all the parties to observe a total and immediate ceasefire, and expressed its full support for the Tripartite Committee of the Arab Heads of State in the efforts it was making with a view to the establishment of an effective and definitive ceasefire and the putting into effect of a plan for the settlement of the Lebanese crisis in all its aspects. The Council also appealed to all States and to all the parties to support the efforts of the Tripartite Committee, and invited the Secretary-General to pursue all appropriate contacts, in liaison with the Tripartite Committee, in order to ensure observance of the ceasefire.

At the meeting of the Security Council held at the level of Heads of State and Government, held on 31 January 1992 to consider the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, several Council members touched on the role of the Secretary-General under Article 99. They encouraged him to use his initiative to draw potential conflicts to the attention of the Council as part of a more active role he might usefully play in preventive diplomacy.¹²⁵ In a presidential statement adopted at the conclusion of the summit, the members of the Council invited the Secretary-General to prepare an analysis and recommendations on strengthening the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping.¹²⁶ In that context, he was asked to consider how greater use might be made of his good offices, and of his other functions under the Charter.

In his report of 17 June 1992 entitled “An agenda for peace”,¹²⁷ pursuant to the presidential statement of 31 January 1992 (S/23500), the Secretary-General stressed that preventive diplomacy required timely and accurate knowledge of the facts. An increased resort to fact-finding was needed, he said, initiated either by the Secretary-General — to enable him to meet his responsibilities under the Charter, including Article 99 — or by the Security Council or the General Assembly. He made a number of proposals in that regard on enhancing informal and formal fact-finding.

In a presidential statement adopted on 30 November 1992, in connection with their examination of the Secretary-General’s report, the members of the Council welcomed and supported the proposals on fact-finding in paragraph 25 of the report. They were of the view that “an increased resort to fact-finding as a tool of preventive diplomacy ... [could] result in the best possible understanding of the objective facts of the situation which [would] enable the Secretary-General to meet his responsibilities under Article 99 of the Charter and facilitate the Security Council’s deliberations”. In the same presidential statement, the members of the Council “welcome[d] the Secretary-General’s readiness to make full use of his powers under Article 99 of the Charter to draw the attention of the Security Council to any matter which in his opinion m[ight] threaten international peace and security”.

Part VI

Relations with the Military Staff Committee

Note

The Military Staff Committee, established pursuant to Article 47 of the Charter, is composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members or their representatives. Its function is “to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council’s military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament”.¹²⁸

During the period under review, the Military Staff Committee met every other week in closed session and remained prepared to carry out the functions assigned to it under Article 47.¹²⁹ In mid-1990, the Security Council adopted a resolution by which it contemplated a potential role for the Military Staff Committee in coordinating a naval interdiction authorized in the case of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. There was some discussion by Council members of the role of the Committee in the debate before and after the vote on the resolution in question. This practice is considered in case 16 below. The Committee’s role was also referred to in various contexts at the Council’s summit meeting on the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security. This is dealt with in case 17.

Situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, the Security Council authorized those Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait which were deploying maritime forces to the area to interdict maritime shipping in order to ensure compliance with the economic sanctions against Iraq and occupied Kuwait imposed by resolution 661 (1990). In paragraph 4 of resolution 665 (1990), the Council requested the States concerned “to coordinate their actions in pursuit of the above ... using, as appropriate, mechanisms of the Military Staff Committee”. The resolution was adopted by 13 votes to none, with two abstentions (Cuba and Yemen).

A number of Council members referred to the Military Staff Committee in statements made before or after the vote leading to the adoption of resolution 665 (1990). Some expressed concern that its exact role had not been made clear in the resolution. The representative of Cuba contended that the draft resolution violated several provisions of the Charter relating to the use of force, including Articles 46 and 47 (1). In his view, if the Council were really acting responsibly and seriously when it talked of using military force, then it should have drawn on those articles of Chapter VII that clearly spelled out how that responsibility and authority should be exercised. He noted, for example, that under Article 46, “Plans for the application of armed forces shall be made by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee”. Although there was a reference to the Military Staff Committee in paragraph 4 of the draft resolution, as far as he was aware, it had not been convened either formally or informally “to draw up any plan for the deployment of any forces in any part of the world”. Article 47, moreover, in specifying the functions of that Committee, provided, inter alia, that it should assist the Security Council in the “employment and command of forces placed at its disposal”. It was impossible, however, to find those criteria or requirements in the draft resolution before the Council.¹³⁰ The representative of Colombia noted that, in adopting the resolution, the Council would be establishing a naval blockade and that it would be acting pursuant to Article 42 even if the resolution did not say so. Although that did not cause him concern,

See also Articles 45 and 46, elaborating on the Military Staff Committee’s role in assisting the Security Council, respectively, in determining the readiness of national air force contingents made available for combined international enforcement action; and in making plans for the application of armed force. The Committee’s task in assisting the Council in formulating plans for the regulation of armaments is addressed in Article 26.

other points of the draft resolution did, namely, the failure to specify to whom the Council was delegating authority, and the apparent lack of accountability for the exercise of the delegated powers. Looking to the future, he believed that the Council must be prepared to deal with situations of the kind under consideration so that it would not find itself faced with a fait accompli. To that end, his country believed that, “after 45 years, the Security Council must finally implement Article 43 — and, of course, the following articles — of the Charter”.¹³¹

Other Council members, speaking after the vote, indicated their readiness to consider a role for the Military Staff Committee in coordinating the naval interdiction. The representative of the United States stated in this regard: “In accordance with its responsibilities under this resolution and at the request of the legitimate Government of Kuwait, the Government of the United States will coordinate its actions with those of the many other nations that have sent naval forces to the region. ... We are also ready to discuss an appropriate role in this process for the Military Staff Committee.”¹³² The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated: “Our unambiguous support for the resolutions of the Security Council reflects the Soviet Union’s intention to act exclusively within the framework of collective efforts to settle this crisis. ... It is also important that the Security Council should continue to concern itself on an ongoing basis with this extremely grave problem. We are prepared to make full use of the opportunities offered by the machinery of the Military Staff Committee.”¹³³

Later in the year, in the discussion preceding the adoption by the Council of resolution 678 (1990), authorizing the use of “all necessary means” to ensure Iraq’s compliance with its previous resolutions,¹³⁴ the representative of Iraq argued that the draft resolution was unlawful. He contended that the Security Council could act collectively under Article 42 and could use force to implement sanctions only in accordance with a mechanism provided for in Article 43. He added: “In other words ... only collective action under the command and control of the Security Council, in coordination with the Military Staff Committee, can lead to the use of force against any country”.¹³⁵ This view seems to have found support among two Council members.¹³⁶

Summit meeting on the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

At the Council’s 3046th meeting, held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 in connection with the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”, two Council members alluded briefly to the role of the Military Staff Committee.

The President of France did so while making a proposal aimed at ensuring the greater effectiveness of peacekeeping operations. He stated that France was ready to make available to the Secretary-General a stand-by contingent for peacekeeping operations. He added that “such deployments would involve activity by the Military Staff Committee, as provided for in the Charter”.¹³⁷ The Minister for Foreign Affairs and Personal Emissary of the President of Zimbabwe addressed the role of the Military Staff Committee in future collective enforcement actions and in relation to multilateral disarmament. In relation to the first point, he expressed the view that, in order to avoid the misgivings expressed by some regarding the prosecution of the Gulf War, future collective enforcement operations must be fully accountable to the Security Council and should be truly representative. That could be achieved “by ¹³³ Ibid., pp. 41 and 43. At an earlier meeting in relation to the same item, the representative of the USSR expressed his delegation’s readiness “to undertake consultations immediately in the Military Staff Committee, which, under the Charter of the United Nations, can perform very important functions” (S/PV.2934, p. 12).

strengthening Article 46 of the Charter, which gives a role to the Military Staff Committee". He added, however, that if the Military Staff Committee were to be given such an important role, its membership could not remain limited to only a few members of the Council. He stated: "Non-permanent members should also participate in all the work of the Committee. This would ensure that collective enforcement actions are not dominated by a single group of countries". On the question of disarmament, the Foreign Minister stated that, in tandem with the Arms Transfer Register, multilateral disarmament could further be boosted by the use of the provisions of Article 26 and of Article 47 (1), of the Charter, which empowered the Security Council, with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee, to put in place a system for the regulation of armaments. He contended that those provisions, which had been dormant since the founding of the Organization, would have rendered unnecessary the ad hoc creation by resolution 687 (1991) of the Special Commission dealing with the disarmament measures imposed on Iraq. In his view, an opportunity still existed to utilize them in implementing the disarmament measures for the wider Middle East region provided for in that resolution.¹³⁸

Pursuant to the presidential statement¹³⁹ adopted at the conclusion of the summit meeting, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council on 17 June 1992 a report entitled "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping".¹⁴⁰ In connection with "peacemaking", he expressed the view that the detailed approach governing the use of military force in Chapter VII of the Charter merited the attention of Member States. The special agreements foreseen in Article 43, in accordance with which Member States undertake to make available to the Security Council, on its call, armed forces, assistance and facilities, should be brought into being. He recommended, in that regard, "that the Security Council initiate negotiations in accordance with Article 43, supported by the Military Staff Committee, which may be augmented if necessary by others in accordance with Article 47, paragraph 2". He added that, in his view, "the role of the Military Staff Committee should be seen in the context of Chapter VII and not that of the planning or conduct of peacekeeping operations".¹⁴¹ These suggestions were not referred to by the Council in the series of presidential statements adopted following its consideration of the Secretary-General's report.¹⁴²

Introductory note

The present chapter follows generally the format adopted for previous Supplements.

Part I sets forth the applications for admission considered and the decisions taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly during the period under review. A new comprehensive table, similar to the table of applications included in the first volume of the Repertoire, shows the chain of proceedings from the submission of the applications to the decisions taken thereon by the General Assembly.

Parts II to V concern the procedures employed by the Council in the consideration of the applications. The part entitled “Consideration of the adoption or amendment of rules 58 to 60 of the provisional rules of procedure” contained in previous Supplements has been omitted as there was no material for inclusion.

Part VI deals with practices relating to the applicability of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter.

During the period under review, the Council recommended the admission of 22 States to membership in the United Nations.

The issue of the applications submitted by the Republic of Korea and the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea, which had been pending since 1949, was finally resolved when the Council recommended unanimously,¹ and the General Assembly decided,² to admit the two countries to membership in the United Nations.

In three instances, the discussion involved the applications of newly independent States emerging from decolonization: the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia and the Republic of Namibia.

On two occasions, the Council was informed of the merger of two separate Member States in a single sovereign State, with unitary membership in the United Nations. In the first instance, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Yemen Arab Republic and the People’s Democratic Republic of Yemen informed the Secretary-General by a letter dated 19 May 1990 that their countries would merge in a single sovereign State called the Republic of Yemen on 22 May 1990. The Republic of Yemen would have single membership in the United Nations. At the request of the two Ministers for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary-General communicated the letter to all States Members of the United Nations, to all the principal organs of the United Nations and any other organs of the Organization on which either one of the two former countries was represented, and to all the specialized agencies and related organizations by a note verbale dated 21 May 1990.³ In the other instance, the Prime Minister of the German Democratic Republic informed the Secretary-General by a letter dated 27 September 1990 of the accession of his country, as from 3 October 1990, to the scope of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany so as to unite Germany in a single State. He added that it would consequently be for the united Germany thereafter as a member of the United Nations to remain committed to the provisions of the Charter in accordance with the declarations made by the two German States on 12 June 1973. As before, the Secretary-General circulated the letter in a note verbale, dated 28 September 1990.⁴ The Security Council took no action in these cases.

Conversely, the Council had to deal with the emergence of new States as a result of the dissolution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia.

With respect to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Council recommended the admission, as sovereign States, of 12 of the 15 former constituent republics. Two were already members of the Organization.⁵ The Russian Federation did not apply for membership. By a letter dated 24 December 1991,⁶ the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics transmitted to the Secretary-General a letter of the same date by which the President of the Russian Federation informed the Secretary-General that the membership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Nations, including the Security Council and all other organs and organizations of the United Nations system, was being continued by the Russian Federation, with the support of the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States. The President of the Russian Federation requested that the name “Russian Federation” be used in the United Nations, in place of the name “Union of Soviet Socialist Republics”. He affirmed that the Russian Federation maintained full responsibility for all the rights and obligations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under the Charter of the United Nations, including the financial obligations. The Secretary-General informed the President of the General Assembly and the President of the Security Council of these letters and steps were taken to inform all organs and organizations of the United Nations system. The position of the Russian Federation was not challenged.

In the case of the former Yugoslavia, the Security Council recommended the admission as sovereign States of three of the six former constituent republics. The status of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) remained unresolved at the end of 1992. With respect to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Council considered that it could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. It recommended to the General Assembly “that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly”.⁷ The General Assembly so decided.⁸ The Council’s recommendation and the General Assembly’s decision were seen as falling under neither Article 5 nor Article 6 of the Charter (case in part VI below).

As for Czechoslovakia, by a letter dated 10 December 1992,⁹ the representative of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic informed the Secretary-General of the dissolution of his country as from 31 December 1992. The successor States of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, namely, the Czech Republic and

Applications for admission to membership in the United Nations and action taken thereon by the Security Council and the General Assembly, 1989-1992

Note

As in the previous volumes of the Repertoire, part I provides information on the applications before the Security Council during the period under review and the decisions taken thereon by the Council and the General Assembly. Section A (Applications recommended by the Security Council), section B (Discussion of the question in the Security Council) and section C (Applications pending on 1 January 1989) have been maintained. The section entitled "Applications that failed to obtain a recommendation" contained in previous Supplements has been omitted as there was no material for inclusion.

The new table in section D includes additional information on the dates of circulation of the applications, as distinct from their dates of submission, the meetings at which the applications were first considered by the Council and their referral to the Committee on the Admission of New Members, the meetings, reports and recommendations of the Committee, and the presidential statements adopted by the Council in addition to its resolutions.

A new section E has also been added showing applications pending at the end of the period under review.

B. Discussion of the question in the Security Council

The Council held 38 meetings to consider applications for admission during the four-year period 1989-1992.¹⁰ At a separate meeting,¹¹ the question of the membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) was discussed, since its claim to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had not been generally accepted (see case in part VI).

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia	S/25147 ^a 30.7.92 22.1.93

E. Applications pending on 31 December 1992

Action was taken by the Security Council on all applications circulated during the period under review. The application of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, dated 30 July 1992, was circulated after the end of the period under review in a note of the Secretary-General dated 22 January 1993.¹⁴ No application was submitted by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), which claimed to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (see case in part VI).

Part II Presentation of applications

Note

Material concerning the presentation of applications — that is, the submission of applications to the Secretary-General, their communication to representatives on the Security Council and their subsequent inclusion in the provisional agenda of the Council — may be found in the table of applications in section D of part I above. It should be noted that the applications of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Republic of Korea, which had been pending since 1949, were resubmitted on 2 July and 19 July 1991, respectively. The application of the Republic of Croatia, contained in a letter dated 11 February 1992, was circulated by the Secretary-General on 7 May 1992. The case of the application submitted by the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia on 30 July 1992, and circulated in a note by the Secretary-General dated 22 January 1993, will be dealt with in the next Supplement.

Part III Referral of applications to the Committee on the Admission of New Members

Note

During the period under review, all applications were referred by the President of the Security Council to the Committee on the Admission of New Members. There were no proposals to waive the application of rule 59 of the provisional rules of procedure.¹⁵ On one occasion, the Council adopted a proposal¹⁶ to waive the time limit provided for in the last sentence of rule 59.¹⁷ On 16 occasions,¹⁸ upon the

¹⁷ The sentence reads: “The Committee shall examine any application referred to it and report its conclusions thereon to the Council not less than thirty-five days in advance on a regular session of the General Assembly or, if a special session of the General Assembly is called, not less than fourteen days in advance of such session.”

Part IV

Procedures in the consideration of applications within the Security Council

Note

The practice of deciding upon applications in the chronological order of their receipt was not strictly observed. The application for membership of Azerbaijan, received on 14 January 1992, was recommended after the applications of Tajikistan, the Republic of Moldova and Turkmenistan, dated 16, 17 and 20 January 1992, respectively. The application of Croatia, received on 11 February 1992, was recommended after that of San Marino, dated 19 February 1992. The application of Georgia, received on 6 May 1992, was recommended after that of Bosnia and Herzegovina, received on 8 May 1992.²⁰

The Council decided upon all applications separately with the exception of the applications of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Republic of Korea, which were recommended by a single resolution, as proposed by the Committee on the Admission of New Members.

In one instance, the Committee examined jointly the applications of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, but recommended in its report the adoption of three separate draft resolutions. The Council adopted the three resolutions at one meeting.²¹

In all but two instances, the Council adopted the draft resolutions submitted by the Committee on the Admission of New Members, without a vote, "in accordance with the understanding reached in prior consultations among members of the Council". Following the vote, the President of the Council made a statement on behalf of the members of the Council. The two exceptional cases were those of Liechtenstein and Namibia. In those instances, the draft resolutions submitted by the Committee were put to the vote and adopted unanimously. Statements were made following the voting by members of the Council and, in the case of Namibia, by other Member States and the Secretary-General.

¹⁹ The fourth and fifth paragraphs of rule 60 read:

"In order to ensure the consideration of its recommendation at the next session of the General Assembly following the receipt of the application, the Security Council shall make its recommendation not less than twenty-five days in advance of a regular session of the General Assembly, nor less than four days in advance of a special session.

"In special circumstances, the Security Council may decide to make a recommendation to the General Assembly concerning an application for membership subsequent to the expiration of the time limits set forth in the preceding paragraph."

Roles of the General Assembly and the Security Council

Note

The roles of the General Assembly and the Security Council were considered at the 3116th meeting, on 19 September 1992, when the issue of the membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was discussed (case in part VI). It is also worth noting that the Council requested, as recommended by the Committee on the Admission of New Members in its report on the application of Namibia, the inclusion of an item entitled “Admission of new Members to the United Nations” in the supplementary list of items for the agenda of the eighteenth special session of the General Assembly.²²

Part VI

Practices relative to the applicability of Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not take or consider any measures involving Articles 5 or 6 of the Charter, concerning, respectively, suspension and expulsion. However, in the deliberations of the Council on the question of the membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter were explicitly invoked, as shown in the case history below.

Case

Membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

At its 3116th meeting, on 19 September 1992, the Council considered the item entitled “Draft resolution contained in document S/24570”. By the draft resolution,²³ the Security Council would consider that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, and would therefore recommend to the General Assembly “that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly”.

During the deliberations in the Council, a constitutional discussion arose over the conformity of the draft resolution with the provisions of the Charter relating to membership. On the one hand, it was maintained that the proposed recommendation did not conform to either Article 5 or Article 6 of the Charter. While the Council was competent to recommend suspension or expulsion of a State, it had no authority to recommend to the General Assembly that a country’s participation in the Assembly be withdrawn or suspended. That authority belonged to the General Assembly, which did not need any recommendation to that effect from the Security Council. Indeed, the General Assembly was under no legal obligation to act on any such recommendation. It was also noted that the question of succession had never been raised in the Council and that nowhere in the Charter was the resolution of succession matters stipulated as a condition for membership in the United Nations. Indeed, such matters had been considered in the past as extraneous to the question of membership. It was further maintained that the continuation of the membership of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should be settled through consultations and negotiations between all parties of the former Yugoslavia.²⁴ On the other hand, it was noted that the situation was unprecedented, in that the United Nations had never before faced the dissolution of one of its Members without agreement by the successor States on the status of the original United Nations seat. It was also contended that the resolution respected the apportioning of competence established by the Charter between the Security Council and the General Assembly.²⁵

On the question of the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, it was noted that the prevailing view in the international community was that none of the republics that had emerged in the place of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could claim automatic membership in the United Nations. It was also stated that none of the former republics of the former Yugoslavia was so clearly a predominant portion of the original State as to be entitled to be treated as a continuation of that State. It was further maintained that there was no legal basis for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's automatic continuation of the legal existence of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. It was therefore held that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's claim to the seat of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations could not be accepted and that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should apply for membership in the United Nations.²⁶

With respect to the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, it was contended that the decision of the Council had to be strictly interpreted, since it did not provide for the expulsion of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from the United Nations. It was emphasized, in particular, that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's participation in the work of United Nations organs other than the General Assembly, as well as the functioning of its mission and the issuance of documents to it or from it, would not be affected. It was also noted that the nameplate "Yugoslavia" would be kept in the General Assembly Hall and the rooms in which the Assembly's organs met.²⁷ The view was, however, expressed that "Serbia and Montenegro ... must apply for membership if it wishes to participate in the United Nations" and that "other bodies in the United Nations system should be guided by this action of the Security Council and the General Assembly on this matter".²⁸

Regarding the admission of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to membership in the United Nations, it was maintained that "Serbia and Montenegro, like any other new State, ... should be held to the criteria in the United Nations Charter ... [that] require that the applicant be both willing and able to fulfil United Nations obligations, including compliance with Chapter VII Security Council resolutions".²⁹ It was also stated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's application for membership "should be studied and decided upon in accordance with the same criteria which prevailed in the discussion of the admission to the United Nations of all the other successor States of the former Yugoslav Federation".³⁰ It was further asserted that the principles set out in Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter "should be uniformly applied in the quest for universality that the founding fathers of the United Nations had in mind when they formulated these provisions".³¹

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was adopted as resolution 777 (1992) by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.³² The resolution reads as follows:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Considering that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist, Recalling in particular its resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992 in which it noted that "the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations has not been generally accepted",

2. Decides to consider the matter again before the end of the main part of the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly.

By a letter dated 19 September 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³³ the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia transmitted the text of a statement that, to his regret, he had not been able to deliver at the 3116th meeting of the Council. In his statement, he contended that the suspension of his country's participation in the work of the General Assembly threatened the principle of universality of the Organization, its democratic character and its role as guardian of world peace and forum for equal cooperation between States and peoples. Moreover, he argued that the positions put forward in the Council's recommendation denied the sovereign right of the peoples of a country to preserve their own State and its international and legal personality in case of secession of part of that country.

In a note dated 28 September 1992,³⁴ the Secretary-General indicated that, on 22 September 1992, the General Assembly had adopted a resolution entitled "Recommendation of the Security Council of 19 September 1992".³⁵ He cited the operative paragraphs of the resolution, in which the General Assembly considered that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations; and therefore decided that it "should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly"; and took note of the intention of the Security Council to consider the matter again before the end of the main part of the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly.

Following the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 47/1, the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General a joint letter dated 25 September 1992.³⁶ In that letter, they noted that Security Council resolution 777 (1992) clearly stated that the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had "ceased to exist"; thus, it was not a member of the United Nations anymore". They observed that, at the same time, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was clearly not yet a member, since it had to apply for membership. They further maintained that the flag flying in front of the United Nations and the nameplate bearing the name "Yugoslavia" did not represent anything or anybody anymore. Consequently, they requested the Secretary-General to provide a legal explanatory statement concerning the decision to keep the flag and nameplate of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on United Nations premises.

By a letter dated 28 September 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁷ the Federal Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia considered that the interpretation of the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly contained in the above-mentioned joint letter was contrary to the provisions of the said resolutions and to the general thrust prevailing at the time of their adoption.

By a letter dated 29 September 1992,³⁸ the Legal Counsel responded to the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. He stated that General Assembly resolution 47/1 dealt with a membership issue which was not foreseen in the Charter, "namely the consequences for purposes of membership in the United Nations of the disintegration of a Member State on which there was no agreement among the immediate successors of that State or among the membership of the Organization at large". As a result, resolution 47/1 had not been adopted pursuant to Article 5 (suspension) or Article 6 (expulsion) of the Charter, nor did it refer to those Articles or the criteria they contained. The Legal Counsel pointed out that the only practical conclusion drawn by the resolution from the fact that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations was that it "shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly". Its representatives, therefore, could no longer "participate in the work of the General Assembly, its subsidiary organs, nor conferences and meetings convened by it". He noted, on the other hand, that the resolution neither terminated nor suspended "Yugoslavia's membership in the Organization". Consequently, the seat and nameplate remained as before, but the representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) could not sit behind the sign "Yugoslavia" in Assembly bodies; Yugoslav missions might continue to function and receive and circulate documents; the Secretariat would continue to fly the flag of the old Yugoslavia at Headquarters; and the resolution had not taken away "the right of Yugoslavia to participate in the work of organs other than Assembly bodies". The Legal Counsel concluded that the admission to the United Nations of a new Yugoslavia under Article 4 of the Charter would terminate the situation created by General Assembly resolution 47/1.

By a letter dated 9 December 1992,³⁹ the President of the Security Council informed the President of the General Assembly that the members of the Council had agreed to keep the subject matter of resolution 777 (1992) under continuous review and to consider it again at a later date.

Introductory note

Chapter VIII indicates the chain of proceedings on the substance of each of the questions included in the report of the Security Council to the General Assembly under the heading “Questions considered by the Security Council under its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security”.¹ The range of questions covers broadly those that may be deemed to fall under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter. Ancillary material from the provisional verbatim records bearing on relevant Articles of the Charter is presented in chapters X to XII.

As an outline of the proceedings of the Council in respect of the questions included in its agenda, chapter VIII constitutes a framework within which the ancillary legal and constitutional discussion recorded in chapters X to XII may be considered. The chapter is therefore an aid to the examination of the deliberations of the Council expressly related to the provisions of the Charter within the context of the chain of proceedings on the agenda item.

The questions are dealt with by region, for ease of reference. There is also a category of general issues.²

The framework of the material for each question is provided by the succession of decisions within the purview of this chapter. Decisions relating to the subject-matter of chapters I to VI of the Repertoire are, with certain exceptions, omitted as not relevant to the purpose of this chapter or of the ancillary chapters X to XII. The decisions are recorded in a uniform manner. Affirmative decisions are included under a heading indicative of the form of the decision: a resolution, presidential statement or letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General. Negative decisions are entered under a heading indicative of the origin of the proposal or draft resolution. Affirmative decisions have been reproduced in full as constitutive of the practice of the Council, while negative decisions are indicated in summarized form. Where the negative decision relates to a draft resolution in connection with which discussion has taken place concerning the application of the Charter, the text of the relevant parts of the draft resolution will in most instances be found in chapters X to XII.

¹ The chapter does not, however, cover informal consultations among the members of the Security Council at which some of these questions may have been discussed. Such consultations are not meetings of the Council.

² As indicated in the editorial note at the beginning of this volume, the questions included in the agenda of the Council during the years 1989 to 1992 appear under conventional short titles. In those instances where the case history pertains to a new question brought before the Council, the section bears the heading “Initial proceedings”.

1. Items relating to the situation in Angola

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 17 May 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Angola to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General

Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission

Decision of 30 May 1991 (2991st meeting): resolution 696 (1991)

By a letter dated 17 May 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ the representative of Angola transmitted a letter dated 8 May from the Minister for External Relations of Angola to the Secretary-General, enclosing the texts of the Peace Accords for Angola concluded by the Government of the People's Republic of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA). The Accords were initialled at Estoril, Portugal, on 1 May 1991 by the respective heads of delegation, and signed on 31 May 1991. The Minister requested the Secretary-General to take action to ensure the participation of the United Nations in verifying the implementation of the Peace Accords, as agreed by both sides, and accordingly to inform the Security Council of the need to prolong the presence in the country of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM) until the general elections scheduled for September and November 1992 had been held. He noted that, although the Peace Accords would come into force only after their formal signature at the end of May 1991, a de facto suspension of hostilities was to take effect as of 15 May 1991, on which date the verification mechanisms should be started.

On 20 May 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on

UNAVEM,² in which he considered how the Council might wish to respond to the request from the Government of Angola, which, if accepted, would entail the enlargement and extension of the Mission's mandate. The verification tasks earmarked for the United Nations from the Peace Accords would include (a) verification of the monitoring of the ceasefire by the Angolan parties; and (b) participation in the monitoring of the Angolan police during the ceasefire period. The Secretary-General observed that it was a matter of great satisfaction that an end was at last in sight to the cruel war that had ravaged Angola for too long. Now that the two sides had confirmed their acceptance of the Accords, it was of the greatest importance that all hostilities cease and that the de facto ceasefire should be observed. He added that the concepts set out in the Ceasefire Agreement for the monitoring and verification of the ceasefire seemed to be sound, provided that the two sides adhered scrupulously to their commitments under the Accords and that their representatives worked together in a new spirit of cooperation and national reconciliation. By entrusting the main tasks to the parties themselves, the arrangements proposed would have the advantage of reducing the costs to the international community at a time when there was an ever-growing demand for funds for peacekeeping. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the Council take the earliest possible decision to enlarge and prolong the mandate of UNAVEM in order to enable it to carry out the new verification tasks arising from the Peace Accords. He proposed further that the Mission's new mandate should commence from the date on which the ceasefire was to enter into force (31 May 1991) and end on the day following the completion of presidential and legislative elections in Angola, which were to be held between 1 September and 30 November 1992.

At its 2991st meeting, held on 30 May 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the letter from the representative of Angola and the Secretary-General's report of 20 May. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) also drew the attention of the members of the Council to two letters addressed to the Secretary-General: a letter dated 17 May 1991 from the representative of Portugal;³ and a letter dated 24 May 1991 from the representatives of Angola and Cuba.⁴ By his letter of 17 May, the representative of Portugal transmitted the joint communiqué of a meeting held in Lisbon on 15 and 16 May between the representatives of the Government of Angola and of UNITA, in the presence of the Portuguese mediators and observers from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States, which recorded, inter alia, that the question of the participation of the United Nations in the observance of the ceasefire had been discussed and that the delegations had agreed to request the Security Council for its support of the process. By their letter of 24 May, the representatives of Angola and Cuba transmitted a joint declaration, issued on 23 May by their respective Governments, concerning the completion on 25 May, ahead of schedule, of the withdrawal of the Cuban "internationalist troops" from Angola. The President of the Council also drew members' attention to a draft resolution⁵ that had been prepared in the course of prior consultations.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 696 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the decision of the Government of the People's Republic of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola to conclude the Peace Accords for Angola,

Stressing the importance it attaches to the signing of the Peace Accords and to the fulfilment by the parties in good faith of the obligations contained therein,

Stressing also the importance of all States refraining from taking any actions which could undermine the agreements mentioned above and contributing to their implementation, as well as respecting fully the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola,

Noting with satisfaction the decision taken by the Government of the People's Republic of Angola and the Government of the Republic of Cuba to complete the withdrawal, ahead of schedule, of all Cuban troops from Angola by 25 May 1991,

Considering the request submitted to the Secretary-General by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of Angola in his letter dated 8 May 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 20 and 29 May 1991,

Taking into account that the mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission established by Council resolution 626 (1988) of 20 December 1988 expires on 22 July 1991,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 20 and 29 May 1991 and the recommendations therein;

2. Decides accordingly to entrust a new mandate to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (henceforth United Nations Angola Verification Mission II) as proposed by the Secretary-General in line with the Peace Accords for Angola, and requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to this effect;

3. Also decides to establish the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a period of seventeen months from the date of adoption of the present resolution in order to accomplish the objectives stated in the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council immediately after the signature of the Peace Accords and to keep the Council fully informed of further developments.

On 4 June 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his report in pursuance of resolution 696 (1991).⁶ He stated that he had been present at the ceremony at which the Peace Accords were signed on 31 May and had immediately taken steps to implement the new mandate entrusted to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (henceforth UNAVEM II).⁷

On 6 June 1991, the Secretary-General, pursuant to resolution 626 (1988), submitted to the Security Council a report on the last phase of UNAVEM operations.⁸ He reported that UNAVEM had successfully carried out its mandate ahead of schedule, following the completion on 25 May 1991 of the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola. The Mission's original mandate, set out by the Council in resolution 626 (1988), included verification of the redeployment to the north and the staged and total withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola by 1 July 1991, under a timetable agreed to by Angola and Cuba in December 1988.

B. Further reports of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II

Decision of 24 March 1992 (3062nd meeting): resolution 747 (1992)

On 31 October 1991, pursuant to resolution 696 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of United Nations Angola Verification Mission II (UNAVEM II) during its first five months of operation, beginning on 31 May 1991 when the ceasefire entered into force, and ending on 25 October.⁹ He stated that the ceasefire had, in general, been well respected by both sides, providing a sound basis for implementation of the other provisions of the Peace Accords. The two sides had been less successful, however, in complying with those provisions of the Accords that dealt with the confinement of troops to assembly areas. With regard to the forthcoming elections, the Secretary-General had expressed to both sides his view that, at least as a first step, the United Nations should be invited to provide technical assistance to those who would be responsible for planning and conducting the elections, particularly as Angola would be holding its first democratic elections. Regarding a possible role for the United Nations in observing the elections, that was a formidable prospect, given the devastated condition of the country and the almost total lack of the infrastructure that would be necessary to support electoral observers. Although no decision had yet been taken by the Angolan authorities to request the United Nations to provide either technical assistance or electoral observers, there were strong indications of a growing consensus in the country that the United Nations should be involved. It had been explained to the Angolan authorities that the provision of election observers would require a further decision of the Security Council and that, given the extreme complexities of such an operation, it was important that any request for United Nations involvement should be received as quickly as possible, so that appropriate recommendations could be made.

On 3 March 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on UNAVEM II.¹⁰ He recalled that his predecessor had informed members of the Council of the requests he had received from the Minister for External Relations of Angola in two letters dated 8 November 1991: for United Nations technical assistance to help prepare for and conduct the elections scheduled for September 1992; and for United Nations observers to follow the electoral procedure until its completion. The Secretary-General stated that he had already initiated the early provision of technical assistance on electoral matters to Angola. With regard to United Nations observation of the elections, he recalled that, during informal consultations on 20 December, his predecessor had stated that the following points were particularly relevant to the Angolan request: (a) the request clearly pertained to a situation with an international dimension with which the Council had been seized since it established UNAVEM II to monitor the ceasefire arrangements agreed to in the Peace Accords; (b) the conduct of internationally supervised elections constituted the central element in the implementation of the Peace Accords; (c) in order to verify the fairness and impartiality of the elections, the monitoring should cover the entire electoral process, including voter registration; (d) the introduction of a United Nations presence in the electoral process had been officially requested by the Government of Angola at an important point in the peace process; and (e) there was broad public support in Angola for the United Nations to assume such a role. Bearing those points in mind, his predecessor had informed the Council of his intention to recommend that it authorize a mission to observe the elections in Angola, on the basis of the views of a preliminary survey team which he proposed to send first to the country. The Secretary-General recalled further that he had subsequently informed the Council of his decision to appoint a Special Representative for Angola who would be in charge of all current and projected activities of the United Nations in connection with the Angola Peace Accords and would also be Chief of UNAVEM II; as well as of his intention to recommend that UNAVEM II be enlarged to include an electoral division.¹¹

The Secretary-General outlined the proposed terms of reference¹² and an operational plan for United Nations observation of the elections and the enlargement of UNAVEM II, underlining the need for the electoral mission to have the explicit agreement of the two parties to the Peace Accords.¹³ He observed that, although much had been achieved in implementing the peace process, much remained to be done to ensure that the gains were followed through to completion. The timetable for implementation of the Accords could not be delayed further. All Angolan parties and forces had to join in making renewed commitments to realistic timetables until the goal of free and fair elections in September 1992 was achieved. To ensure the success of the electoral process, the Secretary-General called for the demobilization of troops, the establishment of a unified civilian police force and the formation of joint military police units within the new national army, and an extension of the Government's administration and the restoration of security throughout the country. He emphasized that the Angolan elections were essentially a national, sovereign affair: the role of the United Nations was to observe and verify the elections, not to organize them. Within the limits of its mandate and resources, however, the United Nations should make every possible effort to assist the process. He accordingly recommended that the mandate, strength and composition of UNAVEM II be enlarged in the manner described in his report.

At its 3062nd meeting, held on 24 March 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report of 3 March in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola and Portugal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Venezuela) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution¹⁴ that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations, and to a minor revision to operative paragraph 8 of the provisional version of the draft resolution.

The representative of Angola welcomed the draft resolution as another "very important landmark" in the process of peace and democratization of Angola, since it would guarantee the presence of international observers in his country's electoral process. He also reaffirmed his Government's commitment to implement the Peace Accords.¹⁵

The representative of Cape Verde believed that the decision to enlarge the mandate of UNAVEM II was an important one, as it would confer upon the electoral process the international credibility that would further contribute to the creation of a climate of confidence and stability in Angola.¹⁶

The representative of Portugal observed that the signing of the Peace Accords on 31 May 1991 marked the beginning of a new era for Angola, with the leaders of the parties involved in the conflict that had devastated Angola for more than 15 years now committing themselves to working together for a period that would end with the holding of free elections. In that regard, the role of the United Nations in observing and verifying the elections was essential.¹⁷

Speaking before the vote, several Council members welcomed the broadening of the mandate of UNAVEM II to include electoral monitoring, observing that the United Nations had an important role to play in that process. They called on the Angolan parties to comply with the Peace Accords and to ensure that free and fair elections were held in September, as agreed.¹⁸

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 747 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 by which it decided to entrust a new mandate to the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II as proposed by the Secretary-General in line with the Peace Accords for Angola,

Decision of 20 May 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 14 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁹ the Secretary-General reported that his Special Representative had informed him that noticeable progress had been made with regard to the police monitoring arrangements envisaged by the Peace Accords. Three joint (Government and UNITA) police monitoring groups, to be verified by UNAVEM police observers, had been established in each of 18 Angolan provinces. His Special Representative had concluded that it was necessary to expand the Mission's police strength in each province from four police officers to six; she also believed it to be important to expand the tasks assigned to the Mission's police contingent, to include a role in the Mission's electoral tasks through the monitoring of rallies during the election campaign and observation of the registration process and polling stations at the time of the elections. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the police strength of UNAVEM II should be increased from 90 to 126 officers.

By a letter dated 20 May 1992,²⁰ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General as follows:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 14 May 1992 concerning the increase in the strength of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM) II has been brought to the attention of the members of the Council. They agree with your recommendation contained therein.

Decision of 7 July 1992 (3092nd meeting):
statement by the President

On 24 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report, pursuant to resolution 747 (1992), on the activities of UNAVEM II and the electoral process in Angola.²¹ He observed that the Angolans had achieved a great deal in implementing the peace process and that they were being actively assisted by the three observers — Portugal, the Russian Federation and the United States — as well as by the international community and UNAVEM II. Much work, however, needed to be done urgently by all the parties concerned, mainly the Government and UNITA, if they were to achieve the goal of free and fair multiparty elections on 29 and 30 September 1992. He remarked that the attention of the Angolan people and their leaders had increasingly turned towards the election process and away from the major unfinished tasks of the Peace Accords, such as confinement of troops and weapons, demobilization, and formation of the new armed forces and police. He stressed that the Government and UNITA must now make all possible progress on those vital tasks if the peace process was to succeed and endure. They must also work together to reduce and bring under control the current brinkmanship, since the political and security atmosphere throughout the country remained tense and could derail the peace process if not contained. Recalling that the United Nations was in Angola to observe and verify the peace process and the elections, not to organize them, he called on Angolans to maintain their political commitment and on donor countries to provide the promised assistance expeditiously.

At its 3092nd meeting, held on 7 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report of 24 June in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Cape Verde) stated that, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²²

The Council has considered carefully the further report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II of 24 June 1992, and notes the efforts of the Angolan parties to implement commitments agreed to in the Peace Accords for Angola. It commends the efforts of the Angolans to move their country towards free and fair multi-party elections on 29 and 30 September 1992 in accordance with the established timetable. There is no viable alternative to this. The Council calls on all interested parties to cooperate fully with the electoral process to ensure that elections are free and fair.

The Council re-emphasizes the observation of the Secretary-General in his report, that Angola being a sovereign and independent country, the organization and supervision of all tasks under the Accords is the responsibility of the Angolan parties themselves. Nevertheless, the Council, which has mandated United Nations observation and verification of the peace process, at the request of the Angolan parties, remains seriously concerned at some constraints holding back the process at the moment.

The maintenance of peace since May 1991, and the commitment by all parties to the electoral process, are encouraging. Nevertheless, the Council reaffirms the importance it attaches to the fulfilment by the parties in good faith of all obligations contained in the Accords. In this connection, it strongly appeals to the Government and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola to overcome rapidly the delays and inadequacies described in the report, and increase the momentum of progress on the issues of confinement of troops and weapons, demobilization and the formation of the new armed forces and police.

The Council also expresses its concern at the political and security situation in Angola, which requires the greatest restraint. Violent incidents, mutual accusations and hostile propaganda should be terminated and give way to tolerance, cooperation, and reconciliation. It is imperative to agree, without delay, on a brief and clear code of electoral conduct and to ensure that everybody is allowed freedom of movement and speech and the ability to register to vote without fear in all areas of the country. The Council calls on the Government and all parties to work closely with the Special Representative for Angola and all United Nations specialized agencies engaged in the electoral process to ensure that voter registration is conducted in accordance with established procedures and completed in a timely manner.

The Council calls on both parties to devote all available resources to preparations for the elections in order that their commitment to elections on 29 and 30 September 1992 may be met and welcomes with appreciation commitments by donor countries to provide all support for all vital tasks relating to the final three months of the peace process. Since the logistical difficulties are major constraints on the process, the Council strongly appeals to the Member States concerned to provide the promised assistance expeditiously and urges Member States as well as the United Nations agencies to display flexibility and pragmatism in this cooperation to ensure that a successful conclusion of the Angolan operation leads to stability and prosperity in Angola.

The Council calls on all parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the security and safety of Mission staff and property.

The Council will continue to keep the situation in Angola under close review and looks forward to a further report by the Secretary-General at the beginning of the electoral campaign.

Decision of 18 September 1992 (3115th meeting): statement by the President

On 9 September 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report, pursuant to the statement by the President of 7 July, on the activities of UNAVEM II and the electoral process in Angola.²³ He stated that the Angolans were to be congratulated for maintaining the ceasefire for 15 months, and for registering the great majority of the adult population to vote in the presidential and legislative elections on 29 and 30 September. However, he noted that both sides had failed to complete certain very important tasks provided for in the Peace Accords, including the demobilization of the remaining Government and UNITA troops, the collection and centralized storage of weapons, the formation of the new unified Angolan armed forces and the establishment of a neutral police force. These tasks were essential to the creation of conditions conducive to free and fair elections. The political and security situation throughout the country had, moreover, deteriorated significantly, with reports of intimidation and provocation by both Government and UNITA supporters. The Secretary-General considered it essential that all political parties pledge to respect the results of the elections, as verified by UNAVEM II. He appealed to the Government and UNITA to ensure that their supporters and the media under their control did not present inaccurate, distorted or inflammatory reports during the next few crucial weeks, and appealed to the President of Angola and the President of UNITA to continue honouring their commitments under the Peace Accords.

The Secretary-General reported further that doubts had recently been expressed in some provinces about the effectiveness and impartiality of UNAVEM II. Where his Special Representative for Angola had been able to obtain specific examples, they mainly reflected misunderstanding of the Mission's role and an overestimation of the United Nations capacity and mandate. He recalled that, according to the Peace Accords and the mandate of the Security Council, UNAVEM II was in Angola not to organize or implement the ceasefire and electoral arrangements, but to observe and verify the monitoring of their implementation by the Angolan parties themselves. While interpreting this mandate in the widest and most active manner, UNAVEM had constantly stressed that it could only work through the consultative mechanisms set up under the Peace Accords. The Secretary-General said that he had assured the President of UNITA, who had raised such concerns, that they would be thoroughly investigated and that he had the fullest confidence in his Special Representative.²⁴

Noting that the elections — the culminating point of the peace process — were not an end in themselves, but the springboard for a new era, the Secretary-General stated that concerns had been expressed, both by Angolans and by foreign observers, as to what would happen during the delicate period of transition after the elections. The Presidents of Angola and UNITA had both referred publicly to the possibility of UNAVEM being asked to remain for a limited period, and there were indications that the issue would be discussed further. When this possibility had been mentioned to his Special Representative, she had stressed that any such extension would require an official request by the Government of Angola, based on a consensus, and thereafter a decision by the Security Council; and that the mandate would need to be clearly defined and limited in both time and scope.

At its 3115th meeting, held on 18 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 9 September in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Ecuador) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁵

²⁴ Ibid., para. 9.

The Council has noted with appreciation the further report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II of 9 September 1992, which it has studied carefully.

It reaffirms the importance it attaches to the full implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola, culminating in free and fair multi-party elections on 29 and 30 September 1992. It congratulates the Angolans on their success in maintaining the ceasefire and in registering the great majority of the population to vote in the elections. It is convinced of the irreversibility of this process.

At the same time, the Council calls on the Angolan parties to take urgent and determined steps to complete certain essential measures. These include the demobilization of the remaining Government and National Union for the Total Independence of Angola troops, the collection and centralized storage of weapons, and the rapid completion of the formation of the new Angolan national armed forces. It is also essential that the police should operate as a neutral, national force.

The Council is also concerned at the recent deterioration of the political and security situation in Angola. It endorses the Secretary-General's appeal to President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi to exercise leadership at this critical juncture and to ensure that their followers act with restraint and tolerance. The Council is encouraged by the reports of positive decisions reached by the two leaders at their meeting on 7 September 1992 and urges them to implement these without delay. Of particular importance is their reported agreement in principle to the formation of a government of national reconciliation after the elections.

The Council calls upon the Angolan electoral authorities to ensure that all registered persons are given the opportunity to exercise their vote and to extend polling hours on the second day, if this should prove necessary. The Council also underlines the importance of adequate logistical planning and support and urges the donor community to move speedily to provide the remaining requirements identified in the Secretary-General's report.

The Council is concerned that doubts have recently been expressed in Angola about the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II's effectiveness and impartiality and welcomes the decision of the Secretary-General as expressed in paragraph 9 of his report to investigate thoroughly all matters raised in this regard. It expresses strong support for the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Angola and commends Mission personnel who are tackling their challenging tasks with courage, impartiality and dedication. It urges the Angolan parties to continue to cooperate closely with the United Nations and to take all necessary steps to ensure the security of United Nations personnel and property.

The Council takes note of a reported agreement between the Government and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola that the United Nations should be asked to extend the Mission's presence in Angola during the period of transition after the elections. It will be prepared to consider such a request if it is based on wide support in Angola and if it proposes for the Mission a mandate which is clearly defined in scope and time.

The Council will continue to keep the situation in Angola under close review and looks forward to a further report by the Secretary-General after the elections.

C. Oral report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II

Decision of 6 October 1992 (3120th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3120th meeting, held on 6 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda an oral report of the Secretary-General on UNAVEM II. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁶

The Council has followed closely the electoral process which took place in Angola on 29 and 30 September 1992 in accordance with resolution 696 (1991), which it adopted on 30 May 1991 following the Peace Accords for Angola. The Council is gratified that the presidential and parliamentary elections were held throughout the country in a calm atmosphere and with the participation of a large number of voters. It also wishes to express once again its full support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Angola and its gratitude for the outstanding efforts that she has made, together with all the personnel of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, to ensure the implementation of that resolution and in particular the smooth conduct of the electoral process.

The Council expresses its concern at the reports it has received, according to which one of the parties to the Accords is contesting the validity of the elections. It is also concerned that certain Generals belonging to the same party have announced their intention of withdrawing from the new Angolan armed forces.

The Council calls upon all the parties to respect the obligations they have assumed within the framework of the Accords, and in particular the obligation to respect the final election results. Any challenge must be settled through the mechanisms established for that purpose.

The Council has decided to send to Angola as quickly as possible an ad hoc commission, composed of members of the Council to support the implementation of the Accords, in close cooperation with the Special Representative. The membership of this Commission will be established in the near future following consultations among the members of the Council.

On 8 October 1992, the President of the Council issued a note in which he stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, the members had agreed that the ad hoc Commission should comprise the following four members of the Council: Cape Verde, Morocco, the Russian Federation and the United States.²⁷

Decision of 19 October 1992: statement by the President

On 19 October 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:²⁸

The members of the Security Council heard on 19 October 1992 an oral report of the members of the ad hoc Commission of the Council which was dispatched to Angola from 11 to 14 October 1992.

They expressed gratitude to the members of this Commission and welcomed its contribution to reducing the tension in Angola and to finding a solution to the difficulties that arose after the elections of 29 and 30 September 1992.

The members of the Council once again called upon the parties to abide scrupulously by all the commitments entered into within the framework of the Peace Accords for Angola, in particular with regard to the demobilization of their troops and formation of the united armed forces, and to refrain from any action that could increase the tension.

The members of the Council noted with satisfaction that in her public announcement of 17 October 1992 the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Angola certified that, with all deficiencies taken into account, the elections held on 29 and 30 September 1992 can be considered to have been generally free and fair.

²⁸ S/24683; recorded as a Security Council decision in Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1992, p. 88.

They also noted with satisfaction that the leaders of the two parties to the Accords agreed to start a dialogue with a view to the completion of the presidential elections.

The members of the Council look forward to the recommendations of the Secretary-General on the contribution of the United Nations to ensuring the completion of the presidential elections. They are ready to act without delay on the basis of these recommendations.

D. Letter dated 27 October 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 27 October 1992 (3126th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3126th meeting, held on 27 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda a letter dated 27 October 1992 from the Secretary-General, addressed to the President of the Security Council, on the situation in Angola.²⁹ Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁰

The Council has taken note of the letter dated 27 October 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the situation in Angola. It expresses its serious concern at the deterioration of the political situation and the rising tension in that country.

The Council once again calls on the parties to the Peace Accords for Angola to respect all the commitments undertaken in accordance with these accords, in particular with regard to the confinement of their troops and weapons, demobilization, and formation of the unified national armed forces. It also calls on the parties to refrain from any act that might heighten tension, impair the conduct of the electoral process and threaten the territorial integrity of Angola.

The Council calls on the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and the other parties in the electoral process in Angola to respect the results of the elections held on 29 and 30 September 1992, which the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Angola certified as being generally free and fair. It urges the leaders of the two parties to the Accords to engage in a dialogue without delay so as to enable the second round of the presidential elections to be held. The Council will hold responsible any party which refuses to take part in such a dialogue, thereby jeopardizing the entire process.

The Council strongly condemns the attacks and baseless accusations made by Vorgan, the radio station of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, against the Special Representative and the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II. It calls for the immediate cessation of these attacks and accusations, and reiterates its full support for the Special Representative and for the Mission.

The Council reiterates its readiness to act without delay on the basis of recommendations that the Secretary-General might make concerning the contribution of the United Nations to the completion of the electoral process.

E. Letter dated 29 October 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 30 October 1992 (3130th meeting): resolution 785 (1992)

By a letter dated 29 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³¹ the Secretary-General recommended an extension of the mandate of UNAVEM II for an interim period. He recalled that, in his letter of 27 October to the President, he had described the difficulties which had arisen in Angola since the elections of 29 and 30 September, including the lack of agreement between the two parties to the Peace Accords on arrangements for the holding of a second round of presidential elections. Both parties, however, had declared their wish that UNAVEM II should play a role in organizing and verifying that round when it took place. The Secretary-General also recalled that just before the elections he had received a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Angola,³² conveying his Government's request for an extension of the activities of UNAVEM II until 31 December 1992, the date which the Government believed to be reasonable for the conclusion of the democratization process in the country. Given the uncertainties that had arisen following the Angolan elections, the Secretary-General had deferred making a recommendation to the Council about that request. In these circumstances, he saw no alternative but to recommend the extension of the mandate of UNAVEM II for an interim period of 31 days, until 30 November. He hoped that, with the cooperation of the two parties to the Peace Accords, he would then be in a better position to make a substantive recommendation on the future mandate and strength of UNAVEM II.

At its 3130th meeting, held on 30 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's letter of 29 October in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Angola, Brazil, Portugal and South Africa, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the following letters addressed to the Secretary-General: (a) a letter dated 24 September from the representative of Angola,³³ requesting the extension of the activities of UNAVEM II until 31 December 1992; (b) a letter dated 23 October from the representative of the United Kingdom,³⁴ transmitting a statement on Angola made by the European Community and its member States on 22 October; and (c) a letter dated 27 October from the representative of South Africa,³⁵ concerning the position of the Government of South Africa on the recent elections in Angola and their aftermath. The President also drew members' attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,³⁶ and to some oral revisions made to the draft resolution in its provisional form.

The representative of Portugal stated that his country considered the presence and the role of the United Nations in Angola to be of vital importance, and favoured the strengthening of the future mandate of UNAVEM II. He also welcomed the active engagement of the Security Council in this grave matter. The disturbing increase in tension was taking the country to the brink of war once again, and the international community must make clear that it would not accept the disruption of the commitments made in the Peace Accords. Any support given to any of the parties outside the framework and spirit of those agreements should be unequivocally condemned. He appreciated the fact that, in its draft resolution, the Council would reiterate its readiness to consider all appropriate measures to ensure that all parties abstained from the use of force and fully respected the final outcome of the democratic process. The seriousness of the situation not only caused deep concern over what might occur in Angola, but could also jeopardize the peace and stability of the whole region.³⁷

The representative of Brazil noted that, since the statement made by the President of the Council on 27 October, the situation in Angola had continued to deteriorate; like the previous speaker, he feared that it had now reached proportions at which it might come to affect peace and security both in Angola and in the surrounding region. Expressing firm support for the draft resolution the Council was about to adopt, he stressed in particular the importance of “its readiness to consider all appropriate measures” under the Charter of the United Nations to secure implementation of the Peace Accords.³⁸

The representative of Angola expressed his Government’s concern about the grave situation in his country, created by the “irresponsible attitude” of UNITA in refusing to accept the results of the elections which had been declared “free and fair” by the Council. That attitude was in clear violation of the Peace Accords. His Government asked that strong measures be taken to force UNITA to accept the election results and the implementation of the Peace Accords. He also expressed concern about information regarding the presence of South African fighting forces alongside UNITA; if proved to be correct, that would have dangerous implications for the entire region.³⁹

The representative of South Africa categorically dismissed the allegations of South African military cooperation with UNITA against the Government of Angola. He insisted that his Government would in no way support any party that opted for a violent solution or perpetrated aggression in Angola. Military action was not an option, and his Government had done its best to bring that home to the leaders of Angola; a democratic process was absolutely essential to solve the problems in the country. Differences had to be resolved around the conference table. The Government of South Africa would therefore support any suggestion that would bring about peace, and urged the Security Council to act in such a way as would facilitate its achievement.⁴⁰

Speaking before the vote on the draft resolution, the representative of the United States urged the Presidents of Angola and UNITA to act decisively to stop the spiral of violence from leading Angola towards renewed civil war. He signalled his country’s deep concern at reports that UNITA was trying to extend its authority over parts of Angolan territory; if true, that would represent a major breach of the Peace Accords. The speaker stated that his country would continue, in full cooperation with the United Nations, to seek peace, national reconciliation and democracy in Angola. Those goals could be achieved only if violence was ended, troops were returned to their barracks, and meaningful political dialogue was resumed at the highest level. He called on the parties to implement those actions urgently. It was imperative that the two Angolan leaders hold a summit meeting immediately to overcome the current crisis. The speaker hoped that the draft resolution would contribute to a rapid and peaceful conclusion of the process laid out in the Peace Accords.⁴¹

The draft resolution in its provisional form was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously, as resolution 785 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991 and 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992,

Recalling also the statement made on its behalf by the President of the Security Council on 27 October 1992,

Taking note of the letter dated 29 October 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, in which he recommends an extension of the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for an interim period,

Deeply concerned at the deterioration of the political situation and the rising tension in Angola,

Deeply concerned also at the reports of the recent resumption of hostilities by the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola in Luanda and Huambo,

4. Calls on all States to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly could jeopardize the implementation of the Peace Accords for Angola and increase the tension in the country;

5. Reiterates its full support for the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Angola and the Mission, and its strong condemnation of the attacks and baseless accusations made by Vorgan, the radio station of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, against the Special Representative and the Mission;

6. Supports the statement by the Special Representative certifying that the elections held on 29 and 30 September 1992 were generally free and fair and calls upon the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and the other parties to the electoral process in Angola to respect the results of the elections;

7. Calls upon the parties to the Accords to abide by all the commitments entered into under the Accords, in particular with regard to the confinement of their troops and collection of their weapons, demobilization and the formation of the unified national armed force, and to refrain from any act that might heighten tension, jeopardize the continuation of the electoral process and threaten the territorial integrity of Angola;

8. Urges the leaders of the two parties to engage in a dialogue without delay so as to enable the second round of the presidential elections to be held promptly;

9. Reaffirms that it will hold responsible any party which refuses to take part in such a dialogue, thereby jeopardizing the entire process, and reiterates its readiness to consider all appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations to secure implementation of the Accords;

10. Decides to remain seized of the question.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that since the signing of the peace agreements much progress had been made in Angola, due, in particular, to the United Nations agencies and UNAVEM II, under the leadership of the Secretary-General's Special Representative. That progress was now being put at risk by the unwillingness of one of the parties to accept the results of the elections and to carry the presidential elections to their conclusion in a second round, and by a threatening to resort to force. Such a denial of the results of the elections and a resort to force would not be accepted by the international community. Noting that it was not too late to get the peace process back on track, the speaker stated that his Government hoped that the clear warning of international isolation conveyed in resolution 785 (1992) would be heeded.⁴²

The representative of the Russian Federation, too, stated that UNITA must heed the grave warnings contained in the resolution just adopted. Its attempt once again to plunge Angola into civil war not only threatened the settlement process in that country but could also have a negative impact on the situation in the region as a whole. The Russian delegation believed that the Security Council must continue to take all necessary measures to ensure implementation by the parties of the peace agreements and promote an early dialogue between the two Angolan leaders for the purpose of holding a second round of presidential elections. For its part, the Russian Federation was ready actively to support any steps by the international community and the Council to call for the peaceful development of Angola.⁴³

The representative of Zimbabwe supported the resolution just adopted because Zimbabwe strongly believed that no party should "seek to achieve through the bullet what it failed to achieve through the ballot". He hoped that UNITA would heed the demand by the Security Council to cease all hostilities forthwith and abide fully by the provisions of the Angola Peace Accords.⁴⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, stated that, in adopting resolution 785 (1992), the Council had demonstrated that it stood ready to continue active participation in the implementation of the Peace Accords. It was clear, however, that the United Nations would not be able to accomplish anything without the cooperation of the parties. Like the previous speakers, he hoped that the message sent by the Security Council would be heard and understood.⁴⁵

F. Further report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II

Decision of 30 November 1992 (3144th meeting): resolution 793 (1992)

On 25 November 1992, the Secretary-General, pursuant to the statement made by the President of the Council on 18 September and resolution 785 (1992), submitted to the Council a further report on the situation in Angola after the elections.⁴⁶ He also provided his recommendations for action to be taken by the Council before the expiration of the mandate of UNAVEM II on 30 November. The Secretary-General observed that the situation in the country had deteriorated and that the successful completion of the peace process and the establishment of multi-party democracy seemed further off than at any time since the signing of the Peace Accords in May 1991. The original ceasefire had been seriously broken for the first time since the Accords were signed. A new ceasefire of 1 November was barely holding and both sides had undertaken preparations for renewed war. One of the root causes of what had gone wrong in Angola was the incomplete fulfilment, within an admittedly tight timetable, of key provisions in the Peace Accords that were intended to create the conditions for elections to be held. Foremost among those failings were the less than effective demobilization and storage of weapons; the delay in creating unified armed forces; the failure to re-establish effective central administration in many parts of the country; and the dilatoriness in setting up a neutral police force.

Both sides, however, had reiterated their commitment to peace and dialogue and had expressed a wish for assistance from the international community in that regard. UNITA had, moreover, eventually accepted the results of the elections. Both sides had agreed on the need for an enlarged UNAVEM presence in order to create, within six months, conditions in which the second round of presidential elections could take place and the peace process could be successfully concluded. The Secretary-General stressed that he had made it clear to both sides that, unless they could convince him of their genuine adherence to and fulfilment of the Peace Accords, he would not be prepared to recommend an enlargement of the Mission's mandate and strength, or even its continuation at its present strength. It would also be necessary for the parties to agree on a clear timetable and on formal evaluation at regular intervals of the fulfilment of their commitments. There had to be evidence, as well, of a genuine commitment to national reconciliation, which could not be achieved without the full participation of UNITA, whose legitimate concerns had to be addressed.

As it was not possible at that stage to assess whether his own efforts and those of interested Member States would succeed in persuading the Government and UNITA to reactivate the peace process, the Secretary-General said that he was not yet in a position to make the long-term recommendations on the mandate and strength of UNAVEM II requested by the Council in its resolution 785 (1992). He accordingly recommended an extension of the existing mandate of UNAVEM II, for a further two months, until 31 January 1993. Before then, he would submit a further report with recommendations on the future involvement of the United Nations in the Angolan peace process. He added that if his present recommendation were approved, the Security Council might wish to make it clear to the parties that the international community could not wait indefinitely for them to take the difficult decisions required of them if the peace process were to be put back on track. In the meantime, the Secretary-General proposed to take urgent steps, with the cooperation of the Member States involved, to restore the Mission's strength to its authorized levels. This would both demonstrate the international community's continuing commitment to the peace process and be a practical measure to improve the security of UNAVEM personnel in the field and strengthen their ability to consolidate the ceasefire.

At its 3144th meeting, held on 30 November 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 25 November in its agenda.

⁴⁵ Ibid., pp. 26-27.

⁴⁶ S/24858; see also S/24858/Add.1 of 30 November 1992.

The President (Hungary) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution⁴⁷ that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations, as well as to some oral amendments to the draft resolution in its provisional form.

At the same meeting, the Secretary-General made a statement regretting the death of a police observer with UNAVEM II, who had been killed in the crossfire during an outbreak in hostilities between the two sides at the mission camp in Uige, northern Angola. He deplored the incident as a further serious violation of the Peace Accords, and appealed strongly to both parties to cease hostilities and to seek a peaceful solution to the current crisis through dialogue.⁴⁸

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 793 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 696 (1991) of 30 May 1991, 747 (1992) of 24 March 1992 and 785 (1992) of 30 October 1992,

Taking note of the further report of the Secretary-General of 25 and 30 November 1992 on the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II,

Deeply concerned by deterioration in the political and military situation in Angola and especially by the troop movements which have taken place and by the hostilities which occurred on 31 October and 1 November 1992,

Welcoming and supporting the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Angola aimed at resolving the present crisis,

Disturbed by the continuing non-implementation of major aspects of the Peace Accords for Angola,

Reiterating its support for the statement by the Special Representative that the elections held on 29 and 30 September 1992 were generally free and fair and taking note of the acceptance by the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola of the results of the elections,

Noting the intention of the Secretary-General to continue, in this as in other peacekeeping operations, to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources,

1. Approves the recommendation of the Secretary-General to extend the existing mandate of the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II for a further period of two months until 31 January 1993;

2. Appeals to the troop- and police-contributing States to lend cooperation to the Mission in order to restore as soon as possible its mandated strength;

3. Welcomes the joint declaration of the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola made in Namibe on 26 November 1992 and urges them to take immediate and effective actions in accordance with the declaration;

4. Demands that the two parties scrupulously observe the ceasefire, immediately stop all military confrontations, and in particular offensive troop movements, and create all the conditions necessary for the completion of the peace process;

5. Urges the two parties to demonstrate their adherence to, and fulfilment without exception of the Peace Accords for Angola, in particular with regard to the confinement of their troops and collection of their weapons, demobilization and the formation of the unified national armed force and to refrain from any action which might heighten tension or jeopardize the return to normalcy;

6. Strongly appeals to the two parties to engage in a continuous and meaningful dialogue aimed at national reconciliation and at the participation of all parties in the democratic process and to agree on a clear timetable for the fulfilment of their commitments in accordance with the Accords;

7. Reaffirms that it will hold responsible any party which refuses to take part in such a dialogue, thereby jeopardizing the entire process, and reiterates its readiness to consider all appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations to secure implementation of the Accords;

8. Calls on all States to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly could jeopardize the implementation of the Accords and increase the tension in the country;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council by 31 January 1993 a further report on the situation in Angola together with his longer-term recommendations for the further role of the United Nations in the peace process, which should be clearly defined in scope and time and based on a wide degree of support in Angola;

10. Decides to remain seized of the question.

Decision of 2 December 1992: statement by the President

Following consultations among the members of the Council held on 2 December 1992, the President (India) made a statement to the media on behalf of the Council concerning the safety and security of United Nations peacekeeping personnel.⁴⁹ The relevant part reads as follows:

The members of the Council wish to express their deep concern and outrage about the increasing number of attacks against United Nations personnel serving in various peacekeeping operations.

A number of serious incidents affecting military and civilian personnel serving with the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and the United Nations Protection Force have occurred during the last few days.

On 29 November 1992 in Uige, northern Angola, a Brazilian police observer with the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II was killed as a result of an outbreak of hostilities between the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola and Government forces, during which the Mission camp was caught in the cross-fire. The members of the Council convey their deep sympathy and condolences to the Government of Brazil and to the bereaved family.

The members of the Council condemn these attacks on the safety and security of United Nations personnel and demand that all parties concerned take all necessary measures to prevent their recurrence

G. Letter dated 18 December 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 22 December 1992 (3152nd meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 18 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁰ the Secretary-General informed the Council about the situation in Angola since the adoption of resolution 793 (1992) on 30 November. He reported that there had been little or no progress in putting the peace process back on track and that, unless there was rapid improvement, it was difficult to believe that by the end of January 1993 conditions would exist for him to recommend an enlarged United Nations presence in Angola, which both sides said they wanted. Since the end of November, when UNITA forces took the northern cities of Uige and Negage, the latter being the site of an important airbase, all attempts to restore a dialogue between the two sides had failed. UNITA forces continued to occupy up to two thirds of the municipalities in Angola, which the Government administration had had to leave or from which it had been expelled. There was disturbing evidence that both sides were continuing preparations for a resumption of war on a large scale, a possibility of which the Government's public statements spoke openly.

On the political front, the Government had announced the formation of a Government of National Unity, in which a number of posts had been offered to UNITA. UNITA had decided to take up its seats in the new Assembly and to nominate persons to the posts offered by the Government. It had also decided to return its Generals to the structures of the new Angolan armed forces, from which they had withdrawn shortly after the September elections. However, the hopes that a political dialogue could be resumed and agreement reached on a programme of action to complete the implementation of the Peace Accords had not been fulfilled. Recriminations continued between the two sides on a variety of issues: the situation in Uige and Negage; the refusal of UNITA to withdraw its troops and its resistance to the restoration of Government administration in municipalities which it had seized since the elections; the release of persons held by each side, in particular the UNITA personalities living "under Government protection" in Luanda; the exchange of bodies of those killed in the recent fighting; and mutual accusations of preparations for war.

A further obstacle to progress was the legitimate concern of UNITA about the security of its members in Luanda and other Government-controlled parts of the country; that was a matter for which both sides would like the United Nations to assume responsibility. The Secretary-General stated that, while it would be difficult for the United Nations to do so directly, a number of ideas had been offered to both sides and, if certain conditions were met, he would be ready to seek the Council's authority to make some United Nations military personnel available, on a temporary basis, to facilitate the return to Luanda of the President of UNITA, and the UNITA members of the new Government and of the elected Assembly.

As to the role the two sides would like the United Nations to play in the future, they agreed in principle on the need to enlarge the mandate of UNAVEM II and increase its strength on the ground, including the provision of armed troops. However, differences existed between them, especially on the extent to which the Mission should in future exercise a good offices or mediation function, and the extent to which it should be involved in the organization and conduct of the second round of presidential elections.

The Secretary-General stated that he had continued to maintain his position that he would be prepared to recommend an enlargement of the mandate and strength of UNAVEM II, but only if the two sides had demonstrated their continuing commitment to the Peace Accords by agreeing on a realistic plan of action to get the implementation process back on track. They had so far failed to satisfy these conditions. In those circumstances, he had invited the two Angolan leaders to meet together, under his auspices and in his presence, to make a determined effort to move forward. In bringing the situation to the Council's attention, the Secretary-General said that he would value any support which it might wish to give to his efforts, perhaps in the form of an appeal to both leaders to accept his invitation to a joint meeting at an agreed location.

At its 3152nd meeting, held on 22 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's letter of 18 December in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Angola, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (India) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵¹

The Council has taken note of the letter dated 18 December 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council concerning the situation in Angola. It expresses serious concern at the lack of progress in implementing the Peace Accords for Angola and at the continuation of the dangerous political and security situation in the country.

The Council reiterates its strong appeal to the two parties to engage in a continuous and meaningful dialogue aimed at national reconciliation and at the participation of all parties in the democratic process, and to agree on a clear timetable and programme of action to complete the implementation of the Accords. The Security Council urges that the military forces of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola be immediately withdrawn from Uige and Negage and that the Government administration be fully restored there and that the two parties resume the direct talks started in Namibe on 26 November 1992. It again urges both parties to demonstrate their commitment to the Accords, in particular with regard to confinement of their troops and collection of their weapons, demobilization, formation of the national armed forces and restoration of the central administration throughout the country.

The Council also considers it essential that both parties agree without delay on security and other arrangements which would allow all ministers and other high-ranking officials to occupy the posts which have been offered by the Government and for all deputies to assume their functions in the National Assembly.

The Council also considers it imperative that both parties agree on a realistic plan of action for full implementation of the Accords, and to facilitate a continuing United Nations presence in Angola. It underlines the need for the two sides to produce early evidence of their willingness and ability to work together to implement the Accords, so that the international community would feel encouraged to continue to commit its scarce resources to the continuation of the United Nations operation in Angola on its present scale.

The Council fully supports the action of the Secretary-General aimed at resolving the present crisis and appeals to President dos Santos and Mr. Savimbi to accept the Secretary-General's invitation to attend, under his auspices, a joint meeting at an agreed location, to confirm that real progress has been made in the reactivation of the Bicesse Accords with a view to their full implementation and that agreement has been reached on a continuing United Nations presence in Angola.

2. The situation in Liberia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 22 January 1991 (2974th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 15 January 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Côte d'Ivoire requested the convening of a meeting of the Council to consider the deterioration of the situation in Liberia. He submitted a draft presidential statement.

At its 2974th meeting, on 22 January 1991, the Council included the letter from Côte d'Ivoire in its agenda, and invited the representatives of Liberia and Nigeria, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President of the Council (Zaire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 14 December 1990 from the representative of the Gambia, addressed to the Secretary-General,² transmitting the final communiqué of the first extraordinary session of the Authority of Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), issued at Bamako on 28 November 1990, on the crisis in Liberia. The Authority, inter alia, endorsed the ECOWAS peace plan for Liberia as embodied in the Banjul communiqué and decisions of the Standing Mediation Committee adopted on 7 August 1990.

Commencing the discussion, the representative of Liberia welcomed the opportunity to speak before the Council as it sought, for the first time, to respond to the tragic consequences of the civil war that had devastated Liberia for over a year. That a response was now being made, more than one year after the conflict had started, raised, in his opinion, the need to review, and perhaps reinterpret, the Charter — particularly the provision calling for non-interference in the internal affairs of Member States. Regrettably, the strict application of that provision had hampered the effectiveness of the Council and its principal objective of maintaining international peace and security. Despite previous efforts seven months before to have the Council seized, it was only now — after the displacement of nearly half of Liberia's population, the loss of thousands of innocent lives, and the virtual destruction of the country — that the Council was finally meeting to address the tragic civil war in Liberia. He stressed that full implementation of the peace plan formulated by ECOWAS could lead to the establishment of a durable peace in Liberia provided that all the parties to the conflict were truly committed to peace. He said that there was also a need to address the deteriorating social and economic conditions in the country, and urged the international community to support the humanitarian and other relief programmes that needed to be implemented.³

The representative of Nigeria, speaking as the alternate Chairman of the group of States members of ECOWAS at the United Nations, stated that the leaders of ECOWAS had responded collectively to the conflict in Liberia by authorizing and supporting the operations of the ECOWAS Ceasefire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG). The ECOMOG mandate was not to take sides, but to reconcile them; it was to restore peace and stability, and to create an atmosphere conducive to the resumption of free political activity and, eventually, democratic elections. The speaker stressed the importance of the Council's urging all the parties to the conflict to continue to respect the ceasefire to which they had agreed, and added that ECOWAS should be commended for its efforts to restore peace and stability in Liberia. Nigeria endorsed the draft statement on Liberia which was to be issued on behalf of the Security Council. It also called on the international community to intensify its humanitarian support for Liberia and for the Liberian refugees, and to provide financial and logistical support for ECOMOG, whose mission had been endorsed by all the leaders of the West African subregion and by the Organization of African Unity (OAU).⁴

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The members of the Security Council took note of the final communiqué of the first extraordinary session of the Authority of Heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States, issued in Bamako on 28 November 1990.

The members of the Council commend the efforts made by the heads of State and Government of the Community to promote peace and normalcy in Liberia.

The members of the Council call upon the parties to the conflict in Liberia to continue to respect the ceasefire agreement which they have signed and to cooperate fully with the Community to restore peace and normalcy in Liberia.

The members of the Council express appreciation to the Member States, the Secretary-General and humanitarian organizations for the humanitarian assistance to Liberia and call for additional assistance. In this connection the Council welcomes the resumption of the United Nations emergency programme in Liberia following the acceptance of a general ceasefire.

The members of the Council support the appeal launched by the heads of State and Government of the Economic Community of West African States to the international community for increased humanitarian assistance to the people of Liberia.

Decision of 7 May 1992 (3071st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3071st meeting, held on 7 May 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached during its prior consultations, the Council continued its consideration of the item entitled “The situation in Liberia”. The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 30 April 1992 from the representative of Senegal addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶ transmitting, on behalf of the President of Senegal and Chairman of ECOWAS, the final communiqué of the ECOWAS Committee of Five on Liberia, issued at Geneva on 7 April 1992. He then stated that, following prior consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

The members of the Council recalled the statement made by the President of the Council on behalf of the Council on 22 January 1991 concerning the situation in Liberia.

The members of the Council noted with appreciation the final communiqué issued at Geneva on 7 April 1992 of the informal consultative meeting of the Economic Community of West African States Committee of Five on Liberia.

The members of the Council commend the Community and its various organs, in particular the Committee of Five, for their untiring efforts to bring the Liberian conflict to a speedy conclusion.

In this connection the members of the Council believe that the Yamoussoukro Accord of 30 October 1991 offers the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia.

The members of the Council renew their call to all parties to the conflict in Liberia to respect and implement the various accords of the peace process of the Committee of Five, including refraining from actions which endanger the security of neighbouring States.

The members of the Council commend the efforts of the Secretary-General in providing humanitarian assistance to the victims of the civil war in Liberia and in this regard reaffirm their support for increased assistance.

Decision of 19 November 1992 (3138th
meeting): resolution 788 (1992)

By a letter dated 28 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸ the representative of Benin informed the Council of the decision taken by the Standing Mediation Committee and the ECOWAS Committee of Five on Liberia to send a ministerial mission to the Council for the following purposes: (a) to report on the latest developments in the crisis; (b) to request United Nations assistance in imposing, in accordance with the relevant provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, sanctions against those parties to the conflict that did not respect the provisions of the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement — the sanctions to consist of a blockade of all points of entry to Liberia in order to prevent the parties concerned from having access to war materiel and from exporting products from the zones they controlled; and (c) to request the presence of a group of United Nations observers to facilitate the verification and monitoring of the electoral process in Liberia, on the understanding that they would visit the country during the period of confinement and disarmament in order to build trust between the parties to the conflict. The representative requested the holding of an emergency meeting of the Council when the ministerial mission was in New York in order to consider the Liberian crisis whose persistence threatened peace and security, especially in the West African subregion.

By a letter dated 18 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹ the representative of Liberia endorsed the request by the representative of Benin that the Council convene as soon as possible to discuss the situation in Liberia.

At its 3138th meeting, on 19 November 1992, the Council included both letters in its agenda and continued its consideration of the item. The Council invited, at their request, the representatives of Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d’Ivoire, Egypt, the Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Mauritius, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone and Togo to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Hungary) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents that had been transmitted to him by the representative of Benin: (a) by a letter dated

30 October 1992,¹⁰ the final communiqué on the Liberian crisis, issued by the first joint summit meeting of the Standing Mediation Committee and the Committee of Five of ECOWAS, held at Cotonou on 20 October 1992, together with the decision taken with respect to the implementation of sanctions (the ECOWAS sanctions decision); (b) by a letter dated 13 November 1992,¹¹ the final communiqué of the first summit meeting of the Monitoring Committee of Nine of ECOWAS, held at Abuja on 7 November 1992, on the peaceful settlement of the conflict; and (c) by a letter dated 17 November 1992,¹² the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement of 30 October 1991 on the peaceful settlement of the Liberian conflict.

A delegation of Foreign Ministers from nine States members of ECOWAS participated in the Council's meeting. The ministerial mission included the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, the Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, Senegal and Togo (sometimes referred to as the "Committee of Nine"). They reported on the recent developments in Liberia, as well as on the ECOWAS efforts to restore peace and stability to the country. They also sought the Council's support for ECOWAS efforts, by such measures as the dispatch of a Special Representative of the Secretary-General to Liberia and the imposition of an arms embargo in line with the above-mentioned ECOWAS sanctions decision.

As head of the ECOWAS delegation, the representative of Benin recalled that, since the outbreak of hostilities in Liberia in 1989, numerous initiatives to solve the conflict had been taken by the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS. Among the more recent, he reported that the first joint summit meeting of the Standing Mediation Committee and the Committee of Five, established to resolve the Liberian conflict, had been held at Cotonou on 20 October 1992. He stated that, at that meeting, a new deadline had been set for a ceasefire and for the complete implementation of the provisions of the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement. A decision had also been adopted on the prospective imposition of sanctions against any party to the Liberian conflict that failed to comply with the provisions of that Agreement. The sanctions were intended to blockade all points of entry into Liberia by land, sea and air so as to prevent the delivery of war materiel to those parties and the export of products from zones they controlled in Liberia. He added that a follow-up committee, the Committee of Nine, had noted at its summit meeting in Abuja on 7 November 1992 that the deadline set by the Cotonou meeting had expired, that the Agreement had not been implemented and that the sanctions decision had, accordingly, entered into force against all the warring factions on 5 November 1992. He warned that there was a great risk that the conflict in Liberia could spread to the entire West African subregion and urged the Council to support ECOWAS efforts by adopting a number of measures. The measures included a call for effective compliance with the ceasefire established on 28 November 1990 and for the disarming and encampment of the troops of the warring factions; the appointment by the Secretary-General of a Special Representative; a total arms embargo against Liberia, with the exception of arms for ECOMOG; and a ban on the export of Liberian resources by the warring parties from the areas they controlled. It was hoped that those measures would create conditions that would allow the organization of free and democratic elections in Liberia.¹³

The representative of Liberia commended the Council for its earlier support of the ECOWAS peace initiatives in his country, as evidenced by the presidential statements of 22 January 1991 and 7 May 1992. He regretted, however, that the statements had proved to be the most that Liberia could elicit from the Council at the most critical hour of its history. He stated that, in 1990, at the height of the Liberian civil conflict, international opinion had been divided between the imperatives for humanitarian intervention and classical conceptions of sovereignty, however anachronistic. As the ECOWAS peace plan continued to be violated by some warring parties, an arms embargo, binding not only on all ECOWAS member States but also internationally, was essential. Noting that, by its spillover effects, the Liberian conflict was already a "clear and present danger" to neighbouring Sierra Leone, the speaker warned that it could degenerate into a wider conflagration in West Africa. He therefore urged the Council, in the context of its responsibility to maintain international peace and security, to support the measures ECOWAS had taken

and to adopt unanimously the draft resolution before it along the lines proposed.¹⁴

The representative of Senegal also stressed that the crisis in Liberia presented a genuine threat to the peace and security of the region. Among the many destabilizing factors, he pointed to the existence of a huge quantity of weapons now circulating in that part of Africa accompanied by a whole range of military experts; hundreds of thousands of refugees scattered about the various neighbouring countries, putting an increasingly intolerable burden on those countries; and the spreading of the war across the borders of Liberia into Sierra Leone. Noting that ECOWAS had, with the support of all the parties to the conflict, prepared the framework for a peaceful settlement, in the form of a peace plan, and that a consensus had even been reached on the arrangements for implementing the plan, he trusted that the Council would support its efforts.¹⁵

The representative of Côte d'Ivoire stated that ECOWAS had striven to restore peace in Liberia, in accordance with the provisions of Article 52 of the Charter. It was imperative now that, with the support of the Council, an effective ceasefire be put into effect and that the Secretary-General be authorized to appoint a Special Representative who would work in close cooperation with ECOWAS in implementing the ECOWAS peace plan. The presence of a United Nations observer group, by helping to build confidence among the parties, would contribute to the encampment and disarming of the factions. So, too, would the imposition of an arms embargo.¹⁶

The representative of Burkina Faso stated that the situation in Liberia was first and foremost a Liberian matter and that any peace process should aim at resuming dialogue among the warring parties, without outside interference. Despite some previously expressed reservations over certain ECOWAS measures and the manner in which they had been implemented, his country agreed with the reaffirmation of the role of ECOMOG as a neutral disengagement force and supported the implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement, stressing that the Liberian people should have the final word in the resolution of the crisis through free and democratic elections. Burkina Faso affirmed its hope that subregional joint efforts would enable the Liberians finally to lay the groundwork for a lasting peace.¹⁷

The representative of the Gambia said that the climate of instability and disorder created by the crisis in Liberia was hampering the socio-economic development of the region. The pre-eminent challenge was the restoration of peace in Liberia, in particular, and the consolidation of democracy in the region, in general. It was in that spirit that the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement had been adopted by the Heads of State of ECOWAS. The successful implementation of their collective commitments under that Agreement depended largely on the adoption of the draft resolution before the Council, which called for a general arms embargo.¹⁸

The representative of Guinea stated that the efforts of ECOWAS were being hampered by the continuous refusal of one of the parties to implement the various agreements and by that party's attacks against ECOMOG. Having assumed its responsibilities in response to the threat to the region's peace and security, ECOWAS now needed the support of the Council, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter. Guinea urged adoption of the draft resolution and the monitoring of its implementation, which would bring relief to the countries of the region.¹⁹

The representative of Nigeria stated that ECOMOG, which had been deployed in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter, had suffered substantial losses. He refuted allegations by one of the parties that the ECOWAS peacekeeping force was part of the problem in Liberia, underlining its even-handedness and lack of territorial ambitions in the country. He urged West Africa's powerful friends to assist in providing humanitarian aid; to join in putting the weight of the United Nations behind the prohibition of arms transfers to the warring factions, in order to promote an environment conducive to the holding of free and fair elections; and to join in condemning war crimes and crimes against humanity.²⁰

The representative of Sierra Leone stated that, with the exception of Liberia itself, his country had been the most seriously affected victim of the conflict. One of the factions had launched an armed invasion of

Sierra Leone and continued to occupy parts of the country. The same faction continued to violate the peace agreements, which it had entered into voluntarily. Sierra Leone was also providing refuge to thousands of Liberians who had fled from their country. He stressed that his country was appearing before the Council to request its assistance in repelling the aggressors whose actions could lead to instability and insecurity in the whole subregion. He supported the call to impose a complete arms embargo on Liberia and to request all States to respect the measures adopted by ECOWAS to restore peace in Liberia. He also called on the United Nations to render it all necessary military, economic and diplomatic support to enable it to resist the aggressors, and said that ECOWAS deserved the full support of the United Nations.²¹

The representative of Togo stated that the Liberian crisis, presented at the outset and for a long time as a mere civil war and hence an internal matter, had become a breeding ground for economic, political and social destabilization in the region. The Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS had proved their determination to prevent the disintegration of Liberia. However, the continued failure of one of the factions to respect the agreements and the ensuing escalation of violence had shown the urgent need to secure the support of the international community. He urged the Council to impose an arms embargo on Liberia and to authorize the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for Liberia in order to evaluate the situation and to consider the means of deploying a United Nations observer group to assist ECOMOG in monitoring the ceasefire and the electoral process.²²

Following the statements made by the ECOWAS delegation, a number of speakers commended the peace initiatives of ECOWAS; expressed deep concern over the renewed fighting in the country; called on all parties to respect and implement the ECOWAS peace plan; called for cooperation between the United Nations and ECOWAS; and supported the adoption of the draft resolution, by which the Council, inter alia, would request the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for Liberia; and impose a mandatory arms embargo on the country.²³

The representative of Zimbabwe said that, although his country would have liked to see the Council take immediate concrete measures on Liberia along the lines that had been requested by the ECOWAS delegation, his delegation appreciated the difficulty of doing so in the absence of a report and recommendations by the Secretary-General. It therefore welcomed the request for the Secretary-General to dispatch expeditiously to Liberia a Special Rapporteur to evaluate how best the United Nations could cooperate with ECOWAS towards implementing the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement, with respect to bringing about a durable cessation of hostilities and nurturing the democratic process.²⁴

The representative of the United States insisted that, to ensure real progress, comprehensive disarmament was necessary. Peace without disarmament was tenuous at best. He also stressed that it was imperative that the regional peacekeeping effort in Liberia succeed. If it failed, ECOWAS would be unlikely to venture into the difficult realm of peacekeeping and conflict resolution in the future, and pressure would build rapidly for direct United States or United Nations intervention. The Council owed ECOWAS its full support as it considered means for pressuring the Liberian warring factions to implement the ECOWAS peace plan.²⁵

The representative of France observed that, with respect to the monitoring role the Council should legitimately play in the context of action under Chapter VII of the Charter, his country welcomed the provision in the draft resolution by which the Council, on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General, would consider certain modalities for the implementation of the draft resolution, in particular its paragraph 8, imposing the arms embargo.²⁶

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations.²⁷ The draft resolution was then put

8. Decides, under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that all States shall, for the purposes of establishing peace and stability in Liberia, immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia until the Council decides otherwise;

9. Also decides within the same framework that the embargo imposed by paragraph 8 shall not apply to weapons and military equipment destined for the sole use of the peacekeeping forces of the Economic Community of West African States in Liberia, subject to any review that may be required in conformity with the report of the Secretary-General;

10. Requests all States to respect the measures established by the Economic Community of West African States to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict in Liberia;

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Benin stated that, in addition to sending a very clear message to the warring parties, the resolution that the Council had just adopted provided encouragement to the tireless efforts led by the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS to restore peace and security to the region. On their behalf, he assured the Council that ECOWAS would cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in implementing the peace plan for Liberia.²⁸

3. Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 4 January 1989 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 4 January 1989 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Bahrain to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 4 January 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya informed the Council of the downing on 4 January 1989 of two Libyan reconnaissance aircraft by the United States Air Force over international waters and requested that the Security Council be convened immediately to halt the aggression against his country. The representative of Bahrain made a similar request, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, in a letter dated

4 January 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council.²

At its 2835th meeting, on 5 January 1989, the Council included the letters from the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Bahrain in its agenda. It considered the item at its 2835th to 2837th and 2839th to 2841st meetings, from 5 to 11 January 1989.

The Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 2835th meeting, the representatives of Bahrain, Burkina Faso, Cuba, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Syrian Arab Republic and Tunisia; at the 2836th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, Democratic Yemen, the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Madagascar, Mali, Nicaragua, the Sudan and Uganda; at the 2837th meeting, the representatives of Pakistan and Zimbabwe; at the 2839th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, India and Morocco; at the 2840th meeting, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Malta, Poland, Romania, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen; and at the 2841st meeting, the representatives of Bulgaria, Mongolia and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic. The Council also extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to the following: at its 2835th meeting, to Mr. Samir Mansouri, Acting Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States (LAS); at its 2840th meeting, to Messrs. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), Leasona S. Makhanda, Secretary for Labour of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania, and Solly Simelane, Deputy Representative of the African National Congress of South Africa; and at its 2841st meeting, to Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of LAS. At its 2841st meeting, the Council decided by a vote to invite the Alternate Permanent Observer of Palestine,³ at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁴

rejection of a draft resolution

At the 2835th meeting, on 5 January 1989, the President of the Security Council (Malaysia) drew the attention of the Council members to two letters dated 4 January 1989 from, respectively, the representative of the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council and the representative of Ghana addressed to the Secretary-General.⁵ The representative of the United States, invoking Article 51 of the Charter, reported that his country's forces had exercised their right of self-defence by taking defensive action in response to "hostile actions constituting an armed attack" by the military forces of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya against United States forces lawfully operating above international waters of the Mediterranean Sea. The representative of Ghana transmitted a statement issued on 26 December 1988 by his Government on the United States threat against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

At the outset of the debate, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the United States had committed an act of premeditated, deliberate aggression by shooting down, without any justification, two unarmed Libyan reconnaissance aircraft on routine patrol near the Libyan coast. He claimed that this act of aggression was a prelude to a large-scale attack upon economic and military installations in his country. The action, he stated, formed part of the United States policy of aggression pursued against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya since its revolution of 1969. That policy had reached a peak under the current United States Administration, subjecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to threats, provocations and acts of aggression. He stressed that the United States had systematically conducted provocative naval and air manoeuvres in the territorial waters of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and in its airspace in an attempt to draw the country into a direct military confrontation. It had launched a disinformation campaign to destabilize the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, undermine its security and violate its territorial integrity. The campaign included the baseless allegation that a Libyan pharmaceutical plant was capable of producing chemical weapons. The continuing campaign had paved the way for the United States latest aggression, which had been preceded by provocative manoeuvres off the Libyan coast. He called upon the Council to condemn the American military aggression and take all measures to put an end to it, and to use whatever means were necessary to prevent its repetition. He also urged the Council to call upon the United States, a permanent member of the Council bearing special responsibilities for international peace and security, to withdraw its naval fleet and to put an end to its provocative manoeuvres against his country.⁶

The representative of the United States stated that it was his country which was the aggrieved party and not the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, whose Air Force had aggressively challenged routine operations conducted by his country well beyond the 12-mile limit of the territorial seas claimed by the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The action by the United States aircraft, in response to provocation and threat by two armed Libyan fighter aircraft, was fully consistent with internationally accepted principles of self-defence. His Government had so informed the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council under Article 51 of the Charter. He recalled that Libyan aircraft had closed in rapidly on two American planes. The American pilots had repeatedly taken evasive action. However, the Libyan aircraft had continued to close, in a hostile manner. They were carrying air-to-air missiles, of which the American delegation had photographic evidence. Faced with a growing and imminent threat of being shot down, the United States aircraft had fired on the Libyan planes, shooting down two, in a clear and unambiguous act of self-defence. The United States Government had made it clear that this was a distinct incident, unrelated to other issues; it had nothing to do with its concerns about the Libyan chemical-warfare plant issue or with the routine rotation of the United States Sixth Fleet into and out of the Mediterranean Sea.⁷

The representative of Bahrain, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, expressed indignation at the “unwarranted act of aggression” by the United States, which would only lead to an escalation of tension in the region, thus threatening regional and international peace and security. The Arab States believed such acts of aggression would continue unless deterrent measures were taken to end military operations of that kind. They called on the Security Council to condemn such irresponsible acts of aggression, to adopt appropriate measures to prevent their repetition against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and to shoulder its responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security in the Mediterranean region.⁸

Many of the speakers who participated in the debate⁹ characterized the action taken by the United States as an act of aggression, in violation of international law and the Charter of the United Nations, which posed a threat to peace and security in the Mediterranean region. They rejected the claim of self-defence invoked by the United States and urged the Security Council to condemn the act of aggression and to take measures to prevent the recurrence of such acts. Some of those speakers and others called for a suspension of United States military manoeuvres off the Libyan coast, or for the withdrawal of American or all foreign naval fleets from the region.¹⁰ Several speakers appealed for the exercise of restraint and the prevention of further escalation of tension,¹¹ some recalling the importance of the Charter principles relating to the non-use or threat of force against the territorial integrity or economic independence of any State and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means. A few noted, with approval, Colonel Qaddafi’s offer of a dialogue with the United States to resolve disputes between the two countries.¹² A number of speakers referred to the special responsibilities of the United States, as a permanent member of the Council, for the maintenance of international peace and security, and ensuring respect for the principles of the Charter.¹³

At the 2836th meeting, on 6 January 1989, the representative of Brazil considered it appropriate that the serious incident had been brought to the attention of the Security Council, thus providing the international community with an opportunity to exercise a good-offices role by encouraging the parties to enter into dialogue.¹⁴ His delegation would be prepared to join the Council in an appeal to the parties for a serene and objective assessment of each other’s intentions, in addition to strict compliance with the principles of the Charter regarding the peaceful settlement of disputes, and would consider favourably the possibility of requesting the Secretary-General to explore with the parties ways and means for achieving a peaceful solution of their differences.¹⁵

The representative of the Soviet Union said that his country considered the request made by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for an urgent meeting of the Security Council fully justified. He stated that there was absolutely no reason for the United States to use armed force as no one had attacked its aircraft or ships in the region. His country could not accept the argument that the military aircraft of one State were entitled to open fire on the aircraft of another State simply because those aircraft had come close to them in international air space. The invocation by the United States of Article 51 of the Charter, relating to self-defence, was absolutely unfounded. He emphasized that the incident highlighted the question of the adoption of practical measures to strengthen security in the Mediterranean. Noting the link between security in the Mediterranean region and security in Europe, the Soviet Union had proposed that agreement be reached on joint measures in the Mediterranean so that the armed forces in the region might be reduced with a view, in particular, to the withdrawal of nuclear-armed ships from the area. If the United States were to withdraw its navy from the Mediterranean, the Soviet Union would immediately do the same. In concluding, he called upon the Council to evaluate properly what had occurred, to take measures for the normalization of the situation and to avert any repetition of such illegal actions.¹⁶

At the 2837th meeting, also on 6 January 1989, the representative of China called upon the United States to stop all military action against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and appealed to the parties to the dispute to exercise restraint in order to prevent further aggravation of the situation and to ensure peace and stability in the region.¹⁷

At the 2839th meeting, on 9 January 1989, the representative of Finland expressed his Government's concern over what appeared to be a continuing pattern of incidents involving the navies and air forces of different nations, particularly in international waters and in the superjacent airspace. He was particularly concerned when such incidents led to the use of force. He urged all sides in situations involving the possibility of incidents to refrain from behaviour that might lead to misunderstanding as to the intentions of the other side and hence to pre-emptive action in the belief that self-defence, which was a clearly recognized right under international law, was required. In an age of military high technology, the resort to so-called pre-emptive self-defence without warning could have very dangerous consequences. He suggested that there was a need for an international code of conduct concerning both naval forces and aircraft in order to build confidence, to avoid misunderstandings, and to reduce the risk of serious incidents. As to what the Security Council could realistically do in the current situation, he said it could decide to deplore the incident that had occurred and call upon all parties to act with restraint, encouraging them to settle any disputes and disagreements by peaceful means.¹⁸

The representative of Ethiopia expressed the view that, when there was convincing evidence indicating a potential threat to international peace and security, the concerned State should bring the matter before the appropriate bodies of the United Nations. In reading out the text of Article 33, he reminded the permanent members of the Council that parties to a dispute should first seek a solution in accordance with the spirit and letter of Chapter VI of the Charter.¹⁹

The representative of France said that his country had taken note of the statements by the United States on the incident and its assurance that it was not linked to concerns expressed elsewhere in respect of a chemical plant. His Government reaffirmed its commitment to freedom of movement in international waters and airspace, and expressed its particular concern with the maintenance of stability and peace in the sensitive region of the Mediterranean. He hoped that, in this case, reason and calm would prevail and that everyone would exercise restraint and refrain from any act that might heighten tensions.²⁰

At the 2840th meeting, on 10 January 1989, the representative of Czechoslovakia stated that the downing of the Libyan aircraft constituted a violation of international law and a threat to the situation in the Mediterranean and in the Middle East. In the circumstances of the case, in which the cited "hostile intent" of the Libyan planes was based exclusively on a subjective assessment by American pilots acting in an “obvious psychosis of hostility”, the use of armed force could not be justified by references to the right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. An indispensable condition of the exercise of such a right was the objective existence of circumstances provided by the Charter. Their existence could not be confused with subjective perceptions of military commanders. Otherwise, the provisions of Article 51 would cease to be a mere exception to the general ban on the use of armed force and become an instrument of destruction of that ban.²¹

At the 2841st meeting, on 11 January 1989, the President (Malaysia) drew the attention of the Council members to two letters dated 6 January 1989 and 10 January 1989, from the representative of Ghana and from the representative of Mali, respectively, addressed to the Secretary-General.²² He also drew their attention to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.²³

By the draft resolution, in its preambular part, the Council would have, inter alia, recalled the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, the Declaration on the Strengthening of International Security and the Definition of Aggression. In its operative part, the Council would have inter alia (a) deplored the downing of the Libyan reconnaissance aircraft by the armed forces of the United States; (b) called upon the United States to suspend its military manoeuvres off the Libyan coast in order to contribute to the reduction of tension in the area; (c) called upon all parties to refrain from resorting to force, to exercise restraint in this critical situation and to resolve their differences by peaceful means in keeping with the Charter; and (d) called upon the United States and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to cooperate with the Secretary-General in an effort to bring about a peaceful settlement of the differences between the two countries.

The representative of Canada said that, while his country favoured the call on all parties to exercise restraint and to resolve their problems by peaceful means, it had accepted the explanation by the United States for its actions during the incident. It could not therefore, associate itself with a draft resolution that contained a one-sided treatment of the incident, and would vote against it.²⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom regretted both the incident of 4 January and that conclusions had been drawn from it that were not justified by the facts. He emphasized the importance his Government attached to upholding the freedom of ships and aircraft to operate in international waters and airspace and their inherent right to self-defence as recognized by Article 51 of the Charter. In his delegation’s view, the draft resolution was couched in the wrong terms and proceeded from wrong assumptions. It could not help the underlying problems referred to in the debate. His delegation would therefore vote against it.²⁵

The Council then started the voting procedure on the draft resolution. Prior to the vote, statements were made by the representatives of France, Finland and the United States. The representative of France said that his delegation would vote against the draft resolution because it was insufficiently balanced. He noted in this respect that the reference made to the definition of aggression in the preamble could imply a deliberate will on the part of the United States to create the incident. Similarly, the difference in the terminology employed in operative paragraph 1 between Libyan “reconnaissance aircraft” and the “armed forces of the United States” presented a problem. Furthermore, the principle of freedom of navigation, in international space, on the sea and in the air, to which France was committed, seemed to be questioned, at least implicitly, in operative paragraph 2, which mentioned the question of manoeuvres.²⁶ The representative of Finland considered that the text was out of proportion with the incident itself, particularly because of operative paragraph 2; his country would not, therefore, vote in favour of the draft resolution.²⁷ The representative of the United States said that his country would vote against the draft resolution because its clear purpose was to criticize the United States for actions taken in self-defence that were entirely lawful and consistent with the Charter. Moreover, the draft resolution contained language inconsistent with the principle of freedom of navigation in international waters, a matter which should concern all nations.²⁸

The draft resolution was then put to vote. It received 9 votes in favour, 4 against (Canada, France, United Kingdom and United States) and 2 abstentions (Brazil and Finland), and was not adopted owing to the negative votes of three permanent members of the Council.²⁹

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya expressed his delegation's disappointment that, in view of the use of the veto power by some Member States, the Council had not been able to take the action that it should have taken. He added that recourse to the so-called inherent right to self-defence and the invocation of Article 51 of the Charter had become all too familiar. They were misinterpretations of the provisions of that Article, which were used to justify aggression.³⁰

B. Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991

By a letter dated 20 December 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹ the representative of France transmitted a communiqué from the Presidency of the French Republic and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning a judicial inquiry that had been conducted into the attack on UTA flight 772, on 19 September 1989, which had resulted in 171 deaths. The communiqué stated that the judicial inquiry implicated several Libyan nationals in the crime and that the Government of France accordingly reiterated its demand that the Libyan authorities cooperate immediately, effectively and by all possible means with the French justice system in order to help to establish responsibility for the terrorist act. To that end, France called upon the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (a) to produce all the material evidence in its possession and to facilitate access to all documents that might be useful for establishing the truth; (b) to facilitate the necessary contacts and meetings, inter alia, for the assembly of witnesses; and (c) to authorize the responsible Libyan officials to respond to any request made by the examining magistrate for judicial information.

By a letter dated 20 December 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³² the representative of the United Kingdom transmitted three statements made, respectively, by the Lord Advocate of Scotland on 14 November 1991, by the Foreign Secretary in the House of Commons on the same day, and by the British Government on 27 November 1991. In his statement, the Lord Advocate announced his conclusion, following an investigation of almost three years, that there was sufficient evidence to justify the issuance of warrants for the arrest of two named Libyan intelligence officers on charges alleging their involvement in the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988. He stated that a demand was being made to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for the surrender of the accused for trial. He added that a simultaneous announcement was being made in Washington by the Attorney General of the United States following the handing down of an indictment by a grand jury in Washington.

The Foreign Secretary recalled, in his statement, that 270 people had been killed in the crash of the flight at Lockerbie, 66 of them British. He repeated the demand, on behalf of the whole Government, that the Libyan authorities surrender the accused to stand trial, stressing that the accusations were of the gravest possible kind: this was a mass murder, which was alleged to involve the organs of government of a State.

In the statement issued by the British Government, it was indicated that, following the issue of warrants against the two Libyan officials for their involvement in the Lockerbie incident, the Government had demanded of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya the surrender of the two accused for trial but that it had thus far received no satisfactory response from the Libyan authorities. It also referred to a joint declaration made that day by the British and American Governments in which they had declared that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya must take the following steps: surrender for trial all those charged with the crime, and accept complete responsibility for the actions of Libyan officials; disclose all it knew of the crime, including the names of all those responsible, and allow full access to all witnesses, documents and other material evidence; and pay appropriate compensation.

By a letter dated 20 December 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³³ the representative of the United States transmitted a statement that had been issued by his Government on 27 November 1991 regarding the bombing of Pan Am flight 103. The Government stated that the indictments of 14 November had been conveyed to the Libyan regime.

By a further letter dated 20 December 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁴ the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States transmitted the text of a tripartite declaration on terrorism issued by their Governments on 27 November, following the investigation into the bombings of flights Pan Am 103 and UTA 772. The declaration noted that, following an investigation, the three States had presented specific demands to the Libyan authorities related to the judicial proceedings that were under way. They required that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya comply with all those demands, and, in addition, commit itself concretely and definitively to cease all forms of terrorist action and all assistance to terrorist groups. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya must promptly, by concrete actions, prove its renunciation of terrorism.

By a letter dated 23 December 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁵ the representative of the United States transmitted a copy of the indictment handed down by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia on 14 November 1991 in connection with the bombing of Pan Am flight 103.

Decision of 21 January 1992 (3033rd meeting):
resolution 731 (1992)

At its 3033rd meeting, held on 21 January 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 (S/23306, S/23307, S/23308, S/23309, S/23317)". The Council considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Canada, the Congo, Iraq, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, the Sudan and Yemen, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, at the request of the representative of Morocco, to extend an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Adnan Omran, Under-Secretary-General of LAS, and Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of OIC.

The President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by France, the United Kingdom and the United States.³⁶ He also drew their attention to four letters from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, respectively: letters dated 20 and 29 November 1991³⁷ and letters dated 17 and 18 January 1992.³⁸ The latter two letters transmitted an Arab League resolution of 16 January 1992, reiterating its call for a joint commission of the United Nations and the League and mediation by the Secretary-General of the United Nations; and a letter from the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the Secretary of State of the United States and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, calling for arbitration under article 14 of the 1971 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation.

At the outset of the debate, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that, although the announcement by the Lord Advocate of Scotland and the indictment by the United States grand jury were ostensibly based on an arduous four-year investigation, no supporting evidence or proof had been made available. That meant either that the United States and United Kingdom indictments were intended as final, unequivocal judgements on which there was to be no further discussion or that the evidence and proof behind them were not serious, and that the accusations were based on guesswork. Despite the weakness of the indictments, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had treated the matter seriously and had taken a number of steps to conduct its own judicial investigation. However, that investigation had not made significant progress, owing to the lack of cooperation by the United Kingdom, the United States and France and their refusal to hand over the files of their investigations. Despite the considerations supporting Libyan national jurisdiction, the competent Libyan authorities had indicated that they would welcome a neutral international investigating committee or a reference of the question to the International Court of Justice. The other parties, however, had not only rejected that position, but had requested the extradition of the two Libyan nationals to stand trial in their own courts. He affirmed that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had cooperated and was still ready to cooperate to the fullest extent, within the context of absolute respect for international arguments, established norms, prevailing legal systems, and human rights. He stressed that in his country's view the issue before the Security Council was a legal one — concerning a conflict of jurisdiction and a dispute in connection with a request for extradition — over which the Council had no competence. In making recommendations in this respect, the Council should bear in mind that, pursuant to Article 36, paragraph 3, of the Charter, “legal disputes should as a general rule be referred to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the Statute of the Court”. What the Council was competent to consider was a dispute of a political nature in which the parties had not followed any of the means for peaceful settlement set out in Article 33 of the Charter. In such a case, the Council could call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such peaceful means. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had frequently declared its readiness to negotiate and accept mediation and other peaceful means to settle the dispute. The Council should at least call upon the other parties to respond favourably to that expression of readiness. It should also recommend settlement of the dispute through the diverse legal channels that were available, not only within the framework of the Charter but under the more relevant international conventions, such as the 1971 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation (the Montreal Convention). The speaker stated that on the basis of that Convention, particularly its article 14, his country had officially requested of the United States and the United Kingdom that the dispute be referred to arbitration. Before the Council, it requested that those countries be invited to enter promptly into negotiations with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on proceedings leading to arbitration and an arbitration panel. A short and fixed deadline could be set for those proceedings, after which, if no agreement was reached on arbitration, the matter would be brought before the International Court of Justice. Turning to the draft resolution, the speaker questioned how the Council could adopt a resolution urging the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to respond fully and effectively to illegal requests and asking other countries to urge it to do so. He added that the participation of the parties to the dispute in the voting on the draft resolution would constitute a violation of the explicit provisions of Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter.³⁹

The Under-Secretary-General of the League of Arab States, Mr. Adnan Omran, stated that during the past month the League had made every possible effort, through the contacts made by its Secretary-General with all the parties concerned, to reach a peaceful solution to the situation. The Council of the League had also held two emergency meetings, on 5 December 1991 and 16 January 1992, and adopted two resolutions.⁴⁰ The two resolutions could, he said, be summed up by the following two points: first, condemnation of terrorism in all its forms and of the incident of the downing of the American aircraft; and, second, support for the position of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, which denied any responsibility for the incident, condemned terrorism in all its forms, and expressed its willingness to find a solution of the question in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter and to place the question before a neutral international commission of inquiry. Based on that willingness, the League had proposed the establishment of a joint commission of the United Nations and LAS to study all documentation relating to the matter. In the light of those investigations, suitable measures could be taken. The League also hoped that the Council would entrust the Secretary-General with the task of exercising his good offices with all the parties concerned.⁴¹

The representative of Mauritania, speaking on behalf of the five States members of the Arab Maghreb Union,⁴² said it was desirable for the spirit of dialogue and compromise to replace the logic of confrontation of the cold war era. He drew attention to Article 33 of the Charter, which called upon the parties to a dispute to seek a solution by peaceful means. In the present case, which appeared to be a question essentially juridical in nature — a question for the settlement of which the Libyan side had made concrete proposals for cooperation — the Council should explore all ways and means leading to a peaceful solution based on international legality. It should take into account the appeals for moderation made, in particular, by the Arab Maghreb Union, OIC and LAS. He also expressed concern at seeing the Council having recourse to controversial procedures that might negatively affect the authority of its decisions and risk setting a dangerous precedent.⁴³

A number of other non-members of the Council,⁴⁴ while condemning all forms and types of terrorism, expressed support for the position of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and emphasized the need to resolve the dispute by negotiations, mediation and judicial machinery, in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter; some stressed that the question should be dealt with in a legal framework. One regretted that the draft resolution went beyond the explicit rule of international law set out in the 1971 Montreal Convention, which gave contracting States the choice to prosecute or extradite alleged offenders.⁴⁵ Others welcomed the involvement of the Security Council, recalling that its concern in respect of matters of international terrorism was not new.⁴⁶ They hoped that it would build upon its prior condemnation of all acts of unlawful interference against the security of civil aviation and make a constructive contribution to bringing such criminal acts to an end. They strongly endorsed the draft resolution and hoped that the Libyan authorities would promptly and effectively comply with its provisions.

The Council then started the voting procedure on the draft resolution. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Zimbabwe said that the Security Council was doing the right thing in addressing the issue before it, as international terrorism constituted a grave threat to international peace and security. The draft resolution sought to achieve two main objectives, namely, to send a clear message that the Council was determined to deal firmly with terrorism; and to ensure that the accused were brought to trial. In Zimbabwe's view, that had to be achieved on the basis of the established legal norms and the existing international legal instruments applicable to acts of terrorism, in particular the 1971 Montreal Convention, which sought to implement the traditional precept of aut dedere, aut punire (extradite or punish). Zimbabwe welcomed the clear role given to the Secretary-General in resolving the dispute, believing that it was appropriate that the Council took full advantage of his good offices.⁴⁷

The representative of Morocco considered that the cooperation requested in the draft resolution was fully justified with regard to the establishment of the facts, particularly the identity of the suspects in the case. However, with regard to the implications to be drawn from the responsibility of such persons, his country felt that the Council was touching upon the well-established principle of international law of "extradite or prosecute". Morocco did not share the view that adoption of the draft resolution enshrined any exception to that principle. The speaker added that the participation of the Secretary-General was the best guarantee of moving towards cooperation by all parties in establishing the truth and in implementing the legal proceedings already in train.⁴⁸

The representatives of Ecuador and Cape Verde echoed those views, stressing that their votes in favour of the draft resolution could not be regarded as favouring the setting of any precedent that could change the well-established rules and international practice on extradition; they looked to the Secretary-General to play a pivotal role in helping to bring about a negotiated solution.⁴⁹

The draft resolution⁵⁰ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 731 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Deeply disturbed by the world-wide persistence of acts of international terrorism in all its forms, including those in which States are directly or indirectly involved, which endanger or take innocent lives, have a deleterious effect on international relations and jeopardize the security of States,

Deeply concerned by all illegal activities directed against international civil aviation, and affirming the right of all States, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and relevant principles of international law, to protect their nationals from acts of international terrorism that constitute threats to international peace and security,

Reaffirming its resolution 286 (1970) of 9 September 1970, in which it called on States to take all possible legal steps to prevent any interference with international civil air travel,

Reaffirming also its resolution 635 (1989) of 14 June 1989, in which it condemned all acts of unlawful interference against the security of civil aviation and called upon all States to cooperate in devising and implementing measures to prevent all acts of terrorism, including those involving explosives,

Recalling the statement made on 30 December 1988 by the President of the Security Council on behalf of the members of the Council strongly condemning the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 and calling on all States to assist in the apprehension and prosecution of those responsible for this criminal act,

Deeply concerned over the results of investigations, which implicate officials of the Libyan Government and which are contained in Security Council documents that include the requests addressed to the Libyan authorities by France, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America in connection with the legal procedures related to the attacks carried out against Pan Am flight 103 and Union de transports aériens flight 772,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism,

1. Condemns the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 and Union de transports aériens flight 772 and the resultant loss of hundreds of lives;

2. Strongly deplores the fact that the Libyan Government has not yet responded effectively to the above requests to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts referred to above against Pan Am flight 103 and Union de transports aériens flight 772;

3. Urges the Libyan Government immediately to provide a full and effective response to those requests so as to contribute to the elimination of international terrorism;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to seek the cooperation of the Libyan Government to provide a full and effective response to those requests;

5. Urges all States individually and collectively to encourage the Libyan Government to respond fully and effectively to those requests;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States observed that the Council had been confronted with the extraordinary situation of a State and its officials being implicated in two ghastly bombings of civilian airliners. This was a situation to which standard procedures clearly did not apply. The issue at hand was not some difference of opinion or approach that could be mediated or negotiated. It was, as the Council had just recognized, conduct threatening to everyone, and a direct threat to international peace and security. The mandate of the Council required that it squarely face its responsibilities in this case; it must not be distracted by Libyan attempts to convert this issue of international peace and security into one of bilateral differences. In adopting resolution 731 (1992), the Council had responded in a careful and prudent manner to a unique situation involving State-sponsored terrorist attacks on civil aviation. It had clearly reaffirmed the right of all States, in accordance with the Charter, to protect their citizens. The resolution made it clear that neither the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya nor any other State could seek to hide support for international terrorism behind traditional principles of international law and State practice. The Council would now be watching carefully how the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya responded. If further action should be necessary, which it hoped would not be the case, the United States was convinced that the Council was ready on a continuing basis to face up to its responsibilities.⁵¹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, noted that the Council was meeting that day to consider two of the most horrific acts of terrorism that the world had seen. He stressed that it was the clear indication of Libyan Government involvement which had led his Government, together with those of France and the United States, to bring before the Council the failure of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with their requests that the accused be made available for trial in Scotland or the United States and to cooperate with the French judicial authorities. It was this exceptional circumstance of government involvement that had made it appropriate for the Council to adopt a resolution urging the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with those requests. Over two months had passed since the requests had been made. No effective response had been received. Instead, the Libyan authorities had prevaricated and resorted to diversionary tactics. The request of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for arbitration under article 14 of the Montreal Convention was not relevant to the issue before the Council. The Council was not, in the words of that provision, dealing with a dispute between two or more contracting parties concerning the interpretation or application of the Montreal Convention. It was concerned, rather, with the proper reaction of the international community to the situation arising from failure of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, thus far, to respond effectively to the most serious accusations of State involvement in acts of terrorism.

The two accused of bombing Pan Am flight 103 must face and receive a proper trial, either in Scotland where the crime had occurred or in the United States, as the aircraft was American. It had been suggested that the men might be tried in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. However, in the particular circumstances, there could be no confidence in the impartiality of the Libyan courts. As for the suggestion of a trial before some international tribunal, it was simply not practical: the International Court of Justice had no criminal jurisdiction; nor was there any other international tribunal with such jurisdiction. The speaker stated that, in addition to the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of those crimes, it was vital that the Council send an unequivocal message to other would-be terrorists. The Council's action should have an important deterrent effect. In future, terrorists operating with the connivance or support of a Government would know that they could be brought to trial in the country where their crime had been committed. The speaker stated that the Council was not, by the resolution just adopted, seeking to challenge in any way the domestic rules in those countries which prohibited the extradition of nationals, or to establish a broad precedent. It was dealing only with terrorism in which there was State involvement. In the circumstances of the present case, it must be clear to all that the State which was itself implicated in the acts of terrorism could not try its own officials.⁵²

The representative of France stated that the deliberate and wilful destruction of the French and American aircraft, causing the death of hundreds of victims, was a clear-cut case of international terrorism. The exceptional gravity of the attacks and the considerations connected with the restoration of law and security justified the Council's action. Like the previous speakers, he affirmed that the action could not constitute a precedent. He hoped that the unanimous reaction of the international community, as expressed in the resolution just adopted, would induce the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to respond quickly to the requests of the juridical authorities conducting the investigation.⁵³

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that it was important, in accordance with universally acknowledged legal norms, that the judicial organs of those countries to which the downed aircraft belonged and over whose territory the crime was committed should be allowed to deal with the case under consideration. The trial should be open and impartial. He added that the efforts of the international community to respond to the threat to international security and stability posed by acts of terrorism against civil aviation must be strengthened. The Russian Federation had supported the resolution just adopted in the belief that it was a step in that direction.⁵⁴

The representative of China said that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted as it condemned terrorism and incorporated constructive proposals made by the non-aligned members which his delegation supported. However, he wished to reiterate his country's belief that the problem could be solved through consultations and diplomacy. Such an approach would avoid increasing the tension and would contribute to the maintenance of regional peace and security, as well as to upholding the Charter and the principles of international law. He stressed that the adoption of the resolution should not lead to any drastic action or exacerbate tensions.⁵⁵

The representative of India stated that by adopting resolution 731 (1992) the Council had taken cognizance of a dispute involving two or more States in an issue of manifest concern to the international community — international terrorism; the Council's need to act in the maintenance of international peace and security was therefore legitimate. However, the Council's decision could not be considered precedent setting. He stressed, moreover, the importance of recognizing and respecting national sovereignty, particularly in cases such as the one under consideration where delicate and complex international issues with implications for national sovereignty were concerned. He welcomed the Council's invocation of the services of the Secretary-General in the matter, adding that it was his delegation's understanding that the Secretary-General would report to the Council on the outcome of his efforts.⁵⁶

The representative of Venezuela said that the inability of the General Assembly to take a stand on the establishment of an international criminal tribunal had made it necessary for the Council to act. Although the measure just adopted was exceptional and had involved problems for many countries in the area of jurisdiction and extradition of nationals, the Council did have the necessary competence and had to be prepared to assume the enormous responsibility involved in filling the institutional gap, the result of the lack of alternative machinery to deal with crimes against mankind. There was no doubt that the action taken unanimously by the Council conferred legitimacy and representativeness on the resolution, the premise of which was limited strictly to acts of terrorism involving State participation. The speaker added in that regard that the countries that had sponsored resolution 731 (1992) — France, the United Kingdom and the United States — had worked with the group of non-aligned countries represented in the Council and had declared that the resolution was exceptional by its nature and could not be regarded in any way as a precedent, but was intended solely for those cases in which States were involved in acts of terrorism. Like other speakers, he expressed the hope that a peaceful settlement of the dispute could be achieved and, accordingly, deemed the urgent and active participation of the Secretary-General to be of special political and institutional importance.⁵⁷

Letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991

Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 731 (1992)

Further report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 731 (1992)

Decision of 31 March 1992 (3063rd meeting): resolution 748 (1992)

On 11 February 1992, the Secretary-General, pursuant to resolution 731 (1992), submitted to the Security Council a report on his efforts to seek the cooperation of the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to provide a full and effective response to the requests referred to in resolution 731 (1992).⁵⁸ He informed the Council that the position of the Libyan authorities was as follows: (a) the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had decided to accept “the French demands since they were in conformity with international law and did not infringe upon the sovereignty of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya”, and had asked the Secretary-General to so inform the Government of France. The Libyan authorities had also requested that the Secretary-General either set up a mechanism for the implementation of that aspect of the resolution or ask France and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to negotiate such a mechanism themselves; (b) as far as resolution 731 (1992) as a whole was concerned, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was ready to cooperate fully with the Security Council and with the Secretary-General “in the light of the statements made in the Security Council and in a way that would not infringe upon State sovereignty or violate the Charter of the United Nations and principles of international law”. Believing that a mechanism should be created for the implementation of resolution 731 (1992), the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had invited the Secretary-General to create such a mechanism or to call upon the parties concerned to set one up. The Secretary-General had explained that his own role under resolution 731 (1992) was determined by the provisions of paragraph 4 of that resolution.

On 3 March 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992).⁵⁹ He stated that, after the issuance of his previous report, he had met on 17 February with the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States. They had asked him to convey to the Libyan leader the following points on behalf of their Governments: (a) the expressed readiness of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to abide by resolution 731 (1992) represented a step forward only if it was supported by action; (b) in that connection, the three Governments supported the request of the Government of France and wished to be informed of the mechanism by which the Libyan authorities would hand over the records and documentation requested, and of where and when they intended to do so; (c) they also would like to know the time, place and modality of the hand-over by the Libyan authorities of the two persons charged and the information and evidence requested, and the precise measures the Libyan Government intended to take in order to end its support for terrorism in all its forms; (d) the three Governments had no objection to the hand-over taking place through the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992); (e) they believed that their requests were clear and precise and that they did not require further clarification; and (f) with regard to the question of compensation, they sought to obtain assurances from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on its responsibility.

The Secretary-General reported that, in the course of two meetings with the Secretary-General's envoy, Colonel Qaddafi, the head of the Libyan State, had made the following points: (a) there were constitutional obstructions preventing the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya from handing over its citizens for trial abroad in the absence of an extradition treaty; (b) he might address an appeal to the Libyan people through the People's Committee, which might result in the removal of those obstructions; he did not indicate how long it might take to overcome the existing constitutional hurdles; (c) once the constitutional problems had been solved, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya could be inclined to consider France as a possible venue for a trial of the Libyan citizens; however, France had not requested that any suspects be handed over to it for trial; (d) the suspects were free to hand themselves over voluntarily and the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would not prevent them from doing so; (e) the possibility of handing over the suspects to the authorities of a third country, such as Malta or any Arab country, for trial might be considered; (f) improvement of bilateral relations between the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the United States would make it possible to hand over the two suspects to the United States authorities; (g) the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was prepared to cooperate in every way possible to put an end to terrorist activities and sever its relations with all groups and organizations that targeted innocent civilians; it would not allow its territory, citizens or organizations to be used in any way for carrying out terrorist acts directly or indirectly, and would punish most severely anyone proved to be involved in such acts; (h) the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya considered that it was premature to discuss the question of compensation, which could only follow from a civil judgement; however, it guaranteed the payment of any compensation should Libyan nationals be found responsible and be unable to pay; and (i) the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya agreed to the French requests, and set out the means for giving effect to them.

The Secretary-General concluded from the foregoing that, while resolution 731 (1992) had not yet been complied with, there had been a certain evolution in the position of the Libyan authorities since his last report. He added that the Council might wish to consider that in deciding on its future course of action.

At its 3063rd meeting, held on 31 March 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's two reports in its agenda. The Council invited the representatives of Iraq, Jordan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania and Uganda, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also extended, at the request of the representative of Morocco, an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Mr. Engin Ansay, Observer of OIC.

The President (Venezuela) then drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by France, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁶⁰ He also drew their attention to the following letters: letters dated 25 February and 18 March 1992 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya addressed to the Secretary-General;⁶¹ a letter dated 26 February 1992 from the representative of Portugal addressed to the Secretary-General;⁶² and a letter dated 23 March 1992 from the representative of Jordan addressed to the President of the Security Council.⁶³

At the same meeting, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the primary objective of the United Nations and the Security Council, as laid down in Article 1 of the Charter, was to act by peaceful means in conformity with the principles of justice and international law in order to settle international disputes which might lead to a breach of the peace. Proceeding from that principle, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had expressed its willingness to find a peaceful and just solution to the dispute under consideration, reaffirmed its readiness to cooperate with the Secretary-General, and put forward many proposals. It was incorrect, therefore, to claim that his Government had not fully and effectively responded to the demands contained in resolution 731 (1992). He noted that, in accordance with Chapter VI of the Charter, particularly paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 36, the Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which had already been adopted by the parties, and the fact that legal disputes should, as a general rule, be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice. He recalled, in that regard, that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had submitted the dispute to the International Court of Justice. Instead of taking those factors into account, however, the Council had bent to the requests of three States and moved directly to the implementation of Chapter VII of the Charter. He stated that the sponsors of the draft resolution had ignored Articles 39 and 40 and jumped directly to Article 41, threatening the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with sanctions. He recalled that Article 39 related to action with respect to a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression. That was not the case in the matter before the Council; the matter was a legal dispute concerning who should investigate the accused and who should put them on trial. Article 40 called upon the Council, before making the recommendations or deciding upon the measures provided for in Article 39, to call upon the parties to a dispute to comply with such provisional measures as it deemed necessary or desirable; the Council must take account of whether the parties to the dispute did or did not take such provisional measures. None of that had taken place. He concluded by expressing the hope that the Council would not take any measures that would adversely affect the credibility of the United Nations.⁶⁴

The representative of Jordan, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States at the United Nations, recalled that the League of Arab States had called for the establishment of a joint committee of the United Nations and LAS to achieve a peaceful settlement of the crisis; emphasized the need to resolve the conflict through negotiations, in accordance with Article 33 of the Charter; and urged the Security Council to avoid adopting any resolution calling for military, economic or diplomatic actions that might have a negative impact on the region, pending a decision by the International Court of Justice on the case submitted to it, and before giving a chance to the Committee established by LAS to produce results. He stressed that the Arab efforts within the League had not yet been exhausted and that they would be adversely affected by the adoption of the draft resolution before the Council. He noted that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had confirmed its desire to contain the crisis and resolve it in accordance with international law and the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter. Instead of rushing to put the draft resolution to the vote, the Council should give adequate time to all parties concerned and the Secretary-General, to seek a peaceful settlement within the framework of the Charter, especially its Article 33.⁶⁵

The representative of Mauritania, speaking on behalf of the five States members of the Arab Maghreb Union,⁶⁶ expressed concern that the draft resolution, in providing for sanctions, would condemn the Libyan people for an act for which responsibility had not yet been established. He believed that sanctions could be avoided, especially since the issue was basically juridical in nature and was currently before the International Court of Justice. Moreover, the Libyan Government had stated its willingness to comply with resolution 731 (1992), as well as with any judgement of the Court.⁶⁷

Mr. Engin Ansay, Observer of OIC, urged that economic or military action against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya be averted, especially since the latter had indicated its willingness to cooperate with the Council.⁶⁸

The representative of Iraq asked, in relation to the draft resolution, whether the Council had exhausted all the means available to it under Chapter VI to secure compliance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with resolution 731 (1992) and whether the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had rejected that resolution, enabling the Council to move on to enforcement measures under Chapter VII; whether the Council had taken into account the adverse economic effects of the resolution on neighbouring States; and whether it had taken into account the humanitarian needs of the Libyan civilian population when it had considered and opted for enforcement measures.⁶⁹

The Council then started the voting procedure on the draft resolution. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde stated that he intended to abstain for several reasons. First, the International Court of Justice should have a role to play whenever a legal issue was at stake, as mentioned in Article 36 (3) of the Charter. It would therefore be more appropriate for the Council to act after the Court — which was now seized with the matter — had decided the issue of jurisdiction. It was difficult, moreover, for Cape Verde to endorse measures that could run counter to its constitution which did not allow the extradition of its own nationals. Finally, his delegation believed that sanctions should be adopted only as a last resort and that the Council should first exhaust all possibilities for a negotiated peaceful solution. In the present case, had there been more time, a negotiated solution might have been worked out for the surrender of the two individuals.⁷⁰

The representative of Zimbabwe also expressed disquiet at invoking Chapter VII of the Charter in the circumstances. He thought that such action would be hasty, disregarded the Secretary-General's views, and overlooked some pertinent provisions of the Charter. In his view, recourse to sanctions should be considered only as a last resort, following the exhaustion of peaceful diplomatic means provided for under Chapter VI. That stage had not yet been reached. He observed, moreover, that the dispute before the Council was also the subject of consideration by the International Court of Justice. While there were no specific provisions in the Charter that precluded parallel considerations of the matter by the Council and the Court, he believed that the authors of the Charter intended the two bodies to complement each other's efforts rather than proceed in a manner that could produce contradictory results. He warned that by taking the Chapter VII route while the case was still pending before the world Court, the Council was risking a major institutional crisis. In his view, it would have been preferable for the Council to await the outcome of the judicial proceedings.⁷¹

The representative of India expressed support for the primary objective of the sponsors of the draft resolution — namely, to serve an unambiguous notice on all those engaged in acts of terrorism of the determination of the international community to combat terrorism and eradicate it. He had some differences, however, with the sponsors about the methods and means suggested at that stage, and would accordingly abstain in the voting. He considered that the Council should take into account the considered judgement of the Secretary-General and the prevailing sentiment among the wider membership of the United Nations in taking such significant decisions. There had been some recent developments which suggested that more time and patience in the quest for a peaceful solution could have yielded better results. A related matter concerned the definition of the circumstances under which the sanctions either would not come into force at all or would be lifted. The non-aligned members of the Council and others had explored with the sponsors the injection of more precision into the relevant paragraphs. Regrettably, however, it had not been possible to remove the vagueness from the draft resolution on that point. He noted, further, that the judicial proceedings before the International Court of Justice had not yet run their course. A little delay in the Council's moving on to the next stage of its action would, therefore, have merited positive consideration. Finally, he highlighted the importance of Article 50 of the Charter. It was intended as the acknowledgement of the Council's responsibility to alleviate special problems of third countries arising from their carrying out enforcement measures under Chapter VII. In the light of past experience, his delegation considered that the draft resolution should have reflected that responsibility more clearly, as well as the Council's commitment to take concrete and effective measures to address urgently all such problems brought to its notice.⁷²

The representative of China explained that his country would abstain in the voting as it did not support the imposition of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; they would not help settle the question but would further complicate the issue, aggravate regional tension and have serious economic consequences for the countries in the region. He appealed to the parties to continue their efforts to resolve their differences and hoped that the Secretary-General would continue to play an active role in that regard.⁷³

The representative of Morocco stated that his country, too, would abstain. Calling the attention of the sponsors of the draft resolution to Chapter VI of the Charter and Article 33, he said there remained every reason to hope that a peaceful diplomatic solution was achievable. His country would pursue its efforts, both through direct contacts and within the framework of the Arab Maghreb Union and LAS, to achieve such a solution.⁷⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 10 votes in favour to none against, with 5 abstentions (Cape Verde, China, India, Morocco, Zimbabwe), as resolution 748 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992,

Noting the reports of the Secretary-General of 11 February and 3 March 1992 submitted pursuant to paragraph 4 of Security Council resolution 731 (1992), Deeply concerned that the Libyan Government has still not provided a full and effective response to the requests in its resolution 731 (1992),

Convinced that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States are directly or indirectly involved, is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling that, in the statement issued on 31 January 1992 on the occasion of the meeting of the Security Council at the level of heads of State and Government, the members of the Council expressed their deep concern over acts of international terrorism, and emphasized the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts,

Reaffirming that, in accordance with the principle in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, every State has the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when such acts involve a threat or use of force,

Determining, in this context, that the failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests in resolution 731 (1992) constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to eliminate international terrorism,

Recalling the right of States, under Article 50 of the Charter, to consult the Security Council where they find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Decides that the Libyan Government must now comply without any further delay with paragraph 3 of resolution

(b) Prohibit, by their nationals or from their territory, the supply of any aircraft or aircraft components to Libya, the provision of engineering and maintenance servicing of Libyan aircraft or aircraft components, the certification of airworthiness for Libyan aircraft, the payment of new claims against existing insurance contracts and the provision of new direct insurance for Libyan aircraft;

(c) Withdraw any of their officials or agents present in Libya to advise the Libyan authorities on military matters;

6. Decides that all States shall:

(a) Significantly reduce the number and the level of the staff at Libyan diplomatic missions and consular posts and restrict or control the movement within their territory of all such staff who remain; in the case of Libyan missions to international organizations, the host State may, as it deems necessary, consult the organization concerned on the measures required to implement this subparagraph;

(b) Prevent the operation of all Libyan Arab Airlines offices;

⁷⁴ Ibid., pp. 61-64.

(c) Take all appropriate steps to deny entry to or expel Libyan nationals who have been denied entry to or expelled from other States because of their involvement in terrorist activities;

7. Calls upon all States, including States not members of the United Nations, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to 15 April 1992;

8. Requests all States to report to the Secretary-General by 15 May 1992 on the measures they have instituted for meeting the obligations set out in paragraphs 3 to 7 above;

(b) To seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 above;

(c) To consider any information brought to its attention by States concerning violations of the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 above and, in that context, to make recommendations to the Council on ways to increase their effectiveness;

(d) To recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 above and provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States;

(e) To consider and to decide upon expeditiously any application by States for the approval of flights on grounds of significant humanitarian need in accordance with paragraph 4 above;

(f) To give special attention to any communications in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations from any neighbouring or other State with special economic problems that might arise from the carrying out of the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 above;

10. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully with the Committee in the fulfilment of its task, including supplying such information as may be sought by the Committee in pursuance of the present resolution;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Committee and to make the necessary arrangements in the Secretariat for this purpose;

12. Invites the Secretary-General to continue his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992);

13. Decides that the Security Council shall, every one hundred and twenty days or sooner, should the situation so require, review the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 above in the light of the compliance by the Libyan Government with paragraphs 1 and 2 above taking into account, as appropriate, any reports provided by the Secretary-General on his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992);

14. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the evidence of Libyan involvement in the terrorist acts against the two civilian airliners indicated a serious breach of international peace and security. It fully justified the adoption of sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter as the appropriate next step in response to the refusal of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with the specific requests made in resolution 731 (1992). The sanctions were measured, precise and limited. They were a multilateral, non-violent and peaceful response to violent and brutal acts. They were tailored to fit the offence and designed to penalize the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, not its neighbours or any other State. By imposing sanctions, the international community was sending two clear signals: that it would not tolerate such threats to international peace and security; and that it was prepared to take concerted political action against the continuing defiance of international obligations and norms of behaviour represented by Libyan State-supported terrorism. That message was the surest guarantee that the Security Council, using its specific, unique powers under the Charter, would preserve the rule of law and ensure the peaceful resolution of threats to international peace and security, now and in the future. The pause in the implementation of the sanctions gave the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya the opportunity to bring this chapter to an end quickly; the choice was up to it.⁷⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that 10 weeks had passed since the adoption of resolution 731 (1992); yet the Libyan Government had taken no serious step towards compliance with the requests of the three Governments as it had been urged to do. It was some four months since those requests had first been made, and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya continued to prevaricate and to impede action by the Council. One of the Libyan suggestions had been that compliance with the requests in resolution 731 (1992) should await the outcome of the proceedings instituted by it in the International Court of Justice. The United Kingdom believed that the application of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was in fact directed at interfering with the exercise by the Council of its functions and prerogatives under the Charter of the United Nations. The Council was fully entitled to deal with issues of terrorism and the measures needed to address acts of terrorism in any particular case or to prevent it in the future. Any other view would undermine the primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security conferred on the Council by Article 24 of the Charter. Regrettably, the efforts made by the Secretary-General, by many Governments, and the Arab Ministers who had gone to Tripoli the week before had been unsuccessful in persuading the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to comply with resolution 731 (1992). That was why the Council now needed to take a further step. The resolution just adopted was a proportionate and carefully measured response to the threat posed by the Libyan Government's actions in support of terrorism and its failure to respond positively to resolution 731 (1992). The sole objective of the sanctions imposed by the resolution was to secure compliance with paragraphs 1 and 2 thereof. The sanctions themselves were tailored precisely to that objective, being limited to three specific areas: aviation, arms and Libyan Government overseas offices and officials. The speaker added that the resolution took account of a number of concerns raised by members of the Council. Thus, for example, the exception for humanitarian flights had been designed so as to cover flights connected with the hajj. It also included, at the request of certain neighbouring countries, references to the right of States, under Article 50, to consult the Council if they were confronted with special economic problems as a result of the sanctions. Noting that the sanctions, themselves, would not be brought into force until 15 April, he expressed the hope that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would use the pause to take the steps required to avoid the imposition of sanctions. Finally, he noted that the review clause in paragraph 13 of the resolution made it clear that the Council would be ready to respond positively in the event of Libyan compliance.⁷⁶

The representative of France, too, underlined that the sanctions imposed were balanced, appropriate and

selective. They applied to three areas — arms, aviation and diplomatic and consular personnel — that could be used to support international terrorism; and were not aimed at the Libyan people. He concluded by stressing that the resolution provided the Libyan leaders with a final deadline of 15 April and hoped that they would make proper use of the delay.⁷⁷

The representatives of Belgium, Hungary and the Russian Federation observed that for two months the Secretary-General, LAS and other countries had sought to convince the Libyan authorities to heed the will of the international community. As those efforts had not produced the desired results, the Council had no alternative but to adopt another resolution providing for enforcement action, to preserve the Council's credibility and ensure compliance with its previous resolution. The speakers hoped that the Libyan Government would take advantage of the two-week delay before the imposition of sanctions to reconsider its position.⁷⁸

The representative of Austria echoed the view that the envisaged sanctions were not punishment; they were intended to make a member of the international community comply with its obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. He added that they would have to be lifted once full implementation by the country concerned had been achieved. That was why Austria had always stressed the necessity of establishing objective criteria for the provisions on the termination of sanctions. In that context, the speaker drew attention in particular to paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 748 (1992).⁷⁹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Venezuela, said that it was his delegation's understanding that the Council and the International Court of Justice were independent of each other, and that each of those organs in the United Nations system should exercise its jurisdiction autonomously. Although it would have been desirable for there to be a simultaneous decision by the two forums, the absence of such a decision could not inhibit the actions which one or other of them might take.⁸⁰

Decision of 12 August 1992: statement by the President

On 12 August 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President of the Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸¹

The members of the Council held informal consultations on 12 August 1992 pursuant to paragraph 13 of resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, by which the Council decided to review every 120 days or sooner, should the situation so require, the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement among members of the Council that the necessary conditions existed for modification of the measures of sanctions established in paragraphs 3 to 7 of resolution 748 (1992).

of procedure of the Security Council, requested an urgent meeting of the Council to bring to its attention the violation of the diplomatic mission of Venezuela in Tripoli on 2 April 1992. He stated that the incident not only constituted a direct violation of international law, as it involved the non-observance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of the basic duties of all host States to provide appropriate security and protection to diplomatic missions in their territories; it was also a hostile act directly related to action taken against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by the Security Council in resolution 748 (1992), adopted on 31 March 1992.⁸⁴

statement by the President

At its 3064th meeting, on 2 April 1992, the Security Council included the letter from Venezuela in its agenda and began consideration of the item. At the same meeting, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Council, the President (Zimbabwe) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸⁵

The Council strongly condemns the violent attacks on and destruction of the premises of the Embassy of Venezuela in Tripoli that took place today. The fact that these intolerable and extremely grave events have been directed not only against the Government of Venezuela but also against and in reaction to Council resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992 underlines the seriousness of the situation.

The Council demands that the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya take all necessary measures to honour its international legal obligations to ensure the security of the personnel and to protect the property of the Embassy of Venezuela and of all other diplomatic and consular premises or personnel present in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, including ⁸⁴ See also a letter of 2 April 1992 from the representative of Venezuela to the President of the Council, transmitting a public statement issued by the Government of Venezuela concerning the attack (S/23776). The statement reported that a mob of students had broken into the Embassy, shouting slogans against Venezuela because of the latter's vote in the Security Council in favour of the "anti-terrorist" resolution on 31 March 1992, and had ransacked and destroyed the premises. Neither the Libyan guards assigned to protect the Embassy nor anyone from the Tripoli police force had intervened to stop the looting and arson, which had been carried out with complete impunity. those of the United Nations and related organizations, from acts of violence and terrorism.

The Council further demands that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya pay to the Government of Venezuela immediate and full compensation for the damage caused.

Any suggestion that those acts of violence were not directed against the Government of Venezuela but against and in reaction to resolution 748 (1992) is extremely serious and totally unacceptable.

By a letter dated 8 April 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁸⁶ the representative of Venezuela reported on the official reply received from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the Venezuelan protest note. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had conveyed its “deepest regret and apologies” for the damage sustained by the Venezuelan Embassy in Tripoli. It had also stated in its note that it took responsibility for the consequences of the incident and would provide compensation “in the fairest manner so as to satisfy the Government of Venezuela”.

4. The situation in Mozambique

Initial proceedings

By a letter dated 10 August 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ the representative of Mozambique transmitted the text of a Joint Declaration signed at Rome on 7 August 1992 by the President of Mozambique and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (RENAMO), in connection with the ongoing peace process in Mozambique. The parties agreed therein, inter alia, to accept the role of the international community, and especially that of the United Nations, in monitoring and guaranteeing the implementation of a contemplated General Peace Agreement, particularly the ceasefire and the electoral process.

By a letter dated 6 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,² the representative of Mozambique transmitted a letter dated 4 October 1992 from the President of Mozambique to the Secretary-General, enclosing the text of a General Peace Agreement for Mozambique signed that day in Rome by the Government of Mozambique and RENAMO. In his letter, the President of Mozambique requested the participation of the United Nations in monitoring and ensuring implementation of the Agreement, in providing technical assistance for the general elections, and in monitoring those elections. He also asked the Secretary-General to inform the Security Council of his request that a United Nations team be sent to Mozambique to monitor the Agreement until the holding of general elections which would take place one year after the signing of the Agreement. According to protocol IV, the United Nations was expected to start its functions of verifying and monitoring the ceasefire upon the entry into force of the Agreement, which should take place no later than 15 October 1992. However, the Government wished to see the monitoring mechanisms established in the field as soon as possible.

On 9 October 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report,³ in which he described the status of the peace process, summarized the principal features of the General Peace Agreement, including the role proposed by the United Nations in monitoring it, and outlined an immediate plan of action. He noted that the Agreement provided for the following: a ceasefire which was to come into effect on the day on which the Agreement itself entered into force, not later than 15 October 1992; the separation of the two sides' forces and their concentration in certain designated assembly areas; demobilization and reintegration of those troops who were not to serve in the new Mozambican Defence Force, within six months of the entry into force of the Agreement; and, in parallel with these military arrangements, the creation of new political parties; preparations for presidential and legislative elections to take place simultaneously, one year after the entry into force of the Agreement; and the provision of humanitarian assistance. The United Nations was asked to undertake certain specific functions in relation to the ceasefire, the elections and humanitarian assistance, including chairing three key commissions: a commission to supervise and monitor the implementation of the General Peace Agreement, a ceasefire commission, and a Reintegration Commission. The Secretary-General stated his intention, subject to the approval of the Security Council, to appoint immediately an interim Special Representative to be in overall charge of the United Nations activities in support of the Agreement and to coordinate the humanitarian and other related efforts of the United Nations system in Mozambique during the implementation of the Agreement. As soon as appointed, the Special Representative would assist the parties in setting up the joint machinery to be chaired by the United Nations and in finalizing the modalities and conditions for the military arrangements. He would also, as a matter of priority, take all necessary steps to ensure access for relief workers to all those in need of humanitarian assistance throughout the country. The Secretary-General further recommended that up to 25 military observers be dispatched to Mozambique in the next few days to support the Special Representative in his initial tasks.⁴ The latter would be asked to submit an early report, upon which the Secretary-General would base recommendations to the Council for the deployment of a United Nations operation in Mozambique to carry out the functions envisaged for the United Nations in monitoring and assisting the implementation of the General Peace Agreement.

Decision of 13 October 1992 (3123rd meeting):

At its 3123rd meeting, held on 13 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 9 October in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned letters dated 10 August and 6 October 1992 from the representative of Mozambique addressed to the Secretary-General, and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of prior consultations.⁵ He also drew their attention to two amendments to the draft resolution as issued in its provisional form.

The representative of Mozambique welcomed the Council's initiative in taking action on the draft resolution by which the Council would, inter alia, approve the appointment by the Secretary-General of an interim Special Representative to Mozambique and the dispatch to the country of a first group of military observers. This would mark the beginning of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique to assist in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. It was just a first step, but a very important one: the whole philosophy and viability of the Agreement hinged on the crucial role to be played by the United Nations. He informed the Council that his country's Assembly had, on 12 October 1992, unanimously approved a law adopting that Agreement which would enter into force on 15 October 1992. The holding of the ceasefire, which would come into effect on the same day, depended largely on the work of the three commissions to be chaired by the United Nations and on the adequate and active presence of United Nations observers in the field. He therefore expected that the Council would continue to act expeditiously so as to ensure the urgent dispatch of the core elements of the Operation.⁶

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 782 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Welcoming the signature at Rome, on 4 October 1992, of a General Peace Agreement for Mozambique between the Government of Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana,

Considering that the signature of the Agreement constitutes an important contribution to the restoration of peace and security in the region,

Taking note of the Joint Declaration signed at Rome on 7 August 1992 by the President of the Republic of Mozambique and the President of the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana, in which the parties accept the role of the United Nations in monitoring and guaranteeing the implementation of the Agreement,

Decision of 27 October 1992 (3125th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 23 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁷ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in pursuance of resolution 782 (1992), he had appointed an interim Special Representative for Mozambique who had proceeded to Maputo with a team of military observers to assist the parties in setting up the joint machinery which was to be chaired by the United Nations, in finalizing the modalities and conditions for the military arrangements, and in carrying out other initial tasks. He noted that while the United Nations had established a token presence in Mozambique, the delays in establishing the agreed machinery and finalizing the modalities of the ceasefire severely limited the ability of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ) to carry out the tasks envisaged for the United Nations in the General Peace Agreement. Drawing attention to reported ceasefire violations by both sides, some very serious, the Secretary-General characterized the current situation in Mozambique as “critical”, and suggested that the Council might wish to consider making an appeal to all concerned to work effectively together to begin the implementation of the Peace Agreement.

At its 3125th meeting, held on 27 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General’s letter of 23 October.

⁷ The letter was circulated in the Council, but not issued as a document of the Council (see S/PV.3125, p. 2).

The President (France) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸

The Council has taken note of the letter of 23 October 1992 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council concerning the situation in Mozambique. It expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General and to his interim Special Representative for Mozambique for their efforts to ensure that the United Nations contributes to the implementation of the General Peace Agreement for Mozambique in accordance with the provisions of this Agreement.

The Council remains deeply concerned by the reports of major violations of the ceasefire in several regions of Mozambique. It calls upon the parties to halt such violations immediately and scrupulously to respect the ceasefire and all the commitments entered into under the Agreement. It also urges the parties to cooperate fully with the interim Special Representative of the Secretary-General, and in particular to take all measures necessary to ensure the safety of United Nations staff in Mozambique.

The Council wishes to reiterate its firm commitment to work towards a lasting peace in Mozambique. In this regard, it urges the parties to respect fully the ceasefire, which is a necessary condition for the speedy establishment of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique and its successful deployment.

Decision of 16 December 1992 (3149th meeting):

On 3 December 1992, pursuant to resolution 782 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report setting out his recommendations on the establishment and deployment of a United Nations Operation in Mozambique.⁹ He proposed that the mission’s mandate encompass a political, a military, an electoral and a humanitarian component, which would be fully integrated in the operational plan. He also recommended the presence of a United Nations police component to monitor the neutrality of the Mozambican police although no such role had been provided for in the Peace Agreement. He stated his intention to ask the interim Special Representative to reopen this matter with the parties and seek their concurrence. With regard to the presidential and legislative elections, scheduled to be held one year after the date of signature of the Agreement, the Secretary-General believed it critically important that they should not take place until the military aspects of the Agreement had been fully implemented. He stressed, however, that the peace process should not be drawn out indefinitely. He had therefore asked the interim Special Representative to give the highest priority to timely implementation of the ceasefire, the assembly, disarmament and demobilization of troops, and the formation of new armed forces.¹⁰ Finally, he stressed the magnitude and difficulty of the task which the United Nations had been asked to assume. To achieve in one year (of which a month and a half had already passed) the assembly, disarmament and demobilization of the two sides' troops, the formation of new armed forces, the resettlement of 5 to 6 million refugees and displaced persons, the provision of humanitarian relief to all parts of the country and the organization and conduct of elections would require a huge and cooperative effort by the Government of Mozambique and RENAMO, as well as by the international community, with the United Nations in the lead.¹¹ The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that "very substantial resources" be made available to ONUMOZ, especially on the military side: unless the military situation in the country was brought fully under control, it would not be possible to create the conditions for the holding of successful elections. He stressed, however, that the General Peace Agreement would not be implemented unless the Mozambican parties themselves made a determined effort to honour their commitments; the efforts of the United Nations could only be in support of theirs. On the basis of the foregoing, the Secretary-General recommended to the Council that it approve the establishment and deployment of ONUMOZ as set out in his report.

At its 3149th meeting, held on 16 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's report of 3 December. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Mozambique, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (India) drew the attention of the Council members to a note verbale dated 2 November 1992 from the representative of Senegal addressed to the Secretary-General,¹² transmitting the statement made by the President of Senegal, in his capacity as current Chairman of the Organization of African Unity, welcoming the signing of the General Peace Agreement in Mozambique and supporting the efforts for national reconciliation in that country. The President of the Council also drew attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of prior consultations.¹³

The representative of Mozambique stated that the Secretary-General's report constituted an important landmark in the efforts to achieve a lasting peace in his country. He reiterated his Government's readiness to fulfil all its obligations under the Peace Agreement and recorded its preparedness to cooperate fully in the implementation of the decisions the Council might take at the present meeting regarding ONUMOZ. He emphasized that the presence of the United Nations in Mozambique would be decisive not only to avoid delicate situations in the field but also to assist in meeting the growing challenges faced by Mozambicans: the consolidation of the ceasefire, the provision of humanitarian assistance to the victims of war and natural calamities, the resettlement of refugees and displaced persons, the reintegration of demobilized personnel, and the electoral process. The speaker recalled the recent establishment of the commissions envisaged in the Agreement, which had created the minimum conditions for its proper functioning. He stressed the importance of peacebuilding activities, particularly the provision of humanitarian relief, for the success of the operation. With regard to the monitoring of police activities, he trusted that ONUMOZ would fulfil its mandate in line with the Agreement, which provided for the establishment of a National Police Affairs Commission reporting to a Supervisory and Monitoring Commission.¹⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Zimbabwe said that, in spite of the increasing burden of peacekeeping operations, the United Nations and the international community should lend timely and adequate support to Mozambique to assist in consolidating the peace and reconstructing the country. His Government was confident that the Government of Mozambique and RENAMO shared the political will and determination to ensure that the Agreement was fully implemented, thus ensuring peace and prosperity not only for Mozambique but for the region as a whole.¹⁵

The representative of Cape Verde considered the United Nations presence in Mozambique to be of immense value and its effectiveness as vital to the success of the operation. He therefore encouraged the parties to extend their full cooperation to ONUMOZ, and appealed to countries in a position to do so to contribute voluntarily to the United Nations efforts.¹⁶

The representative of the United States said that his Government strongly supported the draft resolution. He put on record his Government's understanding of how matters would evolve pursuant to the draft resolution. First, the United States foresaw a phased introduction of peacekeeping forces into Mozambique, which would result in an effective and economic operation. Secondly, it hoped that the regular reporting by the Secretary-General, referred to in operative paragraph 2 of the text, would occur at least every three months. The United States was proud to have played a part in the negotiations which had led to the signing of the Peace Agreement, and would continue to be involved in the peace process through its active participation in the various United Nations-chaired commissions established under the Agreement. It would also join other donors in providing resources for the transition to peace in Mozambique.¹⁷

The representative of France stated that his Government welcomed the fact that Mozambique had finally embarked on the road to peace and national reconciliation, thus contributing to stability in southern Africa. It believed that the United Nations, particularly the Security Council, should respond positively to the parties' request for assistance, as it had done in other situations. By adopting the draft resolution, the Council would, once again, be committing major resources — both human and material — to help to implement the peace process. That effort would only be meaningful and fruitful if the United Nations could count on full compliance by the parties with all the commitments undertaken in the Peace Agreement, in particular the ceasefire. In that respect, the French Government endorsed the appeal and statement in paragraph 4 of the resolution that full respect by the parties of their commitments was a necessary condition for the fulfilment by ONUMOZ of its mandate.¹⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation, too, underlined the importance of the parties' cooperating fully with the interim Special Representative and with ONUMOZ, and respecting scrupulously the ceasefire and all their commitments under the Peace Agreement. He also emphasized the need for agreements to be reached speedily between the Secretary-General and the parties on the date for the holding of elections, and a timetable for carrying out the measures provided for under the Agreement. He added that there was a need to reduce the cost of the operation, but without prejudice to its effectiveness.¹⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 797 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 782 (1992) of 13 October 1992,

5. The situation in Namibia

Decision of 16 January 1989 (2842nd meeting): resolutions 628 (1989) and 629 (1989)

At its 2842nd meeting, held on 16 January 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in Namibia".

The President (Malaysia) drew the attention of the Council members to three documents: (a) a note verbale dated 14 December 1988 from the representative of the United States addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ transmitting the text of the Protocol of Brazzaville, signed by the representatives of Angola, Cuba and South Africa on 13 December 1988; the parties to the Protocol had agreed, inter alia, that 1 April 1989 be established as the date for implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978); (b) a note verbale dated 22 December 1988 from the representative of Cuba addressed to the President of the Security Council,² transmitting the text of the bilateral agreement between Angola and Cuba signed that day; the parties had agreed to the redeployment and the phased and total withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, in accordance with an annexed timetable, with total withdrawal to be concluded on 1 July 1991; through the Secretary-General, they requested the Security Council to carry out verification of the redeployment and withdrawal; and (c) a note verbale dated 22 December 1988 from the representative of the United States addressed to the Secretary-General,³ transmitting the text of the Tripartite Agreement signed by Angola, Cuba and South Africa on the same day, in which the parties had agreed, inter alia, to request the Secretary-General to seek authority from the Security Council to commence implementation of Council resolution 435 (1978) on 1 April 1989.

The President also drew the Council members' attention to two draft resolutions that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁴ pointing out a change in the order of the paragraphs in the second draft resolution.

The first draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 628 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 626 (1988) of 20 December 1988,

Taking note of the agreement between the People's Republic of Angola, the Republic of Cuba and the Republic of South Africa, signed on 22 December 1988,

Taking note also of the agreement between the People's Republic of Angola and the Republic of Cuba, signed on 22 December 1988,

Emphasizing the importance of these two agreements in strengthening international peace and security,

1. Welcomes the signature of the agreement between the People's Republic of Angola, the Republic of Cuba and the Republic of South Africa on the one hand, and of the agreement between the People's Republic of Angola and the Republic of Cuba on the other hand;

2. Expresses its full support for these agreements, and to that effect decides to follow closely the developments in their implementation;

3. Calls upon all parties concerned, as well as all Member States, to cooperate in the implementation of these agreements;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed on the implementation of this resolution.

The second draft resolution,⁵ as orally modified, was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 629 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its relevant resolutions, in particular, resolutions 431 (1978) of 27 July 1978 and 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978,

Taking note of its resolution 628 (1989) of 16 January 1989,

Noting that the parties to the Protocol of Brazzaville agreed to recommend to the Secretary-General that 1 April 1989 be established as the date for the implementation of resolution 435 (1978),

Recognizing the progress in the south-western Africa peace process,

Expressing its concern at the increase in the police and paramilitary forces and the establishment of the South West African Territorial Force since 1978, and stressing the need to ensure conditions under which the Namibian people will be able to participate in free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations,

Noting also that these developments make appropriate a re-examination of the requirements for the United Nations Transition Assistance Group effectively to fulfil its mandate which includes, inter alia, keeping borders under surveillance, preventing infiltration, preventing intimidation and ensuring the safe return of refugees and their free participation in the electoral process,

Recalling the approval by the Security Council of the Secretary-General's statement⁶ on 28 September 1978 to the Council,

Emphasizing its determination to ensure the early independence of Namibia through free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations, in accordance with its resolution 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978,

Reaffirming the legal responsibility of the United Nations over Namibia,

1. Decides that 1 April 1989 shall be the date on which implementation of resolution 435 (1978) will begin;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to proceed to arrange a formal ceasefire between the South West Africa People's Organization and South Africa;

3. Calls upon South Africa to reduce immediately and substantially the existing police forces in Namibia with a view to achieving reasonable balance between these forces and the United Nations Transition Assistance Group so as to ensure effective monitoring by the latter;

4. Reaffirms the responsibility of all concerned to cooperate to ensure the impartial implementation of the settlement plan in accordance with resolution 435 (1978);

5. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare at the earliest possible date a report to the Council on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978), taking into account all relevant developments since the adoption of that resolution;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General, in preparing his report, to re-examine requirements necessary for the Group in order to identify wherever possible tangible cost-saving measures without prejudice to his ability fully to carry out its mandate as established in 1978, namely, to ensure the early independence of Namibia through free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations;

7. Calls upon Members of the United Nations to consider, in coordination with the Secretary-General, how they might provide economic and financial assistance to the Namibian people, both during the transitional period and after independence.

Decision of 16 February 1989 (2848th meeting):
resolution 632 (1989)

On 23 January 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 629 (1989) on the question of Namibia,⁷ containing his recommendations for the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia with effect from 1 April 1989 and the requirements for the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG). He recalled that in resolution 435 (1978) the Council had approved his predecessor's proposed arrangements⁸ for implementing the proposal for a settlement of the Namibian situation put forward on 10 April 1978 by the five Western members of the Security Council (the "Western Contact Group").⁹ The settlement proposal and the Secretary-General's report on its implementation had been exhaustively negotiated with all the parties concerned. The Secretary-General noted that the United Nations plan for Namibia included agreements and understandings reached by the parties since the adoption of resolution 435 (1978) which remained binding on the parties. In that connection, he drew attention to the following: (a) the 1982 agreement on the monitoring of bases of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) in Angola and Zambia by UNTAG; (b) informal understandings reached in 1982 on the question of impartiality by the Western Contact Group, the front-line States, Nigeria and SWAPO; and corresponding obligations on the part of the Government of South Africa to ensure free and fair elections in Namibia; (c) the text of the Principles concerning the Constituent Assembly and the Constitution of an independent Namibia which was transmitted to the Secretary-General on 12 July 1982; and (d) the November 1985 agreement on the system of proportional representation for the elections.

As for UNTAG, under the existing plan, the civilian component would consist of two elements: an electoral element and police monitors. The military component would account for more than 75 per cent of the cost of the mission. The Secretary-General considered that many of the tasks originally envisaged for it in 1978 would still be required, but that a number of them could be performed by military observers rather than armed troops. Referring to paragraph 25 of his predecessor's report of 29 August 1978,¹⁰ the Secretary-General clarified that, in accordance with standard United Nations peacekeeping practice, military observers deployed with UNTAG would not carry weapons.

With regard to the size of the military component to be deployed, the Secretary-General noted that in December 1988 the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council had urged that this be reviewed, in the light of the positive developments in the south-western Africa peace process. They were convinced that UNTAG could carry out its primary function — to ensure free and fair elections — in a substantially more economical manner. Representatives of a number of non-aligned countries, front-line States, Nigeria and SWAPO, on the other hand, had insisted that, if anything, there was a need for an increase in the military component of UNTAG, to enable it to perform its functions. Following the adoption of resolution 629 (1989), the Secretary-General had sought to reconcile those opposing viewpoints. In putting together a concept of operations, he had taken into account such factors as the paramount need for UNTAG to be capable, and to be seen to be capable, of ensuring the full implementation of resolution 435 (1978), including, above all, the creation of conditions which would permit free and fair elections; the assurances he had received from the neighbouring countries, including South Africa, of their full cooperation; the views expressed by some Council members that recent progress in the Namibia peace process had reduced the need for border surveillance and the prevention of infiltration; and the feasibility of assigning to military observers some tasks which had previously been reserved for the infantry. According to the proposed concept of operations, the Force Commander would concentrate on the following tasks: monitoring the dismantling of the citizen forces, commando units and ethnic forces, including the South West African Territorial Force, monitoring South African Defence Force troops in Namibia, as well as SWAPO forces in neighbouring countries, and supervising and securing installations in the northern border area. The authorized upper limit for the military component of UNTAG would remain at 7,500. However, the Secretary-General recommended an initial deployment of 4,650, consisting of three enlarged infantry battalions, 300 military observers, and the appropriate logistic elements and headquarters staff. The estimated cost of the civilian and military components of UNTAG would be approximately $416 million, excluding the cost of operations of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for the return of Namibians then in exile, for which a separate appeal would be launched. The Secretary-General affirmed that if the Security Council decided to proceed on the basis thus recommended, he would do everything possible to have UNTAG in place and operational by 1 April 1989.

As regards the ceasefire envisaged in resolution 435 (1978), the Secretary-General noted that both South Africa and SWAPO had agreed to a de facto cessation of hostilities, with effect from 10 August 1988, as provided for in the Geneva Protocol of 5 August 1988. He intended to send identical letters to both parties proposing a specific date and hour for the formal ceasefire to begin. In conclusion, he stressed that resolution 435 (1978) entrusted to him a wide range of responsibilities in connection with the supervision of free and fair elections in Namibia. The successful implementation of that resolution depended upon the cooperation of all parties concerned, as well as that of the international community as a whole.

On 9 February 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council an explanatory statement,¹¹ in which he addressed concerns raised by various parties about some of the recommendations contained in his report of 23 January. With regard to the deployment of the military component of UNTAG, he affirmed that this would be kept under constant review and that he would inform the Security Council if the situation required the deployment of additional military personnel to Namibia. He added that he had been assured by all the members of the Council that they would fully cooperate with him and respond promptly to any need for additional military personnel that he might deem warranted, up to the authorized upper limit of 7,500.¹² As for the military observers, the Secretary-General stated that, following representations made to him by a number of delegations, he had decided to make an exception to standard peacekeeping practice; he had given the Force Commander of UNTAG discretion to authorize the military observers to carry weapons of a defensive character, as and when necessary. He hoped that with these clarifications the Council could now proceed to approve his report and make its determination for the emplacement of UNTAG in Namibia on 1 April 1989.¹³

At its 2848th meeting, held on 16 February 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached during its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's report of 23 January and his explanatory statement of 9 February 1989. The President (Nepal) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations.¹⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 632 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its relevant resolutions, in particular, resolutions 431 (1978) of 27 July 1978, 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978 and also 629 (1989) of 16 January 1989,

Reaffirming also that the United Nations plan contained in its resolution 435 (1978) remains the only internationally accepted basis for the peaceful settlement of the Namibian question,

Confirming its decision contained in paragraph 1 of resolution 629 (1989) of 16 January 1989 that 1 April 1989 shall be the date on which implementation of resolution 435 (1978) will begin,

Having considered the report of 23 January 1989 submitted by the Secretary-General and his explanatory statement of 9 February 1989,

Taking into account the assurances given to the Secretary-General by all the members of the Council as contained in paragraph 5 of his explanatory statement,

Reaffirming the legal responsibility of the United Nations over Namibia until independence,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General and his explanatory statement concerning the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia;

2. Decides to implement its resolution 435 (1978) in its original and definitive form to ensure conditions in Namibia which will allow the Namibian people to participate freely and without intimidation in the electoral process under the supervision and control of the United Nations leading to early independence of the Territory;

3. Expresses its full support for and pledges its cooperation with the Secretary-General in carrying out the mandate entrusted to him by the Security Council under resolution 435 (1978);

4. Calls upon all parties concerned to honour their commitments to the United Nations plan and to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the present resolution;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed on the implementation of the present resolution.

Speaking after the vote, the President underlined the historic importance of the meeting and the significance of the resolution just adopted. He recalled that since 1966 the United Nations had assumed legal responsibility for Namibia. The Council's historic decision set in motion the process of Namibia's transition towards independence through free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations. The agreement to adopt the decision unanimously and without debate underlined the Council's commitment to the early independence of Namibia and its readiness to cooperate with the Secretary-General in carrying out his mandate in accordance with resolution 435 (1978). The decision also marked the last major step towards decolonization. The President concluded by stressing a point that the Secretary-General had repeatedly made: namely, that it was necessary for all to cooperate fully with him and his Special Representative in the fulfilment of his mandate to enable Namibia to take its rightful place in the community of independent nations.¹⁵

Decision of 29 August 1989 (2882nd meeting): resolution 640 (1989)

By separate letters dated 10 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶ the representative of Ghana, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of African States, and the representative of Zimbabwe, in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries, requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the deteriorating situation in Namibia and South Africa's non-compliance with resolution 435 (1978).

At its 2876th meeting, on 16 August 1989, the Council included both letters in its agenda and considered the item at its 2876th to 2882nd meetings, from 10 to 29 August 1989.

In the course of its deliberations, the Council invited the following, at their request, to participate, without vote, in the discussion of the item: at the 2876th meeting, the representatives of Angola, Cameroon, Cuba, Egypt, Ghana, Mali, Nigeria, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia; at the 2877th meeting, the representatives of Burundi, Guatemala, India and Indonesia; at the 2878th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, Nicaragua, Pakistan and Uganda; at the 2879th meeting, the representatives of the Congo, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Mauritania; and at the 2880th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan and Zimbabwe.

At the 2876th meeting, the President (Algeria) drew the attention of the Council members to the following documents: a letter dated 10 August 1989 from the representative of Zimbabwe addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁷ transmitting the final communiqué of the same date issued by the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries on the situation in Namibia; and a letter dated 15 August 1989 from the representative of South Africa addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁸ transmitting a statement of the same date issued by the Administrator-General of Namibia.

The representative of Ghana, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of African States, expressed the Group's serious concern at the prevailing situation in Namibia, which militated against the achievement of the objectives of resolution 435 (1978). He noted that, four months after its commencement, the electoral process was still neither free nor fair. Moreover, the actions of South Africa, through its Administrator-General, had diminished the authority of the Secretary-General's Special Representative rather than assisted him to be an effective controller. The Group's first major concern was the continued presence and violent activities of South Africa's counter-insurgency unit, the Koevoet, and the integration of elements of that unit into the South West Africa Police, contrary to resolution 435 (1978); if the harassment of Namibians continued unchecked, it could have an adverse impact on the November elections. A second matter of concern to the African Group centred on the loop-hole in the Voter Registration Proclamation which allowed South African nationals to register and to vote in the November elections, while other draft proclamations would disqualify a substantial number of SWAPO members from registering, qualifying to be elected or voting in the elections. A last point of concern was the excessive power that various proclamations vested in the Administrator-General. Those were some of the reasons that had led the African Group to conclude that the plan for the independence of Namibia was not being faithfully implemented. In the face of that unacceptable situation, the Group requested the Security Council to act urgently to ensure compliance with resolution 435 (1978). It recommended, inter alia, that the Council take the following actions: adopt a resolution empowering the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and UNTAG as a whole to supervise and control events, especially the electoral process in Namibia; request South Africa to disband the command structure of the remaining Koevoet elements in the South West Africa Police and to end all forms of harassment of Namibians by members of that group; review all existing laws and draft proclamations bearing on the plan for Namibia's independence, with a view to requesting South Africa and the Administrator-General to remove all clauses that discriminated against or in favour of any of the parties involved; and ensure that sufficient and equal time was given to all political parties on radio and television for the electoral campaign. In conclusion, the speaker stated that the African Group placed those difficult and delicate tasks before the Security Council in the knowledge that it was the ultimate authority on the transition of the Territory of Namibia to independence. States members of the Group stood ready to collaborate with the Council for the achievement of free and fair elections in Namibia.¹⁹

The representative of Egypt, speaking also in his capacity as Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), recalled that by its resolution 2145 (XXI) of 1966, the General Assembly had terminated South Africa's mandate over the Territory and conferred upon the United Nations direct responsibility for the administration of the Territory until independence. The unanimous adoption by the Security Council of resolution 435 (1978) had crowned the Organization's efforts to move towards a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia. Like the rest of the international community, OAU had welcomed the United Nations plan to enable the Namibian people to exercise their right of self-determination and achieve Namibia's independence. Practical implementation of the plan was, however, encountering obstacles. If perpetuated, they might jeopardize the holding of free and fair elections or result in a precarious form of independence, leading to an endless cycle of struggle in and around Namibia that would have disastrous consequences for the region and for world peace and security. He stated that OAU shared with the Secretary-General and his representative in Namibia deep concern about the deteriorating security situation in the territory, especially in the northern area, where Koevoet elements were engaging in acts of provocation and aggression, including murder. He stressed the OAU position that those elements be demobilized and their activities ended, and called on South Africa fully to respect the peace plan and to cooperate with the Secretary-General's Special Representative in its implementation. He concluded by stating that OAU was ready to receive an independent Namibia into its membership, thus marking the fall of the last bastion of colonialism on the African continent.²⁰

The representative of South Africa regretted the Council's decision to convene a formal meeting on the Namibian issue at such a critical and delicate stage of the independence process. The proceedings would remove that process from the ambit of the quiet and effective diplomacy within which it had thus far been conducted. Moreover, the meeting represented a lack of faith in the judgement of the Secretary-General and of his Special Representative, expressed as recently as 3 August, that the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) was well on track despite some remaining obstacles. The latter had subsequently referred to the excellent cooperation he was receiving from South African and Namibian officials. The speaker observed that the time to have convened a Council meeting on the “deteriorating situation in Namibia” would have been on 1 April, when the leaders of SWAPO had ordered their troops into Namibia from Angola, causing the most serious threat to the implementation process and placing the Tripartite Agreement of 22 December 1988 in jeopardy. Throughout the subsequent waves of SWAPO infiltration, South Africa, in concert with the other parties to the Tripartite Agreement, had taken practical steps to reduce that threat and had continued with the practical steps for implementation of the settlement plan. He appealed to the Security Council to include in any resolution it might consider a guarantee that SWAPO would not again conduct a military incursion into Namibia. He stressed that, despite those grave and legitimate concerns, the withdrawal of the South African Defence Force units had been completed ahead of schedule, the ethnic forces had been disbanded and their command structures dismantled as required by the settlement plan. In addition, the Administrator-General and the Special Representative had continued negotiations on the other steps required of the former, including the abrogation of discriminatory legislation, the promulgation of voter-registration legislation, and the release of “political” prisoners held in Namibia. The Administrator-General had, moreover, taken steps to reduce the alleged threat posed by the presence of South Africa’s former counter-insurgency unit, Koevoet. However, he approached with equal seriousness his obligation to maintain law and order, particularly in the light of the concerns expressed by the inhabitants of Namibia over the infiltration of certain armed elements of the People’s Liberation Army of Namibia into northern Namibia. He alleged in that regard that UNTAG had not fully discharged its responsibilities with regard to the monitoring of intimidation. The settlement plan required the Special Representative to “take steps to guarantee against the possibility of intimidation or interference with the electoral process from whatever quarter”. The Government of South Africa reiterated its request that this provision be fully complied with. In conclusion, he observed that the Council, the Secretary-General and UNTAG were under an obligation not only to ensure that SWAPO abided by both the letter and the spirit of its obligations under resolution 435 (1978) but also to convince the population of Namibia that it was committed and able to implement that commitment.²¹

The representative of Zimbabwe, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, observed that the decision to request the meeting of the Council had not been made lightly. For over four months, the African Group and the non-aligned countries had resisted the pressure to do so as they had not wanted to do anything that could adversely affect the implementation process. He believed that the time was right, however, for the Council to meet formally to review that process, and to pronounce itself on the present situation. The Secretary-General had pointed out that there were provisions of resolution 435 (1978) that were not being complied with by South Africa. Although he and his Special Representative had both exerted great efforts to rectify the situation, they had not achieved complete success. The muscle of the Council was now needed to complete the task. The speaker stated that the fact that things were not going well in Namibia was not by accident, but by design. Although South Africa might have been pushed by events to get out of Namibia, it was determined to keep Namibia as a client State under a puppet regime. He opined that South Africa had sought to deny SWAPO a two-thirds majority in the constituent assembly — largely through intimidation and electoral rigging — so that the latter would not be able to write a Namibian constitution that would make the country truly independent of South Africa. If it were unsuccessful in its efforts to engineer such an outcome in the elections, it had in place a whole panoply of destabilization schemes to keep Namibia weak, dependent and unstable. He stated that although in theory the South West African Territorial Force had been demobilized, in reality it was still intact; it could be remobilized within hours. Similarly, South Africa had offered to withdraw and confine the Koevoet, whereas resolution 435 (1978) called for it to be disbanded and its command structure dismantled. Both were mechanisms for the destabilization of a future Namibian Government and for intimidation during the electoral process. He noted that the Administrator-General had, moreover, refused to repeal all discriminatory and restrictive laws, or to grant amnesty to all SWAPO detainees, as required under resolution 435 (1978), and had also failed the impartiality test by not ensuring balanced coverage by the broadcast media. He insisted that South Africa must put those things right if there were to be free and fair elections in Namibia. He assured the Secretary-General of the full support of the non-aligned countries in his endeavours to remedy the prevailing critical situation. He stressed that the major responsibility, however, rested with the Security Council, and hoped that it would unanimously adopt the draft resolution submitted by the non-aligned caucus, restating the provisions calling on South Africa to comply with its commitments under resolution 435 (1978) and requesting that the Secretary-General be provided with adequate resources.²²

A number of speakers associated themselves with the statement made by the Chairman of the Group of African States.²³ They shared or echoed his concerns and endorsed his recommendations for Council action.

Others similarly expressed serious concern about South Africa's non-compliance with certain provisions of resolution 435 (1978), highlighting the security-related problems arising from the misconduct of South African police and paramilitary forces which jeopardized the prospects for free and fair elections in Namibia.²⁴ They called on the Council to take appropriate measures to ensure successful implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibian independence.

Yet other speakers,²⁵ while sharing those concerns, welcomed, as a positive step, the announcement by the Administrator-General that the former Koevoet elements would be removed from the Namibian police and confined to base, a process to be monitored by UNTAG. They underlined the importance of impartiality in every facet of the election process. To that end, they stressed the need to watch closely the development of the electoral law and the legislation on the constituent assembly being negotiated between the Special Representative and the Administrator-General. As for the Security Council's responsibility, they observed that it had a primary role in overseeing the process of implementation of the settlement plan and providing guidance, but that the Secretary-General and his Special Representative must make the day-to-day decisions required for its detailed implementation. The Council should strengthen their hand as they performed their difficult task, not complicate it.

The President of the Security Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Algeria, said that six months after the adoption of resolution 632 (1989), South Africa was still doing its utmost to perpetuate its domination of Namibia. The Council must respond decisively to Africa's appeal, by, inter alia, issuing a clear warning to the South African authorities that the United Nations plan must be implemented in its entirety.²⁶

At the Council's 2882nd meeting, on 29 August 1989, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a revised draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.²⁷ He also drew their attention to two letters: a letter dated 21 August 1989 from the representative of China addressed to the Secretary-General; and a letter dated 22 August 1989 from the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples addressed to the President of the Security Council.²⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation retained considerable doubts about the even-handedness and impartiality of the draft resolution. Even though more than one party to the settlement plan had flouted its provisions, operative paragraph 1 referred specifically only to one party, South Africa. His delegation assumed that that was simply an acknowledgement of the special responsibilities that South Africa should uphold under the settlement plan. On that basis, and to sustain the unanimity which gave the Council's resolutions particular force, his delegation would vote for the revised draft resolution.²⁹

The revised draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 640 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having critically reviewed the implementation process of resolution 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978 since its commencement and noting with concern that all its provisions are not being fully complied with,

Concerned at reports of widespread intimidation and harassment of the civilian population, in particular by Koevoet elements in the South West Africa Police,

Recognizing the efforts being exerted by the United Nations Transition Assistance Group to carry out its responsibilities in spite of obstacles thus placed in its way,

Recalling and reaffirming all its resolutions on the question of Namibia, particularly 435 (1978), 629 (1989) of 16 January 1989 and 632 (1989) of 16 February 1989,

Reiterating that resolution 435 (1978) must be implemented in its original and definitive form to ensure conditions in Namibia which will allow the Namibian people to participate freely and without intimidation in the electoral process, under the supervision and control of the United Nations, leading to early independence of the Territory,

Recalling and reaffirming its firm commitment to the decolonization of Namibia through the holding of free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations and in which the Namibian people will participate without intimidation or interference,

1. Demands strict compliance by all parties concerned, especially South Africa, with the terms of resolution 435 (1978) and 632 (1989);

2. Also demands the disbandment of all paramilitary and ethnic forces and commando units, in particular Koevoet, as well as the dismantling of their command structures as required by resolution 435 (1978);

3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to review the actual situation on the ground with a view to determining the adequacy of the military component of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group in relation to its ability to carry out its responsibilities as authorized under resolutions 435 (1978) and 632 (1989) and to inform the Security Council;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to review the adequacy of the number of police monitors in order to undertake the process for any appropriate increase that he may deem necessary for the effective fulfilment of the Group's responsibilities;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in his supervision and control of the electoral process, to ensure that all legislation concerning the electoral process is in conformity with the provisions of the settlement plan;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that all proclamations conform with internationally accepted norms for the conduct of free and fair elections and, in particular, that the proclamation on the Constituent Assembly also respects the sovereign will of the people of Namibia;

7. Further requests the Secretary-General to ensure the observance of strict impartiality in the provision of media facilities, especially on radio and television, to all parties for the dissemination of information concerning the election;

8. Appeals to all the parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the settlement plan;

9. Expresses its full support for the Secretary-General in his efforts to ensure that resolution 435 (1978) is implemented in its original and definitive form and requests him to report to the Council before the end of September on the implementation of the present resolution;

10. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States said his delegation was pleased to be able to join in the unanimous adoption of the resolution, which represented a compromise between several strongly held positions about Namibia. It did so in the belief that unity in support of the Secretary-General and UNTAG was the key to the success of the Namibia settlement. The speaker added that it was his country's understanding, based on recent consultations, that, in accordance with past practice, any decision on the deployment of additional civilian personnel for UNTAG would be taken by the Secretary-General in consultation with the Council.³⁰

resolution 643 (1989)

On 6 October 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of resolution 640 (1989) concerning the question of Namibia.³¹ The report addressed the various issues raised in the resolution, including the disbandment of all paramilitary and ethnic forces and commando units; the adequacy of the UNTAG military component and its police monitors; the conformity of the electoral legislation with the settlement plan; the acceptability of the draft legislation on the Constituent Assembly; and the impartiality of the media. It also dealt with some other important aspects of the implementation of the settlement plan: namely, the issue of amnesty; the repatriation of exiles; the release of political prisoners and detainees; the repeal of restrictive and discriminatory laws — in respect of which the Secretary-General recommended the repeal of Proclamation AG 8 which created a system of ethnic administration; the registration of voters; and the code of conduct for the political parties. In his concluding observations, the Secretary-General noted that compliance by the parties with the requirements of the settlement plan had been less than complete in certain areas. He had continuing concerns about the presence of ex-members of Koevoet in the South West Africa Police and referred to the problems concerning the cooperation of the South West Africa Police with UNTAG police monitors and the difficulties encountered by UNTAG in verifying the confinement to base of SWAPO combatants in Angola. While these were serious problems, some of them had been or were about to be resolved, and he was pleased to be able to report to the Council that all the parties involved had increasingly complied with the requirements of the settlement plan and had given him reason to believe that they would continue to do so. He stressed that their continuing cooperation was essential, not least because UNTAG had no powers to enforce the provisions of the settlement plan. The Secretary-General observed further that, as the election approached, there was one group of “parties” whose cooperation would be especially important, namely, the political parties that would participate in the election and their supporters both inside and outside Namibia. The code of conduct which the party leaders had signed with his Special Representative was of central importance, giving reason to hope that the parties would conduct the election in a truly democratic manner.

By a letter dated 18 October 1989 addressed to the President of the Council,³² the representative of Kenya, on behalf of the Group of African States, requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the grave situation in Namibia.

At its 2886th meeting, on 31 October 1989, the Council included the letter from the representative of Kenya in its agenda. The President (Canada) drew the attention of the Council members to the Secretary-General’s report of 6 October. He also drew their attention to a number of letters addressed to the Secretary-General in October 1989: (a) letters from the representative of South Africa;³³ (b) a letter from the representative of Yugoslavia;³⁴ (c) a letter from the representative of Kenya;³⁵ and (d) a letter from the representative of Malaysia.³⁶

At the same meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council members to a revised draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.³⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 643 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its relevant resolutions on the question of Namibia, in particular resolutions 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978, 629 (1989) of 16 January 1989, 632 (1989) of 16 February 1989 and 640 (1989) of 29 August 1989,

Reaffirming also that the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia, contained in resolution 435 (1978), remains the only internationally accepted basis for the peaceful settlement of the Namibia question,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 6 October 1989 and the addendum thereto of 16 October 1989,

Noting with deep concern that, one week before the scheduled elections in Namibia, all the provisions of resolution 435 (1978) are not being fully complied with,

Noting the progress made so far in the implementation of the settlement plan and the remaining obstacles placed in its way as well as the efforts being exerted by the United Nations Transition Assistance Group to carry out its responsibilities,

Reaffirming the continuing legal responsibility of the United Nations over Namibia until the full attainment by the Namibian people of national independence,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General and the addendum thereto;

2. Expresses its full support for the Secretary-General in his efforts to ensure that resolution 435 (1978) is fully implemented in its original and definitive form;

3. Expresses its firm determination to implement resolution 435 (1978) in its original and definitive form in order to ensure holding of free and fair elections in Namibia under the supervision and control of the United Nations;

4. Reaffirms its commitment in carrying out the continuing legal responsibility over Namibia until its independence to ensure the unfettered and effective exercise by the people of Namibia of their inalienable rights to self-determination and genuine national independence in accordance with resolutions 435 (1978) and 640 (1989);

5. Demands immediate, full and strict compliance by all parties concerned, in particular South Africa, with the terms of resolutions 435 (1978), 632 (1989) and 640 (1989);

6. Reiterates its demand for the complete disbandment of all remaining paramilitary and ethnic forces and commando units, in particular the Koevoet and the South West African Territorial Force as well as the complete dismantling of their command structures, and other defence-related institutions as required by resolutions 435 (1978) and 640 (1989);

7. Requests the Secretary-General to pursue his efforts to ensure the immediate replacement of the remaining South African Defence Force personnel in accordance with resolution 435 (1978);

8. Demands the immediate repeal of such remaining restrictive and discriminatory laws and regulations as inhibit the holding of free and fair elections and that no such new laws be introduced and endorses the position of the Secretary-General as expressed in his report that Proclamation AG 8 should be repealed;

9. Invites the Secretary-General to keep under constant review the adequacy of the number of police monitors in order to undertake the process for any appropriate increase that he may deem necessary for the effective fulfilment of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group's responsibilities;

10. Demands that the South West Africa Police extend full cooperation to the Group civil police in carrying out the tasks entrusted to it under the settlement plan;

11. Mandates the Secretary-General to ensure that all necessary arrangements are made in accordance with the settlement plan to safeguard the territorial integrity and security of Namibia in order to ensure a peaceful transition to national independence, and to assist the Constituent Assembly in the discharge of responsibilities entrusted to it under the settlement plan;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare appropriate plans for mobilizing all forms of assistance, including technical, material and financial resources for the people of Namibia during the period following the elections for the Constituent Assembly until the accession to independence;

13. Urgently appeals to Member States, United Nations agencies, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to extend, in coordination with the Secretary-General, generous financial, material and technical support to the Namibian people, both during the transitional period and after independence;

14. Decides that, if the pertinent provisions of the present resolution are not complied with, the Security Council shall convene as required before the elections to review the situation and consider appropriate action;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the implementation of the present resolution as soon as possible;

16. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation had doubts about the tone of the resolution just adopted, and would have preferred something simpler and more direct. He assumed that the language in paragraph 5 was an acknowledgement of the special responsibilities that South Africa should uphold during Namibia's transition to independence. That did not, however, diminish the responsibility of the other parties to fulfil their commitments under the settlement plan. The Council's priority must be to unite behind the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their efforts to ensure the success of that plan. It was for that reason that the United Kingdom had voted in favour of the resolution.³⁸

The representative of the United States stated that his delegation had joined in the unanimous adoption of the resolution because it felt strongly that the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and UNTAG deserved the Council's full and undivided support as the process of elections began in Namibia. He wished to make clear, however, their understanding of certain issues addressed by the resolution. It was true that not all provisions of resolution 435 (1978) were being fully complied with. For example, SWAPO had still not provided a full accounting of Namibians it had detained while in exile. He called on it to do so and to resolve other questions regarding its adherence to the United Nations plan. On the other hand, he welcomed the dismantling of the command structures of the South West African Territorial Force and the steps taken to demobilize the remaining ex-Koevoet members of the South West Africa Police. He underscored the importance of the code of conduct signed by the Namibian parties, and the need to ensure that no laws were now enacted that could call into question the validity of the election. He also stressed his delegation's full support for the Secretary-General's statement, as approved by the Council in resolution 632 (1989), that the United Nations plan for Namibia included agreements and understandings reached by the parties since the adoption of resolution 435 (1978), which remained binding on the parties. Finally, he stressed that principal responsibility for the security of Namibia under the United Nations settlement plan rested with the Administrator-General until independence.³⁹

The representative of Brazil observed that, as the election date approached, it had become increasingly apparent that some essential aspects of the administrative and political life in Namibia during the post-election period were not sufficiently covered by existing arrangements. The question arose as to how the Council should deal with the situation to ensure not only the holding of free and fair elections but also a peaceful and smooth transition to independence. Brazil believed that the Council should seriously consider the latter aspect of the independence process, and should remain mobilized until the process had been fully completed.⁴⁰

The representative of Colombia stated that the non-aligned countries, including his own, which had introduced the draft resolution, were not as optimistic as some others about the situation in Namibia. It was not clear, for instance, whether the Government of South Africa would really fulfil its obligations regarding the demobilization of paramilitary forces in Namibia. It was disconcerting, moreover, that the electoral provisions had only just been issued, given that the elections would take place the following week. The non-aligned countries also shared the concern expressed by the representative of Brazil concerning the manner in which Namibia would be administered from the time the elections were certified until the time when independence was declared; they stood ready to fill any such gaps which existed.⁴¹

Decision of 3 November 1989: statement by the President

On 3 November 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of resolution 643 (1989).⁴² He stated that the overall situation throughout Namibia remained calm and that arrangements for the conduct of the elections from 7 to 11 November under the supervision and control of the United Nations were well under way. He observed that, after a careful evaluation of the situation, his Special Representative had concluded that, on balance, he was satisfied that conditions existed for the holding of free and fair elections in Namibia. Based on all the information available to him, the Secretary-General had endorsed that conclusion. He cautioned, however, that the situation, especially in some regions of the country, remained delicate. He appealed to all concerned, both in Namibia and beyond its borders, to comply fully with their respective responsibilities under the settlement plan and the code of conduct.

On the same day, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (China) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴³

The Security Council deplores the false alarm by South Africa on 1 November 1989 concerning the alleged movement of forces of the South West Africa People's Organization across the Angola-Namibia border.

The Council expresses its profound concern about this incident as well as the potential implications for the elections of the initial South African reaction to it. It, therefore, calls upon South Africa to desist from any such further actions.

The Council strongly commends the prompt action taken by the United Nations Transition Assistance Group to clarify the situation and to establish that such allegations were unfounded.

The Council calls upon all parties to honour their commitments in accordance with the settlement plan.

The Council reiterates its full support for the Secretary-General and his Special Representative as well as its firm commitment to ensure the full implementation of resolution 435 (1978) in its original and definitive form.

Decision of 20 November 1989: statement by the President

On 14 November 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) on the question of Namibia.⁴⁴ The report set out the results of the elections held in Namibia from 7 to 11 November 1989 for a Constituent Assembly, which had been certified by his Special Representative as free and fair. The Secretary-General observed that a significant phase in the process of bringing Namibia to independence had thus been accomplished. The way was now open for the next stage in the process — the drawing-up and adoption of a constitution by the newly elected Constituent Assembly, the naming by it of a date for independence and the establishment of a Government for the independent State. The United Nations, for its part, would continue to discharge its obligations to the people of Namibia until the Territory achieved independence.

At its 2893rd meeting, held on 20 November 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached during its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.

The President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on their behalf:⁴⁵

The members of the Security Council welcome with satisfaction the successful conclusion of the elections in Namibia, certified by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as free and fair, thus paving the way for the convening of the Constituent Assembly and the early independence of Namibia at a date to be determined by the Constituent Assembly.

The members of the Council congratulate the people of Namibia for the successful exercise of their democratic rights and look forward to the early independence of Namibia. They are deeply appreciative of the efforts of the Secretary-General, his Special Representative and the United Nations Transition Assistance Group for the role they have played, which attests to the effectiveness and credibility of the United Nations.

The members of the Council reaffirm the continuing important role of the United Nations in the transition period in ensuring the implementation of the settlement plan on the basis of its legal responsibility over Namibia until independence, so that the Constituent Assembly, reflecting the collective will of the people, can draw and adopt, in accordance with the settlement plan and free from any interference, a Constitution that will accord sovereignty to Namibia. In this regard, they express support to the Secretary-General in his continuing efforts to ensure full implementation of the settlement plan and request him to make the necessary arrangements under the settlement plan to safeguard the territorial integrity and security of Namibia. They also stress the importance of full compliance with all the remaining provisions of resolution 435 (1978) in its original definitive form. The members of the Council express the hope that, in the transition period, the utmost political responsibility will be displayed to facilitate the earliest possible accession of Namibia to independence.

The members of the Council call upon the Constituent Assembly to carry out its responsibility expeditiously and request the Secretary-General to provide it with all necessary assistance.

On 16 March 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the question of Namibia.⁴⁶ He recalled having orally informed the members of the Council on 9 February 1990 that, on the same day, the Constituent Assembly of Namibia had approved, by consensus, the Constitution for an independent Namibia. The Constitution would enter into force on Independence Day, 21 March 1990. The text of it was annexed, together with a note comparing its provisions to the 1982 Constitutional Principles.⁴⁷

On 28 March 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his final report on the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) concerning the question of Namibia.⁴⁸ He reported that, shortly after midnight on 20/21 March 1990, at the National Stadium in Windhoek, the flag of the Republic of South Africa had been lowered and the flag of the Republic of Namibia had been raised, thus marking the accession of Namibia to independence in accordance with Security Council resolution 435 (1978). Immediately thereafter, he had administered the oath of office to the first elected President of the Republic of Namibia. Thus had been achieved, in dignity and great rejoicing, the goal of independence for Namibia, for which the United Nations and its Member States had striven for so long.

6. Items relating to the situation in Somalia

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 20 January 1992 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Somalia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 20 January 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Somalia transmitted a letter dated 11 January 1992 from the interim Prime Minister of Somalia, and requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the deteriorating situation in Somalia.

By a letter dated 21 January 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of Morocco transmitted the text of a resolution adopted on 5 January 1992 by the Council of the League of Arab States (LAS) at its extraordinary session concerning the situation in Somalia. The Council expressed deep concern at the developments threatening the national unity and territorial integrity of Somalia, called on all Arab countries to provide emergency relief, and urged all regional and international organizations to support the efforts of the League and to coordinate their activities with those of the League, in order to establish a lasting ceasefire in Somalia.

By a letter dated 23 January 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of Guinea, as Chairman of the Group of African States, transmitted a statement made on 18 December 1991 by the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) concerning the situation in Somalia. The OAU Secretary-General stated that both parties involved in the fighting in Mogadishu had a particular responsibility to ensure that there was an immediate ceasefire and that normalcy was restored to the city. He appealed to the international community to use its influence and leverage to encourage the parties to seek a peaceful resolution of the conflict, and to respond to the very urgent humanitarian needs of the victims of the conflict. He reiterated that OAU was available to facilitate an end to the fighting and to bring about a lasting settlement.

Decision of 23 January 1992 (3039th meeting): resolution 733 (1992)

At its 3039th meeting, on 23 January 1992, the Council included the letter from the Chargé d'affaires of the Permanent Mission of Somalia in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (United Kingdom) then drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 733 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Considering the request by Somalia for the Security Council to consider the situation in Somalia,

Having heard the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Somalia and commending the initiative taken by him in the humanitarian field,

Gravely alarmed at the rapid deterioration of the situation in Somalia and the heavy loss of human life and widespread material damage resulting from the conflict in the country and aware of its consequences on stability and peace in the region,

B. The situation in Somalia

Decision of 17 March 1992 (3060th meeting): resolution 746 (1992)

By a letter dated 30 January 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵ the Chargé d'affaires of the Permanent Mission of Somalia expressed her gratitude for the Security Council's decision to consider the situation in her country and the unanimous adoption of resolution 733 (1992). In an annex to the letter, she stated that her country had not received any international political assistance to end its protracted crisis. She advocated a two-pronged approach to the conflict: the establishment of a holding ceasefire, maintained if necessary by coercive means; and the convening of a national reconciliation conference under the auspices of the Security Council. She assured the Council that any measure — even a coercive one — taken to resolve the crisis in Somalia could not, and would not, be interpreted as interference in the country's internal affairs, since it would save human lives and restore human dignity.

On 11 March 1992, pursuant to resolution 733 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Somalia,⁶ dealing in particular with the efforts to secure a cessation of hostilities to permit the humanitarian assistance to be distributed, to promote a ceasefire, and to assist in the process of a political settlement of the conflict in Somalia. He reported that heavy fighting had persisted in Mogadishu since November 1991. The fighting had resulted in widespread death and destruction, forced hundreds of thousands of civilians to flee the city, caused dire need for emergency humanitarian assistance, and brought about a grave threat of widespread famine. It had also seriously impeded United Nations efforts to deliver much-needed humanitarian assistance to the affected population in and around Mogadishu. Furthermore, the conflict had threatened instability in the Horn of Africa region and its continuation had occasioned threats to international peace and security in the area. He observed that because of the intolerable security situation, it had not been possible to provide food supplies to Mogadishu since December 1991. The prospect of famine deaths was high.

The Secretary-General reported that consultations, aimed at exploring ways of achieving a ceasefire agreement and a political settlement through the convening of a conference of national reconciliation and unity, had been held in New York, from 12 to 14 February 1992. Delegations representing the factions of the Interim President, Ali Mahdi Mohamed, and the Chairman of the United Somali Congress, General Mohamed Farah Aidid, had taken part in the consultations. Representatives of three regional and intergovernmental organizations — LAS, OAU, and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) — had also participated. On 14 February 1992, the two factions had committed themselves to an immediate cessation of hostilities and to the maintenance of a ceasefire in Mogadishu, and had signed pledges to that effect. They had also agreed to a visit to Mogadishu by a high-level delegation from the United Nations, LAS, OAU and OIC. The joint delegation had arrived in Mogadishu on 29 February. On 3 March, after four days of intensive negotiations, the Interim President and General Aidid had signed an Agreement on the Implementation of a Ceasefire,⁷ which provided for the implementation of measures aimed at stabilizing the ceasefire through a United Nations monitoring mechanism.

The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Somalia had so far eluded conventional solutions and that new avenues and innovative methods had to be explored to facilitate a peaceful settlement. The collaborative effort of the United Nations and the regional and intergovernmental organizations undertaken in the context of Chapter VIII of the Charter had proved to be very effective and had set a useful precedent for future cooperation. A general framework for the implementation of the ceasefire had been worked out; the next step, as agreed by the two principal factions, was to dispatch a technical team to Mogadishu to prepare an operational plan for a United Nations monitoring mechanism. On the basis of the technical team's report, the Secretary-General would make further recommendations to the Council in that regard. Such an arrangement would have to be approved by the Security Council. The Secretary-General also proposed that the technical team look into possible mechanisms to ensure the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance to the displaced persons in and around Mogadishu, as well as Berbera and Kismayo. This aspect of the technical team's task represented an innovation and might require careful consideration by the Council. The Secretary-General added that an understanding had already been reached with the two factions that United Nations civilian police would be required to assist in the delivery of humanitarian assistance in and around Mogadishu. He cautioned, however, that the presence of armed elements not under the control of either of the two protagonists could complicate the implementation and monitoring of the ceasefire.⁸

The Secretary-General concluded by calling on the Council to underline the individual and collective responsibilities of the leaders of the factions to save lives and assist in the distribution of humanitarian assistance. He stressed that the relief programme should not necessarily be dependent upon the implementation of a ceasefire but could not be undertaken without adequate measures to ensure the safety of relief officials. The Council also needed to make clear to those leaders the consequences of any obstruction to the work of international monitors or the operations of any United Nations observer mission that it might set up.

At its 3060th meeting, held on 17 March 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda, under the item entitled "The situation in Somalia", the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Italy, Kenya, Nigeria and Somalia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended an invitation to Mr. Ahmet Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of OIC, and Mr. Aboul Nasr, Permanent Observer of LAS, under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure. The President (Venezuela) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁹ and read out revisions made to the provisional version of that draft. He also drew their attention to a letter dated 13 March 1992 from the representative of Egypt, addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁰ concerning Egyptian efforts in connection with the Somali crisis.

Commencing the debate, the Minister of External Affairs of Nigeria, speaking on behalf of the current Chairman of OAU, stated that Africa placed a premium on the responsiveness of the Council to situations that were likely to constitute a threat to international peace and security. In line with its new orientation and thrust, the Council ought to conduct preventive diplomacy and be seen to do so effectively in Somalia. The situation in that country qualified for direct action by the Council in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. At a minimum, the Council ought to establish a United Nations presence in Somalia by deploying a military observer mission to monitor the ceasefire. He stated that OAU welcomed the cooperation between the United Nations and the regional organizations in addressing issues of concern to the international community, which it believed should result in the peaceful resolution of the Somali conflict. Noting with considerable interest the United Nations efforts in crisis management, peacemaking and peacekeeping, he suggested that Africa deserved as much, if not more, attention than other regions because of its weak economic base.¹¹

The Permanent Observer of LAS recalled the League's attempts to contain the crisis and its participation in the United Nations efforts. He believed that the joint mission to Mogadishu was a unique example of creative cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. He confirmed the League's full support for the draft resolution before the Council, and its willingness to cooperate with the United Nations in its implementation.¹²

The Permanent Observer of OIC noted that Organization's efforts to restore peace and promote national reconciliation since the inception of the crisis, and its participation in the United Nations efforts. He underlined the OIC members' commitment to the restoration and preservation of the unity, sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Somalia. The international community as a whole ought to reiterate its commitment to those principles. Stressing that a ceasefire agreement should cover all parts of Somalia, he called for a peacekeeping force to ensure its enforcement, monitoring and observance. OIC also believed that consideration should be given to the convening — under the joint sponsorship of the United Nations, OIC, OAU and LAS — of a conference on national reconciliation. With respect to humanitarian assistance, it suggested that zones of peace be established in various parts of Somalia. OIC was ready to explore further ideas and proposals, together with the United Nations and other international and regional organizations, so that a well-coordinated and comprehensive approach to the crisis in Somalia could be evolved.¹³

The representative of India stressed that the sheer magnitude of the Somali problem and its continuation constituted a threat to the peace and security of the region. The situation in Somalia, where there was no single political authority with which the world community could interact, was sui generis and had eluded conventional solutions. Nevertheless, the principles drawn from the Charter had to be applied in those circumstances also. Innovative methods commensurate with the humanitarian and political situation had to be explored to facilitate a peaceful settlement. The first task of the technical team proposed by the Secretary-General would be to impress upon the combatants the need to observe the agreed ceasefire. In the light of the humanitarian situation, which was of crisis proportions, the Secretary-General's recommendation that the technical team also be mandated to look into mechanisms to ensure the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance had not come a moment too soon. Ultimately, only political dialogue within the conference of national reconciliation and unity, which would form the second phase of the United Nations involvement, could resolve the conflict in Somalia.¹⁴

The representative of Italy hailed the forthcoming dispatch of a United Nations technical team to Somalia, but also hoped that the United Nations, OAU, LAS and OIC would cooperate in efforts to convene a conference on national reconciliation and unity.¹⁵

The representative of Belgium stated that, in view of the distress of the Somali people, his delegation had no difficulty in endorsing proposals that the Secretary-General had described as “innovations”. He pointed out that, in the eventual implementation of a United Nations operation in Somalia, a clear distinction should be drawn between the political and military aspects and the humanitarian aspect, especially because of their specific budgetary implications. He urged continued cooperation between the Secretary-General and the regional and intergovernmental organizations in the convening of a conference on national reconciliation and unity, as provided for by the draft resolution, and in an eventual United Nations monitoring mechanism as was the Secretary-General’s intention.¹⁶

The representative of China believed that it was mainly for the Somali people to settle peacefully the Somali internal disputes through consultation and dialogue. Only at their request and with their support and cooperation could any external endeavours, including the United Nations monitoring mechanism and humanitarian relief, be genuinely effective. The Chinese delegation hoped that the United Nations activities in Somalia would be conducted in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter, and with full respect for Somalia’s independence and sovereignty. Any further peacekeeping operation to be carried out by the United Nations in Somalia would have to be reported in advance to the Council and approved by it.¹⁷

The representative of France supported the Secretary-General’s initiatives and hoped that they would receive the parties’ cooperation, which was indispensable if they were to succeed. He stressed that all States, in accordance with the Council’s appeal, ought to refrain from any act likely to increase the tension.¹⁸

The representative of Zimbabwe recalled that the Council had recently been seized of fratricidal conflicts threatening regional peace and stability, and had taken measures to stabilize the ceasefires in Yugoslavia and Cambodia. He believed that the Somali tragedy, which had been unravelling for almost a year, should be addressed with utmost urgency.¹⁹

According to the representative of the United States, a ceasefire, the establishment of a process of national reconciliation, and the provision of humanitarian assistance were the primary goals of the international community in Somalia. A more concerted, well-articulated and tightly coordinated humanitarian assistance effort was urgently needed to alleviate human suffering and to ensure the effectiveness of a ceasefire. That ceasefire must be strictly and effectively adhered to before the Security Council could send in United Nations monitors. Prior experience in peacekeeping operations had shown that the United Nations could not perform effectively in situations where the parties to a conflict were unwilling to create the conditions necessary for it to carry out its mandate. No United Nations monitoring mechanism to supervise a ceasefire could be put into a situation where there was no effective ceasefire. Nor could the United Nations deliver humanitarian assistance where an active conflict was under way. Once an effective ceasefire was achieved, all parties had to agree to its international supervision. On the basis of the next report of the Secretary-General, the Council would have to consider seriously whether those conditions could be met.²⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation supported the draft resolution in view of the critical nature of the situation in Somalia and the loss of life and suffering caused by the conflict, which harboured a threat to international peace and security. He shared the view that a clear distinction should be drawn between expenditures on peacekeeping and the expenses incurred in providing technical, humanitarian, and other assistance. He stressed the importance of close cooperation between the United Nations and OAU, LAS and OIC, particularly when consulting all the

Somali parties, movements and factions about convening a conference on national reconciliation and unity in Somalia.²¹

The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that the will of the parties to honour the ceasefire was absolutely fundamental for a return to more peaceful conditions, and that there could be no peacekeeping if there was no peace to keep. He welcomed the intention of the Secretary-General to devote his humanitarian efforts to the whole of Somalia, and not just the area around Mogadishu. Finally, he hoped that the technical team would induce the parties to move towards a process of reconciliation; otherwise, there was a risk that the United Nations and Somalia would remain “stuck halfway between peace and war”.²²

The President made a statement in his capacity as the representative of Venezuela. He observed that the consultations held in New York between the parties to the conflict and the sending to Somalia of the special envoy had at last made it possible to establish a certain ceasefire. The cooperation and assistance of the regional organizations, such as OAS, LAS and OIC, had, moreover, contributed to alleviating tension and facilitating dialogue. He pointed to those developments as significant examples of the work the United Nations must do at this new stage in international relations and of the irreplaceable support that regional organizations could provide. The challenge for the international community was to reverse the fratricidal division of the Somali nation. He therefore urged the Secretary-General to turn to a personality of a very high level — widely recognized internationally — who could work with vision towards achieving the delicate political task of national reconciliation, while the technical team carried out its work in respect of the ceasefire and humanitarian assistance.²³

The other speakers expressed their support for the Secretary-General’s proposals, stressed the need for the parties to cooperate fully with the United Nations, and welcomed the cooperation of the regional and intergovernmental organizations.²⁴

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 746 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Considering the request by Somalia for the Security Council to consider the situation in Somalia,

Reaffirming its resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 11 March 1992 on the situation in Somalia,

Taking note of the signing at Mogadishu on 3 March 1992 of the ceasefire agreements, including agreements for the implementation of measures aimed at stabilizing the ceasefire through a United Nations monitoring mission,

Deeply regretting that the factions have not yet abided by their commitment to implement the ceasefire and thus have still not permitted the unimpeded provision and distribution of humanitarian assistance to the people in need in Somalia,

Deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering caused by the conflict and concerned that the continuation of the situation in Somalia constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Bearing in mind that the factors described in paragraph 76 of the Secretary-General’s report must be taken into account,

Cognizant of the importance of cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations in the context of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Underlining the importance which it attaches to the international, regional and non-governmental organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross, continuing to provide humanitarian and other relief assistance to the people of Somalia under difficult circumstances,

Expressing its appreciation to the regional organizations, including the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, for their cooperation with the United Nations in the effort to resolve the Somali problem,

6. Strongly supports the Secretary-General's decision urgently to dispatch a technical team to Somalia, accompanied by the Coordinator, in order to work within the framework and objectives outlined in paragraphs 73 and 74 of his report and to submit expeditiously a report to the Security Council on this matter;

7. Requests that the technical team also develop a high-priority plan to establish mechanisms to ensure the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance;

8. Calls on all parties, movements and factions in Mogadishu in particular, and in Somalia in general, to respect fully the security and safety of the technical team and the personnel of the humanitarian organizations and to guarantee their complete freedom of movement in and around Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia;

9. Calls upon the Secretary-General to continue, in close cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, his consultations with all Somali parties, movements and factions towards the convening of a conference for national reconciliation and unity in Somalia;

10. Calls upon all Somali parties, movements and factions to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the present resolution;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

Decision of 24 April 1992 (3069th meeting):
resolution 751 (1992)

On 21 April 1992, pursuant to resolution 746 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation in Somalia and his recommendations.²⁵ He observed that the situation in the country continued to be of great concern to the international community. Governmental and physical infrastructure were largely non-existent. Although the ceasefire in Mogadishu agreed between the major factions was holding, sporadic fighting and incidents of banditry were putting a strain on it. The port of Mogadishu and the international airport were, moreover, in the control of groups not under the command of either faction. There was increased fighting in the northern part of the country and the situation in the south remained tense. There was wide proliferation of weapons and various reports indicated that arms continued to flow into the country, despite the arms embargo. The threat of dramatic food shortages among particularly vulnerable groups was becoming increasingly acute: some 1.5 million people had been identified as being at immediate risk, with a further 3.5 million people in need of food, seeds and basic health and water services. The crisis in Somalia also had regional consequences, as evidenced by the flow of Somali refugees into neighbouring countries, and there were grave concerns about the destabilizing effects it could have on the Horn of Africa.

The Secretary-General reported that the technical team he had appointed, which included representatives from LAS, OAU and OIC, had visited Somalia from 23 to 31 March. It had secured, from the Interim President, Ali Mahdi Mohamed and General Mohamed Farah Aidid, letters of agreement on the mechanism for monitoring the ceasefire and arrangements for the equitable and effective distribution of humanitarian assistance in and around Mogadishu, signed on 28 and 27 March 1992, respectively.²⁶ The team had also obtained letters of agreement from other Somali leaders who had committed themselves to work for peace and ensure the efficient and equitable distribution of humanitarian assistance. The agreements reached with the leaders of the two major factions required the United Nations (a) to deploy United Nations observers to monitor the ceasefire; and (b) to deploy United Nations security personnel to protect its personnel and safeguard its activities in continuing to provide humanitarian and other relief assistance in and around Mogadishu. The Secretary-General recommended that the monitoring task be carried out by 50 unarmed and uniformed military observers whose security would be ensured by the parties; in accordance with the agreements, 25 of the observers would be deployed to northern Mogadishu and 25 to southern Mogadishu. The security force envisaged in the agreements would be required to provide security for United Nations personnel, equipment and supplies at the port of Mogadishu — and, as necessary, at the airports in Mogadishu — and to escort deliveries of humanitarian supplies from there to distribution centres in Mogadishu and its immediate environs. The security force would not have any law-and-order responsibilities; its task would be to provide the United Nations convoys of relief supplies with a sufficiently strong military escort to deter attack and to fire in self-defence should deterrence not prove effective. The Secretary-General recommended, accordingly, that the security force take the form of infantry, organized in the normal manner. He estimated that a strength of approximately 500 would be required, but recalled that the agreements provided that the two parties be consulted about the number before the plan was finalized. The Secretary-General recommended that the Security Council establish a mission along those lines, for an initial period of six months, to be known as the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM),²⁷ and to be under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General, under the authority of the Security Council.

The Secretary-General reported, further, that, as a result of the request in resolution 746 (1992) to develop a high-priority plan to facilitate the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance, the technical team had established mechanisms to implement the Mogadishu portion of an initial 90-day plan of action,²⁸ drawn up by the United Nations agencies in collaboration with the International Committee of the Red Cross and non-governmental organizations. It had also made arrangements to facilitate delivery of humanitarian assistance to other parts of the country. He stressed that the effectiveness of the plan and subsequent emergency relief and recovery programmes would depend on the observance by all parties of basic principles of humanitarian assistance and respect for the inviolability of United Nations-flagged ships, aircraft and relief convoys and protection of relief workers passing to and through designated "corridors" and "zones of peace", and appealed to all parties to honour agreements made with the technical team in that regard. He added that implementation of the plan would also depend upon the provision of sufficient resources by the international community. The Secretary-General observed that, although the difficulties of providing relief assistance were fully recognized, the prevailing crisis posed a paradox that had to be addressed: without security, relief assistance programmes would continue to be severely constrained; but without such programmes, the prospects for security were at best precarious. He emphasized, therefore, the necessity of providing humanitarian assistance even before the full complement of United Nations security personnel and ceasefire modalities were in place.

In view of the precarious security situation outside Mogadishu, the Secretary-General suggested that the Security Council might wish to consider calling for a general ceasefire throughout the country. He also suggested that, in the light of various reports indicating that arms continued to flow into the country, the Council might wish to consider putting into place the appropriate arrangements for monitoring the arms embargo. Finally, he stressed that he would continue to pursue efforts for national reconciliation in Somalia, together with LAS, OAU and OIC. He intended to appoint a Special Representative for Somalia to assist him in the consultations and arrangements for the convening of a conference of national reconciliation and unity in Somalia, in close cooperation with the regional organizations. The Special Representative would also provide overall direction to the United Nations activities recommended in the Secretary-General's report, including those directed at economic recovery and rehabilitation, as well as demobilization and disarmament programmes.

At its 3069th meeting, held on 24 April 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Zimbabwe) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared during the Council's prior consultations,²⁹ and, after drawing attention to a change to operative paragraph 3, put the draft resolution, as orally revised, to the vote. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was adopted unanimously as resolution 751 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Considering the request by Somalia for the Security Council to consider the situation in Somalia,

Decision of 27 July 1992 (3101st meeting):
resolution 767 (1992)

On 22 July 1992, pursuant to resolution 751 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Somalia.³⁰ He reported on the activities of his Special Representative in relation to the three major elements of his mandate: the monitoring of the ceasefire in Mogadishu and the cessation of hostilities throughout the country; the effective delivery of humanitarian assistance, as well as the need for rehabilitation and institution-building; and the process of national reconciliation.

With regard to ceasefire monitoring and security, the Secretary-General reported that both principal factions in Mogadishu had formally agreed to the deployment of the 50 military observers, who were due to arrive in the city towards the end of July. In the meantime, the security situation in the city continued to be precarious. While the ceasefire in Mogadishu had held reasonably well, banditry and looting remained a major problem, with most incidents attributable to irregular armed groups; and attacks on United Nations and non-governmental organization personnel had increased. Although the impending deployment of the military observers would assist in efforts to bring about an improvement in the security situation in Mogadishu, the Secretary-General shared the view of his Special Representative that the problem could not be properly addressed unless the United Nations security force called for in paragraphs 4 and 5 of resolution 751 (1992) was deployed. That force would play an important deterrent role, with regard to both the safety of personnel providing humanitarian assistance and a general stabilization of the situation in Mogadishu. The security situation in most of the other regions of Somalia also called for immediate action. There was an almost total absence of government at any level. A vast quantity of arms had fallen into the hands of individuals, factions and groups, thus fuelling the conflicts as well as the banditry and looting which were taking place all over the country. Such actions by independent armed groups were, possibly, the biggest and most serious threat to those working for United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations. The Secretary-General informed the Council that he therefore intended to dispatch a technical team to Somalia as soon as possible to examine inter alia: (a) the possible monitoring of the ceasefire arrangements in parts of the country other than Mogadishu; (b) the possible deployment of military observers in the south-west region on Somalia's border with Kenya; (c) the feasibility of an "arms for food" exchange programme; (d) the need for security forces to provide escort and protection for humanitarian aid activities and personnel in other parts of the country; and (e) a possible role for the United Nations in assisting the re-establishment of local police forces. As all political leaders and elders in Somalia had requested United Nations assistance in disarming the population and demobilizing the irregular forces, the Secretary-General stated that his Special Representative, with the help of the technical team, would develop a plan in that regard for application throughout the country. He added that it was also important that the international community continue to enforce the arms embargo as provided for in resolution 733 (1992).

The Secretary-General reported further that the country faced a desperate situation in terms of its needs for humanitarian assistance, recovery programmes and institution-building. Somalia was a country without central, regional or local administration, and without services: it had no electricity, communications, transport, schools or health services. The food situation was critical, with over 1 million children at risk due to malnutrition, and some 4.5 million people in urgent need of food assistance. Observing that the absence of food was both the cause and the result of the lack of security, the Secretary-General suggested that breaking this vicious cycle might be the key to resolving the complex and inextricably linked social and political problems in Somalia. In the face of this situation, and in spite of precarious security conditions which continued to hamper relief activities, the United Nations system, working in close cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross, and non-governmental organizations, had made a determined effort to bring humanitarian relief assistance to the affected populations in Somalia. The Secretary-General noted that the inter-agency 90-day plan of action for emergency humanitarian assistance to Somalia had provided the initial framework for acceleration of the provision of humanitarian assistance by the United Nations system. In addition, Somalia had figured prominently in the two consolidated inter-agency appeals for the Horn of Africa which he had issued in February and July 1992.

The Secretary-General observed that the complexity of the situation and the inherent dangers of working in Somalia, combined with the almost total absence of government at any level, made it very difficult for the United Nations to establish a large-scale, effective presence. Nonetheless, the threat of mass starvation facing large segments of the population and the potential renewal of hostilities, which could affect peace and stability throughout the Horn of Africa region, required an immediate and comprehensive response from the United Nations and the international community. He had therefore come to the conclusion that the United Nations must adapt its involvement: its efforts had to be expanded so that it could help bring about an effective ceasefire throughout the country, while at the same time pressing forward with parallel efforts to promote national reconciliation. That would require the Organization to establish a presence in all regions, and to adopt an innovative and comprehensive approach dealing with all aspects of the Somalia situation — the humanitarian relief and recovery programme, the cessation of hostilities and security, the peace process and national reconciliation — in a consolidated framework. The Secretary-General proposed the establishment of four operational zones: the north-west (Berbera), the north-east (Bossaso), the central rangelands and Mogadishu (Mogadishu), and the south (Kismayo). In each zone a consolidated United Nations operation would carry out the primary activities envisaged in resolution 751 (1992): (a) humanitarian activities — emergency relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and institution-building; (b) monitoring of the ceasefire and containment of potential hostilities; (c) security, demobilization and disarmament; and (d) the peace process and national reconciliation efforts, through conciliation, mediation and good offices. Such a decentralized, zonal approach would, in his view, improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the humanitarian operations in Somalia. To reach areas in the interior of the country, not easily accessible from major ports, he suggested the mounting of an urgent airlift operation.

The Secretary-General pointed out that the conflict in Somalia could only be resolved by the people of Somalia themselves in a process of national reconciliation. As stated in resolution 751 (1992), the objective of the United Nations in this connection was to undertake consultations and make arrangements for the convening of a conference on national reconciliation and unity in the country. He stated that his Special Representative had made important progress on this matter in his consultations with Somali leaders and elders, all of whom had voiced their commitment to national reconciliation. The Secretary-General called upon all the Somali people, leaders of political movements, elders and spiritual leaders, to close ranks and work together in order to achieve the desperately needed national reconciliation of their country. Noting that his Special Representative through his personal intervention had been able to defuse potential local crises, he added that qualified UNOSOM personnel would be located in each of the four zones to assist in mediation and conciliation, and in arranging for consultative conferences as needed. He observed that the States of the Horn of Africa had an essential role in assisting and encouraging the process of national reconciliation and that it was important that the United Nations continue to consult them. He expressed his appreciation, moreover, for the support and cooperation which the regional organizations, including OAU, LAS, and OIC had extended to the United Nations in the joint efforts to restore peace and security to Somalia and to provide humanitarian assistance to those in need. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that the new comprehensive approach recommended in his report, for which he had sought the Council's approval, was intended to be a catalyst for achieving the vital objective of national reconciliation and the reconstruction of a peaceful, stable and democratic Somalia.

At its 3101st meeting held on 27 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,³¹ as well as to a change that should be made to the draft resolution in its provisional form. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 767 (1992), which reads:

Decision of 28 August 1992 (3110th meeting):

On 24 August 1992, pursuant to resolution 767 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Somalia,³³ concerning the findings of the technical team that had visited Somalia from 6 to 15 August and his recommendations. He reported that United Nations agencies, the International Committee for the Red Cross and non-governmental organizations had continued to implement the 90-day plan of action for emergency humanitarian assistance to Somalia and to intensify and extend their humanitarian assistance to the country. He noted, however, that those efforts were in no way adequate to meet the overall needs of the Somali people, an estimated 4.5 million of whom were in desperate need of food and other assistance. Although the United Nations and its partners were ready and had the capacity to provide substantially increased assistance, they had been prevented from doing so by the lack of security that prevailed throughout the country. Security conditions did not permit the assured delivery of humanitarian assistance by overland transport and were thus the main cause of the food crisis in Somalia. Given the difficulties, the Secretary-General had come to the conclusion that the airlift operations needed to be substantially enhanced. The technical team had recommended that, for the immediate future, those operations should be directed to the areas of particular need. Noting that a number of States had expressed interest in contributing to an urgent airlift, he stressed the need for the relief effort to be carefully coordinated by the United Nations. The Secretary-General reiterated that the critical problem facing the United Nations in its humanitarian activities in Somalia was how to ensure the security of relief supplies at all stages: delivery, storage and distribution. He also stressed that the airlift could not be a substitute for an effective surface-delivered programme of assistance through Somalia's ports and overland routes, for which effective security and ground arrangements were essential.

On security and ceasefire monitoring, the Secretary-General noted that the technical team had confirmed his earlier recommendation that the protection of convoys, supplies and distribution centres should be provided by United Nations security personnel operating on the lines described in his report of 21 April 1992.³⁴ He reported that the two parties in Mogadishu had agreed, on 12 August, to the earliest possible deployment of a 500-strong security force. The technical team had, moreover, obtained the agreement of those concerned for the deployment of similar security units in two other parts of Somalia, the north-east and the south-west. The Secretary-General believed that United Nations security units should also be deployed in two other places — in the north-west and the south-east — but the agreement of those concerned had not yet been obtained. He accordingly requested the Security Council to authorize the deployment of four additional security units, each with strength of up to 750, the first two to be deployed immediately and the other two as soon as consultations with those concerned had reached a successful conclusion. The Secretary-General also reported that the 50 military observers authorized for Mogadishu had been deployed since the end of July and had been able to play a valuable role in helping the two sides to maintain the ceasefire; nevertheless, the security situation in the city remained precarious. The technical team had evaluated the possible extension of the ceasefire activities of UNOSOM at Mogadishu to other parts of the country. However, concern had been expressed by several regional leaders about the implications of such an operation for the balance of military forces within the country. Given that attitude, the lack of an effective ceasefire and the fluidity of the fighting, the Secretary-General concluded that it was not feasible to deploy military observers outside Mogadishu.

The Secretary-General recalled that, in his report of 22 July,³⁵ he had recommended that UNOSOM establish four operational zones, which would enable the Organization to establish a presence in all parts of the country and adopt an innovative and comprehensive approach to the various components of the Mission. The technical team had confirmed the validity of that concept and he therefore proposed to establish the four zone headquarters as soon as possible. Each headquarters would be headed by a civilian official who would assist the Special Representative in all aspects of his duties.

The Secretary-General stressed that the immediate need was to break the vicious cycle of insecurity and hunger: lack of security prevented the delivery of food, while food shortages contributed significantly to the level of violence and insecurity. There must then be a comprehensive programme of action covering humanitarian relief, the cessation of hostilities, the reduction of organized and random violence, and national reconciliation. He emphasized, moreover, that a fundamental consideration that should guide all United Nations activities in Somalia was that the Somalis themselves should progressively assume responsibility for establishing conditions and arrangements for the distribution of humanitarian assistance. A stronger United Nations role in securing access, transport and distribution of relief supplies must be paralleled by an effort to involve Somali entities in all aspects of the process. The Secretary-General concluded by noting that much of the action described and recommended in the report was covered by existing mandates. However, it would be necessary for the Council to authorize the increases in UNOSOM strength that he had recommended, which related to the establishment of the four zone headquarters of UNOSOM and to the deployment of four additional security units.

At its 3110th meeting, held on 28 August 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared during the Council's prior consultations,³⁶ as well as to a correction that should be made to the draft resolution. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 775 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Considering the request by Somalia for the Security Council to consider the situation in Somalia,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992 and 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 24 and 28 August 1992 on the situation in Somalia,

Deeply concerned about the availability of arms and ammunition and the proliferation of armed banditry throughout Somalia,

Decision of 8 September 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 1 September 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,³⁷ the Secretary-General requested the Council, through the President, to extend the applicability of the authorization contained in paragraph 3 of resolution 775 (1992) to cover also the logistic support unit of UNOSOM, mentioned in the addendum to his report of 24 August 1992. By a letter dated 8 September 1992,³⁸ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council were in agreement with the proposal contained in his letter.

Decision of 16 October 1992: statement by the President

On 16 October 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:³⁹

The Council heard today a communication from Mr. Sahnoun, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Somalia. On this occasion, the members of the Security Council reiterated their full support for the action of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative. They also expressed the wish that the appeal recently made in Geneva for an increase in the humanitarian assistance to Somalia should be heeded.

The members of the Council expressed their deep concern over the information communicated to them by Mr. Sahnoun, particularly regarding the difficulties he is encountering in the delivery of humanitarian assistance. In this regard, the rapid deployment of United Nations Operation in Somalia is essential. The members of the Council consider that persons hampering the deployment of the Operation in Somalia would be responsible for aggravating an already unprecedented humanitarian disaster.

Decision of 3 December 1992 (3145th meeting):

By a letter dated 24 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁰ the Secretary-General described a number of disturbing developments and conditions in Somalia which made it exceedingly difficult for UNOSOM to implement its mandate. General Aidid had declared that the Pakistani battalion would no longer be tolerated in the streets of Mogadishu; ordered the expulsion of the UNOSOM Coordinator for Humanitarian Assistance, on the grounds that his activities went counter to the interests of the Somali people and his security could no longer be guaranteed; warned that any forcible UNOSOM deployment would be met with violence and that the deployment of United Nations troops in Kismayo and Berbera was no longer acceptable; and demanded the withdrawal of United Nations troops from Mogadishu airport. The Secretary-General also noted that a widespread perception had developed among Somalis, apparently at the instigation of local faction leaders, that the United Nations had decided to abandon its policy of cooperation and was planning to “invade” the country.

The Secretary-General stated that a number of factors had inhibited the distribution of food and other humanitarian assistance, especially in areas outside Mogadishu. He referred, in particular, to the lack of a government or governing authority capable of maintaining law and order, to the failure of various factions to cooperate with UNOSOM, to the extortion, blackmail and robbery to which the international relief effort was subjected, and to repeated attacks on the personnel and equipment of the United Nations and other relief agencies. The net result was that, while massive amounts of relief supplies had been readied for the implementation of a 100-day action programme, the assistance reaching the intended beneficiaries was often barely a trickle. The Secretary-General insisted that, unless the problems relating to security and protection of relief were effectively addressed, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations would not be able to provide the relief assistance urgently in the amounts needed now in Somalia. To establish security conditions that would permit the distribution of relief supplies, it was of the utmost importance that the four additional UNOSOM battalions be deployed to Somalia as quickly as possible. However, the Secretary-General stated that, despite the intensive efforts of his Special Representative, it had been possible to secure Somali consent to the deployment of only one battalion in one part of the country. He concluded by stating that he was giving urgent consideration to the current state of affairs, and that he did not exclude the possibility that it might become necessary to review the basic premises and principles of the United Nations effort in Somalia.

By a letter dated 29 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁴¹ the Secretary-General recalled that the members of the Council had discussed his letter of 24 November during informal consultations on 25 November. They had expressed the view that the situation in Somalia that he had described was intolerable and had voiced doubts as to whether the methods employed by the United Nations to date would be capable of bringing the situation under control. Strong support had been expressed for his view that the time had come to move to Chapter VII of the Charter. The members of the Council had therefore welcomed his reference to a re-examination of basic premises and principles, and had asked him to come forward with specific recommendations on how the United Nations could remedy the situation.

The Secretary-General set out five options for the Council's consideration, all addressed to the immediate humanitarian issue, namely how to create conditions for the uninterrupted delivery of relief supplies to the starving people of Somalia. He stressed, however, that that was only part, albeit the most urgent part, of the problem in Somalia and that efforts were also required to create the political conditions in which Somalia could begin to resolve its political problems and rehabilitate its economy. The latter was an integral part of the UNOSOM mandate and it was important that further measures to protect humanitarian relief supplies should be accompanied by continuing efforts to promote national reconciliation.

The following were the five options set out by the Secretary-General. The first option was to continue and intensify his efforts to deploy UNOSOM in the strength authorized by the Council. UNOSOM would continue to be guided by the existing principles and practices of United Nations peacekeeping operations: it would not deploy without the agreement of the de facto authorities at each location where it was to operate; and it would not use force except in self-defence. The Secretary-General concluded, however, that the situation in Somalia had deteriorated beyond the point where peacekeeping was a viable option. The reality was that there were very few authorities in the country with whom a peacekeeping force could safely negotiate an agreed basis for its operations. The second option was to abandon the idea of using international military personnel to protect humanitarian activities, withdraw the military elements of UNOSOM and leave the humanitarian agencies to negotiate their own arrangements with the various factions and clan leaders. Experience had shown, however, that without international military protection, the agencies had felt obliged to pay protection money to the various factions and clans. If the international community were to allow this to continue, it would be committing itself to a process in which less and less of the aid it provided would reach vulnerable groups and in which lawless trading in that aid would become, increasingly, the foundation of Somalia's economy. Such an outcome would encourage further fragmentation and destroy hopes of national reconciliation. The Secretary-General was more than ever convinced of the need for international military personnel to be deployed in Somalia. The difficulties being encountered were due not to their presence but to the fact that there were not enough of them and that they did not have the right mandate. He therefore excluded the option of withdrawal.

The above considerations had led the Secretary-General to conclude that the Security Council had no alternative but to adopt more forceful measures to secure the humanitarian operations in Somalia. His last three options, therefore, all involved the possible use of force by the United Nations or by Member States so authorized by the Council. Noting that no government existed in Somalia that could request and allow such use of force, he observed that the Council had to make a determination under Article 39 of the Charter that a threat to the peace existed, as a result of the repercussions of the Somali conflict on the entire region, and to decide what measures should be taken to maintain international peace and security. The Council would also have to determine that non-military measures as referred to in Chapter VII were not capable of giving effect to the Council's decisions.

The purpose of each of the three following options involving the possible use of force would be to ensure, on a lasting basis, that the violence against the international relief effort was brought to an end:

The third option would be to mandate UNOSOM to undertake a show of force in Mogadishu, in order to create conditions for the safe delivery of humanitarian relief and to deter factions and other armed groups there and elsewhere in Somalia from withholding cooperation from UNOSOM. However, the arms at the disposal of the various factions and armed groups in the city were not negligible. Moreover, he was inclined to think that if action were to be effective, a countrywide operation might be required. That would entail a major military undertaking, giving rise to many difficult questions, especially with regard to organization, command and control. The fourth option would thus be a countrywide enforcement operation undertaken by a group of Member States authorized to do so by the Security Council. The Secretary-General informed the members of the Council that the United States had informed him that it would be prepared to take the lead in organizing and commanding such an operation, in which other Member States would also participate. He advised that, if the members of the Council were to favour this option, the Council should seek to agree with the Member States participating in the operation on ways of recognizing that it had been authorized by the Security Council and that the Security Council therefore had a legitimate interest in the manner in which it was carried out. The fifth option, which would be consistent with the expansion of the Organization's role in the maintenance of international peace and security and which would strengthen its long-term evolution as an effective system of collective security, would entail a countrywide enforcement operation under United Nations command and control. The command and control could be exercised by the Secretary-General, mandated by the Security Council in an arrangement similar to that followed in the Organization's peacekeeping operations, or by some other arrangement which the Council might decide upon. However, the Secretary-General noted that, in that case, as the Secretariat did not have the capability to command and control such an enforcement operation, troop-contributing countries would have to provide staff officers not only for the headquarters in the field but also in New York.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council take a very early decision to adjust its approach to the crisis in Somalia. The focus of the Council's immediate action should be to create conditions in which relief supplies could be delivered to those in need. Experience had shown that that could not be achieved by a United Nations peacekeeping operation; there was now no alternative but to resort to Chapter VII of the Charter. In parallel, there must also be action to promote national reconciliation and thus remove the main factors that had created the humanitarian emergency. If forceful action were to be taken, the Secretary-General expressed a preference that it be under United Nations command and control. If that were not feasible, an alternative would be an operation undertaken by Member States acting under the authorization of the Council. In either case, the objective of the operation should be precisely defined and limited in time, in order to prepare the way for a return to peacekeeping and post-conflict peacebuilding.

At its 3145th meeting, held on 3 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the letters dated 24 and 29 November 1992 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Somalia, at her request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President of the Council (India) drew the attention of the Council members to several other letters that had been addressed to him: a letter dated 27 November 1992 from the representative of Canada,⁴² anticipating that his country, as a troop-contributing nation, would be consulted by the Security Council and the Secretariat on any measures which might be envisaged in days ahead affecting the mandate of UNOSOM; a letter dated 1 December 1992 from the representative of Egypt to similar effect;⁴³ and a letter dated 2 December 1992 from the representative of Qatar, as Chairman of the Group of Arab States.⁴⁴ The latter expressed the Arab Group's support for the Secretary-General's proposal of a new United Nations operation in Somalia, particularly under Charter VII of the Charter, and stated that that force ought to be managed and supervised by the United Nations. The Arab Group also affirmed the importance of undertaking, in parallel with the military operation, and in cooperation with regional organizations, initiatives aimed at achieving national reconciliation; and requested that the Security Council intensify international efforts to consider ways and means of rebuilding Somalia. The President also drew Council members' attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁵ Before the draft resolution was put to the vote, the representatives of Zimbabwe, Ecuador, China, Cape Verde, Belgium and the Russian Federation made statements.

The representative of Zimbabwe stated that his delegation had followed with increasing horror the fratricidal tragedy that had continued to spiral in Somalia. Particularly unacceptable was the fact that humanitarian assistance was available but could not reach its intended recipients simply because it was being hijacked, stolen or otherwise obstructed by warlords, armed gangs and bandits. Efforts at negotiation had met with intransigence and uncooperativeness, revealing that the humanitarian imperatives of the Somali crisis could not be met through conventional methods. Those considerations had convinced the speaker's delegation that the question of Somalia was a unique situation that warranted a unique approach. However, the solution adopted by the Council would necessarily set a precedent against which similar situations would be measured in the future; it was therefore essential that the situation be handled correctly. The political and humanitarian problems of Somalia could not be addressed in the context of one Member State or a group of Member States; they had to be handled in the context of the international community. In the post-cold-war era it was not unreasonable, though, to expect individual States or groups of States to provide the resources to help resolve such a tragic crisis as part of an international effort. However, an effort could be construed as international only if the United Nations was at its centre. It was in that context that his delegation welcomed the draft resolution, which placed the Secretary-General at the centre of the operation. Zimbabwe attached considerable importance to the idea that in any international enforcement action the United Nations must define the mandate, monitor and supervise its implementation, and determine when it has been fulfilled. The draft resolution met those requirements and set an important precedent for future operations under equally unique circumstances.⁴⁶

The representative of Ecuador said his country would be voting in favour of the draft resolution for several reasons. Solidarity and interdependence — principles that underlay the international order — did not permit impassivity in the face of tragedy wherever it occurred. As a member of the Council, Ecuador felt obliged to contribute to a settlement of the Somali conflict. Unfortunately, the resolutions adopted by the Council to facilitate the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the Somali population had not been sufficient to resolve the crisis, despite the great efforts made by humanitarian organizations, the generous contributions made by many countries, and the activities of UNOSOM. The Somali crisis was an exceptional one, which required a fresh kind of analysis: political as well as legal. It had reached the point where it constituted a threat to international peace and security. There was no government in the country that could agree with the United Nations on a humanitarian assistance operation. However, the Somali people — sovereign in respect of its destiny — was the interlocutor of the United Nations, and the

Organization was heeding its call. The operation the Council was about to authorize would have a defined and limited objective — the promotion of a secure environment that would make it possible for humanitarian assistance operations to be carried out. Moreover, the Secretary-General would report to the Council on the progress of the operation. The draft resolution thus properly recognized the fundamental role of the United Nations in political analysis and scrutiny, in that the Security Council was the body that would authorize the start-up, execution and termination of the operation. Furthermore, the unified command and control of the military forces would be subject to arrangements between the Secretary-General and the troop-contributing countries. The speaker observed that the decision the Council was about to take was an important one. It was a response under Chapter VII of the Charter, commensurate with the complex and sui generis situation that beset Somalia.⁴⁷

The representative of China stated that his delegation agreed with the Secretary-General's analysis of the Somali situation. He supported the efforts to find ways by which the Somali crisis could be settled within the framework of the United Nations. Taking into account the long-term chaotic situation resulting from the lack of a government, he endorsed the requests of most African countries, and the recommendation of the Secretary-General, that the United Nations should take prompt, strong and exceptional measures to settle the crisis. He noted that the draft resolution reflected, to a certain extent, the Secretary-General's recommendations and incorporated some of the views expressed by many delegations, including his own, regarding such issues as strengthening United Nations control over the proposed operation; his delegation would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution. He observed, however, that although the draft resolution empowered the Secretary-General to some extent, it took the form of authorizing certain countries to take military action, which might adversely affect the collective role of the United Nations; his delegation wished to express its reservations in that regard. He added that, in the long term, only through dialogue and consultation between the parties concerned could national reconciliation and enduring peace and stability be achieved in Somalia. As his delegation understood it, the proposed military operation was an exceptional action in view of the unique situation in Somalia, whose purpose was to create promptly a secure environment for the humanitarian relief effort. Once such an environment was achieved, the military operation should cease. Meanwhile, he maintained that the Security Council and the Secretary-General should be empowered to take decisions regarding the control and duration of the operation.⁴⁸

The representative of Cape Verde maintained that the national conflict in Somalia had reached a level of destruction comparable to that of the most ferocious international conflicts, necessitating resolute and effective action by the international community. The conflict had, moreover, an international dimension: because of its repercussions on neighbouring States, it was imperilling the stability and security of the whole region. As existing circumstances did not permit effective execution of the peacekeeping operation, forceful action was necessary on the part of the international community to restore order, disarm the warmongers and ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance to the population. He stressed that the renewed confidence of all peoples in the United Nations, and in the Council in particular, as a guarantor of peace, international legality and the territorial integrity of States, must be nurtured if the credibility of the Council and of the United Nations were to be preserved. The Council must therefore show imagination and determination to ensure that all its decisions were respected and implemented. The case of Somalia offered the Council an opportunity to prove its determination. Its action would not only help solve the situation but also contribute to giving fresh impetus to United Nations activities in maintaining international peace and security. His delegation would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁴⁹

The representative of Belgium stated that his delegation shared the conclusion reached by the Secretary-General: the approach adopted so far by the international community and by the Council in particular had proved ineffective. The Council had to make a fresh start in meeting the humanitarian challenge in Somalia, by taking into account the atypical situation there: it was a country without a government, without an administration, with no source of authority, where factions and gangs held sway. While agreeing with the innovative proposals contained in the draft resolution, he stated that his delegation would have preferred the fifth option proposed by the Secretary-General, namely a purely United Nations operation. Nevertheless, in view of the arguments adduced by the Secretary-General, the option of an enforcement operation undertaken by a group of Member States, duly authorized by the Council, was acceptable. He welcomed a number of elements in the draft resolution that it considered particularly important and which significantly narrowed the distance between the two options. First, the purpose of the operation was clearly a humanitarian one. Secondly, the operation would be under the political control of the United Nations. The coordinating machinery to be set up between the States participating in the operation and the Secretary-General, and the decision-making powers granted to the Council concerning the duration of the operation, were, in the opinion of the Belgian delegation, key elements in the draft resolution.⁵⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation noted that the situation in Somalia was one of total chaos, fraught with the real threat that the country could disintegrate. Millions of Somalis were on the brink of dying from starvation and the considerable efforts made by the international community had failed to yield the needed results. Under such circumstances, it was essential that additional and urgent steps should be taken by the United Nations and the international community as a whole. As the Secretary-General had rightly stressed in his letter of 29 November 1992, the Council had no alternative but to decide to adopt more forceful measures to secure the humanitarian operations in Somalia. He stated that his delegation was convinced that resolution of the crisis required the use of international armed forces under the auspices of the Security Council to ensure the delivery and safe-keeping of the humanitarian assistance and its distribution to the country's starving population. He added that united action by the international community was necessary to put an end to the human tragedy in Somalia. That was why the Council had requested all States, particularly those in the region, to provide appropriate support for the actions taken to implement relevant Council decisions with respect to Somalia, including the draft resolution before the Council.⁵¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 794 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992 and 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992,

Recognizing the unique character of the present situation in Somalia and mindful of its deteriorating, complex and extraordinary nature, requiring an immediate and exceptional response,

Determining that the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Gravely alarmed by the deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Somalia and underlining the urgent need for the quick delivery of humanitarian assistance in the whole country,

Noting the efforts of the League of Arab States, the Organization of African Unity, and in particular the proposal made by the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at the forty-seventh regular session of the General Assembly for the organization of an international conference on Somalia, and the Organization of the Islamic Conference and other regional agencies and arrangements to promote reconciliation and political settlement in Somalia and to address the humanitarian needs of the people of that country,

Commending the ongoing efforts of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and humanitarian organizations and of non-governmental organizations and of States to ensure delivery of humanitarian assistance in Somalia,

Responding to the urgent calls from Somalia for the international community to take measures to ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Somalia,

Expressing grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring in Somalia, including reports of violence and threats of violence against personnel participating lawfully in impartial humanitarian relief activities; deliberate attacks on non-combatants, relief consignments and vehicles, and medical and relief facilities; and the impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies essential for the survival of the civilian population,

Dismayed by the continuation of conditions that impede the delivery of humanitarian supplies to destinations within Somalia, and in particular reports of looting of relief supplies destined for starving people, attacks on aircraft and ships bringing in humanitarian relief supplies, and attacks on the

Pakistani contingent in Mogadishu of the United Nations Operation in Somalia, Taking note with appreciation of the letters of 24 and 29 November 1992 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

Sharing the Secretary-General's assessment that the situation in Somalia is intolerable and that it has become necessary to review the basic premises and principles of the United Nations effort in Somalia, and that the Operation's existing course would not in present circumstances be an adequate response to the tragedy in Somalia,

Determined to establish as soon as possible the necessary conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance wherever needed in Somalia, in conformity with resolutions 751 (1992) and 767 (1992),

Noting the offer by Member States aimed at establishing a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia as soon as possible,

Determined also to restore peace, stability and law and order with a view to facilitating the process of a political settlement under the auspices of the United Nations, aimed at national reconciliation in Somalia, and encouraging the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Somalia to continue and intensify their work at the national and regional levels to promote these objectives,

Recognizing that the people of Somalia bear ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and the reconstruction of their own country,

1. Reaffirms its demand that all parties, movements and factions in Somalia immediately cease hostilities, maintain a ceasefire throughout the country, and cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Somalia as well as with the military forces to be established pursuant to the authorization given in paragraph 10 below in order to promote the process of relief distribution, reconciliation and political settlement in Somalia;

4. Further demands that all parties, movements and factions in Somalia immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law including from actions such as those described above;

5. Strongly condemns all violations of international humanitarian law occurring in Somalia, including in particular the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies essential for the survival of the civilian population, and affirms that those who commit or order the commission of such acts will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts;

6. Decides that the operations and the further deployment of the three thousand five hundred personnel of the United Nations Operation in Somalia authorized by paragraph 3 of resolution 775 (1992) should proceed at the discretion of the Secretary-General in the light of his assessment of conditions on the ground; and requests him to keep the Council informed and to make such recommendations as may be appropriate for the fulfilment of the mandate of the Operation where conditions permit;

7. Endorses the recommendation by the Secretary-General in his letter of 29 November 1992 to the President of the Security Council that action under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations should be taken in order to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia as soon as possible;

8. Welcomes the offer by a Member State described in the Secretary-General's above-mentioned letter concerning the establishment of an operation to create such a secure environment;

9. Welcomes also offers by other Member States to participate in that operation;

10. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, authorizes the Secretary-General and Member States cooperating to implement the offer referred to in paragraph 8 above to use all necessary means to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia;

11. Calls on all Member States which are in a position to do so to provide military forces and to make additional contributions, in cash or in kind, in accordance with paragraph 10 above and requests the Secretary-General to establish a fund through which the contributions, where appropriate, could be channelled to the States or operations concerned;

12. Also authorizes the Secretary-General and the Member States concerned to make the necessary arrangements for the unified command and control of the forces involved, which will reflect the offer referred to in paragraph 8 above;

13. Requests the Secretary-General and the Member States acting under paragraph 10 to establish appropriate mechanisms for coordination between the United Nations and their military forces;

17. Requests all States, in particular those in the region, to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by States, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, pursuant to the present and other relevant resolutions;

18. Requests the Secretary-General and, as appropriate, the States concerned to report to the Council on a regular basis, the first such report to be made no later than fifteen days after the adoption of the present resolution, on the implementation of the present resolution and the attainment of the objective of establishing a secure environment so as to enable the Council to make the necessary decision for a prompt transition to continued peacekeeping operations;

19. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a plan to the Council initially within fifteen days after the adoption of the present resolution to ensure that the Operation will be able to fulfil its mandate upon the withdrawal of the unified command;

20. Invites the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to continue their efforts to achieve a political settlement in Somalia;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

After the vote, the representatives of France, Austria, the United Kingdom, the United States, Venezuela, Japan, Morocco and Hungary, and the President, in his capacity as the representative of India, made statements.

The representative of France stated that, given the intolerable situation prevailing in Somalia, the international community had to react vigorously. His Government appreciated the suggestions made by the Secretary-General and welcomed the offer by the United States which would make possible a broad-scale international operation to establish, in a lasting manner, conditions in which humanitarian assistance could be delivered without hindrance. The decision just taken was of major importance. In adopting resolution 794 (1992), which envisaged action under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council had demonstrated its determination to put an end to the suffering of the Somalis. For France, that commitment was part of the principle of establishing access to victims and of the right to emergency humanitarian assistance, which it supported. It would, therefore, make a substantial contribution to the operation. He noted that the operation would be carried out in close liaison with the United Nations and clearly as part of the Organization's humanitarian and political sphere of action. The role devolving upon the Secretary-General with respect to all aspects of the operation — its establishment, follow-through, and implementation through UNOSOM, which would eventually take it over — was thus essential. His delegation was also pleased that the resolution provided for regular reports to the Council, not only by the Secretary-General, but also by an ad hoc commission composed of some Council members. He stated that it was not surprising that, given the unprecedented situation prevailing in Somalia, the Council had at that stage determined upon an approach different from the usual form of peacekeeping operations. By the present resolution, the United Nations had demonstrated its capacity to adapt to new challenges and was acting in line with the proposals put forward in the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace". He added that, in tandem with United Nations intervention and humanitarian action, he appealed to the international community, and above all to the States of the region and to the African States, to work together for a political settlement in Somalia and for the re-establishment of a State, which required national reconciliation.⁵²

The representative of Austria said that, by taking a more determined approach under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council was fulfilling its responsibility towards the afflicted population in Somalia and was acting upon its claim on international solidarity. This bold new step was a further development of steps the Council had taken already in resolutions 678 (1990), 688 (1991) and 770 (1992). He recalled that, in speaking in the Council on a previous occasion, he had mentioned possible lessons from the Gulf conflict and the United Nations response. One suggestion had been to look more closely into possible "fine print" for enforcement action under the auspices of the United Nations. The resolution just adopted advanced in a pragmatic manner a number of important elements of which the following could be singled out: the Secretary-General's role in the use of all necessary means and in making the arrangements for the unified command and control of the forces involved; the appointment of the ad hoc commission of the Council; the creation of a liaison staff; and the improved reporting requirements.⁵³

The representative of the United Kingdom shared the Secretary-General's analysis that action under Chapter VII of the Charter had to be taken to establish a secure environment for the distribution of humanitarian relief. His country welcomed the offer of the United States to make available very substantial resources to achieve that objective. It would be essential that the United Nations and the unified command deal effectively and forcefully with the elements that had hitherto obstructed the United Nations relief efforts. However, those parts of the country not affected by looting and anarchy but where the need for international assistance was still very real should not be forgotten. Those areas also required the sustained attention and support of the international community. He stressed that the United Kingdom attached importance to the continuing mandate of UNOSOM to operate in those regions where security conditions permitted and the consent of the parties had been obtained. He stressed also the importance of ensuring that the Somalis were aware that the international community had no desire to intervene in the internal affairs of their country, but that it could not stand by and permit a humanitarian crisis of such magnitude to continue. That was a unique set of circumstances which required special measures.⁵⁴

The representative of the United States emphasized that the measures authorized by the resolution and supported by his Government had one objective: to achieve a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian relief to the Somali people in the areas of greatest need. Although the resolution authorized the use of "all necessary means", the United States mission was essentially a peaceful one; force would be used only if it were necessary to achieve that objective. By acting in response to the tragic events in Somalia, the international community was also taking an important step in developing a strategy for dealing with the potential disorder and conflicts of the post-cold-war world. That step must entail unprecedented levels of cooperation among the international community in response to urgent humanitarian needs and to peacekeeping, utilizing the military forces of its members, if necessary, to do so. Cooperation would have to occur on a case-by-case basis, given the complexity of the post-cold-war order. He emphasized that, in offering to contribute to the effort authorized by the resolution, his country had no objective beyond enabling the United Nations to confront a challenge to international peace and security. Once deployed, his country's military forces would remain in Somalia no longer than was necessary. His country looked forward to the early transition to an effective United Nations peacekeeping force. Military intervention was no substitute for political reconciliation, and that task belonged firmly in the hands of Somalis. By acting to provide a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian relief to the people of Somalia, the Council had once again taken an essential step to restore international peace and security. He believed that that courageous decision by the Council strengthened the United Nations and affirmed the ideas upon which it was based. In concluding, he noted that the international community in the post-cold-war era was being confronted with problems which were quite different from the threat that had hung over the world for the past 45 years. There could be no simple solution to those problems. However, it was important to send the unambiguous message that the international community had the intent and will to act decisively regarding peacekeeping problems that threatened international stability.⁵⁵

The representative of Venezuela characterized the decision the Council had just taken as an attempt to respond to an extraordinary humanitarian emergency with equally extraordinary measures. Despite efforts to mediate a ceasefire, the imposition of an arms embargo, a United Nations operation, an airlift, the humanitarian activities of intergovernmental bodies and non-governmental organizations, and the political efforts of regional organizations, the situation had gradually and tragically worsened, with the result that the state of affairs in Somalia constituted an affront to the dignity and conscience of the international community. Although the Council had been confident that it was possible to act in a conventional manner, that had not been the case. The Secretary-General's judgement that there was no national authority in Somalia could not be disputed. A critical point had been reached. His country had no doubt that the situation required exceptional measures. All the values and purposes of the Organization would have been without foundation if the Council had not taken that decision. The resolution was aimed at meeting an urgent need: creating the necessary conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance throughout Somalia. He reiterated his country's view that the crisis in Somalia would be resolved only if that nation recognized the need for its own reconciliation. The future of Somalia was, moreover, intimately connected with the political circumstances of the countries of the Horn of Africa; hence, the search for machinery to establish regional stability had to be uppermost in the minds of the Council members when undertaking future action.⁵⁶

The representative of Japan considered that the situation demanded that urgent and effective action be taken to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia. His country welcomed the initiative of the United States to meet that challenge, and supported the new operation provided for in the resolution just adopted. He added that it was important that the United Nations and the new military operation maintain close cooperation and coordination, and that the Council be kept fully informed of the implementation of the resolution.⁵⁷

The representative of Morocco supported the Secretary-General's innovative approach, observing that an extraordinary situation required an exceptional response. There was no alternative but to launch a large-scale operation within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter, in order to restore a situation that was worsening daily, a situation characterized by terror, blackmail, banditry and devastation. That action — whose first objective was to protect humanitarian assistance — must at the same time pave the way for national reconciliation in Somalia and an international reconstruction effort. The operation should not, therefore, reduce or overshadow the laudable role of UNOSOM, which must still achieve the objectives set by the Council in its resolutions. By authorizing the urgent and exceptional operation, the Security Council was responding to the expectations of the international community as a whole, particularly those of the Arab, African and Muslim community. Morocco had thus voted without hesitation in favour of the resolution just adopted and would be taking an active part in the operation.⁵⁸

The representative of Hungary considered the resolution just adopted to be of fundamental importance in the life of the United Nations, in that it opened up the possibility of joint, determined and innovative action by which it would be possible to put an end to the hardship of an entire people, and to the dangers that were threatening it with extermination. The Security Council had demonstrated that it was quite feasible to adapt to the realities of the world and to undertake an international operation that would make it possible to carry out wide-scale and extraordinary humanitarian actions. The resolution just adopted might, moreover, provide inspiration and guidelines for the future. In the light of the newly authorized operation in Somalia, it seemed to Hungary that it would be even more difficult, confronted with world public opinion, for the international community to avoid its responsibility to meet the challenges arising in hotbeds of crisis as serious as the one that was continuing to tear Somalia apart. His country was pleased that the new type of action had been planned and formulated in such a way as to establish an organic link with the United Nations. It demonstrated how far the United Nations had come since adopting resolution 678 (1990) on the Gulf crisis; the distance covered demonstrated the more effective and dynamic role the United Nations could play in the creation of a new international environment.⁵⁹

The President, in his capacity as the representative of India, stated that the resolution just adopted recognized the uniqueness of the Somali crisis. The rapidly deteriorating complex and extraordinary situation, with no Government in control, demanded an immediate and exceptional response from the international community. His delegation had favoured the fifth option put forward by the Secretary-General, namely a countrywide enforcement operation carried out under United Nations command and control. In the light of the positions taken by the United States, France and Morocco, which had offered to contribute to the operation, the Indian delegation had favoured an arrangement under which the United Nations would keep effective political command and control while leaving enough flexibility for the contributing States to retain on the ground the operational autonomy they had requested. The views of the non-aligned members of the Council on that important point had been accommodated to a considerable extent in the resolution, notably in paragraphs 10, 12 and 19. India could therefore go along with it, particularly in view of the compelling need for speedy action. He stressed, however, that the present action should not set a precedent. India expected that, should situations arise in the future requiring action under Chapter VII, the action would be carried out in full conformity with the Charter provisions and in the spirit of the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace". This would also be consistent, as was noted in the Secretary-General's letter of 29 November 1992, with the recent expansion of the Organization's role in the maintenance of international peace and security and with its long-term evolution as an effective system of collective security. It was India's hope that Member States would develop the necessary political will and confidence in the Organization so that they would be able to contribute to and participate in full-scale United Nations operations.⁶⁰

Decision of 16 July 1992 (3096th meeting): resolution 765 (1992)

By a letter dated 2 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Madagascar, on behalf of the Group of African States, requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation in South Africa. He also transmitted the text of a resolution adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) meeting at its fifty-sixth ordinary session, held at Dakar, from 22 to 28 June 1992. In the resolution, the Ministers, inter alia, expressed grave concern over the escalation of violence in South Africa targeted at black communities, in particular the recent massacre at Boipatong Township; called for the urgent convening of a meeting of the Security Council to examine the issue of violence in South Africa and take all appropriate action to put an end to it as well as to create the conditions for negotiations leading towards a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa; decided to send a ministerial delegation to present Africa's position to the Security Council; and invited the Secretary-General of the United Nations to follow closely the evolution of the situation and take all necessary measures aimed at achieving the above-mentioned objectives.

At its 3095th meeting, on 15 July 1992, the Council included the letter from the representative of Madagascar in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 3095th meeting, the representatives of Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Barbados, Botswana, Brazil, Canada, the Congo, Cuba, Egypt, Germany, Indonesia, Lesotho, Malaysia, Namibia, Nepal, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Peru, the Philippines, Portugal, Senegal, South Africa, Spain, Suriname, Sweden, Uganda, Ukraine, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire and Zambia; and at the 3096th meeting, the representatives of Greece, the Islamic Republic of Iran and Italy.

At the 3095th meeting, the Council decided, in addition, to extend an invitation, at his request, to the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. At the same meeting, the Council also extended invitations, under rule 39, at the request of the representative of Zimbabwe, to the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, to Messrs. Clarence Makwetu, President of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC), and Nelson Mandela, President of the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC); and, at the request of the representative of South Africa, to the following participants in the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (CODESA): Messrs. Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi, Lucas M. Mangope, Oupa J. Gqozo, J. N. Reddy, Ebrahim Joosab, Kenneth M. Andrew and E. E. Ngoben. At the 3096th meeting, the Council extended invitations, under the same rule, at the request of the representative of India, to Messrs. Bantu Holomisa, Essop Pahad, Philip Mahlangu and Manguenzi Zitha. In giving the floor to certain speakers invited under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, the President stated: "This does not in any way entail the recognition by the Council or any of its members of the organization or entity he [the speaker] claims to represent".²

The Council considered the item at its 3095th and 3096th meetings, on 15 and 16 July 1992.

At the 3095th meeting, the President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 8 July 1992 from the representative of South Africa addressed to the Secretary-General,³ enclosing a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of South Africa to the Secretary-General. In his letter, the Foreign Minister stated that the South African Government welcomed the Secretary-General's informal proposal for a goodwill visit to South Africa and suggested that it might take place before the envisaged meeting of the Security Council. Should a visit by the goodwill mission not be feasible before the Council met in open session, the Government of South Africa would support a Council meeting to authorize the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission, which would report through the Secretary-General to the Council as soon as possible.

Commencing the discussion, the representative of Senegal, speaking on behalf of the current Chairman of OAU and of the ministerial delegation of OAU which he headed, stated that Africa as a whole was deeply concerned by the turn of events in South Africa. In the light of the atmosphere of unacceptable violence, as evidenced by the Boipatong massacre, and of the precarious political situation, it was impossible to go on with a credible negotiating process aimed at creating a democratic, non-racial South Africa. OAU believed that the South African Government must be made to shoulder its responsibilities for guaranteeing the security of life and property and creating a climate of civil peace. At the same time, all the parties that believed in the possibility of setting up a democratic regime in South Africa must work for the elimination of all forms of violence. The OAU approach to the Security Council was based on the findings of the Commission of Inquiry on the Prevention of Violence and Public Intimidation chaired by Judge Goldstone (the Goldstone Commission) and recent international commissions of inquiry that the violence in South Africa was gradually eroding the society and causing serious security problems. OAU believed that the Council was the best possible place to seek a solution to the crisis, which, if it continued, threatened to spill over the frontiers of the country and threaten peace and security in the region. The Council could, among other things and in agreement with all the parties concerned, provide a United Nations presence in South Africa, with the aim, inter alia, of helping to consolidate the measures to combat violence, to restore a climate of security and to explore and create conditions in which it would be possible to relaunch the negotiating process within CODESA. Ending the violence was undoubtedly one of the ways to bring about a resumption of the negotiations, which OAU encouraged. Recalling the United Nations long-standing involvement with the problem of South Africa, OAU considered that the United Nations should take up the matter again — to help to identify the causes of the violence and to take the necessary steps to put an end to it. As for the proposed international presence, OAU believed that the designation by the Secretary-General of a Special Representative might be a solution, provided that the Security Council remained seized of the question until the establishment of a democratic, united and non-racial South Africa.

Mr. Nelson Mandela, President of ANC, recalled that the United Nations had been seized of the question of South Africa for the past 45 years because its people had been subjected to the policy of apartheid, which the United Nations had determined was a crime against humanity. The decisions taken by the Security Council and the General Assembly had aimed at ending apartheid and helping to transform the country into a non-racial democracy. That objective had not yet been achieved. The Government of South Africa, representing the system of white minority rule to which the United Nations was opposed, continued to govern the country under a constitution that the Security Council had declared null and void. Since its purposes had not yet been achieved, the United Nations should remain seized of the question of South Africa and continue to look for ways and means by which it could help to expedite the process leading to the democratic transformation of the country. In the meantime, an extremely critical situation had arisen. The process for drafting a new constitution for a democratic, non-racial society, set in motion by the Declaration of Intent adopted at the Convention for a Democratic South Africa on 21 December 1991, was deadlocked. The Security Council was meeting because that process had been brought to a halt by the carnage in the black townships. Mr. Mandela contended that the Government of South Africa was involved in the escalating violence — through acts of omission and commission. The regime had failed to use its power and legal authority to stop the violence and take action against the perpetrators; and the complicity of State security forces in the violence had been confirmed by the Goldstone Commission and international fact-finding missions. Directed at the democratic movement, the violence constituted a strategy of State terrorism intended to create the conditions under which the forces responsible for the introduction and entrenchment of the system of apartheid would be able to impose their will on a weakened democratic movement at the negotiating table. Faced, however, with the horrendous escalation of the violence, as evidenced by the Boipatong massacre, ANC had been forced to withdraw from the multilateral process of negotiations that had been taking place in CODESA. Mr. Mandela acknowledged that there were instances of counter-violence by members of the democratic movement, but stressed that ANC stood opposed to the promotion of violence and remained firmly committed to that position.

Recalling earlier decisions of the Council to help the people of South Africa to transform the country into a non-racial democracy, Mr. Mandela and ANC believed that that commitment placed an urgent obligation on the Council to intervene in the South African situation to end the carnage. Moreover, the interest of the Council in seeing the resumption of negotiations so that a peaceful solution could be found — a solution in keeping with the democratic principles contained in the 1989 Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa,⁴ and the resolutions of the Security Council itself — required the Council to act on the matter of violence in South Africa firmly and speedily. Its failure to do so would undermine its prestige and authority at a time when the Council and the United Nations as a whole were being called upon to play an even more active role in the ordering of world affairs. He therefore urged the Council to request the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for South Africa to investigate the situation with a view to helping the Council to decide on the measures it should take to help end the violence. The Council should then take the necessary decisions to implement such measures and should continuously monitor the situation to ensure their effectiveness.

During the debate, many speakers condemned the escalation of violence in South Africa, in particular the Boipatong massacre; stressed the Government's primary responsibility for curbing violence and for maintaining law and order; called for a halt to the violence and for the resumption of the negotiations within the framework of CODESA; supported the proposed appointment of a Special Representative of the Secretary-General for South Africa; and urged the Council to act decisively to address the situation.⁵

The representative of Algeria said that OAU was having recourse to the United Nations because it had worked for more than 40 years to end racial discrimination. Although considerable progress had been made, the escalation of violence was now threatening to derail the entire negotiating mechanism that had been so laboriously established. He thought that the Government of South Africa, which was responsible for maintaining public order and security, should be firmly invited by the Council to exercise that responsibility without discrimination and to bring to justice the perpetrators of those criminal acts. But that, in itself, would not suffice. The Government also had to address the causes of violence. The Council should call upon it to adopt concrete measures, including the dissolution of private militias, the demobilization of the foreign mercenary battalion which specialized in brutal repression in the townships, the purging of police and army ranks of reactionary elements and the promotion of recruitment among the black majority, and the reinstatement of the ban on arms, including "traditional" weapons, in public places.⁶

The representative of France concurred with the previous speakers that the Council should call upon the South Africans to put an end to violence and to resume negotiations. He supported the draft resolution, including the invitation to the Secretary-General to send a Special Representative to South Africa. As France saw it, that envoy would undertake a dialogue with all the parties concerned and determine, in agreement with them, the precise modalities of his mission.⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the responsibility for dealing with the violence lay with the South Africans themselves — primarily the Government and the police, but also those whose position in South African society gave them influence and authority. He welcomed the constructive approach the Government of South Africa was adopting to the various offers of external assistance, in inviting, for example, non-South Africans to participate in its internal investigations. He expected such help to be aimed at reinforcing the peace structures that South Africans themselves had already built. As to the process of negotiation, the sooner it could be resumed, the better. The outside world should do whatever it could to assist; but it should seek to help, not to prescribe. In that spirit, the troika of European Community Foreign Ministers would visit South Africa later in the year to explore with all the parties ways to restore momentum to the negotiating process and to combat political violence. He added that his Government strongly supported the continuing use by the Secretary-General of his good offices, and believed that the best first step was the dispatch to South Africa of a Special Representative. That envoy's contacts with all parties should enable the Secretary-General and the Security Council to discuss what useful and constructive role the United Nations could play in the period ahead. The Special Representative would need to cooperate closely with other organizations working for the same objectives, such as the Commonwealth, OAU and the European Community.⁸

The representative of the United States observed that the participation in the Council's debate of so many representatives from OAU, other African countries, opposition movements within South Africa and the Government of South Africa provided a unique opportunity to reach a consensus on what must be done to suggest how to bring all South African parties together to continue their negotiations. On the issue of violence, the United States had full confidence in the Goldstone Commission and supported the implementation of its findings by all parties. It also supported the efforts of the National Peace Accord Forum. The United Nations stood ready to support those efforts, but they would only bear fruit if the parties themselves resolved to control the violence. As to what was necessary to get all the leaders of South Africa back to the negotiating table in an atmosphere free of violence, that was impossible for the Council to ascertain precisely. However, a small United Nations team dispatched to South Africa would be able to gain a better perspective. The United States accordingly proposed that a United Nations goodwill mission, under the good offices of the Secretary-General, travel to South Africa to meet all leaders and offer its services to bring the parties closer together. Such a mission would seek to enhance the complex negotiating process, but would not seek to supplant it.⁹

The representative of Zimbabwe welcomed the agreement on the necessity of the Council taking all appropriate action to ensure that the violence was brought to an end. It was important that the violence be stopped for negotiations to continue. However, what had brought CODESA to a halt was not only the issue of violence but also the refusal of the National Party — the ruling party of South Africa — to accept the principle of majority rule. The negotiations had to get back on track, but on a basis that would clearly lead to non-racialism and democracy within South Africa. Characterizing the tragic massacre at Boipatong and other recent similar incidents as merely the tip of the iceberg, he questioned whether the Goldstone Commission — appointed by the South African Government — was the right body to investigate the endemic violence in the country and provide definitive information about it. Zimbabwe did not think it was enough to internationalize the Commission, as had recently been done. It would have preferred a commission appointed by the Security Council or by another body of the United Nations or, failing that, by the Commonwealth. That would have ensured impartiality and continued monitoring of South Africa.¹⁰

Mr. Clarence Makwetu, President of the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania, stated that the Government of South Africa had been forced to adopt a reformist posture by the twin pressures of heightened internal resistance and the international isolation campaign, including punitive economic sanctions. Relaxing those pressures had played into the hands of the regime, which had announced reforms while simultaneously unleashing an unprecedented wave of violence. The lifting of sanctions against the South African regime by sections of the international community had been premature. Contending that the problem of South Africa had already been internationalized through the involvement of foreign mercenaries, he urged the Security Council to internationalize the solution. He invited the United Nations to send an international commission to South Africa to investigate and recommend measures to end the violence, and to supervise the disbanding and expulsion of foreign mercenaries. He called for the strengthening of selective and voluntary sanctions and the introduction of a moratorium on sports contacts until peace and democracy had been achieved through elections. He also asked the Council to adopt a resolution demanding that the South African regime stop the recruitment of white immigrants, intended to increase the white population in the country, until a democratically elected Government was in place. Contending that the South African regime opposed meaningful and effective international involvement on sovereignty grounds, he said that "Azania" would not be an independent and sovereign State until its colonized indigenous majority had exercised its inalienable right to self-determination. The South African problem, which involved colonialism, apartheid and genocide, was an international problem. In conclusion, he urged the Council to authorize the Secretary-General to identify a neutral venue and representatives of the United Nations to convene, chair and mediate discussions on, and the election of, a constituent assembly, since his party considered that CODESA was unrepresentative and undemocratic.¹¹

The representative of Nigeria welcomed the suggestion of the Secretary-General of a goodwill mission to South Africa, but advocated a two-pronged approach to the issue of violence. It was important to secure the immediate implementation of the conditions requested by ANC and all the liberation movements in the country. It was also correct to observe that, since an OAU monitoring or fact-finding mission on violence had visited South Africa earlier in the year, township violence had virtually disappeared. If OAU could make such a noticeable impact, he wondered what a United Nations mission could not achieve in a different environment. He said his country saw no reason why the Council could not act immediately on that request of OAU. He suggested that the Secretary-General, in consultation with all the parties involved, could work out the modalities of carrying out the proposal, recognizing that the primary objective was to put an end to violence and intimidation and thereby to help create a climate conducive to successful negotiation and transition to a non-racial and democratic society in South Africa.¹²

The Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid elaborated upon the two critical issues that must be addressed by the Council — namely, violence and the deadlock in the political negotiations — both of which could undermine peace and security in South Africa and consequently in the southern African subregion. He stated that the Council had an obligation under the Charter to act immediately. Beyond that, the international community had a moral responsibility for the implementation of the 1989 Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences in Southern Africa. He noted that various suggestions had been made during the meeting, ranging from the introduction of international monitors to oversee the implementation of the Peace Accord in particular and law enforcement in general, to direct involvement in the political negotiations so as to guarantee the neutrality of both the convener and the venue. Observing that there was a broad spectrum of possible action that could be taken, he urged the Council to act in a timely manner.¹³

The representative of Australia shared the view of other speakers that the time had come for direct involvement in South Africa. There was a need for prompt, effective and constructive action by the United Nations and other international agencies, such as the Commonwealth, to stem the violence and to restore confidence in the constitutional negotiations. He agreed that, as a first step, a Special Representative should be appointed, and, in determining the precise form of any further United Nations involvement, the Council should await his report. Noting that various options had been mentioned — a goodwill or fact-finding mission, a peacekeeping presence, the establishment of the office of a Special Representative — he hoped that due weight would be given to the needs and wishes of all parties in South Africa. It would also be important that there be close consultation and coordination between the various international organizations concerned with the situation. In conclusion, he stressed that the Council's meeting should be seen as a beginning of a concerted international campaign to restore a climate for the elimination of violence and the resumption of negotiations, and not as an end in itself.¹⁴

The representative of Canada encouraged the efforts that were being made to develop a coordinated international response to the situation in South Africa by organizations such as the United Nations and the Commonwealth. On the negotiations, she stated that it was not appropriate for any country to prescribe a particular constitutional model for South Africans. Her country was convinced, however, that a political settlement must be secured through a process of peaceful negotiations and ratified through free and fair elections. Regarding violence, the speaker underlined that all groups shared responsibility for its continuation and that they must all accept responsibility for ending the cycle of aggression, blame and distrust. In concluding, she suggested that international observers, acting in support of the National Peace Accord, might be able to play a useful role in moving the country towards a non-racial and peaceful democracy. She also urged the Security Council to endorse the proposal to send a Special Representative of the Secretary-General to South Africa.¹⁵

The representative of Suriname considered that international observers should be deployed in South Africa to monitor the policing of the townships and deemed appropriate the request that the Secretary-General appoint a Special Representative.¹⁶

The representative of Antigua and Barbuda, speaking on behalf of the 12 member States of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), recalled the position taken on the developments in South Africa by the Heads of Government of CARICOM at their last summit meeting. He expressed their support for the terms of the draft resolution before the Council, and pledged that they would maintain existing economic and financial sanctions against South Africa until an interim Government was established.¹⁷

The representative of Angola recalled that his country, with all other members of OAU, had strongly and unequivocally supported the steps taken by the South African Government towards the abolition of apartheid, and the measures for the gradual lifting of sanctions against that country. He regretted the new wave of violence in which the protagonists were mainly the black peoples, with the participation of the South African police and foreign mercenary troops. Expressing his deepest abhorrence of the fact that Angolan citizens had participated in the Boipatong massacre, he urged the Council to take the strongest steps possible towards the immediate disbanding of the foreign mercenary forces before they committed any more atrocities in South Africa, Mozambique, Angola or any other country in the region. He also called for the appointment of a United Nations representative to monitor, step-by-step, the implementation of the measures aimed at the final solution of the conflict and the establishment of a democratic, non-racial South Africa.¹⁸

The representative of Cuba described the decision by certain members of the international community to relax international pressure on the apartheid regime as premature and unjustified. Indulgence and inertia were largely to blame for the current situation. In the case of apartheid, nothing had been done in the Council to prevent a “wrong signal” being sent to those who opposed urgent change. He hoped that the question of South Africa and the violence besetting the country would get the attention it deserved. He stressed that the Council had the inescapable duty under the Charter to address, and act upon, all issues that threatened peace and security in the world, irrespective of where they occurred, of the forces involved and of the great Powers’ strategic interests in them.¹⁹

The representative of Lesotho said that his country’s immediate neighbours had pinned their hopes on the Council for the establishment of a protection force which, it was hoped, would contribute to genuine multilateral negotiations by all South Africans acting in good faith.²⁰

The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania stressed that the Council’s meeting was about the tragic violence in South Africa, not about the resumption of negotiations. Priority could not be put on negotiations when carnage was going on in South Africa. The whole purpose of negotiations was to secure the restoration to the majority people of South Africa of their fundamental freedom and rights. But before they could enjoy those rights, including their inalienable right to self-determination, they first had to secure their foremost fundamental right, namely the right to life. While acknowledging that the South Africans needed a negotiated constitution for a post-apartheid South Africa, he asserted that no one had a right to ask them to negotiate “with a gun pointed at their heads”. He recalled that the previous Security Council resolutions concerning South Africa, including resolution 418 (1977) imposing an arms embargo — the first and only Chapter VII measure against the Government of South Africa — had all been adopted in response to massive repression and brutality following violence in the country. In planning an appropriate response to the current crisis, the Council should keep in mind that some members of the international community had been in too much of a hurry to lift sanctions. That had emboldened the South African authorities not only to ignore their undertaking to take steps to end the violence but also to slow down the negotiations. The first responsibility of the Council, therefore, was to reaffirm the need for continued pressure on the South African regime; existing sanctions had to be maintained.²¹

At its 3096th meeting, on 16 July 1992, the Council resumed consideration of the item on its agenda. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²² He also drew their attention to two letters dated 15 July 1992 from the Chairman of the Special Committee against Apartheid addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, respectively,²³ transmitting the statements made by Archbishop Trevor Huddleston and Reverend Frank Chikane at the International Hearing on Political Violence in South Africa and the implementation of the National Peace Accord, held in London on 14 and 15 July 1992.

Opening the discussion, the representative of South Africa welcomed the even-handedness of the Council's approach thus far. With regard to the violence, he agreed that his Government bore the primary responsibility for maintaining order. That did not mean, however, that the other parties to the National Peace Accord were absolved from their commitments. He rejected the allegations that the South African Government was involved in fomenting violence or acquiescing in it. In fact, President De Klerk had taken numerous initiatives to combat the violence, leading to the conclusion of the National Peace Accord and the appointment of the Goldstone Commission. He had made many attempts to arrange a joint meeting with the leaders of ANC and Inkatha to consider the issue of violence and possible monitoring mechanisms. The role of the international community, including the Security Council, in an observer or other acceptable capacity, could be considered in that connection. With respect to his Government's constitutional proposals, the speaker said that they would ensure that the Government would be accountable through free and regular elections in a multi-party system on the basis of one person, one vote. Power would be devolved to autonomous regions and human rights would be entrenched in the Constitution and protected by an independent judiciary. He refuted the allegations that the Government was opposed to an interim Government and favoured the writing of a constitution by a body that was not democratically elected. On the contrary, it favoured the expeditious establishment of a transitional government, operating under a transitional constitution. That remained its primary objective at CODESA. He also denied that the Government was aiming at a transitional government which would be permanent. He stated for the record that if the transitional constitution had not been replaced within three years, a general election would be held. There could be no justification for the claims that the Government's constitutional proposals proceeded from a desire to cling to power or to entrench a white veto, and affirmed that, following the referendum of 17 March, "the book on apartheid was closed". In concluding, he associated himself with an analysis that appeared in an editorial of the Washington Post, which supported the sending of a United Nations fact-finding or goodwill mission to South Africa, but stressed that ultimately the task of curbing the violence belonged to South Africans themselves; and added that only South Africans could determine the pace of the transformation of their country into a practising democracy. The Security Council's meeting enabled the United Nations to mobilize support for that vital transition.²⁴

Mr. Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi, President of the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP), speaking in his personal capacity, said that he would welcome a strong and effective international fact-finding mission charged with researching the origins of the violence and monitoring it. He qualified the claim by ANC that the Government of South Africa was the dominant cause of violence as unproven, and maintained that an independent United Nations fact-finding team would establish that both insurgency and counter-insurgency forces had killed for political gains. CODESA remained, in his view, the only viable negotiating forum despite its flaws. Its deadlock had nothing to do with the Boipatong violence or the white minority veto. The controversy was about the predetermining of a system of checks and balances. Turning to the draft resolution, he said that the KwaZulu Government and his party would welcome and cooperate with any special representative charged with investigating the origins and underlying causes of the violence, with a view to recommending measures to bring the violence to an end. They had no serious objection, moreover, to the establishment of some monitoring mechanism to observe, on a continuous basis, developments in South Africa and to make recommendations. However, he sounded a warning that whatever international presence was envisaged would exacerbate the situation if it were perceived to be designed to buttress the position of any party or group of parties to the internal political conflict. It was vital that any investigation should establish the facts of the situation objectively and impartially. He also stressed that, in the prevailing circumstances, nothing in the nature of peacekeeping with security or military forces was called for. In conclusion, he acknowledged that the international community had played a major role in the fight against apartheid and could continue to help, but he added that, if sanctions were kept in place, violence would not stop in South Africa.²⁵

Mr. Lucas M. Mangope, speaking in his personal capacity, stated that Bophuthatswana had thus far largely escaped the violence currently sweeping South Africa. Describing Bophuthatswana as a model of what a near-ideal future South Africa could be like, both in terms of development and inter-racial harmony, he invited the Security Council to visit and see for itself. He contended, however, that ANC was seeking to destabilize Bophuthatswana with the aim of creating a climate of ungovernability in order to install an administration to its own liking. Insisting that the problems of the region would only be solved at the negotiating table, he proposed that all southern African leaders should assume their responsibility to end the chaos and misery through reasoned negotiations. He appealed to the Council and the United Nations as a whole to use their influence to endorse that proposal.²⁶

Mr. Oupa Gqozo, speaking in his personal capacity, appreciated the fact that some other parties, which were a reality in South Africa, were being heard in the Council irrespective of their status with the Council. He stressed that it was not true that ANC alone represented black political aspirations in South Africa. Over the years, many political groups had mushroomed, a number of which were represented at the CODESA negotiations. He emphasized that ANC was not justified, therefore, in presupposing a right to negotiate on behalf of all others. He noted that South Africa had 10 homelands, of which 6 were self-governing and 4 were politically independent and autonomous, like his "country", Ciskei. Whether or not they were recognized internationally was beside the point. They existed and their leadership could not be wished away. He stated that ANC and its allies had vowed publicly to render South Africa and Ciskei and Bophuthatswana ungovernable, and considered that ANC was intolerant of opposition. He stressed that it was the wish of all South Africans that, whenever an opinion was required, all leaders should be consulted, including the leaders of "independent and self-governing states" in South Africa. He added that a peacekeeping force would not be successful, as it would have to serve ANC interests and comply with its demands.²⁷

Mr. J. N. Reddy, speaking as the leader of the Solidarity Party of South Africa, said that his party was firmly committed to seeking change through peace. The responsibility for ending the violence was a collective one, though the Government of South Africa bore the greater share of that responsibility and should pursue its role vigorously and with greater determination. The way forward lay through negotiations, which could only take place in a climate of peace and stability. His party welcomed the involvement of the Security Council in contributing to conditions conducive to negotiations, and supported the proposal to send a special representative of the Secretary-General to South Africa to facilitate the resumption of the CODESA process and negotiations. It also requested the establishment of a United Nations constitution-monitoring committee to monitor and evaluate the proceedings and outcome once negotiations had resumed.²⁸

Mr. Ebrahim Joosab, of the National People's Party of South Africa, said that the Council's decision to invite all the participants of CODESA demonstrated the impartial and objective manner in which the Council had handled the sensitive situation in his country. He stressed that there was no alternative to peace and negotiations. While he believed that South Africans were capable of coming together, there was a genuine need for the international community to be involved. The United Nations had a role to play in providing objectivity and in ensuring that no one was coerced into accepting a particular constitutional model for South Africa. He suggested that the Security Council should play a role in the resumption of negotiations, and underlined that the nature of the role of the United Nations or of any other organization should be negotiated between the participants of CODESA.²⁹

Mr. Kenneth Andrew, speaking on behalf of the Democratic Party of South Africa, considered the reports of the Goldstone Commission and the International Commission of Jurists on the causes of violence to be generally correct in their analyses and conclusions. His party shared the view that the causes of violence were “many and varied”. It believed that the international community could play a constructive role in helping to resolve the crisis. One of the most critical problems in restoring peace was the level of mistrust in the security forces and their ability to deal effectively with political violence. The Democratic Party of South Africa was of the view that restoring trust and confidence in the institutions responsible for peace required the promotion and strengthening of the mechanisms established by the National Peace Accord. To that end, he suggested that it might be useful to appoint a panel of international figures, commanding the respect and trust of all signatories to the Accord, to promote the Accord both internally and internationally. He also considered that there might well be a role for a respected and impartial person to undertake a mission to South Africa to facilitate the resumption of negotiations. He believed that the international community could play a role in maintaining the momentum of the negotiation and transition processes, and an independent person or agency could perhaps perform a mediating function. He stressed, however, that, to be effective, any action contemplated by the international community to promote peace in South Africa should be endorsed by all the signatories to the Accord. Involvement of the international community should not absolve political parties inside South Africa from their responsibility to resolve problems, particularly those resulting from violence and the breakdown of negotiations. At best, the international community could help the process. Moreover, it could not impose a constitution on South Africa. In the final analysis, a new constitution, to be durable and binding, would have to be the product of negotiation and agreement among South Africans themselves.³⁰

The representative of Norway said that his country favoured the direct involvement of the United Nations in the current situation. That involvement could be in the form of an international mechanism agreed to by all parties, and should result from close consultations based on fact-finding by the Secretary-General and his proposed special representative.³¹

The representative of Brazil said that the well-known links between the need to eradicate apartheid and to preserve international security fully warranted the Council’s participation in measures to overcome the problem of civil conflict in South Africa and to accelerate the complete dismantling of the structures of apartheid. In that context, it was the duty of all Member States and organs of the United Nations to assist the efforts of those who sincerely wished to break the cycle of violence and achieve long-lasting civil peace.³²

The representative of Botswana stressed the importance of the Council’s meeting, which had given South African leaders the opportunity to express themselves on the issue under consideration. The information they had provided was valuable for the Council because those who came from southern Africa believed it was important that the same concern that the Council had shown for crises elsewhere should be shown for the crises in Africa, of which the crisis in southern Africa was one. He affirmed the commitment of the front-line States, the countries of southern Africa and of the continent at large to the negotiation process, but underlined the need for peace and tranquillity if the negotiations were to succeed. The responsibility for creating such a climate lay with the Government of South Africa. All the leaders of South Africa had a responsibility to help the Government maintain law and order, but the Government bore the primary responsibility in that regard. He hoped that the Council would enable the Special Representative whose appointment was envisaged in the draft resolution to do what had to be done to assist the people of South Africa in their negotiations for the new South Africa.³³

Mr. Bantu Holomisa, speaking in his personal capacity, maintained that the South African Government was a colonial administration, as the indigenous people of South Africa were denied self-determination; the international community was therefore justified in intervening in the situation. He said that members of the international community, such as the Council, should exercise caution when it came to imposing punitive measures against the country. They should avoid taking unilateral decisions without consulting the South African black protagonists. He contended that the international community would be effective only in South Africa when it had a direct say over the negotiation process and was invested with mandatory powers to intervene and arbitrate between the parties. He appealed for the dispatch of an international peacekeeping force to South Africa. Its duties should include dispatching an advance team to the country to meet various leaders; looking into the general stability of the whole country; helping to create a free political climate; helping to identify and repatriate all foreign mercenaries in the employ of the South African Defence Force; monitoring the South African arms manufacturers and preventing the flow of weapons to the surrogate forces of the South African Defence Force and Police; monitoring the possibly extensive violation of the arms embargo; and taking over control of the National Peace Accord and revamping it. In conclusion, he said that he saw no purpose in the international community simply insisting on the resumption of CODESA negotiations under existing arrangements and in the present climate.³⁴

Mr. Essop Pahad, of the South Africa Communist Party, rejected the claim, made by some, that the violence in South Africa was black-on-black violence. He contended that the violence emanated from a corrupt, discredited system, and could have been significantly reduced — if not avoided — if the South African police and South African Defence Force had fulfilled their obligations and not played an active role in fomenting it. As to the negotiations, he maintained that the objective of the ANC-led alliance in the negotiation process had been to seek the transfer of power from a white minority regime into the hands of the people — not into the hands of ANC or anybody else. It was the people of South Africa who must decide who should govern them. That was the nub of the breakdown in CODESA. The continuation of CODESA was inconceivable until the National Party regime gave a clear and unambiguous statement that it was prepared to accept a constitution which gave to the people of South Africa the right to decide who should govern them. If the international community were to intervene on that question, it should be in the direction of giving to South Africa what every other democratic society enjoyed, namely, the right of a people to elect its own government. He stated that his party considered it vital that the international community begin to play a much more active role in monitoring the situation in South Africa. It was crucial that the proposed representative of the Secretary-General arrive in the country as soon as possible, for the Security Council, which had been seized of the situation in South Africa since 1946, had a duty and obligation to all humanity to bring to an end what was a crime against humanity.³⁵

Mr. Philip Mahlangu, of the Intando Yesizwe Party, said that the situation warranted urgent international intervention. He appealed to the Security Council to send a high-powered monitoring committee to South Africa with a mandate, inter alia, to monitor, investigate and report on the violence in the country, to recommend to the Secretary-General steps to be taken by the United Nations to end the violence, and to report on the advisability and necessity of having permanent United Nations observers in CODESA.³⁶

The representative of Ukraine considered that, given the atmosphere of mutual mistrust prevailing in South Africa, the international community had a role to play. An international team of independent investigators should be sent urgently to South Africa to monitor the violence. Moreover, during the transitional period, there should be local, regional and national elections, which would also require some form of international supervision to ensure their fairness. He stated that the complexity of the transitional process called for continuous wide-ranging support from the international community, which could be effective only when properly coordinated. There was a need for a combined approach to the problems of political, social and economic development, the protection of human rights and the democratization of South African society. In that context, he suggested that the role of the Special Committee against Apartheid and the Centre against Apartheid should be increased. He hoped that the Security Council would urge the international community to maintain the existing measures imposed for the purpose of bringing about an early end to apartheid.³⁷

Drawing on his country's experience in dealing with South African Governments, the representative of Namibia maintained that the test for ensuring the resumption of the CODESA process was not only the ending of the violence, but the emplacement of effective and durable mechanisms to prevent the armed forces and security units from being used against opponents of the Government. He noted the unprecedented situation as far as the South African participation in the Council meeting was concerned, which was perhaps indicative of how much things had changed. Apart from the delegations of the Government of South Africa and of the national liberation movements recognized by the United Nations, the Council had decided to afford the privilege of addressing it to some of the parties represented at CODESA. The debate and the draft resolution before the Council clearly indicated the convergence of views between OAU and the Council concerning the events in South Africa. Moreover, various intergovernmental bodies, such as the European Community and the Commonwealth, had already taken initiatives similar to those that had been taken or were being contemplated by either OAU or the United Nations. That broad consensus should send a clear message to the Government of South Africa that, on the one hand, the escalating violence was unacceptable and the South African Government must stop it, and, on the other hand, the international community was ready to help normalize the situation. He welcomed the draft resolution as a necessary first step towards a meaningful United Nations role, but urged that that step be followed by a more permanent mechanism: a monitoring group that would remain in the country until a new constitution was adopted.³⁸

The representative of Zimbabwe, in a further statement, denied the allegation made by the representative of South Africa that the Zimbabwean National Army had assisted in transporting weapons to the liberation movements in South Africa. Zimbabwe had never involved itself in the armed conflict or violence occurring there. He also mentioned another issue that had emerged from the day's discussions. In his view, there was a need for a referee of the situation in South Africa. He thought the Council and the United Nations in general should view the role of the Special Representative as a slightly broader one, involving some kind of supervision or refereeing of the process.³⁹

The Council proceeded to vote on the draft resolution before it.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Belgium noted that his delegation had worked to see that the draft resolution was a balanced text and in keeping with reality. However, it considered that certain references in the draft to previous texts were anachronistic. In its view, despite the tragic recent events, there should have been greater acknowledgment of the progress made. As for the mandate to be given to the Secretary-General, Belgium thought it important not to lose sight of the fact that the process of democratization was above all domestic and national in character. It wished to encourage a resumption of dialogue, not the placing of that dialogue under supervision.⁴⁰

The representative of Austria stressed that, at the request of the parties concerned, the international community should encourage and support the process of change in South Africa. His country supported the idea of giving the Secretary-General a mandate to use his good offices towards creating conditions conducive to further progress.⁴¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 765 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 392 (1976) of 19 June 1976, 473 (1980) of 13 June 1980, 554 (1984) of 17 August 1984 and 556 (1984) of 23 October 1984,

Gravely concerned by the escalating violence in South Africa, which is causing a heavy loss of human life and by its consequences for the peaceful negotiations aimed at creating a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa,

Concerned that the continuation of this situation would seriously jeopardize peace and security in the region, session, on 14 December 1989, which called for negotiations in South Africa to take place in a climate free of violence,

Emphasizing the responsibility of the South African authorities to take all necessary measures to stop the violence immediately and protect the life and property of all South Africans,

Emphasizing also the need for all parties to cooperate in combating violence and to exercise restraint,

Concerned at the break in the negotiating process and determined to help the people of South Africa in their legitimate struggle for a non-racial, democratic society,

1. Condemns the escalating violence in South Africa and in particular the massacre at Boipatong township on 17 June 1992, as well as subsequent incidents of violence, including the shooting of unarmed protesters;

2. Strongly urges the South African authorities to take immediate measures to bring an effective end to the ongoing violence and to bring those responsible to justice;

3. Calls upon all the parties to cooperate in combating violence and to ensure the effective implementation of the National Peace Accord;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to appoint, as a matter of urgency, a Special Representative for South Africa in order to recommend, after, inter alia, discussion with the parties, measures which would assist in bringing an effective end to the violence and in creating conditions for negotiations leading towards a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa, and to submit a report to the Security Council as early as possible;

5. Urges all parties to cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in carrying out his mandate, and to remove the obstacles to the resumption of negotiations;

6. Underlines, in this regard, the importance of all parties cooperating in the resumption of the negotiating process as speedily as possible;

7. Urges the international community to maintain the existing measures imposed by the Council for the purpose of bringing an early end to apartheid in South Africa;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter until a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa is established.

After the vote, the representative of Senegal made a further statement on behalf of the OAU ministerial delegation and the current Chairman of OAU, pledging the Organization's full assistance to, and cooperation with, the Secretary-General's Special

Representative for South Africa in the discharge of his task.⁴²

Decisions of 17 August 1992 (3107th meeting): resolution 772 (1992) and statement by the President

On 7 August 1992, pursuant to resolution 765 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the mission carried out by his Special Representative and a small team to South Africa from 21 to 31 July 1992.⁴³ The mission had discussed with a wide range of parties measures to assist them in bringing an end to the violence and to create conditions for the resumption of negotiations. On the basis of its findings, the Secretary-General recommended a number of measures. On the issue of violence, he recommended that the efforts of the Goldstone Commission be supported by the international community and that its recommendations be fully and speedily implemented by the Government and, when so required, by the parties in South Africa. He also recommended that the mechanisms established by the National Peace Accord, to which all parties had agreed, be strengthened and reinforced. To that end, he recommended the deployment of some 30 United Nations observers to South Africa, to work in close association with the National Peace Secretariat, in order to further the purposes of the Accord. Their number could, as necessary, be supplemented by other appropriate international organizations, such as the Commonwealth, the European Community and OAU. As to the negotiations, they were uniquely the responsibility of South Africans. The Secretary-General was heartened by the determination of the major parties to return to the negotiating table as soon as possible and urged them to do so. He expressed the view that certain actions could contribute greatly to improving the political climate and creating trust: for example, the immediate release of all remaining political prisoners; and fair and objective reporting on State-owned radio and television. He endorsed the CODESA process. For all its shortcomings, it should be pursued and improved. Others should be encouraged to join and its work should be better coordinated and made much more transparent. In addition, the Secretary-General recommended that the establishment of a deadlock-resolving machinery at the highest political level and the appointment of an eminent and impartial person be considered by all concerned. The Secretary-General concluded by stressing that, to discharge its functions, the Security Council should have before it regular, impartial and objective information. To that end, he proposed that missions such as that just completed be undertaken on a quarterly basis or more frequently, if the situation warranted, and that reports be provided to the Council.

At its 3107th meeting, held on 17 August 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁴⁴ as well as to a letter dated 12 August 1992 from the representative of Senegal addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁵ transmitting a communiqué issued by the Government of Senegal, whose President was the current Chairman of OAU, welcoming the successful completion of the mission to South Africa by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General.

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 772 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 765 (1992) of 16 July 1992,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 7 August 1992 on the question of South Africa,

Determined to help the people of South Africa in their legitimate struggle for a non-racial, democratic society,

Cognizant of the expectations of the people of South Africa that the United Nations will assist with regard to the removal of all obstacles to the resumption of the process of negotiations,

Bearing in mind the areas of concern relevant to the question of violence in South Africa, including the issues of the hostels, dangerous weapons, the role of the security forces and other armed formations, the investigation and prosecution of criminal conduct, mass demonstrations and the conduct of political parties,

Also bearing in mind the need to strengthen and reinforce the indigenous mechanisms set up under the National Peace Accord, so as to enhance their capacity in the building of peace, both in the present and in the future,

Determined to assist the people of South Africa to end violence, the continuation of which would seriously jeopardize peace and security in the region,

Underlining, in this regard, the importance of all parties cooperating in the resumption of the negotiating process as speedily as possible,

1. Welcomes with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 7 August 1992 on the question of South Africa;

2. Expresses its appreciation to all relevant parties in South Africa for the cooperation they extended to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for South Africa;

3. Calls upon the South African Government and all parties in South Africa to implement urgently the relevant recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy, as a matter of urgency, United Nations observers in South Africa, in such a manner and in such numbers as he determines necessary to address effectively the areas of concern noted in his report, in coordination with the structures set up under the National Peace Accord;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to assist in the strengthening of the structures set up under the National Peace Accord in consultation with the relevant parties;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council quarterly, or more frequently if necessary, on the implementation of the present resolution;

7. Calls on the Government of South Africa, parties and organizations, and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord, to extend their full cooperation to the United Nations observers to enable them to carry out their tasks effectively;

8. Invites international organizations such as the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Community to consider deploying their own observers in South Africa in coordination with the United Nations and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter until a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa is established.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the President stated that, in connection with the resolution

just adopted, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁶

It is the understanding of the members of the Council that the Secretary-General will consult the Council on the number of observers he has the intention to deploy from time to time.

Decision of 10 September 1992: statement by the President

By a letter dated 9 September 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁷ the representative of South Africa submitted a memorandum issued by his Government on the events that had taken place at Bisho, Ciskei, on 7 September 1992, resulting in the death of 28 people and injury of approximately 190. In the memorandum, the Government urged the Secretary-General and the members of the Security Council to demand that the ANC/Communist Party alliance abandon any further provocative actions which put at risk the lives of innocent South Africans. It also appealed to the Secretary-General to consider sending his representative to South Africa, as soon as possible, in order to assist in the strengthening of the National Peace Secretariat and its regional structures. The Government suggested, further, that the Secretary-General's representative attend the proposed meeting of the signatories of the National Peace Accord as an observer, and enter into discussions with the main political players with a view to assisting in bringing violence to an end and in removing the remaining obstacles to the resumption of negotiations.

On 10 September 1992, following consultations held on the same day, the President (Ecuador) made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:⁴⁸

The members of the Security Council deplore the killing of 28 demonstrators and the wounding of nearly 200 others by security elements in South Africa on 7 September 1992. They reiterate their grave concern at the continued escalation of the violence in South Africa. They emphasize once again the responsibility of the South African authorities for the maintenance of law and order and call on them to take all measures to end the violence and to protect the right of all South Africans to engage in peaceful political activity without fear of intimidation or violence. They urge all parties in South Africa to cooperate in combating violence and to exercise maximum restraint in order to help break the spiralling cycle of violence.

The members of the Council emphasize the need to put an end to the violence and create conditions for negotiations leading to the establishment of a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa. They note in this regard that the Council, in its resolution 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992, authorized the Secretary-General to deploy United Nations observers in South Africa, in coordination with the structures set up under the National Peace Accord, to provide a framework and basis for putting an end to violence in the country. They welcome the Secretary-General's decision to deploy an advance party of 13 United Nations observers in South Africa on 11 September 1992 as part of the complement of 50 observers to be deployed within one month.

The members of the Council call upon the Government of South Africa, parties and organizations, and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord, to extend their full cooperation to the United Nations observers to enable them to carry out their tasks effectively. They reiterate their call to other relevant regional and inter-governmental organizations to consider deploying their own observers in South Africa in coordination with the United Nations and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord in order to facilitate the peace process.

8. The situation concerning Western Sahara

Decision of 27 June 1990 (2929th meeting): resolution 658 (1990)

On 18 June 1990, pursuant to resolution 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara.¹ It contained the text of the settlement proposals made by the Secretary-

General and the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), as accepted in principle on 30 August 1988 by the parties to the conflict in Western Sahara, namely, Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (Frente Polisario). The report also contained the outline of an implementation plan proposed by the Secretary-General for giving effect to those proposals. The main elements of the settlement plan were a ceasefire and the holding of a referendum without military or administrative constraints to enable the people of Western Sahara, in the exercise of their right to self-determination, to choose between independence and integration with Morocco. The implementation plan was based on recommendations made by the Technical Commission established on 30 June 1989 and the responses of the parties to the Commission's draft timetable. It provided, inter alia, for a ceasefire monitored by United Nations military personnel, followed by an exchange of prisoners of war; a substantial and phased reduction by Morocco of its troops in the Territory; the confinement of the combatants on each side to designated locations monitored by United Nations military personnel; the organization and conduct by the United Nations of a referendum 24 weeks after the ceasefire had come into effect; the monitoring by the United Nations of other aspects of the administration of the Territory, especially the maintenance of law and order, to ensure that the necessary conditions existed for the holding of a free and fair referendum; and the return of refugees, other Western Saharans living outside the Territory and Frente Polisario members found eligible to vote.

Under the implementation plan, during a transitional period lasting from the entry into force of the ceasefire to the announcement of the results of the referendum, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General would have sole and exclusive responsibility over all matters relating to the referendum. He would be assisted by an integrated support group of United Nations civilian, military and civil police personnel, to be known as the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO). The Secretary-General expressed the belief that the proposed implementation plan — to be carried out by the United Nations in cooperation with OAU, whose representatives would act as official observers — provided an effective means of holding a referendum and permitting the people of Western Sahara to determine their future without military or administrative constraints. He accordingly commended it to the Council for such action as the latter might consider appropriate to facilitate its implementation at the earliest possible date. He stressed that the United Nations operation would be large and complicated, and noted that, owing to a number of unknown factors, it was impossible at that stage to present to the Council even a preliminary estimate of costs. He therefore intended to dispatch, in the immediate future, a technical mission to the Territory and neighbouring countries, to refine the administrative aspects of the plan and to obtain the information — especially about the availability of logistic supplies and support in the Territory — which was required to prepare a further report to the Council containing an estimate of the cost of MINURSO. In that report, he would recommend to the Council that it authorize the immediate establishment of MINURSO.

At its 2929th meeting, held on 27 June 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.² The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 658 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, by which it decided to authorize the Secretary-General to appoint a special representative for Western Sahara and to request the Secretary-General to transmit to it as soon as possible a report on the holding of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara and on ways and means to ensure the organization and supervision of such a referendum by the United Nations in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity,

Recalling also that, on 30 August 1988, the Kingdom of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro gave their agreement in principle to the proposals of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity in the framework of their joint mission of good offices,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the situation concerning Western Sahara,

1. Expresses its full support to the Secretary-General in his mission of good offices, pursued jointly with the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, with a view to settling the question of Western Sahara;

2. Approves the report of the Secretary-General, transmitted to the Council in accordance with resolution 621 (1988) with a view to settling the question of Western Sahara, which contains the full text of the settlement proposals as accepted by the two parties on 30 August 1988 as well as an outline of the plan provided by the Secretary-General in order to implement those proposals;

3. Calls upon the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity in their efforts aimed at an early settlement of the question of Western Sahara;

4. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to dispatch, in the immediate future, a technical mission to the territory and to neighbouring countries, in particular to refine the administrative aspects of the outlined plan and to obtain the necessary information for the preparation of a further report to the Council;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Security Council as soon as possible a further detailed report on his implementation plan, containing, in particular, an estimate of the cost of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara, on the understanding that this further report should be the basis on which the Council would authorize the establishment of the Mission.

Decision of 29 April 1991 (2984th meeting):
resolution 690 (1991)

On 19 April 1991, pursuant to resolution 658 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on the situation concerning Western Sahara.³ Taking account of the work of the technical mission and the views of the two parties, the report contained detailed proposals with regard to the composition, strength and timetable of MINURSO,⁴ and an estimate of the overall cost of the mission. The mission would consist of three units: (a) a civilian unit, which would include an Identification Commission, charged with the central task of identifying and registering all Western Saharans eligible to vote in the referendum; a Referendum Commission, to assist the Special Representative in all aspects of the organization and conduct of the referendum; and a component under the responsibility of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, to implement the repatriation programme and facilitate the voluntary return of identified eligible voters; (b) a security unit; and (c) a military unit.

With regard to timing, the Secretary-General proposed that D-Day (the day on which the transitional period would begin and the ceasefire come into effect) be scheduled for 16 weeks after the approval of the MINURSO budget by the General Assembly. With regard to the duration of the operation, he envisaged that the referendum could be held 36 weeks after the approval of the Mission's budget by the General Assembly, although MINURSO would continue to discharge its monitoring responsibilities arising from the referendum results for a period of some four to six weeks thereafter. He cautioned, however, that the duration stipulated for the various processes in the timetable were estimates and might require adjustment.

With regard to the financial aspects of the operation, the Secretary-General estimated that its overall cost, including the repatriation programme, would be approximately $200 million. He recommended that the expenditures of MINURSO be considered as expenses of the Organization to be borne by the Member States in accordance with Article 17 (2) of the Charter except for the repatriation programme, estimated at some $35 million, which would be funded through voluntary contributions. He stressed, however, that the programme should not be considered solely as a humanitarian activity: it was a political element crucial to the success of the operation. Consequently, he recommended that MINURSO not be deployed in the mission area on D-Day unless, by that date, the voluntary contributions needed for the implementation of the repatriation plan had been paid in full. The Secretary-General was confident that his proposals constituted a balanced and equitable way of achieving the goal of the holding of a free, fair and impartial referendum for the people of Western Sahara. However, he stressed that, for MINURSO to be effective, the following four essential conditions must be met: (a) it must at all times have the full support of the Security Council; (b) it must operate with the full cooperation of the two parties, particularly with regard to the comprehensive cessation of all hostile acts; (c) the cooperation and support of the neighbouring countries (Algeria and Mauritania) must be assured; and (d) the necessary financial resources must be made available by Member States in a full and timely manner. The Secretary-General concluded by recommending that the Security Council should decide to authorize the establishment of MINURSO and link the beginning of the transitional period to the appropriation action by the General Assembly.

At its 2984th meeting, on 29 April 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the statement the Secretary-General had made at the Council's informal consultations on 24 April 1991,⁵ recommending the establishment of MINURSO as soon as possible in order to hasten the restoration of peace and stability in the region. He also drew their attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶ The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 690 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, by which it, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to transmit to it a report on the holding of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara and on ways and means to ensure the organization and supervision of such a referendum by the United Nations in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity,

Recalling also that, on 30 August 1988, the Kingdom of Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguía el-Hamra y de Río de Oro gave their agreement in principle to the proposals of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the current Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity in the framework of their joint mission of good offices,

Recalling further its resolution 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, by which it approved the report of the Secretary-General of 18 June 1990, which contains the full text of the settlement proposals as accepted by the two parties on 30 August 1988, as well as an outline of the plan provided by the Secretary-General in order to implement those proposals, and by which it requested the Secretary-General to transmit to it a further detailed report on his implementation plan, containing in particular an estimate of the cost of the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara,

Desirous of reaching a just and lasting solution of the question of Western Sahara,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 19 April 1991 on the situation concerning Western Sahara,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General, transmitted to the Council in accordance with resolution 658 (1990);

2. Expresses its full support for the efforts of the Secretary-General for the organization and the supervision, by the United Nations in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, in accordance with the objectives mentioned in his report;

3. Calls upon the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of his plan as described in his report of 18 June 1990 and amplified in his report of 19 April 1991;

4. Decides to establish, under its authority, a United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara in accordance with the report of 19 April 1991;

5. Also decides that the transitional period will begin no later than sixteen weeks after the General Assembly approves the budget for the Mission;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council regularly informed of the implementation of his settlement plan.

Decision of 4 September 1991: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 8 July 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,⁷ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in accordance with paragraph 12 of his report of 18 June 1990,⁸ he had written to Morocco and the Frente Polisario on 24 May 1991, proposing that a formal ceasefire should commence on 6 September 1991, and that the two parties had accepted that date.

By a letter dated 3 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,⁹ the Secretary-General transmitted a note regarding the implementation of the ceasefire. Expressing concern at recent developments along the international frontier, he stated that he had decided that United Nations efforts should be concentrated, at that stage, in the areas specified in the note. He intended to deploy about 100 military observers in those areas, as from 6 September 1991, to verify compliance with the ceasefire. Full deployment of MINURSO would not begin until the activities set out in the timetable for the plan were well under way. By a letter dated 4 September 1991,¹⁰ the President informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council endorsed his action.

Decision of 17 September 1991: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 13 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,¹¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council that, in the context of the deployment of military observers to verify the ceasefire in the areas referred to in his letter of 3 September, he intended to deploy about 100 additional military observers and the staff necessary for command and control functions, logistical support, communications, air transport and medical support. By a letter dated 17 September 1991,¹² the President informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council endorsed his action.

On 19 December 1991, pursuant to resolution 690 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of his settlement plan for Western Sahara.¹³ He reported that, during the three months following the acceptance by the parties of the date of the ceasefire, it had become apparent that it would not be possible to carry out a number of tasks that were supposed to be completed before the ceasefire came into effect on 6 September 1991. It had also become clear that, notwithstanding the parties' earlier acceptance of the settlement plan, substantial areas of difference between them remained. Consequently, one party had not been able to agree that the transition period should begin on 6 September 1991, as envisaged in the plan. Meanwhile, hostilities had broken out in the Territory, interrupting an informal ceasefire that had been in effect for more than two years. In those circumstances, the Secretary-General said he had decided that the ceasefire should come into effect on 6 September as agreed, on the understanding that the transition period would begin as soon as the outstanding tasks had been completed. There was no doubt, in his view, that the United Nations military and civilian presence in the area had contributed significantly to a calming of the situation, although both parties had complained about violations of the ceasefire.

The Secretary-General regretted that slow progress in the accomplishment of certain tasks had made it necessary to adjust the timetable of the settlement plan, largely because of the complexity of the identification process, aimed at establishing the list of those who would vote in the referendum, and the parties' different interpretations of the plan in that regard. The parties also differed in their interpretation of the plan in relation to the confinement of troops and the return of refugees and other Saharans living outside the Territory. There was likely to be a further delay of some months while consultations continued on those issues. The Secretary-General stressed that everything would be done to reduce costs. In conclusion, he noted that serious efforts would have to be made at the political and technical levels in order to keep the process going.

At its 3025th meeting, on 31 December 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Russian Federation) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴ He also drew their attention to three letters addressed to the President of the Security Council relating to the item on the agenda: a letter dated 23 December 1991 from the representative of Ghana; a letter dated 24 December 1991 from the representative of Morocco; and a letter dated 26 December 1991 from the representative of Algeria.¹⁵

The draft resolution was thereupon put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 725 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 621 (1988) of 20 September 1988, 658 (1990) of 22 June 1990 and 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 December 1991 on the situation concerning Western Sahara, Noting with concern the difficulties and delays encountered in the implementation of the settlement plan regarding the question of Western Sahara, as adopted by resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991), cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, and therefore welcomes the report of the Secretary-General of 19 December 1991 on the situation concerning Western Sahara;

2. Reiterates its support for further efforts by the Secretary-General for the organization and the supervision, by the United Nations in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara in conformity with resolutions 658 (1990) and 690 (1991), by which the Council adopted the settlement plan for Western Sahara;

3. Calls upon the two parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the settlement plan, which has been accepted by them;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to submit a further report to the Security Council as soon as possible, but in any event within two months of the date of passage of this resolution.

Decision of 25 March 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

On 28 February 1992, pursuant to resolution 725 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on MINURSO.¹⁶ He underlined that the primary function of the Mission in its current limited deployment was to monitor the ceasefire. He reported that the ceasefire had held: there had been no exchanges of fire between the two sides and no deaths as a result of hostile action. However, there had been a worrying number of lesser violations of the ceasefire, the great majority of which had been attributable to one of the parties. Recalling that the referendum in Western Sahara should have been held in January 1992, the Secretary-General said that it had not been possible to proceed in conformity with the original timetable in view of persistent differences of interpretation with regard to the implementation of the plan. The fact that the United Nations had never before organized a referendum of this kind also contributed to the delay. The Secretary-General stated that he was not in a position at that stage to propose a revised timetable for implementation. However, he believed that a target date should be set for resolution of all outstanding issues that blocked implementation of the plan. He accordingly proposed to report further to the Council not later than the end of May 1992. In the meantime, he recommended that MINURSO be maintained for the next three months at its current level of activity, on the grounds that its continued presence helped to maintain the ceasefire and thus created conditions for the remaining obstacles to be removed.

By a letter dated 25 March 1992,¹⁷ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had taken note of his report of 28 February and reiterated the Council's support for his efforts and those of his newly appointed Special Representative to accelerate the implementation of the settlement plan. Taking into consideration the urgency of the situation, the members of the Council looked forward to a further report from the Secretary-General on the progress made in the implementation of the plan.

Decision of 3 June 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the
Secretary-General

On 29 May 1992, pursuant to the Council's expressed interest and his stated intention, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on the status of the implementation of the settlement plan.¹⁸ He reported that, although ceasefire violations had continued with somewhat increased frequency since his last report, the incidents had generally not been of a violent nature and that, since the deployment of MINURSO the previous year, there had not been a single casualty. Furthermore, the parties had assured his Special Representative that they would make every effort to adhere to the provisions of the ceasefire agreement and to cooperate with MINURSO within the framework of the settlement plan. In the light of the foregoing and bearing in mind the critical role the MINURSO observers were playing in the maintenance of peace and tranquillity, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the mandate of MINURSO for a further period of three months, until the end of August 1992. He added that if, by that time, the peace process remained deadlocked, the Council might wish to consider a different approach.

By a letter dated 3 June 1992,¹⁹ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that his report of 29 May had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council who reaffirmed their support for the efforts he and his Special Representative were making to reactivate the settlement plan. The President added that the members of the Council shared the Secretary-General's views on the necessity of maintaining in place the MINURSO personnel currently deployed in Western Sahara in order to monitor the ceasefire. In view of the increasing urgency of the situation, the members of the Council requested the Secretary-General to submit, at the earliest possible date, a further progress report on the implementation of the plan.

Decision of 31 August 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

On 20 August 1992, pursuant to the last paragraph of the President's letter of 3 June, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further progress report on the situation concerning Western Sahara.²⁰ He reported that, since his last report, there had been a marked decline in the number of ceasefire violations confirmed by MINURSO observers. In accordance with the agreement reached with the two parties, his Special Representative had embarked on a series of talks with each of them, focusing initially on the formulation of safeguards to protect the rights and liberties of the losing side in the referendum, whatever the outcome. Each party had submitted proposals for such safeguards. The parties had been reminded that, in the interest of restoring confidence in the peace process, they should abide scrupulously by the ceasefire and abstain from any provocative behaviour endangering the settlement plan. The Secretary-General stated that the talks had achieved their principal objective of creating a climate in which obstacles to the holding of the referendum — primarily, disagreements over the criteria for eligibility to vote²¹ — could be overcome. He also reported on the discussions his Special Representative had had with the Government of Morocco concerning the latter's reported intention of holding, in the coming months, municipal and legislative elections, as well as a plebiscite on constitutional reform, in which the inhabitants of Western Sahara would be eligible to vote. While reluctant to consider postponing the intended elections, Morocco had expressed its readiness to give a written commitment to the Secretary-General to the effect that those elections would be independent of, and separate from, the United Nations referendum and that it would abide by the results of the latter. In concluding, the Secretary-General stated his intention to submit a further report to the Council before the end of September, focusing on the results of the next round of talks between his Special Representative and the parties which would concentrate on the interpretation of the criteria for eligibility to vote. In the meantime, he proposed to maintain the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO.

²¹ For the criteria for eligibility to vote, see the annex to the Secretary-General's report of 19 December 1991 (S/23299).

By a letter dated 31 August 1992,²² the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that his report of 20 August had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council and that they had agreed to his proposal to maintain the existing staffing and deployment of MINURSO. They also shared the Secretary-General's views on the necessity of the parties abiding by the ceasefire and abstaining from any provocative behaviour endangering the settlement plan. The members expressed the hope that both parties would cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Special Representative in their efforts to achieve speedy progress in the implementation of the plan, and strongly urged the parties themselves to make extraordinary efforts to ensure the success of the plan. They looked forward to receiving a further progress report on the implementation of the plan, as indicated, before the end of September.

Decision of 8 October 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 2 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²³ the Secretary-General stated that the results of the talks of his Special Representative with each of the parties on the interpretation of the criteria for eligibility to vote had been inconclusive. He had therefore authorized his Special Representative to undertake further consultations with a view to clarifying certain unresolved questions and also to determining whether a meeting of tribal chiefs, such as that organized by the United Nations at Geneva in June 1990, could help solve the problems impeding the implementation of the settlement plan. Pending the completion of those consultations, the Secretary-General proposed to postpone the submission of his report to the Council by six to eight weeks. In the meantime, he recommended maintaining the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO.

By a letter dated 8 October 1992,²⁴ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that his letter of 2 October had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council. They reiterated their full support for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and the Special Representative to resolve the problems impeding the implementation of the settlement plan, welcoming, in particular, the Secretary-General's intention to explore the possibility of a further meeting of tribal chiefs. The members of the Council emphasized the urgency of settling the pending questions, especially those which related to the interpretation of the criteria for inclusion in the voters' lists, so that the implementation of the plan might begin as soon as possible. They also approved the Secretary-General's proposal to maintain the existing deployment and staffing of MINURSO, and awaited his further report in due course.

By a letter dated 22 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁵ the Secretary-General referred to his letter of 16 November²⁶ in which he had expressed the need to postpone the presentation of his report until the second week of December in order to await the results of the consultative meeting of tribal chiefs, scheduled to be held at Geneva earlier in the month. He regretted to inform the Council that it had not been possible to hold the meeting, owing to discrepancies regarding the notion of tribal chiefs — discrepancies which were themselves linked to the persisting divergences on the criteria for identification and their interpretation. The Secretary-General recalled that it had been his hope that the referendum in Western Sahara could be organized on the basis of agreements among all concerned on the major aspects of the settlement plan. However, he had to conclude with much regret that the considerable efforts made by his Special Representative over the past several months to reach such agreements had not achieved the desired results. He now felt obliged to take concrete steps towards the holding of the referendum, in the expectation that both parties would fully cooperate with him pursuant to their commitment to abide by the provisions of the settlement plan. In his forthcoming report, which he would submit to the Council in the second half of January 1993, he intended therefore to set forth the various steps which would need to be taken in order to hold the referendum at the earliest possible date.

Americas

9. Central America: efforts towards peace

Initial proceedings

By a letter dated 24 February 1989 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ the representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua transmitted the text of the Joint Declaration of the Central American Presidents² adopted by their respective Heads of State on 14 February 1989 at their summit meeting held at Costa del Sol, El Salvador. The five Presidents noted that they had reviewed the status of the Central American peace process and adopted decisions required to put it into effect, on the understanding that the commitments entered into under the Esquipulas II Agreement of 7 August 1987³ and the Alajuela Declaration of 16 January 1988⁴ constituted a single, indivisible whole. The President of Nicaragua had informed them that he was prepared to undertake a process of democratization and national reconciliation in his country, in the context of the Esquipulas II Agreement, to hold elections by 25 February 1990 and to invite international observers, including representatives of the Secretary-General, to verify the electoral process. The Central American Presidents undertook to draw up, within 90 days, a joint plan for the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation in Nicaragua or third countries of members of the Nicaraguan resistance and their families. To that end, they would request technical advice from specialized agencies of the United Nations. They also entrusted an Executive Commission with the task of establishing, in accordance with talks with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, an international mechanism to verify their security commitments.

On 26 June 1989, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the situation in Central America,⁵ pursuant to Security Council resolutions 530 (1983) and 562 (1985). He recalled that the Central American Presidents had, in their Joint Declaration of 14 February 1989, made several specific commitments with a view to implementing the Esquipulas II Agreement and had entrusted the United Nations with three important tasks: assistance in the establishment of an international mechanism for on-site verification of the security commitments; provision of international observers to verify the genuineness of the electoral process in Nicaragua; and provision of technical advice from specialized agencies of the United Nations on the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation of members of the Nicaraguan resistance.

With regard to the establishment of a possible security verification mechanism, the Secretary-General reported that the Secretariat had prepared, with the Governments of the five Central American countries, a working paper providing for the creation of a United Nations Observer Group in Central America (ONUCA), to be deployed in their countries. On the basis of that working paper, the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua had addressed to him a letter dated 31 March 1989,⁶ asking him to take the necessary steps to establish the Observer Group. However, the Secretary-General explained that he was not in a position to take those steps because of a reservation formulated by one of the signatories. With regard to the electoral process in Nicaragua, the Secretary-General reported that he had received a formal request from the Government of Nicaragua to proceed with setting up a group of electoral observers and that he was in contact with the Government concerning the performance of that task. Noting that the performance of the observation task belonged in the context of the Central American peace plan, he said he had reported on it to the President of the General Assembly. He had also been in contact with the Secretary General of the Organization of American States (OAS) with a view to performing the observation jointly. As to the prospective joint plan for demobilization, repatriation or relocation of members of the Nicaraguan resistance, the Secretary-General reported that the Central American Presidents had not yet approved such a plan.

The Secretary-General expressed concern that, since the last summit meeting of the Central American Presidents, the political climate had deteriorated and, in some cases, there had been a resurgence of violence. He emphasized his view that the means to address the problems afflicting the Central American countries and their people existed in the instruments that had been signed by their leaders. More specifically, it was essential, if the peace process were to be set on the right track again, to put into practice without delay the decisions referred to in his report which envisaged a role for the United Nations.

Decision of 27 July 1989 (2871st meeting):

At its 2871st meeting, held on 27 July 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Central America: efforts towards peace".

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Yugoslavia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the report of the Secretary-General and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷ He explained that the primary objective of the draft resolution was to extend the Council's full support to the five Central American countries and their Presidents to continue their efforts towards achieving a firm and lasting peace in the region. He noted that the draft resolution also lent the Council's full support to the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices in the region in consultation with it. The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 637 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 530 (1983) of 19 May 1983 and 562 (1985) of 10 May 1985 and General Assembly resolutions

38/10 of 11 November 1983, 39/4 of 26 October 1984, 41/37 of 18 November 1986, 42/1 of 7 October 1987 and 43/24 of 15 November 1988, as well as the initiative that the Secretary-General of the United Nations undertook on 18 November 1986 together with the Secretary General of the Organization of American States,

Convinced that the peoples of Central America wish to achieve a peaceful settlement to their conflicts without outside interference, including support for irregular forces, with respect for the principles of self-determination and non-intervention while ensuring full respect for human rights,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1989 submitted in pursuance of Security Council resolutions 530 (1983) and 562 (1985),

Recognizing the important contribution of the Contadora Group and its Support Group in favour of peace in Central America,

Welcoming the agreement on "Procedures for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace in Central America" signed at Guatemala City on 7 August 1987 by the Presidents of the Republics of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua as the manifestation of the will of the peoples of Central America to achieve peace, democratization, reconciliation, development and justice, in accordance with their decision to meet the historical challenge of forging a peaceful destiny for the region,

Welcoming also the subsequent Joint Declarations issued by the Central American Presidents on 16 January 1988 at Alajuela, Costa Rica and on 14 February 1989 at Costa del Sol, El Salvador,

Aware of the importance which the Central American Presidents attach to the role of international verification as an essential component for the implementation of the above-mentioned instruments, including, in particular, their commitments relating to regional security, especially non-use of territory to support destabilization of neighbouring countries and democratization, especially free and fair elections, as well as to the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation of irregular forces, as agreed in the Costa del Sol accord of 14 February 1989,

Aware also that the commitments enshrined in the Guatemala agreement form a harmonious and indivisible whole,

Noting with appreciation the efforts undertaken to date by the Secretary-General in support of the Central American peace process, including his assistance in the establishment of appropriate mechanisms to verify compliance with the provisions of the Guatemala agreement and of the Joint Declaration adopted by the Central American Presidents at their meeting held in El Salvador on 14 February 1989, and particularly the Secretary-General's agreement with Nicaragua to deploy a United Nations observer mission to verify the electoral process,

1. Commends the desire for peace expressed by the Central American Presidents in signing on 7 August 1987 at Guatemala City the agreement on “Procedures for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace in Central America” and in the Joint Declarations subsequently signed in pursuance of it;

2. Expresses its firmest support for the Guatemala agreement and the Joint Declarations;

3. Calls upon the Presidents to continue their efforts to achieve a firm and lasting peace in Central America through the faithful implementation of the commitments entered into in the Guatemala agreement and in the expressions of good will contained in the Joint Declaration of 14 February 1989;

4. Appeals to all States, in particular to those which have links with the region and interests in it, to back the political will of the Central American countries to comply with the provisions of the Guatemala agreement and of the Joint Declaration, particularly that regional and extra-regional Governments which either openly or covertly supply aid to irregular forces or insurrectional movements in the area immediately halt such aid, with the exception of the humanitarian aid that contributes to the goals of the Costa del Sol accord;

5. Lends its full support to the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, in consultation with the Security Council, in support of the Central American Governments in their effort to achieve the goals set forth in the Guatemala agreement;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council regularly on the implementation of the present resolution.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the resolution reflected and supported three important elements in the Central American peace process: the centrality of the fulfilment of the principles and provisions of the Esquipulas II and Tesoro Beach⁸ agreements to the achievement of peace and democracy in the region; the crucial need for a free and fair election and electoral process in Nicaragua to unlock regional movement towards peace, democracy and development; and the fact that States which continued to supply lethal assistance to insurgent forces in the region — namely, Nicaraguan and Cuban support to the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) — must cease that supply and publicly renounce such practices.⁹

Decision of 20 September 1989: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 28 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰ the Secretary-General recalled that the Council had examined the agreement reached on 7 August 1989 by the five Central American Presidents at their meeting at Tela, Honduras,¹¹ regarding a Joint Plan for the voluntary demobilization, repatriation or relocation in Nicaragua or third countries of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance and their families. He had since received a request dated 14 August 1989 from the representatives of the five Central American countries,¹² for the establishment, with the Secretary-General of OAS, of an International Support and Verification Commission to execute and implement the Joint Plan. The Secretary-General stated that he and the Secretary General of OAS had agreed to establish the International Commission, with effect from 6 September, and had defined its terms of reference. He observed that the tasks entrusted to the Commission comprised components of interest to various programmes of the United Nations and other agencies of the system. However, the question of demobilization concerned the Security Council in particular, since it was an operation of a clearly military nature. The Commission was asked to collect the weapons, materiel and military equipment of members of the Nicaraguan resistance and to keep them in its custody until the five Presidents decided where they should be sent. In the Secretary-General’s opinion, that was not a task which could be taken on by civilian personnel of the United Nations, but one which should be entrusted to military units equipped with defensive weapons. The launching of such an operation was clearly within the competence of the Security Council.

Stressing the voluntary aspect of the demobilization, the Secretary-General stated that, prior to undertaking that task, every necessary precaution would have to be taken to obtain the assurance that the Nicaraguan resistance was indeed determined to agree to being demobilized. To that end, he had agreed with the Secretary General of OAS to contact the resistance as soon as possible to explain how the Secretaries-General interpreted the Plan and the role of the International Commission, and to hear what the position of the resistance was on the issue. In light of those considerations, the Secretary-General considered it premature to ask the Security Council to take steps to establish the military component of the International Commission, particularly since an assessment of its needs could only be made after a technical reconnaissance in the resistance camps and he was not yet assured of having access to them. He proposed, therefore, to revert to the Council later, once those conditions had been met.

By a letter dated 20 September 1989 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹³ the President of the Council informed him that the members of the Council had noted with approval the steps he had taken to set up the International Commission and put it into operation and welcomed his intention to ask the Council to adopt in due course the measures needed to establish its military component. They had also reiterated their support for the Central American peace process as envisaged in the various instruments signed by the five Central American Presidents and, recalling resolution 637 (1989), had welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to consult the Council and keep it fully and regularly informed of action taken in support of that process.

Decisions of 7 November 1989 (2890th meeting): resolution 644 (1989) and statement by the
President

On 11 October 1989, in accordance with resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report concerning the request of the five Central American Governments for the establishment of ONUCA to verify their security commitments.¹⁴ The report reflected the operational concept of ONUCA set out in the working paper that had been agreed earlier with those Governments and took into account the findings and recommendations of a reconnaissance mission which had visited the region in September 1989. As requested by the Central American Governments, the mandate of ONUCA would be to conduct on-site verification of (a) the cessation of aid to irregular forces and insurrectionist movements; and (b) the non-use of the territory of one State for attacks on other States. It was proposed that the monitoring and investigative functions of ONUCA would be performed by mobile teams of unarmed military observers. The Observer Group would be under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General, under the authority of the Council. It was also envisaged that, in addition to its functions as observer and monitor, ONUCA would by its very presence perform a preventive function — and, as appropriate, a deterrent function — with regard to possible non-fulfilment of the parties' commitments. Its commander would have the authority, on his own initiative or at the request of a party, to suggest follow-up action to the Secretary-General, who in turn might recommend it to the Council so as to assist the parties in properly fulfilling their commitments. On the basis of the report of the reconnaissance mission, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council should accept the request of the five Central American Presidents and decide to establish forthwith an observer group on the above lines, to be deployed in four phases. He further recommended that, in accordance with the Council's recent practice, ONUCA should be established for an initial period of six months.

At its 2890th meeting, held on 7 November 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹⁵ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 644 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 11 October 1989;

2. Decides to set up immediately, under its authority, a United Nations Observer Group in Central America and requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to this effect, in accordance with his above-mentioned report, bearing in mind the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources;

3. Also decides that the United Nations Observer Group in Central America shall be established for a period of six months, unless the Security Council decides otherwise;

¹⁵ S/20951.

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶

The members of the Security Council reaffirm their full support for the Secretary-General's efforts to assist the Central American Governments in their efforts to achieve the goals set forth in the Guatemala agreement of 7 August 1987 and in the Joint Declarations subsequently signed in pursuance of it. In any consideration of the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America, they will wish to assure themselves that the presence of the Observer Group is continuing to contribute actively to the achievement of a firm and lasting peace in Central America.

Following the statement by the President, the Secretary-General addressed the Council. He expressed his conviction that, by approving the establishment of ONUCA, the Council had taken an important step towards the impartial verification of compliance with the parties' undertakings in the security area. The Observer Group could also play a significant political role, since its establishment in itself constituted a confidence-building measure which could contribute to restoring and strengthening stability in the region. The Secretary-General hoped, moreover, that the Council's decision would help in recovering the momentum of the peace process. He observed, further, that ONUCA was a complex and innovative operation being set in motion in a volatile region, a circumstance which justified his proposal that its deployment be carried out incrementally. Although it was proposed to remain within the terms of his report, he noted that, as the operation proceeded, the personnel and material resource needs originally foreseen might require adjustment or reconfiguration in order to carry out effectively the mandate of ONUCA. He therefore intended to monitor carefully each stage of the implementation of ONUCA in cooperation with the Council.¹⁷

resolution 650 (1990)

On 15 March 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on ONUCA.¹⁸ He sought the Council's urgent approval, on a contingency basis, of an enlargement of the mandate of ONUCA and the addition of armed personnel to enable it to play a part in the voluntary demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance. He recalled, inter alia, that in the Declaration signed at San Isidro de Coronado, Costa Rica, on 12 December 1989,¹⁹ the five Central American Presidents had requested that the ONUCA mandate be expanded to include verification of any cessation of hostilities and demobilization of irregular forces that might be agreed upon in the region. He reported that, following the elections in Nicaragua on 25 February 1990, he had been asked by the Government of Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan Opposition National Union to consult with them about how ONUCA could assist with regard to the transition process in that country. Agreement in principle had been reached on the modalities, subject to the approval of the Council. It was envisaged that ONUCA would be responsible for implementing the military aspects of the Joint Plan agreed at Tela, Honduras, on 7 August 1989²⁰ (i.e., for taking delivery of the weapons, materiel and military equipment of the Nicaraguan resistance), while the International Support and Verification Commission, set up pursuant to the Tela Accord, would be responsible for implementing the civilian aspects (i.e., for the repatriation, or relocation elsewhere, of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance and for their resettlement). The Secretary-General noted that the role thus envisaged for ONUCA went beyond its existing mandate, which was to verify, on the ground, compliance by the five Central American Governments with their security commitments, and that it would require the addition of armed personnel, as all existing ONUCA personnel were unarmed. He believed, moreover, that, as considerable additional responsibilities would fall on ONUCA in connection with this expanded role, the final phase of its deployment should begin as soon as possible. In recommending such an expanded role for the mission, the Secretary-General underlined that the voluntary demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance was an essential element in the Central American peace process to which both the existing Government and the Government-elect in Nicaragua attached importance as part of the process of transferring power following the elections in that country. However, he stressed that the additional armed personnel would not be deployed until the necessary political conditions were fulfilled, namely, an agreement by all concerned for the voluntary demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance.

At its 2913th meeting, held on 27 March 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Democratic Yemen) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.²¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 650 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989 and 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989,

Reiterating its support for the Central American peace process and commending the efforts made by the Central American Presidents, represented by the agreements they have concluded,

Urging all parties to comply with their undertakings under those agreements, including in particular the commitments relating to regional security, and reiterating its full support of the Secretary-General's mission of good offices in the region,

Noting with appreciation the efforts undertaken to date by the Secretary-General in support of the Central American peace process, including his continuing efforts to promote voluntary demobilization, resettlement and repatriation as reflected in his report of 15 March 1990,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Decides to authorize, on a contingency basis in accordance with that report, an enlargement of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America and the addition of armed personnel to its strength, in order to enable it to play a part in the voluntary demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments regarding the implementation of the present resolution.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States observed that, together with OAS and other observers, the United Nations had played a key role in the free and fair elections that had taken place in Nicaragua in February. He hoped it could play a further essential role in the democratization of that troubled region. His Government's position on the question of the contras was clear: it wanted and encouraged them to demobilize freely and return to their land to contribute to its development. He welcomed the framework of the expanded ONUCA mandate as providing a useful starting-point for achieving agreement by all the involved parties on a settlement leading to the voluntary demobilization and repatriation of the Nicaraguan resistance. He stressed that the first priority had to be the achievement of a formal agreement on and adherence to a ceasefire, and a clear-cut separation of forces within the country. Noting that the conditions for, and the mechanisms to verify, a comprehensive settlement were not yet in place, he added that his Government believed that, in addition to ONUCA, it was essential that the International Support and Verification Commission be made fully operational. He added that his Government also supported the Secretary-General's intention to deploy the final phase of ONUCA immediately.²²

The representative of Cuba stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution on the understanding that it authorized the Secretary-General to expand the mandate of ONUCA and strengthen it with armed personnel "for the specific purpose of playing a role in the demobilization of the members of what is termed the Nicaraguan resistance". Alluding to concerns that had been expressed with regard to the financial implications of the United Nations operation, he observed that "it would be ironic if, at the end of this episode, it were to fall to the international community and to all Members of the Organization to pay for the mechanisms to monitor the end of an operation that should never have taken place, particularly since the so-called Nicaraguan resistance [had] benefited from well-known external financing".²³

By a letter dated 19 April 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴ the Secretary-General referred to his statement at the Council's informal consultations earlier that day,²⁵ in which he had informed the members of the Council that a series of agreements had been signed that day in Managua by the Government of Nicaragua, representatives of the President-Elect, representatives of the Nicaraguan resistance and the Archbishop of Managua, relating to the voluntary demobilization of members of the Nicaraguan resistance. The agreements provided for the establishment of a ceasefire, security zones and a timetable for voluntary demobilization from 25 April to 10 June 1990. As a consequence of those agreements, the parties had requested that ONUCA should monitor both the ceasefire, which had come into effect on 19 April, and the separation of forces which would result from the withdrawal of the Nicaraguan Government's forces from the security zones, to which the members of the Nicaraguan resistance would move. The Secretary-General believed that the agreements just signed constituted an important step forward in the Central American peace process, and therefore recommended that the Council approve the necessary enlargement of the ONUCA mandate to include the new tasks.

At its 2919th meeting, held on 20 April 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "Central America: efforts towards peace". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Ethiopia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter from the Secretary-General and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its consultations.²⁶ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 653 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having examined the letter addressed to the President of the Council by the Secretary-General on 19 April 1990 concerning the United Nations Observer Group in Central America, as well as his statement of the same date to the members of the Security Council in which he briefed them on the agreements signed at Managua that day, which envisage the complete demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance by the Observer Group during the period from 25 April to 10 June 1990,

Reaffirming its resolutions 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989 and 650 (1990) of 27 March 1990,

1. Approves the proposals concerning the addition of new tasks to the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America contained in the letter of the Secretary-General of 19 April 1990 and in his statement;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on all aspects of the operations of the Observer Group before the expiry of the current mandate period on 7 May 1990.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Cuba said that his delegation supported the draft resolution above all because the adoption of a formal procedure by which the Council acceded to the Secretary-General's request through a resolution was the least the Council should do in dealing with a request implying a substantial alteration to the expanded mandate given by the Council to ONUCA. However, his delegation had grave reservations about some aspects of the request made to the Council — both as regards substance and procedure. The request before the Council was the result of a series of agreements which the Council did not yet have before it. He said that he had seen the agreements, and expressed concern about several elements of the agreement establishing the ceasefire, which conferred a task on ONUCA which Cuba did not regard as clearly defined and which implied, inter alia, that the Nicaraguan resistance would continue to have an organized military structure and would receive humanitarian assistance. He stated that it would be immoral — and unprecedented — if the United Nations were to provide such assistance to uniformed units, militarily organized and with their leadership intact. He also pointed out an apparent discrepancy between another of the agreements and the resolution just adopted concerning the role of ONUCA. Whereas the agreement suggested that the demobilization would be carried out in the presence of ONUCA, the resolution clearly provided for the demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance by ONUCA. In conclusion, he stressed that the United States, as the Government responsible for the perpetuation and insolubility of the situation in Nicaragua, should cover the costs involved in ending it, not the international community.²⁷

The representative of the Soviet Union stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution expanding the mandate of ONUCA on the basis of the explanations of the tasks, composition and timetable for the disarmament of the contras and the financing of the operation, as laid down in the Secretary-General's statement during the Council's consultations. While welcoming the 19 April agreements which would eventually lead to the full demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance, he expressed concern about the sincerity of the contra leaders with regard to those agreements. The Council could not permit a situation in which the security zones that had been created were transformed into a springboard for the armed opposition in Nicaraguan territory, a kind of State within a State. The existence of those zones, as his Government saw it, would be legitimate only within the context of the implementation of the main task of ensuring the disarming of the contras within the prescribed timetable. Non-compliance could not only dash hopes of national reconciliation in Nicaragua but also undermine the authority of the United Nations in the region.²⁸

The representative of the United States took exception to the assertion of the representative of Cuba that somehow the United States was responsible for all the ills that had befallen Nicaragua. He expressed full support for the agreement by which the parties in Nicaragua expected to achieve peace; that was not something imposed on them by outsiders but something that they had arrived at themselves. He also supported the efforts of the Secretary-General and the United Nations to contribute to that process.²⁹

resolution 654 (1990)

On 27 April 1990, pursuant to resolution 653 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report containing an account of the operations of ONUCA during its first six months.³⁰ He recalled that the original mandate of the Observer Group was to verify compliance by the five Central American Governments with the security undertakings each of them had given to the others in the Esquipulas II Agreement: namely, to cease aid to irregular forces and insurrectionist movements operating in the region; and to prevent the use of its territory for attacks on other States. To that end, mobile teams of military observers had been deployed in phases. While specific breaches of the security undertakings had not been directly observed by ONUCA patrols, cross-border movements had undoubtedly taken place during the period under review, especially a major movement of members of the Nicaraguan resistance from Honduras into Nicaragua. ONUCA had received and investigated complaints about alleged violations of the security undertakings. Although the five Governments concerned had fully cooperated with ONUCA, the hostilities in El Salvador had limited its ability to patrol in that country and no verification centre had so far been set up outside the capital. The Secretary-General also recalled that, following the elections in Nicaragua in February, there had been two enlargements of the ONUCA mandate, at the request of the Nicaraguan parties: to monitor the ceasefire and separation of forces in Nicaragua; and to demobilize members of the Nicaraguan resistance. The Secretary-General welcomed this evolution in the role of ONUCA; he had hoped that its very presence in the area would encourage the five Central American Governments to ask the Council to give ONUCA additional functions as the peace process developed. He hoped to approach the Council before long regarding the monitoring of a cessation of the armed confrontation in El Salvador.

The Secretary-General acknowledged, but did not share, the view that recent and prospective developments in Central America, notably the elections in Nicaragua, the imminent demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance and the early start of talks under his auspices between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, had rendered obsolete the original ONUCA mandate to verify the five Governments' compliance with their security commitments. He believed that those developments needed to be followed up and consolidated and that more time was needed to assess the consequences of what had happened and was happening in the region. He therefore considered it prudent to leave the mandate and military observer strength of ONUCA unchanged for the time being, adding that the five Central American Governments had also expressed the wish that the Council should extend the ONUCA mandate in its present form. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the Council extend the mandate of ONUCA, as defined in its previous resolutions, for a further period of six months. His recommendation was made on the understanding that, in accordance with the agreements signed by the Nicaraguan parties concerned, the ONUCA tasks of monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing members of the Nicaraguan resistance would lapse with the completion of the demobilization process, not later than 10 June 1990.

On 2 May 1990, in an addendum to his report of 27 April,³¹ the Secretary-General observed, as a matter of grave concern, that the demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance had not begun on 25 April, as stipulated in the Managua agreements of 18 and 19 April. He added that it had always been intended that the role of ONUCA in this process should be to help ensure the speedy return of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance to civilian life and not to assist them in establishing armed camps for an indefinite period of time on Nicaraguan territory. It was on that basis and on the strength of the agreements signed at Managua that he had recommended to the Council that ONUCA should play the part requested of it in monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces. He believed that serious efforts should now be made by all concerned to get the demobilization process back on track.

At its 2921st meeting, held on 4 May 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General of 27 April and 2 May. The President (Finland) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.³² The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 654 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989, 650 (1990) of 27 March 1990 and 653 (1990) of 20 April 1990, as well as the statement made by the President of the Security Council on its behalf on 7 November 1989,

Recalling the initial agreement reached at Geneva on 4 April 1990 by the parties to the conflict in El Salvador, under the auspices of the Secretary-General,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 27 April and 2 May 1990;

2. Decides to extend, under its authority, the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America as defined in resolutions 644 (1989), 650 (1990) and 653 (1990), for a further period of six months, that is, until 7 November

1990, on the understanding, as expressed by the Secretary-General in his report, that the tasks of the Observer Group of monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing members of the Nicaraguan resistance will lapse with the completion of the demobilization process, not later than 10 June 1990, and bearing in mind the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources;

3. Welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General to promote the achievement of a negotiated political solution to the conflict in El Salvador;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments and to report on all aspects of the operations of the Observer Group before the expiry of the current mandate period and in particular to report to the Council not later than 10 June concerning the completion of the demobilization process.

Decision of 23 May 1990 (2922nd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2922nd meeting, held on 23 May 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council considered the item entitled "Central America: efforts towards peace". After the adoption of the agenda, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on their behalf:³³

The members of the Council recall that the Council, in conformity with its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, has supported the Central American peace process from the outset. This has resulted in its decision to set up a United Nations Observer Group for Central America, whose mandate it subsequently enlarged and reaffirmed on two occasions.

The members of the Council also recall the decision taken by the Council in its resolution 654 (1990) of 4 May 1990 to extend the mandate of the Observer Group until 7 November 1990 on the understanding that its tasks of monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing members of the resistance would lapse with the completion of the demobilization process, not later than 10 June 1990.

The members of the Council, taking note of the report of the Secretary-General and fully supporting his efforts, express their concern at the slow pace of the demobilization process during its first two weeks. It is clear that the process must be accelerated if the deadline of 10 June set for its completion is to be met.

In the light of the foregoing, the members of the Council call on the resistance to meet fully and urgently the commitments it made in agreeing to demobilize. They also support the Government of Nicaragua in its efforts to facilitate, by taking the necessary steps, timely demobilization and urge it to continue such efforts. They also call on all others with influence in this matter to take actions to ensure that demobilization now proceeds in accordance with the agreements entered into by the Nicaraguan parties, and in particular to ensure that the 10 June deadline is respected.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General, through a senior representative, to continue to observe the situation on the ground first-hand and to report to the Council by 4 June.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to convey the Council's position to the five Central American Presidents.

The members of the Council also request the Secretary-General to convey the Council's concerns about the situation described above to the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, who shares responsibilities with the Secretary-General of the United Nations as regards the operations of the International Support and Verification Commission.

Decision of 8 June 1990 (2927th meeting):
resolution 656 (1990)

On 4 June 1990, pursuant to the presidential statement made on 23 May, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the progress of the demobilization process in Nicaragua.³⁴ He observed that the rate of demobilization had increased following the signing on 30 May of an agreement entitled the "Managua Protocol"³⁵ between the Nicaraguan Government, the leaders of the Nicaraguan resistance and the Archbishop of Managua. However, the leaders of the resistance had still not achieved the minimum target to which they had committed themselves in that document. He warned that, unless there was a substantial increase in the pace of demobilization, the whole process would not be completed by the agreed target date of 10 June. The Secretary-General also reported that that his Alternate Personal Representative had met with the Secretary General of OAS and conveyed to him the Council's concerns, in accordance with the request contained in the presidential statement of 23 May. It was agreed that closely coordinated steps would need to be taken by the United Nations and OAS in the event that the various agreements relating to the demobilization process were not implemented. The Secretary-General further stated that, if by 10 June demobilization had not been very largely completed, the Council would need to consider the decisions it should take to deal with the matter.

On 8 June 1990, pursuant to resolution 654 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on ONUCA in which he provided an update on the status of the demobilization process.³⁶ He considered it doubtful that the process could be completed by 10 June. However, he reported that rapid progress had been made during the week just ended by the largest group of the Nicaraguan resistance, whose leaders had stated publicly and to the Government that they would honour their commitments. In those circumstances, the Nicaraguan Government had indicated its wish that that part of the mandate of ONUCA which was related to monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces and demobilizing the members of the Nicaraguan resistance should not be allowed to lapse on 10 June but should be extended for a sufficient period to permit demobilization to be completed. The Secretary-General added that he thought it would be a mistake for ONUCA, which had played such a central role in making demobilization possible, to be withdrawn when the work was now, on the whole, proceeding rapidly and its completion was within reach. He accordingly recommended that the Council should authorize an extension of the relevant part of the ONUCA mandate for a period of up to 19 days, until 29 June 1990.

At its 2927th meeting, held on 8 June 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's reports of 4 and 8 June. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁷ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 7 June 1990 from the representatives of Spain and Venezuela, addressed to the Secretary-General.³⁸ As prominent contributors to ONUCA, they expressed their support for an extension of its mandate, as it related to demobilization, for a short and clearly defined period.

The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 656 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 654 (1990) of 4 May 1990 and the statement made by the President of the Council on its behalf on 23 May, concerning the United Nations Observer Group in Central America,

Expressing its concern that the process of demobilization has not yet been fully completed, although progress is now being made after the removal of obstacles that prevented the conclusion of the demobilization process on 10 June 1990, as stipulated in resolution 654 (1990),

Having studied the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 4 June 1990 as well as his statement of 8 June to the members of the Council,

1. Decides that the tasks of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America of monitoring the ceasefire and separation of forces in Nicaragua and demobilizing members of the Nicaraguan resistance shall be extended, on the understanding, as recommended by the Secretary-General, that those tasks will lapse with the completion of the demobilization process, not later than 29 June 1990;

2. Urges all those directly involved in the demobilization process to take all necessary measures to maintain and, if possible, increase the rate of demobilization so as to complete it, at the latest, on the date specified in paragraph 1 above;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments and in particular to report to it not later than 29 June 1990 concerning the completion of the demobilization process.

On 29 June 1990, pursuant to resolution 656 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on ONUCA,³⁹ informing it that the demobilization of the Nicaraguan resistance had essentially been completed the previous day. He stated that, by twice enlarging the mandate of ONUCA and later extending the deadline for the completion of demobilization, the Council had enabled ONUCA to play a role in helping end the conflict in Nicaragua.

Decision of 6 September 1990: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

General referred to the negotiations which were under way, under his auspices, between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN. He stated that, as he had informed the Council in his statement in informal consultations of 3 August 1990,⁴¹ it was envisaged that the United Nations would in due course be formally requested to carry out a number of tasks relating to the verification of a ceasefire, the monitoring of the forthcoming electoral process and the verification of respect for human rights. The parties and a wide range of representatives of Salvadorian society shared the wish that preparations for carrying out the envisaged requests should be initiated at the earliest possible date. Despite the absence of a formal and verifiable ceasefire, the Secretary-General believed that the time had come to take steps which would permit the United Nations to assess the local situation and begin preparations, including the possible establishment of a small preparatory office in El Salvador, in order to enable a United Nations verification mission to undertake the monitoring tasks as soon as circumstances permitted. He therefore sought the concurrence of the Council with his making the necessary preparatory arrangements as soon as practicable. Verification per se would await further consultation with the members of the Council.

By a letter dated 6 September 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴² the President of the Council informed him that his letter of 29 August concerning preparatory arrangements for a United Nations verification mission in El Salvador had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council and that they concurred with his proposal.

Decision of 5 November 1990 (2952nd meeting): resolution 675 (1990)

On 26 October 1990, pursuant to resolution 654 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report containing an account of ONUCA operations during the period from 7 May to 26 October 1990 and his recommendations on its future.⁴³ He reported that, with the successful demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance, the Observer Group had now reverted to its original mandate: namely, verification of compliance by the five Central American Governments with their security undertakings under the Esquipulas II Agreement. With its role limited to verification, ONUCA did not have the authority or the capacity to prevent physically either the movement of armed persons or warlike material across borders or other violations of the security commitments. Those were tasks that fell within the competence of the security forces of the Governments concerned. Experience had also shown that the capacity of ONUCA to detect violations of the security undertakings was very limited, mainly due to the fact that an international peacekeeping operation could not undertake the detection of clandestine activities without assuming functions that properly belonged to the security forces of the countries concerned, not least because they required armed personnel to carry them out. Although Governments had sometimes agreed that an armed United Nations peacekeeping operation should implement such a mandate on their territory, that was not the case in Central America. Nevertheless, the ONUCA method of operation — maintaining a regular and visible presence in those parts of the region where breaches of the undertakings would seem most likely to occur — enabled it to play an important part in ensuring compliance with the security commitments. Through its presence, it was able to perform a preventive or deterrent function which fell short of physical prevention or deterrence, but made it more difficult for activities contrary to the Esquipulas II Agreement to be carried out. The presence of ONUCA also provided a means whereby the Central American Governments could take up with each other, through an impartial third party, complaints about violations of the security undertakings.

As to the future of ONUCA, the Secretary-General reported that the five Governments had confirmed that they wished its mandate to be extended for six months. He agreed that it was important to maintain a United Nations military presence in the region in order to support the Central American peace process and concluded that ONUCA should maintain its current method of operation, with Observer Groups based in each country. However, following the end of the conflict in Nicaragua and the demobilization of the members of the Nicaraguan resistance, he considered that it would be possible to close some of the verification centres whose tasks were primarily related to the Nicaraguan conflict. That would permit a reduction of approximately 40 per cent in the number of military observers currently assigned to ONUCA.

Those proposals had been accepted by each of the five countries. With regard to his efforts to achieve a negotiated political solution to the conflict in El Salvador, the Secretary-General reiterated his previously expressed view that verification or observation of the implementation of such a settlement would most appropriately be carried out as an integrated whole, rather than as separate enterprises. It followed that verification of the military aspects would be undertaken by a military component rather than by ONUCA. He accordingly recommended to the Council that the mandate of ONUCA should be extended for a further period of six months, until 7 May 1991, and that its tasks and method of operation should continue to be those approved by the Council in its resolution 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989. If the Council approved that recommendation, the Secretary-General intended to reduce the strength of the ONUCA military observers as proposed, by mid-December.

At its 2952nd meeting, held on 5 November 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United States) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 675 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989 and 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989, as well as the statement made by the President of the Security Council on its behalf on 7 November 1989,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 26 October 1990;
2. Decides to extend, under its authority, the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for a further period of six months, that is, until 7 May 1991, bearing in mind the report of the Secretary-General and the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources;
3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments and to report on all aspects of the operations of the Observer Group before the expiry of the new mandate period.

⁴⁴ S/21927.

Decision of 6 May 1991 (2986th meeting):
resolution 691 (1991)

On 29 April 1991, pursuant to resolution 675 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report containing an account of the organization and operational activities of ONUCA during the period from 27 October 1990 to 29 April 1991, together with his recommendations concerning the future of the mission.⁴⁵ He remained convinced that ONUCA continued to make a valuable contribution to the peace process in Central America by providing an impartial mechanism for verifying that the five Central American Governments were complying with their security commitments under the Esquipulas II Agreement. The five Presidents, themselves, had expressed their full confidence in ONUCA. He re-emphasized, however, the point made in his report of 26 October 1990,⁴⁶ that the Observer Group was not mandated, staffed or equipped to detect clandestine activities or to take physical action to prevent them, functions that properly belonged to the five Governments. Noting that the extensive patrolling activities of ONUCA had not so far led to the detection of a single violation of the security undertakings, the Secretary-General intended to modify its method of operations on the basis of recommendations by his Chief Military Observer aimed at making the mission more cost-effective. While ONUCA would continue to maintain a regular and visible presence in potentially sensitive border areas, that presence would be more directly focused on liaison and exchange of information with the security authorities of the States concerned, in order to enable ONUCA to verify that those States were taking the action necessary to enable them to comply with their security commitments. Those tasks could be carried out satisfactorily with a somewhat reduced strength of military observers. The five Central American Governments had welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to recommend a further six months' extension of the mission's mandate but wished to maintain its strength at its current level. However, based on the recommendations of the Chief Military Observer, and bearing in mind the Council's reference in resolution 675 (1990) to the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during a period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources, the Secretary-General considered it right to recommend a modest reduction in the strength of ONUCA. He accordingly recommended that the mission's mandate should be extended for an additional period of six months, until 7 November 1991; that its mandate should continue to be the one approved by the Council in resolution 644 (1989); and that its strength should be reduced to 130 military observers.

At its 2986th meeting, held on 6 May 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (China) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁷ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 691 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989 and 675 (1990) of 5 November 1990, as well as the statement made by the President of the Security Council on its behalf on 7 November 1989,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 29 April 1991;

2. Decides to extend, under its authority, the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for a further period of six months, that is, until 7 November 1991, bearing in mind the report of the Secretary-General and the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments and to report on all aspects of the operations of the Group before the expiry of the new mandate period.

Decision of 20 May 1991 (2988th meeting):
resolution 693 (1991)

On 21 December 1990, pursuant to resolution 637 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report in which he provided an account of his efforts to promote the achievement of a negotiated political situation to the conflict in El Salvador.⁴⁸ He recalled that, in his report of 8 November 1990,⁴⁹ he had reported on two agreements between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN arrived at under his auspices: the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990,⁵⁰ on the framework for negotiations to end the armed conflict by political means; and an agreement concluded at Caracas, on 21 May 1990,⁵¹ on the agenda and schedule of the negotiating process. The initial objective of the negotiation process, as set out in the Geneva Agreement, was to achieve political agreements for arranging a halt to the armed confrontation and any acts that infringed the rights of the civilian population, compliance with which would have to be verified by the United Nations, subject to the approval of the Council. The Secretary-General recalled that he had also drawn attention to the agreement on human rights reached between the two parties at San José on 26 July 1990,⁵² which contained detailed commitments to guarantee unrestricted respect for human rights in El Salvador, and provided for the establishment of a United Nations verification mission in the country upon cessation of the armed conflict.

The Secretary-General stated that while significant progress had been made to date — as exemplified by the San José Agreement on Human Rights — considerable problems had been encountered in reaching agreement on the issue of the armed forces, the most sensitive and complex issue on the agenda. Given the pervasive character of that question, it had not been possible to make substantive progress on other items. The Secretary-General recalled that, having considered the complex and interrelated character of the verification tasks envisaged for the United Nations under the above-mentioned agreements, he had put forward to the members of the Council the concept of an integrated operation under the authority of the Security Council to ensure proper coordination of operations on the ground and the rational use of resources,⁵³ a concept with which they had concurred. He reported that the Government of El Salvador and FMLN had since signified their desire to have the human rights mechanism in place as soon as possible without waiting for other agreements, notably a ceasefire agreement, to be concluded. He emphasized that such a desire was in keeping with the objectives laid down in the Esquipulas II Agreements, which had been endorsed by the Council in resolution 637 (1989), with its emphasis on democratization and respect for human rights as key components of the peace process. The importance of international verification of Central American peace agreements had also been underlined by the Central American Governments as well as in successive General Assembly resolutions, notably resolution 45/15. Accordingly, the Secretary-General informed the Council of his intention to request its authorization to establish a United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL) to monitor compliance with the agreements concluded between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, commencing with the verification of the Agreement on Human Rights. He recommended that the human rights verification component of ONUSAL be established as soon as the necessary preparations had been made on the ground: in particular, the extent to which the tasks of the mission could be conducted in the absence of a ceasefire had been determined; the personnel required for such a complex operation, for which “no precedent exist[ed] in the annals of the United Nations”, had been recruited; and satisfactory arrangements had been worked out with the Government and FMLN to ensure the safe deployment and effective functioning of ONUSAL. He intended to dispatch to El Salvador in early 1991 a technical mission to assist him in preparing an operational plan for submission to the Council. In the meantime, he had established the small preparatory office in El Salvador with which the Council had previously concurred.

On 16 April 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report⁵⁴ recommending the establishment of the human rights component of ONUSAL, on the basis of the conclusions of a preliminary mission to El Salvador in March. The preliminary mission had reached the conclusion that there was a strong and widespread desire among all sectors of political opinion in the country that the United Nations should commence, as soon as possible, the verification of the Agreement on Human Rights without awaiting a ceasefire. It considered, moreover, that, in the absence of the other political agreements envisaged in the 1990 Geneva Agreement, ONUSAL would be able to reach working arrangements on an ad hoc basis with the military, security and judicial authorities and FMLN. The preliminary mission had also concluded that the risks posed by the armed conflict to the tasks of verification and to the security of personnel were not to a degree that should prevent the establishment of the mission before a ceasefire. In the light of those and other relevant considerations, the Secretary-General accepted the preliminary mission's recommendation that the human rights component of ONUSAL be established at the earliest feasible moment in advance of a ceasefire agreement. He proposed that ONUSAL adopt a progressive approach to assuming the verification tasks envisaged for it under the Human Rights Agreement, concentrating first on the active monitoring of the human rights situation, and of the processing by the parties of cases involving allegations of human rights violations. In conclusion, the Secretary-General strongly recommended that the Council give early authorization for the initial establishment of ONUSAL as outlined above. He advised against linking the approval of this proposal to the success of the negotiations as a whole, reiterating his conviction that the commencement of the verification of human rights by ONUSAL would promote a significant improvement in the human rights situation in El Salvador and would act as a positive impetus to the negotiations. Once there was agreement on the ceasefire and the United Nations was called upon to play the broader role envisaged for it, the corresponding resources could be included in the mission's structure to enable it to operate effectively as an integrated whole.

At its 2988th meeting, on 20 May 1991, the Council included in its agenda the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 December 1990 and 16 April and 20 May 1991.⁵⁵ The President (China) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵⁶ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 693 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, in which it lent its full support to the Secretary-General for the continuation of his mission of good offices in Central America,

Recalling also the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990 and the Caracas Agenda of 21 May 1990 concluded between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional,

Deeply concerned at the persistence of and the increase in the climate of violence in El Salvador, which seriously affects the civilian population, and thus stressing the importance of the full implementation of the Agreement on Human Rights signed by the two parties at San José on 26 July 1990,

Welcoming the Mexico Agreements between the two parties of 27 April 1991,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General of 21 December 1990 and 16 April and 20 May 1991,

Commending the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative for Central America for their efforts at good offices, and expressing its full support for their continuing efforts to facilitate a peaceful settlement to the conflict in El Salvador,

Underlining the great importance that it attaches to the exercise of moderation and restraint by both sides to ensure the security of all United Nations-employed personnel as well as to the adoption by them of all other appropriate and necessary measures to facilitate the negotiations leading to the achievement of the objectives set forth in the Geneva and other above-mentioned agreements as soon as possible, including their full cooperation with the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative to this end,

Recognizing the right of the parties to determine their own negotiating process,

Calling upon both parties to pursue the current negotiations urgently and with flexibility, in a concentrated format on the items agreed upon in the Caracas Agenda, in order to reach, as a matter of priority, a political agreement on the armed forces and the accords necessary for the cessation of the armed confrontation and to achieve as soon as possible thereafter a process which will lead to the establishment of the necessary guarantees and conditions for reintegrating the members of the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional within a framework of full legality into the civil, institutional and political life of the country,

Expressing its conviction that a peaceful settlement in El Salvador will contribute to a successful outcome in the Central American peace process,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 16 April and 20 May 1991;

2. Decides to establish, under its authority and based on the Secretary-General's report referred to in paragraph 1, a United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador to monitor all agreements concluded between the two parties, whose initial mandate in its first phase as an integrated peacekeeping operation will be to verify the compliance by the parties with the Agreement on Human Rights signed at San José on 26 July 1990, and also decides that the subsequent tasks or phases of the Mission will be subject to approval by the Council;

3. Also decides that the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador will be established for an initial period of twelve months;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary measures to establish the first phase of the Mission as described in paragraphs 2 and 3;

5. Calls upon both parties, as agreed by them, to pursue a continuous process of negotiations in order to reach at the earliest possible date the objectives set forth in the Mexico Agreements of 27 April 1991 and all other objectives contained in the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990, and to this end to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative in their efforts;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed on the implementation of the present resolution.

Decision of 30 September 1991 (3010th meeting): resolution 714 (1991)

On 25 September 1991, the Government of El Salvador and FMLN signed the New York Agreement,⁵⁷ at United Nations Headquarters. The Agreement provided guarantees and conditions on which to reach a peaceful settlement of the armed conflict. These included provisions concerning the establishment of a National Commission for the Consolidation of Peace (COPAZ), responsible for overseeing the implementation of all political agreements reached by the parties, the creation of which was to be explicitly endorsed by Council resolution.

At its 3010th meeting, held on 30 September 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council considered the item entitled "Central America: efforts towards peace". Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁵⁸ The resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 714 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, by which it lent its full support to the Secretary-General for his mission of good offices in Central America,

Also recalling its resolution 693 (1991) of 20 May 1991, by which it established the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador,

Welcoming the New York Agreement signed 25 September 1991 by the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, which provides guarantees and conditions on which to reach a peaceful settlement to the armed conflict, including, inter alia, the provisions concerning the National Commission for the Consolidation of Peace, permitting the reintegration of the members of the Frente Farabundo Martí within a framework of full legality into the civil, institutional and political life of the country,

Welcoming also the oral report of the Secretary-General made at the consultations held on 30 September 1991,

1. Commends the parties for the flexibility and seriousness which they demonstrated during the course of the recent talks in New York;

2. Congratulates the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative for Central America for their skilful and tireless efforts which have been vital to the peace process;

3. Expresses its appreciation for the contributions of the Governments of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General — Colombia, Mexico, Spain, and Venezuela — which have advanced the peace process in El Salvador;

4. Urges both parties, at the next negotiating round, which will begin on 12 October 1991, to proceed at an intensive and sustained pace to reach at the earliest possible date a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement to the armed conflict in accordance with the framework of the New York Agreement;

5. Reaffirms its full support for the urgent completion of the peace process in El Salvador, and expresses its readiness to support the implementation of a settlement;

6. Urges both parties to exercise maximum and continuing restraint, particularly with respect to the civilian population, in order to create the best climate for a successful last stage of the negotiations;

7. Calls upon both parties to continue to cooperate fully with the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador.

Decision of 6 November 1991 (3016th meeting):
resolution 719 (1991)

On 28 October 1991, pursuant to resolution 691 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the structure and operations of ONUCA during the period from 30 April to 28 October 1991, together with his recommendations regarding the future of the mission.⁵⁹ He noted that since the establishment of ONUCA, the political and military environment in which it functioned had been profoundly affected by a number of developments inside as well as outside Central America. These included the disengagement of the Powers that had earlier actively supported opposing sides in Central America and their announced intention to revise their policies vis-à-vis Central America, emphasizing their support for negotiated political solutions and assistance for economic and social development rather than military purposes. On the regional level, after 10 years of devastating internal strife in Nicaragua, there was now a climate of relative peace and tranquillity in the country. As for El Salvador, the agreements recently signed by both parties in New York constituted an important step towards the establishment of a lasting peace. He added that the ongoing direct negotiations between representatives of the Government of Guatemala and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca also gave hope for an end to that conflict. In the light of the improved situation in the region, the five Central American Governments were making efforts to arrive at new collective security arrangements for the region, which would enable them to dispense with the need for international verification of their compliance with the Esquipulas II Agreement. In the meantime, however, the five Governments had indicated their wish that the mandate of ONUCA be extended for a further six months. The Secretary-General concluded that, in the prevailing fluid and dynamic situation, it would not be right to withdraw ONUCA or further reduce the scope of its operations. He therefore recommended a further extension of the Observer Group's mandate until 30 April 1992. He suggested, however, that the Council might wish to request him to report during the new mandate period if developments in the region indicated that the future of ONUCA should be reconsidered.

At its 3016th meeting, on 6 November 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Romania) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁶⁰ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 719 (1991), which reads:

⁶⁰ S/23196.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, 644 (1989) of 7 November 1989, 675 (1990) of 5 November 1990 and 691 (1991) of 6 May 1991, as well as the statement made by the President of the Security Council on its behalf on 7 November 1989,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 28 October 1991;

2. Decides to extend, under its authority, the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America, as defined in resolution 644 (1989), for a further period of five months and twenty-three days, that is, until 30 April 1992, bearing in mind the report of the Secretary-General and the need to continue to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments and to report on all aspects of the operations of the Group before the expiry of the new mandate period, and in particular to report to the Council within three months from the date of adoption of the present resolution, taking account of any developments in the region which indicate that the present size of the Group or its future should be reconsidered.

Decision of 3 January 1992: statement by the President

On 31 December 1991, the Government of El Salvador and FMLN signed the Act of New York.⁶¹ That instrument recorded that the two parties had concluded a number of further agreements whose implementation would put a final end to the armed conflict in El Salvador. The Final Peace Agreements would be signed in Mexico City on 16 January 1992, following a final round of negotiations on two outstanding issues.

On 3 January 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (United Kingdom) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶²

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the briefing provided by the Secretary-General on the agreement signed late in the night of 31 December 1991 by the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional which, when implemented, will put a definite end to the Salvadorian armed conflict. The members of the Council warmly welcomed the agreement which is of vital importance for the normalization of the situation in El Salvador and in the region as a whole. They place on record their thanks and appreciation for the enormous contribution of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for Central America, their collaborators, and all the Governments, especially those of Colombia, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela, that have assisted the Secretary-General in his efforts.

The members of the Council urge the parties to show maximum flexibility in resolving the pending issues in the negotiations at United Nations Headquarters in New York starting this weekend. They also urge the parties to exercise maximum restraint and to take no action in the coming days which would be contrary to the agreement reached in New York and to the excellent spirit in which these talks took place.

They welcomed the Secretary-General's intention, stated today, to submit a written report and proposals early next week with a view to Council action both regarding verification of ceasefire arrangements and the monitoring of the maintenance of public order pending the establishment of the new National Civil Police. This will require the approval by the Council of new tasks for the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador. The members of the Council stand ready to deal expeditiously with any recommendations that the Secretary-General may make.

Decision of 14 January 1992 (3030th meeting):
resolution 729 (1992)

On 10 January 1992, pursuant to resolution 693 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report,⁶³ recommending the enlargement of ONUSAL and an increase in its strength to enable it to undertake the additional functions desired of it by the Government of El Salvador and FMLN under the Final Peace Agreements to be signed in Mexico City on 16 January 1992. He noted that two of the agreements in particular envisaged additional verification and monitoring functions for ONUSAL, which would require an immediate and substantial increase in its strength. Under the Agreement on the Cessation of Armed Conflict, which provided for a ceasefire to come into force on 1 February 1992, the Mission would verify all aspects of the ceasefire and the separation of forces. Under the Agreement on National Civil Police, the Mission would monitor the maintenance of public order during the transitional period pending the establishment of the National Civil Police. If the mandate of ONUSAL were to be enlarged to fulfil these new tasks, it would be necessary to increase its strength by adding two new divisions — a Military Division and a Police Division — to the existing Human Rights Division. The Secretary-General recommended that the Council should take the decision now to enlarge the ONUSAL mandate and increase its strength, in advance of signature of the agreements giving rise to the additional tasks for the Mission, so that ONUSAL would be ready to fulfil its new responsibilities as soon as the ceasefire came into force. He added that, in the exercise of his good offices with regard to the Central American peace process, he would continue, as provided in the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990, to call upon Member States, in particular Colombia, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela (informally known as the “Friends of the Secretary-General”) for support.⁶⁴

At its 3030th meeting, held on 14 January 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United Kingdom) invited the representative of El Salvador, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. He then drew the attention of the Council members to the statement made by the President of the Council on 3 January 1992,⁶⁵ and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁶⁶ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 729 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989,

Recalling also its resolution 714 (1991) of 30 September 1991, as well as the statement made by the President of the Security Council on behalf of its members on 3 January 1992 following the signature of the Act of New York on 31 December 1991,

Recalling further its resolution 693 (1991) of 20 May 1991 by which it established the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador,

Welcoming the conclusion of agreements between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, which are to be signed at Mexico City on 16 January 1992 and which, when implemented, will put a definitive end to the Salvadorian armed conflict and will open the way for national reconciliation,

Calling upon both parties to continue to exercise maximum moderation and restraint and to take no action which would be contrary to or adversely affect the agreements to be signed in Mexico City,

⁶⁶ S/23411.

Expressing its conviction that a peaceful settlement in El Salvador will make a decisive contribution to the Central American peace process,

Welcoming the intention of the Secretary-General to convey shortly to the Council his recommendation on the termination of the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 10 and 13 January 1992;

2. Decides, on the basis of the report of the Secretary-General and in accordance with the provisions of resolution 693 (1991), to enlarge the mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador to include the verification and monitoring of the implementation of all the agreements once these are signed at Mexico City between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional, in particular the Agreement on the Cessation of the Armed Conflict and the Agreement on the Establishment of a National Civil Police;

3. Also decides that the mandate of the Mission, enlarged in accordance with the present resolution, will be extended to 31 October 1992 and that it will be reviewed at that time on the basis of recommendations to be presented by the Secretary-General;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary measures to increase the strength of the Mission as recommended in his report;

5. Calls upon both parties to respect scrupulously and to implement in good faith the commitments assumed by them under the agreements which are to be signed at Mexico City and to cooperate fully with the Mission in its task of verifying the implementation of these agreements;

6. Reaffirms its support for the Secretary-General's continuing mission of good offices with regard to the Central American peace process, and in particular for his observations in paragraphs 17 to 19 of the report regarding his intention to continue, as was foreseen in the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990 concerning the process which is to end definitively the armed conflict, to rely on the Governments of Colombia, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela, as well as other States and groups of States, to support him in the exercise of his responsibilities;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of developments relating to the implementation of the present resolution and to report on the operations of the Mission before the expiry of the new mandate period.

Decision of 16 January 1992 (3031st meeting): resolution 730 (1992)

On 14 January 1992, pursuant to resolution 719 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on ONUCA,⁶⁷ in which he recommended that its operational mandate be terminated with effect from 17 January 1992, so as to enable him to proceed with the transfer of certain personnel and equipment from ONUCA to ONUSAL. He recalled the observations made in his predecessor's report of 28 October 1991,⁶⁸ concerning the need to reconsider the future of ONUCA in case of an early and successful conclusion of the peace process in El Salvador, and the widely held view that peacekeeping operations should be set up to do a specific task for a specific period and then be disbanded. The Secretary-General also referred to his report of 10 January 1992, which contained details of the major additional tasks of verification which would now fall to ONUSAL and of the resources that it would require.⁶⁹ In the circumstances, he believed that the Council should decide to terminate the mandate of ONUCA, and had so informed the five Central American countries in which the Observer Group was deployed. He believed that, in the present case, those considerations must necessarily prevail over the parties' concerns at the termination of a peacekeeping operation in which they had come to have confidence.

At its 3031st meeting, held on 16 January 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.⁷⁰ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 730 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 719 (1991) of 6 November 1991,

Recalling also its resolution 729 (1992) of 14 January 1992,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 14 January 1992;

⁶⁷ S/23421.

⁶⁹ S/23402 and Add.1.

⁷⁰ S/23427.

2. Decides, in accordance with the recommendation in paragraph 7 of the report, to terminate the mandate of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America with effect from 17 January 1992.

Decision of 3 June 1992: statement by the President

On 26 May 1992, pursuant to resolution 729 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report describing ONUSAL activities since the ceasefire between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN formally came into effect on 1 February 1992.⁷¹ The Mission had been carrying out the various verification tasks assigned to it in the agreements signed by the parties. In addition to its specific verification responsibilities, ONUSAL was exercising its good offices to help the parties to implement the agreements. In those endeavours, it had received valuable support from the four “Friends of the Secretary-General” (Colombia, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela), as well as other interested Governments. ONUSAL had also been participating as an observer in the work of the National Commission for the Consolidation of Peace. The Secretary-General observed that the peace process was not an easy one. The agreements were complex and demanded a commitment to compromise and fundamental adjustments in political and social attitudes. Nor were they self-executing. The United Nations was committed to assisting the two parties, but success would be assured only by their political will and their acceptance of national reconciliation as the overriding national goal. The Secretary-General commended the parties for their success in maintaining the ceasefire, which had not once been violated. However, he reported that there had been some serious delays in implementing various provisions of the agreements, which had undermined each side’s confidence in the other’s good faith. He was particularly concerned by the continuing failure of both sides to concentrate all their forces in the designated locations. Other sources of serious concern were the Government’s delay in adopting measures which it had committed itself to take to facilitate the reintegration of the FMLN ex-combatants into civilian life — especially as regards agriculture, political activity and recruitment into the National Civil Police — and the failure of FMLN to return the first 20 per cent of its combatants to civilian life. The Secretary-General added that the Mission was operating in an atmosphere of deep distrust and its insistence on maintaining its impartiality was sometimes misperceived by each side as being partiality towards the other. In that context, he reported with regret that there had recently been a recurrence of threats against the security of the Mission and its personnel.

On 3 June 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷²

The members of the Security Council have taken note of the report of the Secretary-General of 26 May and 19 June 1992 on the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador.

The members of the Council are pleased that the ceasefire is holding and there has not been a single violation since it came into force on 1 February 1992.

However, the members of the Council are deeply concerned about the many delays by both parties in implementing agreements concluded between the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional and the climate of mutual suspicion that still remains. If that situation were to continue, it would jeopardize the very foundation of the agreements.

The members of the Council urge both parties to demonstrate good faith in implementing the agreements fully, to abide by the agreed time limits, to exert every effort to bring about national reconciliation in El Salvador and to implement the process of demobilization and reform.

The members of the Council reaffirm their full support for the efforts made by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for El Salvador, with the assistance of the Governments of the Group of Friends of the Secretary-General and other Governments concerned. They commend the staff of the Mission, who are working under very difficult conditions, and express their concern about the threats to their safety. They remind the parties of their obligation to take all necessary measures to guarantee the safety of the Mission and its members.

The members of the Council will continue to monitor closely developments in the implementation of the peace agreements in El Salvador.

Decision of 30 October 1992 (3129th meeting):
resolution 784 (1992)

By a letter dated 19 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council on the situation in ⁷² S/24058.

El Salvador,⁷³ the Secretary-General reported that he did not believe that it would be possible to complete the demobilization of FMLN by 31 October 1992, as provided for in the Peace Agreements of 16 January 1992. He noted that delays in implementing the land transfer programme and the police project, both of which were to have been completed before the demobilization, had led to a suspension of the demobilization process.

By a letter dated 28 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁴ the Secretary-General confirmed that, because of the above-mentioned difficulties, the demobilization process would not be completed on schedule. He had presented proposals for overcoming those difficulties to both parties. In the meantime, he recommended that the Council extend the mandate of ONUSAL for an interim period of one month, until 30 November 1992. The Secretary-General anticipated that, by then, he would be able to make a specific recommendation on the mandate and strength that ONUSAL would need in order to verify implementation of the final phases of the peace process in El Salvador.

At its 3129th meeting, held on 30 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the letter of 28 October from the Secretary-General. The President (France) drew the attention of the Council members to the Secretary-General's letter of 19 October, and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁵ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 784 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989,

Recalling also its resolutions 693 (1991) of 20 May 1991, 714 (1991) of 30 September 1991 and 729 (1992) of 14 January 1992,

Taking note of the letter from the Secretary-General of 19 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council, in which he announced a delay in the schedule laid down in resolution 729 (1992),

Taking note also of the letter from the Secretary-General of 28 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council, in which he proposed an interim extension of the current mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador,

1. Approves the proposal of the Secretary-General to extend the current mandate of the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador for a period ending on 30 November 1992;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council, between now and that date, recommendations on the period of extension of the mandate, on the mandate itself and on the strength that the Mission will need, taking into account progress already made, in order to verify the implementation of the final phases of the peace process in El Salvador, together with their financial implications;

3. Urges both parties to respect scrupulously and to implement in good faith the commitments assumed by them under the agreements signed on 16 January 1992 at Mexico City and to respond positively to the Secretary-General's latest proposals to them aimed at overcoming the current difficulties;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Venezuela noted that, together with Colombia, Spain and Mexico, his country had assisted in the delicate tasks of guaranteeing the agreements entered into by the Secretary-General. He supported unreservedly the efforts of the Secretary-General and, referring to paragraph 3 of the resolution, urged both parties to respond positively to his latest proposals to them aimed at overcoming the current difficulties. However, he emphasized that his country understood those proposals to be practical and realistic responses and not a renegotiation of the agreements signed on 16 January 1992 in Mexico City.⁷⁶

The representative of Ecuador said that the United Nations had played a unique role in building peace in El Salvador and stated that its impartiality in the conflict had made it possible for it to present objective proposals which had gained the approval of the parties. He welcomed, therefore, the Secretary-General's further initiative and urged the parties to cooperate with him. Although compliance with the original schedule envisaged in the peace agreements would have been preferable, the success achieved so far should not be jeopardized. A short and specific extension of the time frame, if it served the purpose of reactivating the peace process and was supported with goodwill by the parties, could be very positive.⁷⁷

Decision of 30 November 1992 (3142nd meeting): resolution 791 (1992)

On 23 November 1992, pursuant to resolutions 729 (1992) and 784 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report recommending the extension of the mandate of ONUSAL for a further six months.⁷⁸ He reported that ONUSAL continued to carry out all the verification functions assigned to it under the various agreements signed by the Government of El Salvador and FMLN. The Mission had also used its good offices in a variety of ways to assist the parties in overcoming difficulties that had arisen in the implementation of the peace accords, and had participated as an observer in the National Commission for the Consolidation of Peace. With regard to the timetable for implementation of the accords, the Secretary-General stated that his representative had, earlier in November, concluded arrangements with the parties which would formally bring the armed conflict to an end on 15 December 1992 (instead of by 31 October, as originally envisaged). The arrangements stipulated that compliance with specific undertakings by one side would be contingent upon compliance with specific undertakings by the other side. ONUSAL was therefore now verifying, with close attention, implementation by the parties to ensure that compliance took place on schedule.

The Secretary-General observed that the peace process continued to show signs of becoming irreversible, noting in particular the impeccable observance of the ceasefire and the involvement of FMLN in political activities. He welcomed the manner in which the parties had overcome obstacles, but noted that the implementation of the peace accords in their entirety would require flexibility and restraint, especially in the zones of former conflict. Successful completion of the peace process would also require continuing support from the international community — both through the continued existence of ONUSAL and through voluntary contributions for activities that the Government could not finance itself but which it would be inappropriate to include in the Mission's budget.

As the ONUSAL mandate under resolution 693 (1991) was “to monitor all agreements concluded between the two parties”, and certain major undertakings — such as the reduction of the Armed Forces and the deployment of the National Civil Police — extended into 1994, the Secretary-General intended to submit to the Council at regular intervals his recommendations on the future activities and strength of the mission, taking into account the progress made in implementing the peace process. He anticipated that ONUSAL would complete its work by mid-1994. In the interim, he recommended that the Council extend the mission's mandate for a further period of six months, to 31 May 1993. Such a decision would be another sign of the international community's commitment to support the peace process in El Salvador. That commitment was of course based on the belief that Salvadorians themselves would show a matching commitment. The Secretary-General stressed that only through determined efforts by all sectors of Salvadorian society would the country return to the path of lasting peace. He called on the Salvadorian media to play a positive role in that regard, expressing concern at anonymous threats that had appeared in the newspapers, aimed at FMLN leaders, political figures and members of ONUSAL, which the Government had been repeatedly asked to investigate.⁷⁹

At its 3142nd meeting, held on 30 November 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Hungary) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Venezuela stated that, as one of the “Friends of the Secretary-General”,⁸¹ and with the support and participation of the United States, his country bore witness to the peace efforts of the United Nations in El Salvador. The peace process had demonstrated the positive scope of two main roles that could be played: on the one hand, the participation of the United Nations as mediator and guarantor of the peace agreements entered into by the parties in a civil conflict, with whom main responsibility rested; and, on the other hand, the important support role that could be played by friendly countries in the dialogue leading to agreements and in follow-up with regard to implementation. Those two roles could help to ensure, at the national and international levels, trust in the peace process and the reconciliation process.⁸²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 791 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989,

Recalling also its resolutions 693 (1991) of 20 May 1991, 714 (1991) of 30 September 1991, 729 (1992) of 14 January 1992 and 784 (1992) of 30 October 1992,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador of 23 and 30 November 1992,

Noting with appreciation the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General to support implementation of the several agreements signed between 4 April 1990 and 16 January 1992 by the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional to re-establish peace and promote reconciliation in El Salvador,

Noting the intention of the Secretary-General to continue, in this as in other peacekeeping operations, to monitor expenditures carefully during this period of increasing demands on peacekeeping resources,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador of 23 and 30 November 1992;

2. Decides to extend the mandate of the Mission as defined in resolutions 693 (1991) and 729 (1992), for a further period of six months ending on 31 May 1993;

3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to adapt the future activities and strength of the Mission, taking into account progress made in implementing the peace process;

4. Urges both parties to respect scrupulously and to implement in good faith the solemn commitments they have assumed under the agreements signed on 16 January 1992 at Mexico City and to exercise the utmost moderation and restraint, both at present and following the conclusion of the ceasefire phase, in order to respect the new deadlines agreed upon by them for the successful completion of the peace process and for the restoration of normal conditions, especially in the zones of former conflict;

5. Shares, in this context, the preoccupations expressed by the Secretary-General in paragraph 84 of his report;

6. Reaffirms its support for the Secretary-General's use of his good offices in the El Salvador peace process and calls upon both parties to cooperate fully with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for El Salvador and the Mission in their tasks of assisting and verifying the parties' implementation of their commitments;

7. Requests all States, as well as the international institutions in the fields of development and finance, to continue to support the peace process, in particular through voluntary contributions;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council fully informed of further developments in the El Salvador peace process and to report, as necessary, on all aspects of the operations of the Mission, at the latest before the expiry of the new mandate period;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Letter dated 28 November 1989 from the Permanent Representative of Nicaragua to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Initial proceedings

Decision of 8 December 1989 (2897th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 27 November 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of El Salvador requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider actions by the Government of Nicaragua, which he contended constituted breaches of the regional agreements concluded by the Central American Presidents — specifically, the “Procedure for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace in Central America” (Esquipulas II Agreement);² the Joint Declaration of the Central American Presidents (Tesoro Beach Agreement);³ and the Tela Declaration of 7 August 1989.⁴ His Government believed that, unless those serious breaches of the Central American agreements were brought to an end, peace in Central America would be threatened and a regional conflict might be unleashed.

By a letter dated 28 November 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ the representative of Nicaragua requested that the scope of the urgent meeting of the Council be expanded to include consideration of the grave repercussions which the serious deterioration of the situation in El Salvador was having on the peace process in Central America.

At its 2896th meeting, on 30 November 1989, the Council included the two above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) noted that, in keeping with past practice and as agreed in the Council’s prior consultations, he had requested the Secretariat to make the necessary technical arrangements to permit the representatives of El Salvador and Nicaragua to show in the Council chamber audio-visual material⁶ relating to the item under consideration. The President then invited the representatives of El Salvador and Nicaragua, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The question was considered by the Council at its 2896th and 2897th meetings, on 30 November and 8 December 1989, respectively.

The President also drew the attention of members of the Council to two other letters: a letter dated 22 November 1989 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting a communiqué issued on 20 November by the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries on the situation in El Salvador;⁷ and a letter dated 27 November 1989 from the representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela addressed to the Secretary-General, enclosing a communiqué issued on 24 November by their Governments — the member countries of the Permanent Mechanism for Consultation and Concerted Political Action — concerning the situation in El Salvador.⁸ In the latter communiqué, the seven Governments expressed concern at the internal conflict in El Salvador, following the break-off of the dialogue between the Salvadorian Government and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN), the Salvadorian opposition movement. They urged the immediate cessation of hostilities and the resumption of the national political dialogue. They also called on all States with ties to or interests in the region to refrain from intervening in the conflict; and urged cooperation in the efforts to achieve peace within the framework of the Esquipulas II agreements and in conformity with the commitments accepted by the Central American Presidents. They expressed firm support for the efforts of the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States in that regard.

The President remarked, at the beginning of the meeting, that the Council was mindful of the need to encourage efforts at ensuring that the peace process in Central America went forward and that nothing was done which would adversely affect those efforts. For that reason, as agreed in the course of the Council's prior consultations, he appealed to all speakers to show restraint in their statements so as not to disturb the peace process.⁹

The representative of El Salvador stated that his country had turned to the Council to lodge a complaint against the Government of Nicaragua because of serious acts of aggression for which the Sandinista regime was responsible. He stated that that regime was supplying weapons and military equipment to the irregular forces of El Salvador and providing them with military training. Such conduct was contrary to the Central American agreements, which established a total ban on Government aid to irregular forces operating in certain States. It was also in violation of the principle of non-intervention. He warned that El Salvador did not want the situation to lead to actions of legitimate self-defence and called on the Council to put an end to those violations of the Central American agreements so as to ensure that the conflict did not spread in the region. It should shoulder its primary responsibility by making an effective and impartial contribution to corroborating the substance of El Salvador's charges. If the Council were to decide to send a fact-finding mission, El Salvador would cooperate with it fully. In any case, El Salvador stressed the need for strict compliance with the Central American agreements: El Salvador would not "stand idly by" if the Sandinista regime did not end its interventionist policy. He noted that this was the first time that his country had resorted to the Council, which had become the "guarantor" of compliance with the agreements by virtue of its resolutions 637 (1989) and 644 (1989). He cautioned that violations of the agreements would render them "null and void", which would block, and even set back, the process of peace and socio-economic development in the region. He concluded by insisting that the Central Americans had to resolve the crisis themselves. In that connection, El Salvador considered that it was worth holding a presidential summit meeting at a date to be renegotiated.¹⁰

The representative of Nicaragua contended that El Salvador's allegations were simply a "cover-up" for the real causes of the tragedy which had long beset the Salvadorian people. They could not be attributed to external factors allegedly attempting to destabilize the internal situation in El Salvador. Nor could they be ascribed to the internal opposition movement, FMLN. Responsibility lay, rather, with the Government of El Salvador, an "insensitive oligarchy" and a "repressive" army. It was they who were responsible for the exploitation and repression of the Salvadorian people and for the attacks on the civilian population, involving most recently the deaths of trade unionists and Jesuit priests. The United States also bore responsibility for those human rights abuses because of its continued military assistance to the Government of El Salvador. He stated that El Salvador was, moreover, in breach of its obligations under the Central American agreements as it was incapable of fostering reforms and of entering into serious negotiations with FMLN to find a political solution to the conflict. By bringing the matter to the Council, it was bypassing and deliberately endangering the machinery established by the agreements. Nicaragua had never done this, despite the fact that El Salvador was still engaged in "aggression" against Nicaragua — as was the United States — in continuing to provide assistance to the Nicaraguan "counter-revolutionaries" (the so-called contras). Such action was in violation of El Salvador's commitments under the Central American agreements, which required that those forces be demobilized, disarmed and repatriated. The grave deterioration of the situation in El Salvador and that country's conduct posed a serious threat to the Central American peace process. The speaker asked the Council urgently to take the measures necessary to guarantee basic human rights in El Salvador and to promote measures towards an agreed ceasefire and the commencement of effective, substantive negotiations between the Government of El Salvador and FMLN, as required by the Central American agreements. He drew attention to his delegation's draft resolution¹¹ to that end, as submitted to the President of the Council. He also called on the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and the Organization of American States to use or continue to use their good offices to guarantee the holding of the summit of the Central American Presidents scheduled for early December.¹²

The representative of El Salvador, in a further statement, rejected the accusations made by the representative of Nicaragua, and emphasized his Government's constitutional commitment to human rights.¹³

The representative of the United States regretted that he had to speak to denounce as baseless the charges made by Nicaragua against his country. The FMLN "war" on the democratically elected Government of El Salvador had escalated dramatically, fuelled by the Governments of Nicaragua and Cuba. In violation of the Central American agreements, the Government of Nicaragua continued to supply weaponry to FMLN. He appealed to that Government to abide by the spirit of those agreements and stressed that, for its part, the United States supported the process of democratization and peace enshrined in the Esquipulas agreements. Its economic, military and humanitarian assistance to El Salvador was aid directed to a constitutionally elected Government in support of the peace process and used to offset guerrilla damage and attacks on the economy and infrastructure. As regards United States aid to the Nicaraguan "resistance", all lethal aid had ceased, in compliance with the Esquipulas process; the Tela Accords specifically allowed for the provision of humanitarian assistance. He concluded by affirming that the United States stood by its commitment to support the democratically elected Government of El Salvador in its struggle against the Sandinista-supported violent and terrorist tactics of FMLN.¹⁴

The representative of Nicaragua, in a further statement, urged the United States to stop interfering in

Nicaragua's internal politics and to encourage the opportunities for Central Americans themselves to solve their own problems.¹⁵

At the 2897th meeting, held on 8 December 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations, the President said that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶

The members of the Security Council, after hearing statements by the representatives of El Salvador and Nicaragua at the 2896th meeting of the Security Council, on 30 November 1989, express their grave concern over the present situation in Central America, in particular over the numerous acts of violence resulting in loss of lives and sufferings of the civilian population.

The members of the Council reiterate their firm support for the Esquipulas process of peaceful settlement in Central America and appeal to all States to contribute to the urgent implementation of the agreements reached by the five Central American Presidents. In this regard the members of the Council welcome the announcement by the five Central American Presidents to meet on 10 and 11 December at San José, Costa Rica, in order to discuss within the framework of the Esquipulas peace process, solutions to the problems confronting them.

The members of the Council consider that it is primarily the responsibility of the five Central American Presidents to find solutions to the regional problems, in accordance with the Esquipulas agreements. Therefore, they reiterate their appeal to all States, including those with links to the region and interests in it, to refrain from all actions that could impede the achievement of a real and lasting settlement in Central America through negotiations.

The members of the Council urge all parties concerned to cooperate in the search for peace and a political solution.

The members of the Council also express their firm support for the efforts being made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States in the peace process. In particular, they reiterate their full support for the Secretary-General of the United Nations in the exercise of the missions entrusted to him by the General Assembly and the Security Council, as well as for the early deployment of the United Nations Observer Group in Central America.

11. Items relating to Cuba

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 2 February 1990 from the Permanent Representative of Cuba to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 2 February 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Cuba requested the convening of a meeting of the Council to consider “the harassment of and armed attack on a Cuban merchant ship in the Gulf of Mexico by a vessel of the Coast Guard of the Government of the United States of America”. Cuba contended that that action constituted not only a violation of international law, but also an act of piracy endangering international peace and security.

By a letter dated 3 February 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,² the representative of Cuba transmitted the texts of two notes dated 31 January and 1 February 1990 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Cuba to the Interests Section of the United States in the Embassy of Switzerland in Havana. Cuba protested against the “illegal actions” of the United States Coast Guard Service, one of whose vessels had fired at and attempted to sink the merchant vessel Hermann in the early hours of 31 January as the latter — leased by a Cuban firm and manned by a Cuban captain and crew — was sailing in international waters from Cuba to Mexico. It observed that the Cuban Government had backed the decision of the captain and crew of the Hermann to resist the “illegal attempts” by the Coast Guard to board the vessel. Cuba rejected, moreover, the explanations by the United States Department of State that the attempted boarding and subsequent attack were part of an anti-drug-smuggling operation. It condemned the attack as a violation of freedom of navigation in international waters and of the human rights of its citizens whose lives had been put at risk. Cuba demanded that the United States put an end to such acts of provocation and aggression and make full reparation for the damage caused.

By a letter dated 3 February 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,³ the representative of the United States provided his Government’s detailed account of the incident of 31 January. The Coast Guard authorities had requested permission to board and inspect the Hermann as there was reason to suspect that it was carrying narcotics or other contraband. When the captain denied permission, the United States had sought and received permission from the flag State, Panama, to stop and search the vessel. The Coast Guard vessel had resorted to authorized and appropriate force only after the captain’s continued refusal to stop and after having exhausted all internationally recognized means of stopping the Hermann. The action taken by the United States was fully consistent with international maritime law and practice. The letter stressed that the Security Council should not expend its valuable time considering this matter, which “in no way” constituted “a threat to international peace and security”.

By a letter dated 5 February 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ the representative of Panama confirmed that the vessel concerned flew the Panamanian flag and that the Government of Panama had given express permission for United States authorities to board and inspect it. Panama accepted that, in such cases, all necessary measures could — even must — be taken, including the use of force.

At its 2907th meeting, on 9 February 1990, the Council included the letter dated 2 February 1990 from the representative of Cuba in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Cuba) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned communications from the representatives of Cuba and the United States, dated 3 February 1990, and of Panama, dated 5 February 1990, concerning the matter.⁵ Prior to taking up the item, the President decided to exercise his discretion under rule 20 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure and to vacate the Chair while the item was being discussed, since it concerned a matter that directly involved his country.

He yielded the Chair to the representative of Democratic Yemen.

The representative of Cuba presented a detailed account of the operation against the merchant vessel Hermann, which, he said, had been conducted in international waters, hundreds of miles outside United States' territory. He rejected the United States contention that the Cuban Government was responsible for the incident and stated that Cuba's refusal to allow the United States Coast Guard to inspect the Hermann was justified. He did not accept that the United States' conduct had been authorized by the Panamanian authorities and criticized its selective resort to a convention on drugs that had not yet come into force.⁶ He contended that the United States had flagrantly violated the Charter of the United Nations, the 1958 Convention on the High Seas⁷ and the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea⁸ and had disregarded General Assembly declarations and resolutions relating to peaceful coexistence among States. It had committed crimes of piracy and State terrorism. In conclusion, the speaker claimed that the incident was part of the United States policy of interference and aggression in a part of the world that it intended to go on treating as if it were its own backyard. That policy constituted a clear threat to international peace and security; consequently, the Council should take the necessary decisions to put an end to it.⁹

The representative of the United States stated that his Government strongly disagreed that a routine drug-interdiction case merited Security Council consideration. That type of operation was standard, frequent and an essential component of the battle against international drug traffickers. In his Government's opinion, it was Cuba that had violated international law by interfering with the rights and obligations of the flag State and ordering a Cuban crew to resist lawful inspection. The United States' actions, on the other hand, had been taken with the authorization of the flag State¹⁰ and in accordance with customary international law and practice, as codified in various treaties.¹¹ His Government saw no reason whatsoever for the Council to consider this routine law-enforcement issue, which in no way threatened international peace and security.¹²

The representative of Cuba made a further statement, reiterating a number of his previous points. The President then stated that the next meeting of the Council to continue its consideration of this item would be fixed in consultation with the members of the Council.¹³

B. Letter dated 27 April 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Cuba to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 27 April 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴ the representative of Cuba requested the convening of a meeting of the Council as soon as possible to consider the "terrorist activities being carried out against the Republic of Cuba, which are promoted, encouraged or tolerated by the United States authorities". He stated that these activities, which had been conducted for more than three decades, included the in-flight destruction of a Cuban civilian aircraft near Barbados on 6 October 1976, causing the death of 73 persons on board. Certain individuals who had plotted that atrocity had still not been punished and were currently under the protection of the United States Government. The representative of Cuba recalled that during 1992 the Council had stated its determination to eliminate international terrorism. In the presidential statement issued on 31 January 1992, on the occasion of the meeting of the Council at the level of Heads of State and Government, the members of the Council had expressed their deep concern over acts of international terrorism, and emphasized the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts. In resolution 748 (1992), moreover, the Council had reaffirmed that every State had the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when such acts involved a threat or use of force. That duty appertained to “every State”, including members of the Council and particularly its permanent members. The Council was accordingly obliged to condemn the terrorist actions for which the United States Government was responsible, and to demand that the latter hand over two named individuals to the Cuban courts and take immediate steps to eliminate completely the terrorist activities carried out from United States territory against Cuba. Just as Cuba condemned the attacks on Pan Am flight 101 and Union de Transports Aériens flight 772,¹⁵ so it demanded that the Council condemn the sabotage of the Cubana de Aviación aircraft. And, just as Cuba rejected international terrorism, so it demanded that an immediate end be put to the terrorism promoted, fostered or tolerated by the United States Government against Cuba.

By a letter dated 8 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶ the representative of Cuba reiterated his request for a meeting. He drew attention to the fact that it was a formal request, made by a State Member of the United Nations exercising its right under Article 35 of the Charter of the United Nations, bearing in mind the obligation of the Council under Article 24 of the Charter. He noted that, on the basis of that right and that obligation, there had been a well-established and generally respected practice since the inception of the United Nations that no member of the Council could ignore or seek to debase. Since the meeting still had not been convened, he submitted further information to illustrate why the Council had a duty to examine the matter and take prompt and effective action.

By a letter dated 13 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷ the representative of Cuba reiterated his country’s request for a meeting. He also expressed the view that, despite suggestions to the contrary, no decision had yet been adopted by the Council with regard to his letter of 27 April as the Council had not held any meeting since that date.

At its 3080th meeting, on 21 May 1992, the Council included the letter dated 27 April from the representative of Cuba in its agenda and considered the matter at that meeting. The representative of Cuba was invited, at his request, to take part in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents,¹⁸ including a draft resolution submitted by Cuba.¹⁹ By the draft resolution, in its preambular paragraphs, the Council would have, inter alia, reaffirmed its conviction that the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which States were directly or indirectly involved, was essential for the maintenance of international peace and security; and that, in accordance with Article 2 (4) of the Charter, every State had the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when such acts involved the threat or use of force. In the operative part of the draft resolution, the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, would have, inter alia, condemned the act of sabotage against the Cuban Airlines aircraft; urged the United States Government to provide to the Council, through the Secretary-General, all the information and evidence in its possession on that act of sabotage and on the persons who had planned, directed and carried it out; and requested the Secretary-General to seek the cooperation of the United States Government in providing that information and evidence and facilitating the investigation of that act of sabotage and the punishment of the guilty parties so as to contribute to the eradication of international terrorism.

At the same meeting, the representative of Cuba reiterated his Government’s claim that two of the persons who had masterminded the bombing of the Cuban civilian aircraft had not been punished and were in the United States. He also contended that the United States Government possessed information and evidence concerning the incident which had never been made public despite the country’s legal and ethical obligations and the fact that the International Civil Aviation Organization had called on all States to act with vigour and resolve in the matter so that the guilty might be duly punished. He detailed a number of other terrorist activities and threats against his country promoted and organized by Cuban expatriates living in Miami, Florida, United States. He concluded by stating that he hoped that the Council could support the draft resolution, the main elements of which he summarized.²⁰

The representative of the United States acknowledged that one of the fundamental principles of the United Nations was that all countries, members or non-members of the Council, had the right to be heard. However, he regretted Cuba's misuse of the Council's valuable time to make baseless allegations against his country, attempting to portray it as a supporter of international terrorism and a harbourer of terrorists. He stated that the United States supported peaceful democratic change in Cuba and had no aggressive intentions towards that country. His Government neither supported nor condoned preparations in the United States for the violent overthrow of the Government of Cuba, or efforts from the United States to foment violence in Cuba. He refuted the specific allegations made by the representative of Cuba and referred to a statement circulated to the Council that dealt with them in greater detail.²¹

The representative of Cuba made a further statement in which he stated that although the complaint before the Council had happened 15 years ago, the events continued to occur even just before the Council started its meeting.²²

12. Items relating to Haiti

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 30 September 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Haiti to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 30 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Haiti requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation in Haiti and its consequences for regional stability.

At its 3011th meeting, on 3 October 1991, the Council included the letter from the representative of Haiti in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. It invited the representatives of Canada, Haiti and Honduras, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (India) drew the attention of the Council to two additional documents addressed to the Secretary-General: a note verbale dated 2 October

1991 from the representative of Panama;² and a letter dated 3 October 1991 from the representatives of Ecuador and the United States of America,³ transmitting the text of resolution MRE/RES.1/91, adopted on 2 October 1991 at a meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Organization of American States (OAS). In its resolution, OAS, inter alia, vigorously condemned the grave events taking place in Haiti and demanded the full restoration of the rule of law and of constitutional order and the immediate reinstatement of President Aristide; called on the Secretary-General of OAS, together with a group of OAS Ministers for Foreign Affairs, to travel to Haiti immediately to inform those who held power illegally that the American States rejected the disruption of constitutional order and to advise them of the decisions adopted by the OAS meeting; recommended that States isolate diplomatically those who held power illegally in Haiti; recommended that all States suspend their economic, financial and commercial ties with Haiti and any aid and technical cooperation except that provided for strictly humanitarian purposes; urged all States to provide no military, police or security assistance of any kind and to prevent the delivery of arms, munitions, or equipment to Haiti; and urged the United Nations and its specialized agencies to consider the spirit and aims of the resolution.

Opening the discussion, the President of Haiti, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, stated that the threat to democracy in Haiti was a threat to democracy in the whole world. The international community had vigorously condemned the coup d'état and, through OAS, was attempting to negotiate a solution. He believed that, with the Council's support, those efforts could be strengthened further and many lives could be saved. He stressed that the international community should not try to decide for the Haitian people, but, rather, with them. The Haitian people opposed dictatorship and expected the Council's support in the protection of human rights. This implied action that would strengthen institutions in Haiti and would make it possible to deal with structures of exploitation, injustice and dictatorship. He said that they would be grateful if a delegation were to be dispatched to Haiti to "do justice that must be done beyond one's frontiers", so that "those criminals" would relinquish power. He would also welcome any help in shoring up Haiti's democratic structures, in particular humanitarian assistance in building a police force that could protect lives and property, without any obligation to support the army. It was due to the help of the international community that Haiti had been able to hold free, fair and democratic elections on 16 December 1990; it would also be with such help that Haiti would be able to save its threatened democracy.⁴

The President of the Council stated that the grave events that had taken place in Haiti, which represented a violent usurpation of legitimate democratic authority and power, deserved to be strongly condemned. He called for the restoration of the legitimate Government in Haiti. He expressed support for the OAS resolution and for the efforts of OAS to bring about the restoration of legitimate authority in Haiti. In conclusion, he said that they all hoped that President Aristide would be reinstated as soon as possible.⁵

All the speakers who took part in the discussion echoed or endorsed the views of the President of the Council.⁶ Several considered that the United Nations had a particular responsibility in the circumstances, given the crucial role the Organization had played — through the United Nations Observer Group for the Verification of the Elections in Haiti (ONUVEH) — in monitoring and verifying the elections which had led to President Aristide's election.⁷ Some speakers, in addition to expressing firm support for the OAS actions, drew attention to the bilateral measures which they and others had already taken along the lines of those called for in the OAS resolution; the representatives of France, the United States, Canada and Belgium stated that they had suspended assistance to Haiti, as had the European Community and its member States.⁸

The representative of Honduras, speaking in his capacity as the Chairman of the Group of Latin American and Caribbean States, recalled that the General Assembly, in its resolution 45/2 of 1990, had supported the democratic electoral process in Haiti. However, on 30 September, the world had discovered that the Haitian military had deposed the constitutionally elected President. Noting that all preferred to remedy the situation through diplomatic and peaceful means, he urged strong and unequivocal solidarity with Haiti. The Group of Latin American and Caribbean States had requested the inclusion of an item entitled "Crisis of democracy and human rights in Haiti" in the agenda of the current session of the General Assembly. It trusted that the Council would support the action taken by OAS and follow closely the results of its major diplomatic effort.⁹

The representative of France stated that exceptional circumstances had given rise to the Council meeting. The Head of a sovereign State, legally elected in a free and democratic ballot monitored by the United Nations, was personally addressing the international community to request its support. France was ready to respond to the appeal. It was ready out of friendship for Haiti. It was ready because the United Nations, which had lent its assistance during the Haitian elections and guaranteed the fairness of the results, could not remain passive now that the will of the Haitian voters was being flouted. Finally, it was ready because the international community could no longer, in an era when democracy and human rights were being reaffirmed throughout the world, accept the flagrant violation of such values. He stressed that the United Nations had a particular responsibility to shoulder, since the events in Haiti constituted a direct attack on its authority. His Government believed that the Organization must take a stand as soon as possible to condemn the coup d'état, to demand the re-establishment of the rule of law in Haiti and to support the efforts undertaken at the regional level by OAS.¹⁰

The representative of Austria, after echoing the views of the President of the Council, added that the reaction of the international community to the events in Haiti was of paradigmatic importance that transcended the present case. Democracy and respect for human rights were being increasingly accepted as central principles for the further evolution of the society of nations. A new universal consensus was taking shape. Austria considered that the Council, "with its new-found determination", could make "an important contribution" in that respect.¹¹

The representative of Yemen stated that the coup d'état in Haiti was a manifestation of the dangers that could threaten new democratic regimes owing to the lack of democratic traditions, the fact that democratic institutions were not deeply rooted and, above all, economic problems. The perpetrators of the coup d'état had tried to justify their actions by the lack of economic progress and the existence of a recession. Therefore, while Yemen condemned the coup d'état and called on the United Nations to support all efforts to restore legitimacy, it also appealed to the United Nations — and to all countries that were able to help — to assist democratic or newly democratic countries in the task of building their new institutions.¹²

The representative of Belgium stated that his country, as a member of the European Community, the Council of Europe and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, was convinced that regional organizations had a role to play in the protection, re-establishment and spread of freedom and democracy. Therefore, Belgium could not but welcome the firm position taken by OAS in its resolution, which the Council must support fully.¹³

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics noted with satisfaction the determination of members of OAS to champion the political rights and freedoms of the Haitian people. What was particularly important in this case was the proposal put forward at the twenty-first session of the General Assembly of OAS concerning the establishment of machinery to protect democracy and legal order in countries that belonged to that regional organization. He observed that, within the framework of OAS, measures were being taken with a view to restoring legitimate power in Haiti.¹⁴

The representative of the United States noted, with approval, that the President of the Council had expressed clearly to President Aristide the Council's support for him and his Government. However, he stressed that such support must consist of more than words. The United States had not and would not recognize the junta which had illegally usurped power. It had, moreover, suspended all aid to Haiti, as had others. With regard to collective action, the United States strongly supported the OAS resolution and called upon members of the Council to do the same. The speaker stressed that the hard-won democratic rights of the people of Haiti must not be allowed to slip away. The United Nations was especially qualified to speak to the crisis, since ONUVEH had played a key role in restoring democracy in that country. The United Nations and the entire world must send a clear message to those who had seized power in Haiti: the military junta was illegitimate; it had no standing in the international community; and, until democracy was restored, it would be treated as a pariah in the hemisphere. Noting the hemisphere's remarkable progress towards democracy since the mid-1970s, he stated that the junta's unconstitutional and violent seizure of power, which denied the people of Haiti their right of self-determination, must not and would not succeed.¹⁵

The representative of Cuba recalled that his Government had favoured an immediate meeting of the Council on 30 September when Haiti's request was received. Cuba considered that the Council had an obligation to agree to that request and to listen to what the representative of Haiti deemed appropriate to explain to it. Cuba shared the position of the Group of Latin American and Caribbean States. As President Aristide had said, it was not a question of anyone deciding for the Haitian people; rather, what was involved was support for the Haitian people and clear and firm solidarity with them so that they could soon restore their legitimately elected authorities and pursue a process which was the culmination of a 200-year struggle.¹⁶

The representative of Romania stated that it was the political and moral duty of the Security Council, which was officially and legally seized of the situation in Haiti, to voice its support for constitutional order in that country and for its democratic, freely chosen institutions and structures. His delegation believed that the regional efforts of OAS should be strengthened by the action of the Council "in the most appropriate form, given the prevailing circumstances". What was vital now in this regard was to pass on to those who had seized power in Haiti a very clear message: the Council was in favour of the restoration of democracy and the defence of basic human rights and freedom in Haiti. Such a message should be conveyed by the unanimous voice of the Council. It would be consonant with the specific, dramatic circumstances of the case, with the dignity of the Council and with the requirements of its unity which was its valuable asset in dealing with such complex matters. Romania fully supported any further effort of the Security Council to help the restoration of freedom and democracy in Haiti.¹⁷

The representative of Ecuador stated that, given the hemispheric duty to act, the Council had done what it could and must do. It had unanimously condemned the coup d'état and hoped that the rule of law would be restored and President Aristide reinstated. It had also expressed solidarity with the measures adopted by OAS. He thought that the Council would be ready to shoulder new responsibilities if necessary but hoped, in any case, that the action of the regional organization would be effective.¹⁸

The representative of Canada recalled the part played by his country in the establishment and conduct of ONUVEH. He stressed that all countries should act together to send a clear signal to those who sought to undermine democracy in Haiti. The United Nations, having played a crucial role in the process that had brought President Aristide to power, could not remain silent on the matter. That was why Canada had supported the convening of the Council meeting and the inclusion of an additional item on Haiti in the agenda of the General Assembly. Canada sincerely hoped that the United Nations would, both in word and deed, join in the efforts being made to reverse the unacceptable situation.¹⁹

B. Exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council concerning Haiti

Decision of 29 July 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 15 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰ the Secretary-General brought to his notice an exchange of correspondence regarding the situation in Haiti. He stated that on 18 June he had received a letter from President Aristide dated 3 June 1992, which he had brought to the attention of the Secretary-General of OAS, since that organization had, at the request of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of its member States, taken a leading role in efforts to restore democracy to Haiti. The Secretary-General observed that his own mandate under General Assembly resolution 46/7 of 11 October 1991 was more limited and had as its general purpose to support the action of OAS. The Secretary-General of OAS had responded by letter dated 10 July 1992 to the Secretary-General's letter. He therefore enclosed copies of the relevant correspondence.

The Secretary-General also wished to inform the members of the Council that he had decided to accept the offer of the Secretary-General of OAS to include participation from the United Nations in his proposed mission to Haiti.

By a letter dated 29 July 1992,²¹ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated 15 July 1992 regarding the situation in Haiti.

I have brought the letter to the attention of the members of the Council, who took note of it at the informal consultations held on 20 July 1992.

13. Items relating to the situation in Panama

Initial proceedings

A. Letter dated 25 April 1989 from the Permanent Representative of Panama to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 25 April 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Panama requested the convening of a meeting of the Council as a matter of urgency to consider the grave situation faced by his country as a result of the flagrant intervention in its internal affairs by the United States; the policy of destabilization and coercion pursued by the United States against Panama; and the permanent threat of the use of force against his country. He stated that there had been a serious worsening of the situation created by United States activities against Panama's sovereignty, political independence, economic security and territorial integrity, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations and of the principles of international law, as a result of a further escalation of acts of aggression and subversion, constituting a threat to international peace and security.

At its 2861st meeting, on 28 April 1989, the Council included the letter from the representative of Panama in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Panama, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) then drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 26 April 1989 from the representative of Panama addressed to the Secretary-General,² transmitting the text of a statement made on 24 April 1989 by the President of Panama concerning United States "meddling" in the electoral process in Panama.

At the same meeting, the representative of Panama thanked the Council for its promptness in convening the meeting, on the basis of Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter, to consider the grave situation brought about by the chain of actions in violation of international law committed by the United States against his country, which endangered international peace and security. He said that Panama had sought to resolve, through negotiation, the causes of conflict in United States-Panamanian relations stemming from the existence of the Panama Canal. However, when his Government had denounced the unilateral interpretation by the United States of the Panama Canal Treaties of 1977, aimed at extending its military presence in the country beyond the year 2000, Panama had been subjected to a series of acts of economic, political and financial aggression and an escalation of threats of military force. Moreover, the United States had abused the diplomatic privileges of its embassy in Panama to plan, organize, finance and carry out acts of interference in Panama's internal affairs and to participate in seditious activities. According to reports in the United States press, the United States had approved a covert plan which included the possibility of assassinating the Commander-in-Chief of the Panamanian defence forces and was providing financial assistance to an opposition candidate. The speaker said his country had also had to contend with, inter alia, the movement of armed units of the United States army outside their defence sites, violation of its airspace, infiltration by United States intelligence units, overflights of Panamanian military installations and acts endangering civilian aviation in Panama. In addition, the United States had brought to Panama an offensive military team that had never before been part of the forces used to defend the Panama Canal. Troop and weapons movements had been continuous, as had military manoeuvres displaying a force in constant readiness to attack. The speaker added that, in spite of the foregoing, the Government of Panama intended to proceed with the forthcoming elections on 7 May. However, the electoral process had itself become a new area for United States intervention, which had entered upon a phase of direct participation in an effort to disrupt public order, sow chaos, promote widespread destabilization and thus create a pretext for direct military intervention. Such behaviour was not only unacceptable, but also extremely dangerous; it jeopardized the normal evolution of the election process as well as international peace and security in an area that was vital to world navigation and trade.³

The representative of the United States stated that his country had grave doubts about the fairness and freedom of the coming elections in Panama, which were shared by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights of the Organization of American States (OAS). Evidence continued to mount that the military regime was continuing to subvert any expression of popular will through fraud, coercion and intimidation. However, the place where a free and open debate about Panama should be taking place was in the country itself, among the Panamanian people; the solution to Panama's lack of democracy did not lie in the Council, but in Panama. Panama's crisis was not the result of interference by his country in its internal affairs, but of the policies of General Noriega, who had arrogated to himself complete power over civic life and sponsored and countenanced widespread corruption, including drug trafficking and gun-running. He insisted that the international community should not become part of an effort by the Noriega regime to deflect attention from itself by bringing what was in essence a problem with its unfair and fraudulent elections to the Council. Instead, the regime should immediately restore the minimum conditions for free elections and permit full international and press monitoring of them. He stated that the United States, for its part, remained firmly committed to supporting the efforts of the Panamanian people to restore genuine civilian democracy and fully committed to the Panama Canal Treaties.⁴

In two further interventions, the representative of Panama said that the Council was not meeting to discuss the elections in his country, which were an internal matter, but rather the growing threat of the use of military force in Panama and the possibility that the deployment of such force could lead to violent actions there. The representative of the United States had not, he stated, addressed that issue. He accordingly invited him to state categorically that there would be no recourse to the use of force in Panama in connection with the forthcoming elections.⁵

Before closing the meeting, the President said that the time of the next meeting to continue consideration of the item would be fixed in consultation with the members of the Council.

By a letter dated 7 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶ the representative of Panama requested that the Council meet as soon as possible, in public, to renew consideration of the situation in his country in view of the fact that the United States troops in Panamanian territory had continued the dangerous escalation of their acts of intimidation, provocation and aggression against Panama, in violation of its sovereignty and territorial integrity and of the Panama Canal Treaties.

At its 2874th meeting, on 11 August 1989, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President of the Council (Algeria) invited the representative of Panama to participate in the discussion without the right to vote, in accordance with the decision taken at its 2861st meeting on 28 April 1989. The President informed the members of the Council that the representative of Panama intended, during the course of his statement, to show video material relating to the item under consideration and that, in keeping with past practice and as agreed in the Council's prior consultations, he had requested the Secretariat to make the necessary technical arrangements.

The representative of Panama stated that the increased activities of the United States armed forces on Panamanian territory — in violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Panama, the Panama Canal Treaties and the Charter of the United Nations — had forced his country to draw the Council's attention to the need to take specific measures to avert an armed conflict. He observed that the situation had worsened with the adoption by the United States of measures violating the Canal Treaties and other agreements. Among the more noteworthy violations, the armed forces of the United States had suddenly, without any explanation, decided to ignore the requirements regulating the United States military presence in Panama pursuant to which manoeuvres outside the authorized defence zones were planned and executed jointly by the two countries and flights by the United States Air Force were carried out in compliance with the rules of the Panamanian aviation authority. Hostile mobilizations had begun in April 1988 and had been brought to the attention of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations and OAS. Since then, such hostile acts had increased beyond all reasonable limits. He cited several incidents involving unilateral troop movements in Panamanian military and civilian areas, as well as overflight of cities, including the capital, by combat helicopters and Air Force planes. He added that he could document several hundred cases of Panamanian citizens having been detained, assaulted or humiliated by American troops. He asked the members of the Council to judge whether such acts amounted to acts of aggression, as defined in the annex to General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX), and suggested that their purpose was to fabricate an incident by taking provocation to the extreme, causing Panamanians to react in self-defence, or in such a way as to justify the launching of an operation to take Panama by force.

Continuing, the representative of Panama stressed that the case of Panama differed from any that the Council had so far considered in its role of preserving and restoring peace. The United States Army did not need to invade Panama because it was already deployed there. The same applied to its air and naval forces. There was another unusual aspect of the Panamanian situation. If it became a precedent, it would trample underfoot all the guarantees in the Charter for countries lacking military power, because the interpretation and application of the principles and provisions of the Charter would be subject to the unilateral whim of a nation having the force to impose its will. He warned that, in the light of the new situation, Panama's armed forces were on permanent alert, which meant that "any mad adventure" mounted against his country would not be bloodless. There existed a state of imminent war which called for the Council's immediate attention. The military threat posed a serious threat to the very functioning of the Canal and to peace in this very sensitive part of Central America, the stability of which was vital to the users of the Canal. Panama had therefore decided to submit custody of the Canal Treaties to the Council, so that that body might see to their strict implementation and guarantee the normal and efficient functioning of the Panama Canal, which was now endangered by constant violations of the Treaties governing its administration. Panama also called for military observers to be sent to the area immediately. In addition, it requested a good offices mission of the Secretary-General to avoid an imminent breach of the peace in the region, observe the situation on the ground and advance urgent measures aimed at contributing to a decrease of tension between the two countries.⁷

The representative of the United States said he considered it unfortunate that the Council had to spend its valuable time and resources to listen to the groundless complaints of the representative of General Noriega's regime. The truth, in his view, was simple and had been laid out by OAS in three extraordinary meetings of Ministers for Foreign Affairs in May, June and July 1989. He recalled that, on 7 May 1989, the Panamanian people had gone to the polls and, despite intimidation, repression and massive efforts at fraud, the opposition candidates had won by a margin of over three to one, a fact that had been documented by a host of international observers and by the Catholic Church. Having failed to control the outcome of the elections, General Noriega had annulled them and violently suppressed the protests of the democratic opposition, actions that had been condemned by Governments throughout the western hemisphere and the rest of the world. OAS had recognized that the crisis in Panama centred on the person and the conduct of General Noriega in its resolution of 17 May calling for a democratic transfer of power in the country. An OAS mission,⁸ charged with promoting conciliation formulas for arriving at a national accord that could bring about a democratic transfer of power in the shortest possible time, had reaffirmed that fact in its 19 July report. The United States supported those regional efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis through multilateral diplomacy.

Continuing, the representative of the United States maintained that United States military activities in Panama there were conducted in complete accord with the Panama Canal Treaties. Panama's appeal to the principle of non-intervention was intended to divert the Council's attention from General Noriega's violent denial of his people's right to self-determination, through fair and free elections and peaceful protest. He accused the Noriega regime of having itself violated various provisions of the Panama Canal Treaties on numerous occasions since February 1988. Many of those violations had involved threats to, and the physical abuse of, members of the United States armed forces stationed in Panama; others had involved attempts to interfere with the operations of the Canal. The United States had augmented its military forces in Panama and increased their readiness in direct response to the hostile actions of the Noriega regime. In calling the present meeting, that regime had sought, among other things, to enhance its own legitimacy and to distract international attention from the OAS efforts to promote General Noriega's surrender of power and a transition to a legitimate, representative, democratic government. The only solution to Panama's current problems was that called for by OAS. False charges made in the Council could not hide this and the Council should waste no more of its time on them. In concluding, he confirmed his country's commitment under the Panama Canal Treaties to ensuring the efficient and safe operation of the Canal until it was turned over to the Panamanian people in the year 2000.⁹

In a further intervention, the representative of Panama showed an amateur videotape which, he stated, had been taken in Panama City, far away from the defence zones, and showed the occupation of a civilian area, the unauthorized search of civilians and the presence of United States tanks and military personnel aimed at intimidating the Panamanian civilian population. With regard to the OAS mission, he stressed that his Government had always facilitated its work, especially when it had gone to Panama to assist the Panamanian political forces in reaching a national accord. He urged the United States not to prevent the dispatch of a United Nations mission to Panama to verify, on the ground, the alleged violations of the Treaties and the imminent danger of confrontation.¹⁰

In a further intervention, the representative of the United States reiterated that the Council was faced with an attempt to divert attention from the root cause of the problem — General Noriega's illegal persistence in hanging on to power against the wishes of his people. That was the issue that must be addressed.¹¹

In a final statement, the representative of Panama deplored the lack of any mention of a United Nations mission which could verify the situation.¹²

The President of the Council announced that the next meeting to continue consideration of the item would be fixed in consultation with the members of the Council.

B. The situation in Panama

Decision of 23 December 1989 (2902nd meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 20 December 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ the representative of Nicaragua requested an urgent and immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation following the invasion of Panama by the United States.

By a letter dated 20 December 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴ the representative of the United States reported, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations,¹⁵ that United States forces had "exercised their inherent right of self-defence under international law by taking action in Panama in response to armed attacks by forces under the direction of Manuel Noriega". He stated that the action was designed to protect American lives and the United States obligations to defend the integrity of the Panama Canal Treaties. It had been taken after consultations with the democratically elected leaders of Panama and with their support, and after the United States had exhausted every available diplomatic means to resolve peacefully the disputes with Mr. Noriega. It followed a declaration made on 15 December by Mr. Noriega, after assuming the role of Head of Government of Panama, that a state of war existed with the United States, and brutal attacks by his forces on American personnel lawfully present in Panama. The representative further stated that United States forces would use only the force necessary to assure the safety of Americans and the integrity of the Panama Canal Treaties, and that all feasible measures had been taken to minimize the risk of civilian damage or casualties.

At its 2899th meeting, on 20 December 1989, the Council included the letter from the representative of Nicaragua in its agenda. It considered the item at its 2899th to 2902nd meetings, from 20 to 23 December 1989. The Council invited, at their request, the following to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: the representative of Nicaragua (2899th meeting); the representatives of Cuba, El Salvador, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Peru (2900th meeting); and the representative of Panama (2901st meeting).¹⁶

At the 2899th meeting, the President (Colombia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the letter dated 20 December 1989 from the representative of the United States.

The representative of Nicaragua stated that the invasion of Panama earlier that day by American troops was in clear violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of international law. That flagrant violation of Panama's sovereignty and territorial integrity — which came six years after the invasion by the United States of another country in the region — was a threat not only to Central America but also to international peace and security. He invoked Articles 1 (2) and 2 (4) of the Charter, as well as the principle of non-intervention, noting that the latter had been reaffirmed in various United Nations instruments and by the International Court of Justice. He also recalled that, in the context of the inter-American system, the Charter of OAS, various regional treaties and other instruments prohibited resort to the use of force and intervention in the affairs of other States and provided for the settlement of disputes by peaceful means. He contended that the United States action was in violation of its obligations under all those instruments. He maintained that international law could provide no justification for the invasion; no argument could possibly justify intervention against a sovereign State. He rejected the United States argument that its action had been taken for the protection of American citizens, claiming that that was simply a pretext which had been asserted time and again over the years by Governments of the United States in an attempt to justify aggression and to legitimize invasions. He stated that the crisis in relations between Panama and the United States had worsened as a result of the latter's adoption of various measures in violation of international law and the principles of peaceful coexistence. He recalled that, in recent months, Panama had twice called for a meeting of the Security Council to consider serious threats of the use of force against it by the United States and intervention by the latter in its internal affairs; and to request that action be taken to ensure that there would not be an armed conflict.¹⁷ He added that he had submitted to the Council the custodianship of the Panama Canal Treaties, so that the United Nations could ensure strict compliance. In conclusion, he appealed to the world community, and specifically the Council, to condemn the United States action and demand the immediate withdrawal of the invading troops from Panamanian soil. He urged the United States not to use its veto.¹⁸

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his country's concern at the invasion of Panama by the United States. He contended that it was a flagrant violation of the norms of international law and the Charter of the United Nations, which must be condemned by the international community. He rejected the United States attempts to justify its action by invoking Article 51 of the Charter and its claims that Panama was threatening the national interests of the United States. Recalling that the course of events resulting from United States policy towards Panama had been drawn to the

Council's attention on several occasions, he regretted that the Council had not taken the necessary steps to prevent the situation before it. The Soviet Union believed that the principles of non-intervention and non-use of force should have no exceptions and should be respected by all and for all. It considered that, whatever one's views of General Noriega's Government, the introduction of foreign troops into the territory of a sovereign State was intolerable. The choice could and must be made only by the Panamanian people, without outside interference. The Soviet Union believed that the United States should immediately halt its armed intervention in Panama and withdraw its troops. Any problems in United States-Panamanian relations should be resolved by peaceful means through negotiations.¹⁹

The representative of China also condemned the aggressive action of the United States in using force against Panama, a sovereign State. He observed that the invasion of Panama not only violated the purposes and principles of the Charter, which required States to resolve their disputes through peaceful means without resort to force; it also ran counter to the improving international situation. The United States action could only aggravate tension in the region and would have a serious negative impact on peace and stability in the world. The speaker reiterated China's opposition to interference in the internal affairs of other countries under whatever pretext — particularly by military means. He called on the United States to cease its aggressive action, withdraw its invading troops from Panama, hold talks with that country and seek to resolve its disputes through peaceful means.²⁰

The representative of France underlined the extreme seriousness of the situation in that country. Following the interruption in the democratic process in Panama, the tragic events of the past few days and the death of an American officer had led the United States to intervene directly in the crisis. The situation warranted a Security Council debate as outside intervention had occurred and was still occurring. For France, recourse to force was always deplorable and could not be approved per se, whatever the causes. The situation was largely the result of a sequence of regrettable events that had taken place since the annulment of the elections of 7 May, contrary to the will of the people. France had supported the decisions of OAS and its mediation efforts aimed at securing a resumption of dialogue between Panamanians and regretted that those efforts had not been successful. He called upon the Council to take initiatives that could lead to the restoration of a normal situation. He suggested a declaration or statement by the President of the Council, expressing the Council's concern over events in Panama and their origins, affirming the right of the people of that country to express themselves in a sovereign manner as to whom they wished to be their leaders and appealing for a return to peace and democracy in Panama.²¹

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the establishment of a democratic government in Panama. He recalled that earlier in the year the international community had almost unanimously condemned the decision of the Panamanian authorities under General Noriega to declare null and void the elections of 7 May, which had resulted in an overwhelming victory for the opposition alliance. The United Kingdom had repeatedly called on General Noriega to respect the democratic will of the people of Panama and to step down, and had endorsed the efforts made in that regard by OAS. Regrettably, every attempt to give peaceful effect to the outcome of the elections had failed. The United Kingdom believed that force had been used only as a last resort and against a regime which had itself turned to force to subvert the democratic process. He reiterated that his Government fully supported the action taken by the United States, which had been undertaken with the agreement and support of the Panamanian leaders elected in May. The establishment of a legal and democratically elected Government in Panama could only be beneficial for Panama itself and for peace and security in the region. In the United Kingdom's view, the Council should do its utmost to encourage progress in that direction. While he regretted the loss of life incurred as a result of the United States operation, he noted that United States personnel in Panama had been subjected to attacks and threats. He welcomed the United States assurance, contained in the letter from its representative to the President of the Security Council,²² that its forces would only use the minimum force necessary and that all feasible measures had been taken to minimize the risk of civilian damage or casualties.²³

The representative of Canada stated that intervention by force by a Member of the United Nations in the internal affairs of any State was against both the letter and the spirit of the Charter. His Government therefore regretted the use of force by the United States in Panama. However, he observed that Article 51 of the Charter recognized a basic exception to the prohibition of the use of force and affirmed the inherent right of self-defence which was vested in Member States. While intervention by force was a dangerous precedent, Canada was firmly of the view that, before condemning the United States in the present case, the Council should examine all the circumstances to determine whether or not compelling reasons justified the use of force. In the opinion of the Government of Canada, such compelling reasons did exist: the United States had relied on force as a last resort and only after the failure of numerous attempts to resolve the situation in Panama peacefully. The speaker recalled that for a period of almost two years, there had been a progressive and systematic betrayal in Panama of democratic values. Events, such as the statement by General Noriega that Panama was in a "state of war" with the United States and the harassment of American citizens, had clearly left the United States with few options. The efforts of OAS and of individual neighbouring States had regrettably been unsuccessful. Moreover, the representative of the United States, in his letter to the President of the Council,²⁴ had affirmed that his country had acted after consultation with the democratically elected leaders of Panama, who had supported its actions. In conclusion, he affirmed that his Government was of the opinion that the United States was justified in acting as it had. It looked forward to the consolidation of democracy and to a peaceful and stable future for the people of Panama.²⁵

The representative of the United States stated that, acting in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, United States forces had exercised their inherent right of self-defence under international law by taking action in Panama in response to armed attacks by forces under the direction of General Noriega. The action was designed to protect American lives as well as to defend the integrity of the Panama Canal Treaties. For nearly two years the United States and the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean had worked together to try to resolve the crisis in Panama through diplomatic means, but to no avail. The root cause of the crisis in Panama had been the struggle between General Noriega and his ruthless cabal and the people of Panama. The will of the Panamanian people, which had been expressed in free elections, had been repeatedly obstructed. As a result of the United States actions, that situation had been reversed: the freely elected leaders of Panama had assumed the rightful leadership of their country. They had been consulted beforehand and had approved of the American steps. Referring to the words of the President of the United States that morning, the speaker explained that his Government's military action had been precipitated by General Noriega's recent declaration of a state of war with the United States and his threats, and actual attacks, on the lives of Americans in Panama, which had created an imminent danger to the 35,000 United States citizens in that country. The armed forces had been directed to protect their lives and to bring General Noriega to justice in the United States. He recalled that the whole world, including OAS, had denounced the violation of human rights that had followed the annulment of the Panamanian elections and the brutality used against the opposition to the Noriega regime. The commitment of the United States to Panamanian sovereignty had never been at issue. He added that another issue in the debate over Panama was drug trafficking. Such activities threatened the survival of democratic countries: countries which provided a safe haven and support for the international drug trafficking cartels menaced peace and security just as surely as if they were using their own conventional military forces to attack democratic societies. General Noriega could not invoke Panamanian sovereignty while the drug cartels with which he was allied intervened throughout the hemisphere. That was aggression against all, and it was now being brought to an end. He also maintained that the United States had the right — and duty — to protect and defend the Panama Canal under article 4 of the Panama Canal Treaty. Harassment and intimidation of American and Panamanian employees of the Panama Canal Commission and the United States forces by the Noriega regime had threatened American and Panamanian lives as well as Canal operations.

Continuing, the representative of the United States noted that Chapter VIII of the Charter called upon Member States to make every effort to use regional arrangements to solve regional problems. The language of Article 52 was striking in its use of the word “shall” in that context. It left little room for doubt that members of a regional arrangement were obliged to refer regional disputes to regional organizations and that the Council was obligated to encourage that recourse to regional arrangements. In the situation under consideration, OAS was currently engaged in that effort. Apart from the legal consequences that flowed from the use of “shall” in Chapter VIII, common sense dictated that where there was a regional organization and a regional problem, recourse should be to the regional organization. Although that need not and did not preclude United Nations involvement, the risk of wasteful duplication was obvious. Far more serious, however, was the possibility of reaching inconsistent conclusions. It was important that international organizations contribute to resolving problems, not further complicate them. In conclusion, he reiterated that his country had resorted to military action under Article 51 as a last resort, in consultation with, and with the approval of, the democratically elected leaders of Panama, and in a manner designed to minimize casualties and damage. He affirmed his Government’s intention to withdraw its troops from Panama as quickly as possible.²⁶

At its 2900th meeting, on 21 December 1989, the Council continued its consideration of the item. The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking also in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of the Non-Aligned Countries in the United Nations, stated that the non-aligned countries had always considered as unacceptable any foreign intervention — especially military intervention — under any pretext since it represented a gross violation of sovereignty. They therefore firmly objected to the action of United States forces in non-aligned Panama, which constituted a violation of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of that country. Moreover, the intervention had been carried out at a time when the countries of the region were striving to find peaceful solutions to existing problems in Central America. The United States action would no doubt not only damage the stability of the region but also seriously affect the prevailing positive atmosphere in international relations. He noted that the non-aligned countries had recently reaffirmed, at their ninth summit conference, in Belgrade, the inalienable right of the Panamanian people freely to decide on their own political, economic and social system without any form of external pressure, interference or intervention. That position had been reaffirmed in a communiqué adopted by the Coordinating Bureau the day before. He could not therefore but re-emphasize the non-aligned countries’ strong objection to military intervention and interference in the internal affairs of Panama. The use of force and the violation of the independence and territorial integrity of Panama could not resolve the dispute between the United States and that country. Moreover, the non-aligned countries seriously doubted that democracy could be promoted by foreign military means. Whatever one might think about General Noriega’s regime, it was up to the Panamanian people to decide what kind of government or internal development was most suitable for their country. The non-aligned countries therefore strongly believed that the only way to resolve the situation was through dialogue and negotiations in a broader regional context. The Coordinating Bureau had called on the United States to cease immediately all military operations and withdraw its troops. In its view, the continuation of the hostilities could only further aggravate tensions in the region, with dangerous consequences for regional stability and the ongoing efforts to restore peace and security in Central America.²⁷

The representatives of Nepal, Ethiopia, Algeria and Malaysia spoke along similar lines. They stressed that the United States military intervention created a disturbing precedent, fraught with a potential threat to the security of small States through what was considered to be an erroneous interpretation of the provisions of the Charter. Their concern was all the greater in the circumstances because the action involved a major Power and a permanent member of the Council, which bore special responsibility as regards international peace and security.²⁸

The representative of Finland recognized the right of self-defence under international law. In his view, however, the military intervention undertaken by the United States in Panama, with considerable loss of life, was a disproportionate response to the recent incidents in that country, reprehensible as they were. He hoped that the Council could express its grave concern about the events in Panama and immediately call for a ceasefire and the withdrawal of those United States forces that were not legitimately in the country under existing arrangements. He also hoped that it could affirm the right of the Panamanian people freely to elect their legitimate authorities.²⁹

The representative of Brazil quoted from a declaration that had been issued by his Government on the United States military intervention in Panama. He noted that an OAS Meeting of Consultation on the subject remained open, and appealed for a prompt and peaceful solution to the crisis, based on respect for the principles of self-determination and non-intervention.³⁰

The representative of Cuba condemned the United States action as an act of armed aggression against the people of Panama contrary to international principles and norms, which had no justification. He quoted from a letter dated 22 December 1989 from the President of Cuba addressed to the Secretary-General, in which the President had denounced the attempt by the United States to pose as the country that had been attacked and to justify its action by invoking Article 51 of the Charter. What was really at stake in Panama, he maintained, was an attempt by the United States to avoid its obligations under the Panama Canal Treaties and not to yield authority over the Canal to the legitimate Government of Panama. He called on the international community to support the people of Panama in upholding its sovereign right to decide its own destiny and to defend itself by all means against the aggression. He urged the Council to condemn the invasion; demand the withdrawal of the United States forces that had invaded Panama; and denounce the establishment by force by the United States of a puppet government.³¹

The representative of Peru condemned the invasion of Panama by United States military forces as a flagrant violation of Panama's sovereignty and of the principle of non-intervention enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of OAS. He stressed, however, that his Government's condemnation of the invasion should not be construed as support for General Noriega's dictatorial regime, which it had repeatedly denounced. He recalled, in this regard, that Peru had initiated, in OAS and other multilateral forums, actions aimed at ensuring the sovereign will of the people of Panama. He concluded by drawing attention to a communiqué issued the day before by his Government on its response to the invasion, which had been circulated to members of the Council.³²

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said that the Council was once again faced with the problem of an act of aggression and intervention by one of its permanent members against a small Member State. He rejected the United States attempt to justify the intervention by invoking Article 51 of the Charter as a fallacious legal pretext: there could be no justification for such acts of aggression and intervention. He stated that small countries without the means to defend themselves, which had believed that the Charter protected them, were losing faith in the system of international security and in the Council, where law was interpreted so as to support the strong and allow the small and weak to be violated. He urged the Council to adopt an unequivocal resolution denouncing aggression and calling for the withdrawal of the forces of aggression. He asked this not because the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya supported General Noriega or his regime, but to defend the principles involved, including the right of peoples to self-determination.³³

The representative of El Salvador affirmed his Government's support for the sovereign right of the people of Panama freely and democratically to choose their leaders — a right of which they had been deprived by General Noriega, who had forcibly prevented the newly elected Government from exercising its mandate. El Salvador also advocated complete respect for the principles of self-determination and of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other States. He concluded by stating his country's firm support for the legitimate Government of Panama presided over by Mr. Guillermo Endara, who had been elected as the constitutional President of Panama during the elections of 7 May 1989.³⁴

At the 2901st meeting, on 21 December 1989, following the adoption of the agenda, the President

(Colombia) stated that, on the basis of prior consultations among members of the Council, it was his understanding that they wished to invite the representative of Panama to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. At the request of the representative of the United States, the proposal was put to the vote and was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention.³⁵ At the same meeting, following the announcement by the President that he had received two requests to participate on behalf of Panama, the Council decided, without a vote, to ask the Secretary-General to prepare a report on credentials under rules 14 and 15 of its provisional rules of procedure.³⁶ At its 2902nd meeting, on 23 December 1989, the Council, on the basis of its prior consultations, took note of the Secretary-General's report on credentials.³⁷ The President then informed the Council that the two contending requests to participate had been withdrawn.

At the 2902nd meeting, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia,³⁸ as well as to several other documents.³⁹

By the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council, inter alia, would have reaffirmed the sovereign and inalienable right of Panama to determine freely its social, economic and political system and to develop its international relations without any foreign intervention; and would have recalled the obligation of all Member States, under Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter, to refrain from the threat or use of force against any State. In the operative part of the draft resolution, the Council would have: (1) strongly deplored the military intervention in Panama as a flagrant violation of international law; (2) demanded the immediate cessation of the intervention and the withdrawal of the United States armed forces from Panama; (3) called upon all States to respect the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Panama; and (4) requested the Secretary-General to monitor the developments in Panama and to report to the Council within 24 hours after the adoption of the resolution.

At the same meeting, the representative of the United States emphasized that he was not claiming a right on behalf of his country to intervene in favour of democracy where it was not welcomed. His country had acted in Panama for legitimate reasons of self-defence and to protect the integrity of the Panama Canal Treaties. Its actions were in conformity with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, article 21 of the OAS Charter and the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaties. He asked members, before pronouncing on the United States action, to pause and reflect and to remember that that action had been welcomed by a democratically elected Government of Panama and, overwhelmingly, by the people of Panama themselves. He contended that, although General Noriega had formally declared war on the United States a few days earlier, he had in fact done so a long time before. Through their drug trafficking activities, General Noriega and his cohorts were guilty of intervention and aggression against the United States. He pointed out that during the previous eight months, his Government had expressed its willingness to work through the United Nations to reinvigorate OAS, and to work with the organizations in an attempt to deal collectively with the challenge to democracy represented by General Noriega. However, OAS had been unable to do anything about General Noriega's annulment of the Panamanian elections or to secure a peaceful transition to democracy in Panama. When General Noriega had declared a state of war against the United States and had begun to implement it, there had been no other recourse but to deal directly with him. He stressed that the use of force in self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter was a right granted to all States under the Charter and could not be read out of it. The use of force contrary to the Charter was impermissible and contrary to international law. But the Charter rightly provided, in those cases where all else failed, that States had the right to defend themselves where force was being used against them and their citizens, in particular. Noting that some had questioned the proportionality of the United States response to General Noriega's armed actions, he pointed out that the preservation of the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal Treaties, the presence of 35,000 Americans and the special responsibilities of the United States under the Canal Treaties made for a particular and difficult series of problems, which had to be taken into account in judging proportionality. He reiterated that the United States action in Panama had been approved — and applauded — by the democratically elected Government of Panama and by the overwhelming majority of the people of Panama. In his view, the Council should now welcome the restoration of democracy in Panama, as had the United States, which would do all it could to promote it, including through the withdrawal of its forces when their mission had been accomplished. He concluded that for all those reasons, the United States would vote against the draft resolution.⁴⁰

The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as representative of Colombia, stressed that there could not be any motive — even a temporary motive — for a State to be subjected to military occupation or other forms of force by another State. Any solution of the Panamanian crisis required respect for the self-determination of the Panamanian people. Colombia would continue to promote initiatives leading to the restoration of democracy in their country. As one of the sponsors of the draft resolution, Colombia urged its adoption.⁴¹

The President then put the draft resolution to the vote. It received 10 votes in favour and 4 against (Canada, France, United Kingdom, United States), with 1 abstention (Finland), and was not adopted owing to the negative votes of three permanent members of the Council.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Finland explained that he had abstained in the vote on the draft resolution because its wording did not come sufficiently close to his Government's own view. Although Finland agreed with a large part of the text, in particular the call for a withdrawal, it would have wished, in the preambular part, for a more specific reference to the right of the Panamanian people to establish a democratic and legitimate regime, respecting human rights, and, in the second operative paragraph, for a clear distinction to be drawn between the forces used for intervention and other forces.⁴²

The representative of France explained that his delegation had voted against the draft resolution because it was unbalanced and might be interpreted as implying support for a regime that France had declared illegitimate. The text categorically denounced the United States intervention in Panama without mentioning either the circumstances surrounding it or the grave events which had preceded it and which to a large extent explained the current situation. A balanced text would have included, in its operative part, an essential paragraph expressing regret at the interruption of the process which had allowed the Panamanian people to express themselves freely and to choose their leaders democratically and calling for the establishment of a legitimate, democratically elected regime.⁴³

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that his delegation, too, had cast a negative vote because of the unbalanced nature of the draft resolution. He observed that the draft failed to welcome the establishment of a legal and democratically elected Government in Panama; that it failed to address the illegal and arbitrary nature of General Noriega's regime, which for months had imposed itself on the Panamanian people, in disregard of their right to self-determination and of the legitimate electoral process in that country; that it made no mention of the long history of violence and intimidation conducted by the Noriega regime against United States personnel in Panama and against its own people; and that it failed to acknowledge the fact that the United States had used force only as a last resort after lengthy diplomatic efforts.⁴⁴

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on the other hand, stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution submitted by the non-aligned members of the Council for several reasons: it reaffirmed the right of Panama to determine freely its social, economic, and political system and to develop its international relations without foreign intervention; it denounced the United States action as a "flagrant violation of international law and of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of States"; and it demanded the immediate cessation of the intervention and the withdrawal of the United States armed forces from

Panama. He regretted the casting of the triple veto, which undermined the efforts of the Council to halt the interventionist acts of the United States. He hoped that the Council would, nevertheless, monitor events in Panama very closely so that a prompt halt to the intervention could be achieved and United States troops could be removed from Panama.⁴⁵

C. Letter dated 3 January 1990 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Nicaragua to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 17 January 1990 (2905th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 3 January 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁶ the representative of Nicaragua requested the convening of a meeting of the Council to consider “the temporary occupation by force of the residence of [its] Ambassador in Panama ... on 29 December 1989” and “the forced entry by troops of the occupying Power into the apartment of [two] Nicaraguan diplomats ... on 31 December 1989”, in the aftermath of the “invasion” of the Republic of Panama by United States forces. The letter stated that Nicaragua considered the “invasion and current occupation” of Panama by United States troops to constitute not only a violation of the purposes and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations, but also a serious threat to peace and security in the region.

At its 2905th meeting, on 17 January 1990, the Council included the letter from the representative of Nicaragua in its agenda and considered the question at the same meeting. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Côte d'Ivoire) invited the representative of Nicaragua, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Malaysia and Zaire.⁴⁷

In the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have, inter alia, recalled that the 1928

Havana Convention regarding Diplomatic Officers provided that “diplomatic officers should be inviolate as to their persons, their residence, private or official and their property”; reaffirmed the need for States to comply with their obligations under the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations, and other international legal instruments; and taken note of two letters, from the Permanent Mission of the United States to the President of the Council, regretting the incident and indicating that the United States had taken steps to prevent the recurrence of such actions. In the operative part of the draft resolution, the Council would have: (1) declared that the serious events that took place at the residence of the Ambassador of Nicaragua in Panama were a violation of the privileges and immunities recognized under international law; (2) expressed deep concern at any measure or action that restricted free communication and prevented the functioning of diplomatic missions in Panama, and called upon those concerned to take the appropriate steps to avoid the recurrence of such measures or actions; and (3) demanded full respect for the rules of international law that guaranteed the immunity of diplomatic officers and the inviolability of the premises of diplomatic missions.

At the same meeting, the representative of Nicaragua explained that his country had called for a meeting of the Council to denounce the United States for its forced entry into the residence of the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Panama and for a series of actions violating the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations in particular, and international law in general. He then yielded the floor to the Ambassador of Nicaragua to Panama, who gave a detailed account of the incident, which had included the unauthorized entry, search and sacking of his diplomatic residence by United States troops. The Nicaraguan Ambassador to Panama also denounced a similar, subsequent, attack by United States troops on the apartment of two Nicaraguan diplomats in Panama. He alleged that the latter action demonstrated that the first, very serious, incident was not an accident but part of a specific plan of provocation against Nicaragua aimed at increasing the tension between the two countries “in order to justify a warlike escalation against the Nicaraguan people”.⁴⁸

Resuming his own statement, the representative of Nicaragua contended that the United States had violated numerous international agreements, including the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, the Havana Convention regarding Diplomatic Officers of 1928, and the 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents. He stated that the United States had also failed to respect the judgment of the International Court of Justice of 27 June 1986 in the case Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua, in which the Court had found that the United States had attacked Nicaragua in violation of customary international law and the principles of non-intervention, and had held that the United States was under a duty immediately to cease and to refrain from all such acts as might constitute breaches of its legal obligations. He acknowledged that some kind of explanation and assurances had been given by the United States in respect of the incident under consideration. However, he questioned their reliability in the light of subsequent events. Nicaragua therefore demanded that an investigation be carried out and that appropriate penalties be imposed on those responsible for the attacks.

Continuing, the representative of Nicaragua added that his country had also come before the Council because it was concerned that the United States action was a provocation designed to elicit an equivalent response, which would result in the unleashing of even broader actions against Nicaragua, threatening international peace and security. He contended that, so long as the occupation troops remained in Panama, the latent threat of further acts of aggression, such as the one currently under consideration by the Council, would persist, and demanded once again the immediate withdrawal of the invading forces. He stated that the international community had the right and duty to require of the United States conduct consistent with law and the system of international relations; and that the United States, in turn, was obliged to act in accordance with its serious responsibilities as a world Power and a permanent member of the Council. He concluded by recalling that, in 1979, when the United States suffered the invasion of its diplomatic mission in Tehran, its then Secretary of State had called on the Council to “move together, in a manner that is clear and convincing, to demonstrate that the rule of law has meaning and that our machinery of peace has practical relevance”. Those words, he contended, were appropriate on the present occasion.⁴⁹

The representative of the United States stated that the issue at hand was an allegation of an action inconsistent with diplomatic privileges and immunities, which had been fully acknowledged and fully dealt with. There was no threat to international peace and security that required a formal Council meeting or even Council consideration of the issue. Nor was the incident a potential threat to peace and security. Clear remedies for dealing with it already existed: in normal diplomatic practice, if such an issue could not be resolved bilaterally, then the dean of the local diplomatic corps mediated the incident. He recalled that he had told the members of the Council in informal session that the United States had no intention of deliberately entering a diplomatic residence, let alone one claimed to be occupied by the Ambassador of Nicaragua to Panama. His Government had expressed regret for the incident in a formal note to the Government of Nicaragua and had publicly affirmed its continuing commitment to abide by the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. The Council had been informed of that note and of the follow-up by the United States to the incident in documents⁵⁰ which had been circulated to the members of the Council. The United States regretted the incident, even though Nicaragua had violated Article 41 of the Vienna Convention by using the premises of its embassy as a large weapons cache. The actions that the United States had taken did not then or now pose any threat to international peace and security. There was no valid reason to insist that the Council debate the issue in the first place and, consequently, no reason for the Council to adopt a resolution in response to the Nicaraguan complaint.⁵¹

Speaking before the vote on the draft resolution, the representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation would abstain in the voting because the draft resolution related to an incident that was not appropriate for action by the Council. His country viewed with concern any breach of the inviolability of diplomatic premises; but, in this case, the United States Government had already formally and at the highest level expressed its regret to the Government of Nicaragua. He recalled, moreover, that under Article 52 (2) in Chapter VIII of the Charter, Member States were urged “to make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through ... regional arrangements or by ... regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council”. He noted that that was precisely what had happened with the present incident: the question it raised had been dealt with in a resolution adopted by the appropriate regional agency — OAS — on 8 January 1990. The matter was therefore closed. The United Kingdom saw no reason to re-open it in the Council. The incident did not pose any threat to international peace and security; nor did it provide any basis for a Council resolution under Chapter VI of the Charter.⁵²

The President then put the draft resolution to the vote. It received 13 votes in favour, 1 against (United States) and 1 abstention (United Kingdom), and was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Canada stated that he had voted for the draft resolution because it reaffirmed certain basic and important principles guiding the conduct of international relations. By adopting the draft resolution, the Council would have appropriately added its voice to the voices of other international bodies that had addressed the issue of inviolability of diplomatic missions.⁵³

The representative of Finland said that she had voted in favour of the draft resolution out of respect for the norms of international law. However, her Government wished to register its concern over the submission of the draft resolution to the Council. Finland had difficulty in accepting that the subject matter fell within the competence of the Council, as defined in the Charter of the United Nations since the events described were not of such a character as to present a threat to international peace and security.⁵⁴

14. The situation relating to Afghanistan

Decision of 26 April 1989 (2860th meeting): adjournment

On 15 February 1989, pursuant to resolution 622 (1988) of 31 October 1988, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan (UNGOMAP).¹ Since 15 May 1988, UNGOMAP had been monitoring the implementation of the Agreements on the Settlement of the Situation Relating to Afghanistan, concluded under United Nations auspices, and signed at Geneva on 14 April 1988 by Afghanistan and Pakistan, and by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America as guarantors (the “Geneva Agreements”).² The Secretary-General confirmed the complete withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan in compliance with the Geneva Agreements. He added that it was imperative to move forward to ensure the implementation of all the obligations under the Agreements, whose provisions were to be implemented in an integrated manner. He observed that the external aspects of the situation needed to be fully resolved, in conformity with the Agreements, to enable the Afghan people to decide their own future and to achieve peace and stability in their homeland. He stressed that it was for them to decide upon the next steps, in their efforts towards the establishment of a broad-based government.

Relations, in particular on Non-Interference and Non-Intervention; (ii) Declaration on International Guarantees, signed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States; (iii) Bilateral Agreement between Afghanistan and Pakistan on the Voluntary Return of Refugees; and (iv) Agreement between Afghanistan and Pakistan on the Interrelationships for the Settlement of the Situation relating to Afghanistan.

By a letter dated 3 April 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of Afghanistan transmitted a letter of the same date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan, requesting the convening of an emergency meeting of the Council, in accordance with Articles 34 and 35 (1) of the Charter of the United Nations, in view of the “intensification of aggressions and interferences of Pakistan in the internal affairs of Afghanistan”.

At its 2852nd meeting, on 11 April 1989, the Council included the letter from the representative of Afghanistan in its agenda. The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) also drew the attention of Council members to a letter dated 7 April 1989 from the representative of Pakistan,⁴ transmitting a message from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of his country. The latter questioned the appropriateness of an emergency session of the Security Council. He contended that Articles 34 and 35 (1) of the Charter had no bearing on the situation inside Afghanistan. He described the situation as a purely internal one, in which the Afghan people were resisting the rule of an illegal and unrepresentative regime that had been imposed on them by external military intervention and which was responsible for massive and brutal violations of human rights. He stated that the request of the “Kabul regime” for a Security Council debate was therefore untenable. He also rejected the allegations that Pakistan had conducted military aggression against Afghanistan and interference in its internal affairs.

The Council considered the item at its 2852nd, 2853rd, 2855th to 2857th, 2859th and 2860th meetings, from 11 to 26 April 1989.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 2852nd meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, Pakistan and the Syrian Arab Republic; at the 2853rd meeting, the representatives of Cuba, Democratic Yemen, the German Democratic Republic, Japan, Mongolia, Saudi Arabia and Turkey; at the 2855th meeting, the representatives of India, the Lao People’s Democratic Republic, Madagascar, Nicaragua, the United Republic of Tanzania and Viet Nam; at the 2856th meeting, the representatives of Angola, Bulgaria, the Comoros and Iraq; at the 2857th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, Burkina Faso, the Congo, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Somalia and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; and at the 2859th meeting, the representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. At the 2853rd meeting, the Council also decided, at the request of the representative of Saudi Arabia, to extend an invitation to Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) to the United Nations, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. At the invitation of the President, the representatives of Afghanistan and Pakistan took seats at the Council table.

At the 2852nd meeting, the representative of Afghanistan stated that his Government wished to draw the Council’s attention to the serious threat posed to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Afghanistan by the blatant acts of aggression and interference in its internal affairs committed by Pakistan. The recent intensification of Pakistan’s armed aggression and its overt and covert interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan had acquired ever-wider dimensions, threatening peace, stability and security in south-west Asia. Pakistan’s actions had prompted Afghanistan to turn to the Council under Chapter VI of the Charter, on the peaceful settlement of disputes, and on the basis of the Council’s obligations under Articles 34 and 35. The speaker contended that Pakistan’s aggression and interference in Afghanistan’s internal affairs constituted a violation of various international instruments, including the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.⁵ He claimed that they were also in breach of the principles agreed upon in the Geneva Agreements on the normalization of relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan. He maintained that Pakistan’s acts of aggression and interference had changed “from the imposed undeclared war of the past 10 years into a full-fledged war” against Afghanistan. Those acts included the following: extensive deployment of its armed forces along the eastern and southern borders with Afghanistan, in particular around the city of Jalalabad; the establishment of military training centres in Pakistan for training extremists to carry out destructive activities in Afghanistan; the transfer of arms and ammunition to extremist forces in Afghanistan; the participation of Pakistani militiamen in military operations in Afghanistan; and violations by the Pakistan air force of Afghan airspace. The speaker stated that those violations of the Geneva Agreements had been duly reported to UNGOMAP in some 390 notes, but none of the complaints had yet been investigated. He asked that a list of those notes be circulated as a document of the Council.⁶ He questioned whether any principle of international law allowed States to resort to the use of force and to conduct acts of aggression against the territory of another State in an effort to change that State's system. He claimed, further, that Pakistan's support for the creation by the "Alliance of Seven" of an "interim government" on its territory amounted to an interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and a violation of the Afghan people's right to self-determination. Pakistan evidently planned, he stated, to annex Afghanistan under the guise of forming a confederation.

The representative of Afghanistan added that the current leadership of his country was intent on achieving a peaceful solution to the country's problems, as evidenced by its signing of the Geneva Agreements. It was committed, moreover, to the establishment of a broad-based Government, as called for in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly at its forty-third session.⁷ However, his Government wished to reiterate that only by ensuring the ceasefire and its respect by all other forces concerned would it be possible to hold a free and democratic election with the participation of all political parties. He called for the establishment by UNGOMAP of additional outposts in strategic areas, which could play an important role in reducing tensions, implementing the Geneva Agreements, and promoting a cessation of Pakistan's military aggression and interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. Politically, he called for the convening of an international conference to establish Afghanistan's permanent neutrality and demilitarization. He proposed that the Soviet Union and the United States — as co-guarantors of the Geneva Agreements — and the other members of the Council should participate, adding that the participation of other States would also be welcomed. In conclusion, the speaker stated that, in view of the present grave situation, the continuation of which would result in a serious regional conflict, Afghanistan, in accordance with Articles 33 and 34 of the Charter, requested the Council to take the following actions: (a) to take all urgent measures within its competence under the Charter to stop Pakistani aggression and intervention against Afghanistan; (b) to send a fact-finding mission made up of members of the Security Council to Afghanistan and Pakistan; and (c) to request the Soviet Union and the United States, as co-guarantors of the Geneva Agreements, to play a further active role in persuading Pakistan to meet its obligations under those Agreements.⁸

The representative of Pakistan expressed regret that the Council's time should be taken up by the request for the convening of an emergency session, under cover of Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter. He stated that those articles had no bearing on the situation within Afghanistan. What was happening there was a continuation of the struggle of the Afghan people to overthrow an illegal and unrepresentative regime that had been imposed on them by external military intervention. That struggle was a purely internal matter, which in no way endangered peace and security within the meaning of Article 34. The speaker dismissed the allegations made against his country by the "Kabul representative" as baseless and untenable. He observed that the UNGOMAP teams had found no evidence of Pakistan's alleged massing of troops along its border with Afghanistan, of the alleged training camps, of arms and ammunition being transported from Pakistan to Afghanistan, or of any violation by Pakistan of Afghan airspace or territory. The charge that Pakistani troops were fighting alongside the Mujahideen inside Afghanistan was preposterous; the latter had no need of such assistance. The UNGOMAP reports clearly stated, moreover, that there was no evidence that Pakistan had prevented any refugees from returning to Afghanistan. As for the interim Government of Afghanistan, the speaker stated that it had been elected through a secret ballot by a representative Consultative Shura, an independent body representing a wide spectrum of Afghan opinion. The interim Government included eminent Afghans representing different points of view. Its admission into the Organization of the Islamic Conference showed that it was supported by a very important group of countries. It also showed that the Islamic countries continued to view the “Kabul regime” as illegal and unrepresentative of Afghanistan. The speaker stressed that peace and security in Afghanistan could be restored only if power were transferred from the “illegal Kabul-based regime” to a broad-based government acceptable to the Afghan people as a whole. The establishment of such a government was the exclusive prerogative of the Afghan people themselves. That was acknowledged by the Geneva Agreements and General Assembly resolution 43/20 of 3 November 1988, which, inter alia, mandated the Secretary-General of the United Nations to facilitate the establishment of a broad-based government. The creation of the interim government was a major step towards the achievement of that objective. The speaker recalled that Pakistan’s aim, in requesting the establishment of UNGOMAP, had been to ensure a neutral machinery to investigate complaints regarding the implementation of the Geneva Agreements. The Kabul regime had now chosen to ignore that established mechanism for redress of complaints and had instead approached the Security Council in an attempt to malign Pakistan. Pakistan, for its part, remained ready to continue its cooperation with UNGOMAP and to discuss with the Secretary-General any relevant proposals that would enable the Mission to continue to discharge its responsibilities effectively. The speaker concluded by assuring the members of the Council that Pakistan remained committed to promoting a comprehensive settlement of the Afghanistan issue on the basis of the Geneva Agreements and General Assembly resolutions.⁹

At the 2853rd meeting, on 17 April 1989, Mr. Ansary, Permanent Observer of OIC, stated that while the Islamic Conference welcomed the withdrawal of the Soviet forces from Afghanistan, it was concerned that they had installed an “illegal regime” which did not enjoy the support of the people. The Afghan people continued, therefore, in their struggle to eliminate the last vestiges of foreign occupation. OIC believed that the transfer of power to a broad-based interim government acceptable to the Afghan people was a sine qua non for the restoration of peace in Afghanistan, the creation of conditions conducive to the voluntary return of the Afghan refugees, and the exercise of the right to self-determination by the people of Afghanistan, free from outside intervention or coercion. It had welcomed, therefore, the establishment by the people of Afghanistan of an interim Government, through the convening of a Consultative Shura, in exercise of their right to self-determination. Indeed, it had invited the representatives of that Government to occupy the vacant seat of Afghanistan in the Organization, and now wished to invite other intergovernmental organizations to follow suit. He added that, in the view of OIC, the various aspects of the problem that remained to be solved should be dealt with by the Afghans themselves, since it was an internal matter of that country — especially after the withdrawal of the foreign troops. Any attempt to “internationalize” the question by bringing it before the Security Council would only delay its resolution.¹⁰

The representative of the United States stressed that his Government’s policy towards Afghanistan was designed to uphold the principle that the Afghan people themselves must be allowed to determine their own future, without outside interference or coercion. The conditions must be created for them to be able to carry out a true act of self-determination. The “illegitimate Kabul regime” was impeding that process as it tried to retain its waning grip on Afghanistan. Unfortunately, the present process in the Council appeared to be being used by that same regime as part of such an effort. There was, of course, a proper role for the international community to play. It was to continue to support the Afghan people’s desire to choose their own government, to provide assistance to the refugees to return home in safety and to help rebuild the country once stability and peace were achieved. The speaker noted that there were several United Nations mechanisms in place to deal with the problems created by the conflict. His country fully supported them. However, it would oppose any attempt to use those mechanisms to perpetuate the “illegitimate regime in Kabul” or to impose a political settlement on the Afghan people. He dismissed as “spurious allegations” the charges made against Pakistan, a country that had sacrificed so much to care for millions of Afghan refugees, the world’s largest refugee population. With regard to a ceasefire, his Government believed that that issue could only be decided by the Afghan people themselves. The United States did not believe that the Security Council could or should at this time take a more prominent role in Afghanistan unless the Afghan people themselves and all the Afghan parties actively sought greater Council involvement. Now that the Soviet troops had withdrawn, the Afghan people should be permitted to achieve full self-determination, with the support and assistance of the United Nations.¹¹

Several speakers echoed the views expressed by the representative of Pakistan and the Permanent Observer of OIC. For them, the struggle between the people of Afghanistan and the “Kabul regime” was an internal problem which did not fall within the competence of the Security Council under Articles 34 and 35 (1). They called for recognition of the right of the Afghan people to persist in their determination to stand on their own feet and welcomed the creation of the interim government as a step in that direction. Stressing that the interim government of Afghanistan had been recognized by the Islamic Conference, they urged the Council not to buttress the “Kabul regime”, which did not enjoy the support of the Afghan people and would have to make way sooner or later for a truly representative government.¹²

A number of other speakers also questioned the appropriateness and value of a Council debate on the current situation in Afghanistan.¹³ Some stressed that, with the withdrawal of the Soviet forces from the country, the external aspects of the situation had been addressed; it was now a purely internal matter, which concerned the right of the Afghan people to self-determination. Others observed that the Geneva Agreements provided a mechanism — the United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan — for handling the complaints under consideration; they were not a matter for the Council. They noted, moreover, that the General Assembly, in its resolution 43/20, had asked the Secretary-General to encourage and facilitate an early comprehensive political settlement of the Afghan question, through the establishment of a broad-based government. They encouraged those efforts and urged the parties concerned to do the same with concrete actions, by implementing in earnest the Geneva Agreements.

Several other speakers similarly maintained that the Geneva Agreements and General Assembly resolution 43/20, which were complementary, formed the basis for the settlement of the Afghan issue.¹⁴ They called for strict implementation of the Agreements by all parties. They reaffirmed moreover that a political solution should be based on full respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and non-aligned character of Afghanistan and the right of the Afghan people freely to determine their form of government and to choose their economic, political and social system. They stressed that the Afghan people should engage in a process of dialogue and reconciliation leading to the formation of a broad-based government, with many expressing support for the good offices of the Secretary-General and UNGOMAP.

Other speakers, on the other hand, shared the views expressed by the representative of Afghanistan.¹⁵ They stressed that the situation in Afghanistan was not an internal matter, but a threat to regional peace and security; commended the compliance with the Geneva Agreements by Afghanistan and the Soviet Union, but regretted the lack of compliance by the other parties, particularly Pakistan; favoured a weightier role for the United Nations in the implementation of the Geneva Agreements; and endorsed various proposals made by the representative of Afghanistan — concerning a ceasefire, a strengthening of UNGOMAP by setting up observer posts along the Afghan-Pakistan border and the convening of an international conference under United Nations auspices to discuss questions relating to the neutrality and demilitarization of Afghanistan. Several of those speakers rejected the formation of a “so-called interim government” on foreign territory, which did not represent the Afghan people, and was undemocratic and illegal.

At the 2855th meeting, on 19 April 1989, the representative of the United Kingdom echoed previous speakers in stressing the need for the restoration of peace, which could only be achieved if the Afghans could establish a representative government accepted by the overwhelming majority of the population. The common interest of the international community had been set out in the consensus resolution adopted by the General Assembly in November 1988, calling for the restoration of Afghanistan’s independent and non-aligned status and for the return of refugees in safety; and reaffirming “the right of the Afghan people to determine their own form of government and to choose their economic, political and social system free from outside intervention, subversion, coercion or constraint of any kind whatsoever”. The withdrawal of the Soviet Union from Afghanistan was a welcome step towards the achievement of those aims. The priority now must be for the Afghans themselves to exercise their right to self-determination. The speaker observed that the present regime had failed to win back politically through its national reconciliation policy what it had lost militarily. There was no prospect of its winning over the hearts and minds of the Afghan people or of evolving into a representative government. It had already been rejected by the Afghan people, as evidenced by the decision by over 5 million Afghans to leave their country since the Soviet occupation. With regard to the requests made by the representative of Afghanistan, the speaker stated that the future of UNGOMAP was primarily a matter for the parties to the Geneva Agreements. More active forms of political assistance, such as United Nations-supervised elections, the dispatch of a United Nations peacekeeping force or the holding of an international conference would be appropriate only if they were wanted by a broad majority of Afghans. In conclusion, the speaker remarked that there was no reason why those who had fought for nine years to liberate their country would or should give up a struggle in which they enjoyed the overwhelming support of the Afghan people; the Council would do ill to suggest that they should.¹⁶

The representative of France welcomed the signing of the Geneva Agreements as an important step towards the settlement of the Afghan conflict. However, he stressed that a comprehensive political solution depended on efforts at national reconciliation. In France’s view, such reconciliation would not be possible unless those who, in the eyes of the overwhelming majority of the Afghan people, represented a “painful past” stood aside to allow for the start of a genuine dialogue between all the components of that people. Only such a dialogue would make it possible for all Afghans to exercise their right to self-determination. France stood ready to promote such a dialogue as well as the implementation of an overall solution.¹⁷

The representative of Canada stated that, with the Soviet withdrawal completed, the Afghan people should determine their common future and choose their own form of government without outside interference. Canada supported the early establishment of a representative government in Afghanistan. Only in that way could there be a lasting solution to the conflict. The Afghans themselves must be permitted to establish the conditions that would allow the millions of refugees in Pakistan and the Islamic Republic of Iran to return to their homes and their country to be rebuilt. The Council could not make a meaningful contribution to that process in the absence of a request from the entire Afghan people. What the United Nations could do it was now doing. Canada supported the efforts of the Secretary-General to promote a political solution to the Afghanistan dispute, recognized the important contribution made by UNGOMAP in overseeing the implementation of the Geneva Agreements, and urged the international community to continue its support for the United Nations programme for humanitarian assistance and mine-clearance.¹⁸

On the other hand, the President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and noting that his country was a guarantor of the Geneva Agreements, echoed or endorsed the views expressed by the representative of Afghanistan. He stressed that the Soviet Union strongly supported the recourse by the Government of Afghanistan to the Security Council in connection with the threat to that country's territorial integrity, independence and national sovereignty stemming from Pakistan's escalation of its aggressive activities and intervention in Afghanistan's internal affairs. Afghanistan's recourse to the Council was right, proper and timely. Current events in Afghanistan were by no means the strictly internal affair of the Afghan people, as had been argued by certain speakers. On the contrary, as demonstrated by the evidence adduced by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan, outside activities posed an ever-greater threat to the sovereignty and independence of Afghanistan, creating a threat to the peace and stability of South-West Asia. The Soviet Union's decision to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan had been based on the understanding that outside intervention in Afghan affairs from Pakistani territory would be completely stopped. Indeed, the two obligations were balanced in the Geneva Agreements. The speaker stressed that the obligation of non-interference and non-intervention on the part of Pakistan was not simply contractual; it was a confirmation of universally acknowledged principles of international law enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and in the definition of aggression adopted by the United Nations. In referring therefore to violations by Pakistan of the Geneva Agreements, the Soviet Union was speaking in shorthand; it wished to make clear that these were also violations of the principles of international law and provisions of the Charter. That was what made it so necessary, indeed urgent, for the Council to consider the present item. The speaker detailed a number of alleged violations by Pakistan of the Geneva Agreements, which he contended amounted to aggression against Afghanistan. Because of Pakistani intervention in the internal conflict in Afghanistan, moreover, a new dangerous dimension had been added: military confrontation between Pakistan and Afghanistan. He dismissed the new alternative "government" formed by the Alliance of Seven in Jalalabad: the emergence of such a narrow unrepresentative "government" — whose goal was to seize power in the country — by no means constituted a step towards forming a broad-based coalition government that could bring peace to the Afghan people. On the contrary, it was a step away from that goal.

With regard to the way forward, the representative of the Soviet Union reiterated his country's appeal for a complete ceasefire. He did not preclude the possibility, at a later stage, of dispatching a United Nations peacekeeping force to strategic centres in Afghanistan or of otherwise broadening the stabilizing effect of a United Nations presence there. Meanwhile, he endorsed the proposal for the convening of an international conference on the neutrality and demilitarization of Afghanistan. A first step towards such a conference would be the establishment, under United Nations auspices, of a working group of experts for the exchange of views on an Afghan settlement: the major Afghan groups could participate, together with Afghanistan's direct neighbours and the guarantors of the Geneva Agreements. What the people of Afghanistan desperately needed was not weapons but economic and humanitarian assistance. The Soviet Union regretted, however, that in some quarters the provision of such assistance was being deliberately and openly politicized, thus distorting its humanitarian nature. Noting the important role played by the United Nations military observers, but their small number (only 20) in Pakistan, the speaker called for the effectiveness of UNGOMAP to be enhanced in response to the dangerous development of the situation. In particular, he endorsed the call by the Government of Afghanistan for an increase in the number of observer points on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. He hoped, moreover, that the Secretary-General would continue in his efforts to promote the implementation of the Geneva Agreements, in accordance with the mandate entrusted to him under General Assembly resolution 43/20. Turning to the role of the Security Council, he stressed that it must deal earnestly with this matter, bringing its authority to bear in order to extinguish the military conflagration in Afghanistan. The Soviet Union supported the specific proposals put forward by the Foreign Minister of Afghanistan in his statement. He concluded that it was the duty of the Security Council to make a genuine effort to put an end to foreign intervention and bloodshed in Afghanistan and to work for a ceasefire, the holding of an intra-Afghan dialogue and the creation of a broad-based coalition Government.¹⁹

At the 2857th meeting, on 24 April 1989, the representative of Afghanistan reiterated that the Council's discussion, at his country's request, of the question of Pakistan's aggression and interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan was fully in accord with Articles 34 and 35 (1) of the Charter: Pakistan's actions had been posing a grave threat to regional peace and security. He again detailed the nature of Pakistan's alleged intervention, including its support for the "so-called interim government". He added that Saudi Arabia, too, had played a role, claiming that it had funded participation in the "so-called Consultative Shura" and was backing certain Afghan guerrilla groups — in an effort to increase its influence in the establishment of the future government in Afghanistan. The speaker reaffirmed his Government's readiness to hold a national democratic election throughout the country, provided that a ceasefire was observed by all sides. He concluded by warning that, if the Council failed to adopt measures necessary for defusing the present tense situation and if Pakistani aggression and intervention against Afghanistan continued, his Government would have no choice but to use its legitimate right of self-defence.²⁰

At the 2859th meeting, on 26 April 1989, the representative of Saudi Arabia disputed the allegations made against it by the representative of the "Kabul regime". He added that that regime had no legitimate standing either in Afghanistan or before the Council.²¹

The representative of the United States considered that the debate had been unnecessary and needlessly prolonged. It had not furthered either the cause of peace or self-determination for the Afghan people, both of which goals were widely supported in the Council and closely intertwined. The Afghan people had been denied their right to self-determination during nine years of military occupation and were still being denied it by a regime clinging to power by force of arms against the will of the vast majority of its own people. The international community would continue to insist that they be provided with the opportunity to choose their own government. It should not and would not give its approval to an illegally installed regime. The United States agreed with the many speakers who had pointed out that Afghanistan had been the victim of foreign aggression. However, it wished to set the record straight: Pakistan was not and had never been the aggressor. On the contrary, it had supported and continued to support the terms and objectives of the

Geneva Agreements. Moreover, none of the allegations made by Afghanistan had been verified by the United Nations teams. The speaker hoped that the Council might now move on to more "constructive tasks".²²

The representative of Pakistan reiterated his country's view that the request to hold the current debate lacked validity. There was no threat to regional or international peace and security, as alleged. The complaints lodged by the "Kabul side" against Pakistan had been thoroughly investigated by UNGOMAP and had been found to be baseless. Pakistan rejected them categorically. The speaker claimed that the accusations against his country were designed to divert attention from the real obstacle to a peaceful settlement: namely, the military support by the Soviet Union for the "Kabul regime", which prevented an early and peaceful transfer of power to a broadly acceptable interim government. His Government was accordingly formally requesting the Secretary-General to establish additional UNGOMAP posts in various Afghan towns and airports, to monitor Soviet compliance with the Geneva Agreements. As to the call by some speakers for an immediate ceasefire, since Pakistan was not a party to the internal conflict in Afghanistan, it could not pronounce on a matter entirely within the competence of the Afghan people. The proposal for an international conference on the neutrality and demilitarization of Afghanistan was premature: it was something for a representative and legitimate government to consider, if it so wished, after a comprehensive settlement had been achieved. Similarly, the idea of a United Nations peacekeeping force, which was contingent upon a ceasefire, could be considered only if all the parties concerned agreed. That was not the case at present. The speaker drew the Council members' attention to recent remarks by the Prime Minister of Pakistan concerning the possible spillover of war into Pakistan: he had said that Pakistan had no intention of becoming a party to the Afghan conflict, but that if the "Kabul regime" resorted to committing an act of aggression against Pakistan, the latter would "respond accordingly". The speaker concluded by recalling that, after the first day of the current debate, the President of the Council had suggested that if Pakistan were agreeable the debate could be abandoned in favour of a statement by the President. Although Pakistan had responded positively, the debate had continued, to his delegation's surprise.

It had yielded nothing but further opportunities for indulging in “propaganda” against Pakistan and had effectively foreclosed the option of a statement by the President.²³

At the 2860th meeting, on 26 April 1989, the representative of Afghanistan reiterated that the root cause of the grave situation prevailing in the region lay in Pakistan’s continued interference and intervention in his country’s internal affairs. He stressed that other Islamic countries, including Saudi Arabia, should play a constructive role in bringing the Afghans together, instead of assisting and participating in the Pakistani aggression and intervention. He reaffirmed his Government’s support for an immediate ceasefire to facilitate the beginning of an intra-Afghan dialogue and for an end to the “senseless fratricidal war” to be able to rebuild the country.²⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, said that the Council would have failed to meet its obligations under the Charter if it had not discussed the question of Afghanistan. Pakistan’s aggressive actions and interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan posed a threat to the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of that country, as well as a threat to regional peace and security. Attempts to deny Pakistan’s interference had been unconvincing. Claims that Pakistan’s innocence was attested to by the lack of confirmation of the violations of the Geneva Agreements in the reports of the UNGOMAP observers were absurd: it was well known that the Pakistan authorities had isolated UNGOMAP from the real situation and had shown the observers nothing that might cast aspersions on the conduct of the Government of Pakistan. During the debate, particular emphasis had been placed on the need for all parties fully to carry out their obligations under the Agreements and on the responsibility of the guarantor States to ensure their implementation. What was at stake in the implementation of the Agreements was the authority and interests not only of the countries directly involved in the conflict, but also of the entire international community. For this was a test of the will of States to seek peaceful ways to resolve conflicts. It was also a test of the political will of two permanent members of the Council. The speaker added that, as

President of the Council, he had given serious consideration to the possibility that, after the initial statements of the representatives of Afghanistan and Pakistan, the work of the Council should be steered towards the preparation of a presidential statement on the substance of the problem. In that connection, he had taken into account the views that had been expressed to him by various members of the Council. He had put this proposal to the representatives of Afghanistan and Pakistan. While the representative of Afghanistan had responded positively, his Pakistani counterpart had agreed only that the President of the Council should state to the press that the Council had listened to the statements by the sides and had completed its consideration of the question. The speaker expressed disappointment with the uncooperative attitude of the representative of Pakistan. In conclusion, he appealed once again to the Council to discharge its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and to do its utmost to ensure a prompt settlement of the Afghan problem in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter.²⁵

The representative of Pakistan maintained that his delegation had agreed to the issuance of a presidential statement in lieu of a prolonged debate. He had not expressed a view about the contents of such a statement, on the understanding that that would be subject to negotiation among the members of the Council and the parties concerned. Thereafter, he had heard nothing from the presidency, but had learned to his surprise that the debate had been scheduled to continue.²⁶

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, regretted that the Council would end the debate without adopting any statement.²⁷

The meeting was then adjourned.

Decision of 11 January 1990: resolution 647 (1990)

By a letter dated 9 January 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁸ the Secretary-General recalled that, in his report of 20 October 1989 to the Council,²⁹ he had indicated that more still needed to be done for the implementation of the Geneva Agreements, and had drawn the attention of the parties and the guarantors to the need to ensure strict implementation of their obligations. Having consulted the parties to the Agreements, he therefore proposed to the Council that the temporary detachment of military officers to Afghanistan and Pakistan be extended. He stated that the concurrence of the countries supplying the military personnel had already been secured.

At its 2904th meeting, on 11 January 1990, the Council included the Secretary-General's letter in its agenda.

The President (Côte d'Ivoire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰ He also drew their attention to a note by the Secretary-General dated 15 February 1989,³¹ and to his above-mentioned report of 20 October 1989.

The draft resolution was then voted upon and adopted unanimously as resolution 647 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the letters dated 14 and 22 April 1988 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council concerning the Agreements on the Settlement of the Situation Relating to Afghanistan, signed at Geneva on 14 April 1988,

Recalling also the note by the Secretary-General of 15 February 1989 and his report of 20 October 1989,

Recalling further its resolution 622 (1988) of 31 October 1988,

Taking note of the letter dated 9 January 1990 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council,

1. Confirms its agreement to the measures envisaged in the Secretary-General's letter of 9 January 1990 concerning the arrangements for the temporary deployment in Afghanistan and Pakistan of military officers from existing United Nations operations to assist in the mission of good offices for a further period of two months;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of further developments in accordance with the Agreements on the Settlement of the Situation Relating to Afghanistan, signed at Geneva on 14 April 1988.

Decision of 28 March 1990: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 12 March 1990 addressed to the President of the Council,³² the Secretary-General stated that the arrangements for the temporary deployment in Afghanistan and Pakistan of military officers from existing United Nations operations to assist in the mission of good offices would come to an end on 15 March. He added that his consultations with the signatories to the Geneva Agreements had indicated that another extension of the existing arrangements would "not meet with the necessary consensus". He therefore intended to redeploy a limited number of military officers from existing United Nations operations, by assigning them as military advisers to his Personal Representative in Afghanistan and Pakistan, to assist in the further implementation of a comprehensive political settlement.

By a letter dated 28 March 1990,³³ the President informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had no objection to the action he proposed.

Decision of 16 April 1992: statement by the President

On 10 April 1992, the Secretary-General issued a statement on the situation in Afghanistan,³⁴ in which he announced that an agreement in principle had been reached to have a pre-transitional council of 15 members in Kabul, which would take power immediately. That was the first step of the reconciliation. Secondly, they had agreed to the holding, as soon as possible, of an international conference within the framework of the United Nations.

On 16 April 1992, the Secretary-General made a further statement,³⁵ in which he said that he was deeply disturbed by the news he had received from his Personal Representative in Kabul concerning the developments that had occurred in the night of 15 to 16 April. He expected that the safety of all United Nations personnel would be respected and that they would be allowed freedom of movement in and out of the country as their responsibilities required. He added that there was no alternative to a political solution.

Later on 16 April 1992, following consultations among the Council members, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶

The members of the Security Council strongly endorse the statement on the situation in Afghanistan issued by the Secretary-General on 10 April 1992 and share the Secretary-General's concern about the recent events there expressed in his statement of 16 April 1992. In this regard, it is imperative that all concerned display restraint and support the efforts of the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General for Afghanistan and Pakistan towards a political solution to the Afghanistan crisis, to which there is no viable alternative. Such a solution has been proposed by the Secretary-General with the objective of bringing an end to bloodshed and violence, promoting national reconciliation, and safeguarding the unity and territorial integrity of Afghanistan. Failure to do so could only perpetuate the suffering of the Afghan people. The members of the Council urge all parties in Afghanistan to assure the safety of all, especially United Nations personnel and their complete freedom of movement and the safety of the personnel of all diplomatic missions, as well as the safe departure of those who have chosen to leave.

Decision of 12 August 1992: statement by the President

On 12 August 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:³⁷

The members of the Council express their utmost concern over the wide-scale fighting which has broken out in Kabul and which has already resulted in heavy loss of life and property, including to foreign missions and their personnel.

The members of the Council urge that the Government of Afghanistan take every measure to ensure the safety and security of all diplomatic and international missions, as well as their personnel in Kabul, and call upon all those involved in the hostilities to cease them and establish the necessary conditions for the safe evacuation of foreign personnel.

15. Items relating to the situation in Cambodia

A. Exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council concerning the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to Cambodia

Decision of 3 August 1989: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 2 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the Secretary-General informed the Council members that he had attended the Conference on Peace in Cambodia convened in Paris at the initiative of the Government of France. He said that, at the opening of the Conference on 30 July 1989, he had made a statement expressing the view that peace in Cambodia could only be achieved in the framework of a comprehensive political settlement. In that context, he had noted that the Conference would be discussing the establishment of an international control mechanism, and had stated, inter alia, that: (a) no international control mechanism could function without the full cooperation of the parties concerned nor could one be imposed on them; (b) the establishment of a credible international control mechanism was dependent upon the identification of a clear and realistic mandate, the adoption of an effective decision-making process and the provision of the necessary human, logistical and financial resources, which could be evaluated only by a fact-finding mission; and (c) the international control mechanism could only be deployed in stages, on the understanding that all its functions should be agreed by the parties beforehand. He had given the assurance that, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, he stood ready, in keeping with established procedures, to offer any assistance the Conference might deem useful.

The Secretary-General reported further that the first ministerial session of the Conference had concluded, on 1 August 1989, with the adoption of a number of organizational measures, including a decision to establish four working committees. He noted that the First Committee had been entrusted with defining the modalities of a ceasefire, and the mandate and guiding principles of an international control mechanism which would supervise and control the comprehensive implementation of the settlement. The Secretary-General said that the Conference had decided to accept his proposal to send, without prejudice to the positions of the parties and States participating in the Conference, a fact-finding mission to gather technical information relevant to the work of the First Committee from all areas of Cambodia. Noting that the Conference had called upon the four Cambodian parties and the States concerned to extend to the mission the cooperation and assistance that would enable it to carry out its tasks effectively in conditions of security, the Secretary-General informed the members of the Council that it was his intention to proceed with the arrangements for the dispatch of the mission as soon as possible.

By a letter dated 3 August 1989,² the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council had agreed to the proposal concerning the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to Cambodia, as contained in his letter dated 2 August 1989.

B. The situation in Cambodia

Decision of 20 September 1990 (2941st meeting): resolution 668 (1990)

By a letter dated 30 August 1990,³ the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council transmitted to the Secretary-General the joint statement which, together with the appended framework document, had been adopted in New York on 27 and 28 August 1990 at the sixth meeting of the five members held at the Vice-Ministerial level in 1990 to define the key elements of a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict based on an enhanced United Nations role. In their statement, the five permanent members said that they had reached final agreement on a framework for a settlement composed of five sections: (1) transitional arrangements regarding the administration of Cambodia during the pre-election period; (2) military arrangements during the transitional period; (3) elections under United Nations auspices; (4) human rights protection; and (5) international guarantees. The basic principle behind their approach was “to enable the Cambodian people to determine their own political future through free and fair elections organized and conducted by the United Nations in a neutral political environment with full respect for the national sovereignty of Cambodia”.

By a letter dated 11 September 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ the representatives of France and Indonesia, in their capacity as representatives of the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia, transmitted the joint statement of the informal meeting on Cambodia issued at Jakarta, on 10 September 1990. The joint statement declared that the Cambodian parties had accepted the framework document formulated by the five permanent members as the basis for settling the Cambodia conflict, and had committed themselves to elaborating that framework into a comprehensive political settlement through the processes of the Paris Conference. They had also agreed to form a Supreme National Council, having the nature and functions stipulated in the framework document. Specifically, they had agreed, inter alia, that the Supreme National Council would be the unique legitimate body and source of authority in Cambodia during the transitional period and that it would delegate to the United Nations all powers necessary to implement the comprehensive agreement at the time of its signature.

At its 2941st meeting, held on 20 September 1990, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled “The situation in Cambodia” and considered the question at the same meeting. The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the two above-mentioned letters⁵ and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.⁶ He noted that members had agreed not to hold a debate on the question or make statements before or after the vote. The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 668 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Convinced of the need to find an early, just and lasting peaceful solution of the Cambodia conflict,

Noting that the Paris Conference on Cambodia, which met from 30 July to 30 August 1989, made progress in elaborating a wide variety of elements necessary for reaching a comprehensive political settlement,

10. Encourages the Secretary-General to continue, within the context of preparations for reconvening the Paris Conference and on the basis of the present resolution, preparatory studies to assess the resource implications, timing and other considerations relevant to the United Nations role;

11. Calls upon all States to support the achievement of a comprehensive political settlement as outlined in the above-mentioned framework.

Decision of 14 August 1991: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 8 August 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Council members to recent developments relating to the situation in Cambodia. He noted, inter alia, a number of important decisions taken unanimously by the Supreme National Council: in particular, its agreement to an immediate and unlimited ceasefire, and to undertake to stop receiving outside military assistance; its election of Prince Sihanouk as its President; and its decision to request the United Nations to dispatch a survey team to Cambodia. The Secretary-General reported that he had received a request for a survey mission by a letter dated 16 July 1991 from Prince Sihanouk on behalf of the Supreme National Council. He added that in a communiqué issued on 18 July 1991,⁸ the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia and the five permanent members had, inter alia, reiterated that the withdrawal of foreign military forces, the ceasefire and the cessation of outside military assistance must be effectively verified and supervised by the United Nations. They had also recommended the dispatch of a survey mission, as proposed by the Supreme National Council. The mission would begin the process of preparing for the military aspects of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC), and could consider how the good offices of the Secretary-General could be used to help maintain the ceasefire. The Secretary-General accordingly informed the Council of his intention to proceed with the necessary arrangements for the dispatch of a survey mission to Cambodia as soon as possible.

By a letter dated 14 August 1991,⁹ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that his letter had been brought to the attention of the members of the Council, who agreed with his proposal.

Decision of 16 October 1991 (3014th meeting):
resolution 717 (1991)

On 30 September 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report¹⁰ recommending, in the light of the report of the survey mission, that the Council authorize the establishment of a United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia (UNAMIC). He recalled that he had informed the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia and the permanent members of the Security Council that, initially, the United Nations could assist the Cambodian parties to maintain the present ceasefire by deploying in Cambodia a small advance mission consisting mainly of military liaison officers in order to help them to address and resolve any violations or alleged violations of the ceasefire. Such an advance mission could be envisaged as the first stage of the good offices mechanism foreseen in the draft Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict. This information had been welcomed. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the Council decide to authorize the establishment of UNAMIC under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General under the authority of the Security Council. UNAMIC would consist of civilian liaison staff, military liaison officers, a military mine-awareness unit and the necessary support personnel. The Mission would become operational immediately after the signature of the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict, but would be deployed in phases. Its mandate would extend from the signature of the Agreement until the establishment of UNTAC by the Security Council and the adoption of its budget by the General Assembly. At that time, UNAMIC would be absorbed into UNTAC, and the good offices functions being carried out by UNAMIC would be continued and expanded by UNTAC during the first phase of the ceasefire.

At its 3014th meeting, on 16 October 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (India) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹¹ as well as to three other documents: (a) a letter dated 8 January 1991 from the representatives of France and Indonesia addressed to the Secretary-General,¹² enclosing, inter alia, the final statement issued at the end of a meeting held in Paris from 21 to 23 December 1990 between the two Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia, the 12 members of the Supreme National Council and the representative of the United Nations Secretary-General, and the draft agreements of 26 November on a comprehensive political settlement prepared by the two Co-Chairmen and the permanent members of the Security Council, which had been formally presented to the members of the Supreme National Council at that meeting; (b) a letter dated 23 September 1991 from the President of the Supreme National Council addressed to the Secretary-General,¹³ enclosing the final communiqué of a meeting of the Supreme National Council, held at Pattaya from 26 to 29 August 1991, at which it had unanimously agreed, inter alia, on the request by Prince Sihanouk, Chairman of the Supreme National Council, for United Nations personnel to be sent to Cambodia as "observers" to assist the Supreme National Council in controlling the ceasefire and the cessation of foreign military assistance; and (c) a letter dated 30 September 1991 from the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁴ enclosing the text of the statement issued on 27 September by their Ministers for Foreign Affairs following a meeting with the Secretary-General. The Ministers, inter alia, welcomed the intention to reconvene the Paris Conference for the signature, at the end of October or early in November, of agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodian conflict, which would involve an important role for the United Nations.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 717 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, by which it endorsed the framework for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict of 28 August 1990,

Taking note of the draft agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict,

Welcoming the very significant progress made, on the basis of those draft agreements, towards a comprehensive political settlement which would enable the Cambodian people to exercise its inalienable right to self-determination through free and fair elections organized and conducted by the United Nations,

Welcoming in particular the election of His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk as the Chairman of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, Noting with satisfaction the other decisions taken by the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, concerning in particular the implementation of a voluntary ceasefire and the renunciation of foreign military assistance, and underlining the need for the full cooperation of the Cambodian parties,

Considering that such progress has opened the way to an early reconvening of the Paris Conference on Cambodia at the ministerial level and the signing of the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement based on the framework document of 28 August 1990, and welcoming the preparations being made by the Co-Chairmen of the Conference in that regard,

Convinced that such a comprehensive political settlement can offer at last a peaceful, just and durable solution to the Cambodian conflict,

Taking note of the request by His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk for United Nations personnel to be sent to Cambodia at the earliest possible moment,

Underlining the necessity of a United Nations presence in Cambodia immediately after the signing of the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict, pending the implementation of the arrangements set out in those agreements,

Having considered, to this end, the report of the Secretary-General of 30 September 1991 proposing the establishment of a United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 30 September 1991;

2. Decides to establish, under its authority, a United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia immediately after the signing of the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict and in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General, with members of the Mission to be sent to Cambodia immediately after the signing;

3. Calls upon the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, and the Cambodian parties for their part, to cooperate fully with the Mission and with the preparations for the implementation of the arrangements set out in the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement;

4. Welcomes the proposal of the co-chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia to reconvene the Conference at an early date at the ministerial level to sign the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by 15 November 1991 on the implementation of the present resolution and to keep the Council fully informed of further developments.

Decision of 31 October 1991 (3015th meeting): resolution 718 (1991)

By a letter dated 30 October 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁵ the representatives of France and Indonesia, in their capacity as representatives of the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia, transmitted the texts of the agreements signed in Paris on 23 October 1991 by the States participating in the Conference. These included the following instruments: (a) Final Act of the Conference; (b) Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict, with annexes on the mandate for a United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, military matters, elections, repatriation of Cambodian refugees and displaced persons, and the principles for a new Cambodian constitution; (c) Agreement Concerning the Sovereignty, Independence, Territorial Integrity and Inviolability, Neutrality and National Unity of Cambodia; and (d) Declaration on the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia. Paragraph 10 of the Final Act stated that the three other instruments represented an elaboration of the Framework for a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict adopted by the five permanent members of the Security Council on 28 August 1990 and of elements of the work accomplished at the first session of the Conference. They entailed a continuing process of national reconciliation and an enhanced role for the United Nations, thus enabling the Cambodian people to determine their own political future through free and fair elections organized and conducted by the United Nations in a neutral political environment with full respect for the national sovereignty of Cambodia. As noted in paragraph 11 of the Final Act, they together formed the comprehensive settlement which the Paris Conference had aimed to achieve. Under paragraph 12 of the Final Act, the States participating in the Conference requested the Secretary-General to take the appropriate steps to enable consideration of the comprehensive settlement by the Security Council at the earliest opportunity. Under the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement, the signatories invited the Security Council to establish a United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and to provide it with the mandate set out in the Agreement.

By a note dated 30 October 1991,¹⁶ the Secretary-General, in accordance with the request in paragraph 12 of the Final Act of the Paris Conference, drew the attention of the Security Council to the instruments adopted at the Paris Conference, in order to enable it to consider the comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict at the earliest opportunity.

At its 3015th meeting, on 31 October 1991, the Council included in its agenda the letter from the representatives of France and Indonesia and the note by the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (India) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁷ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 718 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990 and 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991,

Welcoming the meeting in Paris, from 21 to 23 October 1991, of the Paris Conference on Cambodia at the ministerial level, at which the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict were signed,

Having considered the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict, signed in Paris on 23 October 1991,

Noting that those agreements provide, inter alia, for the designation of a special representative of the Secretary-General and the establishment of a United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia,

Noting also that it is the intention of the Secretary-General to send a survey mission to Cambodia as soon as possible to prepare a plan for implementing the mandate envisaged in the agreements, for submission to the Security Council,

Underlining the necessity for the full cooperation of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, and all Cambodians for their part, in the implementation of the agreements,

1. Expresses its full support for the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict, signed in Paris on 23 October 1991;

2. Authorizes the Secretary-General to designate a special representative for Cambodia to act on his behalf;

3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to send a survey mission to Cambodia as soon as possible to prepare a plan for implementing the mandate envisaged in the agreements;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council at the earliest possible date a report containing his implementation plan, including in particular a detailed estimate of the cost of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, on the understanding that this report would be the basis on which the Council would authorize the establishment of the Authority, the budget of which is to be subsequently considered and approved in accordance with the provisions of Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations;

5. Calls upon all Cambodian parties to comply fully with the ceasefire that entered into force at the time of the signature of the agreements;

¹⁷ S/23180.

6. Calls upon the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, and all Cambodians for their part, to cooperate fully with the United Nations in the implementation of the agreements for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict.

Decision of 8 January 1992 (3029th meeting):

On 14 November 1991, pursuant to resolution 717 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia.¹⁸ He informed the Council that, following the signing on 23 October 1991 of the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict, the arrangements for the establishment of UNAMIC had entered into force and the Mission was now operational. Deployment of all civilian and military personnel was expected to be completed on schedule by mid-December 1991.

On 30 December 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on Cambodia,¹⁹ in which, inter alia, he recommended the expansion of the UNAMIC mandate to include training in mine clearance and the initiation of a demining programme. The Secretary-General noted that it was generally recognized that a major mine clearance effort was needed in Cambodia. While the total eradication of mines would necessarily be a long-term endeavour, the initial programme recommended in the report would enable UNAMIC to reduce the threat posed by mines to the civilian population and to prepare the ground for a safe and orderly repatriation of the refugees and displaced persons under United Nations auspices. It would also facilitate the timely deployment of UNTAC and the discharge of its responsibilities throughout Cambodia.

At its 3029th meeting, held on 8 January 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General on Cambodia. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the Secretary-General's report on UNAMIC and to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 728 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991 and 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991,

Welcoming the fact that the United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia has become operational as reported by the Secretary-General in his report of 14 November 1991,

Welcoming also the progress that has been made in implementing the provisions of the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991 relating to the functioning of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia under the chairmanship of His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk and the maintenance of the ceasefire,

Concerned that the existence of mines and minefields in Cambodia poses a serious hazard to the safety of people in Cambodia, as well as an obstacle to the smooth and timely implementation of the agreements, including the early return of Cambodian refugees and displaced persons,

Noting that the Mission's mandate as approved by the Security Council in its resolution 717 (1991) provides, inter alia, for the establishment of a mine-awareness programme, and that the agreements provide for the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia to undertake, inter alia, a programme of assisting with clearing mines and undertaking training programmes in mine clearance and a mine-awareness programme among the Cambodian people,

Considering that the establishment of training programmes in mine clearance, in addition to the existing mine-awareness programme undertaken by the Mission, and the early initiation of mine clearance are required for the effective implementation of the agreements,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on Cambodia of 30 December 1991 and 6 January 1992 proposing that the mandate of the Mission be expanded to include training in mine clearance and the initiation of a mine-clearance programme,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 30 December 1991 and 6 January 1992, especially the provision of assistance in mine clearing by Cambodians;

2. Calls upon the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, and all the Cambodian parties, to continue to cooperate fully with the United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia, including in the discharge of its expanded mandate;

¹⁸ S/23218. For details on the composition and operations of UNAMIC, see chapter V.

²⁰ S/23383.

3. Reiterates its call to all the Cambodian parties to comply scrupulously with the ceasefire and to lend all necessary assistance to the Mission;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of further developments.

Decision of 28 February 1992 (3057th meeting):
resolution 745 (1992)

On 19 February 1992, pursuant to resolution 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report containing his plan for implementing the mandate of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia.²¹ He stated that, in formulating his proposals, he had been guided by information gathered by a number of United Nations survey missions, in particular those that had visited the country at the end of 1991. He cautioned, however, that the information could not be regarded as complete and that the recommendations might need to be re-examined in the light of experience, once UNTAC was in place. He recalled that the mandate envisaged in the Paris Agreements included aspects relating to human rights, the organization and conduct of free and fair elections, military arrangements, civil administration, the maintenance of law and order, the repatriation and resettlement of the Cambodian refugees and displaced persons, and the rehabilitation of essential Cambodian infrastructures during the transitional period.²² The Secretary-General accordingly proposed that UNTAC consist of seven distinct components: human rights, electoral, military, civil administration, police, repatriation and rehabilitation. The level of the activities of the different components would vary during the course of the transitional period and would be coordinated, as necessary, in order to allow for the most efficient and cost-effective use of resources. Noting that the elections were the focal point of the comprehensive settlement, the Secretary-General recommended that they should be scheduled for late April or early May 1993.²³ With regard to the military component of the Mission, he recalled that its main functions would include the following: verification of the withdrawal of foreign forces; supervision of the ceasefire and related measures, including regroupment, cantonment, disarmament and demobilization of the military forces of the Cambodian parties; weapons control; and assistance with mine clearance. Its objectives were to stabilize the security situation and build confidence among the parties to the conflict — objectives whose achievement was a necessary precursor to the successful conduct of the functions of the other components of the Mission. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that full deployment of the military component be accomplished by the end of May 1992. He also proposed that the regroupment and cantonment processes, as well as the demobilization of at least 70 per cent of the cantoned forces, should be completed by the end of September 1992. In this respect, he strongly urged the Cambodian parties to agree to the complete demobilization of their military forces prior to the end of the election registration process and called on the Security Council to join him in so doing. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stressed that four essential conditions had to be met if UNTAC were to be able to discharge its responsibilities effectively and with complete impartiality: (a) it must at all times have the full support of the Security Council; (b) it must operate with the full cooperation, at all times, of the Cambodian parties and all other parties concerned; (c) it must enjoy full freedom of movement and communications; and (d) the necessary financial resources must be provided by Member States in full and in a timely manner.

At its 3057th meeting, held on 28 February 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 745 (1992), which reads:

²² The transitional period was defined as the period beginning with the entry into force of the Paris Agreements (on 23 October 1991) and terminating when the constituent assembly elected in conformity with the Agreements had approved the new Cambodian Constitution and transformed itself into a legislative assembly, and thereafter a new Cambodian Government had been created.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991, 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991 and 728 (1992) of 8 January 1992,

Reaffirming also its full support for the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement to the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on Cambodia of 19 and 26 February 1992 submitted pursuant to resolution 718 (1991),

Desiring to contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace in Cambodia, to the promotion of national reconciliation, to the protection of human rights and to the assurance of the right to self-determination of the Cambodian people through free and fair elections,

Convinced that free and fair elections are essential to produce a just and durable settlement to the Cambodia conflict, thereby contributing to regional and international peace and security,

Mindful of Cambodia's recent tragic history and determined that the policies and practices of the past will not be repeated,

Expressing appreciation for the work of the United Nations Advance Mission in Cambodia in the maintenance of the ceasefire, in mine awareness and mine clearance, and in preparation for the deployment of a United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia,

Noting with appreciation the efforts of His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk and the Supreme National Council of Cambodia under his chairmanship in regard to the implementation of the provisions of the agreements,

Welcoming the appointment by the Secretary-General of a Special Representative for Cambodia to act on his behalf,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 19 and 26 February 1992 containing his plan, which is subject to re-examination in the light of experience, for implementing the mandate envisaged in the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement to the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991;

2. Decides that the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia shall be established under its authority in accordance with the above-mentioned report for a period not to exceed eighteen months;

3. Decides that it is vital that elections be held in Cambodia by May 1993 at the latest as recommended by the Secretary-General in paragraph 38 of his report;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to deploy the Authority as rapidly as possible to implement the above decision, urges that both the deployment and the further implementation of his plan be done in the most efficient and cost-effective way possible, and invites him to that end to keep the operation under continuous review, bearing in mind the fundamental objectives of the agreements;

5. Calls upon the Supreme National Council of Cambodia to fulfil its special responsibilities set out in the agreements;

6. Also calls upon all parties concerned to comply scrupulously with the terms of the agreements, to cooperate fully with the Authority in the implementation of its mandate, and to take all necessary measures to ensure the safety and security of all United Nations personnel;

7. Further calls upon the Supreme National Council of Cambodia and all Cambodians on behalf of the host country to provide all necessary assistance and facilities to the Authority;

8. Strongly urges the Cambodian parties to agree to the complete demobilization of their military forces prior to the end of the process of registration for the elections as well as to the destruction of the weapons and ammunition deposited into the Authority's custody in excess of those, if any, which may be deemed necessary by the Authority for the maintenance of civil order and national defence, or which may be required by the new Cambodian Government;

9. Appeals to all States to provide all voluntary assistance and support necessary to the United Nations and its programmes and specialized agencies for the preparations and operations to implement the agreements, including for rehabilitation and for the repatriation of refugees and displaced persons;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by 1 June 1992 and subsequently to report to the Council in September 1992, January 1993 and April 1993 on progress to date in the implementation of the present resolution and on tasks still to be performed in the operation, with particular regard to the most effective and efficient use of resources;

11. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, the Secretary-General stated that the implementation plan might appear ambitious and its cost rather worrying; however it merely translated into operational terms the many-faceted and, in some ways, unprecedented mandate conceived by the authors of the Paris Agreements and unanimously endorsed by both the Security Council and the General Assembly. He assured members of the Council that everything would be done to hold to the proposed timetable for the rapid deployment of UNTAC and the holding of elections in the latter part of April or early May 1993. The operation gave the United Nations a historic opportunity to restore peace to Cambodia and to contribute to the advent of a new era in South-East Asia and in international relations.²⁵

The representative of France noted that the Paris Agreements had given the United Nations a major and unprecedented role. For the first time, the Organization had been at once entrusted with organizing and carrying out the election of a constituent assembly, monitoring military aspects of a settlement, ensuring repatriation of refugees and displaced persons, promoting human rights and initiating reconstruction of a country. In adopting resolution 745 (1992), the Security Council had officially decided to create UNTAC to carry out that mandate. It had thereby initiated “the most important and complete operation ever undertaken by the United Nations in the maintenance of peace”. The speaker drew attention to paragraph 4 of the resolution, requesting the Secretary-General to deploy UNTAC as rapidly as possible. Any delay would be very harmful. It was vital that elections be held by May 1993 at the latest. He also emphasized two of the conditions which the Secretary-General had said must be met for the operation to succeed. First, UNTAC must have the full cooperation of all the parties concerned — above all, of the Cambodians as a whole. That was indispensable for the security of the members of UNTAC and for the success of the United Nations operation. Secondly, UNTAC should be given adequate financial resources. Recognizing that the needs would be great and that Member States would face difficulties in providing resources on that scale at a time when peacekeeping operations were multiplying, the French delegation put particular emphasis on the need to achieve the best possible cost-effectiveness.²⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed UNTAC as one of the keys to the successful implementation of the Paris Agreements. He described its task as “the most ambitious” the United Nations had ever undertaken, its goal being to permit the Cambodian people to exercise their right to self-determination and to elect, freely and in peace, a democratic government. Peace in Cambodia would benefit not only the Cambodians but also the peoples of Indochina and of South-East Asia generally. He stressed that the other key to success was the leadership and cooperation of the Cambodian people and their leaders: no external force could on its own bring peace, prosperity and democracy to Cambodia. In that context, the leadership already being given by Prince Sihanouk was of fundamental importance. He also welcomed the Secretary-General’s reiteration in his statement of the need to adhere to the target date of April or May 1993 for the holding of elections in Cambodia, supported his view that full demobilization of military forces before the elections would be greatly preferable to the 70 per cent demobilization to which the parties were already committed, and endorsed the four conditions he had set out for the success of UNTAC. He concluded by observing that all Members of the United Nations had an interest in ensuring that this largest-ever United Nations operation was carried out not only successfully but also cost-effectively.²⁷

The representative of China stated that the Council, as the primary organ for the maintenance of world peace and security, must ensure strict observance of the Paris Agreements by the various Cambodian parties and the countries concerned and support the efforts for national reconciliation made by the Supreme National Council. He hoped that, with the adoption of the resolution, UNTAC would be deployed in Cambodia as soon as possible, and that the international community would see an early return in its midst of an independent, peaceful, neutral and non-aligned Cambodia. That would contribute to peace and stability in South-East Asia and in the world as a whole. Noting that many countries had expressed deep concern over the rapid increase of United Nations expenditure on peacekeeping operations, he underlined the need for UNTAC to fulfil its tasks in the most economical and effective way. He also expressed the hope that in the implementation of the resolution the Secretariat would maintain close consultations with the permanent members of the Council and all countries concerned.²⁸

The representative of the Russian Federation observed that the decision to establish UNTAC marked the beginning of one of the largest peacekeeping operations in the history of the Organization. He fully shared the Secretary-General’s view that the success of the operation would depend primarily on the degree of cooperation by the Cambodian parties, and stressed the importance of strict compliance with the spirit and letter of the Paris Agreements by all the parties involved. He believed that the Cambodian parties would abide by their commitments and respond to the appeal of the Secretary-General and the Security Council for the full demobilization of their armed forces. Like previous speakers, he stressed the need to carry out the operations of UNTAC in the most effective and economical manner. The provisions of the resolution concerning the Secretary-General's periodic reports to the Council and review of the UNTAC plan in the light of experience were aimed at achieving that goal. He underlined the importance of the speedy deployment of UNTAC to focus on holding elections in Cambodia no later than May 1993, as called for by the resolution. He expressed his country's conviction that, with the Council's support, the operation in Cambodia would provide further proof that the United Nations was a unique instrument for the maintenance of international peace and that, with its assistance, even long-standing conflicts could be settled on the basis of national reconciliation and responsibility by all parties concerned, and by ensuring that the will of the people was expressed through free, democratic elections.²⁹

The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United States, welcomed the establishment of UNTAC as a landmark in the arduous efforts over many years to secure a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodian conflict. He hoped that the deployment of UNTAC would proceed rapidly in order to preserve the settlement and to ensure that the operation would achieve the administration of free and fair elections within the timeframe indicated in the Secretary-General's report. He stressed the importance to the political settlement, as well as to the implementation of the United Nations plan, of the spirit of cooperation among the Cambodians, made possible by the leadership of Prince Sihanouk. The generous support and constant attention of the international community would also be required to fulfil the objectives of the settlement. He welcomed the Secretary-General's intention to continually review and refine the operation of UNTAC in the light of actual experience and new information, with a view to achieving maximum effectiveness and the most efficient use of resources. He concluded by observing that his country had watched with satisfaction the increasing development of global cooperation, which in turn had given rise to expectations that the United Nations would at last assume responsibilities commensurate with the vision of its founders. Nowhere was the full scope and impact of that vision more evident than in the mandate just approved for a United Nations presence in Cambodia — an enterprise of extraordinary size, scope and expense. The Organization's experience in Cambodia would probably help to shape for years to come perceptions of the United Nations as an effective instrument for addressing regional conflict and of the viability of its principle of collective security.³⁰

The other speakers also expressed their satisfaction at the envisaged implementation of the Cambodian settlement on the basis of the Paris Agreements of October 1991 and the establishment of UNTAC.³¹ They emphasized the need for all Cambodian parties to cooperate with UNTAC in the plan's implementation. Several speakers urged that the Mission be as cost-effective and economical as possible.³²

Decision of 12 June 1992 (3085th meeting):
statement by the President

On 1 May 1992, pursuant to resolution 745 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a first progress report on UNTAC,³³ in which he stated that the mission had made a "generally good start". His Special Representative for Cambodia had arrived in the country on 15 March 1992, marking the initial deployment of UNTAC, which had thereupon absorbed UNAMIC. Work on all aspects of the mission's activities was proceeding at varying rates and some successes had been recorded by each component. Every effort was being made to discharge the complex tasks of UNTAC within the timeframes envisaged in the implementation plan.

On 12 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a special report on UNTAC.³⁴

He noted that the Commander of the military component of the mission had announced — following consultation with, and assurances from, the four Cambodian parties — that phase I of the ceasefire, in effect since the signing of the Paris Agreements, would be followed on 13 June by phase II (the cantonment, disarming and demobilization phase). However, following that announcement, it had become clear that one party, the Party of Democratic Kampuchea (PDK), was not cooperating. It was not taking the steps necessary to enable it to honour the assurances it had given. It had failed to provide information on its troops, arms, ammunition and equipment to be cantoned; denied full access and freedom of movement to UNTAC; and failed to mark minefields in areas under its control and re-mined some areas. In addition, UNTAC believed that it had been responsible for many ceasefire violations. The question had thus arisen whether the scheduled date for implementation of phase II of the ceasefire should be maintained, given that it depended critically on the cooperation of all the parties. After careful consideration, the Secretary-General had concluded that, despite the lack of cooperation by PDK, phase II should commence on 13 June as scheduled, since any significant delay in the implementation of the military aspects of the plan would result in a loss of momentum and would jeopardize the ability of UNTAC to organize and conduct the elections by April or May 1993. He emphasized, however, that this could only be a short-term solution and that all efforts should be made to persuade PDK to join the other parties in implementing the comprehensive political settlement. He suggested that the Security Council itself might wish to consider what action it could take to achieve that objective.

At its 3085th meeting, held on 12 June 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the special report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Belgium) said that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁵

Having read the special report of the Secretary-General of 12 June 1992 on the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, the Security Council is deeply concerned by the difficulties that the Authority is encountering in the implementation of the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991, on the eve of moving to phase II of the ceasefire. In particular, the Council notes that, during the meeting of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia on 10 June 1992, one party was not able to allow the necessary deployment of the Authority in areas under its control. The Council believes that any delay could jeopardize the whole peace process to which all Cambodian parties have agreed under the auspices of the United Nations and the Paris Conference on Cambodia.

The Council reaffirms the importance of the full and timely implementation of the Paris agreements. The Council commends the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Cambodia and the Authority in this regard. It reaffirms that the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, under the chairmanship of Prince Norodom Sihanouk, is the sole legitimate body and source of authority in which, throughout the transitional period, the sovereignty, independence and unity of Cambodia are enshrined. In this regard, section III of part I of the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict should be implemented as soon as possible.

The Council stresses the need that phase II of the military arrangements should begin on 13 June 1992, as determined in accordance with the Paris agreements. In this connection, the Council urges the Secretary-General to accelerate the deployment to Cambodia and within the country of the full Authority peacekeeping force.

The Council calls upon all parties to comply strictly with the commitments they have accepted, including cooperation with the Authority. It specifically calls upon all parties to respond affirmatively to the latest demands for cooperation in implementation of the Paris agreements put to them by the Authority.

Decision of 21 July 1992 (3099th meeting):
resolution 766 (1992)

On 14 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a second special report, on the difficulties UNTAC was facing in implementing the Paris Agreements.³⁶ He stated that phase II of the ceasefire had begun, as planned, on 13 June 1992. Three of the parties had shown themselves willing to participate in the regroupment and cantonment process, but the Party of Democratic Kampuchea continued to refuse to canton any of its forces. PDK had also failed to take a number of other measures required for the implementation of the Paris Agreements, including granting free access to UNTAC, marking minefields in the zones controlled by them, and refraining from further violations of the ceasefire. To address the concerns of PDK, an informal “proposal for discussion” had been put forward by the participants at the Ministerial Conference on the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia, held in Tokyo on 22 June 1992. Moreover, a number of steps had been taken by UNTAC. The Secretary-General’s Special Representative had met with the PDK leaders on several occasions. However, the party had failed to respond to those initiatives. As a result, the ability of UNTAC to adhere to the timetable set by the Security Council had been seriously compromised. In those circumstances, the Secretary-General saw two possible courses of action: to suspend the operation until all parties could be persuaded to fulfil their obligations under the Paris Agreements; or to pursue the process, thus demonstrating the international community’s determination to assist the Cambodian people in their quest for peace and stability, despite the lack of cooperation of one party. Convinced that the latter approach was the most appropriate, he had requested his Special Representative to press forward with the regrouping and cantonment process wherever possible, albeit cautiously and selectively, taking great care to maintain security in the countryside and concentrating on areas where there was no military confrontation. The Secretary-General warned, however, that the process could not continue indefinitely with the cooperation of only three of the parties. He concluded by noting the need to address the following main questions: how to persuade PDK to comply with its obligations under the Paris Agreements; how to emphasize the determination of the international community to implement the Agreements, in accordance with the timetable set forth in the implementation plan; and how to obtain the full and active support of the signatories to the Paris Agreements for UNTAC efforts to carry out its mandate.

At its 3099th meeting, held on 21 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the second special report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the text of a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations,³⁷ as

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France condemned the obstructive attitude of PDK, which endangered not only phase II of the ceasefire but also the overall political settlement of the Cambodian conflict. He recalled that that settlement had developed through a process which had taken into account the views of all the parties, resulting in a final compromise in the form of the Paris Agreements. In signing the Agreements, all the parties had committed themselves to applying them without reservation. No party could arrogate to itself the right to interrupt their implementation midway through. Difficulties in addressing well-founded grievances of any of the parties could be overcome through dialogue between the Supreme National Council and UNTAC. The Security Council had before it a firm and well-balanced draft resolution which clearly expressed the Council’s condemnation of the obstructive attitude of PDK. The speaker hoped that the Council would adopt it unanimously, and that the message it conveyed would be promptly heard. If that did not prove the case, France believed that the Council should once again be seized of the issue by the Secretary-General and should take the measures necessary to proceed with the implementation of the Paris Agreements.³⁹

The representative of China stressed that all the signatory parties to the Paris Agreements had an obligation to carry out their provisions strictly and in a comprehensive and balanced manner. In the course of implementing those Agreements, differences of opinion were inevitable and should be properly resolved by the Supreme National Council and UNTAC through consultations and dialogue.⁴⁰

The representative of the United States said that his country would vote in favour of the draft resolution, as it continued to be gravely concerned over the failure of PDK to meet its obligations under the Paris Agreements. He underlined the importance of efforts, particularly by countries in the region, to persuade PDK to move promptly into phase II. The party’s leaders had nothing to gain — and much to lose — by continuing to obstruct the peace process.

⁴⁰ Ibid., pp. 7-8.

The international community could not wait for them indefinitely and should be prepared to implement the Paris Agreements with or without them. As noted in the draft resolution, development assistance for Cambodia would benefit only those parties cooperating with UNTAC. Free and fair elections among parties committed to the entire process would be held on schedule and all necessary steps would be taken to ensure the viability of a new national government.⁴¹

The representative of the United Kingdom hoped that the process begun by UNTAC, of assuming control of the administrative structures in Cambodia to ensure a neutral political environment conducive to free and fair elections, could be accelerated — as called for by the draft resolution — and that this process would persuade PDK to apply the totality of the Paris Agreements. He called on the international community to ensure the successful implementation of the comprehensive political settlement and, in particular, urged those States bordering on Cambodia to fulfil their obligations under the Agreements. He pointed out that no party which obstructed the peace process could reasonably expect to benefit from the flow of international funds pledged for the rehabilitation of Cambodia. In conclusion, he stated that UNTAC must maintain its efforts to ensure that the settlement plan was implemented and, above all, that free and fair elections were held as planned, in April or May 1993.⁴²

The representative of the Russian Federation insisted that the UNTAC operation, being carried out in the interests of the entire Cambodian people, should continue to be implemented strictly within the context of the Paris Agreements. Any problems or concerns that might arise for any of the parties involved should also be dealt with in accordance with the established plan and the Paris Agreements, by further strengthening cooperation between the Supreme National Council and UNTAC. The draft resolution rightly confirmed that there was no alternative to a political settlement and national reconciliation on the basis of those Agreements, and that the Council was fully resolved to seeing the operation through and to pursuing the task of holding elections no later than May 1993. None of the Cambodian parties was entitled to block the peace process. The Russian Federation, accordingly, supported the Secretary-General's expressed intention of continuing to carry out the operation, in conjunction with persistent efforts to persuade PDK to join the second phase of the ceasefire and to cooperate with UNTAC and the other three parties.⁴³

The other speakers expressed concern at the uncooperative attitude of one party; called on all parties to fulfil their obligations under the Paris Agreements and to cooperate with UNTAC in carrying out its mandate; and supported the Secretary-General's expressed intention to pursue the implementation process despite the difficulties.⁴⁴

The President then put the draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, to the vote. It was adopted unanimously as resolution 766 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991, 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991, 728 (1992) of 8 January 1992, and 745 (1992) of 28 February 1992,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 12 June 1992,

Recalling also that any difficulty arising in the implementation of the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991 should be settled through close consultation between the Supreme National Council of Cambodia and the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and must not be allowed to undermine the principles of these agreements, or to delay the timetable for their implementation,

Taking note of the second special report of the Secretary-General of 14 July 1992 on the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, and in particular of the fact that the Cambodian People's Party, the Front uni national pour un Cambodge indépendant, neutre, pacifique et coopératif and the Khmer People's National Liberation Front have agreed to proceed with phase II of the ceasefire as laid down in annex 2 of the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict and that the Party of Democratic Kampuchea has so far refused to do so,

Taking note also of the Tokyo Declaration on the Cambodia Peace Process issued on 22 June 1992, and the other efforts made at Tokyo by the countries and parties concerned for the implementation of the Paris agreements,

1. Expresses its deep concern at the difficulties met by the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia in the implementation of the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991;

2. Underlines that all signatories of the Paris agreements are bound by all their obligations thereunder;

8. Urges all States, in particular neighbouring States, to provide assistance to the Authority to ensure the effective implementation of the Paris agreements;

9. Approves the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Cambodia to continue to implement the Paris agreements despite the difficulties;

10. Invites in particular the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to accelerate the deployment of the Authority's civilian components, especially the component mandated to supervise or control the existing administrative structures;

11. Demands that the party that has failed so far to do so permit without delay the deployment of the Authority in the areas under its control, and implement fully phase II of the plan as well as the other aspects of the Paris agreements;

12. Requests the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to ensure that international assistance to the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Cambodia from now on benefits only the parties which are fulfilling their obligations under the Paris agreements and cooperating fully with the Authority;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 13 October 1992 (3124th meeting):
resolution 783 (1992)

On 21 September 1992, pursuant to resolution 745 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council his second progress report on UNTAC.⁴⁵ He reported that UNTAC was now close to full deployment throughout most of the territory of Cambodia, and that the mission had made substantial strides towards its goals in the six months since its inception despite constraints imposed by the continued refusal of PDK to participate fully in the peace process. He therefore remained determined that the electoral process should be carried out in accordance with the timetable laid down in the implementation plan.⁴⁶ The Secretary-General considered that an increase in the number of checkpoints within the country and along its borders with neighbouring countries might be necessary for the purpose of verifying the withdrawal of foreign forces and the cessation of outside military assistance to the Cambodian parties, in accordance with the Paris Agreements.⁴⁷ He stressed, however, that the persistent failure of PDK to meet its obligations under the Agreements continued to obstruct their full implementation and he suggested that the Council might wish to take further action to impress upon the parties the international community's firm determination to press ahead with the implementation of the settlement. He also indicated his intention,⁴⁸ subject to the Council's approval, to request the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference to undertake, within a definite time frame, consultations under article 29 of the Paris Agreements, with the aim of finding a way out of the impasse or, if that should prove impossible, exploring appropriate steps to ensure the realization of the fundamental objectives of the Paris Agreements.

At its 3124th meeting, held on 13 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the second progress report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations.⁴⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 783 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991, 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991, 728 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 745 (1992) of 28 February 1992 and 766 (1992) of 21 July 1992,

Recalling the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 12 June 1992,

Recalling also the Tokyo Declaration on the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia, issued on 22 June 1992,

Paying a tribute to His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk, President of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, for his efforts to restore peace and national unity in Cambodia,

Taking note of the cooperation extended to the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, by the Party of the State of Cambodia, the Front uni national pour un Cambodge indépendant, neutre, pacifique et coopératif and the Khmer People's National Liberation Front, and of the fact that the Party of Democratic Kampuchea still fails to meet obligations it assumed when it signed the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991, as reflected in the second progress report of the Secretary-General dated 21 September 1992,

Reaffirming that the Authority must have full and unrestricted access to the areas controlled by each of the parties,

Welcoming with appreciation the achievements of the Authority in the implementation of the Paris agreements, concerning, inter alia, military deployment throughout almost the whole country, the promulgation of the electoral law, the provisional registration of political parties, the beginning of voter registration, safe repatriation of over one hundred and fifty thousand refugees, progress in rehabilitation programmes and projects and the campaign in favour of respect for human rights,

Welcoming the accession of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia to a number of international human rights conventions,

Welcoming also the progress made by the Authority in strengthening supervision and control over administrative structures as set out in the Paris agreements, and recognizing the importance of this part of its mandate,

4. Expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Cambodia for their efforts as well as to Member States which have cooperated with the Authority in order to solve the difficulties it has met and urges all States, in particular neighbouring States, to provide assistance to the Authority to ensure the effective implementation of the Paris agreements;

5. Deplores the fact that the Party of Democratic Kampuchea, ignoring the requests and demands contained in its resolution 766 (1992), has not yet complied with its obligations;

6. Demands that the party mentioned in paragraph 5 above fulfil immediately its obligations under the Paris agreements; that it facilitate without delay full deployment of the Authority in the areas under its control; and that it implement fully phase II of the plan, particularly cantonment and demobilization, as well as all other aspects of the Paris agreements, taking into account that all parties in Cambodia have the same obligations to implement the agreements;

7. Demands full respect for the ceasefire, calls upon all parties in Cambodia to cooperate fully with the Authority to identify minefields and to refrain from any activity aimed at enlarging the territory under their control, and further demands that these parties facilitate Authority investigations of reports of foreign forces, foreign assistance and ceasefire violations within the territory under their control;

10. Encourages the Secretary-General and his Special Representative to make use fully of all possibilities offered by the Authority's mandate, including annex 1, section B, paragraph 5 (b), of the Paris agreements to enhance the effectiveness of existing civil police in resolving the growing problems relating to the maintenance of law and order in Cambodia;

11. Invites States and international financial institutions to make available as soon as possible the contributions they had already announced during the Ministerial Conference on the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia, held at Tokyo on 20 and 22 June 1992, giving priority to those which produce quick impact;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council as soon as possible, and no later than 15 November 1992, on the implementation of the present resolution and, if the current difficulties have not been overcome, undertakes to consider what further steps are necessary and appropriate to ensure the realization of the fundamental objectives of the Paris agreements;

15. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 30 November 1992 (3143rd meeting): resolution 792 (1992)

On 15 November 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his report on the implementation of resolution 783 (1992) of 13 October 1992.⁵⁰ He regretted that the efforts undertaken successively by Japan and Thailand and by the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference had not convinced PDK to fulfil its obligations under the Paris Agreements. He reported that the difficulties encountered in implementing phase II of the ceasefire had led to the effective suspension of the cantonment, disarmament and demobilization process, but that UNTAC had continued to make steady progress in the discharge of the other aspects of its mandate. The Secretary-General remained concerned, however, about the military situation in the country: ceasefire violations had increased as had attacks on UNTAC personnel and helicopters. He shared the Co-Chairmen's assessment that the holding of a presidential election would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and help to reinforce the climate of stability. He had therefore asked his Special Representative to make contingency plans for the organization and conduct of such an election by UNTAC — on the understanding that it would require the authorization of the Security Council and the provision of additional resources. The Secretary-General noted that the situation presented the Council with two difficult decisions. The first concerned what further action should be taken to persuade PDK to comply with its obligations under the Paris Agreements. At that stage, he did not recommend the adoption of specific measures to get PDK to honour its commitments and continued to believe in patient diplomacy. The second decision concerned whether to press on with implementation of as much as possible of the Paris Agreements, within the agreed timetable which called for elections by May 1993, notwithstanding the non-cooperation of PDK. After considering the alternatives, the Secretary-General concurred with the Co-Chairmen that the implementation of the peace process should continue and that the timetable for elections should be maintained. He underlined, however, the implications of a continued lack of cooperation by PDK: the elections would be held while a substantial part of the armed forces of the Cambodian parties remained mobilized and the people living in PDK-controlled areas were likely to be deprived of the opportunity to exercise their right to register and vote. He reported that, given the suspension of the cantonment and demobilization process, he had approved his Special Representative's recommendation that UNTAC should adjust the deployment of its military component, with a view to fostering a general sense of security among the Cambodian people and enhancing its ability to protect the voter registration and polling process, particularly in remote or insecure areas. He therefore proposed that the present level of deployment be maintained until the elections. In conclusion, the Secretary-General expressed the hope that the Council would consider the adoption of measures that would facilitate the UNTAC mission and impress upon the parties concerned the firm determination of the international community to ensure the realization of the fundamental objectives of the Paris Agreements.

At its 3143rd meeting, held on 30 November 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Hungary) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Japan, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁵¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China affirmed his Government's consistent position that problems encountered in implementing the Paris Agreements should be settled with determination and patience through dialogue and consultation. Explaining his country's intended abstention, he said that, while agreeing with some of the elements contained in the draft resolution, his delegation considered that those relating to sanctions and to an election in which only three parties would take part were at variance with the Paris Agreements. It was not in favour of sanctions which would further increase differences and could lead to new, complicated problems in the Cambodian situation. Moreover, in accordance with the Paris Agreements, the sovereignty of the neighbouring States which might be affected by such measures should be respected and their opinions heeded. China was also deeply anxious about the possible adverse consequences that could result from a three-party election.⁵²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour, none against, and 1 abstention (China), as resolution 792 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, 717 (1991) of 16 October 1991, 718 (1991) of 31 October 1991, 728 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 745 (1992) of 28 February 1992, 766 (1992) of 21 July 1992 and 783 (1992) of 13 October 1992,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General dated 15 November 1992 on the implementation of resolution 783 (1992),

Paying a tribute to His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk, President of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia, for his continuing efforts to restore peace and national unity in Cambodia,

Reaffirming its commitment to implement the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed at Paris on 23 October 1991 and its determination to maintain the implementation timetable of the peace process, leading to elections for a constituent assembly in April/May 1993, the adoption of a constitution and the formation of a new Cambodian government thereafter,

Recognizing the need for all Cambodian parties, the States concerned and the Secretary-General to maintain close dialogue in order to implement the peace process effectively,

Recalling that all Cambodians have, in accordance with article 12 of the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict, the right to determine their own political future through the free and fair election of a constituent assembly and that political parties wishing to participate in the election can be formed in accordance with paragraph 5 of annex 3 to the Agreement,

Noting the discussion during the consultations held in Beijing on 7 and 8 November 1992 by the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia regarding a presidential election, and the views of the Co-Chairmen shared by the Secretary-General that such an election could contribute to the process of national reconciliation and help to reinforce the climate of stability in Cambodia,

Welcoming the achievements of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General and of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia in the implementation of the Paris agreements, ⁵¹ S/24865.

⁵² S/PV.3143, p. 4.

Welcoming in particular the progress made in voter registration,

Welcoming also the efforts of the Authority to strengthen its relationship with the Supreme National Council of Cambodia and its supervision and control over the existing administrative structures, inter alia, to ensure the widest possible agreement on essential regulations for elections, natural resources, rehabilitation, national heritage and human rights, on relations with the international financial institutions, and on the question of foreign residents and immigrants,

Noting the efforts of the Authority to address the concerns raised by the Party of Democratic Kampuchea, including steps to verify the withdrawal of all foreign forces, advisers and military personnel from Cambodia, close cooperation between the Authority and the Supreme National Council as the embodiment of Cambodian sovereignty, the creation of technical advisory committees to advise the Supreme National Council and the Authority, the extension of Authority supervision and control over the five key administrative areas mandated in the Paris agreements in the areas to which the Authority has access, and the creation of working groups in these areas to enable the parties to be involved in and informed about the Authority's activities in these five key areas,

Expressing its appreciation to Japan and Thailand for their efforts to find solutions to current problems relating to the implementation of the Paris agreements,

Expressing also its appreciation for the efforts of the Co-Chairmen of the Paris Conference on Cambodia, in consultation with all parties, pursuant to resolution 783 (1992) to find a way to implement fully the Paris agreements,

Deploring the failure of the Party of Democratic Kampuchea to meet its obligations under the Paris agreements, notably as regards unrestricted access by the Authority to the areas under the control of the Party of Democratic Kampuchea for voter registration and other purposes of the agreements and as regards the application of phase II of the ceasefire concerning cantonment and demobilization of its forces,

Deploring recent violations of the ceasefire and their implications for the security situation in Cambodia, emphasizing the importance of maintaining the ceasefire and calling on all parties to comply with their obligations in this regard,

Condemning attacks against the Authority, in particular the recent firings upon Authority helicopters and on electoral registration personnel,

Concerned by the economic situation in Cambodia and its impact on the implementation of the Paris agreements,

1. Endorses the report of the Secretary-General of 15 November 1992 on the implementation of Security Council resolution 783 (1992);

2. Confirms that the election for a constituent assembly in Cambodia will be held not later than May 1993;

3. Notes the decision of the Secretary-General to instruct his Special Representative for Cambodia to make contingency plans for the organization and conduct by the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia of a presidential election, and moreover, noting that such an election must be held in conjunction with the planned election for a constituent assembly, requests the Secretary-General to submit any recommendations for the holding of such an election to the Council for decision;

4. Calls upon all Cambodian parties to cooperate fully with the Authority to create a neutral political environment for the conduct of free and fair elections and prevent acts of harassment, intimidation and political violence;

5. Determines that the Authority shall proceed with preparations for free and fair elections to be held in April/May 1993 in all areas of Cambodia to which it has full and free access as at 31 January 1993;

6. Calls on the Supreme National Council of Cambodia to continue to meet regularly under the chairmanship of His Royal Highness Prince Norodom Sihanouk;

7. Condemns the failure by the Party of Democratic Kampuchea to comply with its obligations;

8. Demands that the Party of Democratic Kampuchea fulfil immediately its obligations under the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement to the Cambodia conflict, signed in Paris on 23 October 1991, that it facilitate without delay full deployment of the Authority in the areas under its control, that it not impede voter registration in those areas; that it not impede the activities of other political parties in those areas, and that it implement fully phase II of the ceasefire, particularly cantonment and demobilization, as well as all other aspects of the Paris agreements, taking into account that all parties in Cambodia have the same obligations to implement the Paris agreements;

9. Urges the Party of Democratic Kampuchea to join fully in the implementation of the Paris agreements, including the electoral provisions, and requests the Secretary-General and States concerned to remain ready to continue dialogue with the Party of Democratic Kampuchea for this purpose;

10. Calls on those concerned to ensure that measures are taken, consistent with the provisions of Article VII of annex 2 to the Agreement on a Comprehensive Political Settlement of the Cambodia Conflict to prevent the supply of petroleum products to the areas occupied by any Cambodian party not complying with the military provisions of this Agreement and requests the Secretary-General to examine the modalities of such measures;

11. Undertakes to consider appropriate measures to be implemented should the Party of Democratic Kampuchea obstruct the implementation of the peace plan, such as the freezing of the assets it holds outside Cambodia;

12. Invites the Authority to establish all necessary border checkpoints, requests neighbouring States to cooperate fully in the establishment and maintenance of those checkpoints and requests the Secretary-General to undertake immediate consultations with States concerned regarding their establishment and operation;

13. Supports the decision of the Supreme National Council dated 22 September 1992 to set a moratorium on the export of logs from Cambodia in order to protect Cambodia's natural resources, requests States, especially neighbouring States, to respect this moratorium by not importing such logs, and requests the Authority to take appropriate measures to secure the implementation of such moratorium;

14. Requests the Supreme National Council to consider the adoption of a similar moratorium on the export of minerals and gems in order to protect Cambodia's natural resources;

15. Demands that all parties comply with their obligations to observe the ceasefire and calls upon them to exercise restraint;

16. Requests the Authority to continue to monitor the ceasefire and to take effective measures to prevent the recurrence or escalation of fighting in Cambodia, as well as incidents of banditry and arms smuggling;

17. Demands also that all parties take all action necessary to safeguard the lives and the security of Authority personnel throughout Cambodia including by issuing immediate instructions to this effect to their commanders forthwith and reporting their action to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General;

18. Requests the Secretary-General to consider the implications for the electoral process of the failure by the Party of Democratic Kampuchea to canton and demobilize its forces and, in response to this situation, to take all appropriate steps to ensure the successful implementation of the electoral process;

19. Also requests the Secretary-General to investigate and report upon the implications for security in post-election Cambodia of the possible incomplete implementation of the disarmament and demobilization provisions of the Paris agreements;

22. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the adoption of the resolution, the representatives of the United States, the Russian Federation, France, Japan, the United Kingdom and Hungary welcomed the resolution as reflecting their concern about the situation in Cambodia and the failure of PDK to carry out the provisions of relevant Security Council resolutions and to meet its obligations under the Paris Agreements.⁵³ In their view, the resolution attested to the Council's determination to take the peace process to its conclusion and to adhere to the established timetable. Moreover, it was a balanced text, which sent a clear and firm message to PDK, but kept the door open for it to join in the peace process. The representatives of the United States, the Russian Federation and France also underlined the importance for stability in Cambodia of the holding of the presidential election, in conjunction with the planned constituent assembly election.⁵⁴

Cambodia, two from the Philippines, one from New Zealand and one from the United Kingdom, on patrol in Kompong Thom province, were illegally detained by forces belonging to the National Army of Democratic Kampuchea. An Authority helicopter, sent to assist in the discussions for their release, was fired upon, and a French military observer on board was injured. Moreover, today, six Authority civilian police monitors, three Indonesians, two Tunisians and one Nepalese, were injured in two land mine incidents in Siem Reap province.

The members of the Council condemn these attacks on the safety and security of United Nations personnel and demand that all parties concerned take all necessary measures to prevent their recurrence. It demands that such actions and any other hostile acts against the Authority cease immediately, and that all parties take all action necessary to safeguard the lives and the security of Authority personnel.

The Council urges all the parties to abide scrupulously by their obligations under the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict signed in Paris on 23 October 1991, to cooperate fully with the Authority and to respect all the relevant resolutions of the Council.

16. The situation in Tajikistan

Initial proceedings

By a letter dated 19 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹ the representative of Kyrgyzstan transmitted a letter dated 15 October, addressed to the Secretary-General, from the Chairman of the Supreme Council of the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, expressing deep concern about the situation in the neighbouring Republic of Tajikistan. Noting that the measures taken by Tajikistan and the peacemaking efforts of Kyrgyzstan had not yet produced the desired results, the Chairman requested the United Nations to provide effective help to settle the conflict; asked the Security Council urgently to consider the issue; and asked the Secretary-General to take personal charge of the settlement of the conflict.

By a letter dated 21 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of Tajikistan stated that, despite the efforts of his country's political leadership, armed conflict among local factions continued in two regions of the country, with consequent loss of life, displacement of population and serious material damage. His Government requested therefore that a peacemaking mission be sent, and humanitarian aid provided, to Tajikistan urgently.

By a letter dated 28 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the representative of the Russian Federation transmitted a statement issued on 24 October by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation concerning the events in Tajikistan. The statement noted that there was a real threat of further escalation of the conflict and expansion of the civil war which could have "catastrophic" consequences for the territorial integrity of Tajikistan and the security of the whole Central Asian region. The Russian leadership was particularly concerned about the fate of the Russian nationals and Russian-speaking population in Tajikistan. It called on the opposing groups to end the fighting and the "fratricidal civil war", and appealed to the Commonwealth of Independent States, the United Nations and other international organizations to promote the normalization of the situation in Tajikistan. The Russian Federation stressed that all States, particularly Tajikistan's neighbours, should direct their efforts towards ending the conflict rather than inflaming it.

By a letter dated 29 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ the representative of Tajikistan transmitted the text of a letter sent to the Secretary-General by the Acting President of Tajikistan on 15 October. The latter advised that the armed conflict in the south of the country was escalating and that several officers of the Russian army in the country had been won over by one of the local factions. The situation threatened to degenerate into a civil war, which could result in the disintegration of Tajikistan as a sovereign State and could have unpredictable consequences for neighbouring countries and for the international community as a whole. Tajikistan was relying on the support and assistance of the international community in settling the conflict and stabilizing the situation.

By a letter dated 29 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ the Secretary-General informed him of his decision to send a United Nations good-offices mission to Tajikistan and Central Asia. He had decided to send the mission in response to two communications, of 29 September and 15 October 1992, from the Acting President of Tajikistan, and with reference to the report of the United Nations fact-finding mission which had visited Uzbekistan and Tajikistan from 13 to 23 September 1992.

Decision of 30 October 1992 (3131st meeting): statement by the President

At its 3131st meeting, held on 30 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the letter from the Secretary-General, as well as the letters from the representatives of Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan, dated 19 and 21 October 1992, respectively. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the two other above-mentioned documents.⁶ At the same meeting, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷

The Council has considered the communications received from the Government of Tajikistan.

The Council expresses its very grave concern about the continuing deterioration in the situation in Tajikistan, which is causing considerable loss of human life and serious material damage. It notes with concern the consequences for peace and security in the region that this crisis might entail.

The Council calls on all parties to the conflict to end the fighting. It urges the Government of Tajikistan, local authorities, party leaders and other groups concerned to enter into a political dialogue with a view to reaching an overall settlement of the conflict by peaceful means. It calls on parties in neighbouring countries to refrain from any action which might contribute to increasing tension and to impeding a settlement.

The Council welcomes the efforts made by the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, on the initiative of the Republic of Kyrgyzstan, and those undertaken by other States to help Tajikistan to resolve the crisis. It invites the Government of Tajikistan and all other parties to the conflict to cooperate actively with all these efforts.

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General's decision to send a goodwill mission, including a humanitarian assistance mission, to Tajikistan and Central Asia, in response to the requests of the Governments of the region, within the next few days as a contribution by the United Nations to resolving the conflict.

The Council calls on all parties to the conflict and the neighbouring countries to facilitate the work of the Secretary-General's mission and to ensure the safety of its personnel.

17. The situation in Cyprus

Decisions of 9 June 1989 (2868th meeting): resolution 634 (1989) and statement by the President

On 31 May 1989, pursuant to resolution 625 (1988), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus for the period from 1 December 1988 to 31 May 1989.¹ The report covered developments with regard to the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP) and the Secretary-General's mission of good offices pursuant to resolution 186 (1964) and subsequent Council resolutions concerning Cyprus. The Secretary-General emphasized that UNFICYP continued to play an indispensable role in Cyprus and was in a unique position to help preserve the conditions on the ground that were vital for his good offices. He noted in particular the success of UNFICYP in working out agreements with both sides in Cyprus for the unmanning of positions in three of the areas in Nicosia where troops of both sides were in dangerous proximity. He hoped that that first step would soon be followed by further measures to reduce confrontation along the Green Line in Nicosia. In the light of that assessment, he recommended that the Council extend the Force's mandate for a further period of six months.² He added that, in accordance with the established practice, he had undertaken consultations on that matter with the parties concerned. Reiterating his deep concern about the serious financial situation of UNFICYP, he hoped that the Council would in due course reform the financing of the Force so that the United Nations share of the costs was paid for from assessed, instead of voluntary, contributions.

² On 8 June 1989, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Government of Cyprus as well as the Governments of Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate (S/20663/Add.1). He added that the Government of Turkey had indicated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/20679 was unacceptable as a basis for extending the mandate of UNFICYP, and that its stand would be expounded at the next meeting of the Security Council.

With regard to his mission of good offices, the Secretary-General stated that the two rounds of direct talks in which the leaders of the two sides in Cyprus had been engaged since August 1988 had progressed to the point where the contours of an overall agreement were discernible. The two leaders had agreed to develop, on a non-committal basis, a wide range of options for each of the issues making up the Cyprus problem. They had also agreed to devote a third round of talks, from May to June 1989, to the preparation of a draft outline of an overall agreement in which the solutions to be achieved for each of the elements of the outline would be described. Those discussions were in progress and he intended to report to Council on the results after meeting with the two leaders during the last week of June 1989.

At its 2868th meeting, on 9 June 1989, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda, under the item entitled "The situation in Cyprus". The Council invited the representatives of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also extended an invitation to Mr. Özer Koray under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

The President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³ He also drew their attention to two letters relating to the item on the agenda: a letter dated 22 May 1989 from the representatives of Australia, Austria, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Ireland, Sweden and the United Kingdom addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ expressing grave concern about the growing deficit in the UNFICYP Special Account; and a letter dated 1 June 1989 from the representative of Austria addressed to the President of the Council,⁵ expressing a similar concern on behalf of the troop-contributing countries.

⁵ S/20666.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 634 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 31 May 1989 and 8 June 1989,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 June 1989,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 December 1989;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 30 November 1989;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

After the vote, the President of the Council stated that he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council following consultations among the members of the Council:⁶

The members of the Security Council welcome and reaffirm their support for the direct talks launched in August 1988 under the auspices of the Secretary-General in the context of his mission of good offices in Cyprus. They express appreciation to the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for their untiring efforts to achieve progress.

The members of the Council note that 25 years have elapsed since the establishment of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus. They regret that, in that time, it has not been possible to achieve a negotiated settlement of all aspects of the Cyprus problem.

The members of the Council, taking into account the importance of the current stage of the talks, urge both parties to redouble their efforts, be flexible and lend the fullest support and cooperation to the efforts of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Cyprus towards achieving a negotiated, just and lasting settlement.

The members of the Council also warmly welcome the unmanning of military positions which has recently taken place, and urge the two parties to consider further steps in cooperation with United Nations authorities aimed at reducing tension, avoiding incidents and creating a climate of goodwill, as well as maintaining an atmosphere conducive to a settlement.

The members of the Council take note of the Secretary-General's intention to meet with the two parties at the end of June, and share the Secretary-General's hope that the meeting will bear positive results. They appeal to the parties concerned to cooperate with the Secretary-General in order to achieve substantial progress in the direction of an overall settlement.

The representative of Cyprus welcomed the decision of the Council to extend the mandate of UNFICYP and pledged his Government's full cooperation with it. He observed that his Government had responded positively to the Secretary-General's initiative for high-level negotiations to settle "all aspects of the Cyprus problem" and had accepted the methodology and the agreed basis for the negotiations. He stressed that his Government was seeking a viable solution to the problem based on the following essential points: withdrawal of the Turkish armed forces; establishment of a balanced system of international guarantees ensuring the territorial integrity and security of Cyprus; return of the "settlers implanted by Turkey in the occupied areas of Cyprus"; full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; functionality of a future federal constitution; and the conformity of any future solution with the resolutions of the United Nations on Cyprus. The proposals put forward by the President of Cyprus in January 1989 were, he said, consistent with those principles.⁷

The representative of Greece stated that his Government had concurred in the extension of the stationing of UNFICYP in Cyprus for another six months and supported the mission of good offices of the Secretary-General, as well as the ongoing intercommunal talks. Greece supported the proposal of the Secretary-General that the method of financing UNFICYP should be changed from voluntary to assessed contributions, as was the case with all other United Nations peacekeeping operations. He shared the view of the eight troop-contributing countries, in their letter of 1 June 1989 to the President of the Security Council,⁸ that the Council and its permanent members, in particular, had a special responsibility to ensure the proper financing of the United Nations share of the cost of UNFICYP. He expressed support for the comprehensive scheme of proposals presented by the President of Cyprus in January 1989, stating that they were based on the rules of democracy, respect for human rights and the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. Stressing that the external aspect of the Cyprus problem was of particular concern to his own country, he noted that a serious security problem had been created in the Eastern Mediterranean by the continuing presence of Turkish troops in Cyprus. He supported, in that regard, the proposal of the President of Cyprus for the full demilitarization of the Republic.⁹

Mr. Koray stated that the ongoing comprehensive talks, for the establishment of a federation between the two States in the island, constituted the longest phase of talks ever held in Cyprus between the leaders of the Turkish Cypriot and the Greek Cypriot peoples. The talks had provided the two sides with an opportunity to discuss all aspects of a bizonal federal republic based on equal political status and participation of the two peoples. He recalled that the Turkish Cypriot side had emphasized the security aspect of a final settlement, with indispensable Turkish guarantees, as well as the political equality of the two sides in the federation. The kind of solution envisaged by the Greek Cypriot side could not, he stated, be accepted so long as it did not recognize such basic concepts as equality, bizonality and power-sharing. Various developments in southern Cyprus had also marred the prospects of an early settlement in Cyprus. In short, the Greek Cypriot administration was, he claimed, trying to undermine the existence of the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus”, for instance by its declared intention to apply, unilaterally, for membership in the European Community. He affirmed, however, that the Turkish Cypriot side would continue to play a constructive role in the negotiations and to address the basic issues and principles central to a feasible and desirable federal solution. On the question of the extension of the mandate of UNFICYP, he reiterated that the resolution just adopted was unacceptable to the Turkish Cypriot side for the reasons that had been outlined in previous Security Council debates on the matter: any resolution that referred to the Greek Cypriot administration as the “Government of Cyprus” was unacceptable because it ignored the existing realities in Cyprus and negated the principle of equality between the two sides. He stated, however, that the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus” nevertheless accepted the presence of UNFICYP on its territory on the same basis as that stated in December 1988: namely, “that the principle, the scope and the modalities and procedures of cooperation between the authorities of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and UNFICYP shall be based only on decisions to be taken solely by the Government of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus”. He also reiterated the support of the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus” for the Secretary-General’s mission of good offices and the current efforts under his auspices to find a negotiated settlement in Cyprus.¹⁰

The representative of Turkey similarly stressed that the basis of a lasting settlement in Cyprus was the establishment of a bicomunal, bizonal, federal State, based on the political equality of the two peoples. He praised the friendly and constructive atmosphere of the negotiations between the two sides, but cautioned that certain recent developments could have an adverse effect on the negotiations. He mentioned, in particular, the growing military build-up in southern Cyprus, the violent demonstrations organized with the encouragement of the Greek Cypriot authorities in or near the buffer zone and the declared intention of the Greek Cypriots to apply for full membership in the European Community. With regard to the resolution just adopted by the Council, his Government could not agree to an extension of the UNFICYP mandate on the basis as therein set out. His Government fully supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side as expressed by Mr. Koray on the modalities governing the presence of UNFICYP in northern Cyprus.¹¹

meeting): resolution 646 (1989) and statement by the President

On 7 December 1989, pursuant to resolution 634 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus for the period from 1 June to 4 December 1989.¹² The report covered developments with regard to UNFICYP and the Secretary-General’s mission of good offices. The Secretary-General reported that Greek Cypriot demonstrators had on four occasions entered the United Nations buffer zone. During one such demonstration, in July, Turkish Cypriot police and security forces had apprehended a number of demonstrators, which had prompted further demonstrations. Those events had created considerable tension on the island and had underlined the importance for all concerned to respect the role and functions of UNFICYP. In that regard, the Secretary-General was pleased that the Government of Cyprus had in the recent past cooperated with UNFICYP in protecting the integrity of the buffer zone. Observing that the presence of the Force remained indispensable, he recommended that the Council extend its mandate for a further six months. In accordance with established practice, he had undertaken consultations on this matter with the parties concerned, and would report to the Council on them as soon as possible.¹³ He once again drew the attention of the Council to the worsening financial crisis facing UNFICYP, reiterating his view that the best way to finance the Force on a more equitable basis would be for the United Nations share of its costs to be financed from assessed contributions. He expressed the hope that in due course the members of the Council would accept that overdue reform.

With regard to his mission of good offices, the Secretary-General reported that, although it had not yielded concrete results, he remained of the view that a basis for effective negotiations existed, provided that both leaders manifested the necessary goodwill and recognized that a viable solution had to satisfy the interests of both communities. The discussions since the previous year had brought out all the ideas that needed to be covered in an agreement, and had produced ideas that should facilitate the negotiating process. He hoped that, after further discussions with his Special Representative, a way would be found for both parties to resume their negotiations, and to proceed expeditiously to complete their work on an outline, as agreed on 29 June. Underlining the close relationship between the negotiations and the overall atmosphere, the Secretary-General urged the two leaders to make a determined effort to promote reconciliation. He observed that the adoption of goodwill measures, including an extension of the unarming arrangements, could prove useful in that regard.

¹³ On 13 December 1989, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the Government of Cyprus, as well as the Governments of Greece and the United Kingdom, had concurred with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate (S/21010/Add.1). He added that the Government of Turkey had indicated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/21020 was unacceptable as a basis for extending the stationing of UNFICYP, and that its stand would be expounded at the next meeting of the Security Council.

At its 2898th meeting, on 14 December 1989, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also invited Mr. Özer Koray to participate in the meeting under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The President (Colombia) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 646 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 7 and 13 December 1989,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 December 1989,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 June 1990;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 31 May 1990;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

¹⁴ S/21020.

The representative of Cyprus welcomed the Council's decision to renew the mandate of UNFICYP and that of the Secretary-General's good offices mission. Among the most recent developments, he underlined the importance of two separate lunches, hosted by the Secretary-General, in which the President of Cyprus and the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, respectively, had participated, together with the Presidents of the Council for November and December, the coordinators of the non-aligned caucus for November and December, and the permanent members of the Security Council. He thought that type of gathering was important for two reasons: it extended the involvement of the Security Council, and especially its five permanent members, beyond the renewal of the two mandates; and it provided a unique, informal, opportunity to the members of the Security Council to know a lot more about Cyprus and why its problem had remained unresolved for more than 15 years. He regretted, on the other hand, the lack of progress in the intercommunal talks, which he attributed to the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community. He stated that, during parallel meetings with the Secretary-General, the Turkish Cypriot side had demanded the withdrawal of the ideas presented by the Secretary-General to the parties, rejected the agreed negotiating procedure and challenged the role of the Secretary-General. Many other unacceptable conditions, moreover, had been laid down that were tantamount to institutionalizing a system of segregation and separation of the Cypriot people based on ethnic origin. He called on the Security Council to strengthen the role of the Secretary-General and assist him in overcoming the obstacles that had arisen. Concluding, he expressed the hope that, despite all the setbacks, and with the active assistance of the Council, a meaningful and results-orientated dialogue could commence on the Cyprus problem.¹⁵

The representative of Greece stated that his Government considered the presence of UNFICYP in Cyprus as indispensable and therefore concurred in the extension of its mandate. He, too, regretted that no concrete results had been achieved during the last mandate period; he maintained that the Turkish Cypriot side had frustrated progress when their leader had, under various pretexts, suspended his attendance at the talks carried out under the auspices of the Secretary-

General. He emphasized that Greece was convinced that it would be inconceivable for claims or proposals presented during the intercommunal talks to depart from the basic rules of international law or from the resolutions of the United Nations and other international or regional bodies that had authoritatively pronounced themselves on the issue. Among the latter, he referred to recent pronouncements of the European Council of Heads of State or Government of the States members of the European Community, underlining that the Cyprus problem had always been, and remained, a European problem too. He added that Greece failed to see that a solution to the problem could be reached unless there was an assurance that the Turkish occupying forces and Turkish settlers would withdraw from Cyprus, that the fundamental freedoms of movement and establishment and the right to property would be respected, and that the people of Cyprus in their entirety would enjoy the fruits of cooperation and unity without external interference or intervention. In conclusion, he recommended that, in accordance with paragraph 5 of resolution 550 (1984), the area of Varosha should be transferred to the administration of the United Nations in order to alleviate the continuing plight of some of the refugees and enable them to regain their homes.¹⁶

Mr. Koray recalled that Mr. Denktash, in an effort to secure a resumption of the stalled talks, had presented substantive proposals to the Secretary-General on how the negotiations could be meaningfully pursued. They were designed, he said, to define the basis of a new pattern of relationship between the two peoples through a "joint declaration", and to prepare, through direct talks, the main features of an outline for a comprehensive settlement. He stressed that the success of the forthcoming negotiations would depend on the acceptance by the Greek Cypriot side of certain guidelines and principles, such as those contained in the "joint declaration" proposal, which he read out.¹⁷ With regard to the extension of the UNFICYP mandate, he reiterated that the resolution that had just been adopted was unacceptable to the Turkish Cypriot side, for reasons outlined in previous Security Council debates on the matter. His government was, nevertheless, favourably disposed to accept the presence of UNFICYP on the territory of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" on the same basis as stated in June 1989: namely, “that the principle, the scope and the modalities and procedures of cooperation between the authorities of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and UNFICYP shall be based only on decisions taken solely by the Government of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus”.¹⁸

The representative of Turkey reiterated that his Government could not agree to an extension of the UNFICYP mandate on the basis of the resolution that had just been adopted, which contained a number of unacceptable elements. It supported the position outlined by the representative of the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus” on the modalities governing the presence of UNFICYP in northern Cyprus. He also reiterated that his Government fully supported the Secretary-General’s mission of good offices, and continued to believe that the only way to achieve a just and lasting solution that could lead to a federation of the two Cypriot States was through direct negotiations conducted on a footing of complete equality. All outside attempts to impose a settlement were condemned to fail.¹⁹

In a further statement, the representative of Greece suggested that the President of the Council might wish to place before the members of the Council a procedural proposal: namely, that, in the light of Security Council resolutions 541 (1983) and 550 (1984), and bearing in mind rules 27, 29, 37 and 39 of the Council’s provisional rules of procedure, precedence should be given to representatives of Member States who wished to address the Council over persons entitled to address the Council under rule 39.²⁰

The representative of Turkey took issue with the attempt by the representative of Greece to cast doubt on the Turkish Cypriot State. He maintained that the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus” had all the attributes of a State, including population, territory and sovereignty.²¹

The representative of Cyprus questioned that assertion, in the light of the mandatory decisions of the Security Council on the matter.²²

At the same meeting, the President of the Council stated that he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council following consultations among the members of the Council:²³

The members of the Security Council take note of the Secretary-General’s report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus and express their full support for his continuing efforts in pursuing the initiative launched in August 1988.

The members of the Council recall the statement made on their behalf by the President of the Council on 9 June 1989 in which they expressed their regret that, in the more than 25 years since the establishment of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus, it had not been possible to achieve a negotiated settlement of all aspects of the Cyprus problem.

The members of the Council note the Secretary-General’s assessment that a basis for effective negotiations exists provided both leaders manifest the necessary goodwill and recognize that a viable solution must satisfy the legitimate interests of both communities.

The members of the Council share the Secretary-General’s disappointment that it has not been possible to achieve concrete results to date in developing an agreed outline of an overall agreement. In this regard, they share the Secretary-General’s hope that direct and meaningful talks can be resumed early next year.

The members of the Council urge both leaders to proceed as suggested by the Secretary-General during their most recent meetings and, as agreed in June, to cooperate with him and his Special Representative in completing work on an outline. They also urge the two parties to make a further determined effort to promote reconciliation. They share the Secretary-General’s view that the adoption of goodwill measures could prove useful in this regard.

The members of the Council are concerned about the difficulties encountered by the Force during the last mandate period. They call on all parties to cooperate with the Force and to take effective measures to ensure that the integrity of the buffer zone is safeguarded.

The members of the Council also note the continuing financial difficulties facing the Force as indicated by the Secretary-General. They take note of his appeal for greater financial contributions to the Force, which would help it continue its important peacekeeping role in Cyprus and would reduce its financial difficulties.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to report back to the Council by 1 March 1990 on what progress has been made in resuming intensive talks and developing an agreed outline of an overall agreement.

Decision of 22 February 1990: statement by the President

On 22 February 1990, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁴

The members of the Council recall the statement made on their behalf by the President on 14 December 1989. They express their appreciation to the Secretary-General for his briefing on the current situation about his mission of good offices concerning Cyprus and give their full support to his efforts to assist the two communities to reach a just and lasting solution.

The members of the Council stress the importance they attach to an early negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem.

The members of the Council are pleased that the leaders of the two sides in Cyprus have accepted the Secretary-General's invitation to meet with him for an extended session beginning on 26 February 1990 to complete the work on an outline of an overall agreement, as agreed in June 1989.

The members of the Council call upon the leaders of the two sides to demonstrate the necessary goodwill and flexibility and to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General so that the talks will result in a major step towards the resolution of the Cyprus problem.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to report to the Council at the conclusion of the forthcoming meeting to inform them of the results achieved and of his assessment of the situation at that time.

Decision of 12 March 1990 (2909th meeting): resolution 649 (1990)

On 8 March 1990, pursuant to the presidential statement of 22 February 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on his mission of good offices concerning Cyprus.²⁵ He reported on the joint and separate meetings that he and his Special Representative had held with the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus from 26 February to 2 March 1990. He annexed the text of his opening and closing statements made during the talks.

In concluding, the Secretary-General regretted that it had not proved possible to advance in drafting an outline of an overall agreement. However, he remained of the view that a basis for effective negotiations existed, provided that both leaders were prepared to take into account each other's concerns, and that both were willing to proceed within the framework of the 1977 and 1979 high-level agreements. He recalled that, in those agreements, the leaders of the two communities had pledged to establish a bicomunal and bizonal Federal Republic of Cyprus that would safeguard its independence, territorial integrity and non-alignment and exclude union in whole or in part with any other country as well as any form of partition or secession. He added that, as he had repeatedly indicated to the parties, the solution that was being sought was one that must be decided upon by, and must be acceptable to, both communities.

He stressed that the two leaders must agree to pursue seriously the current effort to reach a solution providing for a political settlement and the establishment of a mutually acceptable constitutional arrangement, and to cooperate on an equal footing with him to complete, as the next step, an outline of an overall agreement, as they had agreed to do in June 1989.

At its 2909th meeting, on 12 March 1990, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. The President (Democratic Yemen) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁶ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 649 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 March 1990 on the recent meeting between the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus and on his assessment of the current situation,

Recalling its relevant resolutions on Cyprus,

Recalling the statement of the President of the Security Council of 22 February 1990 calling upon the leaders of the two communities to demonstrate the necessary goodwill and flexibility and to cooperate with the Secretary-General so that the talks will result in a major step forward towards the resolution of the Cyprus problem,

Expressing its regret that, in the more than twenty-five years since the establishment of United Nations Force in Cyprus, it has not been possible to achieve a negotiated settlement of all aspects of the Cyprus problem,

Concerned that, at the recent meeting in New York, it was not possible to achieve results in arriving at an agreed outline of an overall agreement,

1. Reaffirms in particular its resolution 367 (1975) of 12 March 1975 as well as its support for the 1977 and 1979 high-level agreements between the leaders of the two communities in which they pledged themselves to establish a bicommunal Federal Republic of Cyprus that will safeguard its independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and non-alignment, and exclude union in whole or in part with any other country and any form of partition or secession;

2. Expresses its full support for the current effort of the Secretary-General in carrying out his mission of good offices concerning Cyprus;

3. Calls upon the leaders of the two communities to pursue their efforts to reach freely a mutually acceptable solution providing for the establishment of a federation that will be bicommunal as regards the constitutional aspects and bizonal as regards the territorial aspects, in line with the present resolution and their 1977 and 1979 high-level agreements, and to cooperate, on an equal footing, with the Secretary-General in completing, in the first instance and on an urgent basis, an outline of an overall agreement, as agreed in June 1989;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to pursue his mission of good offices in order to achieve the earliest possible progress and, towards this end, to assist the two communities by making suggestions to facilitate the discussions;

5. Calls on the parties concerned to refrain from any action that could aggravate the situation;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the situation and the current effort;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council in his report due by 31 May 1990, of the progress made in resuming the intensive talks and in developing an agreed outline of an overall agreement in line with the present resolution.

Decisions of 15 June 1990 (2928th meeting): resolution 657 (1990) and statement by the
President

On 31 May 1990, pursuant to resolution 646 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus for the period from 1 December 1989 to 31 May 1990.²⁷ The report covered developments with regard to UNFICYP and the Secretary-General's mission of good offices pursuant to resolution 646 (1989). He observed that the Force continued to perform its functions of supervising the ceasefire, maintaining calm and promoting peaceful civilian activity in the area between the ceasefire lines, adding that, in carrying out its function, the Force had the cooperation of both sides. In the light of the prevailing circumstances, he had concluded that the continued presence of the Force in Cyprus remained indispensable to achieve the objectives set by the Council. He therefore recommended to the Council that it extend the mandate of UNFICYP for a further six-month period. In accordance with established practice, he had undertaken consultations on the matter with the parties concerned, and would report to the Council as soon as they had been completed.²⁸ He underlined that the Force was facing a chronic and ever-deepening financial crisis, which imposed an inordinately heavy burden on the countries contributing troops to the Force, and suggested that the United Nations part of the cost of the Force be financed from assessed contributions.

With regard to his mission of good offices, the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the contacts aimed at resuming the intensive talks between the two parties had not yet been concluded. He intended to submit a further report as soon as that had happened.

At its 2928th meeting, on 15 June 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also invited Mr. Özer Koray to participate in the meeting under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 657 (1990), which reads:

²⁸ On 13 June 1990, the Secretary-General informed the Security Council that the Government of Cyprus as well as the Governments of Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate (S/21340/Add.1). He added that the Government of Turkey had indicated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/21357 was unacceptable as a basis for extending the stationing of UNFICYP, and that its stand would be expounded at the next meeting of the Security Council.

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 31 May and 13 June 1990,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 June 1990,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 December 1990;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 30 November 1990;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

The representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and Finland underlined the vital role played by UNFICYP in helping to create the necessary conditions for a negotiated settlement to the Cyprus problem. They expressed concern, however, at the precarious state of the Force's finances, noting that it was the only United Nations peacekeeping operation financed from voluntary contributions. They fully supported the proposal made by the Secretary-General in his report that the United Nations share of the cost of UNFICYP should be financed from assessed contributions.³⁰

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that, while his country recognized that UNFICYP had serious financial difficulties, it attributed that to the fact that the Cyprus problem had remained unresolved for an inadmissibly long time. The problems relating to financing of the Force could hardly be regarded in isolation from other crucial aspects of the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Cyprus. He stressed that one should not lose sight of the specific nature and characteristics of that particular peacekeeping operation, as reflected in resolution 186 (1964), by which it was established. He recalled that his country had supported that resolution, taking into account the stance of Cyprus and the fact that the adoption of the resolution would not result in financial obligations being imposed on Member States not involved in the Force. The problem of financing had to be resolved, therefore, in accordance with the procedures laid down in that resolution. It was on that basis, he stated, that his country had not opposed the Secretary-General's appeal to Member States "for a voluntary financial contribution" so as "to enable UNFICYP to continue to carry out the functions for which it was established". In conclusion, he stressed that, in his Government's view, the understanding with regard to the financial procedures laid down in resolution 186 (1964) still held good and should not be undermined: the practice established by the decisions of the Council more than 25 years before had, in its view, become binding and should continue to be followed.³¹

The representative of Cyprus stressed that the Council's decisions to renew the mandate of UNFICYP and that of the good offices mission of the Secretary-General were indispensable to the search for a solution to the question of Cyprus. He urged, however, that the Council not limit itself to the renewal of mandates and the occasional presidential statement. Rather, it should demand from Turkey more respect for its resolutions and the principles of the Charter, the abandonment of illegal preconditions and tangible proof of the political will to embark on a meaningful dialogue.³²

The representative of Greece considered that the present crisis had three aspects: political, institutional and financial. The deadlock in the talks was, he said, of a political nature. It concerned a substantive problem that had arisen from the insistence by the head of the Turkish Cypriot community on the notion of a separate people in Cyprus and on promoting the idea of a new entity, which the Security Council had explicitly condemned by the Council in its resolutions 367 (1975), 541 (1983) and 550 (1984). The institutional aspect of the crisis was illustrated, he stated, by the fact that the Security Council was unable to react more effectively to the continued presence in Cyprus of 35,000 Turkish occupying troops, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations. He urged the Council to implement paragraph 5 of resolution 649 (1990) and call upon Turkey to refrain from any action that could aggravate the situation. With regard to the financial aspects of the crisis, he reiterated Greece's position that the Force should be financed in the same way as that employed for other United Nations peacekeeping forces: through assessed contributions.³³

Mr. Koray stated that the talks had been stalled because of the preconditions set and the intransigent attitude displayed by the Greek Cypriot leader. In an effort to break out of the impasse, the Turkish Cypriot side had made substantive proposals that would enable the two sides to move towards a federal solution and establish their relationship on a new pattern based on respect for each other's existence, integrity and political equality. An essential element of a negotiated settlement based on federation was the separate right of the two peoples to decide freely their future political status — in other words the right to self-determination. Mr. Koray stated that all those proposals were reflected in the Secretary-General's report of 8 March 1990.³⁴ In the report, the Secretary-General called for acknowledgement of the political equality of the two peoples in the federation, which was to be bicomunal as well as bizonal in nature, and explained that the objective of his mission of good offices was a new constitution for Cyprus that would regulate relations between the two sides. Subsequent to the consideration of the report, the Council adopted resolution 649 (1990) and confirmed the legal and political equality of the Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots. In the light of the resolution, the Greek Cypriots had no authority in law, or in fact, to represent Cyprus as a whole. Furthermore, it was important for third parties to treat the Greek Cypriot administration and the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" equally and fairly, in accordance with resolution 649 (1990). Mr. Koray accused the Greek Cypriot side of creating tension and mistrust in the island, in violation of paragraph 5 of resolution 649 (1990), by aggressive development of its military forces and a massive campaign to internationalize the Cyprus issue. Turning to the question of the extension of the UNFICYP mandate, he added that the Turkish Cypriot side could not accept the resolution just adopted for the reasons stated in previous Council debates on the matter. Nonetheless, it accepted the presence of UNFICYP on its territory on the same basis as that stated in December 1989. He stressed that the UNFICYP mandate needed to be reappraised, because it was not compatible with the currently prevailing circumstances, which had undergone radical change.³⁵

The representative of Turkey stated that the resolution adopted by the Council was unacceptable, for the reasons outlined by Mr. Koray. The early resumption of the talks was the only practical way to reach a settlement that conformed to the guidelines restated in resolution 649 (1990). From such a settlement, a "Government of Cyprus" would eventually emerge and therefore that label should not be used to designate the Government of either one of the two existing states in the island. Commenting on the issue of the "so-called Turkish settlers", he stated that since the respective sizes of the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot populations was irrelevant to the final settlement, Turkey had no reason to attempt to alter the demographic balance in Cyprus. He expressed his Government's disappointment at the way the Greek Cypriots had been violating paragraph 5 of the resolution, which called upon the parties to refrain from action that could aggravate the situation. He accused the Greek Cypriots of continuing to wage political and economic warfare against the Turkish Cypriots, pointing to the lack of their sincerity at the negotiations to establish a federation of equals in Cyprus.³⁶

At the same meeting, the President of the Council stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷

The members of the Council recall Security Council resolution 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990 and other relevant resolutions. They express again their regret that, in the more than 25 years since the establishment of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus, it has not been possible to achieve a negotiated settlement for all aspects of the Cyprus problem. They reiterate their full support for the current effort of the Secretary-General in carrying out his mission of good offices concerning Cyprus.

The members of the Council also recall the statement made by the President on 30 May 1990 on United Nations peacekeeping operations. They reiterate their view expressed in that statement that peacekeeping operations must be launched and maintained on a sound and secure financial basis. They therefore express their concern at the chronic and ever-deepening financial crisis facing the Force, as described in the Secretary-General's report and in his letter of 31 May 1990 (S/21351) addressed to all States Members of the United Nations, and they support his appeal for financial contributions which would enable the Force to continue to carry out the functions for which it was established.

Decision of 19 July 1990 (2930th meeting):
statement by the President

On 12 July 1990, pursuant to resolution 649 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,³⁸ in which he reported on the progress made in resuming the intensive talks and in developing an agreed outline of an overall agreement in line with that resolution. The Secretary-General observed that the adoption of resolution 649 (1990), which confirmed the essential elements of the solution of the Cyprus problem, and the acceptance by both sides of all aspects of that resolution, suggested that the two leaders could now proceed with the work agreed to in June 1989. He stated that it was important that the two leaders meet with him as soon as possible to agree on an outline and to launch the negotiation of an overall agreement. However, to ensure that such a meeting yielded the intended results, he proposed that separate discussions be held in Nicosia to prepare the ground. During those discussions, he would again submit to the two leaders the headings that had emerged from their talks as the basis for organizing the work of arriving at an agreed outline. Further, in line with paragraph 4 of resolution 649 (1990), he intended to make suggestions, as necessary, to assist the two sides in arriving at an agreed outline. Once an agreed outline was within reach, he would invite the two leaders to meet with him personally to complete the task and to launch negotiations on an overall agreement.

By a letter dated 18 July 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹ the representative of Cyprus transmitted a letter dated 17 July 1990 from the Foreign Minister of Cyprus, requesting the convening of a meeting of the Council. In his letter, the Foreign Minister referred to recent developments regarding the city of Varosha and expressed his grave concern at information that indicated that the military status quo in the fenced area of Varosha would be altered in a way intended to facilitate the opening of the area to settlement by people other than its inhabitants. He stressed that that would constitute a violation of resolution 550 (1984), which could endanger the maintenance of the ceasefire and have serious repercussions on peace and security in the area. It was the position of his Government that the relevant provisions of resolution 550 (1984) should be fully implemented by transferring the area to the administration of the United Nations and allowing the rightful owners of the city to return to their homes and properties. In an annexed letter dated 18 July addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representative of Cyprus stated that the threatened change to the status quo had just taken place, making the taking of urgent action by the Security Council, in order to restore the status quo ante, imperative.

At its 2930th meeting, held on 19 July 1990, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's report and the letter from the representative of Cyprus.

At the same meeting, the President of the Council (Malaysia) stated that he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council following consultations among the members of the Council:⁴⁰

The members of the Council have considered the Secretary-General's report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus. They are unanimous in giving their full support to the Secretary-General's current effort to assist the two communities to reach a just and lasting solution. They agree with his assessment of recent developments, share his concern about the lack of progress, and endorse his plan of action.

The members of the Council reaffirm resolution 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990, which was accepted by both sides, and reiterate the importance they attach to an early negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem.

The members of the Council call on the leaders of the two communities to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General on the basis of his plan of action and to arrive, on an urgent basis, at an agreed outline of an overall agreement. In line with resolution 649 (1990), they request the Secretary-General to make suggestions, as necessary, to assist the two communities in arriving at an agreed outline.

The members of the Council again call on the parties concerned to refrain, especially at this sensitive stage in the process, from any action or statement that could aggravate the situation. They express their concern over any action which contravenes paragraph 5 of resolution 550 (1984) of 11 May 1984 and paragraph 5 of resolution 649 (1990). They call upon both communities to concentrate their efforts on promoting mutual confidence and reconciliation.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to inform the Council by 31 October 1990 about the implementation of his plan of action.

Decision of 9 November 1990: statement by the President

On 7 November 1990, pursuant to the presidential statement of 19 July 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a further report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.⁴¹ He reported that the negative atmosphere had persisted, with each side objecting to actions and statements by the other, which had detracted from his effort. Since mid-October, however, his Special Representative and a Director in the Office of the Secretary-General had met several times with each leader in Nicosia to explore, in line with his plan of action, the possibility of bringing together the elements of an outline with which the two sides could agree. Subsequently, they had visited Athens and Ankara, where they had discussed his current effort with the Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministers. As those discussions had not yet been completed, he proposed to submit a further progress report to the Council within three months.

On 9 November 1990, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴²

The members of the Council have considered the Secretary-General's report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus. They reiterate their full support of the Secretary-General's current effort and reaffirm their endorsement of his plan of action to complete an outline of an overall agreement covering the critical substantive issues specified in paragraph 7 of his report to the Council of 8 March 1990.

⁴¹ S/21932.

The members of the Council affirm their resolution 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990.

The members of the Council stress the urgent need to arrive at a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem and express their regret that an outline of an overall agreement has not yet been completed. They call for renewed political will and commitment by all parties to facilitate a process of negotiations.

The members of the Council request the parties concerned to extend to the Secretary-General during the coming period their full cooperation and to refrain from taking any action or making any public statement that could further complicate his efforts.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to report to the Council by 15 February 1991 on the outcome of his effort to arrive at an agreed outline of an overall agreement and to provide the Council with his assessment of the situation at that time. They will examine closely the Secretary-General's report and assessment, particularly as they relate to resolution of the substantive issues in the outline.

Decision of 14 December 1990 (2969th meeting): resolution 680 (1990)

On 7 December 1990, pursuant to resolution 657 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,⁴³ covering developments from 1 June to 30 November 1990.⁴² The Secretary-General reported that the continued presence of UNFICYP in the island remained indispensable to achieve the objectives set by the Council. He noted that the number of ceasefire violations had slightly increased and the transfer by the Government of Turkey of the responsibility for the security of Varosha to the Turkish Cypriot forces had caused an increase in political tensions. He recommended to the Council that it extend the mandate of UNFICYP for a further six-month period⁴⁴ and drew attention to the Force's ever-deepening financial crisis.

The Secretary-General informed the Council that, in November 1990, he had dispatched a Secretariat

⁴⁴ The Secretary-General subsequently informed the Security Council that the Governments of Cyprus, Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate, while the Government of Turkey indicated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/22000 was unacceptable as the basis for such an extension, and that its stand would be expounded at the forthcoming meeting of the Security Council (S/21981/Add.1).

review team to Cyprus to examine the operations and organization of UNFICYP, in particular the continued relevance of the functions entrusted to the Force by the Council in resolution 164 (1964) and subsequent resolutions and to examine the possibility of reducing the Force's strength. The team had concluded that the current functions of UNFICYP remained valid, its deployment along the buffer zone was necessary, and that the Force's presence on the line had been stretched as far as it could be and that no further reductions in that deployment were possible without impairing its ability to implement its current functions. The cost-cutting measures implemented by UNFICYP over the past 10 years had reached their limit; any further cuts could impair the effectiveness of the Force. The team had considered the possibility of converting UNFICYP wholly or in part to an observer mission, but concluded that the prevailing situation on the ground did not make that a viable option. Owing to the lack of agreement between UNFICYP and the two sides regarding the complete delineation of the ceasefire lines and the lack of agreement on the use and control of the buffer zone, the Force had to retain both reactive and preventive capabilities. The team had concluded that a reduction of the number of infantry battalions from four to three, while retaining the current level of personnel on the line, was feasible. The team noted that UNFICYP was the only United Nations peacekeeping operation that was not financed from assessed contributions but that, in accordance with resolution 186 (1964), the costs of the Force were met by the Governments providing the contingents and the voluntary contributions received for this purpose by the United Nations. This arrangement for financing a peacekeeping force had proved most unsatisfactory and particularly unfair to the troop-contributing countries, which had had to shoulder a disproportionate share of the cost. In addition, the continuous shortfall in voluntary contributions had caused the United Nations to be 10 years in arrears in paying the troop contributors the sums due for additional expenses, for which the United Nations was responsible. It concluded that continued reliance on voluntary contributions would jeopardize the future of UNFICYP, and that the recommended organizational changes to the Force could be implemented only if the method of its financing was changed to assessed contributions. The Secretary-General considered the team's findings and recommendations to be sound and indicated that he intended to discuss their implementation with the troop-contributing Governments.⁴⁵

At its 2969th meeting, on 14 December 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also invited Mr. Özer Koray to participate in the meeting under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The President (Yemen) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁶ He also drew the attention of the members to a letter dated 12 December 1990 from the representatives of Australia, Austria, Denmark, Ireland and Sweden addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁷ expressing grave concern at the continuing massive shortfall in the voluntary contributions required to provide UNFICYP with adequate funding, and urging the members of the Council to support a draft resolution⁴⁸ that would, in their view, solve the problem.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Canada recalled his country's participation in UNFICYP since its inception in 1964 and reiterated its continuing commitment. He observed, however, that the financing of UNFICYP through a system of voluntary contributions had resulted in the troop-contributing countries, including Canada, bearing an inordinate share of the costs of the Force in the absence of sufficient funds. After two years of negotiation and discussion, Canada and some other members of the Council had circulated a draft resolution that would put the financing of UNFICYP on a more sound and secure basis through assessed contributions. At the request of a few members of the Council, Canada had asked for the voting on that draft to be postponed until the following week to allow time for further consultations. Since the financial crisis of UNFICYP had not been dealt with before the meeting scheduled to renew the mandate, Canada would abstain from the vote on the renewal.

The Council then voted on the draft resolution, which was adopted by 14 votes in favour, none against and 1 abstention (Canada) as resolution 680 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 7 and 14 December 1990,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 December 1990,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 June 1991;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 31 May 1991;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Cyprus welcomed the resolution and reiterated his country's pledge of full cooperation with the Secretary-General and with UNFICYP. He expressed his sympathy with the Canadian initiative and stated that the Government of Cyprus had always been preoccupied with the chronic financial problem of UNFICYP. He stressed that any possible reduction of the Force must not reduce its effectiveness. He described the recent visits by the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Turkey to the occupied part of Cyprus as new and serious provocations, constituting blatant violations of Council resolutions 541 (1983) and 550 (1984). This also showed the other side's serious disregard for the appeals of the Secretary-General and the Council, who had called upon the parties to refrain from actions aggravating the situation. Recent statements by the Turkish Cypriot leadership showed a return to the discredited thesis of "two peoples" and their "separate rights to self-determination". The Cyprus question was an international problem of invasion and occupation and the same considerations and principles that were applicable on Kuwait were equally applicable to Cyprus.⁴⁹

The representative of Greece welcomed the renewal of the UNFICYP mandate and expressed the hope that the following week the Council would be able to adopt a resolution to resolve the chronic financial crisis facing UNFICYP by changing its methods of financing from voluntary to assessed contributions. He also expressed his Government's concern that the reduction proposed by the Secretariat review team of infantry battalions from four to three should in no way reduce the effectiveness of the Force. Sixteen years after the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, the relevant United Nations resolutions had yet to be implemented. He accused Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot side of undermining the agreed basis of the intercommunal negotiations, jeopardizing the efforts of the Secretary-General and further aggravating the already grave situation in Cyprus. It was, therefore, indispensable that the Council assume a more active role in the search for a solution to the Cyprus problem and contribute more effectively to the Secretary-General's ongoing efforts.⁵⁰

Mr. Koray regretted that the high-level meetings in New York in February and March 1990 had failed to produce a favourable outcome, owing to the rejection by the Greek Cypriot leader of the guiding principles of equality, bizonality and true partnership based on friendly relations and mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and integrity. He outlined three issues that had continued to threaten the situation in Cyprus: the unilateral Greek Cypriot application for membership in the European Community; the economic and other restrictions imposed on northern Cyprus; and the rearmament efforts of the Greek Cypriot side. He rejected the Greek Cypriot attempts to draw parallels between the situations in Kuwait and Cyprus and claims over the territory of Varosha as untenable and provocative. On the question of the extension of the mandate of UNFICYP, he reiterated that the resolution, which had been just adopted, was unacceptable since it ignored the existing realities in Cyprus; nevertheless, the Government of the "Turkish Republic of Northern

Cyprus” accepted the presence of UNFICYP on its territory.⁵¹

The representative of Turkey stated that his Government, for reasons well known to the Council, could not accept the resolution that had just been adopted. Turkey supported the political equality of the Turkish Cypriot people and their right to determine their own future. The Greek Cypriot unilateral application for membership in the European Community and rearmament effort were incompatible with the efforts to create an atmosphere of trust and good will in Cyprus, and violated paragraph 5 of resolution 649 (1990) by aggravating the already tense situation on the island. He criticized the Greek Cypriot’s precondition for resuming the negotiations, namely that the Turkish Cypriots renounce some of their basic rights, including their right to self-determination.⁵²

Decision of 21 December 1990 (2971st meeting):
resolution 682 (1990)

At its 2971st meeting, on 21 December 1990, the Council resumed its consideration of the item and included in its agenda the Secretary-General’s report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,⁵³ a letter dated 12 December 1990 from the representatives of Australia, Austria, Denmark, Ireland and Sweden,⁵⁴ and the report of the Secretariat review team on the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus.⁵⁵

The President (Yemen) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution,⁵⁶ to which he made oral amendments before it was put to the vote. It was adopted unanimously as resolution 682 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 establishing the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for an initial period of three months,

Recalling also its subsequent resolutions extending the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force, most recently its resolution 680 (1990) of 14 December 1990,

Reaffirming the statement of the President of the Council of 30 May 1990, in which the members emphasized that United Nations peacekeeping operations must be launched and maintained on a sound and secure financial basis,

Concerned about the chronic and ever-deepening financial crisis facing the Force, as described in the report of the Secretary-General and as expressed in the statement of the President of the Council of 15 June 1990,

1. Decides to examine the problem of the costs and financing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus in all its aspects, bearing in mind the financial crisis facing the Force and the report of the Secretariat Review Team of 7 December 1990, and to report by 1 June 1991 on alternative arrangements for meeting the costs of the Force for which the United Nations is responsible, in order to place the Force on a sound and secure financial basis;

2. Also decides to consider, not later than early June 1991, comprehensively and favourably the results of the examination mentioned in paragraph 1 above, with a view to putting into effect an alternative method of financing the Force, which could, inter alia, include the use of assessed contributions, simultaneously with the extension of the mandate on or before 15 June 1991.

The representative of Canada noted that all the UNFICYP troop contributors and the Secretariat review team had endorsed the Secretary-General’s call that assessed contributions should be used to meet the costs for which the United Nations was responsible. He recalled that together with the other troop-contributing countries, Canada had continued its efforts to convince certain permanent members of the Council — members with a special responsibility for peace and security — that the time had come to solve the financial crisis of UNFICYP. A draft resolution, which would have committed the Council to replacing voluntary contributions with assessed contributions, effective from the next mandate renewal in June 1991, had been prepared and circulated among the Council members.⁵⁷ In the face of the reluctance of certain permanent members to commit themselves to sharing in the cost of the Force, the draft resolution had twice been revised, resulting in the resolution that the Council had adopted.⁵⁸

The representative of Finland stated that his country, as a troop contributor, had consistently supported the Secretary-General’s efforts to bring about a change in the present system of financing and had cooperated with other troop-contributing countries in order to achieve a change from voluntary to assessed contributions. He expressed the hope that this process would lead to an irreversible change in June 1991.⁵⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation regretted that the Council had not been able to “go the whole way”, but believed that the resolution just adopted was a big step forward. His delegation also welcomed the fact that the Council had at last committed itself to finding a solution to the problem of the finances of UNFICYP. In view of the fact that the Council might soon have before it proposals for much larger peacekeeping operations in Western Sahara and Cambodia, it was simply not equitable or acceptable to leave the anomalous and unsatisfactory arrangements for financing UNFICYP unchanged.⁶⁰

The representative of China pointed out that the decisions governing the establishment, composition and financial arrangements for UNFICYP had been made in special circumstances existing at that time and the Force, therefore, had its own unique features. If its financial arrangements were to be altered, questions of reconsidering and changing other aspects of the Force’s arrangements as a whole might also arise. An appropriate solution could be reached only through full consultations. The representative emphasized that, although his delegation believed that consultations should continue, China was not committed to any change in the financing of UNFICYP.⁶¹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics reiterated that the financing arrangements for UNFICYP could not be considered apart from its other fundamental aspects. He recalled that his delegation had supported resolution 186 (1964) by which UNFICYP was established in view of the fact that the resolution would not impose financial obligations on States that did not participate in the Force. He noted that the financing of peacekeeping operations in general had become an acute problem and that the large States, the major contributors, including the Soviet Union, paid a considerable amount for peacekeeping operations around the world. He stressed that the resolution adopted by the Council did not prejudice the question of UNFICYP financing and that mandatory financing would not be automatically applied to the Force. In conclusion, he emphasized that the problem of a settlement in Cyprus should be at the forefront of the Council’s attention.⁶²

The representative of the United States stated that his country fully supported UNFICYP and considered it to be an integral part of the Secretary-General’s efforts to facilitate a lasting and just solution to the Cyprus problem. He also believed that a solution to the problem of funding shortfalls caused by the decline in voluntary donations to UNFICYP had to be found. While the funding problem was being addressed, the Council should also review means to reduce the operating expenses of the Force without undermining its ability to perform its mission.⁶³

The representative of France stated that while peacekeeping operations were a valuable instrument — enabling the United Nations to carry out the duties entrusted to it under the Charter in regard to the maintenance of international peace and security — they should always be temporary and could not be regarded as a substitute for peace or for the quest for a negotiated political settlement. Therefore, in dealing with the financial difficulties facing UNFICYP, the Council should avoid any decision that might strengthen an already too pronounced trend towards institutionalizing the Force and making it permanent. However, his delegation was open to an in-depth review of the financing of the Force that would cover also the functioning and organizational aspects of the Force.⁶⁴

Decision of 28 March 1991: statement by the President

On 28 March 1991, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵

The members of the Security Council have considered the Secretary-General’s report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus. They are unanimous in expressing their full support of his current efforts.

The members of the Council agree with the Secretary-General’s assessment of the current situation, including the main issues that remain to be clarified before an outline of an overall settlement can be completed, and encourage him to continue his efforts along the lines he has proposed by making suggestions to facilitate the discussions.

The members of the Council reaffirm Council resolution 649 (1990) of 12 March 1991 and the mandate for the Secretary-General's mission of good offices as set out in resolution 367 (1975) of 12 March 1975; and recall that resolution 649 (1990) reaffirmed in particular resolution 367 (1975) as well as the Council's support for the high-level agreements of 1977 and 1979 between the leaders of the two communities. This should continue to serve as the basis for the Secretary-General's effort to arrive at an agreed outline.

The members of the Council urge all concerned to act in a manner consistent with resolution 649 (1990), to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and to continue the discussions that have taken place over the past few months in order to resolve without delay the outstanding issues.

The members of the Council welcome the Secretary-General's intention to submit a further report by early July 1991 on his effort to arrive at an agreed outline of an overall settlement. The members of the Council will decide, in the light of the situation at that time, on any further measures for proceeding that may be necessary.

Decision of 14 June 1991 (2992nd meeting):
resolution 697 (1991)

On 31 May 1991, pursuant to resolution 680 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the activities of the United Nations operation in Cyprus,⁶⁶ covering developments from 1 December 1990 to 31 May 1991. The Secretary-General stated that the continued presence of UNFICYP in the island remained indispensable to achieve the objectives set by the Council, and recommended that the Council extend its mandate for a further six-month period.⁶⁷ He noted that UNFICYP was facing a chronic and ever-deepening financial crisis and suggested once again that the United Nations share of the Force's costs should be financed from assessed contributions.

⁶⁶ S/22665.

⁶⁷ In an addendum dated 3 June 1991 (S/22665/Add.1), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a map of the UNFICYP deployment on May 1991. The Secretary-General subsequently informed the Council that the Governments of Cyprus, Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate, while the Government of Turkey had stated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/22700 was unacceptable as a basis for such an extension, and that its stand would be expounded at the forthcoming meeting of the Security Council (S/22665/Add.2).

At its 2992nd meeting, on 14 June 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also invited Mr. Osman Ertug to participate in the discussion under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

The President (Côte d'Ivoire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 697 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 31 May and 3 and 14 June 1991,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 June 1991,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 December 1991;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 30 November 1991;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

The representative of Cyprus, welcoming the extension of the Force's mandate, called for a swift conclusion to the Council's deliberations on the financing of UNFICYP. Rejecting the Turkish proposal for quadrilateral talks on Cyprus, he instead supported convening a conference, presided over by the Secretary-General with the participation of the

Governments of the permanent members of the Council, Greece, Turkey and Cyprus, and of the two communities in Cyprus. He stated that communal rights were important, but they could not be a motive for the denial of individual rights and freedoms; nor could they be augmented through violations of international law, whether by military occupation, the implantation of settlers or the forcible removal of populations for the purpose of creating homogeneous areas. His delegation believed that a solution for Cyprus, achieved through a demilitarized federal republic without foreign troops and settlers, must provide for the equal security of individual citizens of both communities and of the federal state.⁶⁹

The representative of Greece stated that his Government had hoped, subsequent to the establishment of an informal group of friends of the President, that it would be possible to put into effect an alternative method of financing UNFICYP before 15 June 1990, as was anticipated in resolution 682 (1990). The Government of Greece rejected the Turkish proposal for a high-level quadrilateral meeting and proposed that Turkey should first respond to the Secretary-General's questions regarding territorial adjustments, freedom of settlement, displaced persons, and the structure and functioning of the federal executive. A conference should then be convened under the Secretary-General's chairmanship with the participation of the five permanent members of the Council and Greece, Turkey and Cyprus, as well as the two communities in Cyprus.⁷⁰

Mr. Ertug said that the Turkish Cypriot side had sought to facilitate the process of negotiations within the framework of the Secretary-General's good offices and take advantage of the opportunity created by the adoption of resolution 649 (1990), in which the Council called on the two sides to cooperate, on an equal footing, with the Secretary-General. However, by claiming that equality as expressed in resolution 649 (1990) was limited to the negotiating table, the Greek Cypriots and Greece had clearly ruled out the political equality of the Turkish Cypriots in a future federation. The Turkish Cypriots supported the proposal to hold a quadripartite meeting put forward by Turkey, in the belief that it would inject impetus into the negotiating process and facilitate the Secretary-General's mission of good offices. Rather than adopting a positive attitude to this proposal, the Greek Cypriot side had stepped up its hostile actions against the Turkish Cypriot people. With a view to promoting mutual trust, his side had put together a package of ideas in the form of stabilization measures, which could be used to supplement an outline for an overall agreement. In connection with the Secretary-General's report, he referred to specific elements that detracted from the balance of the report and indicated that more detailed comments on the report would be conveyed to the Secretariat. Turning to the question of the extension of the mandate of UNFICYP, he reiterated that resolution 697 (1991), which had been just adopted, was unacceptable since it ignored the existing realities in Cyprus and attempted to negate the principle of equality between the two sides; nevertheless, the Government of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" would accept the presence of UNFICYP on its territory on the basis of the terms stated in December 1990. He pointed out that the Force's mandate was not compatible with the radically changed conditions in Cyprus and a reappraisal had become necessary.⁷¹

The representative of Turkey pointed out that the President of his country had proposed the quadripartite summit, within the framework of the Secretary-General's good offices, in order to break the present stalemate afflicting the intercommunal talks. On the other hand, the proposal to convene an international conference attended by, among others, the Government of Cyprus and the representatives of the Turkish Cypriots and the Greek Cypriots could not be taken seriously, because it would violate the equality of the two sides. Although the reference in resolution 697 (1991) to the "Government of Cyprus" was not acceptable, his Government had no objection to the extension of the mandate of UNFICYP.⁷²

The representative of Cyprus pointed out that his delegation was participating pursuant to rule 37 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council. However, by allowing participation under rule 39 of the previous speaker as a representative of the so-called illegal entity of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus", the Council had become part of a masquerade. Rejecting Mr. Ertug's interpretation of resolution 649 (1990), he emphasized that the resolution clearly denied the right of self-determination of the Turkish Cypriots. As far as the equality of the two sides was concerned, he stated that it merely referred to equality in the negotiating process of the intercommunal talks.⁷³

Decision of 14 June 1991 (2993rd meeting):
resolution 698 (1991)

At its 2993rd meeting, on 14 June 1991, held in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled “The costs and financing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus”.

The President (Côte d’Ivoire) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Austria, Belgium and the United Kingdom.⁷⁴ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 698 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 establishing the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for an initial period of three months,

Recalling its subsequent resolutions extending the mandate of the Force, most recently its resolution 697 (1991) of 14 June 1991,

Also recalling the report of the United Nations Secretariat review team on the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus of 7 December 1990 and the recommendations contained therein,

Further recalling its resolution 682 (1990) of 21 December 1990, by which it decided to examine the problem of the costs and financing of the Force in all its aspects, with a view to putting into effect an alternative method of financing simultaneously with the renewal of the mandate on or before 15 June 1991,

Noting with appreciation the recent consultations among Council members on the problem of the costs and financing of the Force in all its aspects, resulting in the report of the Group of Friends of the President of the Security Council of 31 May 1991,

Taking note with concern of the latest report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus, of 31 May and 3 and 14 June 1991, which once again draws attention to the chronic financing problem of the Force,

Reaffirming again the statement of the President of the Security Council of 30 May 1990, in which the members of the Council emphasized that United Nations peacekeeping operations must be launched and maintained on a sound and secure financial basis,

Stressing the importance of an early agreement on a resolution of the Cyprus problem,

1. Concludes that a method of financing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus is needed which will put the Force on a sound and secure financial basis;

2. Also concludes that the question of the costs of the Force needs to be studied further, with the aim of both reducing and clearly defining the costs for which the United Nations should be responsible;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to hold consultations with members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and others concerned on the question of costs, taking into account both the report of the United Nations Secretariat review team on the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus of 7 December 1990 and the report of the Group of Friends of the President of the Security Council of 31 May 1991, and to report to the Council by 1 October 1991, and undertakes to decide, in the light of this report and by the time of the next extension of the mandate of the Force on or before 15 December 1991, on measures to be taken to put the Force on to a sound and secure financial basis.

Decision of 28 June 1991: statement by the President

On 28 June 1991, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, the President issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁵

The members of the Security Council have considered the Secretary-General’s report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus. They are unanimous in reiterating their full support of his current efforts.

The members of the Council recall that they had urged all concerned to cooperate with the Secretary-General and to continue the discussions with a view to resolving without delay the outstanding issues. They regret that, despite the Secretary-General’s efforts, the necessary progress has not yet been made on these outstanding issues.

The members of the Council endorse the Secretary-General’s view that a high-level international meeting, if properly prepared and of adequate duration, could give his efforts the necessary impetus and achieve an agreed outline of an overall settlement. They agree with the Secretary-General’s judgement that before such a meeting could be held, the two sides should be within agreement range on all the issues. They urgently appeal to all concerned to spare no efforts to achieve this goal.

The members of the Council further endorse the Secretary-General's intention to have his aides meet with all concerned during the months of July and August to try to work out a set of ideas that would bring the two sides within agreement range on each of the eight headings of the outline. The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to pursue these consultations urgently and to assist this process by making suggestions.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to provide a full report to the Council by the end of August on the substance of the ideas that were discussed and the responses of all concerned, and to provide his assessment of the situation, particularly with regard to whether the conditions are conducive to a successful outcome of a high-level international meeting.

Decision of 11 October 1991 (3013th meeting):
resolution 716 (1991)

On 8 October 1991, pursuant to the presidential statement of 28 June 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,⁷⁶ providing his assessment of whether the conditions were conducive to a successful outcome of a high-level international meeting.⁷⁷ The Secretary-General informed the Council of the steps taken to prepare for the high-level meeting, under his chairmanship, of Greece, Turkey and the leaders of the two communities. His representatives had held two rounds of discussions with all concerned during July and August 1991, to elaborate a set of ideas that would bring the parties within agreement range. In view of the comprehensive manner in which the ideas had been elaborated during the talks, the leaders of both the communities in Cyprus had agreed that it would be possible to omit the preparation of an outline agreement and proceed directly to an overall framework agreement. President Vassiliou's reaction to the ideas had revealed that, although differences remained to be resolved on a number of issues, the set of ideas as a whole provided the basis for working out an overall framework agreement. In the course of discussions, Mr. Denktash had stated that each side possessed sovereignty which it would retain after the establishment of a federation, including the right of secession, and sought extensive changes in the text of the ideas that was discussed. The introduction of that concept, the Secretary-General noted, would fundamentally alter the nature of a solution based on the existence of one State of Cyprus comprising two communities, provided for in the high-level agreements of 1977 and 1979 and the understandings accepted by both sides and reiterated in successive resolutions of the Council. He remained confident that it would be possible to convene a high-level meeting if a set of ideas which were in keeping with the Security Council resolutions and the high-level agreements of 1977 and 1979 could be finalized. He would therefore request his representatives to resume their discussions early in November with the two sides in Cyprus and Greece and Turkey.

⁷⁷ The Secretary-General reminded the members of the Council that he had postponed the submission of the report, which was due in August, until the completion of the two rounds of talks between his representatives and the two parties in Cyprus and Greece and Turkey.

At its 3013th meeting, on 11 October 1991, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (India) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷⁸ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 716 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 8 October 1991 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting with satisfaction the progress made in preparing a set of ideas as the basis for arriving at an agreed overall framework agreement on Cyprus,

Noting with concern the difficulties encountered in completing this work,

Regretting that it was not possible to convene the high-level international meeting foreseen in the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 28 June 1991,

1. Commends the Secretary-General for his efforts during the past few months, and endorses his report and observations;

2. Reaffirms its previous resolutions on Cyprus;

3. Reaffirms also its position on the Cyprus question, expressed most recently in resolution 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990 and in line with the high-level agreements of 1977 and 1979 between the parties in Cyprus, that the fundamental principles of a Cyprus settlement are the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and non-alignment of the Republic of Cyprus, the exclusion of union in whole or in part with any other country and of any form of partition or secession and the establishment of a new constitutional arrangement for ⁷⁸ S/23137.

Cyprus that would ensure the well-being and security of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities in a bicomunal and bizonal federation;

4. Reaffirms further that its position on the solution to the Cyprus problem is based on one State of Cyprus comprising two politically equal communities as defined by the Secretary-General in the eleventh paragraph of annex I to his report of 8 March 1990;

5. Calls upon the parties to adhere fully to these principles and to negotiate within the framework of them without introducing concepts that are at variance with them;

6. Reaffirms that the Secretary-General's mission of good offices is with the two communities whose participation in the process is on an equal footing;

7. Endorses the Secretary-General's intention to resume discussions in early November with the two parties in Cyprus and Greece and Turkey to complete the set of ideas on an overall framework agreement;

8. Considers that convening a high-level international meeting chaired by the Secretary-General in which the two communities and Greece and Turkey would participate represents an effective mechanism for concluding an overall framework agreement on Cyprus;

9. Requests the leaders of the two communities and Greece and Turkey to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his representatives so that the high-level international meeting can be convened before the end of this year;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council in November 1991 whether sufficient progress has been made to convene the high-level international meeting and, should conditions not be ripe, to convey to the Council the set of ideas as they will have evolved by that time with his assessment of the situation.

Decision of 12 December 1991: statement by the President

On 15 October 1991, pursuant to resolution 698 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the financing of UNFICYP⁷⁹ based on the results of his extensive consultations with members of the Council, troop-contributing countries and others concerned. Among the possible ways considered in the report to reduce the costs of the Force were the following: reduction of troops; reduction of troops with a seasonal increase; replacement of current troops by less expensive troops and change of structure; transformation of UNFICYP into an observer mission; abolition of humanitarian or economic work and the provision of services; examination of operational costs; and examination and rationalization of extra and extraordinary costs. The report also discussed the possibilities of increasing income. The Secretary-General could not recommend any of the options considered in the report. The Secretariat had explored the only remaining possibility — retaining the present structure and composition of the Force but asking the Government with the highest current rate of claims to reduce its request for reimbursement to the level of the other comparable contributor. The Government concerned had indicated that it was prepared to work towards a solution on this basis, but stipulated that its willingness to reduce its claims was conditional on a number of factors, among them that the Security Council decide to move to assessed contributions.

A draft resolution on the financing of UNFICYP was submitted by Austria and the United Kingdom on 10 December 1991,⁸⁰ but was not acted upon by the Council.

On 12 December 1991, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁸¹

In the light of the discussion at the informal consultations of members of the Security Council, it was concluded that the necessary agreement did not currently exist in the Council for a decision to be adopted on a change in the financing of United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus. The members of the Council agreed to keep this issue under urgent review.

Decision of 12 December 1991 (3022nd meeting): resolution 723 (1991)

On 30 November 1991, pursuant to resolution 697 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,⁸² covering developments from 1 June to 30 November 1991. The Secretary-General stated that the continued presence of the Force in the island remained indispensable; therefore, he recommended that the Council extend its mandate for a further six months.⁸³ Finally, he again drew attention to ⁸¹ S/23284.

⁸² S/23263.

⁸³ The Secretary-General subsequently informed the Council that the Governments of Cyprus, Greece and the the financial crisis facing UNFICYP and reiterated his belief that the United Nations share of its costs should be financed from assessed contributions.

At its 3022nd meeting, held on 12 December 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda and considered the item at the same meeting. The Council invited the representatives of Canada, Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. As agreed during its prior consultations, the Council also invited Mr. Osman Ertug to participate in the meeting under rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.

The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 723 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Cyprus of 30 November and 12 December 1991,

Also taking note of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 December 1991,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 June 1992;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed

United Kingdom had indicated that they concurred with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate; however, the Government of Turkey concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, which was that draft resolution S/23281 was unacceptable as a basis for the extension, and that its stand would be expounded at the forthcoming meeting of the Security Council (S/23263/Add.1).

of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 31 May 1992;

3. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

Speaking after the vote, the representatives of Austria and Canada recalled that, by resolution 698 (1991), the Council had undertaken to decide, by the time of the next extension of the UNFICYP mandate on or before 15 December 1991, on measures to put the Force on a secure financial basis. By resolution 723 (1991), which had just been adopted, the Council extended the mandate of the Force without putting it on such a basis. As most of the permanent members had once again opposed the use of assessed contributions to finance UNFICYP, the Council had failed to fulfil its own undertaking as contained in resolution 698 (1991). The representatives placed on record the position of their respective Governments that the essential principle of using assessed financing for peacekeeping operations, in accordance with Article 17(2) of the Charter, ought to be maintained and that such a system of financing should be extended, at the earliest, to UNFICYP. In the light of the failure of the Council to resolve the Force's financing difficulties, Austria and Canada would have to review their continuing contribution in UNFICYP. The representative of Canada further stressed that the purpose of UNFICYP was to create the conditions conducive to the negotiation of a settlement in Cyprus; but after 27 years if a settlement continued to elude the United Nations, the Council should consider not only how to reduce the expenditure of scarce resources on a process that was stalled but also the role of the Force itself.⁸⁵

The representative of Cyprus stated that the renewal of the UNFICYP mandate was indicative of the continued interest and earnest commitment of the Council to finding a just and viable solution to the Cyprus problem. In relation to the issue of the Force's finances, he expressed the hope that the imperative need to maintain the Force at the level required for it to carry out its duties successfully would be recognized for as long as necessary. He observed that resolution 716 (1991) unequivocally rejected the Turkish side's demands for separate sovereignty and a right to self-determination and defined with precision the parameters within which a just solution must be sought. He emphasized that Council resolutions on

Cyprus were directed at all parties concerned in Cyprus, not just the two communities, and that they could not be subjected to arbitrary or selective interpretation.⁸⁶

The representative of Greece stated that his Government regarded the presence and the role of UNFICYP as indispensable, and he appealed to the Council members to ensure that it was properly and justly financed. He held the Government of Turkey and the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community responsible for the stalemate in the negotiating process and welcomed resolution 716 (1991) which reiterated the fundamental principles of a lasting settlement in Cyprus. He characterized the problem of Cyprus as a problem of the invasion and foreign occupation of the territory of an independent State Member of the United Nations by another Member State, which constituted a flagrant violation of the Charter and the Council's resolutions.⁸⁷

Mr. Ertug stated that the Turkish Cypriot side rejected all claims that the Cyprus question was a problem of invasion and occupation. He observed that such claims misrepresented the Cyprus issue as a question between Turkey and the Greek Cypriots and ignored the existence of the Turkish Cypriots as an equal party. The talks on Cyprus had failed to produce a final result because the Greek Cypriot side had persistently refused to accept a power-sharing formula with the Turkish Cypriots on the basis of equality. The Turkish Cypriot side believed that a direct meeting between the leaders was still the best way for making progress. Commenting on the recent report of the Secretary-General,⁸⁸ he asserted that the report contained inaccuracies which detracted from its objectivity. Although resolution 723 (1991) was not acceptable to the Turkish Cypriot side, his Government accepted the presence of UNFICYP on its territory on the basis set out at the most recent occasion when the mandate was renewed. However, the present mandate of UNFICYP needed to be reappraised because it was not compatible with the radically changed conditions and circumstances.⁸⁹

The representative of Turkey noted with concern the systematic campaign of the Greek Cypriot leadership to undermine the very existence of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" and to internationalize the question, presumably in the hope that outsiders could impose a settlement that was contrary to the fundamental interests of one of the parties of the future federation in Cyprus. The quadripartite high-level meeting envisaged in resolution 716 (1991) could serve to facilitate a mutually acceptable resolution, provided that it was not seen as a mechanism for imposing solutions on parties that harboured serious misgivings. The representative of Turkey stated that his Government could not accept the reference to "the Government of Cyprus" in resolution 723 (1991); however, his Government had no objections to the extension of the UNFICYP mandate.⁹⁰

Decision of 23 December 1991 (3024th meeting):
statement by the President

On 19 December 1991, pursuant to resolution 716 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.⁹¹ The Secretary-General informed the Council that, as a result of parliamentary elections and the subsequent change of Government in Turkey, the discussions towards the convening of a high-level international meeting to conclude an overall framework agreement had had to be postponed. However, the set of ideas that had evolved from the talks held in August 1991 represented an important step forward for arriving at an agreement on Cyprus. The framework of a settlement had become clear and would result in the establishment of a bicomunal and bizonal federation and one State comprising two politically equal communities in which sovereignty would be equally shared but indivisible. The expectations raised earlier in the year that a high-level international meeting would be held to conclude the overall framework agreement should not be lost. The Secretary-General believed that a solution was within reach if all concerned were willing to contribute to a compromise solution that safeguarded the legitimate interests and concerns of both communities.

At its 3024th meeting, held on 23 December 1991, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President of the Council (USSR) stated that he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council following consultations among the members of the Council:⁹²

The members of the Security Council have considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 December 1991 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus (S/23300).

The members of the Council expressed their deep gratitude to the Secretary-General for his long and tireless efforts in seeking a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus question. They noted with appreciation that thanks to his efforts, progress was being made during this year towards achieving an overall framework agreement.

The members of the Council reaffirmed the Council's position as expressed in its previous resolutions, especially in resolutions 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990 and 716 (1991) of 11 October 1991.

The members of the Council were unanimous in endorsing the report and observations of the Secretary-General. They fully shared his view that a solution of the Cyprus problem is long overdue. The mere maintenance of the status quo does not constitute a solution. They called on the leaders of the two communities and of Greece and Turkey to devote their full energies to early achievement of this objective.

The members of the Council reiterated the Council's position that the convening of a high-level international meeting chaired by the Secretary-General in which the two communities and Greece and Turkey would participate represents an effective mechanism for concluding an overall framework agreement.

The members of the Council requested the leaders of the two communities and of Greece and Turkey to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in completing on an urgent basis the set of ideas on an overall framework agreement.

The members of the Council requested the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council by April 1992 whether sufficient progress has been made to convene the high-level international meeting and, should conditions not be ripe, to convey to the Council the set of ideas as they will have evolved by that time with his assessment of the situation.

Decision of 10 April 1992 (3067th meeting):
resolution 750 (1992)

On 3 April 1992, pursuant to the presidential statement of 23 December 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.⁹³ He informed the Council that, despite repeated efforts since the beginning of 1992, there had been no progress in reaching an overall agreement. In some areas there had even been regression. Summarizing the set of ideas that had emerged from the talks in August 1991, he opined that it provided the elements of a fair solution on a significant number of parts of the overall agreement. If similar progress could be made on the outstanding issues in the set of ideas, in particular territorial adjustments and displaced persons, an overall solution would be within reach. The Secretary-General concluded that the current effort could not be expected to continue indefinitely if all concerned were not willing to make their contribution to a compromise solution. Furthermore, the usefulness of the parties' endorsement of Council resolutions was undermined by the interpretation they had given them — it was essential that their views be in harmony with the Council's position. He also emphasized that the lack of progress in his mission of good offices was compounded by the financial crisis facing UNFICYP and the resulting dissatisfaction of the troop-contributing Governments. It thus seemed unlikely that UNFICYP could be maintained in its present form beyond the end of the current year. At a time of greatly increased demands on the scarce peacekeeping resources available to the Organization, a critical look had to be taken at long-lived operations such as UNFICYP and the peacemaking process it supported. If an effort to conclude an agreement based on the set of ideas did not succeed, an alternative course of action for dealing with the Cyprus question would have to be considered. He was examining alternative possibilities and would report on them to the Council in May 1992.

At its 3067th meeting, held on 10 April 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Zimbabwe) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 750 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 3 April 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on Cyprus,

Noting with concern that there has been no progress in completing the set of ideas for an overall framework agreement since the Secretary-General's report of 8 October 1991 and that in some areas there has even been regression,

Welcoming the assurances given to the Secretary-General over the past two months by the leaders of the two communities and the Prime Ministers of Greece and Turkey of their desire to cooperate with him and his representatives,

1. Commends the Secretary-General for his efforts, and expresses its appreciation for his report of 3 April 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus;

2. Reaffirms the position, set out in resolutions 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990 and 716 (1991) of 11 October 1991, that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as defined in paragraph 11 of the Secretary-General's report in a bicomunal and bizonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

3. Calls again upon the parties to adhere fully to these principles and to negotiate without introducing concepts that are at variance with them;

4. Endorses the set of ideas described in paragraphs 17 to 25 and 27 of the Secretary-General's report as an appropriate basis for reaching an overall framework agreement, subject to the work that needs to be done on the outstanding issues, in particular on territorial adjustments and displaced persons, being brought to a conclusion as an integrated package mutually agreed upon by both communities;

5. Requests all concerned to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his representatives in clarifying without delay these outstanding issues;

6. Reaffirms that the Secretary-General's mission of good offices is with the two communities, whose participation in the process is on an equal footing to assure the well-being and security of both communities;

7. Decides to remain seized of the Cyprus question on an ongoing and direct basis in support of the effort to complete the set of ideas referred to in paragraph 4 above and to conclude an overall framework agreement;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to pursue his intensive efforts to complete the set of ideas referred to in paragraph 4 above during May and June 1992, to keep the Council closely informed of his efforts and to seek the Council's direct support whenever necessary;

9. Continues to believe that, following the satisfactory conclusion of the Secretary-General's intensive efforts to complete the set of ideas referred to in paragraph 4 above, the convening of a high-level international meeting chaired by the Secretary-General in which the two communities and Greece and Turkey would participate represents an effective mechanism for concluding an overall framework agreement;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to submit a full report to the Council on the outcome of his efforts by July 1992 at the latest and to make specific recommendations for overcoming any outstanding difficulty;

11. Reaffirms the important mandate entrusted to the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus and looks forward to receiving the report on the Force that the Secretary-General proposes to submit in May 1992.

Decision of 12 June 1992 (3084th meeting):
resolution 759 (1992)

On 31 May 1992, pursuant to resolution 723 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,⁹⁵ covering developments from 1 December 1991 to 31 May 1992. Noting that one or more of the Force's main contingents might soon be withdrawn or reduced because of the uniquely unsatisfactory system of financing UNFICYP, the Secretary-General outlined two ways in which the Council could proceed. One option would be to accept the risk of executing the existing mandate with fewer troops; the other option would be to tailor the mandate to one that could be executed by the smaller number of troops likely to be available under the current financial arrangements. The second option would entail abandoning the function that had enabled UNFICYP to keep the peace in Cyprus, namely controlling the buffer zone. Without the presence of the Force in the buffer zone the danger of petty incidents escalating into armed conflict would greatly increase. Therefore, the better solution would be to alter the structure of the Force by reducing the number of battalions from four to three, while simultaneously increasing the number of troops deployed on the line. The Secretary-General stated that consultations with the troop contributors were necessary in order to clarify their precise intentions about continuing participation in UNFICYP, including the timing of any reduction or withdrawal of their contingents, and to explore with them the possibilities discussed in the report. In this way it would be possible to define specific proposals for submission to the Security Council at the appropriate time. The Secretary-General concluded that the continued presence of UNFICYP remained indispensable to achieve the objectives of the Council and he therefore recommended that it extend the mandate of the Force for a further six-month period.⁹⁶

At its 3084th meeting, held on 12 June 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the Council's members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 759 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 31 May and 10 June 1992 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Security Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that in view of the prevailing conditions in the island, it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 June 1992,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peace-keeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period ending on 15 December 1992;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting the troop-contributing Governments as envisaged in paragraph 56 of his report, to submit specific proposals to the Security Council no later than 1 September 1992 on the restructuring of the Force, such proposals to be based on the realistic options available in current circumstances;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Security Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 30 November 1992;

⁹⁶ The Secretary-General subsequently informed the Council that the Governments of Cyprus, Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate; the Government of Turkey had indicated that it concurred with and supported the position put forward by the Turkish Cypriot side, as expressed at previous meetings of the Security Council on the extension of the mandate (S/24050/Add.1).

4. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

Decision of 13 July 1992 (3094th meeting):
statement by the President

At the 3094th meeting, held on 13 July 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the President (Cape Verde), following consultations among the members of the Council, made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹⁸

The Council recalls the oral report presented on 24 June 1992 on the Secretary-General's mission of good offices in Cyprus. It welcomes the separate meetings which the Secretary-General had with the leaders of the two communities from 18 to 23 June. It notes with satisfaction that the discussions focused on the issues of territorial adjustments and displaced persons and that the other six issues that make up the set of ideas on an overall framework agreement were also reviewed. The Council is unanimous in expressing its full support of the procedure adopted by the Secretary-General for implementing resolution 750 (1992) of 10 April 1992.

The Council reaffirms its endorsement of the set of ideas as an appropriate basis for reaching an overall framework agreement as mentioned in paragraph 4 of resolution 750 (1992).

The Council notes with satisfaction the acceptance by the leaders of the two communities to resume on 15 July 1992 their meetings with the Secretary-General and to remain for such reasonable duration as may be necessary to complete the work.

The Council considers that the forthcoming meetings represent a determining phase in the Secretary-General's effort and calls on both leaders to be ready to take the necessary decisions to reach agreement on each of the issues as dealt with in the set of ideas as an integrated whole on an overall framework agreement.

The Council endorses the Secretary-General's intention to invite the two leaders to a joint meeting as soon as the proximity talks reveal that the two sides are within agreement range on the set of ideas; and, subject to the successful completion of the work at the joint meeting, to convene an international high-level meeting to conclude the overall framework agreement.

The Council calls upon all concerned to fulfil their responsibilities and cooperate fully with the Secretary-General to ensure the success of these meetings.

The Council reaffirms its decision to remain seized of the Cyprus question on an ongoing and direct basis in support of the effort to complete the set of ideas and to conclude an overall framework agreement.

The Council requests that the Secretary-General provide it with an ongoing assessment of the progress being made at the meetings beginning on 15 July so as to enable the Council to determine, as the talks unfold, how it might best lend its full and direct support.

The Council looks forward to receiving at the conclusion of these meetings a full report from the Secretary-General as requested in paragraph 10 of resolution 750 (1992).

Decision of 26 August 1992 (3109th meeting):
resolution 774 (1992)

On 21 August 1992, pursuant to resolution 750 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.⁹⁹ He reported that the strenuous effort from June to August had yielded some progress but had not achieved the expected goal. In the series of talks held with the leaders of both communities, the Secretary-General had concentrated on the two outstanding issues, territorial adjustments and displaced persons, as envisaged by the Council. On territorial adjustments, substantive discussions had taken place for the first time, but the Turkish Cypriot side needed to show the necessary willingness to foresee an adjustment more or less in line with the suggestions embodied in the set of ideas, if the delicately crafted balance in the remainder of the set of ideas was to be maintained. Concerning displaced persons, the Secretary-General welcomed the acceptance by the Turkish Cypriot side of the principle of the right to return and the right to property. The set of ideas offered reasonable arrangements that addressed the practical difficulties involved in resolving the issue of displaced persons in a manner that took into account the legitimate rights and interests of both sides. The Secretary-General concluded that the set of ideas as an integrated whole had been sufficiently developed and the two outstanding issues brought to the same level of clarity as the other elements of the set of ideas to enable the two sides to reach an overall agreement, provided the leaders manifested the necessary political will. A continuation of the status quo was not a viable option. Therefore, should no agreement emerge from the talks scheduled for October 1992, it would be necessary for the Council seriously to consider alternative courses of action for resolving the Cyprus problem.

At its 3109th meeting, held on 26 August 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁰⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 774 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 21 August 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on Cyprus,

Noting that some progress has been achieved, in particular the acceptance by both sides of the right of return and the right to property, and in a narrowing of the gap by both sides on territorial adjustments,

Expressing concern nevertheless that it has not yet been possible, for reasons explained in the above-mentioned report, to achieve the goals set out in resolution 750 (1992) of 10 April 1992,

1. Endorses the report of the Secretary-General of 21 August 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus and commends him for his efforts;

2. Reaffirms its position that a Cyprus settlement must be based on a State of Cyprus with a single sovereignty and international personality and a single citizenship, with its independence and territorial integrity safeguarded, and comprising two politically equal communities as defined in paragraph 11 of the report of the Secretary-General of 3 April 1992 in a bicomunal and bizonal federation, and that such a settlement must exclude union in whole or in part with any other country or any form of partition or secession;

3. Endorses the set of ideas including suggested territorial adjustments reflected in the map contained in the annex to the report of the Secretary-General of 21 August 1992 as the basis for reaching an overall framework agreement;

4. Agrees with the Secretary-General that the set of ideas as an integrated whole has now been sufficiently developed to enable the two sides to reach an overall agreement;

5. Calls on the parties to manifest the necessary political will and to address in a positive manner the observations of the Secretary-General for resolving the issues covered in his report;

6. Urges the parties, when they resume their face-to-face talks with the Secretary-General on 26 October 1992, to pursue uninterrupted negotiations at United Nations Headquarters in New York until an overall framework agreement is reached on the basis of the entire set of ideas;

7. Reaffirms its position that the Secretary-General should convene, following the satisfactory conclusion of the face-to-face talks, a high-level international meeting chaired by him to conclude an overall framework agreement, in which the two communities and Greece and Turkey would participate;

8. Requests all concerned to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his representatives in preparing the ground prior to the resumption of the direct talks in October to facilitate the speedy completion of the work;

9. Expresses the expectation that an overall framework agreement will be concluded in 1992 and that 1993 will be the transitional period during which the measures set out in the appendix to the set of ideas will be implemented;

10. Reaffirms that, in line with previous resolutions of the Security Council, the present status quo is not acceptable, and, should an agreement not emerge from the talks that will reconvene in October, calls on the Secretary-General to identify the reasons for the failure and to recommend to the Council alternative courses of action to resolve the Cyprus problem;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council, prior to the end of 1992, a full report on the talks that will resume in October.

Decision of 25 November 1992 (3140th meeting): resolution 789 (1992)

On 19 November 1992, pursuant to resolution 774 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on his mission of good offices in Cyprus.¹⁰¹ The Secretary-General informed the Council that the outcome of the joint meetings held in the period from 28 October to 11 November 1992 had not met expectations. While the meetings clarified in an unprecedented manner the respective positions of the two sides, they failed to achieve the objectives set by the Council in resolution 774 (1992) and reach an overall framework agreement. The lack of political will, mentioned in his report of 12 August 1992,¹⁰² continued to block the conclusion of an agreement that was otherwise within reach.

Some of the differences between the two sides amounted to variations of the set ideas and ought, therefore, to prove amenable to harmonization. However, certain positions taken by the Turkish Cypriot side were fundamentally at variance with the set of ideas. Those positions fell broadly under the following headings: the concept of federation, displaced persons, and territorial adjustments. With regard to the concept of federation, the position of the Turkish Cypriot side was based on the premise that there currently existed two sovereign States with equal rights and that they would remain effectively sovereign in a future federation. The Secretary-General recalled that the resolutions of the Council concerning Cyprus had from 1964 onwards sought to preserve the territorial integrity and unity of Cyprus. Concerning displaced persons, the Secretary-General stated that, although the leader of the Turkish Cypriot side had accepted the principle of the right to return and the right to property, the exceptions set out by the Turkish Cypriot side would in effect preclude the possibility that any Greek Cypriot displaced persons would be able to return. Concerning territorial adjustments, the leader of the Turkish Cypriot side refused to accept the map included in the set of ideas, even as a basis for discussion. It was essential that the Turkish Cypriot side adjusted its positions more or less in line with the suggestions in the set of ideas given their delicate balance. The Secretary-General noted that the Greek Cypriot side frequently appended provisos when it declared that it accepted the provisions of the set of ideas; those would have to be cleared up at the forthcoming meetings without deviating from the set of ideas.

In order to counteract the deep crisis of confidence existing between the two sides and enhance prospects for the success of the forthcoming meetings, the Secretary-General proposed a range of confidence-building measures to be embraced by the parties before the scheduled resumption of negotiations in March 1993. They included the reduction in the level of Turkish troops, to be reciprocated by a suspension of weapons acquisition programmes on the Greek Cypriot side; the extension of the unmanning agreement to cover all areas of the United Nations-controlled buffer zone where the parties were in close proximity to each other; the inclusion of Varosha in the UNFICYP-controlled area; the reduction of travel restrictions across the buffer zone to promote people-to-people contact; the promotion of bicomunal projects; a Cyprus-wide census under United Nations auspices; and feasibility studies on the resettlement and rehabilitation of Turkish Cypriots affected by territorial adjustments as part of the overall agreement. Finally, the Secretary-General urged the Council to keep developments under close review in order to consider any additional action that should be taken to achieve a speedy solution to the Cyprus problem.

¹⁰² S/24471.

At its 3140th meeting, held on 25 November 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. At the same meeting, the President (Hungary) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁰³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 789 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus,

Noting with satisfaction that the leaders of the two communities discussed all the issues in the set of ideas with the result that there were areas of agreement, as noted in the above-mentioned report,

Welcoming the agreement by the two sides to meet again with the Secretary-General in early March 1993 to complete the work on an agreed set of ideas,

1. Reaffirms all its previous resolutions on Cyprus, including resolutions 365 (1974) of 13 December 1974, 367 (1975) of 12 March 1975, 541 (1983) of 18 November 1983, 550 (1984) of 11 May 1984 and 774 (1992) of 26 August 1992;

2. Endorses the report of the Secretary-General of 19 November 1992 on his mission of good offices in Cyprus and commends him for his efforts;

3. Reaffirms also its endorsement of the set of ideas including the territorial adjustments reflected in the map contained in the appendix to the report of the Secretary-General of 21 August 1992 as the basis for reaching an overall framework agreement;

4. Reaffirms further its position that the present status quo is not acceptable and that an overall agreement in line with the set of ideas should be achieved without further delay;

5. Notes that the recent joint meetings did not achieve their intended goal, in particular because certain positions adopted by the Turkish Cypriot side were fundamentally at variance with the set of ideas;

6. Calls upon the Turkish Cypriot side to adopt positions that are consistent with the set of ideas on those issues identified by the Secretary-General in his report of 19 November 1992, and for all concerned to be prepared in the next round of talks to make decisions that will speedily bring about an agreement;

7. Recognizes that the completion of this process in March 1993 would be greatly facilitated by the implementation by each side of measures designed to promote mutual confidence;

8. Urges all concerned to commit themselves to the confidence-building measures set out below:

(a) As a first step towards the withdrawal of non-Cypriot forces envisaged in the set of ideas, the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus undergo a significant reduction and a reduction of defence spending must be effected in the Republic of Cyprus;

(b) The military authorities on each side cooperate with the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus in order to extend the unmanning agreement of 1989 to all areas of the United Nations-controlled buffer zone where the two sides are in close proximity to each other;

(c) With a view to the implementation of resolution 550 (1984), the area at present under the control of the Force be extended to include Varosha;

(d) Each side take active measures to promote people-to-people contact between the two communities by reducing restrictions to the movement of persons across the buffer zone;

(e) Restrictions imposed on foreign visitors crossing the buffer zone be reduced;

(f) Each side propose bicomunal projects, for possible financing by lending and donor Governments as well as international institutions;

(g) Both sides commit themselves to the holding of a Cyprus-wide census under the auspices of the United Nations;

(h) Both sides cooperate to enable the United Nations to undertake, in the relevant locations, feasibility studies (i) in connection with the resettlement and rehabilitation of persons who would be affected by the territorial adjustments as part of the overall agreement, and (ii) in connection with the programme of economic development that would, as part of the overall agreement, benefit those persons who would resettle in the area under Turkish Cypriot administration;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to follow up on the implementation of the above confidence-building measures and to keep the Council informed as appropriate;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to maintain such preparatory contacts as he considers appropriate before the resumption of the joint meetings in March 1993, and to propose for the Council's consideration revisions in the negotiating format to make it more effective;

11. Further requests the Secretary-General, during the March 1993 joint meetings, to assess developments on a regular basis with the Council with a view to considering what further action may be needed by the Council;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a full report to the Security Council after the conclusion of the joint meetings that will resume in March 1993.

¹⁰³ S/24841.

Decision of 14 December 1992 (3148th meeting):
resolution 796 (1992)

On 1 December 1992, pursuant to resolution 759 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,¹⁰⁴ covering developments from 1 June to 30 November 1992. The Secretary-General concluded that the continued presence of UNFICYP on the island remained indispensable to achieve the objectives set by the Council, and recommended that its mandate be extended for another six months.¹⁰⁵

The Secretary-General reported that, in the light of a forthcoming troop reduction of 28 per cent,¹⁰⁶ the remaining UNFICYP contingents were being restructured and reorganized in order to maintain the Force's ability to implement its present mandate to the greatest extent possible. The troop-contributing Governments had informed the Secretary-General that they wished to make further reductions in their contingents during 1993. The progressive reductions in the strength of the Force had brought UNFICYP to a point at which the viability of its current operational concept was in doubt. In the future the Force would not be able to react as rapidly as in the past to ceasefire violations or incidents, nor would it be able to maintain the same level of control of the buffer zone as it had previously done. The reductions meant that greater responsibility would rest on the two sides for ensuring that conditions were maintained for a speedy overall agreement as envisaged by the Council and that there was no increase in tension in Cyprus. The efforts of UNFICYP to promote a return to normal conditions by facilitating humanitarian activities would also be affected by the troop reduction. At the same time, UNFICYP faced a potential increase in its tasks if all concerned implemented the confidence-building measures endorsed in resolution 789 (1992).

¹⁰⁵ The Secretary-General subsequently informed the Security Council that the Governments of Cyprus, Greece and the United Kingdom had indicated their concurrence with the proposed extension of the UNFICYP mandate. The Government of Turkey had indicated that it concurred with and supported the position of the Turkish Cypriot side, as expressed at previous meetings of the Security Council on the extension of the mandate of UNFICYP (S/24917/Add.1).

¹⁰⁶ See the report of the Secretary-General (S/24581) submitted pursuant to paragraph 2 of resolution 759 (1992).

The Secretary-General reported that he was pursuing his consultations with the troop-contributing Governments about a restructuring of the Force and would report as soon as possible to the Council. He was also exploring the possibility of finding additional countries that could agree to contribute troops to replace those being withdrawn; however, his impression was that even if UNFICYP was radically restructured it was likely that a viable arrangement could exist only on the basis of financing by assessed contributions.

At its 3148th meeting, held on 14 December 1992, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda.

At the same meeting, the President (India) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁰⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 796 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 1 and 9 December 1992 on the United Nations operation in Cyprus,

Taking note also of the recommendation by the Secretary-General that the Council extend the stationing of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus for a further period of six months,

Noting that the Government of Cyprus has agreed that, in view of the prevailing conditions in the island, it is necessary to keep the Force in Cyprus beyond 15 December 1992,

Reaffirming the provisions of resolution 186 (1964) of 4 March 1964 and other relevant resolutions,

1. Extends once more the stationing in Cyprus of the United Nations Peacekeeping Force established under resolution 186 (1964) for a further period, ending on 15 June 1993;
2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, to keep the Council informed of the progress made and to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution by 31 May 1993;
3. Welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General expressed in paragraph 46 of his report to pursue his consultations with the troop-contributing Governments about a restructuring of the Force and to report on this to the Security Council as soon as possible;
4. Calls upon all the parties concerned to continue to cooperate with the Force on the basis of the present mandate.

18. The situation in Georgia

Initial proceedings

Decision of 10 September 1992: statement by the President

By a letter dated 8 September 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of the Russian Federation transmitted the text of the agreement on the situation in Abkhazia signed in Moscow, on 3 September 1992, by the Presidents of the Russian Federation and the Republic of Georgia, and agreed to by the leaders of Abkhazia (the “Moscow Agreement”). The Agreement, inter alia, ensured the territorial integrity of Georgia, provided for a ceasefire effective as from 5 September and established a Monitoring and Inspection Commission composed of representatives of Georgia, including Abkhazia, and the Russian Federation to ensure compliance with the Agreement. The Agreement also contained an appeal by the parties to the United Nations and to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to promote respect for the principles of settlement it set out, particularly by sending fact-finding missions and observers to the area.

On 10 September 1992, following consultations held on the same day among the members of the Security Council, the President of the Council (Ecuador) made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:²

The members of the Council, having heard the information provided by the Secretary-General and having considered the Final document of the Moscow meeting between the President of the Russian Federation and the Chairman of the State Council of the Republic of Georgia, held on 3 September 1992, express their satisfaction with the efforts of the participants of the meeting aimed at achieving an immediate ceasefire, overcoming the crisis situation and creating conditions for a comprehensive political settlement in Abkhazia, which had become an area of armed conflict.

The members of the Council, stressing the urgent necessity for a political settlement of the conflict by peaceful means, through negotiations, reaffirm the inadmissibility of any encroachment upon the principle of territorial integrity and upon Georgia’s internationally recognized borders, and the necessity of respecting the rights of all people of all ethnic groups in the region. They welcome the resumption of the normal functioning of the legitimate authorities in Abkhazia.

In this connection the members of the Council welcome the principles of the settlement contained in the above-mentioned final document and commend the concrete measures aimed at a settlement in Abkhazia envisaged in it. They call upon all the parties to the conflict and all others concerned to observe strictly the agreements achieved in Moscow.

The members of the Council take note of the intention of the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission and request him to inform the Security Council periodically of the developments there.

Decision of 8 October 1992 (3121st meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 6 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³ the First Deputy Foreign Minister of Georgia requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the grave and deteriorating situation in Georgia as a result of the armed conflict in Abkhazia, which threatened regional and international peace and security, and asked the Council to take appropriate action to restore peace and stability in the region.

By a letter dated 7 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴ the First Deputy Foreign Minister of Georgia transmitted his statement of the same date addressed to the Security Council. He described the escalation of armed conflict in Abkhazia and its implications for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Georgia. He stated that it was unacceptable that, under “the guise of self-determination”, the actual splintering of the territory of a democratic State Member of the United Nations was taking place, at the instigation of the Abkhaz leaders who represented a small fraction of the total population of Abkhazia. He emphasized that Georgia followed all the norms of international law, especially those pertaining to the protection of human rights and the rights of ethnic minorities. The First Deputy Foreign Minister contended that Russian armed forces had not complied with their obligations under the Moscow Agreement and denounced a conspiracy between Abkhaz separatists, nationalistic terrorists from the so-called confederation of Caucasian nations and reactionary forces from within the state structures of the Russian Federation. The central Government of the Russian Federation had been unable to curb this “direct aggression” against Georgia. The conflict was not simply a local border skirmish: it might attain regional dimensions. Indeed, by the sheer magnitude of the violation of human rights, it had already become a global issue. Georgia looked to the United Nations to find a way to bring an end to the “military aggression” and to launch peace talks in the region, in compliance with the Moscow Agreement, which it considered should serve as a basis for a just and equitable settlement of the conflict. Georgia requested the Security Council to authorize the Secretary-General to send his personal representative to the region. It also asked the Council to send either a small United Nations peacekeeping force or 10 to 15 military observers who would work under the Secretary-General’s personal envoy. Moreover, Georgia intended to launch a formal complaint with the International Court of Justice to investigate the cases of atrocities and numerous violations of the Vienna and Hague Conventions.

By a letter dated 7 October 1992, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council a summary of the report of the mission of good offices to Georgia, which had been conducted from 12 to 20 September 1992.⁵ In his covering letter, the Secretary-General noted that the situation in Abkhazia had, since the mission, deteriorated considerably. Fierce fighting had broken out again, threatening peace and security in the region. In view of the serious deterioration in the conflict, he intended, in response to the request of the Government of Georgia,⁶ to send a further United Nations mission to the region, headed by an Under-Secretary-General. He proposed that the mission inform the parties of the international community’s grave concern over the fighting; that it stress the urgency of prompt and full implementation of the Moscow Agreement; and that it explore ways in which the United Nations could support implementation of the Agreement, including through the deployment of civilian and/or military observers. The mission would include several observers who would remain in Georgia in order to provide an initial United Nations presence.

By a letter dated 8 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷ the Chairman of the State Council of Georgia reported that, according to reliable sources from Abkhazia, mass executions of the Georgian civilian population, widespread torture, rape and other atrocities were being committed. He appealed to the Council to consider setting up a war crimes commission to collect evidence of possible atrocities committed in Georgia.

At its 3121st meeting, on 8 October 1992, the Council included in its agenda the letter dated 6 October 1992 from the First Deputy Foreign Minister of Georgia.⁸ Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Georgia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the above-mentioned letters of 7 October from, respectively, the First Deputy Foreign Minister of Georgia to the Secretary-General, and the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council.⁹

At the same meeting, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Security Council, the President said that he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰

The Council has noted with concern the summary by the Secretary-General of 7 October 1992 of the report of the goodwill mission to Georgia regarding the situation in Georgia. It thanks the Secretary-General for the useful information contained in that document. It expresses its grave preoccupation regarding the recent deterioration of the situation in Georgia. It calls on all the parties to cease the fighting forthwith and to observe the terms of the agreement concluded on 3 September 1992 in Moscow, which affirms that the territorial integrity of Georgia shall be ensured, which provides for the establishment of a ceasefire and the commitment by the parties not to resort to the use of force, and which constitutes the basis for an overall political situation.

The Council supports the decision of the Secretary-General to send, in response to the request of the Government of Georgia, another mission to Georgia, headed by an Under-Secretary-General, who will be accompanied by members of the Secretariat, some of whom will remain on the spot. It endorses the mandate proposed by the Secretary-General in his letter of 7 October 1992. It looks forward to the report to be submitted by the Secretary-General upon the return of his mission from Georgia and is prepared to consider the recommendations which he plans to submit to it concerning the contribution which the United Nations could make to the implementation of the agreement of 3 September 1992.

The Council notes that the current Chairman of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe intends to dispatch a mission to Georgia in the near future and underlines the need to ensure coordination between the efforts of the United Nations and those of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe aimed at restoring peace.

19. The situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh

Initial proceedings

By a letter dated 9 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Azerbaijan transmitted a statement by the President of Azerbaijan in connection with “the grave situation in Nagorny-Karabakh as a consequence of the intensifying attacks of Armenian forces”. The representative of Azerbaijan stated that the attacks had resulted in the occupation and destruction of the city of Shusha with heavy loss of life. He contended that the massive offensive, supported by the air force and tanks, was a flagrant violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Azerbaijan and a most serious threat to peace. He was accordingly bringing the “very grave situation” to the urgent attention of the Council.

The President of Azerbaijan described the bombardment of the city of Shusha — the ancient centre of Azerbaijani spiritual and cultural life — and added that Armenian forces had cut off the only road linking that city with the rest of Azerbaijan. That provocative incident had seriously jeopardized the outcome of the recent tripartite meeting at Tehran between Azerbaijan, Armenia and the Islamic Republic of Iran, at which there had been agreement that the bloodshed must be stopped. In the President’s view, the matter was clear: a band of separatists and ardent nationalists from Khankendi and their protectors — not only from Armenia — was “playing with the fates of peoples, continuing to rely on force and to fan the flames of hatred and war”. The separatists’ new venture nullified the peacekeeping efforts of the United Nations, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), other international organizations and a number of Heads of State who were seeking to normalize the situation in Karabakh and on the Azerbaijani-Armenian frontier. The President warned that the destruction or capture of the sacred city would inevitably “elicit an appropriate response”, and that the battle for Shusha might develop into a large-scale conflict. He appealed to CSCE, the Presidents of the Russian Federation, Kazakhstan and other States of the Commonwealth of Independent States, Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran, and the entire international community, to restrain the aggressor.

By a letter dated 11 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of Armenia transmitted a letter dated 9 May from the President of Armenia, requesting an emergency meeting of the Council to discuss the escalation of the conflict in Nagorny-Karabakh, the continuing blockade of Armenia and Nagorny-Karabakh, and the threat of potential outside intervention in the region. In his letter, the President of Armenia stated that his country was bringing the situation to the attention of the Council pursuant to Article 35 (1) of the Charter of the United Nations. While Armenia was not a party to the dispute between Nagorny-Karabakh and the Azerbaijani Republic, it had been subject to cross-border attacks from and illegal blockades by the latter. Accordingly, Armenia was specifically requesting the Security Council: (a) to dispatch peacekeeping forces to Nagorny-Karabakh; and (b) to order such other measures as it deemed necessary to compel the lifting of economic blockades, maintain and restore international peace and security, and protect human rights. Armenia also requested the Council to take measures to ensure that all States Members of the United Nations respected their obligations under the Charter and refrained from any and all intervention in the region. In conclusion, the President of Armenia recalled that Nagorny-Karabakh and Azerbaijan had agreed to ceasefires, however temporary, through the recent mediation efforts of the Islamic Republic of Iran. But those agreements were, in his view, not enough; an international peacekeeping force had become essential if the inhabitants of Nagorny-Karabakh were to believe that ceasefires would be respected, a permanent peace process secured and human rights guaranteed. Armenia was convinced that, without the international guarantees that only a United Nations peacekeeping force could provide, the conflict would continue to escalate, jeopardizing the security of the region and, ultimately, of the world.

Decision of 12 May 1992 (3072nd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3072nd meeting, on 12 May 1992, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled “The situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh”, as well as the letters dated 9 and 11 May 1992, respectively, from the representatives of Azerbaijan and Armenia. The Council considered the item at the same meeting.

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two other documents relating to the item on the agenda.³ He then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The members of the Council are deeply concerned by recent reports on the deterioration of the situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh and by violations of ceasefire agreements which have caused heavy losses of human life and widespread material damage, and by their consequences for the countries of the region.

The members of the Council commend and support the efforts undertaken within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, as well as other efforts aimed at assisting the parties in arriving at a peaceful settlement and at providing humanitarian assistance.

The members of the Council welcome the urgent dispatch by the Secretary-General of a mission to the region for fact-finding and to study ways and means to speedily assist the efforts undertaken within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to help the parties to reach a peaceful settlement. This mission will also include a technical element to look into ways the international community could provide prompt humanitarian assistance.

The members of the Council call upon all concerned to take all steps necessary to bring the violence to an end, to facilitate the work of the Secretary-General’s mission and to ensure the safety of its personnel. They recall the statements made on their behalf by the President of the Council on 29 January and 14 February 1992 on the admission, respectively, of Armenia and Azerbaijan to the United Nations, in particular the reference to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes and the non-use of force.

By a letter dated 1 June 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵ the representative of Azerbaijan alleged that the armed forces of Armenia had resorted to using chemical weapons in recent events in Nakhichevan, an Azerbaijani enclave in Armenia. By a letter dated 8 June 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶ the representative of Armenia denied the accusations concerning the use of chemical weapons by his country and requested that a group of experts be dispatched to the conflict zones to assess the situation.

By identical letters dated 11 June 1992 addressed, respectively, to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁷ the representative of Azerbaijan reported that 36 documents had been given to the United Nations fact-finding mission which had gone to Azerbaijan at the end of May. As indicated in the annex to the letters, some of the documents concerned results of tests for the use of chemical weapons carried out by the Ministry of Health of Azerbaijan. Azerbaijan requested that the report of the fact-finding mission be distributed as a Security Council document.⁸ It also requested that the representative of Azerbaijan, as the initiator of the mission, be afforded the opportunity of participating in and addressing the Council's meeting to discuss the report, in accordance with Article 32 of the Charter.

In a note dated 24 July 1992 to the Security Council,⁹ the Secretary-General recalled that, during informal consultations on 19 June 1992, he had informed the Council of his decision to dispatch a mission to the region to investigate the allegations made by Azerbaijan concerning the use of chemical weapons by the armed forces of Armenia in April and May 1992. By his note, he transmitted the report of the mission of experts, which had visited Azerbaijan and Armenia from 4 to 8 July 1992. He noted that the experts had determined that no evidence of the use of chemical weapons had been presented to the team.

Decision of 26 August 1992: statement by the President

By a letter dated 20 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁰ the representative of Armenia drew attention to the rapidly deteriorating and dangerous situation in Armenia and Nagorny-Karabakh and the failure of the CSCE negotiations to bring about an effective ceasefire agreement. He requested an urgent meeting of the Council for the purpose of considering specific steps towards stabilizing the situation.

In his letter, the representative of Armenia reported that intense fighting continued in Nagorny-Karabakh and the border regions of Azerbaijan and Armenia. He claimed that Azerbaijan continued to shell the civilian population of the capital city and a district of Nagorny-Karabakh; at the same time, it was carrying out "attacks of aggression" against Armenia itself, in an attempt to involve it directly in the conflict. Little progress had been made in the negotiations conducted under the auspices of CSCE since January 1992. The representative recalled that, following the presidential statement of 12 May, the Secretary-General had dispatched a fact-finding mission to the region at the end of May and that the Security Council had discussed its report at consultations on 22 June. He claimed that, at those consultations, the Council members had reiterated their support of the efforts of CSCE and decided to study the issue of sending observers to Nagorny-Karabakh, and that the Secretary-General had decided to send observers to the CSCE negotiations. Conditions in Nagorny-Karabakh had deteriorated further, however. Armenia was of the view that, without the active and direct involvement of the United Nations in the peace negotiations, no concrete progress would be realized. Armenia reiterated its belief that peacekeeping forces were necessary to bring about an end to the fighting. It suggested, as a first step, that United Nations observers be sent to Nagorny-Karabakh to negotiate a lasting ceasefire agreement; and, as a second step, that peacekeeping forces be deployed in and around Nagorny-Karabakh and on the Armenian-Azerbaijan border, while negotiations to resolve the conflict were being conducted. Those forces could be sponsored individually or jointly by the United Nations, CSCE or any other appropriate international organization.

By a letter dated 25 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹ the representative of Azerbaijan transmitted a message dated 24 August from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Azerbaijan concerning the status of the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan. The Minister alleged that Armenia was continuing its "armed aggression against Azerbaijan". He stated, further, that Azerbaijan remained nonetheless determined to work towards a peaceful settlement of the dispute and to help to further the process of negotiation within the CSCE framework, which had already achieved results. He added that his country attached great importance to efforts made by the United Nations to help resolve the conflict: namely, its sending of two missions to the region by the Secretary-General, and the endorsement by the Security Council of the CSCE actions. That had strengthened Azerbaijan's conviction that a peaceful settlement could be achieved within the framework of CSCE and had led it to focus its efforts on expanding the results already obtained in the context of that regional organization.

On 26 August 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (China) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²

The members of the Council are deeply concerned by recent reports on the deterioration of the situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh with heavy losses of human life and widespread material damage.

The members of the Council strongly appeal to all parties and others concerned for an immediate ceasefire and support the efforts of the Minsk Conference on the question of Nagorny-Karabakh within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe as well as the preparatory negotiations held in Rome. They urge all parties and others concerned to cooperate closely with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and to participate positively in the negotiations with a view to reaching a peaceful settlement of their disputes as early as possible. They have noted that the Secretary-General dispatched fact-finding missions to the region and was ready to send observers to the above-mentioned negotiations of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The members of the Council will consider further the role of the United Nations in Nagorny-Karabakh at an appropriate time in the light of the development of the situation in the area.

Decision of 27 October 1992 (3127th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 12 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³ the representative of Armenia requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the direct involvement of the United Nations in the efforts to establish peace in Nagorny-Karabakh. He expressed Armenia's full support for the efforts of CSCE and especially those of the Minsk process, but noted that a ceasefire agreement had not been successfully negotiated under its auspices in August. However, a meeting held on 21 September at Sochi, Russian Federation, in support of the CSCE peace process, between representatives of the Russian Federation, Kazakhstan, Armenia and Azerbaijan, had resulted in the signing of a ceasefire agreement, to take effect on 26 September. Although that agreement had already been seriously violated, Armenia believed that, if effective mechanisms were put in place, there was hope that a ceasefire agreement could be successfully implemented. The representative invoked in support Azerbaijan's expression of willingness to enter into a lasting ceasefire agreement and, in accordance with the Sochi agreement, to accept observers in the region. Certain that the appropriate time for direct United Nations involvement had come, Armenia appealed to the United Nations to lend its experience and established mechanisms to bring about and implement a lasting ceasefire agreement. It specifically requested that the Secretary-General designate as soon as possible a special representative and send to the region a United Nations team of observers to assist the parties in reaching a ceasefire agreement and to monitor the situation thereafter.¹⁴

At its 3127th meeting, on 27 October 1992, the Council included in its agenda the letter dated 12 October 1992 from the representative of Armenia. It considered the item at the same meeting.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 24 October 1992 from the representative of Azerbaijan,¹⁵ in which Azerbaijan reiterated that it continued to favour a peaceful settlement of the dispute on the basis of the principles laid down by CSCE, and expressed optimism with regard to accelerating the settlement process within the CSCE framework.

The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁶

The Council is deeply concerned by the grave situation which continues to prevail in Nagorny-Karabakh and surrounding districts, and also by the resulting loss of human life and destruction of property, despite the ceasefire agreement concluded at Sochi on 21 September 1992.

The Council reaffirms the terms of its statement of 26 August 1992 on the situation concerning Nagorny-Karabakh, and in particular its support for the efforts of the Minsk Conference on the Nagorny-Karabakh question within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. It strongly urges all the parties and others concerned to implement the ceasefire forthwith and to lift all blockades. It requests that the Minsk Conference be convened immediately and that political negotiations be undertaken in accordance with the President's rules of procedure. It urges all the parties and others concerned to cooperate closely with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and to participate positively in the Conference in order to reach an overall settlement of their disputes as soon as possible.

The Council welcomes the intention of the Secretary-General to send a representative to the region to evaluate the contribution which the United Nations might make in supporting the efforts of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and in providing humanitarian assistance.

Decision of 25 September 1991 (3009th meeting): resolution 713 (1991)

By a letter dated 19 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Austria requested an urgent consideration, in informal consultations of the members of the Council, of the deteriorating situation regarding Yugoslavia which gave rise to serious concern throughout the region.

By letters dated 19 and 20 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,² the representatives of Canada and Hungary, respectively, requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council in the light of the deteriorating situation in Yugoslavia, the continuation of which was likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

By a letter dated 24 September 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,³ the representative of Yugoslavia stated that his Government welcomed the decision that had been taken, at the initiative of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, to call a meeting of the Council to discuss the situation in Yugoslavia. He added that the Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia wished to participate in the Council meeting, and that he was hopeful that the Council would be able to adopt a resolution at that meeting which would contribute to the current efforts to bring peace to all Yugoslavs.

At its 3009th meeting, on 25 September 1991, the Council included the letters from the representatives of Austria, Canada, Hungary and Yugoslavia in its agenda.

On behalf of the Council, the President (France) expressed deep appreciation for the presence at the meeting of the following Foreign Ministers of States members of the Council: Austria, China, Cuba, Ecuador, India, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zimbabwe. He invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Austria, Belgium, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom.⁴

He also drew their attention to the following other documents: (a) letters dated 5 July to 20 September 1991 from the representative of the Netherlands to the Secretary-General,⁵ transmitting statements and declarations on Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community and its member States during that period, the last of which — a declaration issued on 19 September 1991 — expressed the intention of seeking, through the Security Council, the support of the international community for the European efforts; (b) joint letters dated 7 August to 20 September 1991 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,⁶ also transmitting declarations on Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community and its member States during that period; (c) a letter dated 12 July 1991 from the representative of Czechoslovakia to the Secretary-General,⁷ transmitting the texts of the documents adopted in July 1991 in the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in connection with the situation in Yugoslavia; (d) a letter dated 7 August 1991 from the representative of Austria to the President of the Council,⁸ drawing attention to the recent deterioration of the situation regarding Yugoslavia which gave rise to serious concern throughout the region, and reserving the right to ask for informal consultations of the members of the Council in the light of further developments with a view to the Council taking such measures as might be deemed appropriate; and (e) a letter dated 19 September 1991 from the representative of Australia to the Secretary-General,⁹ expressing the view that the time had come for the international community to reinforce the European efforts through the United Nations, asking the Secretary-General to lend the authority of his own office to the search for a resolution of the problems in Yugoslavia, and suggesting that the Security Council should consider the issue as a matter of urgency.

The President of the Council also noted that members had received copies of a letter dated 25 September 1991 from the representative of Australia addressed to him,¹⁰ attaching a statement by the Foreign Minister of Australia. The latter set out, inter alia, why his Government believed that the Security Council had the authority to consider the situation in Yugoslavia and what the Council could do to support the European efforts. In his country's view, the situation represented a threat to international peace and security in the region justifying, and indeed — in terms of the Charter — requiring, United Nations involvement: continued fighting in Yugoslavia posed a threat to the security of its neighbours; and numbers of refugees fleeing the conflict had already crossed international borders, while the threat of further outflows on a massive scale was of major concern. As to what the United Nations could do, the Security Council could throw the full moral and political authority of the international community behind the European efforts to secure peace in Yugoslavia; the United Nations, and particularly the Secretary-General, could play a more direct role in supporting those efforts by engaging the parties in dialogue; the Council could, as proposed, adopt a resolution imposing an arms embargo on Yugoslavia; and it should stand ready to consider further measures under its Charter competencies, if necessary.

Commencing the discussion, the representative of Yugoslavia stated that the Yugoslav crisis, which threatened peace and security on a large scale, had rightly become a matter of concern for the Council. Yugoslavia was in conflict with itself. The crisis was an integral part of the historical turmoil that had been besetting Central and Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and other parts of the world in recent years. However, it had another tragic aspect due to the historical, political and, particularly, ethnic differences involved. Deep mutual distrust, unilateral acts, the policy of fait accompli and the use of force had blocked all efforts towards a peaceful and democratic resolution of the crisis. The crisis jeopardized not only the present and future of the Yugoslav peoples, but also peace and stability in Europe. It also threatened the emerging new world architecture. Yugoslavia had not been able to resolve the crisis on its own and had welcomed the peace efforts of the European Community under the auspices of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), based on certain basic principles: the unacceptability of any unilateral or forcible changes of borders; protection of, and respect for, the rights of all in Yugoslavia; and full recognition of all legitimate interests and aspirations. Those efforts had included the brokering of a ceasefire, monitored by European Community observers, the suspension of arms deliveries to all the parties involved, and, in September 1991, the inauguration of a Conference on Yugoslavia at The Hague. The speaker stressed the need for a genuine readiness on the part of the international community, the European actors — CSCE and the European Community — and all Yugoslav parties, to utilize the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia in order to consolidate peace and to open a political dialogue on the future of Yugoslavia. He stated that the draft resolution represented a sincere effort to ensure that the Council would enhance the endeavours of the European Community and help Yugoslavia to find the way to help itself. The draft also reaffirmed the original principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the need to preserve international peace and security and to resolve crises primarily through regional arrangements and mechanisms. It was essential that the Yugoslav disputes be resolved through the Conference on Yugoslavia, that the efforts towards peace and dialogue invested by the European Community under the auspices of CSCE should be supported; that the international community be engaged by imposing a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to all parties in Yugoslavia; and that everyone refrain from any action that might contribute to increasing tension and to impeding or delaying a peaceful and negotiated outcome to the conflict in Yugoslavia.¹¹

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Belgium stated that the Council could not fail to address a situation which had caused loss of human life and significant destruction and was a threat to regional peace and security, especially destabilizing in the context of political and economic change in Central and Eastern Europe. He referred to the efforts by the European Community and CSCE, which had called for a ceasefire, the sending of monitors to the area and the convening of a peace conference. Notwithstanding the difficulties encountered in setting up that machinery, the European Community and its member States were determined to contribute to a negotiated settlement on the basis of the following principles: the unacceptability of the use of force; the unacceptability of any modification of frontiers through the use of force — modifications which they were determined not to recognize; respect for the rights of all those who lived in Yugoslavia, including minorities; and the need to take into account all legitimate concerns and aspirations. They needed the support of the Council and of the international community, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter, to lay the groundwork for the parties to settle their dispute within the framework of an international conference.¹²

The representative of Austria stated that his country viewed with great concern the developments in neighbouring Yugoslavia and supported fully the efforts of the European Community and CSCE. Those efforts ought to be supported by the international community as a whole, which had a responsibility to put an end to the armed conflict in Yugoslavia. At the same time, no appeal to the collective security organs could release the European regional organizations from their own responsibility. He reiterated the principles on which the future relations between the peoples in Yugoslavia should be based, including the non-use of force; the right to self-determination; the unacceptability of any changes by force of the borders between the Yugoslav republics; the full implementation of the Paris Charter for a New Europe concerning democracy, the rule of law and respect for human rights; and the conclusion of binding agreements on the protection of minorities and effective guarantees for equal participation in the political process by all groups.¹³

The representative of Zimbabwe stated that he would vote for the draft resolution because the Government of Yugoslavia had clearly indicated its support for it through its letter and the statement by its Foreign Minister. Grieved by the outbreak of tribal hostilities and the escalating toll of death and destruction in Yugoslavia, a founder member of the Non-Aligned Movement, the speaker supported the proposed action by the Council, which focused on two areas: strengthening the hand of the Secretary-General in seeking a peaceful political solution to the problems in Yugoslavia, and stopping the flow of arms into that country. He cautioned, however, that any further action by the Council should be taken properly, within the terms of the Charter and of its own practice.¹⁴

The representative of Yemen said that Yugoslavia was an example of the new type of problems facing the United Nations, which were characterized by political upheavals inside States and a slide towards fragmentation and even anarchy. The Security Council needed to deal creatively with these problems in order to avoid their escalation to the point where they would threaten regional and international security. However, the principles of the Charter, including respect for the sovereignty of States and non-interference in their domestic affairs, must not be disregarded. The Council, while reviewing the bases on which it worked, should not engage in experimentation in settling internal disputes. The speaker, noting the request of the Government of Yugoslavia, hoped that the involvement of the Security Council would contribute to halting the military operations in Yugoslavia and help all parties to settle their disputes and differences peacefully.¹⁵

The representative of Cuba expressed hope that the proposed decision of the Security Council would help to ensure that Yugoslavia and its people would make progress towards the settlement of the country's internal conflicts and achieve stability and lasting peace.¹⁶

The representative of Romania reiterated his country's position that the Security Council's main concern should be to find the best way to encourage the Yugoslav parties to come to an understanding by themselves on issues dividing them and to support the efforts of the European Community to assist those parties to reach such an understanding. Commenting on the draft resolution, he highlighted the importance of the provisions concerning the ceasefire, the arms embargo, and the efforts of the European Community supported by CSCE and those to be undertaken by the Secretary-General. With respect to the embargo, his delegation hoped that all countries would observe the Council's decision in accordance with Article 25 of the Charter.¹⁷

The representative of India stressed that the Council was being formally seized of the situation in Yugoslavia by the State concerned, which was an essential requirement in such cases. Referring to Article 2 (7) of the Charter, he pointed out that the Council's consideration of the item on the agenda related not to Yugoslavia's internal situation as such, but to its implications for peace and security in the region. The Council's intervention became legitimate only when a conflict had serious implications for international peace and security. The efforts of the European Community and CSCE, undertaken with the consent and request of the Yugoslav authorities, deserved commendation and support, as provided for by Chapter VIII of the Charter. The speaker referred specifically to Article 52 (3) and Article 54 of the Charter. In his view, the main purpose of the draft resolution was to throw the Council's moral and political weight behind collective regional efforts.¹⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 713 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Conscious of the fact that Yugoslavia has welcomed, through a letter from the Permanent Representative of Yugoslavia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, the decision to convene a meeting of the Security Council,

Having heard the statement by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Yugoslavia,

Deeply concerned by the fighting in Yugoslavia, which is causing a heavy loss of human life and material damage, and by the consequences for the countries of the region, in particular in the border areas of neighbouring countries,

Concerned that the continuation of this situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter,

Commending the efforts undertaken by the European Community and its member States, with the support of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, to restore peace and dialogue in Yugoslavia, through, inter alia, the implementation of a ceasefire including the sending of observers, the convening of a conference on Yugoslavia, including the mechanisms set forth within it, and the suspension of the delivery of all weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia,

Recalling the relevant principles enshrined in the Charter, and in this context taking note of the declaration of 3 September 1991 of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe that no territorial gains or changes within Yugoslavia brought about by violence are acceptable,

Taking note of the agreement for a ceasefire concluded on 17 September 1991 in Igalo, and also that signed on 22 September 1991,

Alarmed by the violations of the ceasefire and the continuation of the fighting,

Taking note of the letter dated 19 September 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Austria to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, ¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 33-36.

¹⁶ Ibid., pp. 37-38.

¹⁷ Ibid., pp. 43-44.

¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 44-48.

Taking note also of the letters dated 19 and 20 September 1991 from, respectively, the Permanent Representative of Canada and the Permanent Representative of Hungary to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note further of the letters addressed to the Secretary-General dated 5 and 22 July, 6 and 21 August and 20 September 1991 from the Permanent Representative of the Netherlands, the letter dated 12 July 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Czechoslovakia, the letter dated 7 August 1991 from the Permanent Representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the letter dated 19 September 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Australia as well as the letter addressed to the President of the Security Council dated 7 August 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Austria and the letters dated 29 August and 4 and 20 September 1991 from the Permanent Representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations,

1. Expresses its full support for the collective efforts for peace and dialogue in Yugoslavia undertaken under the auspices of the member States of the European Community with the support of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe consistent with the principles of that Conference;

2. Supports fully all arrangements and measures resulting from such collective efforts as those described above, in particular with regard to assistance and support to the ceasefire observers, and to consolidate an effective end to hostilities in Yugoslavia and to assure the smooth functioning of the process instituted within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia;

3. Invites to this end the Secretary-General to offer his assistance without delay, in consultation with the Government of Yugoslavia and all those promoting the efforts referred to above, and to report as soon as possible to the Security Council;

4. Strongly urges all parties to abide strictly by the ceasefire agreements of 17 and 22 September 1991;

5. Appeals urgently to and encourages all parties to settle their disputes peacefully and through negotiation at the Conference on Yugoslavia, including through the mechanisms set forth within it;

6. Decides, under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that all States shall, for the purposes of establishing peace and stability in Yugoslavia, immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia until the Council decides otherwise following consultation between the Secretary-General and the Government of Yugoslavia;

7. Calls upon all States to refrain from any action which might contribute to increasing tension and to impeding or delaying a peaceful and negotiated outcome to the conflict in

Yugoslavia, which would permit all Yugoslavs to decide upon and to construct their future in peace;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution on the understanding that the Security Council discussion was being carried out in special circumstances, that is, with the explicit agreement of the Government of Yugoslavia. However, China's principled position that a country's internal affairs should be handled by the people of that country, and that, according to the Charter, the United Nations, including the Security Council, had to refrain from involving itself and interfering in the internal affairs of any Member State, remained unchanged. The speaker hoped that the Council's action would contribute to the restoration of domestic peace and stability through Yugoslavia's internal peaceful negotiations. He reiterated that the international community, in its endeavours to restore peace and security in the country, must strictly abide by the relevant principles contained in the Charter and international law.¹⁹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics noted that the fratricidal conflict in Yugoslavia had begun to spill over national borders and that, if it continued, it would constitute a direct threat to international peace and security. Convinced that the problems of Yugoslavia and many other multinational States could only be solved through dialogue and negotiation, his delegation had sponsored the resolution just adopted, which called upon all parties to the conflict immediately to cease hostilities and to resolve their disputes peacefully by means of negotiation at the Conference on Yugoslavia. It had been prompted to do so, owing to the consent given by Yugoslavia. The speaker emphasized that intra-State conflicts, like intergovernmental ones, had to be resolved politically, by using new approaches in accordance with the principles both of the Charter and of the CSCE process. Another lesson to be learned from the events in Yugoslavia was the need to respect the rights of national minorities.²⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, against a background of suffering, bereavement and much fear for the future, the Security Council's aim had not been to interfere or to try to impose a solution. Rather, it had sought to respond to the pleas of the Yugoslav parties to help them to find a peaceful way through their differences. Although the conflict in Yugoslavia was being handled as a European matter, it was believed that the unique authority of the Council was needed to emphasize that this was an international concern with stakes and implications going wider than Yugoslavia alone. The resolution just adopted was fully consistent with the principles set out by the European Community on 19 September 1991, namely, that the use of force was unacceptable, that any change of borders by force was unacceptable, that the rights of all who lived in Yugoslavia, including minorities, had to be respected, and that there was a need to take account of all legitimate concerns and aspirations. Noting that some had suggested that it was premature to use the language of Chapter VII, the speaker pointed out that the conflict under discussion had a strong international dimension and that the patchwork of nationalities and minorities throughout Central and Eastern Europe meant that full-scale war might not easily be confined to a single territory.²¹

²⁰ Ibid., pp. 51-53.

The representative of the United States observed that the Security Council was meeting because the crisis in Yugoslavia had descended into open warfare which threatened the peoples of that country as well as its neighbours. It was that danger of escalation which made it a matter of prime concern to the Council. It was time for all parties to commit themselves to resolving their differences peacefully and, as a first step, to respect the ceasefire. The speaker contended that the Yugoslav federal military was not serving as an impartial guarantor of the ceasefire in Croatia and that the Serbian leadership had been actively supporting and encouraging the use of force in Croatia by Serbian militants and the Yugoslav military. Force was also beginning to be used in Bosnia by the Serbian leadership and the Yugoslav military to establish control over territories outside the borders of Serbia. The aggression within Yugoslavia therefore represented a direct threat to international peace and security. The use of aggression to determine the future internal borders of Yugoslavia or Serbia also represented a grave challenge to the values and principles which underlay the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and the Charter of the United Nations. Calling upon all parties to establish a genuine ceasefire and work towards a negotiated agreement on Yugoslavia's future, the speaker commended the efforts of the European Community and CSCE, for which the Council had expressed its full support in the resolution just adopted. The United States had voted for the resolution without reservation, welcoming in particular the international arms embargo and the call for the Secretary-General to bring the good offices of the Organization to bear on the Yugoslav situation in concert with the efforts of regional bodies.²²

Several other speakers also expressed their support for the resolution, in response to the appeal by the Yugoslav authorities, in the hope that it would strengthen the European peace efforts.²³

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, stated that several of the Yugoslav republics were calling for their independence and that the right of peoples to self-determination could not be challenged. He noted that the members of the Security Council had once again shouldered a historic responsibility: a responsibility to Yugoslavia, which had accepted its assistance, to Europe and to the international community. They had to demonstrate that it was possible to build an order of peace and cooperation without recourse to force for the settlement of disputes. In the context of the ongoing peace efforts, he called upon the Secretary-General to offer his assistance without delay.²⁴

meeting): resolution 721 (1991)

On 25 October 1991, pursuant to resolution 713 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the mission to Yugoslavia undertaken by his Personal Envoy, Mr. Cyrus R. Vance, from 11 to 18 October.²⁵ He stated that the latter had visited the six republics comprising the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; attended sessions of the Conference on Yugoslavia at The Hague where he had conferred with the current President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community; and met in Bonn with the current Chairman of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Yugoslavia was very serious and had, in many respects, deteriorated markedly since the adoption of resolution 713 (1991). In sum, the threat to international peace and security identified by the Council in that resolution continued. The resolution itself had been well received on all sides and each of Mr. Vance's interlocutors wished to see the interest of the Security Council in this matter maintained. However, despite the efforts of the States members of the European Community and the strong urging of the Council, successive ceasefire agreements had not been observed. On the contrary, hostilities continued to escalate, with civilians continuing to pay a high price, through casualties and internal displacement, and the country's economy was rapidly deteriorating. There were credible assertions, moreover, from many parties in Yugoslavia that the arms embargo imposed by the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter, in resolution 713 (1991), was being violated. The Secretary-General observed that, given the gravity of this apparent violation of the Council's decision, its members would no doubt wish to respond appropriately. He added that developments in Yugoslavia had already, in varying measure, affected neighbouring States. There had been a flow, as yet relatively modest, of civilians affected by the hostilities from Yugoslavia into the territory of some neighbouring States, as well as allegations of unauthorized overflights of the airspace of a neighbouring State by Yugoslav military aircraft. In conclusion, the Secretary-General expressed his confidence that the Council would continue to be actively seized of the matter. He suggested that it might wish to assist, as well as to encourage, all parties to settle their disputes peacefully and through negotiation at the Conference on Yugoslavia, including through the mechanisms set forth within it.

By a letter dated 24 November 1991 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁶ the Secretary-General reported on a further mission of his Personal Envoy to Yugoslavia, from 17 to 24 November.²⁷ He stated that, as he had indicated to the members of the Council during informal consultations on 15 November, he had decided to ask his Personal Envoy, accompanied by a team of senior United Nations officials, to travel to Yugoslavia to discuss with the principal parties to the conflict the feasibility of deploying a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General informed the Council that, at a meeting at Geneva on 23 November chaired by his Personal Envoy, the Yugoslav parties — President Milosevic of Serbia, President Tudjman of Croatia and General Kadijevic, Minister of Defence of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia — had signed an agreement (the Geneva Agreement),²⁸ a copy of which he attached. The Agreement provided for the immediate lifting by Croatia of its blockade of Yugoslav army barracks, the immediate withdrawal from Croatia of blockaded personnel and their equipment, and, most importantly, a ceasefire, which was to come into effect on 24 November 1991. With regard to the possibility of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia, each of the three Yugoslav participants in the meeting had stated that they wished to see the deployment of such an operation as soon as possible. It was agreed that further work needed to be done on defining the areas where such an operation would be deployed and that this work should be undertaken as quickly as possible so that Mr. Vance could make recommendations to the Secretary-General on the matter. In the meantime, his Personal Envoy had made it clear to the parties that the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation could not be envisaged without a lasting and effective ceasefire.

²⁷ That was Mr. Vance's third mission to the area. A second mission was carried out from 3 to 9 November, and reported on by the Secretary-General in an informal briefing to the members of the Council (S/23280, para. 2).

²⁸ S/23239, annex.

By letters dated 21 and 26 November 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representatives of Germany and France, respectively, requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the situation in Yugoslavia.²⁹

At its 3018th meeting, on 27 November 1991, the Council included the letters from the Secretary-General and the representatives of Germany and France in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Romania) drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 26 November 1991 from the representative of Yugoslavia to the President of the Security Council,³⁰ requesting the establishment of a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia. He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.³¹

The President of the Council noted further that a draft resolution prepared in the course of prior consultations had been distributed to the Council members.³² He stated that, in the light of the urgency of the matter under consideration, he had been authorized by the Council to read out the text of the draft resolution, which he did.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 721 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991,

Considering the request by the Government of Yugoslavia for the establishment of a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia, as conveyed in the letter of 26 November 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Yugoslavia to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, of Bulgaria to the Secretary-General, enclosing a declaration by his Government on the escalation of the conflict in neighbouring Yugoslavia (S/23117); (d) letter dated 10 October 1991 from the representatives of Hungary and Poland to the Secretary-General, transmitting a statement by their Prime Ministers on the continuation of attacks against Croatia, in particular its capital, Zagreb, by the federal armed forces of Yugoslavia (S/23136); (e) report of the Secretary-General of 25 October 1991 (S/23169); (f) note verbale dated 6 November 1991 from the representative of Yugoslavia to the Secretary-General, disputing an allegation by Hungary that aircraft from Yugoslav territory had violated Hungarian airspace and alleging violation of Yugoslav airspace by Hungarian aircraft (S/23200); (g) letter dated 21 November 1991 from the representative of Germany to the Secretary-General, transmitting a declaration on Yugoslavia issued by the Council of Ministers of the Western European Union on 18 November (S/23236); (h) letter dated 21 November 1991 from the representative of Romania to the Secretary-General, relating to his country's implementation of resolution 713 (1991) concerning the arms embargo against Yugoslavia (S/23238); (i) letter dated 26 November 1991 from the representative of Czechoslovakia to the President of the Security Council, forwarding the press statement issued by the Presidents of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and of Slovenia concerning talks held on the situation in Yugoslavia and their initiative to save Dubrovnik, which included the recommendation that a United Nations peacekeeping force start its mission there (S/23248).

Deeply concerned by the fighting in Yugoslavia and by the serious violations of earlier ceasefire agreements, which have caused heavy loss of human life and widespread material damage, and by the consequences for the countries of the region,

Noting that the continuation and aggravation of this situation constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Considering also the letter of 24 November 1991 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council on the mission of his Personal Envoy to Yugoslavia and the annexed agreement signed in Geneva on 23 November 1991,

Considering further the fact, as conveyed in the above-mentioned letter of the Secretary-General, that each one of the Yugoslav participants in the meeting with his Personal Envoy stated that they wanted to see the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation as soon as possible,

1. Approves the efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy, and expresses the hope that they will pursue their contacts with the Yugoslav parties as rapidly as possible so that the Secretary-General can present early recommendations to the Security Council including for the possible establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia;

2. Endorses the statement made by the Personal Envoy of the Secretary-General to the parties that the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation cannot be envisaged without, inter alia, full compliance by all parties with the agreement signed in Geneva on 23 November 1991 and annexed to the letter of the Secretary-General of 24 November 1991;

3. Strongly urges the Yugoslav parties to comply fully with that agreement;

4. Undertakes to examine the recommendations of the Secretary-General mentioned above and take appropriate action without delay upon them, including in particular any recommendation for the possible establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia;

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

C. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 721 (1991)

Decision of 15 December 1991 (3023rd meeting): resolution 724 (1991)

On 11 December 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 721 (1991),³³ on the fourth mission by his Personal Envoy to Yugoslavia, from 1 to 9 December. He reported that the main purposes of the mission had been to urge the three Yugoslav parties to the Geneva Agreement of 23 November 1991 to comply with the commitments that they had entered into and to pursue discussion of the feasibility of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General observed that the conditions for establishing a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia still did not exist,³⁴ as the Geneva Agreement was not being fully implemented. While the process of lifting the blockade on, and the withdrawal from Croatia of, those units of the Yugoslav federal army hitherto blockaded was proceeding, the unconditional ceasefire remained unimplemented. It was essential for the three Yugoslav parties that had signed the Agreement to ensure full compliance with its terms in order to facilitate the resumption of the political negotiations for a peaceful resolution to the problems of Yugoslavia and its peoples. The Secretary-General suggested that the Council might wish to consider ways by which it would seek to ensure such compliance. He added that full compliance with the Geneva Agreement would permit accelerated consideration of the question of establishing a United Nations peacekeeping operation.³⁵ A solid basis for such consideration was, he believed, provided by the concept paper attached to his report,³⁶ which had met with a wide measure of agreement from the parties to the Geneva Agreement. The concept paper envisaged that a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia would be an interim arrangement to create the conditions of peace and security required for the negotiation of an overall settlement of the Yugoslav crisis and would not prejudice the outcome of such negotiations. The operation would be established by the Security Council, acting on a recommendation by the Secretary-General. All members of the operation would be under the command of the Secretary-General, would be required to be completely impartial as between the various parties to the conflict, and would be permitted to use force to the minimum extent necessary and normally only in self-defence. The basic approach would be to deploy United Nations troops and police monitors in those areas of Croatia in which Serbs constituted the majority or substantial majority of the population and where intercommunal tensions had led to armed conflict in the recent past. It was hoped that a further spread of the conflagration could thereby be avoided and the necessary conditions created for successful negotiations on an overall settlement of the Yugoslav crisis. The areas concerned, which would be designated as “United Nations Protected Areas”, would be demilitarized; all armed forces in them would be either withdrawn or disbanded. The United Nations force would also include a group of unarmed military observers. They would initially be deployed in the Protected Areas to verify the demilitarization of those areas. As soon as demilitarization had been effected, they would be transferred to parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina adjacent to Croatia and at Dubrovnik, to monitor intercommunal tension there. Assurances had been sought from the parties to the Geneva Agreement, in particular from President Milosevic, that all currently armed elements would extend full support to this kind of peacekeeping operation.

³⁴ Ibid., para. 21.

³⁶ Ibid., annex III.

In the meantime, the Secretary-General recalled that the Conference on Yugoslavia was guided by a number of considerations, including the principle that “the prospect of recognition of the independence of those republics wishing it [could] only be envisaged in the framework of an overall settlement”, and the unacceptability of any modification of external or internal borders by means of force. He stressed that any selective, uncoordinated departure from those principles could hold very serious dangers, not only for the republics of Yugoslavia, but for all of its peoples and indeed for the maintenance of peace and security in the region. He had written in this connection, on 10 December 1991,³⁷ to the current President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, the Foreign Minister of the Netherlands. In conclusion, the Secretary-General observed that the general situation in Yugoslavia continued to worsen and that the crisis in the humanitarian area, in particular, was deepening. He believed, however, that the international community was prepared to assist the Yugoslav peoples if the conditions he had described were met.

At its 3023rd meeting, held on 15 December 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General’s report of 11 December in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

³⁷ Ibid., annex IV.

The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members of the Council to three letters: a letter dated 2 December 1991 from the representative of Germany addressed to the Secretary-General,³⁸ enclosing the text of a resolution adopted on 29 November by the Committee of Senior Officials of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, expressing support for United Nations action on Yugoslavia; a letter dated 4 December 1991 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹ transmitting a statement by the Federal Government of Yugoslavia of 2 December stressing the need to create the necessary conditions for the immediate deployment of a small-scale United Nations peacekeeping operation; and a letter dated 13 December 1991 from the representative of Yugoslavia in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of Non-Aligned Countries in New York addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰ transmitting the statement on the situation in Yugoslavia adopted by the Bureau on 13 December.

The President also drew their attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.⁴¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 724 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991,

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter,

Determined to ensure that the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia imposed by resolution 713 (1991) is effectively applied,

2. Endorses in particular the views expressed in paragraph 21 of that report that the conditions for establishing a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia still do not exist and in paragraph 24 that full compliance with the agreement signed in Geneva on 23 November 1991 would permit accelerated consideration of the question of establishing a United Nations peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia;

3. Concurs in particular with the Secretary-General's observation that the international community is prepared to assist the Yugoslav peoples, if the conditions described in his report are met, and in that context endorses his offer to send to Yugoslavia a small group of personnel, including military personnel, as part of the continuing mission of his Personal Envoy, to carry forward preparations for possible deployment of a peacekeeping operation;

(iv) To recommend appropriate measures in response to violations of the general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia and to provide information on a regular basis to the Secretary-General for general distribution to Member States;

8. Encourages the Secretary-General to pursue his humanitarian efforts in Yugoslavia, in liaison with the International Committee of the Red Cross, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Children's Fund and other appropriate humanitarian organizations, to take urgent practical steps to tackle the critical needs of the people of Yugoslavia, including displaced persons and the most vulnerable groups affected by the conflict, to assist in the voluntary return of displaced persons to their homes;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

D. Oral report of the Secretary-General pursuant to his further report of 5 and 7 January 1992

Decision of 7 January 1992 (3027th meeting): statement by the President

On 5 January 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to resolution 721 (1991) and taking into account resolution 724 (1991).⁴² He reported on the mission of the preparatory group dispatched to Yugoslavia from 18 to 30 December 1991 to carry forward preparations for the possible deployment of a peacekeeping operation, and on the fifth mission of his Personal Envoy to the area, from 28 December to 4 January 1992. By way of background, he recalled that his predecessor had informed the members of the Council in informal consultations on 27 December that the conditions for establishing a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia still did not exist: the commitments made at ⁴² S/23363 and Add.1 of 7 January 1992.

Geneva on 23 November to establish an unconditional ceasefire remained unimplemented; and the Personal Envoy had not received adequate assurances that full cooperation would be extended to such an operation. He recalled, further, that the former Secretary-General had also told Council members of his concern about the heightened tension, particularly in Bosnia and Herzegovina, that had followed certain decisions taken outside Yugoslavia. That tension had led the President of Bosnia and Herzegovina to request the immediate deployment of United Nations peacekeepers in his country. In the light of those considerations, the former Secretary-General had informed Council members that, having reviewed the situation with his successor and the Personal Envoy, he had asked Mr. Vance to undertake a further mission to Yugoslavia to see if the remaining obstacles could be removed in order to permit the establishment of a peacekeeping operation in the country.

The Secretary-General observed that, although the prevailing situation in Yugoslavia continued to give cause for serious concern, a glimmer of hope could be gleaned from two developments during his Personal Envoy's fifth mission. First, the parties directly involved had accepted the concept paper of 11 December for a United Nations peacekeeping operation,⁴³ and had given a commitment to ensure full cooperation with such an operation although recent public statements by certain leaders of the Serb communities in Croatia had given cause for some concern. Secondly, an Implementing Accord⁴⁴ had been signed, under the auspices of his Personal Envoy, at Sarajevo on 2 January 1992 (the "Sarajevo Accord"), for carrying out the unconditional ceasefire agreed to by the parties at Geneva on 23 November 1991. The Accord provided for the complete cessation of hostile military activities with effect from 3 January, which both parties were making a genuine effort to give effect to as well as for confidence-building measures and third-party monitoring mechanisms.

The Secretary-General stated that both sides had expressed the wish that the United Nations should form part of the monitoring mechanisms. He noted, in this regard, that one such third-party monitoring mechanism already existed in the form of the European Community Monitoring Mission, which had been deployed in Yugoslavia since July 1991. In conformity with resolution 713 (1991), he believed it appropriate for the European Community monitors to take the lead in monitoring implementation of the Sarajevo Accord. At the same time, he had been struck by the strength of the belief expressed to his Personal Envoy by so many of his Yugoslav interlocutors that a United Nations presence in the country would help the Yugoslav parties to honour their commitments, and had also noted the wish expressed by many European Community leaders that the United Nations should play a role on the ground in Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General accordingly intended, as a follow-up to the latest mission of his Personal Envoy, to send immediately to Yugoslavia a group of up to 50 military liaison officers to promote maintenance of the ceasefire. The mission of the military liaison officers would take place on the assumption that the ceasefire would quickly establish itself, that the other necessary conditions for the deployment of a peacekeeping force would be met and that the military liaison group would thus be superseded by the envisaged larger operation, on which he would revert as needed to the Council. He reiterated that a United Nations peacekeeping force could not be established in Yugoslavia without sustained evidence of the willingness and ability of the leaders on both sides to ensure that the ceasefire was respected and adequate assurance that all those on whose cooperation such a force would depend to carry out its mandate had genuinely accepted the basis for the operation as set out in the concept paper of 11 December 1991. With regard to the request made by the President of Bosnia and Herzegovina for the immediate deployment of a substantial United Nations peacekeeping presence in that Republic, the Secretary-General noted that the concept paper already envisaged a deployment of United Nations military observers in Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁴⁵ He believed also that for the time being the matter should be approached in the context of the overall peacekeeping operation envisaged in that paper. The purpose of such an operation, he stressed, had from the outset been conceived as being to create favourable conditions for the necessary negotiations between the parties — negotiations that had been proceeding in the Conference on Yugoslavia, which remained the only forum for a negotiated settlement. In this way, the United Nations would be supporting the role and efforts of the European Community, which had the backing of CSCE and which had been pursued in the framework of Chapter VIII of the Charter.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that his Personal Envoy had pointed out to all interlocutors, during his fifth mission to Yugoslavia, that the arms embargo imposed by resolution 713 (1991) and reinforced by resolution 724 (1991) continued in force and would retain its application unless the Security Council determined otherwise; indeed, he had added that the embargo would continue to apply to all areas that had been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding.⁴⁶

At its 3027th meeting, held on 7 January 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's oral report pursuant to his report of 5 January. The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (United Kingdom) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁷

The members of the Council discussed on 7 January 1992 the tragic incident that occurred in Yugoslavia earlier in the day, in which helicopters of the European Community Monitoring Mission in Yugoslavia were shot down by a Yugoslav aircraft, killing four Italian members and one French member of the European Community Monitoring Mission.

The members of the Council condemned this callous attack on unarmed civilian personnel. They extended their most sincere condolences to the families of those who had lost their lives. They noted that the Yugoslav authorities had accepted responsibility for this flagrant breach of the ceasefire, had said that they would take the necessary disciplinary action against those responsible, and had reiterated their commitment to observe the ceasefire fully. The members of the Council called on the Yugoslav authorities to take all steps necessary to ensure that this act does not go unpunished and that such incidents do not occur again.

The members of the Council reiterated their urgent call on all parties to the conflict in Yugoslavia to respect their ceasefire commitments. They underlined the continuing importance of the role played by the European Community Monitoring Mission, as emphasized in the report of the Secretary-General of 5 and 7 January. They expressed their deep appreciation for the work done by members of the Mission and they called on the Yugoslav parties to ensure that members of the Mission and United Nations personnel be allowed to fulfil their role with the full cooperation of all sides.

E. Further reports of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 721 (1991)

Decision of 8 January 1992 (3028th meeting): resolution 727 (1992)

At its 3028th meeting, held on 8 January 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's further report of 5 January.⁴⁸ The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia at his request to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council members to a note by the President of the Security Council containing the text of his statement of 7 January 1992;⁴⁹ and a report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of paragraph 5 (a) of resolution 724 (1991),⁵⁰ concerning the measures instituted by States to give effect to the arms embargo on Yugoslavia. He also drew their attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁵¹ and noted that an oral amendment had been made to operative paragraph 6 of the draft resolution.

The draft resolution, as orally amended, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 727 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, and 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991,

Decision of 7 February 1992 (3049th meeting):
resolution 740 (1992)

On 4 February 1992, pursuant to resolution 721 (1991) and taking into account resolution 727 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report on the possible establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping operation in

Yugoslavia.⁵² He stated that the ceasefire was generally holding and that he was persuaded that the level of alleged ceasefire violations was not sufficiently grave to preclude deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force, if the other conditions for such deployment were fulfilled. As to the latter, he noted that two of the signatories of the Geneva Agreement of 23 November 1991 — President Milosevic of Serbia and General Adzic, the Acting Federal Secretary of Defence of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Chief of Staff of the Yugoslav Army — maintained their full acceptance and support for the Secretary-General's plan for a United Nations force. He recalled that the plan contained two central elements: the withdrawal of the Yugoslav National Army from Croatia and the demilitarization of the United Nations Protected Areas; and the continuing functioning, on an interim basis, of the existing local authorities and police, pending the negotiation of an overall political solution to the crisis in the European Community Conference on Yugoslavia.⁵³ The local Serbian leaders in two of the three areas where the force would be deployed had also accepted the plan. However, a major obstacle remained to the deployment of a peacekeeping operation. One of the signatories of the Geneva Agreement — President Tudjman of Croatia — appeared to have rejected key elements of the plan, as had the Serbian leaders in what would be the Krajina United Nations Protected Area. The Secretary-General observed that if the envisaged peacekeeping operation were to be launched, action needed to be taken to convince the Government of Croatia and the Serbian leadership in Krajina that the early deployment of a United Nations force, accompanied by a resumption of the work of the Conference on Yugoslavia, was the best, and perhaps the only, available way to create the conditions for a peaceful resolution of the Yugoslav crisis. Noting the need for action to be taken quickly to forestall any tendency for the current ceasefire to unravel, he expressed concern at allegations, including in the media, that the arms embargo imposed in resolution 713 (1991) was not being observed. The Council would no doubt wish to keep the situation under careful scrutiny to ensure that the embargo was scrupulously respected.⁵⁴ The Secretary-General concluded that the circumstances described in his report did not permit him to recommend the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force at that time. In the interim, noting that the United Nations military liaison officers already deployed in Yugoslavia had made an important contribution to the maintenance of the ceasefire, he recommended that the group remain in existence but that its authorized strength should be increased to 75 officers for technical reasons.

⁵³ Ibid., para. 8.

⁵⁴ Ibid., para. 21.

At its 3049th meeting, held on 7 February 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 4 February in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁵⁵ as well as to a number of revisions thereto.

The draft resolution, the provisional text of which had been orally revised, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 740 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991 and 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992,

Taking note of the further report of the Secretary-General of 4 February 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 721 (1991) and welcoming his report that the ceasefire has been generally observed thus removing one of the obstacles to the deployment of a peacekeeping operation,

Noting that the letter⁵⁶ from President Franjo Tudjman of 6 February 1992, in which he accepts fully and unconditionally the Secretary-General's concept and plan, which defines the conditions and areas where the United Nations forces would be deployed, removes a further obstacle in that respect,

Also noting that the implementation of the United Nations peacekeeping plan contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 11 December 1991 will facilitate the task of the Conference on Yugoslavia in reaching a political settlement,

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter,

Expressing concern at the indications that the arms embargo established by the Council in resolution 713 (1991) is not being fully observed, as noted in paragraph 21 of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Reaffirms its approval set out in resolution 724 (1991) of the United Nations peacekeeping plan contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 11 December 1991;

2. Welcomes the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for Yugoslavia to remove the remaining obstacle in the way of the deployment of a peacekeeping operation;

3. Approves the proposal by the Secretary-General to increase the authorized strength of the military liaison mission to a total of seventy-five officers;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to expedite his preparations for a United Nations peacekeeping operation so as to be prepared to deploy immediately after the Council decides to do so;

5. Expresses its concern that the United Nations peacekeeping plan has not yet been fully and unconditionally accepted by all in Yugoslavia on whose cooperation its success depends;

6. Calls upon all States to continue to take all appropriate steps to ensure that the Yugoslav parties implement their unqualified acceptance of the United Nations peacekeeping plan, fulfil their commitments in good faith and cooperate fully with the Secretary-General;

7. Calls upon the Yugoslav parties to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia in its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and reaffirms that the United Nations peacekeeping plan and its implementation is in no way intended to prejudge the terms of a political settlement;

8. Also calls upon all States to cooperate fully with the Security Council Committee established by resolution 724 (1991) concerning Yugoslavia, including reporting any information brought to their attention concerning violations of the embargo;

9. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

Decision of 21 February 1992 (3055th meeting):
resolution 743 (1992)

On 15 February 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report, pursuant to resolution 721 (1991) and taking into account resolution 740 (1992),⁵⁷ in which he recommended the immediate establishment of a peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia. He observed that almost all political groups in the country had expressed support for such an operation, although they differed in certain respects on where it should be deployed and what its functions should be; that many citizens of Yugoslavia had appealed for immediate United Nations deployment to their country as the only remaining hope for avoiding an even more destructive civil war than the one during the second half of 1991; and that many Member States had also urged him not to delay in recommending the deployment of a United Nations force in accordance with the peacekeeping plan of 11 December 1991.⁵⁸ He explained that he was only now proposing such a force because of the complexities and dangers of the Yugoslav situation and the consequent need to be as sure as possible that a United Nations force would succeed in consolidating the ceasefire and thus facilitate the negotiation of an overall political settlement. He reiterated that this required not only a working ceasefire but also clear and unconditional acceptance of the plan by all concerned, with clear assurances of their readiness to cooperate in its implementation. Although there remained a number of unanswered questions about the extent to which the force would in practice receive the necessary cooperation, the Secretary-General had come to the conclusion that the danger that a United Nations peacekeeping operation would fail because of lack of cooperation from the parties was less grievous than the danger that delay in its dispatch would lead to a breakdown of the ceasefire and to a new conflagration in Yugoslavia. That conclusion was based on the assumption, which he recognized could also be questioned, that the Yugoslav parties were ready to engage seriously in negotiating an overall settlement in the European Community Conference on Yugoslavia.

⁵⁵ S/23534.

⁵⁶ S/23592, annex I.

The Secretary-General elaborated as follows on the force, which would be known as the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR). It would include military, police and civilian components, under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General, under the authority of the Security Council. It would be deployed, as envisaged in the plan of 11 December, in three United Nations Protected Areas, namely, Eastern Slavonia, Krajina and Western Slavonia, with military observers deployed in certain parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina adjacent to Croatia. Noting that the peacekeeping plan stated that, subject to the Council's agreement, the Force would remain in Yugoslavia until a negotiated settlement was achieved, the Secretary-General stressed that it would succeed only if there was confidence that this would indeed be the case; fears that it might be precipitously withdrawn before the underlying problems had been peacefully resolved would have a most unsettling effect in the United Nations Protected Areas. He suggested that the Council might therefore wish to decide to establish UNPROFOR for a period of 12 months in the first instance, with provision for its mandate to be renewed, if necessary, thereafter, in the event of a negotiated settlement not having been achieved; and to further build confidence by providing that the Force could be withdrawn before the initial 12-month period was completed only if the Council took a specific decision to that effect.⁵⁹ The Secretary-General accordingly recommended, on the basis of the plan of 11 December and his further comments, that the Council should decide to establish UNPROFOR with immediate effect and that it should instruct the Secretary-General to take the measures necessary to ensure the earliest possible deployment of the Force.

At its 3055th meeting, held on 21 February 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 15 February in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (United States) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁶⁰ as well as to a number of revisions thereto. He stated that the draft resolution, as orally revised, spoke for itself. The fact of its circulation as a presidential text reflected the unanimity of the Council's response to the situation in Yugoslavia, including its determination that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security. Article 25 would apply to the decisions that the Council would be taking in the resolution. Speaking on behalf of all the members of the Council, the President expressed the hope that the Council's decisions that day would facilitate the attainment of a peaceful political settlement.⁶¹

The draft resolution, the provisional text of which had been orally revised, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 743 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992 and 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992,

Taking note of the further report of the Secretary-General of 15 and 19 February 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 721 (1991) and the request of the Government of Yugoslavia of 26 November 1991 for a peacekeeping operation in Yugoslavia referred to in that resolution,

Noting in particular that the Secretary-General considers that the conditions permitting the early deployment of a United Nations Protection Force are met and welcoming his recommendation that this Force should be established with immediate effect,

Expressing its gratitude to the Secretary-General and his Personal Envoy for Yugoslavia for their contribution to the achievement of conditions facilitating the deployment of a United Nations Protection Force and their continuing commitment to this effort,

Concerned that the situation in Yugoslavia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security as determined in resolution 713 (1991),

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the provisions of Article 25 and Chapter VIII of the Charter,

Commending again the efforts undertaken by the European Community and its member States, with the support of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, through the convening of a Conference on Yugoslavia, including the mechanisms set forth within it, to ensure a peaceful political settlement,

Convinced that the implementation of the United Nations peacekeeping plan will assist the Conference on Yugoslavia in reaching a peaceful political settlement,

1. Approves the further report of the Secretary-General of 15 and 19 February 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 721 (1991);

2. Decides to establish, under its authority, a United Nations Protection Force in accordance with the above-mentioned report and the United Nations peacekeeping plan, and requests the Secretary-General to take the measures necessary to ensure its earliest possible deployment;

3. Decides that, in order to implement the recommendations in paragraph 30 of the report, the Force is established in accordance with paragraph 4 below, for an initial period of twelve months unless the Council subsequently decides otherwise;

4. Requests the Secretary-General immediately to deploy those elements of the Force which can assist in developing an implementation plan for the earliest possible full deployment of the Force for approval by the Council and a budget, which together will maximize the contribution of the Yugoslav parties to offsetting its costs and in all other ways secure the most efficient and cost-effective operation possible;

5. Recalls that, in accordance with paragraph 1 of the United Nations peacekeeping plan, the Force should be an interim arrangement to create the conditions of peace and security required for the negotiation of an overall settlement of the Yugoslav crisis;

6. Invites accordingly the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council as appropriate and not less than every six months on progress towards a peaceful political settlement and the situation on the ground, and to submit a first report on the establishment of the Force within two months of the adoption of the present resolution;

7. Undertakes, in this connection, to examine without delay any recommendations that the Secretary-General may make in his reports concerning the Force, including the duration of its mission, and to adopt appropriate decisions;

8. Urges all parties and others concerned to comply strictly with the ceasefire agreements signed at Geneva on 23 November 1991 and at Sarajevo on 2 January 1992, and to cooperate fully and unconditionally in the implementation of the United Nations peacekeeping plan;

9. Demands that all parties and others concerned take all the necessary measures to ensure the safety of the personnel sent by the United Nations and of the members of the European Community Monitoring Mission;

10. Calls again upon the Yugoslav parties to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia in its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and reaffirms that the United Nations peacekeeping plan and its implementation is in no way intended to prejudge the terms of a political settlement;

⁶¹ S/PV.3055, p. 3.

11. Decides within the same framework that the embargo imposed by paragraph 6 of resolution 713 (1991) shall not apply to weapons and military equipment destined for the sole use of the Force;

12. Requests all States to provide appropriate support to the Force, in particular to permit and facilitate the transit of its personnel and equipment;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

F. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 743 (1992)

Decision of 7 April 1992 (3066th meeting): resolution 749 (1992)

On 2 April 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council his first report pursuant to resolution 743 (1992),⁶² on the establishment of the United Nations Protection Force. He stated that advance elements of the Force had carried out reconnaissance, with a view to preparing an implementation plan for deployment, and had conducted negotiations with the federal authorities of Yugoslavia, as well as with the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, concerning the conclusion of status-of-forces arrangements. All the Force Commander's interlocutors had emphasized the need for the earliest possible deployment of UNPROFOR. The Secretary-General observed that he shared their sense of urgency: the ceasefire remained fragile, with daily violations; and tensions had been aggravated by reports of expulsions of persons of various nationalities. There would be serious dangers in any further delay in the Force's full deployment. The proposed implementation plan for deployment, contained in annex I to his report, reflected difficulties which had arisen, largely for budgetary reasons, in making arrangements for transporting some of the more distant battalions and their equipment to Yugoslavia. As a result, UNPROFOR would not, in any case, be fully deployed until the middle of May 1992, assuming that the Council took a very early decision to authorize full deployment. In the meantime, negotiations continued with the various Yugoslav parties to persuade them to make additional goods and services available to UNPROFOR free of charge. In the light of his report, the Secretary-General requested the urgent authority of the Council to proceed immediately to full deployment of UNPROFOR in accordance with the implementation plan.

At its 3066th meeting, held on 7 April 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Yugoslavia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Zimbabwe) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁶³ and to several revisions thereto. The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 749 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992 and 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 2 April 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 743 (1992),

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Welcoming the progress made towards the establishment of the United Nations Protection Force and the continuing contacts by the Secretary-General with all parties and others concerned to stabilize the ceasefire,

Expressing its concern about reports on the daily violations of the ceasefire and the continuing tension in a number of regions even after the arrival of advance elements of the Force,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 2 April 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 743 (1992);

2. Decides to authorize the earliest possible full deployment of the United Nations Protection Force;

3. Urges all parties and others concerned to make further efforts to maximize their contributions towards offsetting the costs of the Force, in order to help secure the most efficient and cost-effective operation possible;

⁶³ S/23788.

4. Also urges all parties and others concerned to take all action necessary to ensure complete freedom of aerial movement for the Force;

5. Calls upon all parties and others concerned not to resort to violence, particularly in any area where the Force is to be based or deployed;

6. Appeals to all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina to cooperate with the efforts of the European Community to bring about a ceasefire and a negotiated political solution.

Decision of 10 April 1992 (3068th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3068th meeting, held on 10 April 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 2 April 1992⁶⁴ in its agenda.

The President (Zimbabwe) stated that, following consultations held earlier among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶⁵

The Security Council, alarmed by reports on rapid deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, reiterates the appeal in Security Council resolution 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992 to all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina to stop the fighting immediately. It invites the Secretary-General to dispatch urgently to the area his Personal Envoy for Yugoslavia to act in close cooperation with representatives of the European Community whose current efforts are aimed at stopping the fighting and at bringing about a peaceful solution to the crisis, and to report to the Council.

Permanent Mission of Austria to the United Nations addressed to the Permanent Representative of France to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 24 April 1992 (3070th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 23 April 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁶ the representative of Austria requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the deteriorating situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina which was endangering international peace and security.

By a letter dated 24 April 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁶⁷ the representative of France requested an urgent meeting of the Council to take such action as might be conducive to the re-establishment of peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the deployment of a peacekeeping force.

At its 3070th meeting, on 24 April 1992, the Council included the letters from the representatives of Austria and France in its agenda.

The President (Zimbabwe) drew the attention of the Council members to a report of the Secretary-General of 24 April 1992,⁶⁸ submitted pursuant to resolution 749 (1992) and to the statement made by the President on 10 April 1992, on the seventh mission of his Personal Envoy to the region from 14 to 18 April. In his report, the Secretary-General observed that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina had deteriorated markedly since his Personal Envoy's last visit to the area early in March: it was characterized by massive mistrust among the communities of the Republic and an escalating cycle of violence. It was essential that a ceasefire on the basis of the agreement signed on 12 April in Sarajevo⁶⁹ should come into effect immediately. It was also essential that the work of the Conference on Yugoslavia continue with vigour and determination, together with European Community endeavours to bring about a peaceful settlement to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Secretary-General expressed concern, moreover, about the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina: the fighting made it increasingly difficult to provide for the most basic needs of the innocent victims of the conflict and put at risk the personnel of international organizations. However, given the limitations on human, material and financial resources, and especially in view of the current widespread violence, he shared the view of his personal envoy that the deployment of a peacekeeping force in Bosnia and Herzegovina was not feasible. The present conditions there made it impossible to define a workable concept for such a force. He had decided, though, to advance the dispatch to Bosnia and Herzegovina of the 100 unarmed military observers that the concept paper⁷⁰ for UNPROFOR had envisaged would be deployed there after the demilitarization of the United Nations Protected Areas. Forty-one observers would be deployed immediately in the municipalities of Mostar, Capljina, Stolac and Trebinje.

The President also drew the Council members' attention to the following other documents: two letters dated 14 April and 21 April 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Council,⁷¹ transmitting statements on Bosnia and Herzegovina adopted by the European Community and its member States on 11 and 16 April, respectively; and a letter dated 22 April 1992 from the representative of Albania,⁷² transmitting his Government's declaration on the recognition of the independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷³

In advance of its consideration of the report of the Secretary-General of 24 April 1992 pursuant to Security Council resolution 749 (1992) the Council had an exchange of views in the course of which various proposals were made with regard to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council notes with deep concern the rapid and violent deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which in addition to causing an increasing number of deaths of many innocent victims further risks compromising peace and security in the region.

The Council welcomes the recent efforts of the European Community and the Secretary-General aimed at prevailing upon the parties to respect fully the ceasefire signed on 12 April 1992 under the auspices of the European Community. It notes with satisfaction the decision of the Secretary-General to accelerate the deployment in Bosnia and Herzegovina of the 100 military observers from the United Nations Protection Force, 41 to be deployed in the Mostar region immediately. The presence of these military observers, like that of the monitors of the European Community, should help the parties to implement their commitment, undertaken on 23 April 1992, to respect the ceasefire. The Council welcomes the support given by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to the efforts of the European Community and the United Nations.

The Council demands that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately. In this respect, it specifically calls upon Bosnia and Herzegovina's neighbours to exercise all their influence to end such interference. The Council condemns publicly and unreservedly the use of force, and calls upon all regular or irregular military forces to act in accordance with this principle. It emphasizes the value of close and continuous coordination between the Secretary-General and the European Community in order to obtain the necessary commitments from all parties and others concerned.

The Council urges all the parties to respect immediately and fully the ceasefire and condemns all breaches of the ceasefire from whatever quarter.

The Council supports the efforts undertaken by the European Community in the framework of the discussions on constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina under the auspices of the Conference on Yugoslavia. It urges the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to participate actively and constructively in these talks and to conclude and implement the constitutional arrangements being developed at the tripartite talks.

The Council calls upon all parties and others concerned to facilitate humanitarian assistance and cooperate so that deliveries of humanitarian assistance reach their destination.

The Council has decided to remain actively seized of the matter and to continue its consideration of the further contribution that it can make to the restoration of peace and security in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

I. Further report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 749 (1992)

Decision of 15 May 1992 (3075th meeting): resolution 752 (1992)

On 12 May 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to resolution 749 (1992),⁷⁶ on two separate subjects: Bosnia and Herzegovina and the deployment of UNPROFOR. He recalled that, following concerns expressed in informal consultations of the Council, he had written to the President of the Council on 29 April informing him of his decision to dispatch the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Mr. Marrack Goulding, to examine the evolving situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to look into the feasibility of a United Nations peacekeeping operation there.⁷⁷ While in the area, from 4 to 10 May, the Under-Secretary-General had also reviewed progress in the deployment of UNPROFOR.

The Secretary-General observed that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina was tragic, dangerous, violent and confused. The conditions in the capital, Sarajevo, continued to deteriorate and intense hostilities were taking place elsewhere in the Republic. All international observers agreed that what was happening was a concerted effort by the Serbs of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the acquiescence of, and at least some support from, the Yugoslav army to create “ethnically pure” regions in the context of negotiations on the “cantonization” of the Republic in the European Community Conference on Bosnia and Herzegovina. The techniques used were the seizure of territory by military force and intimidation of the non-Serb population. The fighting and intimidation had led to massive displacement of the civilians. It had proved impossible to implement the ceasefire agreement signed on 12 April 1992 under European Community auspices. On the political front, European efforts to induce the leaders of the Croat, Muslim and Serb communities to agree on future constitutional arrangements for the Republic continued, although the most recent session of the European Community Conference on Bosnia and Herzegovina had been suspended because of the parties’ failure to honour the ceasefire.

Yugoslavia addressed to the President of the Council, transmitting a Declaration adopted on 27 April 1992 at the joint session of the Assembly of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the National Assembly of the Republic of Serbia and the Assembly of the Republic of Montenegro. In the Declaration, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) claimed, inter alia, to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the international organizations and institutions of which the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was a member.

The Secretary-General did not believe that in the present phase of the conflict it was feasible to undertake peacekeeping activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina beyond the existing limited involvement of UNPROFOR military observers in Sarajevo and the Mostar region, in both of which places the security of United Nations personnel was already precarious. Any successful peacekeeping operation had to be based on some agreement between the hostile parties. No such agreement was in sight. If, however, the European Community efforts on the ground in Sarajevo and in the constitutional talks succeeded, opportunities for United Nations peacekeeping might emerge, though it might in that case be more appropriate for the European Community, rather than the United Nations, to undertake the peacekeeping as well as the peacemaking. A successful peacekeeping operation also required the parties to respect the United Nations, its personnel and its mandate. None of the Bosnian parties could claim to satisfy this condition. Consideration had been given, alternatively, to the possibility of deploying an “intervention force”, as requested by President Izetbegovic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which would be sent in, without the consent of all the parties, to enforce an end to the fighting. However, given the intensity and scale of the fighting, such a concept would require many tens of thousands of troops equipped for potential combat with heavily armed and determined adversaries. The Secretary-General did not, therefore, believe that such an enforcement action was a practicable proposition. Another option that had been explored was the feasibility of deploying United Nations peacekeeping forces in a more limited role requested by President

Izetbegovic — to control Sarajevo airport, protect humanitarian aid deliveries and keep open roads, bridges and border crossings. The Secretary-General stressed that, with regard to the protection of international humanitarian programmes, experience had shown that a mere United Nations presence was not sufficient to deter hostile action against them. The best form of protection was respect for agreements, binding on all the armed parties, to allow humanitarian supplies to be delivered without hindrance. He considered that if the other parties agreed to interim arrangements of this kind, there might be a role for UNPROFOR military observers in monitoring their implementation.⁷⁸

Concerning the deployment of UNPROFOR, the Secretary-General observed that developments since the Council's approval of the plan for the United Nations peacekeeping force in Croatia had raised new doubts about the practicability of that operation. The bulk of the Force's headquarters staff would be relocating temporarily from Sarajevo pending the restoration of calm in the city, and difficult questions had arisen concerning the boundaries of the United Nations Protected Areas. He now saw no alternative but for the Force to assume its responsibilities in the Protected Areas in accordance with the peacekeeping plan, while appealing to the Yugoslav federal army and the Serbian authorities to use their influence to calm the fears of the Serb communities who would find themselves outside the Areas and to ensure that the demilitarization of the Areas went according to the plan. The Secretary-General also drew the Council's attention to the decision of the Belgrade authorities, following the declaration on 27 April 1992 of the new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to withdraw Yugoslav People's Army personnel from republics other than Serbia and Montenegro and to renounce authority over those who remained.⁷⁹ He observed that this in effect removed a party to the peacekeeping plan whose cooperation was essential to its success, while substituting for it a new element or elements which were not formally bound by the Belgrade authorities' acceptance of the plan. Refusal by the much-enlarged local forces to demobilize would undermine the very basis of the plan that UNPROFOR had been mandated to implement.

⁷⁸ S/23900, para. 29.

⁷⁹ Ibid., para. 24.

The Secretary-General concluded that, in these circumstances, the Council had to continue to lend its full support to the peacemaking activities of the European Community. Political solutions to these tragic and complex conflicts could only be achieved through a continuous and uninterrupted process of patient negotiation led by the European Community, which had already established agreed mechanisms for this purpose. The possibilities for an effective United Nations role would depend on the negotiators' success.

At its 3075th meeting, held on 15 May 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached during its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 12 May in its agenda.

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a second report, submitted by the Secretary-General on 24 April 1992 on the progress made towards the full deployment of UNPROFOR.⁸⁰ In that report, he had observed that UNPROFOR would be ready to assume its full responsibilities in the United Nations Protected Areas by the middle of May; but that the first few weeks of its deployment had made clear the complexity of the challenge which confronted the Force and the United Nations as a whole.

The President also drew the Council members' attention to a number of other documents: (a) the exchange of letters of April 1992 between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council,⁸¹ concerning the dispatch of the Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations to examine the evolving situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to look into the feasibility of a United Nations peacekeeping force; (b) a letter dated 24 April 1992 from the representatives of Austria and Hungary to the President of the Council,⁸² transmitting a joint declaration by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Austria, Croatia, Hungary and Slovenia, urging the Council to take appropriate action in Bosnia and Herzegovina in view of the seriousness of the situation; (c) letters dated 26 April to 12 May 1992 from the representatives of Hungary, Senegal, as Chairman of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, Turkey and Egypt addressed to the President of the Council or the Secretary-General,⁸³ to similar effect; and (d) joint letters dated 4 to 12 May 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom to the President of the Council,⁸⁴ transmitting a statement on the death of a member of the European Community Monitoring Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina and two declarations on the recent events in Sarajevo, adopted by the European Community and its member States.

The President drew attention in addition to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,⁸⁵ and made an oral revision to the draft resolution in its provisional form.

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 752 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 and 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992,

Expressing its appreciation for the reports of the Secretary-General of 24 April and 12 May 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 749 (1992),

Recalling also the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, and the continuing role that the European Community is playing in achieving a peaceful solution in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as in other republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Having considered the announcement in Belgrade on 4 May 1992 described in paragraph 24 of the report of the Secretary-General of 12 May 1992 concerning the withdrawal of Yugoslav People's Army personnel from republics other than Serbia and Montenegro and the renunciation of authority over those who remain,

J. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 752 (1992)

Letter dated 26 May 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 27 May 1992 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 30 May 1992 (3082nd meeting): resolution 757 (1992)

On 26 May 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 752 (1992),⁸⁶ on the feasibility of protecting international humanitarian relief programmes in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and of ensuring safe and secure access to Sarajevo airport. He analysed two main options: providing armed protection or protection through respect for agreements. He stated that it was for the Council to decide whether to deploy United Nations troops, in sufficient strength and with the necessary mandate, to undertake armed protection of international humanitarian aid; but observed that combat missions of the kind that would be required would be extremely difficult and expensive. Moreover, any mandate requiring United Nations troops to take hostile or coercive action against certain factions in Bosnia and Herzegovina could make it more difficult to secure the cooperation which UNPROFOR would need if it were to succeed in fulfilling its mandate in the United Nations Protected Areas in Croatia. The Secretary-General considered that more limited protection operations in Sarajevo — with United Nations troops providing armed protection for convoys of humanitarian supplies en route from the airport to distribution centres within that city — were a more feasible possibility, provided that there were reasonable guarantees that hostile action would not be taken against the airport while humanitarian supplies were being delivered. He believed, however, that a more promising course would be to make a determined effort to persuade the warring parties to conclude and honour agreements permitting the unimpeded delivery of relief supplies to all suffering civilians in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Secretary-General expressed some optimism that conditions might now be more propitious for the conclusion of such agreements than they had been recently, and said that the Chief Military Observer of UNPROFOR would continue his efforts to arrange the necessary negotiations and assist them to reach a successful conclusion.

⁸⁶ S/24000.

By a letter dated 26 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁸⁷ the representative of Canada requested an urgent formal meeting of the Council with a view to imposing economic, trade and oil sanctions against the authorities in Belgrade and to consider steps that would allow United Nations-escorted relief convoys to reach civilians in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to open Sarajevo airport for humanitarian reasons.

By a letter dated 27 May 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,⁸⁸ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina reluctantly urged the Council to enact comprehensive economic sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter against the authorities in Belgrade. He also urged the Council to take concrete measures and to empower Member States and appropriate regional organizations to take necessary steps to address the desperate humanitarian tragedy in his country, by, inter alia, placing Sarajevo airport under international control and ensuring the distribution of relief supplies and humanitarian aid from the airport under effective international security.

At its 3082nd meeting, held on 30 May 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's report of 26 May, and the letters from the representatives of Canada and Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Hungary, Morocco, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁸⁹

He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) a letter dated 22 May 1992 from the representative of Bulgaria to the Secretary-General,⁹⁰ expressing concern that the military activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina might spill over into other territories of the former Yugoslavia, risking peace and security in the Balkans, including his country, and requesting the deployment of United Nations observers along the border between Bulgaria and the former Yugoslavia, in order to avert any possible expansion of the conflict; (b) a joint letter from the representatives of Indonesia and Yugoslavia, on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, to the Secretary-General,⁹¹ appealing for the deployment of United Nations peacekeeping forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina in order to restore peace and security; (c) four letters dated 27 to 30 May 1992 from the representative of Yugoslavia to the Secretary-General,⁹² in which he, inter alia, expressed concern and disappointment at the proposed sanctions against his country; denied allegations that it was involved in aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina; suggested an urgent visit by Council members to the area to obtain a more complete and objective picture of the situation; invited the deployment of United Nations observers along the border of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and proposed, instead of sanctions, the convening of an international conference on Yugoslavia to resolve the crisis, including the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina; (d) a letter dated 27 May 1992 from the representative of Slovenia to the Secretary-General,⁹³ proposing that the Council adopt without delay the necessary decisions to terminate the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations; (e) a letter dated 29 May 1992 from the representative of New Zealand to the Secretary-General,⁹⁴ condemning the continued aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina, and expressing support for the European Community in its peacemaking role and the United Nations in its peacekeeping role as well as for the imposition of trade and other sanctions on Serbia and Montenegro, if adopted; and (f) a letter dated 27 May 1992 from the representative of Canada to the Secretary-General,⁹⁵ transmitting a recent address by the Prime Minister of Canada in which he had spoken about the situation in the former Yugoslav republics, including Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the measures Canada would be urging the Council to take and those it would be taking itself against the Belgrade regime.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde deplored the failure of the Security Council to act in the face of escalating violence in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He stressed that the defence and security of a small country like Cape Verde were based entirely on the Council's ability to play its role of maintaining international peace and security. In his country's view, the Council should act to prevent bloodshed, rather than react to atrocities and destruction, and should build on its deterrent role. His country would support the draft resolution, believing that the sanctions contemplated were warranted.⁹⁶

The representative of China expressed regret that Security Council resolution 752 (1992) and the relevant agreements for the withdrawal of troops had not been complied with. While he was in favour of the international community taking measures for an early settlement of the crisis, he expressed concern that sanctions would probably lead to further deterioration of the situation and have serious consequences for the people in the region and the economy of the neighbouring States. He expressed hope that all the relevant regional organizations would continue their constructive efforts, and supported the Secretary-General playing his proper role as a mediator.⁹⁷

The representative of Zimbabwe stressed the complexity of the Yugoslav question and commended the peace efforts since the inception of the crisis. Zimbabwe had hoped that the process of negotiation undertaken within the framework of the European Conference on Yugoslavia would succeed in containing the crisis and lead to a comprehensive peaceful settlement. It was its view that the principles that had been established to guide that Conference had taken into account the complexity of the situation. Of particular importance was the declaration of the European Community of 8 November 1991, which stated that "the prospect of recognition of the independence of those [Yugoslav] republics wishing it can only be envisaged in the framework of an overall settlement". In his report of 11 December 1991, the Secretary-General had warned that any departure from that principle could hold very serious dangers not only for the republics of Yugoslavia but also for all its peoples and for peace and security in the region. In the words he used in his letter to the President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, any such departure would be a "potential time-bomb". What had happened since was history. The speaker

stated that the time might have come for the Council to put its weight behind the Secretary-General in a peacemaking role. His country would like to see the Secretary-General actively involved in efforts to bring about a negotiated settlement in Bosnia and Herzegovina in cooperation with the efforts currently under way. Zimbabwe was not opposed to sanctions in principle, but it was concerned about their possible impact at that stage of the crisis. Would they encourage the parties to negotiate, promote confidence-building among them, improve the security and humanitarian situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina? What would be their implications for UNPROFOR? Those questions remained unanswered. That was why Zimbabwe believed that, instead of taking the Chapter VII route at this point in time, the Council should mandate the Secretary-General to seek a negotiated settlement.⁹⁸

The representative of Hungary stressed that the aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina, which was raging on, was now being committed against a State Member of the United Nations. The efforts to create so-called nation States, incorporating all people belonging to the same ethnic background, and the blatant use of force to achieve this aim through territorial conquests contradicted everything for which the United Nations stood. The time had come for the Security Council to live up to its responsibilities enshrined in the Charter and send the appropriate message to the aggressor. Hungary had accordingly co-sponsored the draft resolution providing for mandatory sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro under Chapter VII of the Charter. Although the sanctions would affect other countries in and outside the region, they would enhance the credibility of the Council and contribute to containing aggression and restoring peace and stability in the region.⁹⁹

The representative of Ecuador considered that the imposition of sanctions was one way of achieving a negotiated settlement, in exceptional cases. He stressed that any political solution of the crisis must be based on strict compliance with the principle of territorial integrity of States, respect for the rights of ethnic minorities and for the right to self-determination which should be accorded to the political entities that could ⁹⁸ Ibid., pp. 12-14.

⁹⁹ Ibid., pp. 14-17.

assert it rather than to minorities in those political entities.¹⁰⁰

The representative of India recalled that, among the examples given by the Secretary-General of the violence raging in the new Member State of Bosnia and Herzegovina was the enormous displacement of peoples, unprecedented in magnitude since the Second World War. There was thus, he said, a clear threat to international peace and security that the Council must address. He observed that Council resolution 752 (1992), which spelled out the basic requirements to be met by all parties to the conflict, remained unimplemented and expressed concern at the continuing and rapid deterioration of the situation. Action was needed to stop the tragedy. Many of India's concerns, such as the exemption of food and medicine from the sanctions, and the inclusion of a paragraph reaffirming the Council's responsibility in terms of Article 50 of the Charter, had been taken into account in the draft resolution. The draft had also been modified with a view to respecting the demarcation, as enshrined in the Charter, of the responsibilities between the General Assembly and the Security Council in regard to membership in the United Nations. Mindful, however, of the possible implications of Chapter VII measures for a peaceful settlement of the conflict and for the cooperation from all parties which was indispensable for UNPROFOR to fulfil its mandate, India had suggested that a period of warning, however brief, might have been helpful and have enabled the Secretary-General to add his enormous influence to the efforts of the European Community. It had not pressed that point but continued to believe that the Council could not afford not to make use of the services of the Secretary-General in the search for a peaceful solution.¹⁰¹

The representative of Morocco stated that the entire Islamic community and the members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference saw the sanctions as an expression of unreserved condemnation of the inhuman acts committed every day against Bosnia and Herzegovina, an independent country and Member of the United Nations. The sanctions were the firm and unequivocal demand on the part of all communities, of all races and religions, to put an end to blindness and intolerance.¹⁰²

The representative of Venezuela stated that the international community had delayed too long in bringing this matter before the Security Council. His delegation had carefully analysed the implications of the draft resolution to be adopted and had concluded that it was the last recourse in a lengthy process of negotiations frustrated by the intransigence and violence of the Belgrade authorities. The sanctions were the responsibility of the leaders in Belgrade who had flouted international opinion and widened their attacks on Bosnia and Herzegovina and on Croatia. The resolution would condemn the conduct of a State that had abused its military power and trampled the sovereignty of a State Member of the United Nations. This was no longer a domestic problem for the former Yugoslavia. The resolution would also send an important message to States that thought they could still solve their differences with other States by force of arms.¹⁰³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It was adopted by 13 votes in favour, none against and two abstentions (China and Zimbabwe), as resolution 757 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992 and 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992,

Noting that in the very complex context of events in the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia all parties bear some responsibility for the situation,

Reaffirming its support for the Conference on Yugoslavia, including the efforts undertaken by the European Community in the framework of the discussions on constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina, and recalling that no territorial gains or changes brought about by violence are acceptable and that the borders of Bosnia and Herzegovina are inviolable,

Deploring the fact that the demands in resolution 752 (1992) have not been complied with, including its demands that:

- Action be taken as regards units of the Yugoslav People's Army in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the disbanding and disarming with weapons placed under effective international monitoring of any units that are neither withdrawn nor placed under the authority of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina,
- All irregular forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina be disbanded and disarmed,

Deploring also that its call for the immediate cessation of forcible expulsions and attempts to change the ethnic composition of the population has not been heeded, and reaffirming in this context the need for the effective protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including those of ethnic minorities,

Dismayed that conditions have not yet been established for the effective and unhindered delivery of humanitarian assistance, including safe and secure access to and from Sarajevo and other airports in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Deeply concerned that those United Nations Protection Force personnel remaining in Sarajevo have been subjected to deliberate mortar and small-arms fire, and that the United Nations Military Observers deployed in the Mostar region have had to be withdrawn,

Deeply concerned also at developments in Croatia, including persistent ceasefire violations and the continued expulsion of non-Serb civilians, and at the obstruction of and lack of cooperation with the Force in other parts of Croatia,

Deploring the tragic incident on 18 May 1992 which caused the death of a member of the International Committee of the Red Cross team in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting that the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations has not been generally accepted,

Expressing its appreciation for the report of the Secretary-General of 26 May 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 752 (1992),

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling also the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter, and the continuing role that the European Community is playing in working for a peaceful solution in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as in other republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Recalling further its decision in resolution 752 (1992) to consider further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with its relevant resolutions, and affirming its determination to take measures against any party or parties which fail to fulfil the requirements of resolution 752 (1992) and its other relevant resolutions, Determined in this context to adopt certain measures with the sole objective of achieving a peaceful solution and encouraging the efforts undertaken by the European Community and its member States,

Recalling the right of States, under Article 50 of the Charter, to consult the Council where they find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures,

Determining that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other parts of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constitutes a threat to international peace and security,

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter and to consider immediately, whenever necessary, further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with its relevant resolutions.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Belgium stated that the Council's resolution was the outcome of lengthy negotiations initiated by the three members of the European Community sitting on the Council, joined by the United States. It represented the end of a long process during which the European Community, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the United Nations had spared no effort to try to reach a peaceful settlement of the grave crisis in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In view of the failure of all earlier attempts, the members of the European Community had seen the imposition of sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro as the only recourse and had recently imposed a trade embargo against that country while calling upon the Council to take similar action. Belgium welcomed the Council having acted along those lines and urged the Serbian authorities to comply fully with the requirements of resolution 752 (1992).¹⁰⁴

The representative of the United States maintained that the aggression of the Serbian regime against Bosnia and Herzegovina represented a clear threat to international peace and security and a grave challenge to the values and principles underlying the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and the Charter of the United Nations. He stressed that the international community would not tolerate the use of force and terror to settle political or territorial disputes. The Chapter VII measures just adopted were serious and comprehensive and the United States was determined to see them through and, if necessary, to seek further measures, until the Serbian regime changed its course. The speaker insisted that Belgrade must, inter alia, clearly and unequivocally demonstrate respect for the independence, borders, territorial integrity and legitimate sovereign governments of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and other former Yugoslav republics.¹⁰⁵

The representative of the Russian Federation maintained that the expansion of the ethnic strife into a broader conflict involving groups and forces from republics bordering Bosnia and Herzegovina constituted a real threat to the countries of the region and to international peace and security. In voting for the sanctions, the Russian Federation was discharging its obligations as a permanent member of the Security Council for the maintenance of international law and order. At the same time, it believed that the Council must go further and shoulder the responsibility for a settlement in Bosnia and Herzegovina and a settlement of the Yugoslav crisis as a whole, making use of all the measures for the restoration of peace provided for in the Charter of the United Nations. The speaker appealed to all peoples living in the republics of the former Yugoslavia and their representatives to refrain from the use of force in solving their problems and to engage in a quest for a comprehensive settlement through peaceful political means that would take account of the legitimate interests of the various national communities. The Russian Federation believed that the opportunity for such a settlement was to be found in direct negotiations by the parties, within the framework of an international conference on Bosnia and Herzegovina under the auspices of the European Community. The speaker suggested that the Security Council — perhaps in consultation with CSCE — could work out a list of criteria on the basis of which the Secretary-General might bring up for consideration by the Council the question of sanctions against those who bore major responsibility for bloodshed, and other decisive actions that might be taken by the international community.¹⁰⁶

The representative of France observed that the demands put forward by the Council in its resolution 752 (1992), designed to promote the cessation of hostilities and the continuation of peace efforts, had not been met. A firm reaction by the international community was essential. The resolution just adopted posited the principle of the application, under Chapter VII of the Charter, of measures against any party that did not heed the demands put forward by the Security Council. It also called for the immediate implementation of a set of measures against Serbia and Montenegro. These measures were very broad in scope because they were designed to respond to an extremely grave situation, but the Council was determined to avoid their leading to total isolation of the populations concerned and to limit their impact on them. Thus, the trade embargo established in the resolution provided for exceptions in regard to medical supplies and foodstuffs. The speaker added that, although France had voted in favour of the resolution, it disassociated itself from the provision for freezing sports contacts because the envisaged measure was derisory, vexatious and inappropriate, having been borrowed from measures adopted in another context — the struggle against apartheid. He concluded by expressing full support for the Council's appeal to the Secretary-
