The representative of the United Kingdom regretted that the efforts through the European Community, the Peace Conference, the monitoring missions and the constitutional conference in Bosnia and Herzegovina had so far been to no avail. He observed that, just as peacekeepers found difficulty in keeping the peace if there was no peace to keep, the peacemakers found difficulty in making peace if there was not a minimum of cooperation with their efforts, as in this case. The United Nations had had the same experience, but he firmly supported the continued deployment of UNPROFOR. Noting that the responsibility for the events in Yugoslavia was shared among many, he welcomed the Council's expressed intention in the resolution to ensure that there was compliance by all with the principles set out in resolution 752 (1992). However, he stated that there was really no doubt where the principal responsibility for the current situation now lay: with the civil and military authorities in Belgrade. That is what had brought the Council to the matter of sanctions. They were designed, as the resolution stated, purely and simply to bring about a peaceful solution and to bring the parties back to the negotiating table.¹⁰⁸

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Austria, stated that the decision of the Council to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro was harsh but necessary. He recalled his Foreign Minister's statement in the Council as early as 25 September 1991, in which he had outlined the principles upon which relations among the peoples of the former Yugoslavia should be based in the future. Those principles — among them the strict observance of the principle of non-use of force, respect for human rights, protection of all minorities, and effective guarantees for equal participation in the political process by all population groups — remained valid. He stressed that the parties and others concerned had to comply with the Council's demand to create immediately the necessary conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies. If that compliance were not forthcoming, the Council would shortly have to consider further measures to achieve that objective.¹⁰⁹

K. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 757 (1992)

Decision of 8 June 1992 (3083rd meeting): resolution 758 (1992)

On 6 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 757 (1992),¹¹⁰ on the progress made through the use of his good offices to secure the necessary conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to Sarajevo and other destinations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He reported that on 5 June an agreement had been signed by all the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina providing for the reopening of Sarajevo airport for the delivery of humanitarian supplies, under the exclusive authority of the United Nations.¹¹¹ The agreement envisaged that UNPROFOR would take over full operational responsibility for the functioning and security of the airport. The Secretary-General noted that the addition of these functions to the UNPROFOR mandate would require the consent of the Council, which would also have to approve a corresponding increase in the Force's strength. Noting that the agreement represented a significant breakthrough in the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina — although only a first step towards the implementation of resolution 757 (1992) — he expressed the view that the opportunity should be seized and said he had accepted the concept of operations proposed by the Force Commander. This envisaged, in the first phase, the deployment of United Nations military observers to Sarajevo to create security conditions for the reopening of the airport.¹¹² He added that he had asked the Force Commander to pursue negotiation of a broader security zone encompassing the city of Sarajevo as a whole, as a second phase of the negotiations. The proposed operation would involve significant risks, since many earlier agreements in Bosnia and Herzegovina had been broken. However, the Secretary-General considered that successful implementation of the agreement of 5 June, which reaffirmed the existing ceasefire agreement as well as providing for the reopening of the airport, would serve both the humanitarian and the political objectives. He accordingly recommended that the Council take the decision to enlarge the mandate and strength of UNPROFOR, as proposed. He hoped that this would be the first stage of a process that would restore peace to Bosnia and Herzegovina.

At its 3083rd meeting, held on 8 June 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹¹³

He also drew their attention to two letters dated 5 June 1992 from the representative of Yugoslavia addressed to the Secretary-General.¹¹⁴ The first letter claimed that the attitude of Slovenia with regard to the question of the membership of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international organizations was an act of political interference in the internal affairs of another State. The second letter affirmed that Yugoslavia was honouring all its international obligations and was firmly resolved to fulfil all the requirements emanating from resolutions 752 (1992) and 757 (1992).

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 758 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992 and 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992,

Noting that the Secretary-General has secured the evacuation of the Marshal Tito barracks in Sarajevo, Noting also the agreement of all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina to the reopening of Sarajevo airport for humanitarian purposes, under the exclusive authority of the United Nations, and with the assistance of the United Nations Protection Force,

Noting further that the reopening of Sarajevo airport for humanitarian purposes would constitute a first step in establishing a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport,

Deploring the continuation of the fighting in Bosnia and Herzegovina which is rendering impossible the distribution of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and its environs,

Stressing the imperative need to find an urgent negotiated political solution for the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 6 June 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 757 (1992);

2. Decides to enlarge the mandate and strength of the United Nations Protection Force, established under resolution 743 (1992), in accordance with the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy, when he judges it appropriate, the military observers and related personnel and equipment required for the activities referred to in paragraph 5 of his report;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to seek Security Council authorization for the deployment of the additional elements of the Force, after he has reported to the Council that all the conditions necessary for them to carry out the mandate approved by the Council, including an effective and durable ceasefire, have been fulfilled;

5. Strongly condemns all those parties and others concerned that are responsible for violations of the ceasefire reaffirmed in paragraph 1 of the agreement of 5 June 1992 annexed to the report of the Secretary-General;

6. Calls upon all parties and others concerned to comply fully with the above-mentioned agreement and in particular to respect strictly the ceasefire reaffirmed in paragraph 1 thereof;

7. Demands that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with the Force and international humanitarian agencies and take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of their personnel;

8. Demands also that all parties and others concerned create immediately the necessary conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to Sarajevo and other destinations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the establishment of a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport and respecting the agreements signed at Geneva on 22 May 1992;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to use his good offices in order to achieve the objectives contained in paragraph 8 above, and invites him to keep under continuous review any further measures that may become necessary to ensure unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on his efforts no later than seven days after the adoption of the present resolution;

11. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

L. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 15 of Security Council resolution 757 (1992) and paragraph 10 of resolution 758 (1992)

Decision of 18 June 1992 (3086th meeting): resolution 760 (1992)

On 15 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 757 (1992), on the implementation of resolution 752 (1992) by all parties and others concerned, and pursuant to resolution 758 (1992), on his efforts to reopen Sarajevo airport in order to facilitate the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies.¹¹⁵ He stated that there was only limited progress to report regarding implementation of the international community's efforts to control and resolve the dreadful conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Nevertheless, he believed that the international community should remain firm in its determination to put into effect the mechanisms and procedures which it had already established to relieve the human suffering, to bring the fighting under control and to negotiate a just and lasting political settlement of the conflict. What was lacking was willingness on the part of the opposing sides to honour agreements they had signed. Although it was encouraging in this respect that the parties had reaffirmed a new ceasefire as from 15 June, which appeared to be holding, he was aware of how often in the past similar hopes had been dashed. The Secretary-General observed that the picture in Croatia was less sombre as UNPROFOR moved towards assumption of its full responsibilities in all four sectors of the United Nations Protected Areas, though daily breaches of the ceasefire and violations of human rights still occurred there as well as instances of non-cooperation with UNPROFOR.

As for his efforts to reopen Sarajevo airport, the Secretary-General reported that the ceasefire had allowed an initial reconnaissance to be carried out, and that significant progress had been made in discussions on the withdrawal of heavy weapons from within range of the airport. Despite this progress, however, it was clear that considerable work still needed to be done to get the airport functioning again.

The Secretary-General assured the Council that, for its part, the United Nations would continue to do all it could to implement both the original mandate of UNPROFOR in Croatia and the new one entrusted to it in Bosnia and Herzegovina. These efforts were intended to create the conditions in which effective international action could be taken to ease the suffering of the civilian population and in which the negotiations of political solutions could proceed under the auspices of the European Community. He stressed that it was political negotiation which offered the only real hope of restoring peace in the former republics of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. He therefore joined Lord Carrington, the Chairman of the European Community Conference on Yugoslavia, in appealing to all concerned to return to the negotiating table over which he and Ambassador Cutileiro presided, and suggested that the Council might again wish to reaffirm its unqualified support for their efforts.

At its 3086th meeting, held on 18 June 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.¹¹⁶

He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) a letter dated 11 June 1992 from the representative of Czechoslovakia, on behalf of his country's chairmanship of CSCE, addressed to the Secretary-General,¹¹⁷ transmitting the decisions adopted by the Committee of Senior Officials of CSCE on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other parts of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; (b) a letter dated 15 June 1992 from the Foreign Minister of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁸ observing that Council's resolutions 757 (1992) and 758 (1992) had not yet stemmed the aggression by the Serbian regime or permitted the delivery of desperately needed humanitarian assistance, and requesting the Council to invoke Article 42 of Chapter VII, which called for coordinated military action to restore international peace and security when the means provided for in Article 41 proved to be inadequate; and (c) a letter dated 16 June 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹¹⁹ transmitting a declaration on the situation in Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community and its member States on 15 June.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 760 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, and 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, and in particular paragraph 7 of resolution 752 (1992), in which it emphasized the urgent need for humanitarian assistance and fully supported the current efforts to deliver humanitarian aid to all the victims of the conflict,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Decides that the prohibitions in paragraph 4 (c) of resolution 757 (1992) concerning the sale or supply to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) of commodities or products, other than medical supplies and foodstuffs, and the prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 757 (1992) shall not apply, with the approval of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 724 (1991) on Yugoslavia under the simplified and accelerated "no objection" procedure, to commodities and products for essential humanitarian need.

M. Oral reports of the Secretary-General on 26 and 29 June 1992 pursuant to Security Council resolution 758 (1992)

At its 3087th meeting, held on 29 June 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda two oral reports made by the Secretary-General to the Council on 26 and 29 June pursuant to resolution 758 (1992), on the situation in and around Sarajevo airport.¹²⁰ In his statement of 26 June, the Secretary-General expressed regret that the situation in Sarajevo had deteriorated considerably that day, with the increased bombardment by the Bosnian Serb forces of a suburb of Sarajevo close to the airport. That action was occurring, he said, despite an agreement by the Serb side to stop shelling civilian areas and to abide by a unilateral ceasefire. It was also incompatible with the agreement of 5 June on the basis of which UNPROFOR had endeavoured to open the airport. Unless the military offensive by the Serb side ceased and there was evidence over the next 48 hours of the relocation of heavy weaponry into areas of concentration to be supervised by UNPROFOR, the Secretary-General said that he would have no choice but to reassess the feasibility of UNPROFOR implementing the agreement. It would then be up to the Council to determine what other means would be required to bring relief to the suffering people of Sarajevo.

In his statement of 29 June, the Secretary-General informed the Council that considerable progress had since been made towards the assumption by UNPROFOR of responsibility for the airport: Serb forces had been withdrawing from the airport and both sides had begun to concentrate their heavy weapons in locations to be supervised by UNPROFOR. Although an absolute ceasefire had not yet been achieved, he endorsed the recommendation of his Force Commander that UNPROFOR must seize the opportunity offered by these developments. He therefore requested the Council to grant the authorization foreseen in paragraph 4 of resolution 758 (1992) to deploy the additional elements of UNPROFOR necessary to secure the airport and make it operational. He suggested that the Council might also wish to call strongly on all parties to make the ceasefire absolute. In particular, in view of the pattern of recent fighting in Sarajevo, he requested the Council to join him in appealing to the Presidency of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise the utmost restraint in this situation and not to seek any military advantage from the Serb withdrawal from the airport. It was important that the humanitarian objectives of the UNPROFOR action be kept firmly in mind by all parties.

At the same meeting, the President (Belgium) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹²¹

He also drew their attention to a letter dated 29 June 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²² transmitting a declaration on the former Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community and its member States at a summit meeting held on 26 and 27 June. The declaration stated, inter alia, that States members of the European Community would propose that the Security Council take, without delay, all necessary measures for the reopening of Sarajevo airport and the effective delivery of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and neighbouring areas. It added that, while giving priority to peaceful means, the European Council did not exclude support for the use of military means by the United Nations to achieve these humanitarian objectives.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 761 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992 and 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992,

Noting the considerable progress reported by the Secretary-General towards securing the evacuation of Sarajevo airport and its reopening by the United Nations Protection Force and feeling the need to maintain this favourable momentum,

Underlining the urgency of a quick delivery of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and its environs,

1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to deploy immediately additional elements of the United Nations Protection Force to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in accordance with his report of 6 June 1992;

2. Calls upon all parties and others concerned to comply fully with the agreement of 5 June 1992 and in particular to maintain an absolute and unconditional ceasefire;

3. Appeals to all sides to cooperate fully with the Force in the reopening of the airport, to exercise the utmost restraint and not to seek any military advantage in this situation;

4. Demands that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with the Force and international humanitarian agencies and organizations and take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of their personnel; in the absence of such cooperation, the Security Council does not exclude other measures to deliver humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and its environs;

5. Calls upon all States to contribute to the international humanitarian efforts in Sarajevo and its environs;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

N. Further report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 752 (1992)

Decision of 30 June 1992 (3088th meeting): resolution 762 (1992)

On 26 June 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to resolution 752 (1992),¹²³ on his efforts to ensure that UNPROFOR would assume its full responsibilities in all the United Nations Protected Areas as soon as possible and to encourage all parties and others concerned to resolve any problems remaining in that connection. The Secretary-General recalled that in his previous reports, of 24 April and 12 May 1992, he had alluded to the problem of certain areas of Croatia that were then controlled by the Yugoslav People's Army and populated largely by Serbs, but which were outside the agreed boundaries of the Protected Areas. The Belgrade authorities had pressed strongly for these areas, which had come to be known as the "pink zones", to be included in the Protected Areas. Otherwise, they said, the Serbs resident in them would forcibly resist the restoration of Croatian authority after the withdrawal of the Yugoslav People's Army. The Croatian authorities had, equally strongly, resisted any changes in the boundaries of those Areas as the peacekeeping plan approved by the Security Council did not provide for any such boundary changes. Endorsing this interpretation, the Secretary-General had concluded that the Croatian authorities were under no obligation to agree to an adjustment of the agreed boundaries in those sectors where the problem was particularly acute, in order to circumvent it. In the circumstances, UNPROFOR had been instructed to deploy in all Protected Areas in accordance with the plan. UNPROFOR had assumed its full responsibilities in Sectors East and West. Difficulties had, however, been encountered by the Force in Sectors North and South, delaying its assumption of responsibility there.

In view of the foregoing and the exhaustive discussions that had taken place during the previous three months with all parties concerned, the UNPROFOR Force Commander had arrived at certain conclusions, which the Secretary-General fully endorsed and which he felt necessary to place before the Security Council for its consideration. First, the restoration of Croatian authority in the "pink zones" without effective preparation and the re-establishment of confidence among its inhabitants did not now appear achievable without a serious danger of the resumption of armed conflict. Secondly, the instability caused within Sectors North and South by the "pink zones" situation had been increased by the conflict that was raging in the adjacent areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Thirdly, the assumption of responsibility in the Sectors by UNPROFOR and the implementation of the plan approved by the Security Council had little likelihood of success if the question of the "pink zones" remained unresolved.

In these circumstances, and on the basis of a recommendation from the Force Commander, the Secretary-General proposed, inter alia, that (a) a joint commission be established under the chairmanship of UNPROFOR, consisting of representatives of the Government of Croatia and the local authorities in the region, with the participation of the European Community Monitoring Mission, to oversee and monitor the process of the restoration of authority in the "pink zones" by the Croatian Government; (b) an appropriate number of United Nations military observers be deployed along the line of confrontation and within the "pink zones"; and (c) United Nations civilian police be deployed throughout the "pink zones" in order to monitor the maintenance of law and order by the existing police forces, with particular regard to the well-being of any minority groups in the area.¹²⁴ The Secretary-General indicated that implementation of these measures would require the strengthening of UNPROFOR by the addition of some 60 military observers and 120 civilian police.

¹²⁴ S/24188, para. 16.

Observing that the collapse of the plan approved by the Security Council in Sectors North and South would have grave consequences not only in the other Protected Areas but also throughout the region,¹²⁵ he recommended that the Council lend its support to his proposed course of action and that it appeal to all parties to cooperate fully with UNPROFOR in its implementation.

At its 3088th meeting, held on 30 June 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 26 June in its agenda.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹²⁶

The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 762 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992 and 761 (1992) of 29 June 1992,

Noting the further report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 752 (1992),

Recalling its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Welcoming the progress made as a result of the assumption of responsibilities by the United Nations Protection Force in Sectors East and West, and concerned about the difficulties encountered by the Force in Sectors North and South,

Commending again the efforts undertaken by the European Community and its member States, with the support of the States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, through the convening of a Conference on Yugoslavia, including the mechanisms set forth within it, to ensure a peaceful political settlement,

1. Approves the further report of the Secretary-General of 26 June 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 752 (1992);

2. Urges all parties and others concerned to honour their commitments to effect a complete cessation of hostilities and to implement the United Nations peacekeeping plan;

3. Also urges, in accordance with paragraph 4 of resolution 727 (1992), the Government of Croatia to withdraw its army to the positions held before the offensive of 21 June 1992 and to cease hostile military activities within or adjacent to the United Nations Protected Areas;

4. Urges the remaining units of the Yugoslav People's Army, the Serb territorial defence forces in Croatia and others concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under the United Nations peacekeeping plan, in particular with regard to the withdrawal and the disarming of all forces in accordance with the plan;

5. Urges the Government of Croatia and others concerned to follow the course of action outlined in paragraph 16 of the report of the Secretary-General and appeals to all parties to assist the Force in its implementation;

6. Recommends the establishment of the Joint Commission described in paragraph 16 of the report of the Secretary-General, which should consult, as may be necessary or appropriate, with the Belgrade authorities in performing its functions;

7. Authorizes the strengthening of the Force by the addition of up to sixty military observers and one hundred and twenty civilian police to perform the functions envisaged in paragraph 16 of the report of the Secretary-General, with the agreement of the Government of Croatia and others concerned;

8. Reaffirms the embargo applied in paragraph 6 of resolution 713 (1991), paragraph 5 of resolution 724 (1991) and paragraph 6 of resolution 727 (1992);

9. Supports the views expressed in paragraph 18 of the report of the Secretary-General about the grave consequences which the collapse of the United Nations peacekeeping plan would have throughout the region;

10. Encourages the Secretary-General to pursue his efforts to fulfil as soon as possible the terms of paragraph 12 of resolution 752 (1992);

11. Calls again upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia and its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and reaffirms that the United Nations peacekeeping plan and its implementation is in no way intended to prejudge the terms of a political settlement;

12. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

O. Statement by the President of the Security Council

Decision of 9 July 1992: statement by the President

On 9 July 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (Cape Verde) issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²⁷

The members of the Security Council take note of the fact that document S/24258¹²⁸ will be issued on 11 July 1992. They agree that this fact does not prejudice decisions that may be taken by appropriate United Nations bodies or their national positions on this matter.

P. Further report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolutions 757 (1992), 758 (1992) and 761 (1992)

On 10 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to Security Council resolutions 757 (1992), 758 (1992) and 761 (1992),¹²⁹ on progress relating to the reopening of Sarajevo airport under the auspices of UNPROFOR. He stated that the airport had reopened effectively, under UNPROFOR control, for the delivery of humanitarian assistance. However, as the operation had taken shape, it had become apparent that the strength of UNPROFOR was inadequate. He recommended that it be increased by some 1,600 additional personnel, to ensure the security and functioning of the airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance.¹³⁰ The Secretary-General also warned that, despite an encouraging start, the Sarajevo airport operation was based upon a foundation of the utmost fragility. Three of the basic conditions stipulated in the airport agreement of 5 June had not been complied with by either side: a ceasefire; the complete concentration of heavy weaponry under UNPROFOR monitoring; and the establishment of security corridors. The continuing military conflict in the area could, moreover, at any moment encroach upon the airport and disrupt the arrival and distribution of relief goods. Meanwhile, the provision of humanitarian aid to the rest of the country was sparse, intermittent and hazardous. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stressed that only urgent efforts by the international community to address the basic causes of the conflict, including negotiations with all the parties involved in it, could resolve what had emerged as one of the worst humanitarian emergencies of the time.

At its 3093rd meeting, held on 13 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 10 July in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,¹³¹ and made an oral correction to paragraph 8 of the draft resolution to reinstate a phrase that had been agreed upon in the Council's prior consultations.

The draft resolution, as orally corrected, was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 764 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992, 761 (1992) of 29 June 1992 and 762 (1992) of 30 June 1992,

Noting with appreciation the further report of the Secretary-General of 10 July 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolutions 757 (1992), 758 (1992) and 761 (1992),

Disturbed by the continuing violation of the Sarajevo airport agreement of 5 June 1992, in which the parties agreed, inter alia:

- That all anti-aircraft weapon systems would be withdrawn from positions from which they could engage the airport and its air approaches,
- That all artillery, mortar, ground-to-ground missile systems and tanks within range of the airport would be concentrated in areas agreed by the United Nations Protection Force and subject to its observation at the firing line,
- To establish security corridors between the airport and the city, under the Force's control, to ensure the safe movement of humanitarian aid and related personnel,

Deeply concerned about the safety of the Force's personnel,

Cognizant of the magnificent work being done in Sarajevo by the Force and its leadership, despite the conditions of great difficulty and danger,

Aware of the enormous difficulties in the evacuation by air of cases of special humanitarian concern,

Deeply disturbed by the situation which now prevails in Sarajevo and by many reports and indications of deteriorating conditions throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Commending the determination and courage of all those who are participating in the humanitarian effort,

Deploring the continuation of the fighting in Bosnia and Herzegovina which is rendering difficult the provision of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and its environs, as well as in other areas of the Republic,

Noting that the reopening of Sarajevo airport for humanitarian purposes constitutes a first step in establishing a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport,

Letter dated 17 July 1992 from the Permanent Representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 17 July 1992 (3097th meeting): statement by the President

By letters dated 11 and 12 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³² the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Croatia and the President of Croatia, respectively, stated that the Serbian and Montenegrin aggressors, taking advantage of the focus of world attention on Sarajevo, were escalating their attacks in all other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina and in part of Croatia. Croatia was facing insurmountable difficulties in its efforts to care for the recent avalanche of refugees set in motion by these events. Observing that all efforts made so far by the international community to halt this aggression by political and economic means and to bring about a peaceful resolution of the crisis had failed, Croatia called upon the Security Council to meet immediately and approve an international military intervention.

By a letter dated 13 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹³³ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina drew attention to the continuing barbaric attack by the Belgrade regime on the town of Gorazde, which was under siege, and its attacks on other population centres around the country. He requested that the Council take “all steps necessary, including air power”, to stop this “humanitarian nightmare” from deepening. He also recommended that the Council initiate flights to Tuzla, a city north of Sarajevo, whose airport and environs were under Government control and could be used as an efficient distribution point for the delivery of relief to Gorazde and other desperate towns nearby.

By a letter also dated 13 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹³⁴ the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of Slovenia stated that his country joined the initiative calling for an emergency meeting of the Council to contend with the aggression in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It urged the Council to take the necessary measures to put an end to the aggression, armed terror and so-called ethnic purification, and to ensure respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of Bosnia and Herzegovina and its recognized borders.

By a letter dated 17 July 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹³⁵ the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom transmitted the text of an agreement between the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina, signed at London on 17 July 1992. In it, the parties, inter alia, agreed to a ceasefire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina for a period of 14 days; asked the Security Council to make arrangements for the international supervision of all heavy weapons; agreed to the return of refugees and to freedom of movement for civilians caught up in or trapped by the military situation; and welcomed the planned resumption of the talks on future constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina in London on 27 July 1992.

At its 3097th meeting, on 17 July 1992, the Council included the five letters described above in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a number of other documents:¹³⁶

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹³⁷

The Security Council welcomes the agreement between the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina, signed in London on 17 July 1992 within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia.

The Council calls on the parties to comply fully with the agreement in all its aspects. In particular, it calls on all parties and others concerned to observe scrupulously the ceasefire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council has decided in principle to respond positively to the request for the United Nations to make arrangements for the supervision by the United Nations Protection Force of all heavy weapons (combat aircraft, armour, artillery, mortars, rocket-launchers, etc.) in accordance with the London agreement. It calls on the parties to declare immediately to the Force Commander the locations and quantities of the heavy weapons to be placed under supervision. It requests the Secretary-General to report by 20 July 1992 on the implementation and resource implications of this decision.

The Council welcomes the provisions in the London agreement concerning the return of all refugees and freedom of movement for civilians caught up in or trapped by the military situation. It also welcomes the efforts being made to mobilize international assistance in handling the refugee problem under the aegis of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. It invites the Secretary-General and the United Nations humanitarian agencies concerned to make the maximum use of the ceasefire now proclaimed to bring humanitarian relief and supplies to all parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council expresses its satisfaction that the talks on future constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina are to resume in London on 27 July 1992, and urges the parties to contribute actively and positively to these talks so that a peaceful solution is achieved as soon as possible.

The Council stresses the need for full compliance with all the requirements of the relevant resolutions of the Council towards which the London agreement is an important step. It reaffirms its decision to remain actively seized of the matter and to consider immediately, whenever necessary, further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with those resolutions.

R. Report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Decision of 24 July 1992 (3100th meeting): statement by the President

On 21 July 1992, pursuant to the request made in the presidential statement of 17 July, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation and resource implications of its decision in principle to respond positively to the request for UNPROFOR to supervise the heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina in accordance with the London Agreement.¹³⁸ He also submitted a proposed concept of operations for such supervision. However, he observed that, having carefully considered the London Agreement and the circumstances in which it was concluded, as well as the advice of the Force Commander, he had concluded that the conditions did not exist for him to recommend that the Council accept the request of the three parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina that the United Nations supervise the heavy weapons which they had agreed to place under international supervision. This was for a variety of reasons — some relating to principle; others, to practical considerations. In the first place, the request raised the question of the relationship between the United Nations and regional organizations in the maintenance of international peace and security. He noted that Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations underlined the primary responsibility of the Council in such matters, providing, for instance, that in certain circumstances it could “utilize” regional organizations or agencies. There was no provision for the reverse to occur. In other instances when the United Nations and a regional organization had both been involved in an international peace and security situation, care had been taken to ensure that the primacy of the world Organization had not been compromised. A second concern was that the United Nations had not participated in the negotiation of the London Agreement. The Secretary-General observed that it was most unusual for the United Nations to be asked to help to implement a politico-military agreement in whose negotiation it had played no part. As a matter of principle, he believed that Secretariat staff should be involved in the negotiation of any agreement which was likely to give rise to a peacekeeping role for the United Nations. His concern on these two points was heightened by the lack of clarity concerning the respective roles of the United Nations and the European Community in implementation of the London Agreement.

¹³⁶ Letters dated 7 July 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the President of the Council (S/24250 and S/24251); letter dated 9 July 1992 from the representative of Croatia to the President of the Council (S/24253); letter dated 12 July 1992 from the representative of Egypt to the Secretary-General (S/24272); letter dated 13 July 1992 from the representative of Yugoslavia to the President of the Council (S/24279); note verbale dated 8 July 1992 from the representative of the United Kingdom to the Secretary-General (S/24280); letter dated 15 July 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the Secretary-General (S/24297); and letter dated 15 July 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom to the President of the Council (S/24299).

The Secretary-General noted, thirdly, that it was well established that certain conditions had to exist before a successful peacekeeping operation could be established. These included the consent and cooperation of the parties and a practicable mandate. Neither existed in the present case. Fourthly, the additional function that UNPROFOR was being asked to assume was simply beyond the existing operational and logistical capability of the United Nations. Fifthly, there was a question of priorities. The United Nations was already massively engaged in the former Yugoslavia. The Secretary-General expressed concern that, if the Council continued to concentrate its attention and resources to such an extent on Yugoslav problems, this would be at the expense of the Organization's ability to help resolve equally cruel and dangerous conflicts elsewhere, e.g. in Somalia.

At its 3100th meeting, held on 24 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 21 July in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two other documents. The first was a letter dated 20 July from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the Secretary-General,¹³⁹ stating that, in spite of the London Agreement and the promises of the Prime Minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the attacks of the aggressor had continued in almost all areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina and in some places had intensified. Unless the international community, and above all the Security Council, took more decisive measures to stop this aggression, it would dangerously escalate. The second document was a letter dated 21 July 1992 from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴⁰ transmitting a declaration on Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community and its member States on 20 July. The Community and its member States, inter alia, welcomed prompt action by the Security Council, working in close cooperation with the European Community Conference on Yugoslavia, to put into effect the supervision of the heavy weaponry specified in the London Agreement.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴¹

The Security Council recalls the statement of its President of 17 July 1992 concerning the agreement signed in London on 17 July 1992 by the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General of 21 July 1992 on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina that he submitted to it, in response to its request of 17 July 1992, together with a Concept of Operations.

The Council concurs with the Secretary-General's view that the conditions do not yet exist for the United Nations to supervise the heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina as envisaged in the London agreement.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to contact all Member States, particularly the member States of the relevant regional organizations in Europe, to ask them to make urgently available to the Secretary-General information about the personnel, equipment and logistic support which they would be prepared to contribute, individually or collectively, to the supervision of heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina as described in the Secretary-General's report.

In the light of the outcome of these contacts, the Secretary-General will undertake the further preparatory work needed on the supervision of the heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, the Council invites the European regional arrangements and agencies concerned, and particularly the European Community, to enhance their cooperation with the Secretary-General in their efforts to help to resolve the conflicts that continue to rage in the former Yugoslavia. In particular, it would welcome the participation of the Secretary-General in any negotiations under European Community auspices.

The Council further invites the European Community in cooperation with the Secretary-General of the United Nations to examine the possibility of broadening and intensifying the present Conference with a view to providing a new momentum in the search for negotiated settlements of the various conflicts and disputes in the former Yugoslavia.

The Council underlines the importance of the parties to the Agreement signed at London on 17 July 1992 honouring fully the terms of that agreement and calls on others concerned also to respect the agreement. It emphasizes in particular the need for the parties to respect and maintain a ceasefire throughout the entire territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and for them to declare immediately to the United Nations Protection Force Commander the locations and quantities of the heavy weapons to be placed under supervision. It further demands that the parties and others concerned cooperate fully with the Force and the humanitarian agencies and take all necessary steps to ensure the safety of their personnel.

The Council stresses the need for full compliance with all the requirements of its relevant resolutions and stands ready to consider immediately, whenever necessary, further steps to achieve a peaceful solution in conformity with its relevant resolutions.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report back to it on the further work being undertaken and remains actively seized of the matter.

By separate letters dated 4 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴² the representatives of the United States and Venezuela drew attention to reports of abuses of civilian prisoners in camps throughout the former Yugoslavia, and requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to discuss the matter.

At its 3103rd meeting, on 4 August 1992, the Council included the letters from the representatives of the United States and Venezuela in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (China) also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 29 July 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁴³ attaching lists of concentration camps and prisons in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Serbia and Montenegro, under the control of the Belgrade regime and "its surrogates", in which tens of thousands of innocent citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina were held captive. The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requested the Security Council to take all necessary steps to secure the safety and provide for the basic needs of these innocent victims, so that they could eventually return to their homes, as agreed in the London Agreement of 17 July.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁴⁴

The Security Council is deeply concerned at the continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law and in particular reports of the imprisonment and abuse of civilians in camps, prisons and detention centres within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council condemns any such violations and abuses and demands that relevant international organizations, and in particular the International Committee of the Red Cross, be granted immediate, unimpeded and continued access to all such places and calls upon all parties to do all in their power to facilitate such access. The Council further calls upon all parties, States, international organizations and non-governmental organizations to make immediately available to the Council any further information they might possess regarding these camps and access to them.

The Council reaffirms that all parties are bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law and in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches.

The Council will remain actively seized of this issue.

T. Statement by the President of the Security Council

Decision of 4 August 1992: statement by the President

On 4 August 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:¹⁴⁵

The members of the Security Council condemn the recent cowardly attack on United Nations Protection Force positions in Sarajevo resulting in loss of life and injuries among the Ukrainian servicemen. The members of the Council note that the Force has already commenced investigation of this incident.

The members of the Council express their condolences to the family of the officer killed and to the Government of Ukraine.

The members of the Council also express their condolences to the families of the two French officers of the Force killed in Croatia and to the Government of France.

The members of the Council call upon all parties to ensure that those responsible for these intolerable acts are quickly called to account.

The members of the Council reiterate their demand that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to secure the safety of Force personnel.

U. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolution 762 (1992)

Decision of 7 August 1992 (3104th meeting): resolution 769 (1992)

On 27 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 762 (1992),¹⁴⁶ on the progress made by UNPROFOR in implementing the mandate entrusted to it in Croatia under the United Nations peacekeeping plan. The report also brought to the Council's notice some of the major concerns facing UNPROFOR in the United Nations Protected Areas and adjoining areas following the Force's assumption of its responsibilities. The Secretary-General observed that UNPROFOR had achieved a number of successes since its assumption of responsibility in the various sectors, due, in large part, to the cooperation extended by the various parties. The principal achievement had been the elimination of ceasefire violations involving the use of heavy weapons. There had also been a considerable lessening of tension in all three Protected Areas, though occasional ceasefire violations, mostly involving small-arms fire, continued to occur. Another major achievement had been the withdrawal of the Yugoslav People's Army from all sectors, as called for in the plan, except for an infantry battalion which was to be withdrawn within the next few days. Both the Government of Croatia and the Serb authorities in the area had, moreover, accepted the concept of the establishment of a Joint Commission, as described in the Secretary-General's report of 26 June 1992,¹⁴⁷ to oversee and monitor the process of restoration of the Croatian Government's authority in the so-called "pink zones".

Problems nevertheless remained, especially with regard to two matters: the excessive armament of the local police in the Protected Areas; and the continuing persecution of non-Serbs in some areas, aimed at forcing them to leave their homes, and the destruction of Serb property in others.¹⁴⁸ Conditions did not therefore exist for the voluntary return of displaced persons to their homes, an important aspect of the United Nations peacekeeping plan. Another development of concern related to the control of international borders. Since the peacekeeping plan had been accepted by the parties and approved by the Council, the Republics in the area had acquired an international legal personality and three had become States Members of the United Nations. The Croatian authorities had raised the issue of the control of the boundaries of the Protected Areas where these coincided with what were now international borders.¹⁴⁹ The economic sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) by resolution 757 (1992) had added a new dimension to the issue.

In the Force Commander's judgement, the existing UNPROFOR mandate needed to be further enlarged in two respects if it were to succeed in establishing peaceful, just and stable conditions in the Protected Areas, pending the negotiation of an overall political settlement. He had recommended that UNPROFOR should be given authority to control the entry of civilians into the Area and that it should have powers to perform immigration and customs functions at the Areas borders where these coincided with international frontiers. He had also recommended an increase in the strength of the UNPROFOR civil affairs component.

The Secretary-General observed that the Force Commander's latest recommendations illustrated the extent to which the evolution of the situation in the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was drawing UNPROFOR into quasi-governmental functions which went beyond normal peacekeeping practice, had major resource implications and might stimulate demands for yet deeper United Nations involvement in this troubled region. As he had noted in his report of 21 July,¹⁵⁰ he viewed this trend with some misgiving, in the light of the many other demands on the Organization's attention and resources. However, the Force Commander had made a strong case in support of his recommendations and, on balance, the Secretary-General believed that they must be accepted if the effort already invested by the Council in Croatia was not to be undermined as a result of the UNPROFOR mandate being limited to control of military movements only or as a result of the Force lacking the necessary civilian staff resources.

At its 3104th meeting, held in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report of 27 July in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁵¹

He also drew their attention to two letters dated 3 and 7 August 1992 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council, respectively.¹⁵² The Government of Croatia conveyed its acceptance of the Secretary-General's report of 27 July 1992, but expressed its view that the suggested expansion of the UNPROFOR mandate should be viewed as a temporary solution for the control of the boundaries of the United Nations Protected Areas where these coincided with international borders of Croatia, until the conditions for their full control by Croatian authorities were fulfilled. On this basis, the Government would support the adoption of a Council resolution authorizing the expansion of the UNPROFOR mandate in Croatia.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 769 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 and all subsequent resolutions relating to the United Nations Protection Force,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 27 July 1992 and 6 August 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 762 (1992) in which he recommended certain enlargements in the mandate and strength of the Force,

Taking note of the letter dated 7 August 1992 from the Deputy Prime Minister of the Republic of Croatia to the President of the Security Council,

Decisions of 13 August 1992 (3106th meeting):
resolutions 770 (1992) and 771 (1992)

By a letter dated 10 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵³ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina requested an urgent emergency meeting of the Council, with a formal debate, to consider the grave and deteriorating situation in his country, entailing serious violations of human rights and international law and involving acts of interference and armed intervention by a foreign country, threatening international peace and security. He also requested that the Council take appropriate collective measures under Chapter VII of the Charter to restore peace and stability in the region.

By separate letters dated 10 to 13 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁵⁴ the representatives of Turkey, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Malaysia, Kuwait, Pakistan, Egypt, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, the Comoros and Qatar supported the request made by Bosnia and Herzegovina for an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation and to take appropriate measures under Chapter VII. By letters dated 11 August 1992,¹⁵⁵ the representatives of Senegal and Saudi Arabia requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the serious situation and to find an immediate solution to restoring peace and stability.

At its 3106th meeting, on 13 August 1992, the Council included the above-mentioned letters in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two draft resolutions,¹⁵⁶ both submitted jointly by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.

He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) a letter dated 10 August 1992 from the representative of Ukraine,¹⁵⁷ requesting the Security Council to ensure maximum safety of the troops of the Ukrainian contingent of UNPROFOR in Sarajevo, which had suffered new losses, and to investigate incidents of 31 July and 7 August 1992; and (b) letters dated 5 and 7 August 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina,¹⁵⁸ submitting, in response to the statement by the President of the Council of 4 August, further information regarding concentration camps and ethnic cleansing.

The President noted, further, that the Council members had received copies of letters dated 13 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council from the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Pakistan and Egypt,¹⁵⁹ transmitting the texts of the statements they would have made had there been a formal debate on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the Security Council's consideration of the matter that day. In their statements, they called for Bosnia and Herzegovina to be exempted from the arms embargo imposed under Security Council resolution 713 (1991) against the entire former Yugoslavia, on the grounds that, as the victim of aggression and a Member of the United Nations, it was entitled to exercise its inherent right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. They also urged the Council to take measures under Chapter VII of the Charter, including the use of military force under Article 42, to halt and reverse the consequences of the Serbian aggression. Although welcoming the two draft resolutions, the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Pakistan did not consider that they were sufficient in the circumstances.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolutions before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Cape Verde noted that the world had been horrified by the recent events in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Cities were being bombed and fired upon indiscriminately. Bosnian Muslims were being expelled from their homes to give way to "ethnically pure" areas, in total disregard of humanitarian law and creating a serious and difficult refugee situation. Concentration camps and mass detention centres had once again made an appearance as evidence of the inhumane nature of the conflict. The Council itself, on whose action the security of many small nations was supposed to rest, had not gone beyond appeals for peace, which had been to no avail. Observing that the conflict in the Balkans had the potential to be a major source of destabilization of international peace and security if it were not controlled and contained, the speaker considered that the Council should assert its powers under the Charter to bring the conflict to an end and repel the aggression against Bosnia. In that context, he welcomed, as a step in the right direction, the first draft resolution's call upon States and others to take all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia. He also welcomed the second draft resolution, dealing with the humanitarian law aspect of the conflict.¹⁶⁰

The representative of Ecuador observed that the Council was meeting in response to the collective outcry of the international community and the express request of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Although he hoped that the first draft resolution they were about to adopt could be implemented without the use of coercion, the Council had not wished to overlook the possibility that circumstances might make the use of such measures necessary; in that light, it had resolved to authorize States to proceed to take even measures of that nature to ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance. The speaker stressed that the situation was a threat to international peace and security and that the provision of humanitarian assistance was a basic condition for the restoration of peace and security in the region. The States that answered the Council's call would, accordingly, be authorized to use every means necessary to achieve the specific aim in question because of the exceptionally grave and urgent circumstances. The second draft resolution, relating to the violation of international humanitarian law, was the minimum response that the international community should make to policies of forcible expulsion, deportation of civilians, imprisonment, torture and death in concentration camps. The perpetrators of such abuses must correct their behaviour immediately, allow free and full access by international humanitarian organizations to places of detention, and realize that the Council firmly intended to adopt new measures under Chapter VII of the Charter if the resolution about to be adopted did not produce immediate and satisfactory results.¹⁶¹

The representative of India maintained that any action authorized by the Security Council should be carried out in strict conformity with the provisions of the Charter and that, if the use of force was to be authorized under Chapter VII, the provisions of that Chapter had to be respected. In the present instance, it was imperative that the envisaged operation, which could involve the use of force, should be under the command and control of the United Nations. The speaker also expressed concern about the safety of UNPROFOR personnel in Sarajevo and elsewhere in Bosnia who might get caught in the crossfire or become the targets of reprisals. Should the Council permit a situation to be created, albeit unintentionally, in which United Nations peacekeepers' lives would be placed in jeopardy? Although India agreed with the objectives as well as the principal feature of the first draft resolution authorizing the use of force, it could not, therefore, support the resolution as it stood. With regard to the second draft resolution, the speaker shared the concern and joined in the condemnation of any violation of international humanitarian law, including those involving the practice of "ethnic cleansing". However, his delegation believed that the Commission on Human Rights was the right forum in which to take up such issues and had, accordingly, supported the convening of an extraordinary session of that body to consider the situation in the former Yugoslavia. It had reservations about bringing compliance with international humanitarian law within the competence of the Security Council, and even more so about making it the subject of Chapter VII action. However, the sponsors of the second draft resolution had accommodated some of India's concerns. Therefore, taking into account the enormity of the alleged crimes, his delegation, while maintaining its reservations, would join in the adoption of the resolution.¹⁶²

The representative of Zimbabwe said his country was of the view that any necessary measures taken to deal with the present crisis had to be taken as a collective enforcement measure under the full control of, and with full accountability to, the United Nations through the Security Council, as provided for by the Charter of the United Nations. His delegation had serious difficulties with the first draft resolution, which sought to authorize any State to use military force in any part of Bosnia and Herzegovina in the name of the United Nations but without any control from or accountability to the Organization; and which left it entirely to the individual States so intervening to define the scope of the humanitarian operation. The Security Council would thus be authorizing unidentified States to use military force after which it was likely to assume the role of helpless spectator in a military operation it had so authorized. Zimbabwe viewed the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina as essentially a civil war. There was a danger, therefore, that action by individual States or groups of States undertaking a humanitarian mission backed by military force could be perceived as intervention on behalf of one side or another, which would intensify hostilities and exacerbate the suffering of innocent civilians. Zimbabwe was also seriously concerned that the presence of UNPROFOR in the same area where the envisaged operations that would inevitably entail the use of force in the name of the United Nations were to be carried out would leave UNPROFOR personnel exposed to the danger of retaliation from the warring groups in the region. In its view, an appropriate arrangement in this case would be the deployment of a security force to protect humanitarian operations, fully controlled by and fully accountable to the United Nations, as that contemplated for Somalia. The speaker concluded that his delegation would not be able to support the first draft resolution. However, it would support the second draft resolution.¹⁶³

The representative of Morocco maintained that the question before them was not that of a civil war, but of an invasion of one State by another, which had planned genocide and taken action to destroy a young, independent State because that State wished to have a democratic structure. The measures the Council proposed to adopt that day must not make it forget the reality and core of the problem. The speaker hoped for the success of the London talks and the joint efforts of the European Community and the United Nations. However, the international community and the Council must remain vigilant and tolerate no more procrastination. His delegation would vote in favour of the first draft resolution because its adoption would make Serbian leaders think, but he hoped that it would not give those leaders yet another opportunity to kill more innocent persons and prolong the suffering of a whole people which was still placing all its hopes in the international community and the Council.¹⁶⁴

The representative of Japan supported both draft resolutions, but wished to emphasize the importance of finding a political, not a military, solution to the situation. His delegation commended the efforts being made by the European countries and by Lord Carrington, and hoped that the resolutions about to be adopted would contribute to expediting the peace process.¹⁶⁵

The representative of Austria firmly supported the adoption and prompt implementation of the two draft resolutions before them, which addressed two crucial humanitarian concerns. He expressed regret, however, that the international community had not acted earlier to create security corridors for the delivery of humanitarian assistance. Blocking food and humanitarian deliveries was regarded by the aggressor as a highly efficient means of forcing the non-Serbian population to flee and give up their property, which was precisely the Serbian aim in the conflict: to “cleanse” parts of the country of the non-Serbian population. In Austria’s view, the international community had a clear obligation to assist displaced persons in returning to their homes and regaining their property. Noting that the second text to be adopted strongly condemned the repugnant violations of international humanitarian law, the speaker added that his country favoured the idea of bringing to trial the individuals responsible for such barbaric acts. He observed that Austria regretted one aspect of the language of the draft resolutions: namely, the attempt carefully to maintain impartiality towards all parties to the conflict. In other relevant international forums, especially CSCE, less ambiguous wording had been used. Could the Council be equally distant from the victim and the aggressor? In its endeavour to display impartiality, the Council should not lose sight of what was causing the conflict — in the words of the President of the European Commission — “the destructive, anti-humanistic ideology of the Belgrade regime”. What was happening in Bosnia and Herzegovina was primarily an aggression against the legitimate government of a State Member of the United Nations. An insurrection, instigated, nurtured and heavily supported with materiel and personnel by Serbia and Montenegro, was threatening the very existence of the Government and State of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and of those citizens loyal to their Government. If there were to be a “new world order”,

the international community had to counter the Serbian aggression speedily and decisively. In the event that the international community could not, or did not want to, live up to that task, at least the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter must be granted to Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁶⁶

At the same meeting, the President put the first draft resolution¹⁶⁷ to the vote. It was adopted by 12 votes in favour, none against and 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe) as resolution 770 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992, 761 (1992) of 29 June 1992, 762 (1992) of 30 June 1992, 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992 and 769 (1992) of 7 August 1992,

Noting the letter dated 10 August 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Underlining once again the imperative need for an urgent negotiated political solution to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina to enable that country to live in peace and security within its borders,

Reaffirming the need to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Recognizing that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to international peace and security and that the provision of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element in the Council's effort to restore international peace and security in the area,

Commending the United Nations Protection Force for its continuing action in support of the relief operation in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Deeply disturbed by the situation that now prevails in Sarajevo, which has severely complicated the Force's efforts to fulfil its mandate to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina pursuant to resolutions 743 (1992), 749 (1992), 761 (1992) and 764 (1992) and the reports of the Secretary-General cited therein,

Dismayed by the continuation of conditions that impede the delivery of humanitarian supplies to destinations within Bosnia and Herzegovina and the consequent suffering of the people of that country,

Deeply concerned by reports of abuses against civilians imprisoned in camps, prisons and detention centres,

Determined to establish as soon as possible the necessary conditions for the delivery of humanitarian assistance wherever needed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in conformity with resolution 764 (1992),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Reaffirms its demand that all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina stop the fighting immediately;

2. Calls upon States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate in coordination with the United Nations the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

3. Demands that unimpeded and continuous access to all camps, prisons and detention centres be granted immediately to the International Committee of the Red Cross and other relevant humanitarian organizations and that all detainees therein receive humane treatment, including adequate food, shelter and medical care;

4. Calls upon States to report to the Secretary-General on measures they are taking in coordination with the United Nations to implement the present resolution, and invites the Secretary-General to keep under continuous review any further measures that may be necessary to ensure unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies;

5. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of the present resolution;

6. Demands that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to ensure the safety of United Nations and other personnel engaged in the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on a periodic basis on the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

The President then put the second draft resolution¹⁶⁸ to the vote. He noted that the blank spaces at the end of the first preambular paragraph should be filled in so as to read "770 (1992) of 13 August 1992". The draft resolution was adopted unanimously as resolution 771 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, 721 (1991) of 27 November 1991, 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991, 727 (1992) of 8 January 1992, 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, 758 (1992) of 8 June 1992, 760 (1992) of 18 June 1992, 761 (1992) of 29 June 1992, 762 (1992) of 30 June 1992, 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992, 769 (1992) of 7 August 1992 and 770 (1992) of 13 August 1992,

Noting the letter dated 10 August 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina to the United Nations,

Expressing grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of mass forcible expulsion and deportation of civilians, imprisonment and abuse of civilians in detention centres, deliberate attacks on non-combatants, hospitals and ambulances, impeding the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population, and wanton devastation and destruction of property,

Recalling the statement of the President of the Council of 4 August 1992,

1. Reaffirms that all parties to the conflict are bound to comply with their obligations under international humanitarian law and in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches;

2. Strongly condemns any violations of international humanitarian law, including those involved in the practice of "ethnic cleansing";

3. Demands that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law including from actions such as those described above;

4. Also demands that relevant international humanitarian organizations, and in particular the International Committee of the Red Cross, be granted immediate, unimpeded and continued access to camps, prisons and detention centres within the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and calls upon all parties to do all in their power to facilitate such access;

5. Calls upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to the violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and to make this information available to the Council;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to collate the information submitted to the Council under paragraph 5 and to submit a report to the Council summarizing the information and recommending additional measures that might be appropriate in response to the information;

7. Decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, shall comply with the provision of the present resolution, failing which the Council will need to take further measures under the Charter;

8. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that, as a sponsor of the resolutions just adopted, his country wished to emphasize their carefully thought-out and balanced nature and clearly defined humanitarian aim of securing compliance with the Council's demands by all parties to the Yugoslav crisis. They reflected the responsibility with which the Council had consistently carried out, with respect to that crisis, its duties under the Charter to maintain international peace and security. Like the other sponsors, the Russian Federation trusted that the delivery of foodstuffs and medicines would take place unimpeded and without the use of extreme measures. The complexity and ambiguity of the situation required the world community to act on the basis of clearly established facts and with an objective approach to the activities of each of the parties to the crisis. A key role in ensuring such an approach fell to the United Nations, in coordination with which all parties and organizations must act in facilitating the delivery of humanitarian assistance. The Security Council had, quite rightly, condemned the practice of "ethnic cleansing" in the strongest terms. In requesting information regarding all breaches of the norms of international humanitarian law, it stressed the need to establish the truth of each report. On the basis of confirmed data, it was prepared to take the necessary measures, including those of the most severe kind, against those guilty of such breaches, regardless of which party was responsible. In the meantime, the Russian Federation insisted that all those involved in the conflict must understand that there was simply no alternative to a solution of the conflict by political means. It hoped that all the parties would seriously and responsibly make use of the new opportunity for peace provided by the forthcoming London conference, which was to be held with an expanded membership, with the United Nations Secretary-General as a co-Chairman.¹⁶⁹

The representative of Hungary maintained that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued to pose a threat to regional and international peace and security. He recalled that, since the beginning of the Yugoslav crisis, his country had advocated a peaceful settlement of the conflict through negotiations, on the basis of democratic values, respect for the right of nations to self-determination, as well as the human and minority rights of the population. Hungary rejected any aspiration to change borders by force and condemned the changing of the ethnic composition of the population by force. It welcomed the adoption of the two resolutions as an example of the strong commitment of the Security Council to human rights and humanitarian issues. To act urgently was not only a moral obligation for the Council: it was indispensable for the preservation of the credibility of the United Nations. Only a credible Organization and Security Council could perform their basic function — maintaining international peace and security. The speaker emphasized once again the urgent need for a negotiated political solution to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The cessation of all military activity was certainly one of the most important steps towards creating a climate conducive to a peaceful settlement. Hungary suggested that isolation of the illegal military forces, including the irregular Serbian forces, which were not operating under the control of any sovereign Government, would help to put an end to the hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It believed that international control over those forces would meet the concerns of all interested parties and contribute to easing the situation. To strengthen this process, it suggested that the Security Council should also consider establishing United Nations control over the border between Serbia and Montenegro and Bosnia and Herzegovina, to prevent the transport of arms and ammunition from Serbia and Montenegro to Bosnia and Herzegovina. Hungary hoped that the interested parties would give favourable consideration to such an arrangement.¹⁷⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the first resolution just adopted called upon States to use any measures necessary for the delivery of humanitarian relief, including military measures, but it did not prescribe the use of force. That was as it should be. The use of force was not desirable, but might be necessary. The aim was to develop a system of protective support, as necessary, to supplement and expand the existing humanitarian operations. The United Kingdom had begun consulting closely with partners and allies to decide how best to follow up the resolution, a process that would now be intensified. Close coordination with the United Nations would be put in hand. In deciding whether and how far military measures were needed, the United Kingdom would give great weight to the views of the United Nations authorities and the humanitarian agencies. As to the second resolution, the speaker deplored the violations of international humanitarian law committed by the parties to the conflict, and insisted that the perpetrators of those criminal acts — whoever they were — had to realize that they would be brought to account. The detention camps were only one aspect of a wholly unacceptable policy of the Serbs, both in Belgrade and in Bosnia, to extend Serb control of Bosnian territory by attacking and expelling other communities. The resolution rightly made special reference to the odious practice of “ethnic cleansing”. Noting that sanctions were already in place against Serbia and Montenegro, the speaker said that the authorities in Belgrade needed to realize that the international political and economic penalties already imposed on their country would continue and would be intensified unless decisive action was taken by them to reverse these policies. Like others, he stressed that peace in the former Yugoslavia could only come from a ceasefire that was respected and a negotiated settlement. He noted that the broadened international conference to be held in London on 26 August, and co-chaired by the President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community and the Secretary-General of the United Nations, offered a real opportunity to engage in a meaningful peace process, which he hoped would be taken.¹⁷¹

The representative of the United States said his Government believed that the world community should do everything necessary in response to Bosnia and Herzegovina’s call to ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance there. In adopting the two resolutions, the Security Council had demonstrated that it too shared the belief that the provision of humanitarian assistance was not only an urgent humanitarian concern but also an important element of the effort to restore peace and security in the region. It had also demanded that barbaric human rights violations must stop. The speaker emphasized, in this connection, that conquest of territory would not be tolerated by the international community. The Council had also addressed the most troubling of the many disturbing accounts currently coming out of the former Yugoslavia, concerning the detention centres in Bosnia and Herzegovina. After quoting from a report of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the speaker stated that the international community demanded to know the truth behind those camps and to see that any and all abuses were brought to an end. His country viewed leadership by the United Nations as key to resolving the humanitarian problems in Bosnia and believed that a continued United Nations presence there was indispensable. It strongly urged all sides to work together through the Conference on Yugoslavia to find a negotiated settlement to the crisis.¹⁷²

The representative of Venezuela stated that his country's decision to vote in favour of the first resolution had been a difficult one since the resolution, while it specifically mentioned implementation by all means necessary to ensure humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina, implicitly presupposed the use of force if circumstances should call for it. Indeed, this was the first time that the Security Council had taken a decision of this sort to provide humanitarian assistance in a country. Venezuela hoped that the use of force would be unnecessary and that the decisions just taken would serve as sufficient warning to all those involved in the conflict, and would contribute to a process that would allow the establishment of an appropriate framework for negotiation. The expanded conference to be held in London on 26 August should serve as such a forum and bear the ultimate responsibility for achieving a comprehensive political solution in the territory of the former Yugoslavia.¹⁷³

The representative of Belgium, commenting on the first resolution, stressed that the taking of all necessary measures was limited to the end of ensuring the distribution of humanitarian assistance to the people of Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina and to that end alone. The escorting of convoys should, therefore, discourage those who continued to impede the distribution of humanitarian assistance. He added that the possibility of using all necessary measures should be carefully coordinated, pointing out that the resolution called upon States to take measures in coordination with the United Nations and to report to the Secretary-General and, through him, to the Security Council on a periodic basis. In Belgium's view, such action was supplemental to the efforts of UNPROFOR, which should continue to carry out its mandate. As for the second resolution, the speaker noted that, since the Council's statement of 4 August, it had been possible to visit a few camps. However, as such visits should not be discretionary, the resolution demanded that there be immediate, unimpeded and continuous access to all camps by humanitarian organizations. It also reminded those responsible for abuses and torture that they could not escape their individual responsibility.¹⁷⁴

The representative of France considered that, faced with the serious obstacles to aid distribution, raised particularly by the forces fighting in the field, and the mounting suffering of the population, the international community was duty-bound to take action to allow humanitarian assistance to reach those for whom it was intended in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It was in this spirit that France had co-sponsored the draft resolution just adopted as resolution 770 (1992). The speaker's delegation hoped that the parties to the conflict would meet the demands of the Council and stop fighting. If the obstacles to the provision of assistance remained, however, the resolution allowed for all measures necessary, including the use of force, to be taken by States in coordination with the United Nations to ensure that it was delivered. France was determined to lend all its assistance to ensure that the actions envisaged in the resolution were taken, intending to provide such assistance as part of the Western European Union whose member States had already begun to consider how to implement the resolution. It was crucial that all efforts be coordinated: those of the United Nations, particularly of UNPROFOR; those of United Nations humanitarian bodies and other humanitarian organizations; and those of Member States. With regard to resolution 771 (1992), on the extremely serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia and the detention camps there, the speaker stressed that the international community had to act immediately to shed full light upon those violations and put an end to them. He recalled that his Government had quickly agreed to the convening of a special session of the Commission on Human Rights to consider this matter. France welcomed the fact that the Security Council, which had already taken action on this question in the presidential statement of 4 August, had formally reiterated in the resolution just adopted the demands that an immediate end be put to these very serious violations of humanitarian law and that immediate access to all places of detention be given to the competent humanitarian organizations. The speaker reiterated the importance — above and beyond these serious humanitarian questions — of pursuing the efforts to reach a political solution to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina with the greatest determination. He expressed hope that the expanded international conference to be held in London at the end of August would give new impetus to the efforts to settle the conflict.¹⁷⁵

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of China, explained his delegation's abstention in the voting on resolution 770 (1992). Although China endorsed the objective of facilitating the humanitarian relief work, it could not agree to the resolution's authorization of the use of force by Member States, as it was precisely the continuous armed conflicts that were hindering the delivery of humanitarian assistance. Once Member States resorted to force, armed conflicts would be expanded and prolonged, further hampering the humanitarian relief work. China was concerned, moreover, that a Council resolution authorizing the use of force would create difficulties for the efforts aimed at a political solution to the problem, which it thought should be given more time and a chance to succeed. It also considered that the broad authorization given to all States by the resolution to take all necessary measures was tantamount to issuing a blank cheque, and might lead to the loss of control over the situation, with serious consequences for which the United Nations and the Security Council would be held responsible. A further concern was that the resolution failed to make arrangements for the mandate of UNPROFOR and its future in the light of the new situation which might arise once military activities were undertaken. With regard to resolution 771 (1992), the speaker stated that China had voted in favour solely out of humanitarian considerations. However, it deemed it inappropriate to invoke Chapter VII of the Charter in this resolution, and wished to place its reservation on record. Chapter VII could be invoked only in situations that seriously threatened international peace and security, not under other circumstances. In China's view, the invoking of Chapter VII in this resolution should not, therefore, constitute a precedent. The speaker concluded by reiterating his Government's appeal to all parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina to work out an immediate ceasefire and to resolve their differences through negotiations and by peaceful means.¹⁷⁶

W. Letter dated 28 August 1992 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 2 September 1992 (3111th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 28 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷⁷ the Secretary-General transmitted the documents of the London stage of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia held on 26 and 27 August 1992, which he had co-chaired with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community.

At its 3111th meeting, held on 2 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's letter in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Ecuador) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷⁸

The Security Council takes note with appreciation of the letter from the Secretary-General, dated 28 August 1992, conveying the documents of the London stage of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, held on 26 and 27 August 1992, which the Secretary-General co-chaired with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community.

The Council expresses its full support for the Statement of Principles adopted and the other agreements reached at the Conference held in London.

The Council shares the Secretary-General's hope that the political will shown in London will speedily be transformed into the concrete actions foreseen in the documents adopted in London by the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia.

The Council reaffirms all its previous resolutions related to the former Yugoslavia and calls for their complete implementation.

The Council notes with satisfaction that the Conference held in London has established the framework within which an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia in all its aspects may be achieved through a continuous and uninterrupted effort.

The Council welcomes the establishment, under the overall direction of the Permanent Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia of the Steering Committee. It also welcomes the appointment of the two Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee who will direct the working groups and prepare the basis for a general settlement and associated measures. It notes with satisfaction that they will commence their work this week which will be pursued in continuous session at the United Nations Office in Geneva.

The Council notes the commitments entered into by the parties and others concerned within the framework of the Conference held in London. It underlines the importance it attaches to the full implementation of these commitments as rapidly as possible.

The Council notes the urgency of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and calls on the parties to cooperate fully with the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee in achieving a comprehensive settlement.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to keep it informed on an ongoing basis of developments and to make recommendations to the Council as may be appropriate.

X. The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Decision of 9 September 1992 (3113th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3113th meeting, held on 9 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina".

The President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁷⁹

The Security Council has noted with deep concern the attack which cost the lives of two French soldiers of the United Nations Protection Force near Sarajevo, during which five other soldiers were wounded. It conveys its deep-felt sympathy and condolences to the Government of France and to the bereaved families. It strongly condemns this deliberate attack against UNPROFOR personnel.

The Council invites the Secretary-General to inform it as soon as possible on the findings of the inquiry into the circumstances of this attack as well as other similar incidents involving the United Nations activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the incident which cost the lives of four Italian airmen in charge of the transportation of humanitarian relief to Sarajevo airport. It invites him also to pass on to it any information which he could gather on the responsibility for these incidents.

These serious incidents underline the urgent need for reinforcing the security and protection of the Force personnel as well as of all personnel involved in the United Nations activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Council expresses its readiness to adopt without delay measures to this end.

Y. Report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Decision of 12 September 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

On 10 September 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina,¹⁸⁰ in which he presented proposals, developed in consultation with a number of the sponsors of resolution 770 (1992), on how the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina could be facilitated through the provision of protective support by UNPROFOR. The proposals envisaged that this function could be added to the UNPROFOR mandate and carried out by military personnel, under the command of the Force Commander. Some of the Member States concerned had indicated that they were ready to provide the necessary military personnel, equipment and logistic support at no cost to the United Nations. The task of UNPROFOR, under its enlarged mandate, would be to support the efforts of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to deliver humanitarian relief throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina and, in particular, to provide protection, at the request of UNHCR, where and when UNHCR considered such protection necessary. In providing support to UNHCR-organized convoys, the UNPROFOR troops concerned would follow normal peacekeeping rules of engagement. They would thus be authorized to use force in self-defence, which, in this context, was deemed to include situations in which armed persons attempted by force to prevent United Nations troops from carrying out their mandate. The Secretary-General suggested that UNPROFOR could also be authorized to provide protection to convoys of released detainees, if the International Committee of the Red Cross so requested and if the Force Commander agreed that the request was practicable.¹⁸¹ He also envisaged that UNPROFOR could undertake supervision of the parties' heavy weapons, should the Security Council assign this further task to the Force.¹⁸² The Secretary-General observed that the concept described in his report seemed to provide the best possibility for ensuring increased deliveries of humanitarian relief to the suffering people of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It would ensure the Security Council's control of the operation, while at the same time avoiding the imposition of additional financial burdens on the Organization. He therefore recommended that the Council approve the expansion of the UNPROFOR mandate and strength on the basis of the plan, to provide protective support for UNHCR-organized humanitarian convoys throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina.

By a letter dated 10 September 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁸³ the Secretary-General indicated that, pending the Council's approval of the recommendation in his report that UNPROFOR should be given authority to protect convoys of released detainees, his Personal Envoy had requested that UNPROFOR be authorized to use its existing resources to protect detainees expected to be released shortly from two Serbian detention camps in the northern part of Bosnia and Herzegovina and transferred, in accordance with their wishes and with the agreement of the Croatian authorities, to transit facilities in Croatia. In the light of the urgent need, on humanitarian grounds, for the detainees to be enabled to leave Bosnia and Herzegovina in safety, the Secretary-General proposed to instruct the Force Commander to proceed accordingly.

By a letter dated 12 September 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁸⁴ the President of the Council informed him that the members of the Council were in agreement with the proposal contained in his letter.

Decision of 14 September 1992 (3114th meeting): resolution 776 (1992)

At its 3114th meeting, held on 14 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report of 10 September in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Ecuador) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁸⁵

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution. Speaking before the vote, the representatives of Zimbabwe and India stated that, although they supported the recommendations made by the Secretary-General, they regretted that they could not support the draft resolution in its present form. They took exception to the inclusion, in operative paragraph 2, of the reference to the fact that the present enlargement of UNPROFOR was being made in implementation of paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992). The inclusion of this controversial provision of resolution 770 (1992) raised the same problems their delegations had faced at the time that that resolution was dealt with by the Council. They reiterated their view that any necessary measures taken, or arrangements made, to deal with the grave crisis in question had to be undertaken as a collective measure under the full control of, and with full accountability to, the United Nations.¹⁸⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It received 12 votes in favour, none against and 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe) and was adopted as resolution 776 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 and all subsequent resolutions relating to the United Nations Protection Force,

Expressing its full support for the Statement of Principles adopted and other agreements reached at the London stage of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, held on 26 and 27 August 1992, including the agreement of the parties to the conflict to collaborate fully in the delivery of humanitarian relief by road throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Having examined the report of the Secretary-General of 10 September 1992 on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting with appreciation the offers made by a number of States, following the adoption of its resolution 770 (1992) of 13 August 1992, to make available military personnel to facilitate the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina, such personnel to be made available to the United Nations without cost to the Organization,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure the protection and security of personnel of the Force and of the personnel of the United Nations,

Stressing in this context the importance of air measures, such as the ban on military flights to which all parties to the Conference held in London committed themselves, whose rapid implementation could, inter alia, reinforce the security of humanitarian activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 10 September 1992 on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina;

2. Authorizes, in implementation of paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992), the enlargement of the mandate and strength in Bosnia and Herzegovina of the United Nations Protection Force, recommended by the Secretary-General in that report, to perform the functions outlined in his report, including the protection of convoys of released detainees if requested by the International Committee of the Red Cross;

3. Urges Member States to provide the Secretary-General, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, with such financial or other assistance as he deems appropriate to assist in the performance of the functions outlined in his report;

4. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter in particular with a view to considering, as required, what further steps might be necessary to ensure the security of the Force and to enable it to fulfil its mandate.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China observed that the resolution just adopted aimed at enlarging the mandate of UNPROFOR in an effort to provide military support for the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina. Although the Chinese delegation did not, in principle, object to the strengthening of humanitarian assistance activities, it could not accept the link the resolution established between the enlargement of the UNPROFOR mandate and the implementation of resolution 770 (1992). It had abstained in the vote on resolution 770 (1992), which authorized countries to use force in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and could not, therefore, endorse any actions related to the implementation of that resolution. China also believed that UNPROFOR should, as a United Nations peacekeeping operation, follow the generally recognized guidelines established in past such operations in implementing its mandate. However, the resolution just adopted contained disturbing elements which departed from those guidelines. Noting that resolution 770 (1992) was a mandatory action taken under Chapter VII of the Charter, the speaker expressed concern that linking the new resolution with resolution 770 (1992) would change the non-mandatory nature of UNPROFOR as a United Nations peacekeeping operation. On the one hand, the new resolution recognized that UNPROFOR should observe the normal rules of engagement of United Nations peacekeeping operations in implementing its new mandate, namely the use of force only in self-defence. On the other hand, it approved the use of force in self-defence when troops were blocked by armed forces. UNPROFOR would thus run the risk of plunging into armed conflict. The speaker also noted that enlargement of the mandate had not received the express consent of the parties concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and that the resolution did not provide for any periodic reports to the Council on the implementation of the UNPROFOR mandate. In view of these concerns, his delegation had abstained in the vote on the resolution just adopted.¹⁸⁷

Several other Council members, while welcoming the decision just taken as an important stage in the stepping up of the United Nations action in Bosnia and Herzegovina, considered that the Council should adopt additional measures which had been the subject of agreement among the participants in the London

Conference. They suggested, variously, the supervision by UNPROFOR of heavy weapons, as had been mentioned by the Secretary-General in paragraph 12 of his report; and a ban on military flights over Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁸⁸

Z. Draft resolution contained in document S/24570

Decision of 19 September 1992 (3116th meeting): resolution 777 (1992)

At its 3116th meeting, held on 19 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled “Draft resolution contained in document S/24570”.

The President (Ecuador) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Morocco, the United Kingdom and the United States.¹⁸⁹

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution. Speaking before the vote, the representative of the Russian Federation stated that his delegation supported the draft resolution agreed upon by members of the Council in the course of their consultations, on the basis of the fact that the prevailing view in the international community was that none of the republics that had emerged in the place of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could claim automatic continued membership in the United Nations. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), like other former Yugoslav republics, would have to apply for membership in the United Nations, and the Russian Federation would support such an application. It was unable, however, to agree with the proposal put forward by some States that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should be excluded, formally or de facto, from membership in the United Nations, because such a decision would have negative consequences for the process of the political settlement of the Yugoslav crisis. Although the compromise that had been reached — that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should not participate in the work of the General Assembly — might seem unsatisfactory to some, the Russian Federation was prepared to agree to this gesture of condemnation by the world community on the understanding that, in order to make a full contribution to the solution of the world problems discussed in the General Assembly, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia must take all possible measures to bring about an early cessation of the fratricidal conflict in its region. The speaker noted that the decision to suspend the participation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the work of the General Assembly would in no way affect its participation in the work of other organs of the United Nations, in particular the Security Council. Nor would it affect the issuance of documents to it, the functioning of its Permanent Mission to the United Nations or the keeping of the nameplate with the name Yugoslavia in the General Assembly Hall and the rooms in which the Assembly’s organs met. He stressed that the decision about to be taken by the Council did not provide for the expulsion of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from the United Nations and that the measures taken with regard to that country had to remain strictly within the limits of that decision.¹⁹⁰

The representative of India expressed two concerns with the draft resolution, one substantive and one constitutional. His delegation was seriously concerned about the effect of the proposed decision on the functioning of UNPROFOR, whose success depended on the cooperation of all the parties concerned. The practical impact of the draft resolution on the attitude of at least one of the parties involved towards UNPROFOR was not likely to be helpful since UNPROFOR was not a Chapter VII operation, at least in Croatia. Indeed, the Council might be placing the entire process of peacemaking and peacekeeping in the former Yugoslavia in jeopardy. On the constitutional aspect of the resolution, the speaker stressed that questions of membership and privileges of participation were matters of fundamental importance, which made it all the more essential to adhere to the provisions of the Charter. The draft resolution was flawed in this respect, as it did not conform either to Article 5 or to Article 6, the only two Articles that dealt with the issue under consideration. The Security Council, under the Charter, was competent to recommend either suspension or expulsion of a State, but it had no authority to recommend to the General Assembly that a country’s participation in the Assembly be withdrawn or suspended. That authority belonged to the General Assembly, which did not need any recommendation to that effect from the Security Council. Indeed, the General Assembly was under no legal obligation to act on any such recommendation. For these reasons, the Indian delegation would not be in a position to support the draft resolution.¹⁹¹

The representative of Zimbabwe expressed the view that the principles governing the admission to and suspension or expulsion of States from membership of the United Nations were clearly and unambiguously set out in Articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter. Where membership of, and participation in, the Organization were concerned, those principles should be uniformly applied in the quest for universality. The speaker noted that, in the past, the question of succession by the constituent members of a State that had undergone reconfiguration or changed its borders had been regarded as extraneous to the question of membership in the United Nations, and had never been raised in the Council. This was not surprising, since the Charter did not provide that the resolution of succession matters was a condition for membership in the United Nations. Zimbabwe regretted that the draft resolution sought to deprive two republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which now constituted the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, of their right to participate in the General Assembly. It also considered that the elementary principles of fairness demanded that, when the Council was about to take such a momentous decision on the fate of a State, that State should at least be afforded the opportunity to state its case. The speaker further noted that the text of the draft resolution made no reference to any provisions of the Charter under which this action was being taken. Strict adherence to the provisions of the Charter had always been a source of protection for small States, and the increasing disregard for, or mutation of, Charter provisions caused Zimbabwe great concern. It seemed that those provisions were consistently ignored or applied selectively in the Council's deliberations, a tendency which was bound to undermine the Council's prestige and moral authority. Zimbabwe maintained that the Council and the United Nations should concentrate on the attainment of a negotiated political solution so as to bring lasting peace. It therefore welcomed the initiative of the Secretary-General to involve the United Nations directly in the peacemaking process. It was doubtful, on the other hand, that the draft resolution would contribute to the success of that process. Zimbabwe regretted that, for these reasons, it would not be able to support the draft resolution.¹⁹²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It received 12 votes in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe) and was adopted as resolution 777 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Considering that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist, Recalling in particular its resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992 in which it noted that "the claim by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations has not been generally accepted",

1. Considers that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations, and therefore recommends to the General Assembly that it decide that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for membership in the United Nations and that it shall not participate in the work of the General Assembly;

2. Decides to consider the matter again before the end of the main part of the forty-seventh session of the General Assembly.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France welcomed the adoption of resolution 777 (1992), on the status of Yugoslavia in the United Nations. The text responded both to the requirements of the Charter and the needs of the moment. It respected the apportioning of competence established by the Charter between the Council and the General Assembly. Moreover, it adopted a pragmatic approach in keeping with the political situation following upon the London Conference, confirming and translating into reality the international community's rejection of the automatic continuation in the United Nations of the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. At the same time, it preserved the future. Non-participation in the work of the General Assembly by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia did not call into question the necessary continuation of dialogue at Geneva, within the framework of the implementation of the London Conference; in the field; or in New York.¹⁹³

The representative of the United States noted that the situation was unprecedented, in that the United Nations was for the first time facing the dissolution of one of its Members without agreement by the successor States on the status of the original United Nations seat. Moreover, none of the former republics of the former Yugoslavia was so clearly a predominant portion of the original State as to be entitled to be treated as a continuation of that State. In the absence of agreement among the former republics on this issue, the United States could not accept the claim of Serbia and Montenegro to the former Yugoslavia's seat in the United Nations. The United States was gratified that the resolution endorsed that view and recommended that the General Assembly take action to confirm that the membership of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had expired and that, because Serbia and Montenegro was not the continuation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, it must apply for membership if it wished to participate in the United Nations. As for the recommendation that Serbia and Montenegro not participate in the work of the General Assembly, the speaker stated that this flowed inevitably from the determination by the Council and the General Assembly that Serbia and Montenegro was not the continuation of the former Yugoslavia and must apply for membership in the United Nations. He added that the resolution's call to have the Security Council review the matter once again before the end of the main part of the session of the General Assembly simply referred to a willingness on the part of the Council to consider an expected application from Serbia and Montenegro. The resolution made it clear that, in the view of the Council, that State, like any other new State, must apply for membership in the United Nations and be held to the criteria in the Charter of the United Nations if it did so. The criteria required that the applicant be both willing and able to fulfil United Nations obligations, including compliance with Chapter VII Security Council resolutions. In conclusion, the United States believed that other bodies in the United Nations system should be guided by the action of the Council and the General Assembly on this matter.¹⁹⁴

The representative of China maintained that the continuation of the membership in the United Nations of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should be settled properly through consultations and negotiations among all parties of the former Yugoslavia. China held that the former Yugoslav republics should all be Members of the United Nations and that none of them should be excluded. Such questions should be dealt with cautiously. Any action taken by the United Nations with regard to membership of the former Yugoslavia in the United Nations should contribute to the relaxation of tension in that region and promote a political settlement brought about by genuine negotiations among the various parties concerned. To isolate any of them would not be conducive to the settlement of the question. Based on that position, the Chinese delegation had abstained on the resolution just adopted. The speaker pointed out that the resolution did not mean the expulsion of Yugoslavia from the United Nations. The nameplate "Yugoslavia" would be kept in the General Assembly Hall. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would continue to participate in the work of United Nations bodies other than the General Assembly and would continue to issue its documents in the United Nations. It was China's understanding that this was only a transitional arrangement, and it hoped that the membership of Yugoslavia would be settled in a proper manner and that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would eventually have its place in the United Nations family.¹⁹⁵

The representative of Venezuela supported the Council's recommendation, on the understanding that neither it nor any later decision of the General Assembly should prejudge in any way diplomatic recognition of those States arising from the dissolution of the former Yugoslavia, including the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and diplomatic relations between them and Member States.¹⁹⁶

The representative of Austria maintained that there was no legal basis for an automatic continuation of the legal existence of the former, now defunct, Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by the new federation of Serbia and Montenegro. The latter could not, therefore, be considered to continue Yugoslavia's membership in the United Nations. For eventual international recognition of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the criteria contained in the guidelines on the recognition of new States adopted by the Council of the European Communities on 16 December 1991 should be applied, notably the requirements concerning the protection of human rights and the rights of ethnic groups.¹⁹⁷

The representative of Hungary welcomed the adoption of resolution 777 (1992), which reflected his country's position. He added that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia's application for membership in the United Nations should be studied and decided upon in accordance with the same criteria applied in the admission to the United Nations of all the other successor States of the former Yugoslav Federation.¹⁹⁸

AA. Further report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Security Council resolutions 743 (1992) and 762 (1992)

On 28 September 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a further report pursuant to resolutions 743 (1992) and 762 (1992),¹⁹⁹ to update it on the progress made by UNPROFOR in implementing its mandate in Croatia under the United Nations peacekeeping plan²⁰⁰ and in implementing resolution 762 (1992), which called for the establishment of a Joint Commission to oversee the return of Croatian authority to certain areas of Croatia known as the "pink zones". He observed that it had not been possible for UNPROFOR to achieve full implementation of the United Nations plan in the three United Nations Protected Areas or to restore a degree of normality and inter-ethnic tolerance there before winter set in. This was due to the failure of the parties, especially the authorities of the so-called Republic of Serbia Krajina (the "Krin authorities"), to give UNPROFOR the full and sustained cooperation that was necessary for it to carry out its various mandates. The Krin authorities had created new paramilitary forces, an action inconsistent with the demilitarization of the United Nations Protected Areas and thus a blatant violation of the United Nations plan. These so-called "police units" had revived some of the worst features of Serb behaviour during the war in Croatia, including "ethnic cleansing", and had created conditions of near anarchy, especially in one sector. The deteriorating security situation had made it impossible for UNPROFOR and UNHCR to start major programmes for the return of refugees and displaced persons to their homes. The Secretary-General suggested that the Security Council might wish to consider whether it should take action in response to the many cases in which persons had been coerced into signing away their property and rights of residence. To that end, it might consider declaring that such acts of renunciation, undertaken under duress, were null and void and created no legal rights or obligations. The situation in the "pink zones" had also been a cause of considerable concern although the most recent developments had been somewhat more positive. A particularly disagreeable feature of the situation there was the readiness of both sides, but especially of the Serb side, to cut power and water supplies as a means of putting pressure on their opponents. This was a problem that also afflicted other parts of the former Yugoslavia, especially the city of Sarajevo, and the Secretary-General suggested that the Council might wish to support the current efforts of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia on this issue by calling upon all concerned to work together to restore power and water supplies before the coming winter.²⁰¹ Noting a more positive development, the Secretary-General observed that an agreement had been reached on the withdrawal of the remaining elements of the Yugoslav Army from Croatia and the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula. Detailed arrangements for the implementation of that agreement were being finalized. In the meantime, he recommended that the Security Council authorize UNPROFOR to assume responsibility for monitoring the agreed arrangements, the additional resources required for which would not be large. In conclusion, the Secretary-General stated that the situation described in his report had to be corrected urgently; otherwise there would be a real danger of a renewal of widespread conflict in and around the United Nations

Protected Areas. He and the Force Commander would continue to do everything they could to persuade the parties to honour their commitments and accept the will of the Security Council, and he trusted that they would have the Council's full support in those endeavours.

At its 3118th meeting, held on 6 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's further report of 28 September in its agenda. The Council invited the representative of Croatia, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,²⁰² and made an oral revision²⁰³ to the text in its provisional form.

He also drew their attention to a letter dated 1 October 1992 from the representative of Croatia addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁰⁴ transmitting a Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 779 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 and all subsequent resolutions relating to the activities of the United Nations Protection Force in Croatia,

Having examined the further report of the Secretary-General of 28 September 1992 submitted pursuant to resolutions 743 (1992) and 762 (1992),

Concerned about the difficulties encountered by the Force in the implementation of resolution 762 (1992) of 30 June 1992, owing to ceasefire violations and in particular to the creation of paramilitary forces in the United Nations Protected Areas in violation of the United Nations peacekeeping plan,

Expressing grave alarm at continuing reports of "ethnic cleansing" in the United Nations Protected Areas and of forcible expulsion of civilians and deprivation of their rights of residence and property,

Welcoming the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), Welcoming in particular the agreement, reaffirmed in the Joint Declaration, concerning the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula,

Recalling the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the further report of the Secretary-General of 28 September 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992 including the steps taken to ensure the control of the Peruca dam by the United Nations Protection Force;

2. Authorizes the Force to assume responsibility for monitoring the arrangements agreed for the complete withdrawal of the Yugoslav Army from Croatia, the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula and the removal of heavy weapons from neighbouring areas of Croatia and Montenegro, in cooperation, as appropriate, with the European Community Monitoring Mission, looks forward to the report of the Secretary-General on how this is to be implemented, and calls on all parties and others concerned to cooperate fully with the Force in its performance of this new task;

3. Calls on all parties and others concerned to improve their cooperation with the Force in the performance of the tasks it is already undertaking in the United Nations Protected Areas and in the adjacent areas;

4. Urges all parties and others concerned in Croatia to comply with their obligations under the United Nations peacekeeping plan, especially with regard to the withdrawal and the disarming of all forces, including paramilitary forces;

5. Endorses the principles agreed by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) on 30 September 1992 that all statements or commitments made under duress, particularly those relating to land and property, are wholly null and void and that all displaced persons have the right to return in peace to their former homes;

6. Strongly supports the current efforts of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia to ensure the restoration of power and water supplies before the coming winter, as mentioned in paragraph 38 of the report of the Secretary-General, and calls on all the parties and others concerned to cooperate in this regard;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

By letters dated 10 to 13 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁰⁵ the representatives of 13 States Members of the United Nations had requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council, with a formal debate, to consider the grave and deteriorating situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the taking of appropriate measures, with many calling for action under Chapter VII of the Charter.

By a letter dated 5 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁰⁶ the representatives of Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Senegal and Turkey, as members of the Contact Group of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), drew attention to the dire humanitarian situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina as winter approached. They noted that the international community was unable to deliver sufficient humanitarian assistance to the victims of the conflict; that the situation was made worse by the continued aggression of the Serbian elements who, through their attacks on civilian targets, continued to violate the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, international humanitarian law and the basic norms of civilized behaviour; and that “ethnic cleansing” persisted, principally against the Muslims, whose very existence in their ancestral lands was being threatened. The Contact Group called for an immediate meeting of the Council to consider taking the following urgent action: to establish safe corridors and take effective measures to stop anyone from hindering the delivery of humanitarian assistance; to ensure the effective enforcement of the “no-fly zone” over Bosnia and Herzegovina; and to take steps to bring before an international tribunal those responsible for the practice of “ethnic cleansing”, mass killings and other grave breaches of international humanitarian law.

At its 3119th meeting, held on 6 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the 14 letters referred to above in its agenda. The Council invited the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Hungary, Morocco, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela.²⁰⁷

He also drew their attention to a number of other letters,²⁰⁸ as well as to a note by the Secretary-General

²⁰⁸ Letter dated 17 August 1992 from the representative of Bolivia to the President of the Council (S/24473); letters dated 3 September 1992,²⁰⁹ transmitting a report on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia submitted by Mr. Tadeusz Mazowiecki, Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Venezuela stated that the Security Council was duty-bound to address firmly and swiftly the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, where war crimes were being perpetrated against the defenceless civilian population. He expressed support for the proposed decision to establish a commission of experts to investigate all such violations of international humanitarian law, which would be inspired by the commission that was set up in 1943 for similar purposes and later served as the basis for the proceedings of the Nuremberg trial. In Venezuela’s view, this would not only serve to establish responsibility and punish the guilty, but would also constitute an important deterrent in the context of the process the United Nations had undertaken to bring peace to the population of the former Yugoslavia, and especially to Bosnia and Herzegovina. Its understanding was that the commission would collect the information that would make it possible to prosecute those responsible for the criminal acts perpetrated against thousands of citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina.²¹⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 780 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Recalling paragraph 10 of its resolution 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992, in which it reaffirmed that all parties are bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law and in particular the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches,

Recalling also its resolution 771 (1992) of 13 August 1992, in which, inter alia, it demanded that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law,

Expressing once again its grave alarm at continuing reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including reports of mass killings and the continuance of the practice of “ethnic cleansing”,

1. Reaffirms its call, in paragraph 5 of resolution 771 (1992), upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to the violations of humanitarian law, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and requests States, relevant United Nations bodies, and relevant organizations to make this information available within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution and as appropriate thereafter, and to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts referred to in paragraph 2 below;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse the information submitted pursuant to resolution 771 (1992) and the present resolution, together with such further information as the Commission may obtain through its own investigations or through the efforts, of other persons or bodies pursuant to resolution 771 (1992), with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia;

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the establishment of the Commission of Experts;

4. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the conclusions of the Commission of Experts and to take account of these conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps called for by resolution 771 (1992);

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the resolution just adopted sent a clear message that those responsible for the atrocities and gross violations of international humanitarian law, including violations involved in the process of “ethnic cleansing” and other war crimes in the former Yugoslavia, must be brought to justice. It would also, it was to be hoped, act as a deterrent to those in other parts of the world who might be contemplating similar violations and crimes. The speaker elaborated on his delegation’s interpretation of paragraph 1 of the resolution. It believed that the term “relevant United Nations bodies” included the Special Rapporteur; and it considered that the phrase “to provide other appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts” allowed the Commission to request follow-up by those other bodies, including the Special Rapporteur.²¹¹

The representative of Belgium stated that, in the wake of resolution 771 (1992), the Council had now sent an even clearer signal to the perpetrators of violations of international humanitarian law on the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The establishment of a Commission made this signal more credible by making more operational the principle contained in the Geneva Conventions regarding the personal responsibility of war criminals. The Belgian authorities hoped that the Organization, upon receipt of the conclusions of the Commission and the recommendations of the Secretary-General, would be able to provide itself with the means to punish the perpetrators so identified.²¹²

The representative of Hungary said his country interpreted the resolution just adopted as the beginning of a process which should lead, within a reasonable period of time, to the establishment of the appropriate means and the compilation of the necessary information to bring to justice those responsible for the crimes that continued to be committed systematically in the former Yugoslavia. It was also Hungary’s understanding that the request to collate information represented an appeal to all bodies, organs and individuals concerned with the cause of human rights, including the Commission on Human Rights; the information should, most particularly, include the detailed report on the human rights situation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia submitted by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights.²¹³

²¹³ Ibid., p. 13.

The representative of Morocco stated that the adoption of the resolution, while welcome, should, in the view of the members of OIC, be considered as no more than one stage in a whole range of measures which the Council would have to take in order to put an end to the terrible acts which were continuing to be perpetrated with impunity in Bosnia and Herzegovina.²¹⁴

The representative of the Russian Federation said his delegation viewed the resolution just adopted as an additional means to influence the opposing parties with a view to alleviating the sufferings of the peaceful population in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, particularly in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and by so doing to bring about the quickest possible solution to the Yugoslav conflict. It hoped that the impartial Commission of Experts would, on the basis of carefully substantiated information, provide a true picture of the violations of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law taking place on the territory of the former Yugoslavia. The resolution should be a serious warning to any political and military leaders who allowed mass breaches of the norms of international humanitarian law on the territory of the former Yugoslavia and warn them of their personal responsibility for such acts. It should also serve as a warning to all who violated the norms of international humanitarian law in other spheres of conduct.²¹⁵

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, stated that it was very important that the Council send a clear warning to the perpetrators of the impermissible violations of international humanitarian law being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and in Bosnia and Herzegovina in particular, who must understand that their personal responsibility was involved. He added that the resolution just adopted was a part of the prospective creation by the appropriate bodies of an international penal jurisdiction to rule on such acts. His Government considered that it went without saying that the Council's request in paragraph 1 of the resolution to "relevant United Nations bodies" included the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the former Yugoslavia. His contributions to the impartial Commission of Experts would be one of the essential elements in drawing up that Commission's conclusions.²¹⁶

CC. The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Decision of 9 October 1992 (3122nd meeting): resolution 781 (1992)

At its 3122nd meeting, held on 9 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina".

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Austria, Belgium, France, Morocco, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.²¹⁷

He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) letters dated 5 and 8 October 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Council,²¹⁸ transmitting letters from the President of his country in which he reported that heavy bombardment of towns in Bosnia and Herzegovina continued; stated that, as all the parties at the London Conference had agreed to a "no-fly zone", the member nations of the Conference, through the Security Council, had a responsibility to enforce such a zone without delay; and stressed that a "no-fly zone" resolution that did not include immediate enforcement would only permit continued aggression from the air, resulting in many more unnecessary deaths and new victims of "ethnic cleansing"; and (b) a letter dated 8 October 1992 from the representative of the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Council,²¹⁹ enclosing the report of the Chairman of the Working Group on Confidence and Security-building and Verification Measures to the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, which contained details of the agreements reached between the parties in the region on the implementation of aerial confidence measures, including the ban on the military use of aircraft in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation did not oppose, in principle, the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina with the consent of all the relevant parties to ensure the smooth operation of humanitarian relief operations and the safety of the innocent civilian population there. However, it shared the concern expressed by the Secretary-General in his letter of 8 October 1992 to the President of the Council,²²⁰ in which he reiterated his concerns about the implications that proposals to amend the mandate of UNPROFOR might have for its effectiveness and the security of its personnel, and drew the Council's attention to the fact that the proposed ban and the modalities of its monitoring did not yet enjoy the consent of all the parties. The speaker noted, moreover, that the draft resolution embodied similar content to that in resolution 770 (1992), which authorized the use of force, and that the possibility of using force in the future was implied in various paragraphs. China's position in this regard was well known; it could not therefore support the draft resolution.²²¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour, none against and 1 abstention (China), and was adopted as resolution 781 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Determined to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights to Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting the readiness of the parties, expressed in the framework of the London stage of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, held on 26 and 27 August 1992, to take appropriate steps in order to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights and their commitment at that Conference to a ban on military flights,

Recalling in this context the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), and in particular paragraph 7 thereof,

Recalling also the agreement reached on air issues at Geneva on 15 September 1992 among all the parties concerned in the framework of the Working Group on Confidence and Security-building and Verification Measures of the London Conference,

Alarmed at reports that military flights over the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina are none the less continuing,

Noting the letter of 4 October 1992 from the President of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Considering that the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes an essential element for the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance and a decisive step for the cessation of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Acting pursuant to the provisions of resolution 770 (1992) of 13 August 1992 aimed at ensuring the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Decides to establish a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, this ban not to apply to United Nations Protection Force flights or to other flights in support of United Nations operations, including humanitarian assistance;

2. Requests the Force to monitor compliance with the ban on military flights, including the placement of observers where necessary at airfields in the territory of the former Yugoslavia;

3. Also requests the Force to ensure, through an appropriate mechanism for approval and inspection, that the purpose of flights to and from Bosnia and Herzegovina other than those banned by paragraph 1 above is consistent with Security Council resolutions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on a periodic basis on the implementation of the present resolution and to report immediately any evidence of violations;

5. Calls upon States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to provide assistance to the Force, based on technical monitoring and other capabilities, for the purposes of paragraph 2 above;

6. Undertakes to examine without delay all the information brought to its attention concerning the implementation of the ban on military flights in Bosnia and Herzegovina and, in the case of violations, to consider urgently the further measures necessary to enforce this ban;

7. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

²²⁰ Not issued as a document of the Council; referred to in S/PV.3122, p. 7.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States remarked that, in establishing a no-fly zone over Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council was taking an important step to address the violence that had racked the republic and to support the efforts of the London Conference. The London Conference agreements reflected the approach of the international community to the crisis and included the concurrence of the warring parties in Bosnia. The resolution just adopted codified a ban on military flights in Bosnia and Herzegovina, an action specifically agreed to by Bosnian Serb representatives. The speaker added that the United States vote in favour of the resolution reflected its view that, in the case of violations, it bound the Council to further action. If the resolution were violated, his Government would move to seek adoption by the Council of a further resolution mandating enforcement of the no-fly zone.²²²

The representative of India maintained that, as military flights still operated over Bosnian airspace despite the ban on military flights agreed to by all parties at the London Conference, concerted action by the international community, as represented by the Council, was clearly called for. It was only logical that the parties should comply with the agreement they themselves had voluntarily entered into. Noting, however, that one of the Bosnian sides — the Bosnian Serbs — had yet to give its agreement to a comprehensive ban on military flights and to the modalities for its monitoring, the speaker shared the Secretary-General's concern that this lack of agreement by one side could have implications for the effectiveness of UNPROFOR and the security of its personnel. Indeed, without the agreement of the Bosnian Serb side, it would be impossible for UNPROFOR to implement the resolution just adopted and to station observers at airfields under Bosnian Serb control. India hoped that the efforts of UNPROFOR, backed by the firm support of the Council, would prevail upon all sides to obtain their cooperation. Although it agreed that, as envisaged in paragraph 6 of the resolution, the Council might have to take further measures to enforce the ban it imposed, it hoped that such measures would not be necessary. India believed, moreover, that any such measures would have to conform strictly to the provisions of the Charter. They would have to remain under direct and effective United Nations command and control, which alone would ensure that the action was effective and commensurate, and that the security of UNPROFOR personnel could be ensured against the risks.²²³

The representative of Austria supported the establishment of a ban on military flights in Bosnia and Herzegovina as a long overdue measure, which was essential to ensure the safety of delivery of humanitarian assistance to the population of that country. He noted that such a ban had been agreed to by the parties at the London Conference but had not been adhered to by the Serbian side, whose aggression in the air had continued unabated. That was why the firm undertaking by the Council to take the necessary further measures to enforce the ban in case of its violation was so important, although Austria hoped that it would not be necessary to do so.²²⁴

The representative of Morocco stated that his country and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to which it belonged welcomed the new resolution, but considered it only as part of a whole which would ultimately force Serbia to put an end to its exactions, crimes and inadmissible practices against a sovereign State that was a Member of the United Nations.²²⁵

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, stated that the continuation of aerial bombings, in spite of the undertakings given at the London Conference on the ban on military flights over the territory of the former Yugoslavia, called for a clear-cut reaction from the international community. The resolution just adopted provided an appropriate response. Noting that the Council, in addition to establishing such a ban, undertook, in the event of violations, to consider urgently the further measures necessary to enforce the ban, the speaker said that this in no way prejudged the nature of the measures the Council might take in such an event. In his Government's view, it was important for such a warning to be issued to the parties concerned so as to encourage them to abide by their commitments forthwith. The speaker also stressed the importance of the security of the members of UNPROFOR, to which the Secretary-General had drawn attention in his letter of 8 October.²²⁶ He urged all parties to refrain from any action that might imperil the members of the

Force, which was contributing so valiantly to the process of peace and reconciliation.²²⁷

Decision of 30 October 1992 (3132nd meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 29 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²²⁸ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that the besieged city of Jajce had just fallen to the aggressor and that his Presidency urgently requested UNPROFOR protection for civilians being attacked by heavy artillery and helicopter fire as they fled. He added that Security Council resolution 781 (1992) had been grossly violated since its adoption, as the aggressor had been using helicopters for offensive warfare purposes.

At its 3132nd meeting, held on 30 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to letters dated 16, 20, 23, 25 and 28 October 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Council,²²⁹ containing allegations of violations by the aggressor of Security Council resolution 781 (1992), which banned military flights in the airspace of his country. Invoking paragraph 6 of the resolution, the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina urged the Council to consider urgently the further measures necessary to enforce the ban.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³⁰

The Security Council remains concerned by the continuing conflict in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina with its resultant loss of life and material damage, which threaten international peace and security and by reports of egregious violations of international humanitarian law by whomsoever committed.

The Council is appalled by the most recent reports that Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina are attacking civilians fleeing from the city of Jajce.

The Council strongly condemns any such attacks which constitute grave violations of international humanitarian law, including the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and reaffirms that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of these Conventions are individually responsible in respect of such breaches. The Council wishes that such violations be brought to the attention of the Commission of Experts mentioned in resolution 780 (1992) of 6 October 1992.

The Council demands that all such attacks cease immediately.

Decision of 10 November 1992 (3133rd meeting): resolution 786 (1992)

On 5 November 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to resolution 781 (1992),²³¹ on the measures recommended or already taken to implement that resolution, which, inter alia, requested UNPROFOR to monitor compliance with the ban imposed on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to approve and inspect non-military flights to and from that Republic. The Secretary-General described the general concept of operations that had been developed by UNPROFOR, which combined the deployment of military observers at selected airfields with information obtained from technical sources. It had been agreed with the presidency of the European Community that, in matters relating to resolution 781 (1992), the European Community Monitoring Mission would be tasked by and report to UNPROFOR. Technical monitoring information was being made available to the Force by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The measures described had already become operational to a limited extent with the temporary redeployment of 30 military observers, from other United Nations peacekeeping operations, to airfields in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). The Force Commander estimated that 75 additional military observers would be required for this task.²³² The Secretary-General added that the cooperation of the parties concerned, which was essential for the successful implementation of resolution 781 (1992), had been secured. The Presidents of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had welcomed the stationing of international observers on airfields in their respective countries and had concluded agreements with UNPROFOR. With regard to Bosnia and Herzegovina, similar agreements had been signed by UNPROFOR with the Foreign Minister of the Republic, granting the Force unrestricted access to airfields there, and separately with the leader of the Bosnian Serbs in respect of two airfields in the Banja Luka area. The Secretary-General concluded by observing that he believed that the concept described in his report would permit effective and cost-efficient implementation of resolution 781 (1992). He accordingly recommended that the Council approve the necessary expansion of the strength of UNPROFOR on the basis of the plan described.²³³

By a letter dated 6 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²³⁴ the Secretary-General reported on the information received by UNPROFOR thus far on possible violations of the military flight ban imposed by resolution 781 (1992), and on the impossibility of corroborating the information on such violations by the means then available to UNPROFOR.

At its 3133rd meeting, held on 10 November 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the Secretary-General's report of 5 December and his letter of 6 November.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Hungary) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,²³⁵ and made several oral revisions to the text in its provisional form.²³⁶

He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) letters dated 2 and 8 November 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the President of the Council,²³⁷ alleging further violations by the aggressor of the military flight ban imposed by resolution 781 (1992), and requesting that the Council consider urgently the further measures necessary to enforce the ban, as envisaged in that resolution; and (b) a letter dated 2 November 1992 from the representative of Venezuela addressed to the President of the Council,²³⁸ suggesting that it would be useful for the Council to receive updated information from the Secretariat to enable it to assess the reports it received of violations of resolution 781 (1992). Venezuela believed that such reports should be verified and that, if their accuracy was independently confirmed, the measures envisaged in the resolution should be put into effect.

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it, as orally revised, in its provisional form.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China said that, as his delegation favoured the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina with the consent of all parties concerned, and supported the recommendations for monitoring the ban put forward by the Secretary-General, it would vote in favour of the draft resolution. However, he reiterated China's position that it was not in favour of any use of force in establishing such a flight ban. China hoped that all the relevant parties of the former Yugoslavia would honour their commitments to respect the ban on military flights and fully cooperate with UNPROFOR.²³⁹

The draft resolution, as orally revised, in its provisional form, was then put to the vote. It was adopted unanimously as resolution 786 (1992), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolution 781 (1992) of 9 October 1992,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 5 November 1992 submitted pursuant to resolution 781 (1992) and his letter of 6 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council pursuant to his report,

Considering that the establishment of a ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes an essential element for the safety of the delivery of humanitarian assistance and a decisive step for the cessation of hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Taking into account the need for a speedy deployment of monitors on the ground for observation and verification purposes,

Gravely concerned at the indication in the letter from the Secretary-General of 6 November 1992 of possible violations of its resolution 781 (1992) and of the impossibility of corroborating the information on such violations by technical means presently available to the United Nations Protection Force,

Determined to ensure the safety of humanitarian flights to Bosnia and Herzegovina,

1. Welcomes the current advance deployment of military observers of the United Nations Protection Force and the European Community Monitoring Mission at airfields in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro);

2. Reaffirms its ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which applies to all flights, whether of fixed-wing or rotary-wing aircraft, subject to the exceptions contained in paragraph 1 of its resolution 781 (1992), and reiterates that all parties and others concerned must comply with this ban;

3. Endorses the general concept of operations described in the report of the Secretary-General of 5 and 9 November 1992 submitted pursuant to Security Council resolution 781 (1992) and calls on all parties and others concerned, including all Governments operating aircraft in the area, to cooperate fully with the Force in its implementation;

4. Calls upon all parties and others concerned henceforth to direct all requests for authorization of flights pursuant to paragraph 3 of its resolution 781 (1992), to the Force, with special provisions being made for flights of the Force and all other flights in support of United Nations operations, including humanitarian assistance;

5. Approves the recommendation in paragraph 10 of the report of the Secretary-General that the strength of the Force be increased, as proposed in paragraph 5 of the report, in order to permit it to implement the concept of operations;

6. Reiterates its determination to consider urgently, in the case of violations when further reported to it in accordance with its resolution 781 (1992), the further measures necessary to enforce the ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina;

Decision of 16 November 1992 (3137th meeting): resolution 787 (1992)

By a letter dated 5 October 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁴⁰ the representatives of Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Senegal and Turkey, as members of the Contact Group of OIC, had drawn attention to the dire humanitarian situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina as winter approached. The international community was unable to deliver sufficient humanitarian assistance to the victims of the conflict; the situation was made worse by the continued aggression of the Serbian elements who, through their attacks on civilian targets, continued to violate the principles of the Charter, international humanitarian law and the basic norms of civilized behaviour; and the practice of “ethnic cleansing” persisted, principally against the Muslims, whose very existence in their ancestral lands was being threatened. The Contact Group had called for an immediate meeting of the Security Council to consider taking the following urgent action: to establish safe corridors and take effective measures to stop anyone from hindering the delivery of humanitarian assistance; to ensure the effective enforcement of the “no-fly zone” over Bosnia and Herzegovina; and to take steps to bring before an international tribunal those responsible for the practice of “ethnic cleansing” and the commission of other grave breaches of international humanitarian law.

By a letter dated 4 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁴¹ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, unless urgent steps were taken to stop the Serbian aggression, to implement existing Security Council and General Assembly resolutions and to enforce the London Conference commitments, the efforts of the Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia would be overcome by military force and their proposed constitutional framework for his country would become irrelevant. He therefore requested a formal meeting of the Council, with the right of full debate, as soon as practicable.

By separate letters dated 9 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁴² the representatives of Belgium and France expressed grave concern at the current situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Noting that in resolution 713 (1991) and all its subsequent resolutions the Council had undertaken to pursue consideration of this issue, they requested an urgent meeting of the Council for this purpose.

At its 3134th meeting, on 13 November 1992, the Council included the letters from the OIC Contact Group and the representatives of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Belgium and France in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 3134th to 3137th meetings, on 13 and 16 November 1992.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 3134th meeting, on 13 November, the representatives of Albania, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Canada, the Comoros, Croatia, Germany, Egypt, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, Jordan, Malaysia, Pakistan, Qatar, Senegal, Slovenia and Turkey; at the 3135th meeting, also on 13 November, the representatives of Afghanistan, Kuwait, Lithuania, Norway, Romania, Tunisia and Ukraine; at the 3136th meeting, on 16 November, the representatives of Greece, Malta and the United Arab Emirates; and at the 3137th meeting, also on 16 November, the representatives of Algeria and Bangladesh.

At its 3134th meeting, the Council also decided, by a vote, to extend an invitation to Mr. Nasser Al-Kidwa, Permanent Observer of Palestine to the United Nations, not under rule 37 or rule 39 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, but with the same rights of participation of rule 37.²⁴³ At the same meeting, the Council extended invitations under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to the following individuals: Mr. Vance and Lord Owen, Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, in accordance with the understanding reached in the Council's prior consultations and at the request of the representative of Belgium; Mrs. Sadako Ogata, United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations; and Mr. Mazowiecki,²⁴⁴ at the request of the representatives of Belgium and France. The representatives of China and Zimbabwe expressed reservations about the appropriateness of inviting Mr. Mazowiecki to address the Council, on the ground that human rights issues fell within the purview of the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly, rather than of the Security Council and that, as Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, he should report to that organ.²⁴⁵ At its 3135th meeting, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council invited Mr. Ilija Djukic, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, at his request, to address the Council in the course of the discussion of the item.²⁴⁶

At the 3134th meeting, the President (Hungary) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the report of the Secretary-General on the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia,²⁴⁷ as well as to the documents submitted pursuant to paragraph 5 of resolution 771 (1992) and paragraph 1 of resolution 780 (1992), relating to violations of humanitarian law being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. He also drew their attention to the following documents: (a) notes dated 3 September and 6 November 1992 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Council,²⁴⁸ transmitting two reports on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia prepared by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights; (b) a letter dated 19 October 1992 from the members of the Contact Group of OIC addressed to the President of the Council,²⁴⁹ in which they reiterated their call for an immediate meeting of the Council, urged that Bosnia and Herzegovina not be denied its inherent right to defend itself in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations and requested the Council to consider and secure the lifting of the arms embargo on that country; and (c) several other letters.²⁵⁰

Speaking at the start of the discussion, Mr. Vance stated that the situation in the former Yugoslavia continued to threaten international peace and security; that the sanctions regime established by the Council was being evaded and violated; and that the humanitarian crisis was deepening. Given that complex and testing situation, it would require the strongest resolve of the international community to bring about a durable cessation of hostilities and compliance with the principles of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the decisions of the Council. He addressed several matters which he considered to be of urgent concern to the Council. On the critical issue of sanctions, he stated that it was clear that embargoed oil was getting through to Belgrade in larger and larger quantities. Items being trans-shipped through Serbia by land had to be checked more carefully at their points of origin and their destinations. Water-borne cargoes also needed to be checked more rigorously, both on the Adriatic and along the Danube. In his judgement, it was essential that the arms embargo be maintained and enforced. Lifting it — as some had suggested — would not contribute to a durable peace and would be counter-productive. Lifting it for only one party, moreover, was neither feasible nor desirable, in his view. Such an action could only widen and deepen the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina and jeopardize the effectiveness of the UNPROFOR operation, and could spread the conflict throughout the Balkan region. He welcomed the ceasefire recently declared by the military commanders of the three warring parties in Sarajevo, under the auspices of UNPROFOR. While it was too early to draw any conclusions, he expected the three parties to live up to their commitments. It was also essential that all parties in the former Yugoslavia cooperate with UNPROFOR as it carried out its humanitarian and peacekeeping missions.

Continuing, Mr. Vance stressed a number of points arising from the Secretary-General's report on the International Conference at Geneva. Among them was the importance the Co-Chairmen attached to the Conference's constitutional proposals for Bosnia and Herzegovina. From the outset, they had rejected partition of the country and its reorganization on ethnically based territorial lines. They believed that those constitutional proposals provided a sound basis for the future organization of the country, and welcomed the support given by the members of the Security Council. He recalled that the Security Council and the General Assembly had set out guidelines for devising solutions to problems in the former Yugoslavia, which the Co-Chairmen had sought to keep clearly in view. The Council had called for a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Charter and of international human rights norms; had rightly condemned forcible expulsions, illegal detentions and all attempts to change the demographic composition of territories; and had invoked the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, in particular the inviolability of borders — both internal and external — and the non-recognition of attempts to alter such borders unilaterally. The General Assembly had expressly mentioned, in addition, respect for the sovereignty and the territorial integrity of States, and non-recognition of the spoils of aggression and of the acquisition of territory by force. He stressed that the international community could not accept non-compliance with these guidelines.²⁵¹

Lord Owen observed that the Geneva process, a conference in continuous session that had started on 3 September, was charged with forging together the European Community's previous Conference on Yugoslavia and the increasing activity of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the former Yugoslavia. Henceforth, peacemaking, peacekeeping and preventative diplomacy were to be run together. That joint effort of the European Community and the United Nations built on Chapter VIII of the Charter, which provided for regional agencies to work in partnership with the Security Council. The former worked under the authority of the United Nations and were dependent on key United Nations personnel for ensuring an effective and integrated United Nations command. He stated that the opposing sides in Bosnia and Herzegovina had been brought together in a by-and-large constructive dialogue in two main areas — over the future Constitution, conducted by the politicians, and over a cessation of hostilities, conducted by the military. The International Conference's constitutional proposals for Bosnia and Herzegovina made clear that there was not going to be a crude division of the Republic into three separate provinces, because such an arrangement would simply endorse ethnic cleansing. The Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Croats fully accepted this, as well as the vast bulk of the constitutional proposals. The Bosnian Serbs were participating and putting forward counter-proposals. Unfortunately, however, many of their leaders appeared to want a single, geographically contiguous, Bosnian Serb province that would be linked with those parts of Croatia where the Serbs were in the majority and with the Republic of Serbia, in a Greater Serbia. It would not be easy, in his view, to pressure them to abandon that dream. He noted that although sanctions were a blunt instrument, which often hit the innocent harder than the guilty, they were the only peaceful weapon the world had. It was vital that a resolution blocking the gaping holes in the current oil embargo be adopted. On the recently negotiated ceasefire, he cautioned that much would depend on how local military leaders reacted. He acknowledged that a ceasefire had its political dangers, as the frontline, established by force, risked becoming frozen into de facto political boundaries. However, with the publication of the draft Constitution, the parties to the ceasefire were aware of the political framework for a settlement on which the Co-Chairmen were working. He added that it needed to be said quite clearly, in the Security Council, that the present Bosnian Serb frontline had to be rolled back and that the international community could not accept the philosophy that “might was right and that what they had, they held”.

Lord Owen further rejected calls by some in the Council for more dramatic solutions, such as massive outside military intervention or the lifting of the arms embargo from the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina on the ground that it had an unfair impact on their predominantly Muslim forces. He observed that there was no sign of any significant military Power being ready to act; and, on the arms embargo, stated that all previous experience showed that prohibiting arms sales tended to dampen conflict while increasing them deepened it. A selective lifting of the arms embargo was, moreover, unfeasible and would have a profoundly adverse effect on the chances of achieving a cessation of hostilities and a constitutional settlement. At the same time, it was vital that the international community learned a lesson from Bosnia and Herzegovina and did not disavow the use of external force. A negotiated no-fly agreement would never have been achieved had the then President of the United States not been ready to enforce it. In conclusion, he expressed the view that, in the absence of superior military force on the ground or in the air, the international community would make its principles stick by applying steady, persistent pressure to any intransigent party that failed to negotiate constructively. The Security Council debate was an important part of that process.²⁵²

The High Commissioner for Refugees remarked that strictly neutral humanitarian access in Bosnia and Herzegovina was often hampered by political considerations, military objectives and hostile behaviour. She called for the full deployment of the additional UNPROFOR troops — to enhance security and to augment the logistical capacity of UNHCR for delivering the relief required. In the carrying out of the humanitarian task in the former Yugoslavia, the question had arisen how to strike the right balance so that sanctions served as a political tool but did not become a lethal weapon against the weak. She was grateful that the sanctions Committee had now recognized the special needs of UNHCR, as exemplified by a recent blanket approval of a request to deliver assistance. Observing that the return of refugees and displaced persons, which she saw as an attempt to “de-cleanse the ethnic cleansing”, was both a humanitarian and a political endeavour, she noted that it would be a most difficult task linked to progress towards a political settlement. She added that, if sanctuaries for the refugees and the displaced were to be created, they would have to be linked with the presence and capacity of UNPROFOR. She drew the Council's attention once again to the pressing issue of the release of detainees in Bosnia and Herzegovina, insisting that, in the absence of other viable solutions, the international community must be willing to share the burden of receiving this most vulnerable group of people. In conclusion, she stated that UNHCR alone could not prevent massive suffering and death during the winter. To avoid the worst scenarios, what was needed was the holding and spreading of the current ceasefire; a renewed commitment by the parties to respect safe passage of relief goods and non-disruption of public utilities; immediate full deployment of UNPROFOR and flexibility in its mandate to provide extensive logistical support; massive bilateral and multilateral provision of resources; and pressure on all concerned, inside and outside the region, to keep borders open for those fleeing to survive, and to receive detainees.²⁵³

The Special Rapporteur observed that, in the context of the conflict taking place in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the human rights issues could not be examined separately from the political and military situation. The issue at stake was the fundamental human right to life, which was totally threatened. The violations of that right and other fundamental human rights were massive and grave and contradicted both the Covenants on Human Rights and the Geneva Conventions, which called for respect for the rights of the civilian population during armed conflicts. He observed that those violations stemmed from the practice of “ethnic cleansing”, which was not a consequence of, but an objective of, this war. The practice had been pursued by the Serbian authorities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in the parts of Croatia under the control of Serbian forces, where they could not be prevented even by the presence of UNPROFOR. He added that the Serbian population in the areas of Bosnia and Herzegovina controlled by the Government of that Republic and Croatian armed forces was also a victim of discrimination and human rights abuse. In his view, however, although those acts should be condemned, they were not an element of systematic policy. From the point of view of human rights, he proposed three urgent measures: the closing of detention camps; the establishment of security zones for humanitarian purposes in Bosnia and Herzegovina; and the establishment of corridors for humanitarian supplies, particularly to the cities and areas under siege. He added that the human rights situation required systematic and coordinated action. Assistance to the victims must go hand in hand with the will to punish the guilty, especially the perpetrators of war crimes. He urged the establishment of the Commission of Experts provided for in resolution 780 (1992), to investigate these matters further. In conclusion, he observed that profound changes in the world had led to the recognition that respect for human rights had become a crucial element of international security. The former Yugoslavia constituted, in that respect, one of the most serious and tragic challenges faced by the international community and intergovernmental organizations, primarily the United Nations. It was urgent, accordingly, that the Organization undertake effective action in favour of the protection of human rights in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other territories of the former Yugoslavia, notably Kosovo and Vojvodina.²⁵⁴

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina noted that the meeting was the first time, including after six months of membership in the United Nations, that his country had had an opportunity to present its case orally before the Security Council. Although his Government fully supported the humanitarian efforts being made to relieve the suffering of its citizens, including the suggested creation of temporary safety zones, and endorsed the proposed constitutional framework, he stressed that the most important element of the solution — implementation and enforcement of existing commitments and decisions — was still lacking. His country was still the victim of aggression and its citizens the targets. As the Special Rapporteur had reported, “ethnic cleansing” did not appear to be the consequence, but rather the goal, of that aggression, threatening a segment of the population with extermination. That crime had not only continued; it had intensified, and could not be stopped simply through prosecution. He insisted that if the Security Council would not take direct steps to stop this crime and implement the measures adopted by it, then it should yield and fully recognize Bosnia and Herzegovina’s sovereign and absolute right to self-defence. Exercised through legitimate and lawful authorities or through international mechanisms, self-defence encouraged respect for constitutional principles, humanitarian standards, the rule of law and order and, ultimately, reconciliation.²⁵⁵

Many of the speakers stressed the importance of a political settlement of the conflicts in the former

Yugoslavia, and expressed their support for the International Conference on Yugoslavia as the appropriate, if not the only, framework for arriving at a comprehensive and lasting solution. They endorsed the proposals put forward in that context for a new constitutional arrangement for Bosnia and Herzegovina as offering a good basis for negotiation among the three constituent communities, while respecting the principles insisted upon by the international community: notably, that the taking of territory by force and the practice of “ethnic cleansing” were unlawful and unacceptable and would not be allowed to affect the outcome of the negotiations; and that the territorial integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina must be respected. Noting that the situation on the ground was still deteriorating, despite massive efforts by the United Nations and the European Community, they urged the Security Council to persevere in its efforts and to strengthen its action.²⁵⁶ In that regard, a number of speakers supported the strengthening of the sanctions regime against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and its strict implementation.²⁵⁷

At the 3135th meeting, later on 13 November, the representative of Malaysia expressed regret at the delay of some 12 weeks in the convening of an emergency meeting of the Council requested by members of OIC to consider the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He stated that the right of Member States to ask for an emergency meeting of the Council, with formal debate, to consider such a serious situation, involving a breach of international law and threatening international peace and security, always had to be respected by the Council.²⁵⁸

Several speakers echoed the Co-Chairmen in urging that the arms embargo be maintained throughout the former Yugoslavia and strictly enforced.²⁵⁹ A number of speakers also supported a proposal that international observers be deployed on the borders of Bosnia and Herzegovina to facilitate the implementation of the Council’s resolutions.²⁶⁰ Some warned that, if policy changes and effective action on the ground were not forthcoming, especially to end outside interference in Bosnia, consideration might have to be given to further measures.²⁶¹

A number of other speakers, on the other hand, endorsed the appeal made by Bosnia and Herzegovina that, as the Security Council had not been able to stop the aggression against that country — an independent State Member of the United Nations threatened with extinction — it should lift (or threaten to lift) the arms embargo against it and allow it to exercise its inherent right of self-defence as recognized in the Charter.²⁶² Several of these and other speakers urged the Council to take enforcement measures under Chapter VII of the Charter, to halt and reverse the Serbian aggression, or to consider taking such action in the event of continued non-compliance by the aggressor.²⁶³ Some expressed concern that if the aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina went unanswered, small and weaker

States, in particular, would lose confidence in the ability of the Council to safeguard their security.²⁶⁴

In the humanitarian sphere, Council members and non-members alike expressed support for the efforts of the United Nations, its various agencies and the non-governmental agencies assisting the Bosnian people. A number endorsed such further measures as the establishment of safe areas, under military protection, within Bosnia and Herzegovina, for the protection of those who had been forced out of their homes and become refugees;²⁶⁵ and the prosecution of those responsible for “ethnic cleansing” and war crimes.²⁶⁶

At the 3136th meeting, on 16 November 1992, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.²⁶⁷ He also drew their attention to a letter dated 12 November 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁶⁸ objecting to a proposal by the United States to deliver humanitarian assistance to his country through Belgrade on the ground that it would, inter alia, weaken an already unsuccessful economic embargo and improve Belgrade’s ability to support aggression.

The representative of Venezuela observed that regional organizations, including his own, were ill-prepared to deal with tragedies of such magnitude and intensity as the one before them. Conventional methods of peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance did not suffice. Peacekeeping operations were designed for situations in which there was a consensus and agreement between the parties to the conflict. That was certainly not the case in the situation under consideration. Order had to be imposed; yet the forces on the ground were neither authorized nor equipped for the task. Although he would vote in favour of the draft resolution, he wished to place on record his concern that the ways and means of putting such resolutions into effect and of ensuring compliance with them had not yet been found.²⁶⁹

The representative of Zimbabwe, whose country viewed the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina as essentially a civil war, believed that the gravity of the situation warranted the present debate. In the final analysis, it was the people of the Republic who would resolve the problem, although the international community could, and indeed must, assist them. Patience and impartial mediation were essential in this regard. The United Nations, as one of the mediating parties, needed to undertake this task in a manner that was not only impartial but also seen to be impartial. He cautioned that any approach that could be construed as selective finger-pointing, apportionment of blame, condemnation or punishment could serve to exacerbate the situation and make a difficult task even more difficult for those entrusted to broker a negotiated peaceful solution.²⁷⁰

At the 3137th meeting, later on 16 November, the President of the Council drew the attention of the members of the Council to a revised draft resolution sponsored by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States,²⁷¹ and to a change in the text: all references to Bosnia and Herzegovina should be understood to refer to the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The representative of India observed that any attempt to impose constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina from outside would be a recipe for disaster. He was encouraged, therefore, to hear from Lord Owen, in his statement to the Council, that all the parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina had agreed to use the draft outline constitution as a basis for negotiating a political settlement. He could, accordingly, go along with operative paragraph 1 of the draft resolution under consideration, which urged the parties to continue negotiations on the basis of the draft outline. On the military side, he observed that UNPROFOR continued to operate in Croatia and Bosnia under traditional rules of peacekeeping — that is, with the consent and cooperation of all parties. He reiterated his country's concern that the Council and the United Nations as a whole should retain full authority and responsibility over the execution of actions authorized by the Council. His delegation had worked with the sponsors of the draft resolution to provide for effective coordination, through the Secretary-General, of the actions that Member States might take for the inspection and verification of shipping in the Adriatic and on the Danube, under paragraphs 12 and 13. Paragraph 14, as amended, had largely met India's concern in this regard and would make it possible for him to support the draft resolution. On the humanitarian situation, he recalled that the Council had heard a statement from the Special Rapporteur for Yugoslavia appointed by the Commission on Human Rights, on the violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia, including Bosnia and Herzegovina. He reiterated his Government's position that the respective competences of the major organs of the United Nations should be strictly respected; human rights reports of this nature should be presented to and examined by the competent organ, in this case the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly. He noted, however, that the enabling resolution appointing the Special Rapporteur included reporting to the Security Council. Moreover, the Bosnian situation was unprecedented in its multidimensional character; it was impossible to separate the political, military and humanitarian aspects of the crisis. While the Council must, therefore, take into consideration those gross violations of international humanitarian law in its findings and decisions, where they directly impinged on the political-military situation — as it had done in resolutions 771 (1992) and 780 (1992) — it must not lose track of the fact that the organs competent to act on the Special Rapporteur's recommendations remained the General Assembly and the Commission on Human Rights.²⁷²

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia stated that his country was making every effort and using all its influence to bring about the end of war in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It had fully accepted all the decisions and principles of the London Conference and considered that their consistent implementation was the only way to end the war. To dispel any allegations of its involvement in any military operations in the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina, his country had insisted that United Nations monitors be placed at all airfields of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and along Bosnia and Herzegovina's borders with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and with Croatia. Regrettably, that had not yet been accepted. His country had also exerted all its influence to bring about an agreement between the Bosnian Serbs and UNPROFOR on deploying United Nations observers at locations around Sarajevo in order to place the heavy artillery of the Bosnian Serb side under UNPROFOR supervision. The last member of the Yugoslav Army had been withdrawn in May 1992, as confirmed in the Secretary-General's report and by the European Community. He stated that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had no territorial claims against Bosnia and Herzegovina, and had strongly condemned the practice of "ethnic cleansing" committed by any side. Horrible crimes had been committed by all warring parties, including against the Serbs. Expressing support for the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 780 (1992), he stated that his Government's report had already been submitted to the Secretary-General on the violation of humanitarian law in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. He added that peace could not be established in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina if account were not taken of some basic facts. The heart of the matter was that the war there was an ethnic, religious and civil war. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could not be responsible for either its outbreak or its continuation. The aggressor in Bosnia and Herzegovina could only be the Republic of Croatia, whose armed forces were currently fighting there. It was imperative that the international community condemn such behaviour, which was a breach of the fundamental norms of international law and the Charter of the United Nations. The Bosnian leaders who were determined to create a national State at any cost doubtless also bore great responsibility for the ongoing bloodshed, particularly the President, who had done all he could to create a unitary State dominated by the Muslims, who represented 41 per cent of the population. The premature recognition of Bosnia and Herzegovina by the European Community, which had been publicly admitted by many, including Lord Carrington and Cyrus Vance, had only deepened the crisis and war and increased the suffering of the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The present phase of the war had been further aggravated by the foreign mercenaries from a number of Islamic countries.

As to the way forward, Mr. Djukic maintained that a peaceful settlement was the only true solution to the problem of Bosnia and Herzegovina and that the three parties to the conflict should reach a mutually acceptable solution within the framework of the Conference on the former Yugoslavia. His Government would honour and fully support any such solution. In the meantime, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was increasingly alarmed at the repeated requests for international military intervention. Bosnia and Herzegovina was replete with arms; those advocating additional arms supplies for any side were pouring oil on the flames. He warned of the unforeseeable harmful effects of the continued sending of mercenaries, violations of the arms embargo and the prospects of the conflict turning into a full-scale religious war. He appealed, on the other hand, for the lifting of the harsh sanctions imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which his country believed to be one-sided and unjust. Sanctions had never been known to solve problems; they could hardly stop the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina; and they were hitting the most vulnerable strata of the population, including some half a million refugees, many of whom were from Bosnia and Herzegovina. By lifting the sanctions, the United Nations would prove that justice and humanity could prevail, and encourage the efforts of the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia towards historic and democratic changes.²⁷³

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina expressed his appreciation for the convening of the four meetings of the Security Council on the situation in his country, for the role played by OIC in bringing them about, and to all delegations that had spoken in his country's support at the meetings. His delegation was deeply puzzled, however, by the participation of a representative of the so-called government of the so-called Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the work of the Council, especially in the light of the conclusions of the Council in its resolution 777 (1992) and General Assembly resolution 46/242. There appeared to be no legal precedent or procedure that would allow the delegation in question to participate in these discussions, and his delegation believed that this had been permitted by the Council strictly out of good will. He objected to Mr. Djukic's characterization of the situation in his country as a "war"; it could not be called a war when heavily armed forces were fighting barehanded civilians. Moreover, in blaming Bosnian Muslims, Croats and Bosnian leaders, Mr. Djukic had simply reiterated old, unfounded accusations used by the Belgrade leaders to justify their aggression, "ethnic cleansing" and genocide in Bosnia and Herzegovina.²⁷⁴

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that all the international efforts in Bosnia and Herzegovina should be conducive to securing an early negotiated settlement of the differences and disputes and should not complicate the situation. Some of the elements included in the draft resolution were in conformity with that approach and acceptable to his delegation. However, he had reservations about those aspects of the draft resolution aimed at strengthening the sanctions against Yugoslavia. In China's view, as he had indicated at the time of the adoption of resolution 757 (1992), sanctions would not help solve the problem, but would further aggravate the situation in the former Yugoslavia and create serious consequences affecting the lives of the people in the region and the economy of the neighbouring States. He could not, therefore, accept those elements. China also considered it inappropriate for the draft resolution to refer to the report of the Special Rapporteur on human rights, as it was not within the purview of the Council to handle the human rights issue. He would therefore abstain in the voting on the draft resolution.²⁷⁵

The representative of Zimbabwe stated that his delegation would also abstain on the draft resolution as he continued to have serious doubts about the validity of the underlying assumptions that had led to the imposition of sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia under resolution 757 (1992): namely, that Belgrade had the ability to control the Bosnian Serbs and that the pressure of a tough regime of economic and other sanctions against Belgrade would immobilize the Bosnian Serbs. Those closely involved in the efforts to resolve the crisis in Bosnia and Herzegovina over the past six months could testify that the Bosnian Serbs were anything but the puppets of Belgrade. While Belgrade might not be totally devoid of influence, there was an important distinction to be drawn between the ability to control and the ability to influence, which had its limitations. If the Council were to impose punitive sanctions on all countries that were perceived to have influence on one party or the other in the various conflict situations around the globe, there would be a very long list indeed. It was, moreover, ironic that the country targeted for punitive measures, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, had withdrawn its forces from Bosnia and Herzegovina some six months ago. Although thousands of other foreign troops remained in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in defiance of its resolutions calling for their withdrawal, the Council was not considering any punitive measures in spite of that continuing act of defiance. It was only prepared to reaffirm its call for elements of the Croatian army to be withdrawn.²⁷⁶

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote. It received 13 votes in favour, none against and two abstentions (China and Zimbabwe) and was adopted as resolution 787 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991 and all subsequent relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its determination that the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to the peace, and reaffirming that the provision of humanitarian assistance in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element of the effort by the Council to restore peace and security in the region,

Deeply concerned at the threats to the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which, as a State Member of the United Nations, enjoys the rights provided for in the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming also its full support for the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia as the framework within which an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia may be achieved, and for the work of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the Conference,

Recalling the decision by the Conference to examine the possibility of promoting safe areas for humanitarian purposes,

Recalling also the commitments entered into by the parties and others concerned with the framework of the Conference,

Reiterating its call on all parties and others concerned to cooperate fully with the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the Conference,

Noting the progress made so far within the framework of the Conference, including the Joint Declarations signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 and 20 October 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); the Joint Statement made at Geneva on 19 October 1992 by the Presidents of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro); the Joint Communiqué issued on 1 November 1992 at Zagreb by the Presidents of the Republic of Croatia and the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; the establishment of the Mixed Military Working Group in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina; and the production of a draft outline constitution for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Noting with grave concern the report of the Special Rapporteur for Yugoslavia appointed following a special session of the Commission on Human Rights to investigate the human rights situation in the former Yugoslavia, which makes clear that massive and systematic violations of human rights and grave violations of international humanitarian law continue in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Welcoming the deployment of additional elements of the United Nations Protection Force for the protection of humanitarian activities in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in accordance with its resolution 776 (1992) of 14 September 1992, Deeply concerned about reports of continuing violations of the embargo imposed by its resolution 713 (1991) and 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991,

Deeply concerned also about reports of violations of the measures imposed by its resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992,

1. Calls upon the parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to consider the draft outline constitution for Bosnia and Herzegovina as a basis for negotiating a political settlement of the conflict in that country and to continue negotiations for constitutional arrangements on the basis of the draft outline, under the auspices of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, these negotiations to be held in continuous and uninterrupted session;

2. Reaffirms that any taking of territory by force or any practice of "ethnic cleansing" is unlawful and unacceptable, and will not be permitted to affect the outcome of the negotiations on constitutional arrangements for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and insists that all displaced persons be enabled to return in peace to their former homes;

3. Strongly reaffirms its call on all parties and others concerned to respect strictly the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and affirms that any entities unilaterally declared or arrangements imposed in contravention thereof will not be accepted;

4. Condemns the refusal of all parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in particular the Bosnian Serb paramilitary forces, to comply with its previous resolutions, and demands that they and all other concerned parties in the former Yugoslavia fulfil immediately their obligations under those resolutions;

5. Demands that all forms of interference from outside the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, including infiltration into the country of irregular units and personnel, cease immediately, and reaffirms its determination to take measures against all parties and others concerned which fail to fulfil the requirements of resolution 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992 and its other relevant resolutions, including the requirement that all forces, in particular elements of the Croatian Army, be withdrawn, or be subject to the authority of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded or disarmed;

6. Calls upon all parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to fulfil their commitments to put into effect an immediate cessation of hostilities and to negotiate in the Mixed Military Working Group, continuously and in uninterrupted session, to end the blockades of Sarajevo and other towns and to demilitarize them, with heavy weapons under international supervision;

7. Condemns all violations of international humanitarian law, including in particular the practice of “ethnic cleansing” and the deliberate impeding of the delivery of food and medical supplies to the civilian population of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and reaffirms that those that commit or order the commission of such acts will be held individually responsible in respect of such acts;

8. Welcomes the establishment of the Commission of Experts provided for in paragraph 2 of its resolution 780 (1992) of 6 October 1992, and requests the Commission to pursue actively its investigations with regard to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular the practice of “ethnic cleansing”;

9. Decides, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, in order to ensure that commodities and products trans-shipped through the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) are not diverted in violation of resolution 757 (1992), to prohibit the trans-shipment of crude oil, petroleum products, coal, energy-related equipment, iron, steel, other metals, chemicals, rubber, tires, vehicles, aircraft and motors of all types unless such trans-shipment is specifically authorized on a case-by-case basis by the Security Council Committee established by the resolution 724 (1991) on Yugoslavia under its “no objection” procedure;

10. Decides also, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, that any vessel in which a majority or controlling interest is held by a person or undertaking in or operating from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) shall be considered, for the purpose of implementation of the relevant resolutions of the Council, a vessel of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) regardless of the flag under which the vessel sails;

11. Calls upon all States to take all necessary steps to ensure that none of their exports are diverted to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) in violation of resolution 757 (1992);

12. Acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, calls upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992);

13. Commends the efforts of those riparian States which are acting to ensure compliance with resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992) with respect to shipments on Danube, and reaffirms the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube is in accordance with resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992), including such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary to halt such shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992);

14. Requests the States concerned, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to coordinate with the Secretary-General, inter alia, on the submission of reports to the Council regarding actions taken in pursuance of paragraphs 12 and 13 above to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the present resolution;

15. Requests all States to provide in accordance with the Charter such assistance as may be required by those States acting nationally or through regional agencies and arrangements in pursuance of paragraphs 12 and 13;

16. Considers that, in order to facilitate the implementation of the relevant resolutions, observers should be deployed on the borders of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and requests the Secretary-General to present to the Council as soon as possible his recommendations on this matter;

17. Calls upon all international donors to contribute to the humanitarian relief efforts in the former Yugoslavia, to support the United Nations Consolidate Inter-Agency Programme of Action and Appeal for the former Yugoslavia and to speed up the delivery of assistance under existing pledges;

18. Calls upon all parties and others concerned to cooperate fully with the humanitarian agencies and with the United Nations Protection Force to ensure the safe delivery of humanitarian assistance to those in need of it, and reiterates its demand that all parties and others concerned take the necessary measures to ensure the safety of United Nations and other personnel engaged in the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

19. Invites the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other relevant international humanitarian agencies, to study the possibility of and the requirements for the promotion of safe areas for humanitarian purposes;

20. Expresses its appreciation for the report presented by the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, and requests the Secretary-General to continue to keep the Security Council regularly informed of developments and of the work of the Conference;

21. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter until a peaceful solution is achieved.

Decision of 2 December 1992: statement by the President

Following consultations among the members of the Council held on 2 December 1992, the President (India) made a statement to the media on behalf of the Council concerning the safety and security of United Nations peacekeeping personnel.²⁷⁷ The statement reads in the relevant part as follows:

The members of the Security Council wish to express their deep concern and outrage about the increasing number of attacks against United Nations personnel serving in various peacekeeping operations.

A number of serious incidents affecting military and civilian personnel serving with the United Nations Angola Verification Mission II, the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and the United Nations Protection Force have occurred during the last few days.

The situation in the United Nations Protection Force, which has already suffered over 300 casualties, 20 of them fatal, remains deeply troubling. On 30 November 1992, two Spanish Force soldiers in Bosnia and Herzegovina were seriously injured in a mine attack and a Danish Force soldier was abducted by armed men today.

...

The members of the Council condemn these attacks on the safety and security of United Nations personnel and demand that all parties concerned take all necessary measures to prevent their recurrence. The members of the Council consider the abduction and detention of United Nations peacekeeping personnel as totally unacceptable and demand the immediate and unconditional release of the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia and United Nations Protection Force personnel concerned.

Decision of 9 December 1992 (3146th meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 7 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Council,²⁷⁸ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, invoking paragraph 1 of Article 35 of the Charter of the United Nations, requested an emergency meeting of the Council, in view of the dramatic increase in aggression against Sarajevo and Bihac and cities in central Bosnia. The Presidency of the Republic urged the Council to take immediate measures, including the use of force under Chapter VII, to enforce its resolutions and stop the aggression against the Republic.

At its 3146th meeting, held on 9 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the above-mentioned letter in its agenda.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (India) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁷⁹

The Security Council is alarmed by the most recent reports that Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina have renewed their offensive in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in particular against the city of Sarajevo, resulting in further loss of life and material damage as well as in endangering the security of United Nations Protection Force and international relief workers, thus threatening international peace and security.

The Council is particularly alarmed by reports that the Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina are forcing inhabitants of Sarajevo to evacuate the city. The Council warns that actions aimed at impeding the distribution of humanitarian assistance and at forcing the inhabitants of Sarajevo to leave the city, including the possibility of "ethnic cleansing", would have grave consequences for the overall situation in that country.

The Council strongly condemns these attacks as violations of its relevant resolutions and of previous commitments, in particular with regard to the cessation of hostilities, the ban on military flights in the airspace of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the safety of humanitarian assistance to the civilian population and the restoration of power and water supplies.

The Council demands the immediate cessation of these attacks and of all actions aimed at impeding the distribution of humanitarian assistance and at forcing the inhabitants of Sarajevo to leave the city.

If such attacks and actions continue, the Council will consider, as soon as possible, further measures against those who commit or support them to ensure the security of the Force and of international relief workers, the ability of the Force to fulfil its mandate and compliance with the relevant resolution of the Council.

The Council will remain actively seized of the matter.

Decision of 18 December 1992 (3150th meeting):
resolution 798 (1992)

At its 3150th meeting, held on 18 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled “The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina”.

The Council invited the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (India) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Morocco and the United Kingdom.²⁸⁰ He also drew their attention to a joint letter from the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom addressed to the President of the Council,²⁸¹ containing the texts of three declarations adopted by the European Community and its member States at the European Council held in Edinburgh on 11 and 12 December 1992: they concerned the former Yugoslavia, the treatment of Muslim women in the former Yugoslavia and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. The second declaration recorded the decision of the European Council to dispatch rapidly a delegation to investigate the facts concerning treatment in places of detention, and called upon the United Nations to adopt measures to support this mission.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 798 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 770 (1992) and 771 (1992) of 13 August 1992 as well as its other relevant resolutions,

Appalled by reports of the massive, organized and systematic detention and rape of women, in particular Muslim women, in Bosnia and Herzegovina,

Demanding that all the detention camps and, in particular, camps for women be immediately closed,

Taking note of the initiative taken by the European Council on the rapid dispatch of a delegation to investigate the facts received until now,

1. Expresses its support for the initiative of the European Council;

2. Strongly condemns these acts of unspeakable brutality;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to provide such necessary means of support as are available to him in the area to enable the European Community delegation to have free and secure access to the places of detention;

4. Requests the member States of the European Community to inform the Secretary-General of the work of the delegation;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution on measures taken to support the delegation;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

DD. Report of the Secretary-General on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Decision of 25 November 1992: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 25 November 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁸² the Secretary-General stated that the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia had conveyed to him a request for the deployment of United Nations observers in that Republic in view of his concern about the possible impact on it of the fighting elsewhere in the former Yugoslavia. He added that the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia had recommended the very early deployment to Skopje of a small group of UNPROFOR military and police observers, with supporting political staff. Their immediate mandate would be to visit the Republic's border areas with Albania and Serbia and prepare a report on how a larger deployment of United Nations military and police personnel might help to strengthen security and confidence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. He accordingly proposed to dispatch forthwith a group of military, police and civilian personnel on an exploratory mission to that Republic in order to prepare a report on which he could base a recommendation to the Council for a more substantive deployment of UNPROFOR there.

By a letter dated 25 November 1992,²⁸³ the President informed the Secretary-General that the Council agreed with his proposal.

Decision of 11 December 1992 (3147th meeting): resolution 795 (1992)

On 9 December 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the outcome of the exploratory mission to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia from 28 November to 3 December.²⁸⁴ He stated that the mission had recommended that a small UNPROFOR presence be established on the Macedonian side of that Republic's borders with Albania and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), with an essentially preventive mandate of monitoring and reporting any developments in the border areas which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory. It had further recommended that a small group of United Nations civilian police should also be deployed in the border area to monitor the Macedonian border police as incidents arising from illegal attempts to cross the border had recently led to increased tension on the Macedonian side. Unlike the military deployment, however, the latter proposal had not yet received the consent of the Macedonian authorities. The Secretary-General stated that the UNPROFOR Force Commander agreed with these proposals, and that he too endorsed them, in the belief that a small

United Nations deployment of this kind on the Macedonian side of the borders would help the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the two neighbouring countries concerned to make safe passage through a potentially turbulent and hazardous period. He accordingly recommended that the Council authorize this further enlargement of the UNPROFOR mandate and strength on the lines proposed.

At its 3147th meeting, held on 11 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda.

The President (India) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁸⁵

He also drew their attention to the following documents: a letter dated 16 November 1992 from the representative of Albania addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁸⁶ urging that the territory of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia be put under international observation to avoid new bloodshed; and the exchange of letters of 23 and 25 November 1992 between the Secretary-General and the President of the Council.²⁸⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 795 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992,

Recalling the letter from the President of the Security Council dated 25 November 1992 conveying the Security Council's agreement to the proposal by the Secretary-General to send an exploratory mission to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

Noting the report of the Secretary-General on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia dated 9 December 1992,

Concerned about possible developments, which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory,

Welcoming the presence of a mission of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,

²⁸⁶ S/24814.

²⁸⁷ S/24851 and S/24852.

Considering the request by the Government in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia for a United Nations presence there,

Recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 9 December 1992 on the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia;

2. Authorizes the Secretary-General to establish a presence of the United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, as recommended by him in his report, and so to inform the authorities of Albania and those of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro);

3. Requests the Secretary-General to deploy immediately the military, civil affairs, and administrative personnel recommended in his report, and to deploy the police monitors immediately upon receiving the consent of the Government in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to do so;

4. Urges the Force presence in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia to coordinate closely with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe mission there;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council regularly informed of the implementation of the present resolution;

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Middle East

21. The situation between Iran and Iraq

Decision of 8 February 1989 (2844th meeting):
resolution 631 (1989)

On 2 February 1989, pursuant to resolution 619 (1988), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the activities of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group (UNIIMOG) for the period from its inception on 9 August 1988 to 2 February 1989, and on his efforts to bring about implementation of the other provisions of resolution 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, which provided the framework for a settlement of the conflict between Iran and Iraq.¹ The report described the steps taken by UNIIMOG to monitor compliance with a ceasefire which had come into effect on 20 August 1988, and to investigate alleged violations of it. It noted that, although the Group had received numerous complaints of such violations, most of them were very minor in nature and few had been confirmed as violations. Moreover, the number of alleged and confirmed violations per month had been steadily declining as UNIIMOG had gained the trust and respect of both parties. A preliminary agreement on the status of UNIIMOG had been concluded with the Government of Iraq, but a similar agreement with the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran was still under discussion.

The Secretary-General observed that the ceasefire, together with the discontinuation of all military activities on land, at sea and in the air and withdrawal to the internationally recognized boundaries, constituted a first step towards a negotiated settlement as demanded by resolution 598 (1987). Direct talks between the two parties had been held under his auspices immediately after the establishment of the ceasefire, aimed at reaching a common understanding of the other provisions of the resolution and the procedures and timings for their implementation. However, the parties continued to hold divergent views on various issues: on what constituted a ceasefire, on when the withdrawal of forces to the internationally recognized boundaries should begin, and on the context and manner in which the question of the restoration of the Shatt al-Arab to navigation should be discussed. They also disagreed on the wider issue of the framework for the conduct of the direct talks. Those differences and the underlying issues involved had made it difficult to proceed with the full and rapid implementation of resolution 598 (1987).

The Secretary-General emphasized that it was important for the authority of the Security Council that that resolution not remain partially implemented. Stressing the need to develop the basis for mutual trust between the two parties, he strongly hoped that further steps of a confidence-building character might be taken by each side in the near future. The implementation of the resolution required that all concerned show renewed positive determination and that they intensify their efforts to make clear to each other their objectives. The implementation of the resolution would bring peace to both countries and contribute to security and stability for the region as a whole. For that to be achieved, however, the resolution should be looked at in a wider context. It had to be implemented in conformity with the principles of international law as they pertained to respect for territorial integrity, non-acquisition of territory by force, the inviolability of internationally recognized boundaries and non-interference in the internal affairs of other States. The underlying principle was the fulfilment in good faith of international obligations and in particular of those set out in the Charter of the United Nations. Implementation also required a restoration of normality as soon as possible. The Secretary-General stated that he intended to pursue the discussions with the two Foreign Ministers soon and to explore with them how to proceed in the most effective manner. He stressed that, for the talks to be successful, both sides had to accept that there would be neither victor nor vanquished at the negotiating table and that the integrity, dignity and honour of both countries would be preserved. He considered that to be the solid foundation for serious and productive peace talks between the two countries under his auspices. In the meantime, the Secretary-General viewed the continued presence of UNIIMOG as an essential condition for further progress towards the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987). Both parties had, moreover, assured him of their support for the Group and of their agreement that its mandate should be extended. He accordingly recommended to the Council that the mandate of UNIIMOG be extended for a period of 7 months and 22 days, until 30 September 1989.

At its 2844th meeting, on 8 February 1989, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President (Nepal) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.² The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 631 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987 and 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 2 February 1989, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 598 (1987);

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a period of seven months and twenty-two days, that is, until 30 September 1989;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 598 (1987).

Decision of 29 September 1989
(2885th meeting): resolution 642 (1989)

On 22 September 1989, pursuant to resolution 631 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 3 February to 22 September 1989.³ He stated that the ceasefire had, on the whole, been maintained during the period under review. There had been a few serious violations and many minor ones, but in general the parties had honoured their commitment to respect the ceasefire and had cooperated with UNIIMOG. Preliminary agreements concerning the status of UNIIMOG had been concluded with both countries. The Secretary-General expressed concern, however, about the restrictions imposed on the Group's freedom of movement in various locations. He noted, moreover, that, although UNIIMOG continued successfully to monitor compliance with the ceasefire, the withdrawal of forces to the internationally recognized boundaries had not yet taken place; part of the UNIIMOG mandate thus remained unimplemented. It was a matter of widespread concern that one year had elapsed without any further progress beyond the partial implementation of paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 598 (1987), demanding a ceasefire and troop withdrawal under United Nations supervision. The present situation of "no war-no peace" contained elements of instability not only for the two countries concerned but also for the region. Both parties, he said, had repeatedly expressed their commitment to achieving the full implementation of the resolution. However, largely because of mutual mistrust, the divergence in their interpretations of how that was to be accomplished had prevented forward movement. Iraq's position was that the resolution should be fully implemented as a peace plan. Its main concern was the implementation of the other provisions of the resolution, once the withdrawal to the internationally recognized boundaries had been carried out. It maintained that the direct talks it had envisaged to reach a common understanding of the resolution as a whole had yet to take place. The Islamic Republic of Iran, on the other hand, was of the view that the withdrawal to the internationally recognized boundaries was a mandatory provision of the resolution which should be carried out without delay or preconditions. It asserted that the withdrawal should be implemented as a first step, together with the ceasefire, in accordance with paragraph 1 of the resolution. The parties had also taken different views of how and when to implement paragraph 3 of the resolution, on the release and repatriation of prisoners of war.

The Secretary-General affirmed that he and his Personal Representative had stressed to the parties the need to implement resolution 598 (1987) as an integrated whole — an approach which the Council had repeatedly supported — and had also underlined the urgency which the Council attributed to particular provisions of that resolution. He had stressed that the resolution demanded a withdrawal to the internationally recognized boundaries and urged the release and repatriation of the prisoners of war, without delay. He had recognized, however, that other provisions might take longer to implement. He reported, in that regard, that each side had to be assured of the other's firm commitment to the full implementation of the resolution, even though all the elements did not require the same amount of time to be implemented. He stressed that such assurances, which would be in conformity with relevant principles of international law, must be given in a manner that would lay the foundation for stability and peace in the region, another objective of the resolution. In that context, the full support of the economic life of the two countries would be to the advantage of both. The Secretary-General expressed his confidence that the leadership of both countries would make it possible for his Personal Representative to address the issues constructively when he visited the area later in the year. He was also sure that the Security Council would continue to provide him with all necessary support. Observing that UNIIMOG had played an indispensable role in ensuring the maintenance of the ceasefire, and that its continued presence was an essential condition for further progress towards the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987), he recommended, with the agreement of the parties, that the Council extend the Group's mandate for a further period of six months, until 31 March 1990.

At its 2885th meeting, on 29 September 1989, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and of Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President (Brazil) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 642 (1989), which reads:

⁴ S/20873.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988 and 631 (1989) of 8 February 1989,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 22 September 1989, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Decides:

(a) To call once again upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 598 (1987);

(b) To extend the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a further period of six months, that is, until 31 March 1990;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 598 (1987).

Decision of 27 February 1990 (2908th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2908th meeting, held on 27 February 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The situation between Iran and Iraq". After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Cuba) said that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The Council expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his briefing on the situation between Iran and Iraq and on his integrated approach to the format, agenda and timetable for direct talks between the parties aimed at achieving the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987.

Accordingly, the Council fully supports the efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at the holding of appropriately structured direct talks between both parties under his auspices, for a period of two months and with a specific agenda, the elements of which he outlined to the members of the Council, that he would propose to the parties, on the basis of the concluding observations contained in his report of 22 September 1989.

The Council calls upon both parties to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in his ongoing efforts, considering that 18 months after the ceasefire between Iran and Iraq, resolution 598 (1987) has not yet been fully implemented.

The Council requests the Secretary-General to report to it at the conclusion of this stage of his efforts and to inform it on the results achieved and on the further steps he envisages for the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987).

Decision of 29 March 1990 (2916th meeting):

On 22 March 1990, pursuant to resolution 642 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 23 September 1989 to 22 March 1990.⁶ The Group, he stated, continued to monitor compliance with the ceasefire. Despite two serious firing incidents in December 1989, there had been a general calm along the ceasefire lines and a significant and encouraging decline in the number of major violations throughout the mandate period. UNIIMOG continued to receive cooperation from the two parties. However, the military observers had been denied access to certain operational areas by both parties even though the preliminary agreements concerning the status of UNIIMOG remained in effect. Moreover, as the withdrawal of forces to the internationally recognized boundaries had still not taken place, parts of the UNIIMOG mandate remained unimplemented. In the meantime, the Group continued to refine its plans for the supervision of the withdrawal, once it was agreed by the parties.

The Secretary-General also reported that he had made a major effort to explore in detail the positions of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq with regard to the various elements of resolution 598 (1987) yet to be implemented. His Personal Representative's extended visit to the region in November 1989 had been aimed at encouraging both sides to focus on an agenda for a new phase of direct talks. Despite encountering some difficulties, he had concluded his visits to the two capitals by making a presentation of a possible programme of work, which he had outlined to both sides for their consideration. Following his envoy's visits, the Secretary-General had continued his own efforts, meeting separately with the two sides and emphasizing the need for appropriately structured direct talks under his auspices with a specific agenda based on his September report to the Security Council. However, in December 1989, it had seemed that progress would not be obtained without concrete support for his efforts by the members of the Council.

Against that background, the Secretary-General stated that the statement issued by the President of the Council on 27 February 1990 constituted an important step in the efforts aimed at implementing resolution 598 (1987). It was an indication of what the international community considered to be a reasonable way to proceed. The particular urgency of certain provisions in the resolution — those referring to withdrawal without delay, and to the release and repatriation of prisoners of war without delay — as well as the need to implement the resolution as a peace plan and as an integrated whole, had been fully recognized. After thus receiving the Council's support, the Secretary-General had presented to both sides a draft agenda for a new phase of direct talks to bring about the implementation of resolution 598 (1987). No final answer had yet been received from either Government, however. The Secretary-General believed that it was time for the leadership of the two countries to notify him of their acceptance of the proposed agenda and to give added political impetus to the talks by indicating to each other their sincerity and their determination to implement the resolution. In the meantime, he thought it was clear that UNIIMOG continued to play an indispensable part in ensuring the maintenance of the ceasefire and that its continued presence was an essential condition for further progress towards the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987). Therefore, and with the agreement of both parties, he recommended to the Council that the UNIIMOG mandate be extended for a further period of six months, until 30 September 1990.

At its 2916th meeting, on 29 March 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and of Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President (Democratic Yemen) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 651 (1990), which reads:

⁷ S/21217.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988, 631 (1989) of 8 February 1989 and 642 (1989) of 29 September 1989,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 22 March 1990, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Decides:

(a) To call once again upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 598 (1987);

(b) To extend the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a further period of six months, that is, until 30 September 1990;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 598 (1987).

Decision of 27 September 1990
(2944th meeting): resolution 671 (1990)

On 21 September 1990, pursuant to resolution 651 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 23 March to 21 September 1990.⁸ He reported that the withdrawal of forces to the internationally recognized boundaries had commenced on 17 August 1990, with the withdrawal of Iraqi forces. UNIIMOG had monitored the withdrawal, in accordance with its mandate. It had also continued to monitor the ceasefire and had endeavoured to obtain the agreement of the parties to other arrangements which, following the withdrawal, could help to reduce possible tensions and build confidence between them. In that regard, and in accordance with its mandate, the Group had proposed to both parties the establishment of areas of separation and of arms limitations along the internationally recognized boundaries. The Secretary-General observed that, although the withdrawal of all forces was now almost complete, there were a few locations where, in the view of UNIIMOG, the forces of each side remained on the wrong side of the internationally recognized boundaries. In those circumstances, he recommended the extension of the Group's mandate for a limited period of two months, until 30 November 1990, to permit it to complete its tasks related to the withdrawal and to allow time for the parties and the Council to judge whether there was a continuing requirement for an impartial third party to monitor the ceasefire on the internationally recognized boundaries. During the extension phase, UNIIMOG would continue to verify, confirm and supervise the remaining stages of the withdrawal; help the parties to resolve any local tensions; and assist them in establishing an area of separation on each side of the border into which each party would agree not to deploy military forces. The Secretary-General also recommended a reduction in the strength of UNIIMOG since only about 60 per cent of the current military observer strength would be required to perform those tasks. He added that both parties had agreed to the proposed extension, and that it was his intention to initiate further consultations with them about the future of UNIIMOG early in November, after which he would submit his recommendations to the Council.

At its 2944th meeting, held on 27 September 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and of Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 671 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988, 631 (1989) of 8 February 1989, 642 (1989) of 29 September 1989 and 651 (1990) of 29 March 1990,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 21 September 1990, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a further period of two months, that is, until 30 November 1990, as recommended by the Secretary-General;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit, during the period of November, a report on his further consultations with the parties about the future of the Military Observer Group, together with his recommendations on this matter.

⁹ S/21822.

Decision of 28 November 1990 (2961st meeting):

On 23 November 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 22 September to 20 November 1990.¹⁰ The report comprised two parts. The first part was submitted pursuant to resolution 671 (1990), in response to the Council's request for a report on his further consultations with the parties about the future of UNIIMOG, together with his recommendations. It also described the Group's activities during the two-month period. The second part of the report, submitted pursuant to resolution 651 (1990), detailed the Secretary-General's efforts aimed at implementing resolution 598 (1987).

In the first part of his report, the Secretary-General noted that the two sides had almost completed the process of withdrawal to the internationally recognized boundaries. Despite some cases of local tension, there had been no serious incidents. UNIIMOG had concentrated its efforts on supervising, verifying and confirming the withdrawal of the two sides' forces and their assumption of new positions on or close to the border. It had also continued to promote the idea of an area of separation and an area of limitation of armaments on either side of the border as a means of building confidence and reducing the risk of incidents. Both sides had stated that they accepted the principle of an area of separation and that they were ready to enter into discussions about detailed arrangements for its establishment.

With regard to the future of UNIIMOG, the Secretary-General reported that both sides had agreed that during a renewed mandate period its tasks should be to resolve the remaining problems on the border; to try to arrange an exchange of information between the parties about unmarked minefields; and to assist the parties in negotiating and implementing an area of separation and an area of limitation of armaments. In his view, those tasks were appropriate ones for the United Nations — through UNIIMOG — to undertake; if successfully carried out, they would make an important contribution to the full implementation of resolution 598 (1987). He added that views had differed, however, on the length of the renewed mandate period and the strength of UNIIMOG. The Secretary-General himself had favoured extension for a longer period than two months and reduction of UNIIMOG to a strength of 50 to 60 observers on each side. The Iraqi authorities had expressed a strong preference for the UNIIMOG mandate to be renewed for a full period of six months, with the Group remaining at its present strength. The Iranian authorities had initially expressed the view that, since important parts of resolution 598 (1987) had been almost completely implemented and progress had been made in recent months in the bilateral relationship between the two parties, it was doubtful whether there was a continuing need for third-party involvement. However, after detailed discussion, the Islamic Republic of Iran had agreed that the mandate of UNIIMOG should be renewed, but with a reduced strength of 50 to 60 military observers on each side and for a period of only two months. In those circumstances the Secretary-General recommended that the Council extend the Group's mandate for a further period of two months, until 31 January 1991, with a strength not exceeding 120 military observers, plus the necessary support personnel, and with the tasks described above.

In the second part of his report, the Secretary-General described his efforts to bring about full implementation of resolution 598 (1987). He reported that on 3 July 1990 he had been able to convene a joint meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, providing the first opportunity for direct contact between the two Ministers since April 1989. Both sides had reaffirmed their commitment to the implementation of resolution 598 (1987), which remained the framework within which all contacts between the two sides were taking place, as well as their support for the role of the Secretary-General in that connection. Bilateral contacts had continued and, in October, the two Governments had re-established diplomatic relations. Both sides had also begun to repatriate their prisoners of war, as required by the resolution.

The Secretary-General observed that when the Council adopted its mandatory resolution on the conflict between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, it was clear that its ultimate aim was the re-establishment of good-neighbourly relations and the enhancement of the security and stability of the region. While important parts of the resolution had been implemented, the fundamental change in the relations between the two countries had come at a time of new crisis for the region. As contacts continued between the two Governments to put their relations on a normal footing, it appeared that paragraph 8 of the resolution — in which the Secretary-General was requested to examine, in consultation with the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq and with other States of the region, measures to enhance the security and stability of the region — should at an appropriate time be looked at anew. It seemed to the Secretary-General that full implementation of resolution 598 (1987) could well contribute to a marked improvement of the situation in the region as a whole. He therefore intended, as appropriate, to remain in close touch with the Governments concerned with regard to the yet unimplemented paragraphs of the resolution.

At its 2961st meeting, on 28 November 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 676 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988, 631 (1989) of 8 February 1989, 642 (1989) of 29 September 1989, 651 (1990) of 29 March 1990 and 671 (1990) of 27 September 1990,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 23 November 1990, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a further period of two months, that is, until 31 January 1991, as recommended by the Secretary-General;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit, during January 1991, a report on his further consultations with the parties about the future of the Military Observer Group, together with his recommendations on this matter.

Decision of 31 January 1991 (2976th meeting): resolution 685 (1991)

On 29 January 1991, pursuant to resolution 676 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 21 November 1990 to 27 January 1991, together with his recommendations on its future.¹² He stated that the activities of the Group had been considerably affected by developments in the Gulf region.¹³ The outbreak of hostilities in the area had effectively prevented UNIIMOG from continuing its operations in Iraq and all UNIIMOG personnel in the country had been temporarily relocated. The Secretary-General observed that the general situation along the internationally recognized boundaries had remained very calm during the mandate period. At a technical meeting of military experts on 6 January 1991, the two parties had reached agreements on the outstanding questions relating to the UNIIMOG mandate: the question of disputed positions along the internationally recognized boundaries; the exchange of information on minefields; and the establishment of an area of separation along the internationally recognized boundaries. The Secretary-General stated that the agreements were fully consistent with the Group's mandate and provided for the Group to monitor their implementation within a specified time frame. He observed that they constituted a very useful development in the efforts towards the successful completion of the remaining tasks of UNIIMOG. Although implementation of the agreements had not proceeded fully according to schedule, that was due to the outbreak of hostilities in the area, not to lack of commitment on either side. Indeed, both sides had given firm indications to UNIIMOG that they remained determined to implement fully in due course the arrangements agreed upon on 6 January. They had also confirmed to the Secretary-General that they would continue to count on the presence and assistance of UNIIMOG for that purpose. Notwithstanding current security considerations and their unavoidable effect on operational effectiveness, the Secretary-General was of the view, shared by the two parties, that the UNIIMOG mandate should be extended so that the Group could fulfil completely its important responsibilities. However, pending clarification of the situation in the area, the extension would have to be for a brief period. He therefore recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UMIIMOG for a further period of one month, until 28 February 1991.

The Secretary-General observed further that the implementation of paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 598 (1987), demanding a ceasefire and troop withdrawal under United Nations supervision, was very close to completion. Progress had also been made in the fulfilment of paragraph 3, calling for the repatriation of prisoners of war, and paragraph 4, calling on the parties to deal with other outstanding issues. What remained to be implemented were other paragraphs in which the role requested of the Secretary-General was mainly a political one. Paragraph 8, in particular, by which he was requested to examine, in consultation with the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq and with other States of the region, measures to enhance the security and stability of the region, had taken on added significance in the current circumstances. The Secretary-General informed the Council that he would consult, at the appropriate time, with both sides on the manner in which he intended to pursue his task in that regard. He expressed the hope that the agreements recently reached at the military level would be fully implemented in the weeks ahead, making it possible to focus more directly on the work required to implement the remaining paragraphs of the resolution.

At the 2976th meeting, on 31 January 1991, prior to the adoption of the agenda, which included the item entitled "The situation between Iran and Iraq", the representative of Cuba made a statement. He stated that, while his delegation considered it appropriate for the Council to meet at that time to renew the mandate of UNIMOG and to support the Group fully in discharging its responsibilities, it could not vote in favour of the provisional agenda without voicing its deep dissatisfaction that the Council had not been able to consider a serious problem, of concern to the entire world, which was obviously its most basic obligation to take up. The speaker noted that, despite the fact that for more than one week a group of members of the Council had been asking for a meeting on an urgent basis and that two members of the Council had requested that it meet to consider the war situation that currently existed in the region, thus far the Council had not done so, notwithstanding the clear and categorical provisions in its provisional rules of procedure. In agreeing to consider now the item "The situation between Iran and Iraq", the Cuban delegation also wished to express its view that the Council had a basic obligation to fulfil in connection with the war situation prevailing in the Gulf: namely, the obligation to consider, discuss and hear the ideas and proposals Member States wished to put forth.¹⁴

The Council members held a procedural discussion on the appropriateness of making such a statement before the adoption of the agenda.¹⁵

The Council then proceeded to adopt the agenda, which included the report of the Secretary-General. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of the Islamic Republic of Iran and of Iraq, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the same meeting, the President (Zaire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁶ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 685 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 598 (1987) of 20 July 1987, 619 (1988) of 9 August 1988, 631 (1989) of 8 February 1989, 642 (1989) of 29 September 1989, 651 (1990) of 29 March 1990, 671 (1990) of 27 September 1990 and 676 (1990) of 28 November 1990,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group of 28 January 1991, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

1. Decides to extend the mandate of the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for a further period of one month, that is, until 28 February 1991, as recommended by the Secretary-General;
2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit, during February 1991, a report on his further consultations with the parties about the future of the Group, together with his recommendations on this matter.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representative of Yemen stated that the chapter on the conflict between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq was closing just as the situation in the region was deteriorating because of the major war operations now taking place in accordance with Security Council resolution 678 (1990). He recalled that, on 23 January, the countries of the Arab Maghreb had called for a Council meeting to debate the situation and that, on 24 January, as his country's representative in the Council, he had put forward a similar request. He found it most regrettable that, for the first time in the history of the Council, a request of that kind, made in accordance with rule 2 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, had not been accepted. The speaker cautioned that the war in the Gulf might lead to a crisis in the Council and to paralysis of its work. His delegation put forward this problem because it strongly believed that the Council must always stand against war, particularly since the current war operations had gone beyond Yemen's view of resolution 678 (1990); they were more like an attempt to destroy the military and scientific infrastructure of Iraq than an attempt to liberate Kuwait. Yemen recognized the need for Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait and for Kuwait's full sovereignty to be restored. The speaker called upon the current President of the Council and the President for the following month speedily to consider his country's request for a meeting so that the Council could, openly, take the appropriate measures.¹⁷

The representative of Cuba pointed out that the Secretary-General, in paragraph 19 of his report,¹⁸ had referred to the real war in the region, which directly affected the compliance of UNIIMOG with its mandate. He drew the attention of the Council members to the fact that it did not serve the Council's interests that it had not yet been able to meet to perform a clear duty spelled out in its provisional rules of procedure: to preserve future generations from the scourge of war and to do whatever could be done for peace. The speaker stated further that the members of the Council should not be deprived of the right under the Charter to be heard. Above all, the Council should not be placed in a situation in which it could be found to be ignoring the norms governing its activities.¹⁹

The President (Zaire), in reply to the representative of Yemen, stated that he had duly applied rule 2 of the provisional rules of procedure and had received a mandate from all members of the Council to conduct consultations. It was clearly understood, he added, that the members of the Council were unanimous in supporting the principle of convening a formal meeting of the Council. He had therefore received a mandate to consult to agree on the date of that meeting.²⁰

Decision of 28 February 1991: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

On 26 February 1991, pursuant to resolution 685 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIIMOG for the period from 28 January to 25 February 1991, together with his recommendations on its future.²¹ He noted that the general situation along the internationally recognized boundaries had remained very calm during the mandate period. Because of the temporary relocation of the UNIIMOG Baghdad observers in January, the Group had continued to monitor the boundaries from the Iranian side only. The parties had continued to implement the agreements reached during their technical meeting on 6 January 1991, and UNIIMOG had provided assistance in that process. The withdrawal of the two sides' forces to the internationally recognized boundaries had been completed, enabling UNIIMOG to complete verification and confirmation of the withdrawal in accordance with its mandate. There remained the question of establishing an area of separation and an area of limitation of armaments which, pending negotiation of a comprehensive settlement, could help to reduce tension and build confidence between the parties. Both sides had informed UNIIMOG that they had begun — and, in the case of Iraq, had completed — the establishment of the area of separation envisaged in the 6 January agreements. However, owing to the temporary suspension of its operations in Iraq and because of the increased restrictions on its freedom of movement in the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Group had not been in a position to confirm this on the ground.

The Secretary-General concluded that the time had come to consider paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 598 (1987) as implemented and to move forward by converting the United Nations presence in the two countries into one, which would more appropriately assist him in carrying out the remaining tasks entrusted to him by other paragraphs of that resolution. Those tasks were essentially political rather than military and the Secretary-General had therefore informed the parties of his intention to recommend to the Council that UNIIMOG should be replaced by small civilian offices. The offices at Baghdad and Tehran would, however, include a few military observers who would be available to investigate and help to resolve any difficulties of a military nature that might arise on the border. He accordingly recommended that the Council take no action to extend the UNIIMOG mandate, which would come to an end on 28 February 1991. He added that he would shortly send the President of the Council a letter elaborating on his intention to establish small civilian offices in the area. Meanwhile, UNIIMOG personnel would be withdrawn as soon as possible, except for those who would be required for the proposed civilian offices.

By a letter dated 26 February 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²² the Secretary-General referred to his report of 29 January 1991 on UNIIMOG,²³ in which he had stated that, after the implementation of paragraphs 1 and 2 of resolution 598 (1987) had been completed, he intended to begin contacts with the parties on the manner in which he would pursue the other tasks entrusted to him by that resolution. He reiterated that those tasks envisaged a political role by the Secretary-General. In particular, some of the remaining paragraphs of the resolution required him to explore certain issues in consultation with the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq. Another paragraph requested him to examine, in consultation with those two countries as well as with other States of the region, measures to enhance the security and stability of the region. Such tasks, in his opinion, would be facilitated by the establishment in the region — particularly in the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq — of civilian offices, which would help him to carry out his work and to have a better assessment of developments in the area. For the reasons stated in his report of 26 February 1991 on UNIIMOG, he had decided to recommend that the mission's mandate not be extended. At the same time, he thought that the continued presence of a few military observers attached to those civilian offices which would be located in the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq would allow the Organization to respond promptly to any request from the parties to investigate matters for which military expertise would be required. The Secretary-General trusted that these arrangements would meet with the concurrence of the members of the Council.

By a letter dated 28 February 1991,²⁴ the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General as follows:

I have the honour to inform you that your letter dated 26 February 1991 was brought to the attention of the members of the Security Council, who considered the matter in consultations held on 27 February 1991.

The members of the Council agreed with the observations and recommendations contained in the report of 26 February 1991 on the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group for the period 28 January 1991 to 25 February 1991 and concurred with the arrangements proposed in the report and the letter.

The members of the Council express their gratitude to you personally and their appreciation to the members of the Group on the successful completion of their important task.

By a letter dated 23 May 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁵ the Secretary-General stated that, following his last report on UNIIMOG²⁶ and the follow-up exchange of letters,²⁷ he had continued his efforts towards the full implementation of resolution 598 (1997). In that context, he wished to inform the Council that, pursuant to the mandate entrusted to him by paragraph 7 of that resolution, and in consultation with the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran, he had assigned a team of experts to make an exploratory visit to that country towards the end of May, to study the question of reconstruction. It was anticipated that the team would remain in the area for an initial period of two to three weeks. The Secretary-General added that, in the implementation of this mandate, he was also in contact with the Government of Iraq.

22. Items relating to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Initial proceedings

A. The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Decision of 2 August 1990 (2932nd meeting): resolution 660 (1990)

By a letter dated 2 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Kuwait requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in the early morning of that day.

By a letter dated 2 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the representative of the United States urgently requested, in the light of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi forces and the request of the representative of Kuwait, an immediate meeting of the Council.

At its 2932nd meeting, on 2 August 1990, the Council adopted the agenda item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait", included in it the two above-mentioned letters and began its consideration of the item. The Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Romania) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Malaysia, the United Kingdom and the United States.³

Commencing the discussion, the representative of Kuwait stated that in the early hours of 2 August 1990 Iraqi forces had crossed Kuwait's internationally recognized boundaries, penetrated its territory and reached its populated area. As stated by his Government a few hours earlier, Iraq had occupied Kuwait at dawn that day. The Iraqi forces had occupied crossroads and ministries and shelled the headquarters of the Government. The Government statement added that Baghdad Radio had announced that the aim of the invasion of Kuwait was to stage a coup d'état to overthrow the government and establish a new government friendly to Iraq. The speaker assured the Council, however, that the Government of Kuwait remained in control in Kuwait and was defending the country. He said that Iraq's pretext for the invasion was false and unwarranted. If not deterred decisively by the Council, such action would threaten all international relations and jeopardize the security, sovereignty and territorial integrity of every State. It was alarming, he added, that the invasion should come from Iraq, an Arab country with which Kuwait shared historic ties, and appalling that it should occur less than one day after a round of talks between the deputy leaders of the two countries in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. At that meeting, Kuwait had expressed its willingness to continue bilateral negotiations in Kuwait and Baghdad in order to solve the problem by peaceful means in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of the Arab League and the principles of non-alignment and of Islam. However, Kuwait was faced with the Iraqi invasion, which represented a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations, particularly the provisions of Article 2 (3 and 4). The speaker further stated that it was incumbent on the Council to shoulder its responsibilities and to protect Kuwait, whose security, sovereignty and territorial integrity had been violated. This was a test for the Council, which was responsible for peace and security in that vital area of the world and towards all small and defenceless nations. He added that Kuwait was asking the Security Council to immediately halt the invasion and to ensure, by every means available, the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraq to the international boundaries that existed before the invasion. In conclusion, he urged the Council to adopt a resolution in conformity with the Charter and with international laws and norms.⁴

The representative of Iraq stated that his Government's position with respect to the item before the Council was as follows: (1) the events taking place in Kuwait were internal matters which had no relation to Iraq; (2) Iraq's assistance had been requested by the "Free Provisional Government of Kuwait", to establish security and order, and was being provided solely on that basis; (3) Iraq was pursuing no goal or objective in Kuwait, with which it wished to have cordial and goodneighbourly relations; (4) the Kuwaitis themselves would determine their future; the Iraqi forces would withdraw as soon as order had been restored, which, his Government hoped, would take no more than a few days, or at most a few weeks; (5) as the previous Kuwaiti Government had reportedly been overthrown and there was now a new Government in Kuwait, the person in Kuwait's seat at the Council's meeting represented no one, and his statement lacked credence; and (6) the Government of Iraq rejected the flagrant intervention by the United States in those events, which was further evidence of the collusion between the United States Government and the "previous Government" of Kuwait. The speaker concluded by reiterating that his Government hoped that order would be swiftly restored in Kuwait and that the Kuwaitis themselves would decide upon their future, free from any outside intervention.⁵

The representative of the United States said that, according to reports received from the United States embassy in Kuwait, Iraqi forces had moved into Kuwaiti territory shortly after midnight or at about 6.30 p.m. Eastern Daylight Saving Time the previous day. They had crossed over into Kuwaiti territory all along the frontier and rapidly proceeded to Kuwait City where they were currently present. They had faced resistance by the Kuwaiti forces but the extent of casualties was not yet known. While the Iraqi invasion had been carefully planned and professionally executed, the Iraqis had made a serious mistake: instead of installing the so-called Free Provisional Government of Kuwait before the invasion, they had first invaded Kuwait and then staged the coup d'état in a blatantly deceitful effort to justify their action. Despite Baghdad's efforts to install its own regime in that country, the Emir, the Crown Prince and the Foreign Minister of Kuwait were safe and continued to direct the Government of Kuwait. The speaker informed the Council that his Government had issued a statement strongly condemning the invasion and calling for the immediate unconditional withdrawal of all Iraqi forces. The Government statement indicated that the message had been conveyed to the Iraqi Ambassador in Washington and to the Government of Iraq, through the United States Embassy in Baghdad. It added that the United States deplored the blatant military aggression and violation of the Charter and had joined Kuwait in calling for an emergency meeting of the Security Council. The speaker emphasized that the United States had made it clear that it would support Kuwait in the current crisis. He further pointed out that it was his Government's understanding that the aggression against Kuwait had been completely unprovoked. United States policy had been to support every diplomatic effort to resolve the crisis. Before seeking the immediate adoption of a draft resolution co-sponsored by eight other members of the Council, his Government had been in touch with many States in the region. He urged the Security Council, which had seldom faced a more blatant case of the use of force, to act immediately to accept its full responsibilities and support Kuwait. In conclusion, he asked the members of the Council to act in accordance with the Charter.⁶

The representatives of Canada, China, Colombia, Finland, France, Malaysia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom, and the President of the Council in his capacity as the representative of Romania, expressed support for the draft resolution, which they either sponsored or endorsed. The representatives of Colombia, Malaysia and the United Kingdom stressed the duty of the Security Council to protect the sovereignty of small States. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom noted that the Iraqi aggression had destabilized a region that had just emerged from a lengthy and bloody conflict. All speakers called for the withdrawal of Iraqi troops and a peaceful settlement of the dispute.⁷

The Council then proceeded to the vote on the draft resolution before it.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen stated that his delegation would not participate in the voting on the draft resolution because it had not received instructions from its capital. He, however, emphasized Yemen's respect for the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the right of all States to their sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence. As a matter of principle, Yemen condemned all forms of interference in the internal affairs of other States, opposed the use of force and called for the peaceful settlement of disputes. On that basis, Yemen called on Iraq and Kuwait to begin negotiations immediately, and supported all efforts by Arab States, individually and collectively.⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour to none against as resolution 660 (1990). One member (Yemen) did not participate in the voting. The resolution reads:

The Security Council,

Alarmed by the invasion of Kuwait on 2 August 1990 by the military forces of Iraq,

Determining that there exists a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait,

Acting under Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait;
2. Demands that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they were located on 1 August 1990;
3. Calls upon Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediately intensive negotiations for the resolution of their differences and supports all efforts in this regard, and especially those of the League of Arab States;
4. Decides to meet again as necessary to consider further steps to ensure compliance with the present resolution.

Decision of 6 August 1990 (2933rd meeting):
resolution 661 (1990)

At its 2933rd meeting, on 6 August 1990, the Council resumed its consideration of the item that had been included in its agenda at the 2932nd meeting. In accordance with the decisions taken at that meeting, the President (Romania) invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table. He then drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Malaysia, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire.⁹ He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.¹⁰

Commencing the discussion, the representative of Kuwait stated that five days after the adoption of resolution 660 (1990), the “aggressor” had not withdrawn from the State of Kuwait but had, in fact, occupied the entire country. He said that the unprecedented and strong international condemnation of the invasion had given rise to hope that the invader would be induced to comply with resolution 660 (1990). Iraq, on the contrary, was actually expanding and consolidating its military occupation throughout Kuwait. The aim of the aggression was to overthrow the legitimate Government of Kuwait and install a new Government in its place, and gain hegemony over Kuwait’s resources. The objectives of the invasion were based on expansionism as seen in Iraq’s threats and subsequent attacks against neighbouring countries. Iraq was thus threatening the strategic interests of all the countries of the world, of which the Gulf was one of the most vital regions. Those objectives, in their totality, threatened international peace and security. The formation by the Iraqis of the so-called Popular Army was a cover for the occupying forces, which confirmed that they had no intention of withdrawing. The purported withdrawal of some military vehicles was a charade. The speaker therefore called on the Council to shoulder its historic responsibility by adopting the draft resolution before it, which provided for the imposition of sweeping sanctions against Iraq for its failure to comply with resolution 660 (1990).¹¹

The representative of Iraq contended that the draft resolution before the Council contradicted resolution 660 (1990) and certain facts. He said that his Government had announced, on 3 August 1990, that it intended to start withdrawing its forces on 5 August, and stated that it had already started to do so. The draft resolution would not help to resolve the crisis, but would only exacerbate it. Nor would it help the Iraqi troops to withdraw. Referring to the second preambular paragraph of the draft resolution, which spoke about “the invasion by Iraq”, the speaker asserted that such a term had not been used during the United States invasion of Panama or Grenada, nor when Israel had invaded its neighbours. His Government therefore believed that the term was being used in the current instance to allow aggression to be committed by a third State in the region. He claimed that the draft resolution had been prepared by a single State and that pressure had been exerted on all the other States to go along, thus rendering the draft resolution null and void, since anything that had been imposed by force and threats was not legitimate under the principles of the Charter. Iraq believed, moreover, that the draft resolution would have a negative impact on the economies of developing countries, in view of its impact on the price of oil. The speaker concluded that, for all those reasons, he expected the Council to reject the draft resolution.¹²

The Council then proceeded to the vote on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States said that the draft resolution was the Council's response to Iraq's aggression against Kuwait and its failure to comply with resolution 660 (1990), a mandatory resolution by which the Council had demanded the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait. Iraq's actions had plunged the strategically critical area of the Gulf into crisis and placed 30 per cent of the region's oil production under Iraqi control, thus threatening international economic health and stability. Contrary to Iraq's purported promises to withdraw immediately, its troop deployments in Kuwait had been enhanced and consolidated and were dangerously provocative to other States in the region. By adopting the draft resolution, the Council would use the means available to it under Chapter VII of the Charter to give effect to its resolution 660 (1990) and meet its obligation to restore Kuwait's legitimate authority, sovereignty and territorial integrity. Referring to paragraph 5 of the draft resolution, the speaker emphasized that the draft resolution would be binding upon all States — Members and non-members alike. His Government had already frozen all Iraqi and Kuwaiti assets and barred all trade with Iraq and it welcomed the decisions by many other Governments to cease arms transfers to Iraq. He concluded that, by acting on the draft resolution, the Council would consolidate and give effect to all those unilateral actions and would pledge to the legitimate Government of Kuwait that there would be international redress for the Iraqi invasion. By its action, the Council would also declare that it would not countenance the continuation or repetition of that aggression.¹³

The representative of France stated that, at the national level, his Government had decided to freeze Iraqi assets and had confirmed that it would continue not to deliver arms to Iraq. Within the framework of the European Community, his Government had actively contributed to the adoption of a declaration imposing an embargo on the import of oil originating in Iraq and Kuwait, and a halt on arms sales and military and scientific cooperation with Iraq. He stated that the magnitude of those measures was justified because of the unacceptable nature of Iraq's military aggression, which was a major violation of international law and a serious threat to international peace and security. Recalling that resolution 660 (1990), adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter, was binding on all States, he stressed that it was up to the Council to take appropriate steps to ensure Iraq's compliance.¹⁴

The representative of Malaysia stated that, although his country had actively supported resolution 660 (1990), its decision to support the adoption of the draft resolution under consideration had not been an easy one. He expressed concern about the hardship that the broad sanctions called for in the resolution would impose on Governments and on the peoples of Kuwait and Iraq, and hoped that they would be of short duration, given prompt compliance by Iraq with resolution 660 (1990). He noted that there was evidence now of a strong will within the international community, as represented by the Security Council, to uphold the principles of the Charter. Resolution 660 (1990) and the draft resolution currently before the Council embodied that collective determination. Malaysia's support for the draft resolution was not meant to be a punitive act; it was, rather, an expression of his Government's desire to be part of the international community's resolve to ensure that disputes between States were not settled through the use of force, and was predicated on the premise that it would remove the prospect of unilateral military or quasi-military action in the region by external Powers. The speaker emphasized the Council's responsibility in ensuring an early and peaceful end to the conflict. In that context, it was also the duty of the Council to ensure that the efforts to bring about the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of the Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait were taken under the ambit of the United Nations and not unilaterally, to avoid escalation and greater turmoil.¹⁵

The representative of Canada stated that his Government had been dismayed to learn that Iraq had not complied with resolution 660 (1990); that its forces remained in Kuwait; that they appeared to be consolidating their position; and that Iraq had moved large numbers of troops near the border with Saudi Arabia. This had increased the tensions in an already volatile region. Iraq's failure to comply with the terms of resolution 660 (1990) left the Council with no alternative but to consider what further measures could be applied to give effect to that resolution. The rare imposition of sanctions was not something that Canada took lightly. However, faced with the intransigence of the Iraqi regime and the extremely serious nature of its invasion and occupation of Kuwait, there could be no other alternative but to act under Article 41 of the Charter. Indeed, it had hoped that the proposed measures would have extended further, to include more explicitly financial and other services. The draft resolution would, nevertheless, impose one of the broadest sets of sanctions ever put in place against a State Member of the United Nations, covering as it did all aspects of military, economic and financial relations with Iraq and occupied Kuwait. The speaker recognized that those sanctions would impose hardships on many countries and organizations, and indeed on individuals throughout the world. However, sacrifices were necessary to maintain the peace and security of States and the integrity of the international system. The extraordinary measures contemplated were essential to exert the necessary pressure on Iraq to end forthwith its aggression and occupation of Kuwait, to safeguard the rule of law and to deter future aggressors. The speaker concluded by underlining the Security Council's particular responsibility towards small and vulnerable States, which looked to it for protection and support.¹⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom said that, over five days, hopes of Iraqi compliance with resolution 660 (1990) had not been fulfilled. Indeed, instead of an unconditional withdrawal, there had been a further entrenchment of Iraqi forces in Kuwait. Some Governments, such as the 12 member countries of the European Community, had already taken action. But individual action by States or groups of States was not sufficient. A framework for international action was needed, as provided in the form of the draft resolution before the Council. The speaker emphasized that the draft resolution, once adopted, would remain in effect only so long as resolution 660 (1990) was not complied with. Furthermore, economic sanctions should not be regarded as a prelude to military action; rather, they were designed to avoid the circumstances in which military action might otherwise arise. Recalling paragraph 3 of resolution 660 (1990), he said that his Government attached great importance to the role of the Arab States in promoting a solution to the problem. In conclusion, he observed that the Security Council had to face its responsibilities. It had to succeed where the League of Nations had failed and where the Council itself had faltered in the past. It had a particular responsibility for small and vulnerable States. It should make of the Council what the founding fathers had intended it to be, and should set a new precedent for the better management of a world order based on respect for law, sovereignty and territorial integrity.¹⁷

The representative of China believed that the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait must be respected and that resolution 660 (1990) should be implemented immediately and effectively. In keeping with that position and taking into consideration the pressing demand of many Arab countries, China would vote in favour of the draft resolution. China hoped that the Arab States would continue their mediation efforts with a view to finding a peaceful solution to the differences between them. It supported those efforts and believed that the Council should also encourage, support and facilitate them.¹⁸

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that his Government believed that no matters in dispute, however complicated they might be, justified the use of force. The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq went, moreover, against the interests of the Arab States and against the positive trends in international relations. In the light of the invasion, the Soviet Union, together with the United States, had taken the unusual step of issuing a joint appeal to the entire international community to join with them in halting all arms deliveries to Iraq. The Soviet Union had also called upon regional organizations, particularly the League of Arab States, but also the Non-Aligned Movement and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, to take all possible steps to ensure the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait. It had also made a direct appeal to the Government of Iraq to heed the voice of the international community. The Soviet Union now believed that it was very important that resolution 660 (1990), which it had actively facilitated, be fully and immediately implemented. It would therefore support the draft resolution imposing sanctions. The decision to vote in favour had, however, been a very complicated matter for the Soviet Union because the draft resolution directly affected a whole set of relationships between the two countries developed over many years. Nevertheless, the circumstances dictated that the necessary steps be taken immediately, including steps by the Security Council, in accordance with the requirements of the Charter.¹⁹

The representative of Colombia observed that, on various occasions in the past four decades, the Security Council had condemned international conflicts, occupation and military confrontation but, owing to the exercise of the veto, it had been unable to impose sanctions against those responsible for not complying with the principles of the Charter or with the Council's decisions. He noted with satisfaction and a sense of optimism that on this occasion the five permanent members of the Council were acting unanimously to condemn the use of force by, and impose sanctions against, Iraq. His Government had joined in sponsoring the draft resolution because it regarded the intended measures not only as just but also as constituting a warning for the future course of relations in the international community.²⁰

The representatives of Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland and Zaire, and the President of the Council in his capacity as the representative of Romania, expressed support for the draft resolution, which their Governments either sponsored or endorsed. They viewed Iraq's occupation of Kuwait as a violation of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and hoped that Iraq could be induced to withdraw from Kuwait rapidly and unconditionally. The speakers stressed that the only way to settle disputes between States lay in negotiations and in resorting to the procedures provided by the Charter.²¹

²¹ Ibid., pp. 19-20 (Finland); pp. 33-35 (Zaire); p. 36 (Côte d'Ivoire); pp. 36-37 (Ethiopia); p. 53 (Romania).

The representative of Cuba said that the principles of non-interference in the internal affairs of States, the non-use of force, the peaceful settlement of disputes between States and respect for the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of all nations were essential principles of the international order. It was in defence of those principles that his Government had condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and declared that that situation must be ended with the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwaiti territory and the full restoration of Kuwait's sovereignty. His delegation was unable, however, to support the draft resolution currently before the Council for several reasons: (a) far from contributing to the settlement of the conflict, the imposition of sanctions would complicate the situation at a time when Iraq had begun withdrawing its forces; (b) the draft resolution would facilitate the interventionist actions being promoted in the region by the United States Government; and (c) it would impede the efforts of the Arab States to arrive at a solution. The speaker doubted, moreover, that the imposition of sanctions against Iraq was really motivated by a desire to defend the above-mentioned fundamental principles, so much as by a desire by a Great Power to foster its strategic interests in the Middle East. He observed that the Council had not adopted positions consistent with the defence of those principles in a number of other cases, and was averse to letting the United States choose how, where and when those principles should be applied. His delegation could not support the draft resolution because it would not help to settle the conflict and was based on inconsistency and the "unacceptable selectivity of approach" of the United States in the Council.²²

The representative of Yemen stated that, since the outbreak of the conflict between Iraq and Kuwait, the President of his country had discussed it with the leaders of Iraq, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, with a view to resolving it by peaceful means on the basis of a speedy withdrawal of Iraqi forces from the territory of Kuwait. His Government intended to continue with its efforts to contain the conflict because it believed that the Arab framework provided the most effective way of achieving a peaceful settlement. He stressed his delegation's keen interest in maintaining peace and stability in the area of the Gulf and the Arabian peninsula and rejected any foreign intervention in the internal affairs of the region. He hoped that the draft resolution would not be a pretext for such intervention.²³

The draft resolution was then put to the vote, and adopted by 13 votes in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen), as resolution 661 (1990), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990,

Deeply concerned that the resolution has not been implemented and that the invasion by Iraq of Kuwait continues, with further loss of human life and material destruction,

Determined to bring the invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq to an end and to restore the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Kuwait,

Noting that the legitimate Government of Kuwait has expressed its readiness to comply with resolution 660 (1990),

Mindful of its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Affirming the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence, in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Determines that Iraq so far has failed to comply with paragraph 2 of resolution 660 (1990) and has usurped the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait;

2. Decides, as a consequence, to take the following measures to secure compliance of Iraq with paragraph 2 of resolution 660 (1990) and to restore the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait;

3. Decides that all States shall prevent:

(a) The import into their territories of all commodities and products originating in Iraq or Kuwait exported therefrom after the date of the present resolution;

(b) Any activities by their nationals or in their territories which would promote or are calculated to promote the export or trans-shipment of any commodities or products from Iraq or Kuwait; and any dealings by their nationals or their flag vessels or in their territories in any commodities or products originating in Iraq or Kuwait and exported therefrom after the date of the present resolution, including in particular any transfer of funds to Iraq or Kuwait for the purposes of such activities or dealings;

(c) The sale or supply by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels of any commodities or products, including weapons or any other military equipment, whether or not originating in their territories but not including supplies intended strictly for medical purposes, and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs, to any person or body in Iraq or Kuwait or to any person or body for the purposes of any business carried on in or operated from Iraq or Kuwait, and any activities by their nationals or in their territories which promote or are calculated to promote such sale or supply of such commodities or products;

4. Decides that all States shall not make available to the Government of Iraq, or to any commercial, industrial or public utility undertaking in Iraq or Kuwait, any funds or any other financial or economic resources and shall prevent their nationals and any persons within their territories from removing from their territories or otherwise making available to that Government or to any such undertaking any such funds or resources and from remitting any other funds to persons or bodies within Iraq or Kuwait, except payments exclusively for strictly medical or humanitarian purposes and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs;

5. Calls upon all States, including States non-members of the United Nations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution notwithstanding any contract entered into or licence granted before the date of the present resolution;

6. Decides to establish, in accordance with rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure, a Committee of the Security Council consisting of all the members of the Council, to undertake the following tasks and to report on its work to the Council with its observations and recommendations:

(a) To examine the reports on the progress of the implementation of the present resolution which will be submitted by the Secretary-General;

(b) To seek from all States further information regarding the action taken by them concerning the effective implementation of the provisions laid down in the present resolution;

7. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully with the Committee in the fulfilment of its tasks, including supplying such information as may be sought by the Committee in pursuance of the present resolution;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all necessary assistance to the Committee and to make the necessary arrangements in the Secretariat for that purpose;

9. Decides that, notwithstanding paragraphs 4 to 8 above, nothing in the present resolution shall prohibit assistance to the legitimate Government of Kuwait, and calls upon all States:

(a) To take appropriate measures to protect assets of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and its agencies;

(b) Not to recognize any regime set up by the occupying Power;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution, the first report to be submitted within thirty days;

11. Decides to keep this item on its agenda and to continue its efforts to put an early end to the invasion by Iraq.

Decision of 9 August 1990 (2934th meeting):

By a letter dated 8 August 1990,²⁴ the representative of Kuwait requested that the Security Council immediately resume its consideration of the item entitled “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”, in the light of the declaration by Iraq of the purported annexation of Kuwait.

By a letter dated 8 August 1990,²⁵ the representatives of the six States members of the Gulf Cooperation Council — Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates — requested an immediate meeting of the Security Council to consider the situation between Iraq and Kuwait in the light of recent developments, most significantly the declaration by the Iraqi Revolutionary Command Council annexing the State of Kuwait to Iraq.

At its 2934th meeting, on 9 August 1990, the Council included the letter from the Gulf Cooperation Council in its agenda and resumed its consideration of the item. In accordance with the decisions taken at its 2932nd meeting, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table. The Council also invited the representative of Oman, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Romania) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.²⁶ He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.²⁷ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 662 (1990), which reads:

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990 and 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990,

Gravely alarmed by the declaration by Iraq of a “comprehensive and eternal merger” with Kuwait,

Demanding once again that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they were located on 1 August 1990,

Determined to bring the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq to an end and to restore the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Kuwait,

Determined also to restore the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait,

1. Decides that annexation of Kuwait by Iraq under any form and whatever pretext has no legal validity, and is considered null and void;

2. Calls upon all States, international organizations and specialized agencies not to recognize that annexation, and to refrain from any action or dealing that might be interpreted as an indirect recognition of the annexation;

3. Demands that Iraq rescind its actions purporting to annex Kuwait;

4. Decides to keep this item on its agenda and to continue its efforts to put an early end to the occupation.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States welcomed the unanimous adoption of resolution 662 (1990), deciding that Iraq’s annexation of Kuwait was null and void. The resolution was necessary because Iraq was attempting to extinguish the sovereignty of a State Member of the United Nations. The statement by the Iraqi Revolutionary Command Council was reminiscent of the rhetoric that had been used before — about the Rhineland, the Sudetenland, the Polish corridor, Mussolini’s invasion of Ethiopia and the Marco Polo Bridge incident in China. It had been used then to divide and swallow up sovereign States. The world community had not reacted, and the result had been global conflagration. Having finally learned the grim lesson of the 1930s — that peace was indivisible — the international community would not and could not let the same thing happen again. By the resolution just adopted, the Council reaffirmed that this crisis was not a regional matter alone, but one that threatened all States. The speaker added that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and its large military presence on the Saudi frontier created grave risks of further aggression in the area. He reported that his Government and others were, accordingly, at the request of Saudi Arabia, sending forces to the region to deter further Iraqi aggression. As his President had announced the day before, this action was entirely defensive in purpose, to help protect Saudi Arabia. The United States was in the course of informing the Council by letter of its action, taken under Article 51 of the Charter and consistently with Article 41 and resolution 661 (1990), which affirmed that Article 51 applied to the situation. The speaker concluded that the United States stood ready to return to the Security Council as circumstances warranted, to seek further action to implement resolution 660 (1990).²⁸

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his Government was alarmed about the escalating confrontation in the Gulf area caused by the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, the so-called merger of the two States, and the deployment of United States naval and air forces in Saudi Arabia. He reaffirmed the Soviet Union's firm opposition to reliance on force and to unilateral decisions, and stressed that experience had shown that the wisest way to act in conflict situations was through collective efforts, making full use of the machinery of the United Nations. Specifically, his Government favoured having the Security Council devote its attention to this extremely acute matter on a permanent basis. It was prepared to undertake consultations immediately in the Military Staff Committee, which, under the Charter of the United Nations, could perform very important functions.²⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the international community had been misled by Iraq in a most dramatic fashion. It had been told that Iraq had no intention of invading Kuwait; the invasion followed. It had been told that Iraq intended to withdraw; the annexation followed. Now it was told that Iraq had no ambitions elsewhere in the region. Against that background, any assertions of that kind must be regarded with legitimate suspicion and doubt. For its part, the Government of the United Kingdom, at the request of the Government of Saudi Arabia, had agreed to contribute forces to a multinational effort for the collective defence of Saudi Arabia and other threatened States in the area. It would do so in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, which was specifically reaffirmed in the preamble to resolution 661 (1990). The presence of British forces, particularly naval forces, in the area would be of added advantage in the context of securing the effective implementation of the embargo against Iraq through the close monitoring of maritime traffic. The speaker stressed, however, that even at this stage it was not too late for Iraq to implement Council resolutions 660 (1990) and 661 (1990) and avoid the impact of the sanctions. He reiterated, moreover, that the Council must continue to support the efforts of the League of Arab States, whose summit, it was hoped, would be able to point a way out of the crisis in accordance with resolution 660 (1990).³⁰

The representative of Cuba observed that while his delegation had no difficulty with the resolution just adopted, he wished to reiterate his country's conviction that the Security Council and the international community must act energetically and promptly to prevent the conflict from being exacerbated and from spreading. It could not be ignored that certain Powers were taking unilateral measures that were not in accordance with the Council's decisions, and had nothing to do with the desire to maintain the sovereignty or territorial integrity of Kuwait, but simply corresponded to their hegemonic designs in the Middle East. The speaker stressed that war and intervention in the region could not be justified on the basis of an arbitrary interpretation of the right to self-defence. He concluded by expressing the hope that the concerted efforts of the Arab States would result in a fair and swift solution to the conflict, thus closing the door on a unilateral approach designed solely to benefit certain great Powers.³¹

Other Council members who spoke strongly condemned and rejected Iraq's purported annexation of Kuwait.³² A number³³ underlined the Council's responsibility for taking the necessary action to secure the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, with some expressing support for such further decisions as might be required. Several speakers called upon all concerned parties to exercise restraint and to refrain from taking any other actions, including unilateral actions, which might further complicate the situation.³⁴ A number also voiced support for the efforts by the Arab States to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict.³⁵

The representative of Kuwait welcomed the resolution just unanimously adopted as a necessary response to Iraq's purported annexation of Kuwait. Kuwait believed the resolution's provisions to be within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter. It looked forward, moreover, to the Council's continued support in the implementation of resolutions 660 (1990) 661 (1990) and 662 (1990), thus upholding Kuwaiti legitimacy, the principles of the Charter, and international law.³⁶

The representative of Oman, speaking on behalf of the States members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, said that they fully supported the role of the United Nations and the Security Council in bringing about a peaceful solution to the conflict, and continued to recognize the legitimate Government of Kuwait, under the leadership of the Emir of Kuwait. They had themselves called upon Iraq to withdraw its forces immediately and unconditionally, in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Security Council. They also rejected the purported annexation and hoped that the resolution just adopted would send a clear message to the world that such an act was null and void.³⁷

The representative of Iraq maintained that the withdrawal of Iraq's forces from Kuwait had begun on 5 August 1990, as presaged in an official Government statement. However, some "international circles" did not want the withdrawal to proceed peacefully. They had accordingly brought pressure to bear on the international community and issued threats against his country, making it impossible for it to complete the withdrawal in a serene climate. The speaker dismissed the allegations that Iraq was acting against a neighbouring Arab country as without foundation. Iraq respected the territorial integrity of all neighbouring Arab States, including Saudi Arabia. Military intervention in the region was, in fact, the reason for the instability there. With regard to the resolution just adopted, the speaker wished to quote some passages from a resolution adopted by the Revolutionary Command Council in Iraq, the supreme authority of his country. It stated, inter alia, that Kuwait had been separated from Iraq by the former colonial powers. The Iraqi Revolutionary Command Council had simply decided to restore to Iraq the portion that had been taken away from it, thus re-establishing the territorial unity of the country. The speaker concluded by declaring that his Government reaffirmed that the unity of Iraq and Kuwait was indestructible; it was an eternal and irreversible unity.³⁸

By a letter dated 18 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹ the representative of Italy requested a meeting of the Council on the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, particularly on the question of foreign nationals in the two countries.

At its 2937th meeting, on 18 August 1990, the Council included the letter from the representative of Italy in its agenda. In accordance with the decisions taken at the 2932nd meeting, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table. It also invited the representative of Italy, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Romania) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 16 August 1990 from the representative of Kuwait addressed to the Secretary-General,⁴⁰ transmitting press reports concerning the inhumane activities of the Iraqi occupation forces against Kuwaiti citizens and foreign residents, and the massive destruction caused by the invading forces. The President also drew their attention to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴¹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen clarified that his delegation's vote in support of the draft resolution before the Council reflected its interest in the safety and well-being of all third-State nationals in Iraq and Kuwait, including Arab nationals. For similar humanitarian reasons, Yemen also called for the lifting of the embargo on food that had been imposed upon Iraq and Kuwait. It expressed concern, moreover, that the crisis in the region was becoming increasingly complicated because of the military and economic blockade that was being set up by one country against Iraq and Kuwait under Article 51 of the Charter. The speaker contended that the military blockade, established by one State without taking into consideration the role of the Security Council, was not defensive in character. He added that the military build-up in the region, an area close to his own country, went beyond the political objectives cited as a pretext for sending foreign armed forces to the region. Convinced of the interdependence of all problems in the region, his Government considered it necessary to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis, within an Arab context.⁴²

The draft resolution⁴³ was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 664 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the Iraqi invasion and purported annexation of Kuwait, and its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990 and 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990,

Deeply concerned about the safety and well-being of third-State nationals in Iraq and Kuwait,

Recalling the obligations of Iraq in this regard under international law,

Welcoming the efforts of the Secretary-General to pursue urgent consultations with the Government of Iraq following the concern and anxiety expressed by the members of the Council on 17 August 1990,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Demands that Iraq permit and facilitate the immediate departure from Kuwait and Iraq of third-State nationals and grant immediate and continuing access of consular officials to such nationals;

2. Also demands that Iraq take no action to jeopardize the safety, security or health of such nationals;

3. Reaffirms its decision in resolution 662 (1990) that annexation of Kuwait by Iraq is null and void, and therefore demands that the Government of Iraq rescind its orders for the closure of diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait and the withdrawal of the immunity of their personnel, and refrain from any such actions in the future;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on compliance with the present resolution at the earliest possible time.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States recalled that, the day before, the members of the Council had expressed their concern and anxiety over the situation of foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait. The Iraqi regime had responded with new actions and threats against those innocent people. The United States welcomed the Secretary-General's announcement that he would immediately send a special mission to the area. Baghdad, for its part, had continued to deny consular access to American and other nationals in Kuwait and Iraq; had begun to detain foreign nationals and to use them as "human shields" to protect strategic sites; and had announced that infants and the aged among them would be singled out for special food restrictions or denied food. While each of those actions was unacceptable to the international community, their cumulative effect was intolerable. No nation could allow such steps to be taken against its own citizens without the fullest possible response. This action by Iraq required the full and concerted solidarity of all States, as represented by the Council's unanimous adoption of the new resolution. The speaker concluded that the United States would support its full implementation.⁴⁴

The representative of China was similarly grateful for the Secretary-General's prompt response to the request by Council members to appoint representatives to engage in good offices in this matter. He also expressed his Government's deep concern about the mounting tension in the Gulf region and reiterated its view that military involvement by the great Powers was not conducive to the settlement of the crisis. Lastly, he pointed out that the meeting was focused on the consideration of the situation of foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait, rather than on the crisis as a whole. Therefore, although his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted, it expressed reservations about the reference in the resolution to Chapter VII of the Charter, which had broader implications.⁴⁵

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics noted that although the members of the Council, through the President of the Council, had the previous day expressed their concern at the fate of the foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait and requested the Secretary-General to take steps to resolve the matter, the situation continued to deteriorate. Nevertheless, the Soviet delegation was convinced that it was necessary to continue efforts to find an early solution to the problem, in accordance with the principles of humanitarianism and respect for human rights, on the basis of the norms of international law and the Charter of the United Nations. In that connection, it expressed its special hope for the success of the efforts of the Secretary-General and his representatives. At the same time, there was a broader issue: the possibility that events might develop in such a way as to lead to a new escalation of tension in the region with unforeseeable consequences. In that situation, it was important to stop military activities, to prevent them from spreading to other countries and to restore respect for international law. The Soviet Union was relying on the Arab States and their regional organization, as well as on the United Nations and the Security Council. It intended to act exclusively within the context of collective efforts for a settlement of the conflict, and wished to see political methods used to prevent a military confrontation involving even greater damage.⁴⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom stressed that the Council was concerned that day with a strictly humanitarian problem. Like previous speakers, he recalled that the previous day members of the Council had asked the President of the Council to express their concern and anxiety about the foreign nationals caught in Kuwait and Iraq to the Secretary-General and also to the representative of Iraq. That had been done and the Secretary-General had already decided to send two emissaries to the Government of

Iraq to secure the release of those who were caught in the two countries. Since then, there had been two acts which violated international law and outraged international opinion: the use of innocent foreign civilians as human shields at strategic sites; and the punishment of the hundreds of thousands of foreign civilians caught in Kuwait and Iraq, particularly the weakest members of that community — a retaliation of sorts against the Security Council for having adopted resolution 661 (1990), imposing economic sanctions upon Iraq. The United Kingdom had hoped for an Arab solution to this problem, noting that a particular role had been given to the Arab League in resolution 660 (1990); it still had a few lingering hopes in that regard. The speaker added that there had been some very sensible remarks about the wider dangers in the region, and appeals for negotiation. However, while a peaceful solution was desirable, he reminded Council members that the basis of any such negotiations must be the implementation of the demands made in the Council's resolution 660 (1990), paragraph 2, and resolution 662 (1990), paragraph 1.⁴⁷

A number of other Council members and the representative of Italy, on behalf of the 12 States members of the European Community, echoed the serious concern voiced by the Council about the untenable situation faced by nationals of third countries in Iraq and Kuwait, which they firmly denounced as a violation by Iraq of its obligations under international law, particularly under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Fourth Geneva Convention.⁴⁸ Several welcomed the diplomatic efforts, in particular those of the Secretary-General, to enable those third-country nationals who wished to do so to leave Iraq and Kuwait without delay.⁴⁹

The representative of Cuba said that his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 664 (1990) because it was based exclusively on legitimate humanitarian considerations. He stressed, however, that the same considerations should apply equally to the nationals of Iraq and Kuwait. He added that his Government had misgivings with regard to some of the elements of the resolution. Notably, it appeared to be rather one-sided. While asking Iraq to guarantee the health of foreign nationals, the resolution was silent on the main factor that could place at risk the ability of third-country nationals or the nationals of Iraq and Kuwait to get sufficient food and medicine, namely, the unilateral action by the United States in impeding the delivery of such products to Iraq and Kuwait, which was in violation of resolution 661 (1990). That resolution exempted from the embargo medicines and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs; it was not for the United States to determine when such circumstances existed. Furthermore, resolution 661 (1990) was based on Article 41 of the Charter, which referred to measures “not involving the use of armed force”. Yet, immediately after the adoption of the resolution, the United States Government — without any request or authorization — had sent its forces to the region to ensure its implementation. Subsequently, a “de facto naval blockade” had been put into place. Then, in a communication of 16 August 1990,⁵⁰ the representative of the United States had informed the members of the Council that the United States was applying blockade measures, under Article 51 of the Charter and Security Council resolution 661 (1990). The speaker insisted that that resolution did not authorize or request anyone to implement it by military means. Article 51 of the Charter, moreover, recognized the right to self-defence only “until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security”. The Charter was thus being amended here as the concept of self-defence was being invoked after the Council had taken the decisions it deemed appropriate. The speaker concluded that, in order to preserve its credibility and moral authority, the Council must ensure that its resolutions and decisions were implemented in the manner in which it itself decided.⁵¹

The representative of the United States made a further statement in response to the issue raised by the representative of Cuba concerning the application of Article 51 of the Charter. He stated that, in accordance with Article 51, he wished on behalf of his Government to report that the United States had deployed military forces to the Gulf region; that those forces had been dispatched in exercise of the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence, recognized in Article 51, in response to developments and requests from Governments in the region, including requests from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, for assistance; and that the application of that inherent right in response to the Iraqi armed attack on Kuwait had been affirmed in resolution 661 (1990), whose penultimate preambular paragraph he read out.⁵²

The representative of Kuwait observed that the resolution just adopted by the Council grappled with a political, legal and humanitarian issue of an unprecedented nature, involving millions of innocent citizens of various countries held hostage in Iraq and Kuwait. At a time when Iraq was calling for the easing of sanctions for humanitarian reasons, it threatened to deprive foreigners in Iraq of food, which was blackmail, and to use them as human shields. It was essential that the international community respond resolutely to stop such behaviour. Kuwait therefore fully supported the efforts of the Secretary-General aimed at finding a satisfactory solution to the problem of the detainees. The international community must, moreover, take more stringent measures to stop the Iraqi regime from trampling upon the norms on which that community was based. The whole world was looking to the Security Council. It was imperative to close ranks, to cooperate and to take joint action to protect the present and pave the way for a world free from aggression and from aggressors.⁵³

The representative of Iraq stated that he wished to draw attention to the position adopted by the United States and the United Kingdom concerning resolution 661 (1990), and their interpretation of how it was to be implemented. He asserted that the United States had arrogated to itself the right to impose a maritime blockade against Iraq without calling it that by name. It had announced on 10 August 1990 at a meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) that the United States had the right to resort to force in order to prevent any commercial relations between third States and Iraq. The United Kingdom had followed that example, announcing on 13 August that it would use its warships to prevent any violation of the sanctions imposed by resolution 661 (1990). In taking that action, both States had declared that they were acting in self-defence, on behalf of what they had called the legitimate Government of Kuwait; they had claimed that this entitled them to implement resolution 661 (1990). However, Article 51 only granted the right of self-defence until such time as the Security Council had taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. The Security Council had taken such measures by adopting resolution 661 (1990) and had established a Committee to guarantee its implementation. The speaker stated that, by their positions, the United States and the United Kingdom had altered the way in which the resolution was to be implemented. The machinery for implementation was no longer the invitation to States to implement the sanctions as they interpreted them, under the supervision of a committee established by the Council. Rather, the United States and the United Kingdom had transformed that machinery into a military blockade by force of arms, thereby appointing themselves the policemen of the region, acting in the name of the Security Council, under the cover of the United Nations, even though neither had granted them that right. Iraq vigorously protested against that conduct by the United States and the United Kingdom, which it believed constituted aggression against Iraq. In conclusion, the speaker stressed that Iraq would take no measure other than defending itself if it were attacked. The security and safety of foreign nationals were guaranteed if the United States and its allies guaranteed that they would not attack Iraq. However, if they persisted in their policy of aggression and attacked Iraq, then whatever the Iraqi people were subjected to would also be applied to its "foreign guests".⁵⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the statement by the representative of Iraq bore no relation to the concerns that had been expressed in the debate, or to the resolution which the Council had just adopted unanimously. He had rejected, or appeared to have rejected, the very strong message that the Council had given him at the meeting. The speaker hoped that the representative of Iraq and his Government would reflect carefully before they continued down that course.⁵⁵

By letters dated 24 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶ the representatives of the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Belgium requested, in identical terms, the convening of a meeting of the Council to consider the deteriorating situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the effective implementation of Security Council resolution 661 (1990).

By a letter also dated 24 August 1990 addressed to the President of the Council,⁵⁷ the representatives of the States members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, namely, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, requested that an immediate meeting of the Council be convened to discuss the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, for the purpose of considering the adoption of measures required to implement Security Council resolutions 660 (1990), 661 (1990) and 662 (1990).

At its 2938th meeting, on 25 August 1990, the Council included the six above-mentioned letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council, in accordance with decisions taken at its previous meetings, invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table; and invited the representatives of Italy and Oman to take seats at the side of the Council Chamber.

The President (Romania) drew the attention of members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Côte d'Ivoire, Finland, France, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire.⁵⁸ He also drew their attention to several other documents.⁵⁹

Speaking before the vote on the draft resolution, the representative of Yemen reiterated that his Government was continuing with efforts aimed at resolving the crisis peacefully, containing it within the region, and avoiding the use of force. In that context, Yemen found that the draft resolution moved too quickly towards the use of force to implement the provisions of Council resolution 661 (1990) on the embargo. It believed that the embargo was functioning effectively and would lead to negotiations on the implementation of resolution 660 (1990). In any event, under resolution 661 (1990), the Secretary-General had been asked to report to the Council on the progress of the implementation of the sanctions within 30 days, that is, by 4 September 1990. Why could the Security Council not wait for that report? Further, by paragraph 6 of the same resolution, the Council had established a Committee and requested it to report with its observations and recommendations regarding the implementation of the sanctions regime. That Committee had not yet reported to the Council. That was why Yemen believed there was an element of haste in the draft resolution. As to the substance of the resolution, it observed that for the first time in the history of the United Nations — and particularly in the history of the Security Council — “unclear powers were being granted to undertake unspecified actions without a clear definition of the Security Council’s role and powers of supervision over those actions”. Thus, the draft resolution called upon “States”, without identifying them, to exercise ambiguous powers in unspecified locations. Moreover, recourse to measures which might require some use of force might in itself lead to an engagement and a conflagration in the area. For those reasons, his delegation could not vote in favour of the draft resolution, while at the same time it approved its objectives.⁶⁰

The representative of Cuba raised various objections to the draft resolution. Although, like the previous speaker, he recognized the efforts made by the sponsors to improve the text, it remained unacceptable. He, too, was concerned with the haste to move on to the use of force: the Council had not yet determined that the measures it had previously decided upon had proved inadequate; nor had it received the Secretary-General’s first report on the implementation of resolution 661 (1990). He contended that, after the unilateral deployment of force in the area a few days previously, the Council was being asked to endorse a de facto situation which had not been authorized by it and which could not be legally justified. The wording of the draft resolution, moreover, had nothing to do with the concepts laid down in the Charter. On the contrary, it violated Articles 41, 42 and 46, and the first paragraphs of Articles 43, 47 and 48. Indeed, very few articles of Chapter VII of the Charter would be left inviolate if the Council adopted the draft resolution. It was not clear which countries would form part of the forces, who would command them, where or against whom. It was clear that such forces would be responsible to their immediate military commanders, but the Council was taking on an ambiguous responsibility because operative paragraph 1 stated “under the authority of the Security Council”. If the Council were really acting responsibly and seriously when it talked of using military force, then it should have drawn on those provisions of Chapter VII that clearly spelled out how that responsibility should be exercised. For instance, Article 46 provided that plans for the application of armed force “shall be made by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee”. However, although the Military Staff Committee was referred to in the draft resolution, it did not appear to have been meeting to draft any plan; nor did the speaker believe that the Council had convened it formally or informally to draw up any plan for the deployment of any forces anywhere. There was no indication, moreover, that the Council had requested certain States to make some of their military forces available to it, as envisaged in Article 43. The speaker also expressed concern about the presence of numerous air and land forces in the region, all operating under another plan than the maritime forces referred to in the draft resolution. He wondered whether the Council was also required to take responsibility for possible hostilities that might arise from the acts of forces not under its command. Finally, he stressed that, when the Council was dealing with matters of such gravity as the use of force to supposedly guarantee the implementation of its decisions, it must be extremely careful. In conclusion, he added that no decision taken by the Council could give it the political, legal or moral authority to undertake any kind of action that was in itself inhuman: that is, any action designed to deprive millions of innocent civilians of foodstuffs and medicines or medical assistance.⁶¹

The representative of Colombia welcomed the fact that the Security Council had for the first time

acted as envisaged by its creators to prevent and control a regional conflict. His country was gratified that the permanent members had reached agreement on intervening for that purpose. With regard to the draft resolution before the Council, he regretted the haste imposed on its drafting. While his delegation had no difficulty with the establishment of a naval blockade, apparently under Article 42 of the Charter, it shared some of the concerns expressed by the representatives of Cuba and Yemen over the fact that, under the draft resolution, the Security Council would be delegating authority without specifying to whom, or where that authority would be exercised. Colombia believed that, from the Council's point of view, the lack of preparedness to cope with a situation such as the prevailing one must be avoided in future. It accordingly believed that, after 45 years, the Security Council must finally implement Article 43 and the following articles of the Charter. The speaker concluded that, notwithstanding those comments, his delegation agreed with the substance of the draft resolution; it did not want to send an equivocal message to the Government of Iraq. It believed that there had been patent violations of resolution 661 (1990) that needed to be dealt with by the international community; and would therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁶²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen), as resolution 665 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990 and 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990 and demanding their full and immediate implementation,

Having decided in resolution 661 (1990) to impose economic sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Determined to bring to an end the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq which imperils the existence of a Member State, and to restore the legitimate authority and the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Kuwait, which requires the speedy implementation of the above-mentioned resolutions,

Deploring the loss of innocent lives stemming from the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and determined to prevent further such losses,

Gravely alarmed that Iraq continues to refuse to comply with resolutions 660 (1990), 661 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990) and in particular at the conduct of the Government of Iraq in using Iraqi flag vessels to export oil,

1. Calls upon those Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait which are deploying maritime forces to the area to use such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990);

2. Invites Member States accordingly to cooperate as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) with maximum use of political and diplomatic measures, in accordance with paragraph 1 above;

3. Requests all States to provide, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, such assistance as may be required by the States referred to in paragraph 1 above;

4. Also requests the States concerned to coordinate their actions in pursuit of the above paragraphs of the present resolution using, as appropriate, mechanisms of the Military Staff Committee and, after consultation with the Secretary-General, to submit reports to the Security Council and the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, in order to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the present resolution;

5. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the Charter of the United Nations had been founded on the fundamental principle that the Security Council would carry a broad responsibility for the people of the world for international peace and security. The Charter empowered the Council to act in that regard, including by giving it the authority to decide to use armed force. The authority granted in the resolution just adopted was sufficiently broad to use armed force — indeed, minimum force — depending on the circumstances. Pointing out that the Council's authority to use force had rarely been exercised in the past, the speaker said that resolution 665 (1990) represented an historic and significant decision. The Council had been compelled to take that step by Iraq's blatant defiance of the Security Council and its evasion of its resolutions. The speaker stressed that no solution to the crisis could be reached without the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces. While efforts must continue to bring about a peaceful solution, the United States,

together with all the other members of the Council, intended to ensure that its resolutions were observed. By the resolution just adopted, the members of the Council had emphasized again their commitment to the peaceful means already adopted. They had no intention that the resolution should encourage a military escalation. It applied strictly to efforts to ensure that the trade sanctions were not violated. The speaker added that the United States had vigorously sought and fully supported collective efforts to respond to the crisis, and to enforce the trade sanctions strictly. Its naval forces, in coordination with others in the area, would use such minimum force only as necessary for that purpose. The United States delegation would continue discussions with other members of the Council concerning how best to apply the economic sanctions against Iraq, and was ready to discuss an appropriate role in the process for the Military Staff Committee. The speaker observed that a number of Member States had already sent naval forces to the region to ensure that the sanctions were effective. They had done so before the adoption of the latest resolution, at the request of the legitimate Government of Kuwait — requests made fully in accordance with the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence confirmed in Article 51 of the Charter and consistent with resolution 661 (1990). That resolution specifically affirmed the exercise of that right in response to the Iraqi armed attack on Kuwait. The new resolution — 665 (1990) — addressed the application of the mandatory sanctions of resolution 661 (1990) specifically against maritime shipping. It lent the full weight and authority of the Security Council to the efforts of States that were deploying maritime forces to ensure that the sanctions were respected. It did not address other aspects of sanctions or other provisions of resolution 661 (1990), and so clearly did not diminish the legal authority of Kuwait and other States to exercise their inherent right. Resolution 665 (1990) therefore provided an additional and most welcome basis under United Nations authority for actions to secure compliance with the sanctions mandated by resolution 661 (1990). The speaker concluded by urging the Council to continue to stand firm in its resolve to confront Iraq's wanton aggression and to preserve the principles enshrined in the Charter.⁶³

The representative of France said that Iraq's attempts to violate the embargo threatened to diminish

the impact of resolution 661 (1990), the only peaceful means of compelling it to comply with the other Council resolutions. Quoting the President of France, who on 21 August 1990 had stated that "an embargo without sanctions would be a fiction", he affirmed that France accepted the need to apply coercion when necessary to ensure respect for the embargo. He emphasized that the resolution just adopted was not a blanket authorization for the indiscriminate use of force, but a means of ensuring respect for the embargo. It authorized verification of cargoes and destinations of maritime shipping and provided for appropriate measures to be taken in that regard, including the minimum use of force. The Government of France believed that this naturally must take place only as a last resort and be limited to what was strictly necessary. In each case, the use of coercion would require notification of the Security Council. In conclusion, the speaker stated that, while the international community had the responsibility for ensuring respect for the universal principles governing relations among States, it was within the framework of the Arab community that a concrete solution could best be found to the problems that had led to the Iraq-Kuwait crisis. Any such solution must of course be based on the Council's resolutions.⁶⁴

The representative of Canada said that the invasion of Kuwait, followed by Iraq's escalating violations of the rules of international law, represented one of the most serious threats to international peace and security that humankind had faced since the signing of the Charter in 1945. At the same time, the five resolutions adopted by the Council without any dissent showed clearly the transformation of the United Nations, which was rediscovering its true mission, as conceived at San Francisco. The resolution just adopted had been made necessary by the consistent and continuing refusal of Iraq to abide by the binding decisions of the Council. Its primary objective was to bring about respect by Iraq for the rule of law. Canada very much hoped that a peaceful solution to the crisis could be found, but stressed that such a solution could be based only on compliance with the resolutions of the Council.⁶⁵

The representative of Malaysia stated that no one could give any definitive assurance on the action

contemplated in the resolution just adopted; the litmus test would be its implementation. Clearly, however, the course of action to be taken crossed a line from applying sanctions to a readiness to apply force, if necessary, to ensure compliance. The speaker noted that, as a member of the Non-Aligned Movement, his country was averse to having military forces from outside Powers deployed in other regions, even on the basis of legitimate appeals by aggrieved parties. It expected, therefore, that the reasons for the presence of those forces would swiftly be removed and that they would quickly leave the scene. He also observed that the link in the resolution between the countries referred to in paragraph 1 and the United Nations was not as satisfactorily spelled out as one would have wished. However, given the present realities, it was not realistic to suppose that there could be an international force under a blue flag policing and enforcing United Nations injunctions. Given the need to ensure the effectiveness of sanctions, the Security Council must be content with only the beginning of United Nations control action, although Malaysia and others would have preferred a more assertive and prominent role for the United Nations. Faced, however, with the need for urgent redress to ensure the survival of a country, Malaysia had judged that resolution 665 (1990) was preferable to protracted debates in pursuit of a perfect resolution. It was determined, though, that the Council's commitment to effective sanctions should be matched by a commitment to ensure that the resolution's implementation was kept within strict parameters: no licence had been given for action beyond that provided for in paragraph 1 of the resolution. Lastly, Malaysia underlined the need to continue diplomatic and political initiatives, calling on the Secretary-General and the Arab countries to make even greater efforts in this regard.⁶⁶

The representative of Zaire observed that the resolution just adopted was a "first" in the history of the United Nations, which responded to a case unique in the annals of the Organization. It was the first case of an invasion of a State Member of the United Nations, followed by annexation of all of its territory, by another Member State. He hoped that resolution 665 (1990) would be a useful deterrent which would oblige

Iraq to respect the Council's decisions and induce it to withdraw from Kuwait unconditionally.⁶⁷

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics underlined the importance of maintaining a high degree of unity in the actions taken by members of the Security Council and of the United Nations as a whole in dealing with the difficult and explosive situation prevailing in the Gulf region. The stress must continue to be placed on methods of dialogue and negotiation. That would further strengthen the authority of the Organization and enhance the prestige of the Council. The Soviet Union supported the resolution just adopted because it favoured that kind of approach. The resolution was intended to expand the array of means available for implementing the sanctions; but it required that the measures taken be commensurate to the specific circumstances. Political and diplomatic methods should be employed to the maximum degree. It was also important that the Security Council should continue to deal with this extremely grave problem on an ongoing basis. The Soviet Union was prepared to make full use of the opportunities afforded by the machinery of the Military Staff Committee and of the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990). The speaker concluded that the swift unfolding of events made it imperative to show prudence and caution and not to permit reliance on forcible measures and actions that could give rise to explosive developments.⁶⁸

The representative of Finland stated that his country and other States Members of the United Nations had set their hopes on the application of the principle of collective security in the face of aggression. Regrettably, on many past occasions, effective actions had been thwarted by disagreements and a lack of political will. On this occasion, by contrast, the whole international community seemed to be determined that collective security should work and that the aggressor should not benefit from aggression. So long as the occupation continued, the first concern of the international community must be to ensure that sanctions were strictly enforced. It was only logical, therefore, that the Council should now strengthen its role in their implementation. The resolution just adopted, in authorizing further measures at sea by

Member States to ensure strict enforcement of resolution 661 (1990), was an unprecedented decision with far-reaching implications. The speaker insisted, therefore, that any concrete action by the naval forces concerned would require close attention to ensure that they served the purposes intended by the Council. Finland saw the new measures as strictly limited to the framework of resolution 661 (1990), strengthening its implementation.⁶⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom considered that the reaction of the Council to the crisis had been exemplary; it showed a new spirit — a creative approach of the international community in dealing with an unprecedented crisis. The resolution just adopted enlarged the means available to Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait: “to use such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council ...”. He stressed that those measures included such minimum force as might be necessary to achieve the purposes of the just cited paragraph 1. Naturally, his country hoped that it would not be necessary to use force. He added that the resolution was the result of mounting evidence of breaches of sanctions on a large scale. Some of that evidence had been furnished to the Committee on economic sanctions. The United Kingdom was also aware that there was a string of tankers carrying Iraqi oil from Iraqi ports outwards from the Gulf. If those open acts of defiance succeeded, the authority of the Council, and of the United Nations itself, would be gravely undermined. In adopting resolution 665 (1990), the Council had chosen the best course for dealing with such maritime breaches of economic sanctions. The speaker noted, however, that sufficient legal authority to take action already existed under Article 51 of the Charter and the request which his Government and others had received from the Government of Kuwait; if necessary, they would use it. Noting that the resolution just adopted did not cover all aspects of the problem, he stated that whether the Council considered further measures and proceeded to other resolutions depended primarily on the Government of Iraq. That Government must recognize and respect the will of the international community, as expressed through the Council. It should not doubt the international community’s determination to see the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate authority in that country, and to hold members of the Government of Iraq personally responsible for the outrages being committed in Kuwait.⁷⁰

The representative of China stated that the pressing need of the moment was to implement effectively the four Security Council resolutions already adopted, including resolution 661 (1990), on the imposition of sanctions. In order to do so and to prevent a further worsening of the situation, China maintained that the mechanisms of the United Nations, including the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990), should be fully utilized. That Committee should expeditiously examine the implementation of the resolution and make recommendations for the Council to discuss and act upon. China also hoped to see mediation and the exercise of good offices by the United Nations Secretary-General in this regard, and would support him in playing such a role. Contrariwise, China was opposed, in principle, to military involvement by big Powers and did not favour the use of force in the name of the United Nations, since that would only aggravate the situation. It therefore held that measures must be taken within the framework of resolution 661 (1990), which did not provide for the use of force, and would naturally not allow force to be used for its implementation. Based on those considerations, the speaker’s delegation had proposed the deletion of the reference to “minimum use of force” from the previous draft of the resolution just adopted. He stressed that the present text of the resolution was limited to the implementation of resolution 661 (1990) and contained no reference to the minimum use of force. He added that, in China’s view, the reference in paragraph 1 of resolution 665 (1990) to using “such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary” did not contain the concept using force. Based on the foregoing, China had voted in favour of the draft resolution.⁷¹

Several other Council members, echoing the views of previous speakers, stated that, in the face of Iraq’s continued defiance of the Council’s resolutions, it was imperative that the Council take appropriate action to enforce compliance.⁷² Through the resolution just adopted, they intended not only to meet the existing shortcomings in the means available to implement earlier resolutions, but also to impress upon Iraq that the international community could not wait indefinitely. Some stressed that the new steps to be taken must be implemented under the authority of the Security Council.⁷³

The representative of Kuwait stated that, by calling for the use of all possible means, including the military option, to tighten the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq, resolution 665 (1990) closed the loopholes in the resolution imposing the embargo, which had been exploited by the Iraqi regime. It would thus contribute to the attainment of Kuwait's legitimate demands that its entire territory and its legitimate Government be restored to it. With regard to calls — made in the Council Chamber and elsewhere — for an Arab solution of the issue, he recalled that his Government had indeed sought to settle the whole problem within an Arab framework, both before and after the invasion and occupation of his country. Iraq had, however, rejected the demands that it withdraw its forces, unconditionally, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the Arab Foreign Ministers on 2 August 1990 and the resolutions subsequently adopted by the Arab Summit and the Foreign Ministers of Muslim countries. The speaker rejected, moreover, Iraq's accusation that the international community was acting in haste. On the contrary, Kuwait's desire to safeguard the interests of its homeland and the safety of its people under occupation had prompted it to move slowly, towards the tightening of the embargo measures and the closing of all the loopholes. He added, further, that any attempt by Iraq to invoke humanitarian considerations to seek exemptions for food and medicine from the embargoed goods was only a pretext to camouflage malicious designs. All the humanitarian problems arising from aggression and occupation would be resolved once the Iraqi occupation was brought to an end. That could only happen if there were firm international solidarity, which would contribute to forcing the aggressor to implement Council resolution 660 (1990).⁷⁴

The representative of Oman, on behalf of the States members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, regretted that Iraq had failed to heed the calls of the international community and the resolutions of the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to work towards a peaceful solution of the situation by withdrawing from Kuwait and restoring the legitimate authority of Kuwait. That was why his Government had joined with other States in asking the Security Council to convene the current meeting and to look into necessary measures for the implementation of its relevant resolutions, especially resolution 661 (1990), in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter. The Gulf Cooperation Council countries welcomed, in this regard, the adoption of resolution 665 (1990), while continuing to call upon Iraq to accept all the previous resolutions in order to avoid unforeseen dangers to its people and the whole region.⁷⁵

The representative of Iraq said that he had asked to speak before the voting in order to show the "illegality" of resolution 665 (1990) under the Charter of the United Nations, but that the President had denied him that privilege without citing either a precedent or a rule of procedure. He was pleased, however, that the representative of Cuba had highlighted the illegal aspect of the resolution in his statement. The resolution contravened the Charter in two respects. First, resolution 661 (1990) was based on Article 41 of the Charter, which ruled out the use of force to implement economic measures decided by the Security Council. That reservation was emphasized by the fact that five members of the Council which voted in favour of resolution 665 (1990) or abstained from voting on it had expressed doubts about its applicability and appropriateness. The representative of China had stated that he had voted in favour while convinced that it did not authorize the use of force to implement the embargo. Secondly, any use of force in accordance with the Charter fell under the provisions of Article 42 and subsequent articles — especially those that limited the use of force to the Security Council, in cooperation with the Military Staff Committee. However, resolution 665 (1990) avoided invoking the authority and purview of the Security Council under Article 42. The Council had no right to deprive itself of its own authority, or to delegate that authority to a number of States. The resolution was, moreover, very dangerous: it lay down no logical basis for or limits on the use of force, and gave no real authority to the Security Council, the Military Staff Committee, the Security Council Committee concerned or the Secretary-General in supervising the use of force by maritime States. The speaker noted that many of the previous speakers had referred to the importance of continuing diplomatic efforts, especially through the Arab Group. However, it was clear that through their behaviour — in requesting meetings of the Security Council, in the hasty adoption of unjust resolutions and in holding meetings at short notice — the United States and its allies had slammed the door on any peaceful solution. He drew attention to the provocative nature of the massive deployment of troops by the latter and the blockade imposed upon the Iraqi people, and concluded by sounding a warning concerning aggression against Iraq.⁷⁶

Decisions of 13 September 1990 (2939th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution and adoption of resolution 666 (1990)

At its 2939th meeting, held on 13 September 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council adopted the agenda item entitled “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”. The Council invited the representative of Kuwait, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the Council members to two draft resolutions, one submitted by Cuba;⁷⁷ the other submitted by Canada, Finland, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States.⁷⁸

He said that, in accordance with rule 32 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council,⁷⁹ he would put the draft resolution submitted by Cuba to the vote first.⁸⁰ It received 3 votes in favour (China, Cuba, Yemen), 5 against (Canada, Finland, France, United Kingdom, United States) and 7 abstentions (Colombia, Côte d’Ivoire, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Romania, Soviet Union, Zaire) and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the required number of votes.

Under that draft resolution, the Council would have declared that the access to basic foodstuffs and to adequate medical assistance was a fundamental human right to be protected under all circumstances and would have decided, accordingly, that under no circumstances should actions be taken, including those resulting from the implementation of Security Council decisions such as resolutions 661 (1990) and 665 (1990), that might hinder access of the civilian population and the foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait to basic foodstuffs and medical assistance.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the draft resolution in the spirit of humanitarianism. China believed that the provision of foodstuffs to the civilian population and foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait should be carried out within the framework of resolution 661 (1990), that is, in humanitarian circumstances. China itself favoured the adoption of a resolution establishing information-seeking and food-distribution mechanisms; its vote in favour of the draft resolution did not change that position.⁸¹

The Council then proceeded to the vote on the second draft resolution before it.⁸² Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen said that his Government was complying with resolution 661 (1990), in accordance with Article 25 of the Charter, despite the fact that Yemen, as a member of the Council, had not voted in favour of it. He affirmed his Government’s understanding that paragraph 3 (c) of resolution 661 (1990) exempted medical supplies and foodstuffs, for humanitarian reasons, from the embargo imposed against Iraq and Kuwait. That resolution could not be used to starve the weak and innocent in those two countries, as a way to achieve political ends, since such methods would contradict many international humanitarian agreements. Such a policy might not, moreover, induce Iraq to implement the Council’s resolutions but, on the contrary, would only harm innocent civilians. With regard to the draft resolution before the Council, Yemen believed that, while it was an attempt to deal with the humanitarian circumstances mentioned in resolution 661 (1990), it was based on a very narrow interpretation. Yemen considered, moreover, that the procedure it envisaged for obtaining information about the food situation, for deciding whether to send food, and for distributing food through international humanitarian agencies was time-consuming and cumbersome. The speaker noted, further, that the draft resolution excluded bilateral efforts to send food to Iraq and Kuwait. Yet the Government of Iraq had stated that it would not allow international humanitarian agencies to transport or distribute food themselves and that it would only deal on a bilateral basis. In this regard, he thanked the sponsors of the draft resolution for accepting an amendment under which the Secretary-General was requested to use his good offices to facilitate the delivery and distribution of foodstuffs to Iraq and Kuwait. In sum, however, his country could not accept the proposed plan, which would put at risk the lives of millions of innocent civilians, and would not therefore vote in favour of the draft resolution.⁸³

The representative of Cuba said that his Government had various reasons for not being in agreement with the draft resolution before the Council. In particular, it regarded as completely inadmissible the idea of depriving peoples of their fundamental right to receive adequate food and appropriate medical care. Resolution 661 (1990) had at least contained reference to the possibility of supplying foodstuffs in humanitarian circumstances. However, the speaker noted that members of the Council had spent countless hours trying to define the criteria for interpreting the clauses of that resolution. At the same time, the Council had received information from various sources concerning the consequences for thousands of innocent individuals, and appeals from the representatives of various countries to deal with the situation. Not only had the Security Council not responded to those appeals; under the draft resolution it proposed to establish non-urgent machinery for obtaining and analysing information about the situation — a tortuous path with regard to imperative needs and requests for food received from various Member States. The draft resolution would thus, in effect, extend and reinforce the sanctions against Iraq and Kuwait to include foodstuffs; Cuba could not therefore support it.⁸⁴

The second draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes in favour to 2 against (Cuba, Yemen) as resolution 666 (1990), which reads:

⁸⁴ Ibid., pp. 18-36.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, paragraphs 3 (c) and 4 of which apply, except in humanitarian circumstances, to foodstuffs,

Recognizing that circumstances may arise in which it will be necessary for foodstuffs to be supplied to the civilian population in Iraq or Kuwait in order to relieve human suffering,

Noting that in this respect the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait has received communications from several Member States,

Emphasizing that it is for the Security Council, alone or acting through the Committee, to determine whether humanitarian circumstances have arisen,

Deeply concerned that Iraq has failed to comply with its obligations under Security Council resolution 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990 in respect of the safety and well-being of third-State nationals, and reaffirming that Iraq retains full responsibility in this regard under international humanitarian law including, where applicable, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that in order to make the necessary determination whether or not, for the purposes of paragraphs 3 (c) and 4 of resolution 661 (1990), humanitarian circumstances have arisen, the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait shall keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under constant review;

2. Expects Iraq to comply with its obligations under resolution 664 (1990) in respect of third-State nationals and reaffirms that Iraq remains fully responsible for their safety and well-being in accordance with international humanitarian law including, where applicable, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,

3. Requests, for the purposes of paragraphs 1 and 2 above, that the Secretary-General seek urgently, and on continuing basis, information from relevant United Nations and other appropriate humanitarian agencies and all other sources on the availability of food in Iraq and Kuwait, such information to be communicated by the Secretary-General to the Committee regularly,

4. Also requests that in seeking and supplying such information particular attention be paid to such categories of persons who might suffer specially, such as children under 15 years of age, expectant mothers, maternity cases, the sick and the elderly;

5. Decides that if the Committee, after receiving the reports from the Secretary-General, determines that circumstances have arisen in which there is an urgent humanitarian need to supply foodstuffs to Iraq or Kuwait in order to relieve human suffering, it will report promptly to the Council its decision as to how such need should be met;

6. Directs the Committee that in formulating its decisions it should bear in mind that foodstuffs should be provided through the United Nations in cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross or other appropriate humanitarian agencies and distributed by them or under their supervision, in order to ensure that they reach the intended beneficiaries;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to use his good offices to facilitate the delivery and distribution of foodstuffs to Kuwait and Iraq in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution and other relevant resolutions;

8. Recalls that resolution 661 (1990) does not apply to supplies intended strictly for medical purposes, but in this connection recommends that medical supplies should be exported under the strict supervision of the Government of the exporting State or by appropriate humanitarian agencies.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States said that his country had voted in favour of resolution 666 (1990) because it guaranteed the integrity of United Nations efforts to end Iraq's occupation of Kuwait by peaceful means. The resolution gave a strong role to the sanctions Committee in supporting the Council's work in applying sanctions against Iraq. It established a process that included consideration by the Committee of the food situation inside Iraq and Kuwait, and set out a procedure for the distribution of relief supplies of food under the supervision of appropriate humanitarian agencies. It also stressed that medical supplies were to be provided only under the supervision of the Government of the country from which they had been exported. The speaker emphasized that those safeguards were essential, not optional, as the Council could not count on the good faith of the Government of Iraq. Moreover, that Government had stated its intention to allocate foodstuffs not to the needy but to the army it had sent to Kuwait, and it had so far refused cooperation with humanitarian agencies. For those reasons, it had become incumbent upon the Council, in promoting the effectiveness of sanctions against Iraq, to lay down procedures to ensure that food supplies reached those for whom they were intended. The mechanisms established ensured that the international community was ready to respond to cases of genuine human need without destroying the strength of the sanctions designed to secure Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait. By contrast, the draft resolution submitted by Cuba, and not adopted by the Council, sought to ignore the clear terms of resolution 661 (1990) and the choice made by the Council in favour of economic sanctions as the response to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Rather than strengthening the sanctions by ensuring that the legitimate needs of the civilian population were met, it would have discredited sanctions as the Council's chosen instrument.⁸⁵

The representative of China stated that, on the question of delivering foodstuffs to Iraq in humanitarian circumstances, his delegation had taken the following as its point of departure: first, resolution 661 (1990) should be strictly implemented so as to urge Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait, thereby paving the way for a political settlement of the Gulf crisis; and secondly, no situation should occur in which people in those two countries, particularly children, suffered from hunger. Proceeding from that position, China had found the draft resolution generally acceptable and had thus voted in favour of it. The speaker stressed, however, that the information-seeking and food-distribution mechanisms provided in the resolution just adopted should in no circumstances cause any impediment or delay in the delivery of food. He added that the situation with which the Council was now faced was an urgent one, in response to which it must be prepared to take whatever emergency measures were necessary. Citing the critical predicament faced by Asian nationals in Iraq and Kuwait as a case in point, he said it was imperative for the Council and its sanctions Committee to solve this type of problem as a priority without delay.⁸⁶

The representative of France condemned Iraq's attempts to bypass the embargo imposed on it by the international community by using the distress of a foreign population it was doing nothing to help. While the Iraqi leaders had been asserting that they had several months' worth of foodstuff reserves, hundreds of thousands of foreigners were in a situation of critical shortage. The real solution to this problem lay in the speediest possible evacuation of those concerned, as provided for in resolution 664 (1990). Unable, however, to return to their countries, those concerned must be able to receive from abroad the food that Iraq had denied them. Security Council resolution 661 (1990) moreover, stipulated that foodstuffs could be sent to Iraq and Kuwait in humanitarian circumstances. Obviously, such supplies must be delivered in strict compliance with that resolution — that is, they must not contravene the embargo and must truly respond to humanitarian considerations without risk of diversion. The resolution just adopted provided a clearly defined framework of action for the Council and its Sanctions Committee, which contained two key elements: it was indispensable that the Committee have available to it objective and impartial information on the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait, in particular with regard to children and other vulnerable persons; and it was essential that the foodstuffs supplied reached the intended beneficiaries, which could only be guaranteed if their shipment and distribution were carried out under close supervision by international organizations. France hoped that there would be movement towards Iraqi acceptance of the role of such organizations, and that Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan, whom the Secretary-General had just entrusted with the task of coordinating United Nations humanitarian actions in the region, would be able speedily to discharge his mission.⁸⁷

The representative of Canada welcomed the adoption by the Council, by an overwhelming majority, of a resolution dealing with one of the most tragic aspects of the situation in Iraq and Kuwait. Like previous speakers, he noted that it established a framework by which the Council and its Sanctions Committee would determine the existence of humanitarian circumstances which required foodstuffs to be supplied to the civilian population in Iraq or Kuwait; and stressed the need for such supplies to be provided through appropriate humanitarian agencies and distributed by them or under their supervision: only in that way could the Council be sure that the foodstuffs would reach their intended beneficiaries, including the most disadvantaged individuals. He called upon the Government of Iraq to cooperate fully with Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan, the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General for humanitarian assistance relating to the crisis, and to facilitate the early and full implementation of the resolution just adopted.⁸⁸

⁸⁸ Ibid., pp. 53-55.

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the Security Council was faced with yet a further breach by Iraq of international law and of its international obligations. The Government of Iraq was refusing to supply food to the poorest and most vulnerable of the third-country nationals in Kuwait, the workers from a number of Asian countries. At the same time, it was boasting that it still had considerable supplies of basic foodstuffs. Iraqi objectives were clear: by provoking a human tragedy, it was seeking to open a breach in the sanctions which the Council had imposed upon it. The resolution just adopted was designed to avoid such an outcome while at the same time meeting the real humanitarian needs of those innocent victims, as was clearly intended when the sanctions were imposed. The Council was laying down guidelines to enable food to be supplied when it could be objectively established that a humanitarian need existed, as had been established, for example, in the case of the Indian and other nationals from Asian countries. The speaker emphasized, as had other speakers, that the supervision of the supply of food must be in the hands of the United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross or other appropriate humanitarian agencies: a regime which, as an occupying Power, had looted medical supplies and equipment from Kuwait was likely to have little compunction about diverting food supplies from those in real need towards its own military.⁸⁹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, recalled that from the beginning of the crisis his country had expressed its unequivocal preference for a diplomatic solution, based on the full use of the machinery and potential of the United Nations. It had considered resolution 661 (1990) to be a necessary and severe lever for collectively influencing Iraq in view of its continuing occupation of Kuwait and its flouting of norms of international law. The Soviet delegation had been aware that the implementation of the comprehensive sanctions would create serious economic, social and humanitarian problems for many States, including its own. However, the Council could not lose sight of the fact that the fundamental reason for those problems was the continuing occupation and annexation of Kuwait by Iraq — not the sanctions adopted as a result of those actions. It was clear, moreover, that the sanctions were not aimed at causing hunger and disease among the populations of Iraq and Kuwait. On the contrary, as emphasized in a recent joint communiqué, issued by the Presidents of the Soviet Union and the United States, resolution 661 (1990) permitted the export of foodstuffs to Iraq and Kuwait for humanitarian considerations. In the light of these considerations, the Soviet Union viewed the resolution just adopted as embodying the internationally recognized need for procedures to allow for the humanitarian provision of foodstuffs and medical supplies to those two countries. The Soviet delegation had, therefore, actively participated in its preparation and supported it. It had been unable, on the other hand, to support the draft resolution submitted by Cuba since it clearly departed from the spirit and purposes and specific provisions adopted by the Council in resolution 661 (1990).⁹⁰

The other members of the Council stated that, by the resolution just adopted, the Council had demonstrated that it was aware of and attentive to the humanitarian concerns that could arise from the strict application of the sanctions imposed against Iraq.⁹¹ They welcomed the establishment of a clearer framework for considering and responding quickly to problems pertaining to the provision of foodstuffs to the civilian population of Iraq and Kuwait, particularly third-country nationals stranded there, although one would have wished for a more efficient system.

The representative of Kuwait stressed the following points in connection with the resolution just adopted. First, the plight of the Kuwaiti people should be kept in mind in any consideration of solutions to humanitarian questions and the effects of the brutality of the aggressor. While his country had great sympathy for the third-country nationals in Kuwait, their plight should not deflect attention from the basic problem — that is, the problem of the Kuwaitis: their food, safety, rights and land. Secondly, Kuwait had no confidence in the occupying Power. The latter should not be given any role in determining the needs of the Kuwaiti population or in regard to the distribution of food. The competent international organizations should carry out that humanitarian task. Thirdly, in no circumstances should these humanitarian questions — important, indeed vital, as they were — deflect international attention from the crux of the question: the continued Iraqi occupation of Kuwait and Iraq's refusal to comply with international law by implementing the Security Council resolutions. The speaker observed that the measures the Council had taken since the aggression had begun were appropriate to the situation. He added, however, that it was now called upon to "turn up the heat" on Iraq to bring it to comply with the Council's resolutions and withdraw from Kuwait so that Kuwait's legitimate Government could be restored.⁹²

By 18 separate letters dated 15 September 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹³ the representatives of, respectively, France, Italy, Canada, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, Finland, Austria, Hungary, Spain, the Netherlands, Greece, Ireland, Sweden, Norway, Portugal, Australia and Luxembourg requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, in view of the grave violations of international law and of the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations which Iraq had committed by forcibly entering the premises of the embassies of France and other countries in Kuwait and abducting diplomatic personnel and foreign nationals.

At its 2940th meeting, on 16 September 1990, the Council included the 18 letters in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq, Italy and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew attention to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Côte d'Ivoire, Finland, France, the United Kingdom and Zaire.⁹⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of France explained that his country had called for the immediate convening of the Council in order to consider without delay events of particular gravity that had just occurred in Kuwait. In recent days, Iraq had violated international law and the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations by forcibly entering the diplomatic premises of several countries, some of them members of the Council, and removing from them diplomatic personnel and persons not enjoying diplomatic status. In the residence of the French Ambassador, the Iraqi army had apprehended the Military Attaché of France and three other French nationals not enjoying diplomatic status. Although the former had been released, the others had joined the numerous foreigners held hostage in Iraq and Kuwait. This was a new intolerable act of aggression by Iraq, which was aimed at the international community as a whole. It compounded the initial aggression by Iraq against Kuwait and the second aggression constituted by the taking hostage of several thousand people of various nationalities. The purpose of these latest actions was clear: by attacking diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait, Iraq was seeking the obliteration of that State. The speaker underlined the importance of the main features of the draft resolution. The Council must act vigorously and swiftly, by firmly condemning the violations that had just been committed and by demanding that Iraq immediately release not only the persons just kidnapped but all foreign nationals that had been taken hostage. It must ensure the success of the strategy chosen by the international community, namely, the embargo — by recalling that it must be strictly respected and its implementation monitored with vigilance. Finally, the Council must send Iraq a clear warning that, in view of its persistent refusal to comply with Security Council resolutions, the international community was determined to adopt other measures. The speaker concluded that it was essential that the international community continue to stand firm against all new acts contrary to international law and to the resolutions of the Council perpetrated by Iraq. He accordingly called upon the members of the Council to support the draft resolution before them.⁹⁵

The representatives of Canada — whose ambassadorial residence had also been unlawfully entered and a diplomat detained — China, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland (speaking on behalf of the five Nordic countries: Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden), Malaysia, Romania, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire, and the President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, expressed support for the draft resolution which they either sponsored or endorsed. The representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stressed the warning, contained in paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, that Iraq's failure to respond appropriately and without delay would lead the Council to adopt "further concrete measures", with some calling for immediate consultations to that end. The representative of China expressed a reservation concerning that formulation, the implications of which China found too wide and not conducive to the efforts of all parties in seeking a political settlement. The representative of Malaysia interpreted the significance of paragraph 6 as a collective determination to continue to take action through the Security Council and not unilaterally, and without any need at that stage "to resort to more force".⁹⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 667 (1990), which reads:

Reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990 and 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990,

Recalling the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961 and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963, to both of which Iraq is a party,

Considering that the decision of Iraq to order the closure of diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait and to withdraw the privileges and immunities of these missions and their personnel is contrary to the decisions of the Security Council, the international conventions mentioned above and international law,

Deeply concerned that Iraq, notwithstanding the decisions of the Council and the provisions of the conventions mentioned above, had committed acts of violence against diplomatic missions and their personnel in Kuwait,

Outraged at recent violations by Iraq of diplomatic premises in Kuwait and at the abduction of personnel enjoying diplomatic immunity and foreign nationals who were present in these premises, ⁹⁶ Ibid., pp. 7-10 (Canada); pp. 11-12 (United Kingdom); p. 12 (Malaysia); pp. 13-15 (Finland); p. 16 (Zaire); pp. 16-17 (China); pp. 18-19 (Côte d'Ivoire); pp. 19-21 (United States); pp. 21-23 (Romania); pp. 23-26 (Colombia); pp. 26-27 (Soviet Union); and pp. 31-32 (Ethiopia).

Considering also that these actions by Iraq constitute aggressive acts and a flagrant violation of its international obligations which strike at the root of the conduct of international relations in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling that Iraq is fully responsible for any use of violence against foreign nationals or against any diplomatic or consular mission in Kuwait or its personnel,

Determined to ensure respect for its decisions and for Article 25 of the Charter,

Considering further that the grave nature of Iraq's actions, which constitute a new escalation of its violations of international law, obliges the Council not only to express its immediate reaction but also to consult urgently in order to take further concrete measures to ensure Iraq's compliance with the Council's resolutions,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Strongly condemns aggressive acts perpetrated by Iraq against diplomatic premises and personnel in Kuwait, including the abduction of foreign nationals who were present in those premises;

2. Demands the immediate release of those foreign nationals as well as all nationals mentioned in resolution 664 (1990);

3. Also demands that Iraq immediately and fully comply with its international obligations under resolution 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990), the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law;

4. Further demands that Iraq immediately protect the safety and well-being of diplomatic and consular personnel and premises in Kuwait and in Iraq and take no action to hinder the diplomatic and consular missions in the performance of their functions, including access to their nationals and the protection of their person and interests;

5. Reminds all States that they are obliged to observe strictly resolutions 661 (1990), 662 (1990), 664 (1990), 665 (1990) and 666 (1990);

6. Decides to consult urgently to take further concrete measures as soon as possible, under Chapter VII of the Charter, in response to Iraq's continued violation of the Charter of the United Nations, of resolutions of the Security Council and of international law.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Cuba expressed his appreciation to the delegation of France for its willingness to seek compromise formulations that had made it possible for all members of the Council to support the resolution just adopted. He voiced concerns, however, about some of its elements. His delegation found the reference to

“aggressive acts” to be somewhat excessive in this context, noting that such an expression had not been used even in resolution 660 (1990), condemning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. It was also concerned about paragraph 6, since it might be inferred that some Powers could use its provisions to exacerbate the conflict and press on to military action. His delegation regretted, moreover, that no mention was made in the text of the need to continue the efforts to find a peaceful solution to the conflict, or of the responsibility that could and should devolve upon the Secretary-General in connection with diplomatic missions in Kuwait.⁹⁷

The representative of Italy stated that the offence against the French Embassy was regarded as an offence against all members of the European Community. However, it was more. Iraq's action against the embassies in Kuwait affected the very bases of civilized relationships between nations. It must, therefore, elicit a response not just from the individual countries affected, but from the whole international community as represented in the Security Council — for Iraq's action constituted an offence against the whole international community. Italy accordingly fully supported the measures contained in resolution 667 (1990), in particular its paragraph 5, calling upon Iraq to respect the Council's previous resolutions. Should that not happen, it was prepared to support such further actions as the Council might take under paragraph 6 of the resolution.⁹⁸

The representative of Kuwait stated that Iraq's act of aggression against the embassies in Kuwait was merely a continuation of Iraq's aggression against the Kuwaiti Embassy and diplomatic personnel in Baghdad, and of the crimes committed by the Iraqi occupation forces in Kuwait. Those actions deserved the Council's most vigorous condemnation. Further, as they were the result of the continued occupation of Kuwait, the Security Council should consider the adoption of further measures to put an end to that occupation: it should tighten the vice by every possible means and procedure to compel Iraq to comply with its decisions and withdraw from Kuwait. In the meantime, he expressed Kuwait's appreciation to all States that had faced up to the difficulties imposed by Iraq and had kept their embassies open in Kuwait. He also expressed gratitude to the Council, which continued to keep under consideration the situation between Iraq and Kuwait with a sense of responsibility, firmness and persistence in pursuing the need to apply the provisions of the Charter.⁹⁹

The representative of Iraq contended that the claim of intrusion into the residence of the French Ambassador was “false and unfounded”. The instructions given to the local authorities in the “province of Kuwait” stipulated that those residences should not be entered, although they no longer had diplomatic immunity. He asserted that the Government of France had been looking for a pretext to create unfounded tension and escalate the situation. Iraq’s position was clear: it respected the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations. He concluded that the resolution adopted by the Council would in no way promote a peaceful solution to the crisis.¹⁰⁰

Decision of 24 September 1990 (2942nd meeting): resolution 669 (1990)

At its 2942nd meeting, held on 24 September 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”.

The President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s consultations.¹⁰¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 669 (1990), which reads:

Recalling its resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990,

Recalling also Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Conscious of the fact that an increasing number of requests for assistance have been received under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter,

Entrusts the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of Article 50 of the Charter and making recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.

Decision of 25 September 1990 (2943rd meeting): resolution 670 (1990)

At its 2943rd meeting, held on 25 September 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait”. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the following members of the Council were, like his own country, represented by their Foreign Ministers, whom he welcomed: Canada, China, Colombia, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Malaysia, Romania, the United Kingdom, the United States, Yemen and Zaire. The Council invited the representative of Kuwait, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President then drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Côte d’Ivoire, Finland, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire.¹⁰² He also drew their attention to several other documents.¹⁰³

At the outset of the Council’s deliberations, the Secretary-General stated that, during the weeks since 2 August, the Security Council had been shouldering the heavy responsibility which the Charter had placed on it but which, in earlier circumstances, it had been unable to exercise. He added that the Council should view its responsibility not just as that of restoring peace, but of upholding and maintaining peace with justice. He stressed that the power of the Security Council was the power of principle, commanded by the solidarity of nations opposed to the transgression of the Charter of the United Nations. What made the Council’s task particularly onerous — but ultimately fruitful — was that principles must be consistently applied and the Council’s actions must be based on equity and perceived to be so. Enforcement provisions under Chapter VII of the Charter had not been used before in such a manner and on such a scale as they were in the present crisis. The United Nations was being subjected to an unprecedented test. It needed to demonstrate that the way of enforcement was qualitatively different from the way of war; that as such action issued from a collective undertaking, it required a discipline all its own; that it strove to minimize undeserved suffering to the extent possible, and to search for solutions to the special economic problems confronted by States arising from the carrying out of enforcement measures; that what it demanded from the targeted State was not surrender but the righting of the wrong that had been committed; and that it did not foreclose diplomatic efforts aimed at a peaceful solution consistent with the principles of the Charter and the determinations made by the Security Council. The Secretary-General recalled that during his recent visit to Jordan he had felt the need to emphasize publicly that one wrong did not justify another. He noted, further, that the effort to correct one international wrong did not mean that other wrongs should be left unaddressed. In his view, the world situation generally, and particularly the situation in the Middle East as a whole, presented itself as a proving ground for the international community's probity in establishing the rule of law. If peace were to be made secure, justice must have the last word.¹⁰⁴

The Council then proceeded to vote on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen said that the crisis between Iraq and Kuwait had developed at the end of the cold war era and that the shift from confrontation to cooperation had brought about a new phase in international relations. The application of the principles of the Charter by the organs of the Organization, especially the Security Council, fell within that historical context. He stated that the response to the Iraq-Kuwait crisis would affect the nature and evolution of the new world order. In addressing the crisis, the Council had to choose beforehand between the two options of peace and war. Peace required a commitment to sustained efforts to achieve the aims of the Security Council resolutions through peaceful means in a manner that avoided escalation and confrontation. War, which would break out if force were used by certain Powers, could lead to catastrophe in the region and have wider implications for the world. It would wreck the new world order at the very outset, especially if force was used outside the authority of the Council. Yemen expected the Council to take positive measures towards a peaceful resolution of the crisis so that its resolutions would not be used as a justification and pretext for war but as an inspiration for peace. It had therefore submitted to the Council a draft resolution that called on all parties, including the countries of the region, to intensify diplomatic efforts and on the Secretary-General to continue his good offices. The speaker asserted that the crisis was being escalated through the application of Chapter VII without any parallel effort to encourage peaceful solutions, especially within an Arab framework, and that famine would result from an inhuman interpretation of "humanitarian cases" under resolution 666 (1990). Recalling his country's position on the crisis, he stressed that the road to war would not lead to the promotion of democracy in the region.¹⁰⁵

The representative of Cuba recalled that his country had voted in favour of the resolutions that rejected the inadmissible invasion of Kuwait, but had felt obliged, for the same reasons of principle, not to join with the rest of the Security Council on other occasions. He believed that the Council must be consistent in fulfilling its obligations under the Charter. However, the Council had been inconsistent in the past and continued to be so in cases such as Palestine, Lebanon, apartheid and Cyprus. It had also lacked consistency in the decisions it had hastily taken since August. Deft in adopting one resolution after another, it had been circumspect towards the growing calls from many States under Article 50 of the Charter. It had imposed inhuman sanctions denying thousands of innocent people their fundamental right to basic food and health care. It had acted in haste, in response to alleged violations of the embargo, without awaiting information from the Secretary-General. The Council was again being asked to strengthen the economic measures against Iraq without pausing to consider the consequences for third parties. Moreover, the draft resolution contained threats that other measures, presumably military, would be used against Iraq, and lashed out at any State that might disregard the resolutions already adopted, although no indication to that effect had been received. Cuba viewed this text — whose measures would extend to international air communications between Iraq and other States in a manner that had little to do with the 1944 Charter of the International Civil Aviation Organization — as a step towards a military outbreak, rather than a settlement of the conflict. Finally, the speaker stated that he would have voted in favour of paragraph 13 of the draft resolution, which dealt with the plight of the Kuwaiti population under foreign occupation, had the sponsors accepted a separate vote on that paragraph. In conclusion, he hoped that the Council would soon devote some time to efforts that would give peace a chance.¹⁰⁶

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour to 1 against (Cuba) as resolution 670 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990 and 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990,

Condemning Iraq's continued occupation of Kuwait, its failure to rescind its actions and end its purported annexation and its holding of third-State nationals against their will, in flagrant violation of resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990), 664 (1990) and 667 (1990) and of international humanitarian law,

Condemning also the treatment by Iraqi forces of Kuwait nationals, including measures to force them to leave their own country and mistreatment of persons and property in Kuwait in violation of international law,

Noting with grave concern the persistent attempts to evade the measures laid down in resolution 661 (1990),

Noting also that a number of States have limited the number of Iraqi diplomatic and consular officials in their countries and that others are planning to do so,

Determined to ensure by all necessary means the strict and complete application of the measures laid down in resolution 661 (1990),

Determined also to ensure respect for its decisions and the provisions of Articles 25 and 48 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Affirming that any acts of the Government of Iraq which are contrary to the above-mentioned resolutions or to Articles 25 or 48 of the Charter, such as Decree No. 377 of 16 September 1990 of the Revolutionary Command Council of Iraq, are null and void,

Reaffirming its determination to ensure compliance with its resolutions by maximum use of political and diplomatic means,

Welcoming the Secretary-General's use of his good offices to advance a peaceful solution based on the relevant resolutions of the Council and noting with appreciation his continuing efforts to this end,

Underlining to the Government of Iraq that its continued failure to comply with the terms of resolutions 660 (1990), 661 (1990), 662 (1990), 664 (1990), 666 (1990) and 667 (1990) could lead to further serious action by the Council under the Charter, including under Chapter VII,

Recalling the provisions of Article 103 of the Charter,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Calls upon all States to carry out their obligations to ensure strict and complete compliance with resolution 661 (1990) and in particular paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 thereof;

2. Confirms that resolution 661 (1990) applies to all means of transport, including aircraft;

3. Decides that all States, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted before the date of the present resolution, shall deny permission to any aircraft to take off from their territory if the aircraft would carry any cargo to or from Iraq or Kuwait other than food in humanitarian circumstances, subject to authorization by the Security Council or the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and in accordance with resolution 666 (1990), or supplies intended strictly for medical purposes or solely for the United Nations Iran-Iraq Military Observer Group;

4. Decides also that all States shall deny permission to any aircraft destined to land in Iraq or Kuwait, whatever its State of registration, to overfly their territory unless:

(a) The aircraft lands at an airfield designated by the State outside Iraq or Kuwait in order to permit its inspection to ensure that there is no cargo on board in violation of resolution 661 (1990) or the present resolution, and for this purpose the aircraft may be detained for as long as necessary; or

(b) The particular flight has been approved by the Security Council Committee; or

(c) The flight is certified by the United Nations as solely for the purposes of the Military Observer Group;

5. Decides further that each State shall take all necessary measures to ensure that any aircraft registered in its territory or operated by an operator who has his principal place of business or permanent residence in its territory complies with the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) and the present resolution;

6. Decides moreover that all States shall notify in a timely fashion the Security Council Committee of any flight between its territory and Iraq or Kuwait to which the requirement to land in paragraph 4 above does not apply, and the purpose for such a flight;

7. Calls upon all States to cooperate in taking such measures as may be necessary, consistent with international law, including the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation of 7 December 1944, to ensure the effective implementation of the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) or the present resolution;

8. Also calls upon all States to detain any ships of Iraqi registry which enter their ports and which are being or have been used in violation of resolution 661 (1990), or to deny such ships entrance to their ports except in circumstances recognized under international law as necessary to safeguard human life;

9. Reminds all States of their obligations under resolution 661 (1990) with regard to the freezing of Iraqi assets, and the protection of the assets of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and its agencies, located within their territory and to report to the Security Council Committee regarding those assets;

10. Further calls upon all States to provide to the Security Council Committee information regarding the action taken by them to implement the provisions laid down in the present resolution;

11. Affirms that the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations in the United Nations system are required to take such measures as may be necessary to give effect to the terms of resolution 661 (1990) and of the present resolution;

12. Decides to consider, in the event of evasion of the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) or of the present resolution by a State or its nationals or through its territory, measures directed at the State in question to prevent such evasion;

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States said that the international community had rarely been so united and determined that aggression should not succeed. By resolution 661 (1990) and its successor resolutions, it had set a high and rising penalty upon Iraq for each day it failed to abandon its aggression. By the resolution just adopted, the Council provided for the following additional measures: (a) it stated explicitly that resolution 661 (1990) would include commercial air traffic; (b) it agreed to consider measures against any Government that might attempt to evade the international quarantine, given that the more effective the enforcement of the sanctions, the more likely a peaceful resolution of the conflict would be; (c) it reminded Iraq that it must respect its international obligations, especially the humanitarian provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention; and (d) it put the Government of Iraq on notice that its continued failure to comply could lead to further action, including action under Chapter VII of the Charter. The speaker stated further that, while the international community had made clear its desire to exhaust every peaceful possibility for resolving the crisis, the Charter also envisaged the possibility of further individual and collective measures to defend against aggression and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law. He emphasized that the sanctions were not aimed at the Iraqi people, but at reversing the aggressive policies of the Iraqi Government. The Council had acknowledged that its sanctions could be costly to many Member States. Its members had a duty to make sure that no nation was crippled because it had stood for the principles of international order. The United States was coordinating an international effort in this regard to provide assistance to those desperately in need. The speaker observed that, with the ending of the cold war, the United Nations had been reborn. The vision of the Charter and the promise of international cooperation seemed suddenly within reach, and the United Nations was at last beginning to control the proliferation of conflicts. If the Organization was to fulfil its mission, the Council must reverse Saddam Hussein's aggression.¹⁰⁷

The representative of France said that the new state of international relations allowed the United Nations to deal collectively with the situations it faced in order to foster the new international order. He stated that this new order aimed at ensuring the primacy of law and justice over force and arbitrary power and that, in the case of the Gulf crisis, the embargo was the instrument of that policy. Resolution 670 (1990) strengthened, in the area of air transport, means of control similar to those laid down for sea transport by resolution 665 (1990) and fully met the concerns of the European Community and the Western European Union. He stressed that the resolution was important not just by virtue of its provisions, but also because it demonstrated the Council's confidence in the policy of embargo as a weapon of peace. It was in that spirit that the Council had decided on an embargo, and that the means of monitoring it had been strictly set out and would be further added to if necessary. He concluded by calling on the Arab world to find a political way out of the conflict and, in so doing, to be guided by the resolutions of the Council which had set out the principles on which any solution must be based.¹⁰⁸

The representative of Canada said that the united response to the crisis held great hope for future collective action through the United Nations. The Council's resolutions stated in clear terms the path Iraq must follow if it wished to resume its place in the international community. Once it had withdrawn totally and unconditionally from Kuwait and allowed all those who wished to do so to leave Iraq and Kuwait, Iraq could pursue its disputes with its neighbours through the channels established for the peaceful resolution of disputes, including the United Nations. The speaker paid tribute to the individuals and the countries that had paid a significant price for upholding the Charter and the rule of international law. The resolution just adopted tightened the sanctions against Iraq and set out the means by which their effectiveness was to be assured. It also underlined to Iraq that its continued failure to comply with the Council's resolutions could lead to further action by the Council under the Charter, with potentially severe consequences.¹⁰⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that Iraq's seizure of Kuwait had confronted the post-cold-war world with its first crucial test. The United Nations, for the first time in its history, had responded the way its founding fathers had intended. The United States, the Soviet Union, China, Western and Eastern Europe, Japan and a decisive majority of Arab and Muslim countries stood together in a unique coalition to defeat aggression. To those who had expressed the desire to see the Council concentrate its efforts on the search for peace, he said that it was precisely by adopting resolution 670 (1990), by tightening sanctions and making them more effective that the Council was working for the peaceful reversal of aggression and for a peaceful end to the crisis. There were many small countries with reason to fear a more powerful neighbour, and many international frontiers whose existence was resented by one or another party. If Saddam Hussein were allowed to get away with the spoils of conquest, then other would-be aggressors would take heart; the Council could not allow that to happen. No member of the Council relished the possibility of war. It was President Saddam Hussein who had used force, to accomplish the invasion. The threat to the security and stability of the Gulf came from Iraq. That was why such a large coalition of peacekeeping forces had been assembled there. The speaker stressed that it was not the United States ranged against Iraq, but the States united — in a coalition against aggression, whose members wanted to see the independence of Kuwait restored by peaceful means, and to secure the release of the foreign nationals being held hostage. He concluded that success in this effort would not only do justice to Kuwait; it would strengthen hopes of a more secure world order, based on the implementation of the resolutions of the Council, whether in the Middle East or elsewhere.¹¹⁰

The representative of Finland said that the adoption of resolution 670 (1990) under Chapter VII signalled the determination of the Security Council to continue to uphold and strengthen the principle of collective security. That principle implied that the security of Kuwait was also the security of all other States, particularly the small Member States. The fact that it had not always been possible in the past to apply the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter and summon the collective strength of the international community against aggression was no argument against the application of effective sanctions in the current crisis. It was desirable that everyone know that, if needed, the Security Council had the will and the capability to use effectively the instruments at its disposal, as was now being demonstrated by the Council in concrete action. The speaker concluded by emphasizing that the world community wanted a peaceful outcome to the crisis, and that it must be based on the Council's resolutions.¹¹¹

The representative of China recalled that his country had voted in favour of Security Council resolution 660 (1990) and its successor resolutions, including the one just adopted, with a view to safeguarding the basic norms governing international relations and restoring peace and security in the Gulf region. It had done so in the belief that the resolutions were aimed at promoting a political settlement of the crisis by peaceful means, an approach which China advocated. It supported the role played by the Council and the efforts of the Arab States and the Secretary-General in the search for a solution. While China understood and respected the necessary defensive steps taken by some Gulf countries out of consideration for their security, it did not, in principle, favour military involvement in the Gulf region by big Powers since such involvement would only make the situation even more complicated. The speaker called on the countries concerned to exercise maximum restraint so as to prevent further deterioration of the matter. He also stressed that, in implementing the provisions of resolution 670 (1990) with regard to civil aircraft, the countries concerned should strictly abide by relevant international law and take rigorous steps to prevent any action that might endanger the safety of such aircraft and the people on board.¹¹²

The representative of Colombia underlined the urgent need to explore all the possible avenues of diplomacy to solve the problems of the Gulf, and to avoid a military confrontation there. His country believed that the Council should encourage an Arab solution to the conflict, as recommended in resolution 660 (1990). Regional participation in the solution of problems frequently offered more possibilities for success than the intervention of extraregional Powers, as evidenced by the Central American peace process of recent years. Colombia had voted in favour of resolution 670 (1990), which further developed resolution 661 (1990) on an embargo against Iraq. While aware of the price of, and the suffering brought about by, an embargo, it preferred that to the price of war. The speaker added that his delegation wished that the Council, in addition to the resolution just adopted, had adopted another one, calling on all parties, in particular on the countries of the region, to undertake maximum efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement.¹¹³

The representative of Malaysia observed that it was appropriate for the Council to meet at the level of Foreign Ministers to weigh and pronounce on important and critical issues, such as the one before it. However, the meeting should not be taken to mean that the Council was ganging up and closing the door on Iraq. He noted that Malaysia had supported all the resolutions adopted on this crisis, including the one just adopted, in furtherance of the objective of the international community: to bring about the withdrawal of Iraqi forces and the restoration of Kuwait. As the application of sanctions on air traffic and transportation was risky and complicated, Malaysia had insisted that paragraph 7 of the new resolution refer to the Chicago Convention. It had supported the resolution since its thrust and objective was to make sanctions effective and ensure compliance. The speaker noted, however, that many countries were enduring much suffering because of the sanctions against Iraq, and urged that the Council and its Sanctions Committee do more to address their needs under Article 50. He expressed unease, moreover, about the apparent headlong rush with which the Council had moved from one resolution to another in a period of seven weeks, wondering whether enough time was given for each resolution to take effect. He wondered whether the Council's haste was aimed at making sanctions effective or whether it was readying itself to conclude that sanctions were not effective and that other measures therefore had to be taken. Malaysia did not regard war as inevitable or accept that events were escalating towards a confrontation. It believed that many outside the Council shared its sense of uneasiness and that the Council should take stock of where it was going. The speaker added that his country was averse to the involvement of the armed forces of major Powers in any region, fearing the consequences of their long-term presence. It thus felt uneasy about having been party to authorizing the use of forces of certain countries under resolution 665 (1990), although it knew that the forces of those countries were there also upon the request of Kuwait under Article 51 of the Charter. The speaker urged Iraq to respond positively to the Council's resolutions, and thus remove the reason for the foreign presence and avoid the outbreak of war. In a broader context, Malaysia hoped that the new spirit of cooperation and determination within the Council would be sustained so that it could act effectively in resolving many existing regional conflicts, including in the Middle East. There could be no double standards in the Council and if, on the question of Palestine, Israel continued to be obdurate and unresponsive, the Council should not hesitate to apply all the pressure and sanctions needed to ensure compliance.¹¹⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, also took note of the unusual nature of the Council's meeting, marked by the participation of so many Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Council's member States. He thought this might be the first time that discussion of a specific situation in the Council had taken place at such a high level, a fact that showed the critical nature of the situation and the desire to resolve it as speedily as possible. The Council had the task of settling a most drastic crisis that had put the firmness of the civilized world order to the test. The Council's unanimous demand for the unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait had set the terms for the solution of the crisis. The Soviet delegation was hopeful that the goal would be achieved in the light of the transformation of the Council into an effective mechanism for the maintenance of international peace and security. By acting consistently and without delay, the Council had justified the mandate entrusted to it by the Charter. The resolution just adopted was a perfectly logical step, given Iraq's stubborn refusal to implement the Council's decisions; it was a completely legitimate reaction to Iraq's continuing challenge to the international community. The speaker emphasized that the new decision was aimed at ensuring compliance with the sanctions against Iraq and was in strict conformity with the Charter of the United Nations and the norms of international law. His Government regarded the expansion of the sphere of monitoring the application of the sanctions as a continuation of the efforts aimed at achieving a peaceful solution of the conflict. The speaker observed that, from the start of the crisis, the Soviet Union had placed the stress on collective efforts based on the rights and capabilities of the United Nations, and on the need to resolve the crisis through non-military, political and diplomatic methods. It remained convinced that the focus of joint efforts must be a de-escalation of the crisis and a political solution. However, that did not diminish its determination to achieve a cessation of the aggression, and if the steps now being taken did not achieve that result, the Soviet Union would be ready to consider the possibility of additional steps, in accordance with the Charter. The speaker added that the extent to which it would be possible to implement the peacemaking potential of the United Nations in this context would depend on the consistency of the efforts made by all States, particularly those of the Arab States, and the Secretary-

General. He hoped that the significant calls made at the meeting for restoration of the international legal order would be heard and correctly understood in Iraq and that the leadership of that country would choose a course of action leading to the peaceful resolution of the crisis. In conclusion, he echoed several previous speakers in calling for the Council, once the Gulf crisis was resolved, to concern itself, without delay, with healing other age-old wounds of that region, first and foremost through a solution of the problems of Palestine and Lebanon.¹¹⁵

Other members of the Council underlined their commitment to the Charter system of collective security and to a peaceful settlement of the Gulf crisis. They stated that they had either sponsored or supported the resolution just adopted, providing for the strengthening of sanctions, as it offered the only option allowing the international community to avoid war.¹¹⁶

The representative of Kuwait stated that the participation of the Foreign Ministers of the States members of the Security Council demonstrated their firm determination to use the capabilities and powers of the Council to implement its resolutions and spare the region and its peoples the scourge of a conflagration. By the resolution just adopted, the Council confirmed that the battle was between the leaders of Iraq on the one hand and the entire world on the other. The rejection by Iraq's leaders of the Council's resolutions had transformed the aggression against Kuwait into an aggression against the entire civilized world, its values and norms of behaviour. The world could no longer accept the continuation of the Iraqi aggression: Iraq must be forced by all means available under the Charter to heed the international will and withdraw its forces from the territory of Kuwait. The speaker observed that the economic embargo against Iraq was not an end in itself. It was a peaceful means to attain an objective: implementation by Iraq of the binding resolutions of the Council. Thus, despite its negative effects for the peoples of Kuwait and Iraq, and indeed for other peoples and States, it was necessary. The speaker added that the Council's resolutions — particularly 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990) — set limits that must not be overstepped, conceded or subjected to negotiation. He noted, moreover, that the elements of those resolutions had been adopted in a decision taken at the Emergency Arab Summit Conference, while the resolutions themselves had been endorsed by the Islamic States at a ministerial meeting. The Security Council's will had thus been united with the will of the Arab and Islamic world, isolating the Iraqi regime. He concluded by paying tribute to the courageous and steadfast role played by the Secretary-General in combating the injustice done to Kuwait.¹¹⁷

At its 2950th meeting, held on 27 October 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait". Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The item was considered at the 2950th and 2951st meetings.

At the outset of the Council's deliberations, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, Finland, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire,¹¹⁸ which was subsequently also sponsored by France, Romania and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He also drew their attention to a letter dated 18 October 1990 from the representative of Kuwait addressed to the Secretary-General,¹¹⁹ transmitting the text of a Decree-Law promulgated by the Government of Kuwait concerning the holding in trust by the State of Kuwait of property belonging to Kuwaitis or residents of Kuwait.

The representative of Kuwait stated that the Council was meeting in order to ensure that the focus remained where it should be: on deterring aggression, ending the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait — which was entering its eighty-fifth day — and halting the inhuman practices against Kuwait's people, its identity and its institutions, and against the large number of third-country nationals living in Kuwait. Despite eight binding resolutions adopted thus far by the Security Council, and notwithstanding all the efforts aimed at resolving the crisis peacefully, Iraq had not shown the slightest sign that it was responding to the call for its complete, immediate and unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait. On the contrary, it had embarked on consolidating its occupation and expanding its military deployment, while practising the harshest forms of oppression and terrorism against the Kuwaiti people. The Kuwaiti people, however, backed by an unprecedented world consensus and by the Security Council, refused to budge from their position and their just demands; they would not accept what had happened as a fait accompli or make any concessions. The speaker emphasized that the Iraqi regime was liable under the Fourth Geneva Convention for all the crimes it had committed against the citizens and foreign residents of Kuwait, and the peace and security of the region. The draft resolution before the Council specifically identified another aspect of Iraq's responsibility: restitution for damages suffered by the Government and people of Kuwait, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 3281 (XXIX) on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, which provided, under article 16, for restitution and full compensation for the exploitation and depletion of the resources and property of a people and country under occupation. He added that, pursuant to the legal obligations and moral responsibilities of the State of Kuwait towards its citizens and foreign residents who had lost their property and funds, a Decree-Law had been issued by the Emir of Kuwait on 18 October 1990,¹²⁰ proclaiming that all property of Kuwaitis and foreigners resident in Kuwait were held in trust by it. Pursuant to the Decree, the lawful Government of Kuwait would have the right to resort, as necessary or appropriate, to any judicial, administrative or legal mechanisms in any State, with a view to protecting such property. The speaker urged the Iraqi regime to comply with the Council's resolutions and not to underestimate its resolve, and the resolve of Kuwait, its Emir, Government and people, to take all measures to make the aggressor respond to the international will and comply with it by withdrawing unconditionally. He stressed that Kuwait was determined to make full use of the rights safeguarded to it under the Charter of the United Nations. It expected the Council to consider promptly what additional measures were needed to achieve its ultimate goal of dislodging the aggressor and restoring Kuwait's legitimate Government.¹²¹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics observed that, in the decisions of the Security Council calling for the unconditional and immediate withdrawal of the Iraqi forces from Kuwait, a unique solidarity among various countries had appeared for the first time in many decades. In the Gulf, the ability of the world community to act in accordance with the new criteria of international politics was being tested, as was its ability to make those responsible for the conflict obey the norms of international law. The Soviet Union was convinced that Iraq's illegal actions, whose continuation challenged the international community, must be halted immediately. The draft resolution, which the Soviet delegation had participated in drafting, contained a strong indication of the Council's resolve to do everything possible to prevent the very tense situation from degenerating into a military conflict. The Soviet Union believed that if there was even the slightest chance of a political settlement it must be seized and fully exploited. It was doing everything it could to promote such a settlement of the crisis: to that end, the special representative of the President of the Soviet Union was currently in Baghdad. The speaker was pleased to see that many other countries were also active in the search for a peaceful solution — both within the context of the Security Council and the Non-Aligned Movement and within the Arab States themselves. A very important contribution was also being made in this regard by the Secretary-General. The speaker pointed out that the draft resolution also repeated the Council's demand that Iraq implement the will of the world community and strictly observe the norms of international law: that was critical if the world wished to live in a state of legality and good order.¹²²

At its 2951st meeting, on 29 October 1990, the Council resumed its consideration of the item. In accordance with the decisions taken at the previous meeting, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table. The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 19 October 1990 from the representative of Kuwait addressed to the Secretary-

General,¹²³ transmitting the texts of the addresses delivered at the opening of the Kuwaiti People's Congress held at Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, from 13 to 15 October 1990.

The representative of Iraq said that each of the eight resolutions adopted by the Council on the "so-called Gulf crisis", as well as the draft resolution currently before it, had been justified as promoting the cause of peace and the avoidance of war, and opposing the use of force. However, those pushing the Council to adopt those resolutions, one after another, had seen nothing wrong in flouting one or other principle of the Charter, international instruments or norms of international law. He feared that such an approach might lead to a slippery slope, endangering the United Nations and its credibility. He wished, therefore, to expose four glaring contradictions between the Council's resolutions and the Charter of the United Nations, on the one hand, and, on the other, between the actions of some permanent members of the Council in relation to the Gulf crisis and especially to Iraq, and the letter and spirit of Security Council resolutions. First, Article 24 (2) of the Charter stipulated that, in discharging its duties concerning the maintenance of international peace and security, the Council must act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The speaker feared that, in adopting the resolutions on the Gulf crisis in quick succession, the Council had not paid enough attention to the purposes and principles of the United Nations; these were the constitutional guarantee that the Council would not exceed its mandate and that no Member State would act arbitrarily in exercising its responsibilities as a member of the Council or in justifying any measure it might take under the pretext of implementing Council resolutions. He stressed that the main purpose of the United Nations, as enshrined in Article 1 (1) of the Charter, was "to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace". This did not suggest that the Council was an international court or a judicial body. The Council was, after all, a political organ. Nevertheless, the Council and its members were duty bound to observe the principles of justice and international law because their very membership of the Council and the rights and privileges as members of the Council derived from the Charter. However, by adopting eight resolutions under Chapter VII of the Charter without consulting with Iraq, the Council had disregarded the most elementary principle of justice, which demanded that each party to a dispute should be given the opportunity to put forward its rights and claims and to clarify what it deemed to be the appropriate means of settling the dispute. Furthermore, the Council, by rushing to adopt resolutions against Iraq, had disregarded the other peaceful means available and avoided the use of good offices to bring to light the causes of the conflict, with a view to finding a peaceful and realistic solution to it.

Secondly, the speaker observed that although some had defended the approach of adopting hasty, harsh resolutions as being in the interests of peace and a peaceful settlement of the conflict, the very opposite was the case. The express purpose of each resolution had been to escalate the situation and abort every international or regional peace effort or initiative. The draft resolution currently before the Council would make it possible for the warmongers to declare that they had exhausted all peaceful means and that the only option left was war. The United States had, in fact, started its military build-up on land and sea even before it had been asked to do so by any State in the region. Before the adoption of resolution 661 (1990), the United States and its ally, the United Kingdom, had taken the initiative of establishing a naval blockade. That was an act of war and an act of aggression under the definition of aggression adopted by the General Assembly. Resolution 661 (1990), moreover, had been designed to provide the United States with cover for its acts of aggression towards Iraq and to allow it to claim that it was acting lawfully even though the resolution did not authorize the United States or any other State to blockade Iraq.

The speaker claimed, thirdly, that the assertion that certain States — especially the United States and its allies — had the right to use force against Iraq in self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter was a falsehood that ran counter to the Charter. The right to use force in individual or collective self-defence was subject to a time scale stipulated in Article 51: it was authorized until such time as the Security Council had taken measures. The speaker maintained that since all the Council resolutions had been adopted under Chapter VII, and the Council had decided to remain seized of the situation until it was resolved, no State had the right to use force. When the United States and its allies committed acts of aggression against Iraq and described them as peace measures, they were simply using the right of self-defence as a pretext while violating the terms of Article 51.

Fourthly, the speaker drew attention to Article 52, in Chapter VIII of the Charter, which provided that the Security Council should encourage the development of peaceful settlement of local disputes through regional arrangements. It was a grave matter that the Council had completely and deliberately disregarded the Arab initiatives calling for a peaceful Arab solution of the Gulf crisis. This created a dangerous situation in which foreign Powers would benefit at the expense of legitimate Arab interests. There was a need for an Arab framework because the Arab States were interconnected with each other by demography, communications, strategic and immediate interests, water and oil resources, religious beliefs and, above all, by the Palestinian cause. The fact that the United States and the Security Council had ignored the initiative of 12 August 1990 by President Saddam Hussein, in which he called for dealing with all the region's problems on an equitable basis, was proof that the United States was determined to prevent any peaceful Arab solution to the crisis, and that it was motivated by its economic, financial and strategic designs on the region.

Finally, the representative of Iraq commented on the draft resolution before the Council. He noted that it consisted of two parts: part A, which had been prepared by the United States, the United Kingdom and other permanent members; and part B, which had been drafted by the non-aligned countries. The two parts were contradictory in letter and in spirit. Iraq nevertheless welcomed the appeal in part B for peaceful solutions in order to spare the region the devastating war for which the United States was gearing up against Iraq. However, it felt that, if the Council intended to make proper use of the Secretary-General's good offices, it would be inappropriate to limit his freedom of action to implementation of the unjust resolutions. Good offices could not bear fruit if their aim was to secure capitulation and the surrender of Iraq's rights and its national security. With regard to paragraphs 1 to 4, instead of creating conditions for a peaceful settlement, they would further complicate the situation since they ignored Iraq's rights and the negative consequences of the Council's earlier resolutions. Paragraph 5 of the draft exposed the contradictions in the Council's resolutions, which imposed a blockade and restrictions on the import of foodstuffs into Iraq, but at the same time called on Iraq to provide foodstuffs and other essentials to the nationals of third countries. Paragraphs 8 and 9, concerning restitution and compensation, most severely contradicted the Charter and attempted to paralyse Iraq's economic potential and its international relations. Iraq believed that the Council had exceeded its mandate in this regard: it was a political body consisting of members who sought only to advance their own political interests, not a judicial body consisting of independent, impartial judges competent to rule on matters of compensation for those entitled to it in any conflict. The speaker stressed, moreover, that the losses being suffered by all States, including developing countries, as a result of increased oil prices and the embargo, were far greater than those suffered by third-country nationals forced to leave their work and return to their countries because of the worsening of the Gulf crisis. Furthermore, the losses suffered by third-country nationals had not resulted directly from the Gulf crisis, but from the massing of ground, sea and air forces in the region, particularly by the United States, and the deteriorating economic situation caused by the economic embargo against Iraq and the arbitrary decisions of the Council's sanctions Committee. In conclusion, the speaker reiterated Iraq's desire to avoid war and establish peace in the region, so that Arab solidarity might be strengthened and all the problems might be solved on an equal footing. At the same time, Iraq stressed its right and readiness to defend itself against any foreign aggression.¹²⁴

The representative of Kuwait maintained that it was the Iraqi regime, not the Security Council, which had violated the Charter, when it launched its aggression against Kuwait and occupied and annexed the country by military force. It continued, moreover, to commit vicious acts against the people and foreign residents of Kuwait, in violation of international conventions, including the Fourth Geneva Convention and the Vienna Convention on diplomatic immunity. The speaker recalled that the Kuwaiti authorities had sought for over 12 years to persuade the Iraqi regime to negotiate and solve its problems with Kuwait peacefully, most recently just before the invasion. As for Arab initiatives, he observed that the League of

Arab States had met in Cairo at the very beginning of the aggression and adopted a resolution condemning it and calling on Iraq to withdraw fully and unconditionally before the Security Council meetings. The Arab Summit had, moreover, met in an emergency session in Cairo and adopted a resolution which embodied the Arab view on how the dispute should be solved, through the call of the Arab leaders for the unconditional and complete withdrawal of Iraq, the restoration of Kuwait's legitimacy, and full compensation for the losses it had sustained. However, Iraq had rejected that resolution as it had all the resolutions of the Security Council. As for international initiatives, the latest example was the mission of Mr. Primakov, the emissary of the Soviet President. The speaker observed that the Security Council had deferred voting on the draft resolution in order to give him a chance to convince the Iraqi regime of its isolation and that the only solution, as well as its only salvation, lay in complying with the resolutions of the Council. The meeting had been disappointing. As expected, the Iraqi regime simply wanted to take advantage of such initiatives to gain time in order to try to divide the alliance against it and to consolidate its annexation of Kuwait. The speaker stressed to the representative of Iraq, however, that he and his Government were mistaken: there was international determination to stop the Iraqi aggression and Kuwait would be liberated. The Security Council would stand firm and would adopt resolution after resolution until it forced the Iraqi regime to comply and avoid destroying the region.¹²⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 13 votes in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen), as resolution 674 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990 and 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990,

Stressing the urgent need for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all Iraqi forces from Kuwait and for the restoration of Kuwait's sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity and of the authority of its legitimate Government,

Condemning the actions by the Iraqi authorities and occupying forces to take third-State nationals hostage and to mistreat and oppress Kuwaiti and third-State nationals, and the other actions reported to the Council, such as the destruction of Kuwaiti demographic records, the forced departure of Kuwaitis, the relocation of population in Kuwait and the unlawful destruction and seizure of public and private property in Kuwait, including hospital supplies and equipment, in violation of the decisions of the Council, the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law,

Expressing grave alarm over the situation of third-State nationals in Kuwait and Iraq, including the personnel of the diplomatic and consular missions of such States,

Reaffirming that the above-mentioned Geneva Convention applies to Kuwait and that, as a High Contracting Party to the Convention, Iraq is bound to comply fully with all its terms and in particular is liable under the Convention in respect of the grave breaches committed by it, as are individuals who commit or order the commission of grave breaches,

Recalling the efforts of the Secretary-General concerning the safety and well-being of third-State nationals in Iraq and Kuwait,

Deeply concerned at the economic cost and at the loss and suffering caused to individuals in Kuwait and Iraq as a result of the invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

Reaffirming the goal of the international community of maintaining international peace and security by seeking to resolve international disputes and conflicts through peaceful means,

Recalling the important role that the United Nations and the Secretary-General have played in the peaceful solution of disputes and conflicts in conformity with the provisions of the Charter,

Alarmed by the dangers of the present crisis caused by the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait, which directly threaten international peace and security, and seeking to avoid any further worsening of the situation,

Calling upon Iraq to comply with its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990),

Reaffirming its determination to ensure compliance by Iraq with its resolutions by maximum use of political and diplomatic means,

A

1. Demands that the Iraqi authorities and occupying forces immediately cease and desist from taking third-State nationals hostage, mistreating and oppressing Kuwait and third-State nationals and any other actions, such as those reported to the Council and described above, that violate the decisions of the Council, the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law;

2. Invites States to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them on the grave breaches by Iraq as per paragraph 1 above and to make this information available to the Council;

3. Reaffirms its demand that Iraq immediately fulfil its obligations to third-State nationals in Kuwait and Iraq, including the personnel of diplomatic and consular missions, under the Charter, the above-mentioned Geneva Convention, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, general principles of international law and the relevant resolutions of the Council;

4. Also reaffirms its demand that Iraq permit and facilitate the immediate departure from Kuwait and Iraq of those third-State nationals, including diplomatic and consular personnel, who wish to leave;

5. Demands that Iraq ensure the immediate access to food, water and basic services necessary to the protection and well-being of Kuwaiti nationals and of third-State nationals in Kuwait and Iraq, including the personnel of diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait;

6. Reaffirms its demand that Iraq immediately protect the safety and well-being of diplomatic and consular personnel and premises in Kuwait and in Iraq, take no action to hinder these diplomatic and consular missions in the performance of their functions, including access to their nationals and the protection of their person and interests, and rescind its orders for the closure of diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait and the withdrawal of the immunity of their personnel;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in the context of the continued exercise of his good offices concerning the safety and well-being of third-State nationals in Iraq and Kuwait, to seek to achieve the objectives of paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 above, in particular the provision of food, water and basic services to Kuwaiti nationals and to the diplomatic and consular missions in Kuwait and the evacuation of third-State nationals;

8. Reminds Iraq that under international law it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq;

9. Invites States to collect relevant information regarding their claims, and those of their nationals and corporations, for restitution or financial compensation by Iraq, with a view to such arrangements as may be established in accordance with international law;

10. Requires that Iraq comply with the provisions of the present resolution and its previous resolutions, failing which the Council will need to take further measures under the Charter;

11. Decides to remain actively and permanently seized of the matter until Kuwait has regained its independence and peace has been restored in conformity with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council;

B

12. Reposes its trust in the Secretary-General to make available his good offices and, as he considers appropriate, to pursue them and to undertake diplomatic efforts in order to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis caused by the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait, on the basis of resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990), and calls upon all States, both those in the region and others, to pursue on this basis their efforts to this end, in conformity with the Charter, in order to improve the situation and restore peace, security and stability;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the results of his good offices and diplomatic efforts.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Yemen stressed the importance of making continuous efforts to contain the crisis by peaceful means within an Arab framework, and expressed his delegation's gratitude that this point was reflected in paragraph 12 of the resolution just adopted. However, his delegation believed that the resolution did not give the Secretary-General sufficient freedom to undertake initiatives independently in order to reach the desired peaceful solution. It also found that there were other constraints on States that could have made endeavours to reach such a solution. The speaker observed that there were those who were frightened by peaceful efforts and opposed them. They included those who tried to deepen divisions among the Arab countries and to weaken the Arab nation in its struggle to realize the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people; those who sought to destroy Iraq's military, economic and social capabilities in order to serve the purposes and ambitions of Israel to achieve hegemony over the region; and those who wished to make the foreign military presence in the Gulf region more than a mere passing phenomenon. The speaker stated that Yemen's support for a peaceful solution was grounded in its close proximity to the conflict, which had greatly affected the economy of the country and its people. He vowed in conclusion that Yemen would pursue its efforts to reach a peaceful solution, to which there was no alternative.¹²⁶

The representative of Cuba considered it obvious that Kuwait had the right to claim compensation for loss and damage caused as a result of the invasion and occupation of its territory. The Council had stated and reiterated its view as to who was the aggressor and who was the victim. There was therefore no need for another Council resolution reaffirming Kuwait's inherent rights as the victim of aggression. In Cuba's opinion, the resolution just adopted sought, moreover, to give the Council certain tasks outside its purview, and at the same time to prevent the Council from discharging certain obligations it did have. In the first place, neither Chapter VII, under which the resolution was adopted, nor any other Chapter of the Charter gave the Council any authority to make legal decisions. The Council had no power to make decisions as to liability or to determine compensation or restitution, such as a court might do. The only reference in the Charter to such matters appeared in Article 92, which defined the International Court of Justice as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations; and the only reference in the Charter to the issue of compensation or restitution was to be found in Article 36 of the Court's Statute, which formed an integral part of the Charter of the United Nations. Only the General Assembly, moreover, had the power to discuss the functions and powers of the respective organs. The speaker questioned what powers the Council was giving itself under paragraph 2 of the resolution, with regard to the collating of substantiated information on the alleged grave breaches by Iraq, and the calls on States to provide that information. What would the Council do with that information? Was it turning itself into a court of law, despite having no responsibilities in that regard? There were also references to international law in paragraphs 8 and 9 of the resolution, which was contradictory since the Charter and the Statute of the Court were part of international law. It might be inferred from those paragraphs that the Council, too, had some powers to make decisions on questions of liability and responsibility with regard to compensation and restitution "as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq". That phrase might have many interpretations, including, for instance, the possibility that Iraq would have to shoulder the cost of the military deployment by some Powers in the Gulf region or could be held responsible for damages to third States resulting from the measures adopted by the Council in dealing with the crisis. If that were the case, the Council would not only be trying to take on powers beyond its competence, but also indirectly avoiding its responsibilities under Article 50 of the Charter. The speaker welcomed the reference in paragraph 12 of the resolution to the potential use by the Secretary-General of his good offices to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis. However, he regretted that the Council had not expressed more clearly its gratitude and support for the Secretary-General's continuing efforts in this regard. He considered that, despite that positive paragraph, the text was by and large one more step towards war. Finally, he observed that from a political and moral standpoint the Council — and, in particular, some of the sponsors of the resolution — was not in the best position to deal with the issues addressed in it. The Council had been inconsistent in the application of the principles involved and should not accept the imposition of criteria and strategies devised solely for the benefit of certain major Powers.¹²⁷

The representative of Malaysia considered it only logical that the enforcement actions of the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter should be accompanied by diplomatic efforts to secure compliance with its resolutions and achieve a peaceful solution. The intertwining of both elements in the resolution just adopted gave recognition to the fact that neither course of action could be pursued exclusively. As the custodian of international peace and security, the Council did not discharge its responsibilities by a “single-track commitment to a course of action”, but by always leaving the door open to diplomatic efforts and initiatives. Malaysia and three other non-aligned members of the Council — Colombia, Cuba and Yemen — had pressed the idea of the Council's involvement on the diplomatic front, believing that this was needed if the Council was to entrust the Secretary-General with using his good offices and undertaking diplomatic efforts to secure a peaceful settlement of the crisis. This was reflected in paragraph 12 of the resolution, though some would have wished for a more specific and clearer reference. In Malaysia's view, the Council should not be so circumspect about the usefulness and indeed the necessity of using the good offices of the Secretary-General, especially when such a role was outlined in Articles 98, 99 and 100 of the Charter. Furthermore, it should allow adequate room for the Secretary-General to examine all factors that could contribute towards diplomatic efforts. The speaker believed that the peaceful course of action taken so far by the Council to secure the withdrawal of Iraqi forces and the restoration of Kuwaiti independence and sovereignty must be allowed to show results; economic sanctions were having an impact, and international support for them had been firm and effective. He concluded that the resolution just adopted was a coherent message that the Council stood firm and united in upholding the principles of the Charter and international law, and warned that the Council's ability and determination to take further enforcement measures should not be doubted.¹²⁸

The representative of China stated that resolution 674 (1990) and other relevant Council resolutions reflected the determination of the international community to safeguard the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and to maintain international peace and security, and constituted a good foundation for the settlement of the Gulf crisis. His Government favoured a peaceful settlement of the crisis on the basis of the implementation of those resolutions and opposed the use of force. The Chinese delegation therefore supported the Secretary-General's mediation and good offices and the Arab and Gulf countries as well as other parties in their endeavours to seek a peaceful solution. It appreciated the inclusion of a provision to that effect in the resolution just adopted.¹²⁹

The representative of Colombia recalled that at the end of September her country, together with Cuba, Malaysia and Yemen, had submitted a draft resolution requesting the Secretary-General to use all the avenues of dialogue and diplomacy to obtain Saddam Hussein's compliance with the Council's resolutions. That text was never considered by the Council as it was argued that it would send the wrong message to the Iraqi leader. Almost a month later, some elements from that draft had been incorporated into what was now resolution 674 (1990). While her delegation would have preferred paragraph 12 of the resolution to be adopted with the broad terms used in the original draft, it had voted in favour of the resolution as it wished once again to resolutely condemn Iraq's actions.¹³⁰

The representative of the United States observed that the statement by the representative of Iraq had already been well answered in the Council. To listen to the invader of Kuwait attempt to lecture the Council on the meaning of the Charter was astounding and certainly not persuasive. The speaker reiterated his Government's commitment to a policy of seeking peaceful implementation of the Council's resolutions on Iraq. These were clear. The international community had acted in unison to condemn Iraq's unprovoked aggression against Kuwait and had taken appropriate and measured steps to implement the Council's resolution calling for immediate and unconditional withdrawal. Concerted action under Article 41 was already having an effect. However, should Iraq continue to ignore and deny the international community, the Council would have to take further measures as prefigured in the resolution just adopted. The United States would actively support such efforts. In the new resolution, the Council had spoken out clearly against Iraq's efforts to destroy the sovereign State of Kuwait through organized looting, destruction, systematic terrorizing of local and foreign innocent civilians, and even murder. The resolution made it clear, moreover, that Iraq was liable for full restitution or compensation for the losses and damages it had caused by its illegal invasion and occupation of Kuwait. The speaker anticipated that the Council would address this question more fully in the days ahead. Baghdad must hear from the Council clearly: unprovoked aggression entailed crippling costs. By its resolution, the Council also demanded that Iraq cease its deliberate mistreatment of innocent citizens and observe the fundamental principles of international conduct among States. The speaker stressed, in this regard, that every nation had a duty to protect its citizens; this was a fundamental obligation. The United States would do that which was necessary to meet its obligations to its own citizens.¹³¹

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, stated that the continued assertion by the Iraqi authorities that Kuwait was the nineteenth province of Iraq — in defiance of Security Council resolutions 660 (1990) and 662

(1990) — alone underlined the need for further action by the Council to remind Iraq of the determination of the international community that it should end its illegal acts. He set out the basis for several of the provisions of the resolution just adopted. The arbitrary arrests, beatings and killings by the occupying forces justified the need for States to collate information they had on grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention and of international law, as set out in paragraph 2. Iraq's continued looting and pillaging of Kuwait, and destruction of its infrastructure, provided the basis for the requirements for restitution and compensation set out in paragraphs 8 and 9 of the resolution. The speaker stressed the desirability of a peaceful solution to the crisis, but reiterated that a settlement could come about only through Iraq's compliance with the Council's resolutions. His delegation had complete confidence in the Secretary-General, whose efforts to explore the prospects for a peaceful settlement had been rebuffed by the Government of Iraq late in August. It supported the Secretary-General's use of his good offices, but underlined that this should occur "as and when he considered it appropriate". The resolution just adopted demonstrated the Council's determination to maintain pressure against Iraq until such time as its illegal behaviour was brought to an end. Other measures of enforcement, including those under Chapter VII of the Charter, would need to be taken to bring this about if Iraq showed no willingness to move.¹³²

At the same meeting, the representatives of Canada, Côte d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Romania and Zaire, who had either sponsored or supported resolution 674 (1990), drew attention to the balanced nature of the text.¹³³ In the face of Iraq's persistent defiance, the Council had sent a clear message that its unity and resolve to end the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait were as strong as ever. Iraq would, moreover, be held responsible for the lawlessness perpetrated by its occupation, with all its attendant consequences. At the same time, the resolution stressed the need to press ahead with the quest for a peaceful solution to the crisis, provided that it resulted in Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait without further delay. Several speakers emphasized the importance of encouraging the Secretary-General to use his good offices in this regard,¹³⁴ as reflected in paragraph 12 of the resolution. One¹³⁵ drew attention to the fact that in the resolution the Council once again signalled that should Iraq continue blatantly to ignore the will of the international community, as expressed by the Council, further measures under the Charter would be required.

At the 2959th meeting, on 27 November 1990, the President of the Council (United States) stated, before the adoption of the agenda, that he had been informed by the representative of Kuwait that he intended during his statement to utilize audio-visual materials relating to the item under consideration. In keeping with past practice, the President had accordingly requested the Secretariat to make the necessary technical arrangements. He then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the provisional agenda for the meeting.¹³⁶

Speaking on a point of order, the representative of Cuba proposed that an additional item be added to the provisional agenda, so that the Council could consider a draft resolution¹³⁷ on the situation in the territories occupied by Israel. This gave rise to a procedural discussion,¹³⁸ relating to the preparation of the provisional agenda, which concluded with the acceptance of an invitation by the President to Council members to meet in informal consultations immediately following the statement by the representative of Kuwait.

The original agenda was thereupon adopted without objection. The Council continued its consideration of the item entitled “The situation between Iraq and Kuwait” at its 2959th, 2960th and 2962nd meetings, on 27 and 28 November 1990.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Kuwait to take a seat at the Council table, in accordance with the decisions taken at its 2950th meeting. The following were also invited, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 2959th meeting, the representatives of Bahrain, Egypt and Saudi Arabia; at the 2960th meeting, the representative of Qatar; and at the 2962nd meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, the Islamic Republic of Iran and the United Arab Emirates. The Council also decided, at the request of the representative of Egypt, to extend an invitation at its 2959th meeting to Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference to the United Nations, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure.

At the 2959th meeting, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Kuwait,¹³⁹ which was subsequently co-sponsored by Canada, Côte d’Ivoire, Ethiopia, Finland, Romania, the United Kingdom and Zaire. He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.¹⁴⁰

At the same meeting, the representative of Kuwait observed that 116 days had passed since the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait. During that period, the Security Council had adopted 10 resolutions under Chapter VII of the Charter demanding Iraq’s immediate and unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait. However, the Iraqi regime had rejected any move towards peace: it had rejected the resolutions of the Council, as well as those of the League of Arab States, the Islamic Conference and the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. It had rejected even the humanitarian endeavours of the Secretary-General, and had refused to receive any team from the International Committee of the Red Cross or any other international or regional humanitarian agency. In its aggression and occupation of Kuwait, the Iraqi regime had not only targeted the territory for expansion, but had gone far beyond that. It had embarked upon unprovoked killings, torture, displacement, rape, humiliation and intimidation of innocent civilians, organized looting of all movable items, and the destruction of immovable assets. The speaker introduced several speakers who spoke on videotape about their experiences under the occupation and its effects on individuals and the economy in Kuwait. He also showed several slides depicting the economic implications of the occupation both on the Kuwaiti economy and on other countries. Following this presentation, the representative of Kuwait contended that the Iraqi goal in all those inhumane practices was to wipe out the Kuwaiti identity by changing the demographic composition of the country. That had been evident when the occupying army had begun confiscating all Kuwaiti identification documents, including citizenship certificates, passports, driving licences and identity cards, and burning the archives of many ministries dealing with citizens' affairs. Some Kuwaitis, however, had managed to transfer out of the country the civil records of Kuwait's total population up to the first day of August 1990. The speaker asked the Council to adopt the draft resolution before it, which would authorize the Secretary-General to keep those records at the United Nations as the legal and official instrument to be relied on when Kuwait was liberated. He added that the current conditions called, inter alia, for protection of the civilian population, in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949, and its Additional Protocol II of 1977, as well as the ensuring of their security, safety and their right to remain on their land; and the inviolability of Kuwait's demographic composition. He also requested the Council to form a fact-finding commission and to dispatch it to Kuwait to assess the extent of destruction and sabotage of assets and properties belonging to the Government, individuals and companies, and to assess reparations for them. Further, he requested the Council to protect the Kuwaiti captives and to ensure their humane treatment in accordance with the First and Third Geneva Conventions of 1949. Finally, the speaker observed that, although the Charter called for the peaceful settlement of disputes, in Article 2 (3 and 4), it also provided a remedy when peaceful endeavours failed: in Articles 41 and 42 in Chapter VII. He stated that the Security Council, as custodian of the Charter, must not allow aggression to continue to stand or be rewarded. That would undermine the edifice of the international order.¹⁴¹

In accordance with the understanding reached earlier in the meeting, the President then adjourned the meeting and invited the members to join him for informal consultations. He stated that the next meeting of the Council to continue consideration of the item on its agenda would be fixed in consultation with the members of the Council.

At the 2960th meeting, on 27 November 1990, the representative of Saudi Arabia expressed abhorrence of the crimes being committed by the Iraqi occupying forces in Kuwait against Kuwaitis and foreigners alike, as described by the representative of Kuwait, condemned the Iraqi regime and charged it with full responsibility for its invasion of Kuwait and violations of law committed during the occupation. He regretted hearing some calls aimed at appeasing the situation and condoning the crimes. He insisted that the Arab and Muslim nation, the international community and the Security Council must shoulder their responsibility to remove injustice from Kuwait, to check the aggressors, return the whole country to its people, make those responsible bear the consequences of their actions, and safeguard the security of the region and its countries from their evil intentions. Noting that the Council would be meeting again on 29 November to discuss the situation, the speaker looked forward to its taking a firm stand, which he hoped would set matters right before they ran out of control.¹⁴²

The representative of Egypt echoed those views, adding that his country joined with Kuwait in calling upon the Council to adopt the resolutions necessary to safeguard the national identity of the Kuwaiti people and to record all instances of subversion and aggression against that identity until the legitimate Government was returned to power and the Kuwaiti people were liberated from the yoke of occupation. With regard to the latter, he stated that the sole way to ensure respect for human rights of peoples under occupation was for that occupation to end: that applied to Kuwait as it did to any other occupied territory or country. The speaker concluded by quoting from a recent statement by the President of Egypt: "In the coming difficult weeks, we will spare no effort to reach a peaceful solution to the Gulf crisis. However, Kuwait must be liberated and the wrongs and injustice against it must be righted.”¹⁴³

At the same meeting and the 2962nd meeting, on 28 November 1990, the representatives of Bahrain, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, and Mr. A. Engin Ansary, Permanent Observer of OIC to the United Nations, expressed outrage and grave concern at the horrific acts perpetrated by Iraq’s occupation forces in Kuwait against Kuwaiti citizens and foreigners. Those acts constituted serious violations of international humanitarian law, and included grave breaches of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War for which the Iraqi authorities would be held responsible. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran added that the only means of establishing peace in the Gulf area was through the implementation of relevant Security Council resolutions and the total withdrawal of foreign forces from this sensitive region.¹⁴⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that the Council had repeatedly reminded Iraq in recent weeks of its obligations under international humanitarian law, including the Fourth Geneva Convention. It had done so most recently in resolution 674 (1990), adopted on 29 October. Iraq had, however, persistently acted with a callous disregard of the Convention. Far from observing its provisions, it was engaged in a determined campaign to expunge the very identity of the State of Kuwait and to change its demographic structure. Each day, Iraq advanced further down that road. It was the duty of the international community to demonstrate to Iraq that aggression did not pay, and to bring the occupation to an end as quickly as possible in conformity with the resolutions of the Council.¹⁴⁵

The representative of France stated that the shocking testimony they had heard confirmed the reality and magnitude of the human rights violations committed by the Iraqi occupation forces in Kuwait. He stressed that the international community should mobilize to help preserve the national identity of

Kuwait, now threatened with systematic destruction by the occupier.¹⁴⁶

The President, in his capacity as the representative of the United States, cited further instances of grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention committed by Iraqi authorities. Underlying those horrifying Iraqi crimes was a declared policy just as unacceptable and abhorrent as the acts it had engendered: to eradicate the sovereign and independent State of Kuwait. That policy must fail. States Members of the United Nations were all bound by their Charter obligations to oppose Iraq’s policy, accomplish the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and to obtain the re-establishment of legitimate Kuwaiti authority. The speaker was confident that the Council, in line with the careful and patient decisions it had taken since the crisis began on 2 August, retained its determination to take effective measures to suppress the Iraqi aggression and to reaffirm the principles on which a safe, secure and prosperous world must rest.¹⁴⁷

At the 2962nd meeting, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 677 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990 and 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990,

Reiterating its concern for the suffering caused to individuals in Kuwait as a result of the invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq,

Gravely concerned at the ongoing attempt by Iraq to alter the demographic composition of Kuwait and to destroy the civil records maintained by the legitimate Government of Kuwait,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns the attempts by Iraq to alter the demographic composition of Kuwait and to destroy the civil records maintained by the legitimate Government of Kuwait;

2. Mandates the Secretary-General to take custody of a copy of the population register of Kuwait, the authenticity of which has been certified by the legitimate Government of Kuwait and which covers the registration of the population up to 1 August 1990;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, in cooperation with the legitimate Government of Kuwait, an order of rules and regulations governing access to and use of the said copy of the population register.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Kuwait expressed his gratitude to all the members of the Council for voting in favour of the resolution just adopted. In doing so, they had reaffirmed that the invading Iraqi regime's practices were null and void in their bid to obliterate Kuwaiti identity.

Decision of 29 November 1990
(2963rd meeting): resolution 678 (1990)

At its 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and, in accordance with the decisions taken previously, invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table.

The President of the Council (United States) noted that the following members of the Council were represented by their Foreign Ministers: Canada, China, Cuba, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Malaysia, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire. He stated that their presence there, for only the fourth time in the Security Council's history that Foreign Ministers had assembled, symbolized the seriousness of the present situation and the significance of the meeting.

He began the meeting with the following quotation, which he believed aptly set the context for the Council's discussions that day:

There is no precedent for a people being the victim of such injustice and of being at present threatened by abandonment to an aggressor. Also, there has never before been an example of any government proceeding with the systematic extermination of a nation by barbarous means in violation of the most solemn promises made to all the nations of the Earth that there should be no resort to a war of conquest and that there should not be used against innocent human beings terrible poison and harmful gases.

He stated that, although those words could well have come from the Emir of Kuwait, they had not. They had been spoken by Haile Selassie, the leader of Ethiopia, in 1936, a man who had seen his country conquered and occupied, as Kuwait had been since 2 August. Sadly, that appeal to the League of Nations had fallen upon deaf ears, the League's efforts to redress aggression had failed and international disorder and war had ensued. History had now given the international community another chance. With the end of the cold war, there was a chance to build the world envisaged by the founders of the United Nations, a chance to make the Security Council and the Organization true instruments for peace and justice across the globe. The United Nations must not be allowed to go the way of the League of Nations. The threat to international peace created by Iraq's aggression must be met. The debate the Council was about to have would, therefore, rank as one of the most important in the history of the United Nations. It would surely do much to determine the future of the Organization. The Council's aim must be to convince Saddam Hussein that the just and humane demands of the Council and of the international community could not be ignored. If Iraq did not reverse its course peacefully, then other necessary measures, including the use of force, should be authorized. The choice must be put to the Iraqi leader in unmistakable terms.¹⁴⁸

The President then drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Canada, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States,¹⁴⁹ which Romania and France had joined in sponsoring.

The representative of Kuwait expressed the hope that the Council's historic meeting would reflect the true voice of the international community, showing a landmark united stand condemning aggression and demonstrating yet again its resolve to counter it. He paid tribute to the Foreign Ministers attending the meeting, whose presence underlined its historic importance and was viewed by the Kuwaiti people as an expression of support. The Council had convened that day to express its resolve that the principles of the Charter should take concrete form and that the principle of collective security should be the framework for regulating international relations, so that people might rest assured that the strong would not prey on the weak and that those who harboured aggressive intentions should hesitate and consider before resorting to force because they now knew that the world would reverse their aggression. The speaker paid tribute to those countries that had contributed to the multinational force, which was a concrete translation of the international community's determination to stand firm against aggression and to ensure that the use of force bore no rewards. He reiterated that the Iraqi aggression had not been limited to the occupation of land but had become a systematic campaign to destroy the economic and social infrastructure of Kuwait, and to transform its demographic composition. He recalled that the Council had adopted 11 mandatory resolutions under Chapter VII of the Charter in which it had demanded the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, and had sought to secure Iraqi compliance by peaceful means through the imposition of a total economic embargo, together with other measures; that similar resolutions had been adopted at the pan-Arab, pan-Islamic level and within the framework of the Non-Aligned Movement; that personal initiatives and endeavours had been undertaken by prominent personalities, including the Secretary-General and envoys from the Soviet Union, China and other countries, aimed at persuading the Iraqi leadership to respond to the international will; and that efforts in the same vein had also been made by some Arab States whose positions were not totally in line with the Security Council resolutions and who had kept open the channels of communication with Baghdad. Despite all those efforts and good offices, however, the Iraqi regime persisted in its intransigence and obduracy, rejecting all overtures, disdaining all peaceful attempts, and defying the international community. No one could claim now that the international community had not given Iraq a full opportunity to comply with the international will or that the international community had not offered good, feasible grounds for a peaceful settlement. The speaker observed that the Iraqi regime had sought to deflect attention from its aggression against Kuwait by invoking issues that had nothing to do with it: it cited, for instance, the danger of the foreign presence in the region, but it knew that it was the real reason for that presence; and it attempted to link its aggression against and occupation of Kuwait to the question of Palestine, calling for an Arab solution, from which, however, it was the first to dissent and which it used to sow dissension among Arab ranks. The speaker concluded that the international community, represented by the Security Council, should therefore feel free, at that stage, to use all necessary means available to it and in cooperation with the Government of Kuwait, as provided for in the draft resolution, to implement the Council's resolutions so as to put an end to Iraq's defiance and opposition to the will of the international community.¹⁵⁰

¹⁴⁹ S/21969; subsequently adopted without change as resolution 678 (1990).

The representative of Iraq recalled that when, on 25 August, the Council had been debating the text that became resolution 665 (1990), he had tried in his statement to focus the Council's attention on the legal requirements which it must observe in adopting any resolution involving the use of force. Otherwise, he had argued, the Council would be acting beyond its jurisdiction and its action should be deemed null and void. He believed that the same argument applied in the current situation, for an even better reason. For, under the Charter, any use of force was deemed to be an act of aggression except in three exceptional cases: (1) a case involving self-defence under Article 51, wherein the use of force was limited to the period until the Security Council was seized of the matter; (2) a situation in which sanctions under Article 41 had proved to be ineffective, in which case the Council could act collectively under Article 42 and could use force in accordance with the mechanism provided for in Article 43 — that is, under the command and control of the Security Council, in coordination with the Military Staff Committee; and (3) a case under Article 106, which provided that should the Council fail to reach special agreements with Member States to put forces under Security Council command, the parties to the Four-Nation Declaration of October 1943, together with France, could, in consultation with other Members of the United Nations, undertake joint action on behalf of the Organization against any country. Those were the three exclusive cases in which the use of force might legally be authorized by the Security Council. However, the Council had apparently considered that in the present case the legal requirements were “disposable niceties”.

The speaker accordingly wished to focus attention on the political aspects of the dispute. The implication of the draft resolution before the Council was that Iraq knew nothing but the use of force. That was not correct. His Government had advocated peace, and continued to do so. However, it wanted a comprehensive, durable and just peace that would safeguard the rights of all parties. That entailed dialogue with the Government of his country, but that had been blocked by the United States. As a cover for its aggressive and imperialist policies in the region, the United States alleged that the crisis was not the result of its stand against Iraq; it claimed that the world stood against Iraq in a manner unprecedented in the annals of the United Nations. However, that simply exposed the fact that it was only small States that did not enjoy veto power in the Security Council or the protection of a super-Power permanent member that were subject to sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter. Thus, for instance, the United States had, over many years, forestalled international unanimity and prevented the imposition of sanctions on Israel for its expansionist and aggressive policies against the Palestinians and the Arab people at large. Indeed, the current crisis had shown, among other things, that the United States totally dominated the Security Council and its arbitrary and biased procedures. The speaker reiterated that Iraq desired peace — not for itself alone, but for the entire Middle East region, on the basis of the implementation of all Security Council resolutions. That approach had been embodied in the initiative set out by the President of Iraq, Saddam Hussein, on 12 August. He argued that the problems of the Middle East were not isolated from one another, but had common historical roots and were linked politically. It was clear that one problem often caused the eruption of other problems, and that the current situation in the region was also the result of the effects of a chronic problem that remained unresolved. Linkage between the problems in the region was therefore natural and logical. The speaker concluded by asking whether the Council would measure up to its historic responsibility of establishing a comprehensive, just and lasting peace through an integrated approach which dealt with all the problems of the region. For Iraq's part, it desired peace. However, if the United States imposed war upon it, the Iraqi people would defend itself against injustice and tyranny.¹⁵¹

The Council then proceeded to vote on the draft resolution before it. Speaking before the vote, the representatives of Yemen and Cuba expressed their opposition to it and the representative of China his reasons for abstaining.

The representative of Yemen stated that the credibility of the Council was at stake as it was not applying the same standards to another crisis in the Middle East region as it was to the crisis in the Gulf: he drew attention to the plight of the Palestinian people that had been systematically denied its basic right to national self-determination. On the Gulf crisis, he observed that since the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, the Council had adopted 11 resolutions, calling for the complete withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait, the immediate release of all hostages and the restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait. Moreover, the Council had imposed on Iraq the most sweeping and enforceable sanctions regime to secure the implementation of those resolutions. The draft resolution before the Council would, in effect, authorize States to use force in order to ensure Iraq's compliance. Yemen could not support a draft resolution that would authorize States to use force, for the following reasons. First, the draft text was so broad and vague that it was not limited to the purpose of enforcing the Council's 11 resolutions. It would thus be up to those States with military forces in the area to decide on the prerequisites for the restoration of international peace and security in the region, which might lead to a military confrontation on a larger scale. Secondly, the draft text was not related to a specific article in Chapter VII of the Charter; hence the Council would have no control over those forces, which would fly their own national flags. Furthermore, the command of those forces would have nothing to do with the United Nations, although their actions would have been authorized by the Security Council. It was a classic example of authority without accountability. Yemen advocated a peaceful approach to resolving the crisis, in accordance with relevant Council resolutions. It believed that the comprehensive and almost totally airtight sanctions regime would eventually force Iraq to comply and withdraw from Kuwait. It was too early to say that sanctions were not working; patience was needed. A peaceful approach to the crisis should also involve active diplomatic activity.¹⁵²

The representative of Cuba stated that his country did not seek to establish any linkage between an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait and the situation in the Arab territories occupied by Israel; but he asked whether it was not incongruous to invoke norms for some that were ignored for others. He added that the President of the Council, bypassing the established rules and procedures, had ignored a request to convene the Council in order to consider a draft resolution prepared contemporaneously, on the subject of Palestine.¹⁵³ As for the draft resolution under consideration, Cuba believed that it would not be advisable to adopt a resolution which was a virtual declaration of war, a fixed-term ultimatum before hostilities were launched, and which was equivalent to giving the United States and its allies carte blanche to use their enormous sophisticated military capability. Moreover, the text violated the Charter by authorizing some States to use military force in total disregard of the procedures established by the Charter. Cuba would have favoured a firm resolution aimed at ensuring respect for the will of the international community, and at the same time being generous and magnanimous, a resolution that rectified the decision to prevent food and medicine from reaching vulnerable groups in Iraq. This would have given great moral authority to the United Nations, lending force to its demands.¹⁵⁴

The representative of China stated that, as a result of his visits to countries in the region, he believed that members of the international community, including his country, shared common ground on the Gulf crisis on two points: they all opposed the Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait and called on Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait immediately, while at the same time, they all wished to see the crisis settled through peaceful means. The United Nations, as an international organization for the maintenance of peace and security, should act with caution and avoid taking hasty action on such a major question as authorizing some Member States to take military action against another Member State. China had voted in favour of the resolutions adopted on the subject thus far because, although the sanctions measures were severe, they were not in the domain of the use of force. However, in the draft resolution before the Council, the wording “use all necessary means” was used, which, in essence, permitted the use of military action. That ran counter to the consistent position of the Government of China, which was to try its utmost to seek a peaceful solution. The Chinese delegation could not, therefore, vote in favour of the draft resolution. On the other hand, the Gulf crisis had arisen as a result of the Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait, and Iraq had thus far not taken any practical steps on the key question of withdrawing troops from Kuwait. In this connection, the speaker noted that the draft resolution would call on Iraq to comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and the subsequent relevant Council resolutions urging Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait immediately. Since China was in favour of that position, it would not cast a negative vote on the draft resolution either. The speaker concluded by stressing that the international community should maintain and strengthen its political, diplomatic and economic pressure on Iraq, in the hope of securing a peaceful solution to the crisis.¹⁵⁵

The representative of Colombia said that it was the Council’s responsibility, in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter, not merely to threaten Iraq but also to take positive action towards achieving a peaceful settlement. If today the Council was opening the way for the option of using force, let it do the same for the peace option. In Colombia’s view, the best hope of reaching a peaceful solution lay in creating a framework for negotiations. Such a framework would address the future of the economic sanctions, of procedures for settling the financial claims and territorial disputes, and what procedure would be followed in guaranteeing regional peace and stability. Clarifying those issues could facilitate compliance with Security Council resolutions without in any way rewarding the invader for his action. As the countdown began towards the deadline of 15 January 1991 set out in the draft resolution, Colombia wished the Secretary-General to make continuous use of his good offices, and would itself step up its own efforts to promote a peaceful settlement of the conflict. The draft resolution afforded Iraq one last opportunity to react and withdraw its troops peacefully from Kuwaiti territory. This pause of goodwill must not, however, be misinterpreted by the Iraqi authorities since the members of the Council, in authorizing Member States to use all necessary means, were expressing a clear position which, if ignored, would place full responsibility for ensuing developments on them. Hoping that reason would prevail, the speaker announced that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution.¹⁵⁶

The representative of Zaire praised the spirit of cooperation in the Security Council which had enabled its members to act with greater unity. Reminding Iraq of its obligations as a Member of the United Nations and a member of the Non-Aligned Movement, he urged the Iraqi authorities to think again and peacefully withdraw from Kuwait before the deadline laid down in the draft resolution. He stressed that the international community and the members of the Council, motivated by the purposes of the Charter and responsible for maintaining international peace and security while guaranteeing the political independence and territorial integrity of States Members of the Organization, could not tolerate this affront by a single Member State. Aware, however, of its historic responsibilities, the Security Council could not envisage other measures against Iraq without giving it a reasonable pause for reflection after four months of refusal to withdraw from Kuwait. The Council had therefore felt that it should be granted an additional delay of at least 45 days so that it might comply with the resolutions adopted by the Council so far and restore to Kuwait its independence and territorial integrity. It was in that context that one must view the current initiative of the Council, authorizing all Member States cooperating closely with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to implement resolution 660 (1990) and to restore international peace and security in the area, unless by 15 January 1991 Iraq had withdrawn all of its forces from Kuwait.¹⁵⁷

The representative of Ethiopia recalled the serious failure of the League of Nations to act in defence of its own Covenant 55 years before, and take a stand against the blatant aggression committed by an expansionist State against the Ethiopian people. With the benefit of hindsight, it was often asserted, perhaps rightly, that had the League of Nations acted more forcefully and in unison at that critical time in defence of international legality, the world might have been spared the destruction and tragedy of the Second World War. In the 1990s, the international community must not repeat the mistakes of the 1930s. Almost four months had elapsed since the invasion of Kuwait. During that time, numerous diplomatic efforts had been made to resolve the crisis peacefully. However, the peaceful measures taken so far, including economic sanctions, had not produced the desired results, for the occupation of Kuwait continued. Although the patience of the world community was running out, the Council was offering Iraq one more chance to respect the will of the international community and withdraw from Kuwait within the time frame provided for in the draft resolution. The speaker observed that many had argued that the international community must wait still longer before considering additional measures. However, experience had shown that economic sanctions could have an effect only with the passage of time, and with complete, universal compliance. More importantly, the people of Kuwait rightfully demanded the immediate restoration of their sovereignty. The Council must not, therefore, wait much longer, for justice delayed could be justice denied. The speaker added that thinking should begin about a post-Iraqi-withdrawal scenario. In that context, the Council should reaffirm and strengthen its determination to work towards peace and stability in the entire region. He concluded that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution to underline its determination that aggression should be thwarted and not rewarded.¹⁵⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 12 votes in favour, 2 against (Cuba, Yemen) and 1 abstention (China), as resolution 678 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990 and 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990,

Noting that, despite all efforts by the United Nations, Iraq refuses to comply with its obligation to implement resolution 660 (1990) and the above-mentioned subsequent relevant resolutions, in flagrant contempt of the Security Council,

Mindful of its duties and responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance and preservation of international peace and security,

Determined to secure full compliance with its decisions,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Demands that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and decides, while maintaining all its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so;

2. Authorizes Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully implements, as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the above-mentioned resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area;

3. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of paragraph 2 above;

¹⁵⁸ Ibid., pp. 48-52.

4. Requests the States concerned to keep the Security Council regularly informed on the progress of actions undertaken pursuant to paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

5. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stated that the fact that the Council was meeting for the second time that year at the level of Foreign Ministers — once again, as on 25 September, to discuss the crisis resulting from Iraq's aggression against Kuwait — underlined the seriousness with which the international community viewed the situation and the extent to which its continuation, in defiance of the Council's successive resolutions, was provocative and unacceptable. In the wake of recent developments in international relations, conditions had been created conducive to a new world order that respected sovereignties and identities. Could the Council then tolerate such a blatant challenge for any extended period of time, especially in a region which was so highly sensitive, where the expectations for security and stability called for special consideration? Since the Council's calls had fallen on deaf ears, it was compelled to resort to a higher level of pressure in the face of the continuing challenge to the international community. That was the meaning of the resolution just adopted: it constituted one last invitation to implement the Council's resolutions, coupled with a warning which opened the way to the use of direct means of action. If Iraq chose to remain locked into the use of force, the Council was left with no other choice but to resort to the same means. While France was committed to the search for a peaceful solution, Iraq's leaders must entertain no doubt as to the Council's resolve. Law must prevail, and the goal the Council had set in its resolutions must be achieved. That was in the interest of all States; at stake was the future of relations among States in building a more secure and stable world. It was in that spirit that France had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted. The speaker added three further comments regarding the meaning of his country's vote. First, assuming there were no adverse changes in the circumstances, France did not intend to introduce or support any further action extending the scope or nature of the sanctions in place, or any new Council measures regarding Iraq until the date of the expiry of the deadline in paragraph 2 of the resolution. Secondly, that undertaking was without prejudice to the rights of his Government under the Charter, including its rights in the event that the Government of Iraq allowed any harm to come to foreign nationals held against their will by that Government. Finally, his Government recalled the terms of paragraph 13 of resolution 670 (1990), under which individuals were personally responsible for grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention, and stated that those involved in violations of the laws relating to armed conflict, including the prohibition against initiating the use of chemical and biological weapons contrary to the Geneva Protocol of 1925, to which Iraq was a party, would similarly be held personally responsible.¹⁵⁹

The representative of Canada stated that Foreign Ministers had gathered, for a second time in the Council's consideration of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, to adopt a resolution which demonstrated that their collective resolve was firm. They were determined to respond to the challenge of Iraq's aggression, which went to the heart of what they had been trying to do at and through the United Nations for the previous 45 years: their attempt to build a workable world Organization able to prevent, or to reverse, the most blatant and dangerous of international offences — the acquisition by force of another country's territory and, in this specific case, an effort to extinguish a United Nations Member in its entirety. The speaker quoted the Prime Minister of Canada to the effect that Canada stood with the overwhelming majority of the world community, including its partners on the Security Council, in giving Saddam Hussein an opportunity to reflect carefully on the consequences of his action and a reasonable timetable to withdraw from Kuwait. It saw no contradiction between continuing to apply pressure through economic sanctions — giving diplomacy a chance — and giving President Hussein a period of time to withdraw from Kuwait. The speaker stressed that, in the resolution just adopted, the Council was saying that, should Iraq choose to ignore its obligations under international law, and under Security Council resolutions, the Member States, cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, would be authorized to use all necessary means, including the use of force, to ensure Iraq's compliance with those resolutions. Whether force was actually used was up to Iraq. It had been offered a pause of goodwill — a period of time in which it could reverse the actions it had taken. If Iraq did have legitimate concerns with Kuwait, those should be negotiated by the two Governments, as contemplated in resolution 660 (1990), the first

adopted by the Council in response to the invasion. However, Iraq must first comply with the Council's resolutions. As to other existing tensions in the Middle East, Canada believed that, if the new unity of the international community and collective determination of the Security Council could be sustained, then a just, lasting and comprehensive solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute might be within grasp. That was a matter that could only be addressed, however, separately from the current crisis; Iraq's offence was sui generis and its undoing, according to the principles of international law and the interests of international security, was essential.¹⁶⁰

The representative of Malaysia observed that the resolution just adopted presented Iraq, in clear terms, with the choice of complying with the relevant resolutions within a specific time frame or facing the certainty of force authorized by the Council. The decision to support the resolution had not been an easy one for his country. However, as a small nation and a member of the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Non-Aligned Movement, it was Malaysia's duty to support and uphold the unity and resolve of the Council to reverse aggression and to restore peace. Malaysia's stand against strong nations invading or annexing small ones was well known; it applied not only to Iraq but to all others. The international community could not compromise on this if it were to build strong foundations for a new world order. As for allowing more time for sanctions to have the necessary impact, the Council was faced with the reality that it would be months before it could be deduced that sanctions had had effects. In the meantime, Iraq had shown no indication of complying with the Council's resolutions, the destruction of Kuwait and the atrocities against its people continued, and several thousand foreigners remained as hostages. Malaysia wished to make it clear, however, that its support for resolution 678 (1990) was not without reservations. The authorization of force, in the event that Iraq did not comply within the time frame specified, could only be done under the terms of the Charter of the United Nations. Malaysia had not agreed to any attempt unilaterally to apply Article 51 of the Charter once the Council was seized of the matter. In this regard, it had always insisted on the centrality of the United Nations role in the maintenance of international peace and security. Any proposed use of force must be brought before the Council for its prior approval, in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter. The speaker regretted that the resolution did not adequately reflect the point that when the Council authorized countries to use force, those countries were fully accountable for their actions to the Council through a clear system of reporting and accountability. Such a precedent might not bode well for the future. He added that resolution 678 (1990) did not provide a blank cheque for an excessive or indiscriminate use of force. The Council had not authorized actions outside the context of its resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990). Malaysia warned against any action purportedly taken under the resolution that would lead to the virtual destruction of Iraq. On the question of the Palestinians in the occupied territories, the speaker expressed his disappointment with the Council over its inability for more than three weeks to address the matter properly and have a vote, which raised questions on the procedure and conduct of the Council.¹⁶¹ While it was absurd to speak of linkages, each action of the Council was evaluated, one against the other. With regard to the situation under consideration, his delegation hoped that Iraq would take advantage of the period given, as a pause of goodwill, for it to take stock of the situation. Steps taken by Iraq to comply with the relevant resolutions would enhance the prospects for a peace framework that would fully address issues between Iraq and Kuwait, bring about an early removal of foreign forces from the region, and allow for a positive consideration of the wider questions of peace and security in the region. Efforts along those lines being pursued by Colombia had Malaysia's support. It felt that such a framework could become a complement to resolution 678 (1990), facilitating Iraqi compliance. The speaker concluded by imploring Iraq to comply with the Council's resolutions, adding that the onus for the avoidance of the use of force was clearly on Iraq.¹⁶²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Council had gathered to make a strong bid for peace. No State represented on the Council had any zest for war. With the resolution just adopted, the Council had put into place the latest and strongest of the peaceful pressures on Iraq. The speaker acknowledged that there had been many acts of international injustice since 1945, and that too many of them still persisted. However, in a world composed of nation States, and in an organization like the United Nations, which consisted solely of nation States, the obliteration of one Member State by another was an act on its own. Such an act of aggression undermined and threatened the whole structure of international order. The response of the international community had therefore been swift and severe, but also peaceful. Nearly four months had passed since the aggression. Sanctions were in place and had been convincingly applied. One of the main purposes of the resolution just adopted was to remove any uncertainties and set out for Iraq exactly how it stood and how the Council stood. There was no ambiguity about what the Council required: Iraq must withdraw all its forces unconditionally and completely to the positions on which they had stood on 1 August. If not, then Member States, acting with the Government of Kuwait, were authorized to use such force as necessary to compel compliance. Like the representative of France, the speaker stated that, from then until the expiry of the 15 January 1991 deadline, unless there was any adverse change in circumstances, his Government did not intend to introduce or support any Council action to extend the scope or nature of the sanctions or any new measures in the Council against Iraq. However, it reserved its rights under the Charter should Iraq allow any harm to come to the foreign nationals whom it was holding against their will. He also recalled the terms of paragraph 13 of resolution 670 (1990), under which individuals were held personally responsible for grave breaches of the Geneva Convention, and stated that the United Kingdom would also hold personally responsible those involved in violations of the laws of armed conflict, including the prohibition against initiating the use of chemicals or biological weapons contrary to the Geneva Protocol of 1925, to which Iraq was a party. The speaker concluded that there was an option for peace, which Iraq held in its hands. The international community had not added that day to its demands. It was not asking for anything except the reversal of the aggression. The Iraqis now had a period of grace in which to respond. By 15 January — the date in the resolution — the aggression would be nearly six months old. No one could accuse the Council of impatience. The military option was reality, not bluff; if it had to be used, it would be used with the full backing of the Council.¹⁶³

The representative of Finland said that the invasion of Iraq by Kuwait had created a situation of unprecedented danger. Iraqi aggression imperilled the very existence of a State Member of the Organization, had created human suffering on a vast scale, and directly challenged the system of collective security under the Charter. Collective security meant that the security of Kuwait was also the security of all other States, particularly of the smaller ones. The foundations of their own security were at stake. The world community had shown determination in the face of that aggression: the occupation would not be allowed to stand. However, it had also shown much patience. The Council had taken action as provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter, with the sanctions imposed four months before remaining the principal instrument deployed to persuade the Iraqi leadership of the need to change course. According to the Charter, should the Council consider that economic and diplomatic measures have proved to be inadequate, it may take further action as may be necessary to restore international peace and security. Acting under those provisions, the Council was simply giving effect to what was the core of the United Nations system of collective security. The authority of the Council must be upheld. It was confronted with the situation in which one Member State claimed the right to obliterate another. Such an act was precisely the kind of aggression that the drafters of the Charter had intended to prevent, and if necessary, suppress. The speaker concluded that it was late, but not yet too late for Iraq to do what was necessary for the achievement of a peaceful solution to the crisis. The resolution just adopted should be regarded as a warning. As others had noted, there were no plans to extend in the coming period, until the date mentioned in the resolution, the scope of the sanctions already in force. Those weeks should be fully used to achieve a peaceful way out of the crisis. The good offices of the Secretary-General were available in that regard.¹⁶⁴

The representative of Côte d'Ivoire stated that the resolution just adopted was a logical outcome of Iraq's non-compliance with the resolutions adopted earlier by the Council, especially resolution 660 (1990). The Iraqi leaders would not attain their objective of leading the international community to accept out of weariness a situation entailing the occupation, subjugation and destruction of an independent State Member of the United Nations. The international community could not allow a dangerous precedent to be set that would create serious threats to the peace for the great majority of the small States that made up the United Nations and for which the Charter was the best shield in the preservation of their sovereignty and integrity. It could not allow aggression such as that committed by Iraq against a small neighbouring country to thwart the Organization's efforts to establish peace, whether regional or global. The speaker said that his Government hoped that the resolution just adopted would be perceived by Iraq's leaders as a reflection of the international community's determination to ensure respect, by all necessary means, for the purposes and principles of the Charter. Further, it hoped that the ultimate goal of the resolution was, according to the well-known adage, to know how to show one's strength in order not to have to use it.¹⁶⁵

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics underlined the logic in the actions of the Council, which from the outset had acted with cohesion and consistency and, at the same time, in a responsible and prudent manner, in strict conformity with the letter and spirit of the Charter in its modern interpretation. There was justice and a large measure of magnanimity in the resolution just adopted. As the end of the fourth month of the crisis approached, the international community was showing genuine magnanimity and giving the side that had breached the peace time to think again. At the same time, it was giving the victim in the crisis a firm pledge that it would not have to wait much longer, that help was on the way and that its rights would be fully restored. The countdown of the "pause of goodwill" had started that day. The Soviet Union believed that it would usher in a transition to a political settlement. No member of the Council wanted or sought a tragic outcome. However, there should be no mistake about the collective will of the international community as expressed in the Council, or about its resolve and readiness to act. Those who had breached the peace should know that "all necessary means" would indeed inexorably be used against them. The speaker added that the Soviet Union, like some previous speakers, did not favour linkages in politics, least of all those that seemed to require the creation of a new problem in order to solve an old one, or the enslavement of one nation in order to promote the freedom of another. However, nor did it see any logic in artificially holding back efforts to solve a long-standing problem just because of the emergence of a new one that had to be addressed first. The Soviet Union believed that the international community and the United Nations should continue what it had been doing for many years: seeking a path towards a comprehensive settlement of the whole complex of Middle East problems that had existed prior to 2 August 1992. For its part, it would continue to do so, while maintaining a clear and straightforward position on the Gulf crisis. The speaker stressed that the purpose of the resolution just adopted was to put an end to the aggression and make it clear to the world that aggression could not be rewarded. He added that the Soviet Union would be guided by the following precepts, to which some previous speakers had already referred. Assuming that there were no adverse changes in the circumstances, his Government did not intend to introduce or support any Council action to extend the scope or nature of the sanctions, or any new measures of the Council against Iraq during the period of the "pause of goodwill". However, the Soviet Union reserved its rights under the Charter, including its rights should the Government of Iraq allow any harm to come to foreign nationals whom it was holding against their will. Lastly, his Government recalled the terms of paragraph 13 of resolution 670 (1990), under which individuals were held personally responsible for grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention, and stated that all those involved in violations of the laws of armed conflict, including the prohibition against initiating the use of chemical or biological weapons contrary to the Geneva Protocol of 1925, to which Iraq was a party, would similarly be held personally responsible. The speaker concluded by expressing the confidence that the international community would be able to overcome the crisis peacefully, in a political way.¹⁶⁶

The representative of Romania said that his country continued to believe that every effort should be made to ease the existing tension politically and to solve the issues at stake by peaceful means, in accordance with the resolutions of the Security Council. He thought full use should be made of the potential of the Charter and the resources offered by it — especially the capabilities of the Security Council and the good offices and other initiatives that might be undertaken by the Secretary-General. At the same time, noting that the current course of events challenged the credibility of the United Nations and of the Security Council, in particular, he stressed that the Council should prove its capacity to ensure the implementation of and respect for its own decisions. This had led his country to conclude that the Security Council should use all the means at its disposal, including those provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression. Hence its support for the resolution just adopted. He stressed, however, that it was not too late for the Iraqi authorities to heed the voice of reason and choose a course of action leading to the restoration of peace in the area.¹⁶⁷

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United States, stated that the Council's vote marked a watershed in the history of the United Nations. Faced with Iraq's aggression, the nations of the world had not stood idly by. They had taken political, economic and military measures to quarantine Iraq and contain its aggression. A coordinated international effort involving over 50 States had been worked out to provide assistance to those nations most in need as a consequence of the economic embargo against Iraq. The military forces of over 27 nations had been deployed to defend Iraq's neighbours from further aggression and to implement the resolutions of the Council. The 12 resolutions adopted by the Council had clearly established that there was a peaceful way out of the conflict — through the complete, immediate and unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, the restoration of Kuwait's legitimate Government and the release of all hostages. The speaker observed that all this could not have taken place unless most nations shared his own country's vision of what was at stake. Saddam Hussein's actions, the vast arms he possessed and the weapons of mass destruction he sought indicated clearly that Kuwait was not only not the first, but probably not the last target on his list. If he should win this struggle, there would be no peace in the Middle East. If he should come to dominate the resources of the Gulf, his ambitions would threaten all of them in the Council and the economic well-being of all nations. Finally, if Iraq

should emerge from this conflict with territory, treasure or political advantage, then the lesson would be clear: aggression paid. The speaker reiterated that the lesson of the 1930s must be remembered and that aggression must not be rewarded. Since 2 August, many nations had worked together to prove just that. Many unprecedented actions had been taken, resulting in a newly effective Security Council, free of the constraints of the cold war. However, Saddam Hussein had not recoiled from his aggression. He apparently did not believe that the international community would stand united until he withdrew. The Council was meeting that day, therefore, first and foremost, as other speakers had pointed out, to dispel his illusions. He must know from the Council that a refusal to comply peacefully with its resolutions risked disaster for him. The resolution just adopted was very clear. It authorized the use of force. The purpose, though, as many had said, was to bring about a peaceful resolution of the problem. The United States concurred with other Council members that the adoption of resolution 678 (1990) should lead to a pause in the Council's efforts — assuming no adverse change in circumstances. It did so while retaining its rights, as other nations had, to protect its nationals in Iraq, and mindful of the terms of the Fourth Geneva Convention and the Geneva Protocol of 1925, should Saddam Hussein use chemical or biological weapons. By adopting resolution 678 (1990), which was a pause for peace, the Council was presenting the Iraqi leader with a choice: he could choose peace by respecting the will of the international community; or risk all. The speaker concluded that if the Council failed to redress this aggression, more would be lost than just peace in the Gulf. As evidenced in Europe, the end of the Cold War presented a new opportunity to get beyond the whole pattern of settling conflicts by force. That opportunity could be seized, or the international community could slip back into ever more savage regional conflicts in which might alone made right. The speaker thought the Council had the courage and the fortitude to choose what was right.¹⁶⁸

The Secretary-General of the United Nations remarked that the Security Council had taken a decision of immense portent. He stressed that the resolution just adopted envisaged at least 45 days of earnest efforts to achieve a peaceful solution of the crisis. Mindful of the responsibility inherent in his office, he expressed the hope that the time would be used constructively. He emphasized that, in requiring compliance with the resolutions of the Security Council, the United Nations was not seeking surrender but the most honourable way of resolving a crisis in a manner that respected all legitimate interests and was conducive to the wider peace and the rule of law. The situation required that diplomatic efforts be made with renewed determination to resolve the crisis peacefully. He added that a collective engagement required a discipline all its own. Moreover, the actions of the United Nations to correct this international wrong must be perceived as part of the larger endeavour to establish peace through justice, wherever the one was imperilled and the other had been denied.¹⁶⁹

The representative of Kuwait expressed gratitude to the members of the Council on behalf of the Kuwaiti people for the decision taken, which reinforced their hopes and strengthened their resolve. The Council's resolution sent a strong, unequivocal, message to the whole world that aggression would be reversed and that the era of the use of force had come to an end.¹⁷⁰

Decision of 13 February 1991 (2977th meeting, part I): to hold a meeting of the Security Council in private

By a letter dated 23 January 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷¹ the representatives of Algeria, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Morocco and Tunisia, as members of the Arab Maghreb Union, requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the grave situation in the Gulf region.

By a letter dated 24 January 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷² the representative of Yemen also requested an immediate meeting of the Security Council to examine the grave situation in the Gulf region.

By a letter dated 28 January 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷³ the representative of Cuba requested a formal meeting of the Security Council as soon as possible to review the situation in the Gulf. He emphasized that the only legitimate way for the Council to assume its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security was to hold a formal debate and to take appropriate steps to end the hostilities and bring the conflict towards a diplomatic and peaceful solution. Noting that requests for a meeting had been made by a number of delegations, including another member of the Security Council, he explicitly invoked rules 2 and 3 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure and Article 35 of the Charter and stated that the Council was compelled to take action when requested to do so by a Member State.

At the first part of its 2977th meeting, on 13 February 1991, the Council included the three above-mentioned letters in its agenda, under the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait".

Following the adoption of the agenda, the representative of the United Kingdom moved, in accordance with rule 48 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, that the Council should decide to meet in private to consider the item on the agenda. The rules of procedure provided for private meetings in exceptional circumstances and the current circumstances were, in his view, exceptional. In response to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the Council had adopted a series of resolutions on the basis of which military action had been undertaken and diplomacy was under way. The Council therefore had responsibilities to take into account when deciding how it should act in the context of the present requests for a meeting. It could not afford to send mixed signals, which might delay the realization that a peaceful solution to the crisis had to begin with an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait. If members or non-members of the Council had proposals to make, they should be heard, but the Council ought to explore carefully how those proposals would assist its objectives and, above all, how they had been received by Iraq. Such exploratory discussion was better handled in a private meeting, as had been done in the context of Western Sahara in 1975. His delegation had no intention of restricting participation by Member States or invoking rule 51 of the provisional rules of procedure: the normal verbatim record should be taken and circulated. It did believe, however, that the Council would carry out its functions better if the public aspect of the meeting — the presence of the media — did not influence or even distort the course and nature of the debate.¹⁷⁴

There followed a procedural discussion on the proposal made by the United Kingdom that the meeting be continued in private.¹⁷⁵ The proposal was put to the vote and adopted by 9 votes in favour, 2 against (Cuba, Yemen) and 4 abstentions (China, Ecuador, India, Zimbabwe).

Following the vote, the President suspended the meeting and said that the agenda would be revised to reflect the private character of the meeting.¹⁷⁶

Pursuant to the Council's decision, the second part of the 2977th meeting was held in private, with five suspensions and resumptions, from 13 February to 2 March 1991.¹⁷⁷

At the second part of its 2977th meeting, on 14 February 1991, the Council invited the representatives of the following countries, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, Colombia, the Comoros, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Kuwait, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Mexico, Myanmar, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Singapore, South Africa, Spain, the Sudan, Sweden, the Syrian Arab Republic, Thailand, Turkey, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the United Arab Emirates, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

At the request of the representatives of Egypt and Belgium, respectively, the Council also extended invitations under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference to the United Nations, and Mrs. Arlette Laurent, Chargé d'affaires of the delegation of the Commission of the European Economic Community.

The President (Zimbabwe) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to letters dated 23 and 24 January 1991, respectively, from the representatives of the Sudan and Jordan addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁷⁸ supporting the requests for the meeting. He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.¹⁷⁹

The representative of Kuwait stated that in authorizing the multinational forces that were cooperating with his country to use force, the Council had resorted to the only means left to it by the intransigent Iraqi regime. Iraq had been the first to wage war. It was now escalating its inhuman practices, which had been condemned by an overwhelming majority in the General Assembly. Lamentably, some Arab countries had lagged behind the international consensus by not repudiating Iraq's policy. They were now requesting the convening of the Security Council to consider their allegation that current military operations aimed at destroying Iraq. The speaker stressed that, from the beginning, the Council had pursued the paths prescribed by the Charter. Hence the imposition of sanctions against Iraq, combined with diplomatic endeavours. Since Iraq had rebuffed those efforts, the Security Council, in its resolution 678 (1990), had given it a period of 47 days to withdraw its forces from Kuwait, failing which the international coalition had been authorized to use all possible means to liberate Kuwait. Numerous démarches had been made during that period, including by the United Nations Secretary-General, but they had yielded no noteworthy results. The Iraqi aggression's effects on international peace and security had necessitated a decisive move and military operations had begun. They had been conducted within the context of resolution

678 (1990). The fighting had not been expanded, nor had it aimed at the destruction of Iraq. The speaker stressed that Iraq did not deserve to be rewarded for its aggression, occupation and atrocities and that there should be no ceasefire before the complete liberation of Kuwait. The Iraqi leadership was yearning for disunity to plague the ranks of the Security Council, but the Council had remained united in the face of such flagrant violations of all the principles of the Charter. By their heroic action, the international forces were for the first time in the history of the United Nations reaffirming collective security and self-defence. A world order was dawning, fashioned by the United Nations. The speaker concluded by saying that he was at the President's disposal for any clarifications or questions.¹⁸⁰

The representative of the United States addressed a few questions to the representative of Kuwait, in keeping with the Council's provisional rules of procedure and past practice, and its decision to do everything possible to make the private meeting fruitful and productive. He asked him to describe the status of the efforts of the Government of Kuwait to reach a negotiated settlement of the border and other disputes with Iraq before 2 August 1990. In addition, he enquired whether Kuwait was prepared, in the words of paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 660 (1990), to begin negotiations with Iraq to resolve that dispute once Iraq had complied with the other elements in that resolution; whether the Government of Kuwait had received from Iraq at any time an indication of any sort that a negotiated settlement consistent with the resolutions of the Security Council was possible; and, finally, whether Kuwait believed or had any reason to believe that a ceasefire would help to resolve the problem and to promote the complete withdrawal of Iraqi forces.¹⁸¹

The representative of Saudi Arabia, the next speaker on the list, said that if the President wished to give the opportunity to the representative of Kuwait to answer the questions that had been addressed to him, he would wait until he had done so; otherwise, he would proceed with his statement.¹⁸²

of procedure.¹⁸³ The President concluded that since the representative of Saudi Arabia had not intended to cede his place on the list of speakers to the representative of Kuwait, the former still had the floor; the representative of Kuwait could reply to the questions at a later stage.

The representative of Saudi Arabia recalled that, for the second time in its history, the United Nations had resorted to war, a war to implement Security Council resolutions and international legitimacy, a war for which the Iraqi regime bore full responsibility. For the apologists of the Iraqi aggression to call for peace at the United Nations instead of in Baghdad was hypocritical and deceptive. Only Iraq's withdrawal and implementation of the Council's resolutions would bring the military operations to a stop.¹⁸⁴

The representative of Qatar, speaking also in his capacity as Chairman of the Gulf Cooperation Council, called on the Council to remain committed to the resolutions it had adopted and to resort to all means to secure their implementation. Any slackening on the part of the Council would constitute a setback to international legitimacy and undermine the ability of the United Nations to restore international peace and security and compel compliance by those who failed to respect its decisions.¹⁸⁵

The representative of Iraq observed that the Council's inability to meet for more than three weeks, in contradiction of its rules of procedure, confirmed that the Council had become an American instrument for the covering up of the worst of international crimes. It had no credibility or legitimacy. Furthermore, the attempt to turn the public meeting, as required by the provisional rules of procedure, into a private meeting was aimed at denying some Member States the opportunity to unmask the crimes being perpetrated in the name of the Council. As a result, the majority of States that had requested the meeting were now boycotting it. Another attempt had just been made to prevent some Member States from speaking at an appropriate time. It had fortunately failed. The speaker claimed that, in resolution 678 (1990), the United States had found a fig leaf to cover up its aggression against Iraq, making the States members of the Council, which adopted it, co-perpetrators of the crime. He pointed out that the only State that had voted against the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 4 December 1990 prohibiting attacks on nuclear facilities — the United States — was the one that had conducted attacks against the peaceful Iraqi nuclear facilities under international supervision. Such acts not only exceeded the framework of resolution 678 (1990); they represented an international crime to which the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter should be applied against the United States and its collaborators in aggression. The aggressors had not stopped at violating the Charter and exceeding the objectives and limits of resolution 678 (1990). They had violated the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the General Assembly resolution prohibiting attacks on nuclear facilities, and all religious and moral values. In sum, they had perpetrated and continued to perpetrate international crimes. Iraq was now in a heroic war against old-time colonialism, whose victims saw the so-called new international order as a new era of terrorism and a threat against peoples striving for their freedom and independence, and to relations of equality among States. It would exercise its right to self-defence until the United States and its co-criminals withdrew.¹⁸⁶

The representative of the United Kingdom deemed it appropriate, in addition to the submission of the regular reports called for in resolution 678 (1990) which States were already providing, to use the occasion of the first formal meeting since the deadline of 15 January 1991 to address a number of issues. Referring to suggestions that military action being taken by the allies was in some way excessive or disproportionate and thus exceeded the “all necessary means” authorized in resolution 678 (1990), he stated that the nature and scope of the military action was dictated by the military capacity of the aggressor. In global terms, Iraq had the fourth largest army in the world. It was that military machine which had to be removed from Kuwait by force. The fighting could not be confined to the territory of Kuwait since the logistical support and resources of the huge Iraqi war machine extended far beyond the confines of Kuwait. However, that did not mean that the allies had extended their objectives beyond those laid down in successive

Council resolutions. They were seeking the liberation of Kuwait, no more, no less. The military action would end as soon as that objective had been achieved. With respect to civilian casualties, the allied forces had been instructed to keep them to a minimum, in sharp contrast to Iraq’s performance. However, there was increasing evidence that military equipment and installations were being moved into civilian areas to protect them from allied attacks. As far as diplomatic efforts were concerned, they should not be discouraged so long as they were based on the Council’s resolutions, but, to be realistic, they must begin in Baghdad. In the current circumstances, the idea of an unconditional pause made no sense at all. The conflict was not a war of the weak against the strong, an Arab war, or a Muslim holy war. It was a confrontation between collective security, as provided for in the Charter, and the law of the jungle. In concluding, the speaker addressed a few questions to the representatives of Iraq and Saudi Arabia, and looked forward to hearing the answers to the questions put to the representative of Kuwait. He asked the representative of Iraq whether Iraq would withdraw immediately and unconditionally from Kuwait, whether it would give an undertaking to abide by the Geneva Convention regarding the treatment of prisoners of war, how it was treating prisoners of war from the countries of the allies, and whether Iraq would commit itself to abiding by its international obligations not to use chemical or biological weapons. He asked the representative of Saudi Arabia about the nature of the military threat which Iraq had represented since 2 August 1990 and continued to represent, and whether Saudi Arabia had received any indications of Iraq’s readiness to comply with Security Council resolutions and withdraw from Kuwait.¹⁸⁷

The representative of China recalled his country’s position that the Gulf crisis should be settled through peaceful means. Expressing concern at the possibility of a protracted and expanded war, he called upon the belligerent parties to exercise the greatest restraint and seek a peaceful solution. Progress towards peace also required that Iraq should signify its immediate withdrawal from Kuwait, that the settlement of the Middle East question should be scheduled, that post-war arrangements should be made mainly by the

countries in the region and that foreign military forces should withdraw from the Gulf region.¹⁸⁸

The representative of Romania informed the Council that, in accordance with paragraph 3 of resolution 678 (1990), in which all States were requested to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken to liberate Kuwait and to restore international peace and security in the Gulf area, Romania had decided to send a surgical hospital and a decontamination unit to Saudi Arabia. Invoking Article 50 of the Charter, he pointed out that the sanctions against Iraq had meant considerable losses for his country; but Romania was nevertheless strictly implementing them. He strongly rejected any suggestion made during the debate of manipulation or malpractices by the Council. At the same time, he urged that, even at this critical stage in the conflict, the Council make maximum use of political and diplomatic means.¹⁸⁹

The representative of Austria also believed that diplomatic efforts should be intensified. The way in which the Council dealt with, and finally resolved, the conflict would be of paradigmatic importance not only for the future of the region, but also for the concept of collective security and the role of the United Nations. The Council ought to uphold, and if necessary enforce, the rule of law in a just and fair manner and its decisions should, as much as possible, represent the collective will of the international community. Only in that way would it maintain its political and moral legitimacy.¹⁹⁰

The representative of Ecuador pointed out that a substantive debate had begun the day before, which militated against continuing the meeting in private. Emphasizing that Iraq had violated the most important principles of the Charter, he urged that diplomatic efforts be redoubled and that flexibility be shown to find a solution based on strict compliance with the Council resolutions which embodied those principles. He added that it would be necessary in due course to consider the framework within which to seek implementation of all resolutions of the Council pertaining to the problems of the region, but that implementation of the 12 Council resolutions on the

Gulf problem was not conditional upon any considerations extraneous to that specific problem.¹⁹¹

The representative of Belgium recalled that similar violations of international law had led to the Second World War and that the United Nations had been founded precisely to put a rapid end to any such threat. On the proposals put forward by the countries that had requested the meeting, the position of his Government was that a truce would be interpreted by Iraq as a sign of weakness and would only prolong hostilities, but that the use of force should not put a halt to diplomacy. He added that States had all been urged to show solidarity with States cooperating in the liberation of Kuwait, the resolutions leaving it up to them freely to determine the level of their commitment. To that end, Belgium had contributed to the collective effort through military support and by means of considerable medical assistance. It would provide humanitarian assistance to the civilian population in Iraq and Kuwait and to the refugees, and was providing financial assistance to those countries most affected by the economic consequences of the conflict.¹⁹²

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that, because of Iraq's rigid intransigence, the world had found itself faced with a most dangerous armed confrontation whose alarming reverberations went far beyond the boundaries of the Middle East. Further escalation of the conflict might create a danger exceeding the mandate of the Council's resolutions. Acts of provocation attempting to involve Israel and other States in the armed conflict, as well as the possible use of weapons of mass destruction, above all chemical and bacteriological weapons, were of concern to his country. Through its diplomatic initiatives, the Soviet Union wished not only to assist in ending the war, but also to begin preparations for a lasting system of security on an equal footing in the region. As to the present meeting of the Council, it was a clear signal to the Iraqi leadership that it had to comply with all the just and well-founded decisions of the Security Council and declare an immediate, full and unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait.¹⁹³

The President of the Council, with the concurrence of the members of the Council, then suspended the meeting until the following morning.

Upon the resumption of the 2977th meeting on 15 February 1991, the President of the Council drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 14 February 1991 from the representative of Iraq to the Secretary-General,¹⁹⁴ and a letter dated 13 February 1991 from the representative of Tunisia to the President of the Council.¹⁹⁵

The representative of India drew the attention of the Council to a communiqué issued by the Revolutionary Command Council of Iraq that morning regarding Security Council resolution 660 (1990) with the aim of reaching an honourable and acceptable political solution, including withdrawal.¹⁹⁶ Underlining the Council's responsibility both to ensure implementation of resolution 660 (1990) and to save the Gulf region from further bloodshed and destruction, he said that the Council should not miss any opportunity for peace, however small it might seem. In taking note of the reported offer from Iraq, it should discuss what it could do to promote a peaceful resolution of the crisis. This would strengthen its prestige, credibility and functioning. Secondly, the Council's efforts should be underpinned by an immediate cessation, or at the least a suspension, of hostilities in the Gulf. Finally, the Council should request the Secretary-General urgently to examine what needed to be done to achieve a peaceful settlement of the crisis.¹⁹⁷

The representative of France recalled his country's approach to the Gulf crisis and its attempts to make Iraq abide by the Security Council's resolutions, including a recent initiative, which provided for a final appeal by the United Nations to the Iraqi leaders before the end of the pause of good will set out in resolution 678 (1990). Those proposals were still valid. Turning to the declaration of the Iraqi Revolutionary Command Council, he remarked that, for the first time, the Iraqi authorities envisaged withdrawal from Kuwait. However, they added impossible conditions that did not fall under resolution 660 (1990), which provided for immediate and unconditional withdrawal from

Kuwait. Therefore, their proposal could not be accepted, rendering a Security Council initiative aimed at the suspension of hostilities pointless. France understood the emotion aroused by the military operation in Arab and Islamic public opinion as well as the solidarity felt by non-aligned countries. However, this was not an action pitting the West against the Arab world or the North against the South. It was the result of resolutions adopted by the Security Council on behalf of the entire international community. In due time, it would be for the Council to play its full role in helping to lay down the conditions for lasting peace in the region. In concluding, the speaker hoped that Iraq, whose existence as a sovereign State was not in question, would abide fully by the Council's resolutions.¹⁹⁸

At the same meeting, the representative of Cuba introduced three draft resolutions.¹⁹⁹ Under the first draft resolution, which explicitly invoked Article 24 of the Charter in its preamble, the Council would have demanded that the bombing of the cities of Iraq be immediately halted and requested that negotiations be intensified without further resort to force. Under the second draft resolution, the Council would have requested the Secretary-General to renew his good offices and report to the Council as soon as possible. Under the third draft resolution, which contained in its preamble explicit references to Article 29 of the Charter and rule 28 of the provisional rules of procedure, the Council would have decided to establish an ad hoc committee, composed of all its members, to consider formulas for achieving a peaceful settlement of the conflict on the basis of its resolutions. The speaker believed that, as mentioned by the representative of India, the Council ought to try to create a framework in which démarches undertaken by others might enjoy the greatest possible success. It should also consider any idea presented by Member States in order to give peace a chance and save lives.²⁰⁰ The draft resolutions submitted by Cuba were not put to the vote.

The representative of Canada noted that any constructive signal to be drawn from the Iraqi declaration might well be entirely nullified by the series of conditions it contained. He urged those who had issued that statement to comply fully with the decisions of the Council. The disappointing and painful recourse to force had been the result of reaching the limits of diplomacy. Ultimately, after unprecedented sanctions had been applied and a pause for peace provided, force had been authorized by the Council, under its legal and moral authority. The international community should be gratified that the United Nations, which all too often in its history had not dealt decisively with aggression and conflict, had now proved itself capable of fulfilling the collective security function that its founders had intended. Canada was participating in the military operation precisely because it was authorized by, and in support of, the United Nations. Since the rationale of this conflict was not only the liberation of Kuwait but also the protection of United Nations values, its pursuit and aims had to meet the highest international standards. This meant minimizing the civilian casualties and otherwise adhering to the laws of war. Indeed, the coalition forces had taken great care to restrict their attacks to military targets. As to the aims of the war, they ought to be limited to those agreed to by the United Nations, which did not include the destruction of Iraq. Stressing the need for an early planning of peace, the speaker advocated a significant United Nations role in the field of security, peacekeeping, mediation, disarmament, humanitarian assistance and economic reconstruction and development.²⁰¹

During the course of the debate, a number of representatives of the countries participating in, or contributing to, the multinational forces made similar remarks as to the justification, conduct and goals of the military operation and the efforts needed to restore peace in the whole region. They gave an account of the military, humanitarian and economic assistance they had provided and urged Iraq to fully comply with all Security Council resolutions.²⁰²

The representative of Malaysia appealed to the Council to weigh every aspect of the Iraqi statement, which, it was hoped, indicated a positive step in the right direction. He stressed that the military action against Iraq was not based on Article 51 nor was it a war between any of the allied countries and Iraq. It was a United Nations enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter, which no country could conduct on the basis of its own imperatives and interests. He expressed alarm at the escalation of the military offensive, which might well go beyond the original objectives contained in the relevant resolutions, and concern at the lack of a clear monitoring role for the United Nations. It was high time that the Council took stock of the conduct of the war; the pursuit of international objectives must not dehumanize it as an institution. It should entrust the Secretary-General with reactivating and intensifying all diplomatic efforts. If the current operation were to constitute a new dimension of United Nations action in the post-cold-war era, Malaysia had to conclude that the initial attempt did not bode well for the future.²⁰³

The representative of Yugoslavia recalled that his country had fully supported the resolute stance of the Security Council and that, at its initiative, as current Chairman of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the Movement had adopted a similar position. Yugoslavia, whose diplomatic efforts had been stepped up since the outbreak of the military operations, believed that the Iraqi announcement deserved to be studied further. As to the Foreign Ministers of the non-aligned countries, they had recently decided to continue individual and joint efforts directed both towards Iraq and towards the countries of the coalition. Yugoslavia stood ready to cooperate with the Security Council and the Secretary-General to contribute to peace in the Gulf. A stable peace could only be achieved on the basis of the principles of international law and the Charter of the United Nations, and a political solution to the conflict could only be based on the relevant Security Council resolutions.²⁰⁴

The representative of the United States indicated that Iraq's statement in the Council offered little hope and that reports coming from Baghdad were not much more encouraging. Iraq had put forward at least a dozen conditions that were unacceptable, in return for purported compliance with resolution 660 (1990). The Council would never accede to the demand that it should abolish 11 of its 12 resolutions on Iraqi aggression against Kuwait. Linkage with the Arab-Israeli issue in the demand for the withdrawal of foreign military forces and equipment from the region, including Israel, had been unacceptable to the United States Government and to many other Governments. Meeting such demands would turn the purported withdrawal from Kuwait into a system of rewards for Iraq, which was inconceivable. Terming the Iraqi announcement “an obvious attempt to buy time”, the speaker reiterated that a ceasefire without concrete implementation of complete withdrawal was not acceptable. With respect to the three draft resolutions submitted by Cuba, he noted that two of them were unnecessary and one unacceptable. He believed that the Secretary-General needed no further encouragement to use his good offices, since his role under the Charter was clearly set out in paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 674 (1990). He did not, moreover, know what a committee of the whole might do that the Council was not able to do then and there, with the participation of all Member States. Finally, he argued that the last draft resolution, which called for a halt in all further use of force, was in effect a ceasefire and that it was not the time for the Council to reverse its course of action and permit the President of Iraq to regroup, repair and rebuild his military machine.²⁰⁵

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran charged that the Security Council was being misused again by certain permanent members. The United States and its allies had yet to convince the people of the region that domination and control of the political, economic and social life of the region were not among the objectives they were pursuing. The Security Council also had a clear responsibility in that regard — to give guarantees and assurances that all the foreign forces would leave the area immediately after the termination of the hostilities. The international community expected the Council not to be aloof on the diplomatic front. Iraq’s announcement provided the Council with a basis to redouble its efforts to convince Iraq to comply with its resolutions. Moreover, it was incumbent upon it to monitor the situation closely and to take positions of principle on the prevention of violations of international humanitarian law and of both the prolongation and the widening of the conflict, so as not to undermine the credibility of the United Nations as a whole.²⁰⁶

At the end of the meeting, the representatives of Cuba, the United States and the United Kingdom discussed the draft resolutions submitted by Cuba, in particular the merits of a committee of the whole as compared to official or unofficial meetings of the Council. The representative of Cuba remarked that the proposed committee would report to the Council, preferably in public. He also noted that unofficial meetings were so informal that no record was kept of what was discussed and agreed, which allowed for distortion of the proceedings.²⁰⁷

The President, with the concurrence of the members of the Council, then suspended the meeting until the next day.

Upon the resumption of the 2977th meeting on 16 February 1991, the President of the Council drew the attention of the Council members to the three draft resolutions submitted by Cuba, and to a number of other documents.²⁰⁸

The representative of Pakistan advocated united diplomatic efforts by the Muslim Ummah.²⁰⁹ The representative of the Sudan also believed that the crisis could be handled within an Arab and Islamic context. He called for an immediate cessation of hostilities, as did the representative of Yemen.²¹⁰

The representative of Mexico stressed the need for multilateral efforts and the fundamental role of the Secretary-General. He said that the Security Council should consider a broader debate on the conduct of the war and shoulder its responsibilities under the Charter.²¹¹

The President, in his capacity as the representative of Zimbabwe, said he believed that the Council should seize the opportunity for peace that the Iraqi announcement might offer.²¹² The representative of Sweden also considered that no openings for a peaceful solution that could lead to the implementation of United Nations resolutions should be overlooked and emphasized the severe humanitarian consequences of the prolonged crisis.²¹³

The representative of Turkey emphasized that peace initiatives could not succeed without Iraq's full compliance with the relevant Security Council resolutions.²¹⁴

At the same meeting, the representative of Saudi Arabia replied to the questions addressed to him earlier by the representative of the United Kingdom. Regarding the nature of the military threat posed by Iraq against Saudi Arabia, he stated that Iraq had the same offensive designs towards his country as it had had towards Kuwait, and that Saudi Arabia had had no choice but to take defensive measures. With respect to Iraq's readiness to comply with the Security Council resolutions, he said that his country had not had any more indications than members of the Council had. The latest announcement by Iraq, in which Kuwait was not mentioned, did not augur well for a peaceful settlement. If the Iraqis really meant to stop the war, they would settle the matter that day in one letter from their President as had been done in the case of the question with the Islamic Republic of Iran.²¹⁵

The representative of Kuwait read out the statement issued by his Government following the Iraqi communiqué and answered the questions put to him earlier by the representative of the United States. With respect to the first question, on Kuwait's efforts to negotiate a border demarcation with Iraq before 2 August 1990, he pointed out that since the signing of the border agreement of 1963, Kuwait's many attempts to start the demarcation process had been met with rejection and prevarication. On 15 July 1990, the Government of Iraq had sent to the League of Arab States a note containing four baseless accusations against Kuwait. It had later rejected the Kuwaiti proposal for the establishment of an Arab or international arbitration panel. A meeting had just been held at Jeddah and was to continue in Baghdad, when the Iraqi aggression occurred. As to the second question, whether Kuwait was prepared to begin negotiations with Iraq after it had complied with paragraph 3 of resolution 660 (1990), the speaker declared that, after the complete and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces, Kuwait was ready to consider with the Government of Iraq all pending matters and solve them by peaceful means. On the question of Iraq's readiness to accept a negotiated solution, he noted that the representative of Iraq found it difficult to say the word "Kuwait", which was not mentioned in the communiqué allegedly indicating Iraq's acceptance of resolution 660 (1990). Replying to the fourth question, he reiterated his country's position that a ceasefire, temporary or durable, partial or comprehensive, would be a wrong signal from the Council to Iraq, which could regroup and again carry out aggression — not only against Kuwait but also against other neighbouring Arab States.²¹⁶

The representative of Iraq restated his reservations regarding the Council's meeting in private. He quoted a statement issued the previous day by Algeria, according to which the military intervention against Iraq was assuming the dimensions of a crime against humanity. He then replied to the questions addressed to him earlier by the representative of the United Kingdom. With regard to Iraq's readiness to withdraw from Kuwaiti territory, he reminded the representatives that resolution 660 (1990), which Iraq was ready to accept, referred not only to withdrawal from Kuwaiti territory, but also to immediate and intensive negotiations. Some countries turned a blind eye to that provision and concentrated on the former, which proved the correctness of the Iraqi position that all the resolutions of the Security Council should be implemented, and that international legitimacy was indivisible and should not be selectively applied. As to whether Iraq respected all the Geneva Conventions, he declared that it did. The prisoners of war were well treated and their safety, health and dignity were guaranteed. Finally, Iraq was committed not to use chemical weapons. However, even in the original Convention on the prohibition of chemical weapons, Iraq had reserved its right to use them in retaliation for their use. Iraq regarded chemical weapons as equivalent to nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction. If any such weapons were used, Iraq would use them too. Moreover, if the intensive high-altitude aerial bombardment continued, Iraq would consider it to be tantamount to the use of weapons of mass destruction. The speaker then put four questions to the representative of the United Kingdom. First, to what extent had the United Kingdom and its allies observed the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of

Civilian Persons in Time of War, particularly in the light of the indiscriminate nature of the bombing by the United States and the United Kingdom? Secondly, why had the United Kingdom prevented the shipment of medical supplies previously contracted for by Iraq with British companies even though those were not covered by Security Council resolutions? Thirdly, to what extent had the United Kingdom observed the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 4 December 1990 prohibiting attacks on nuclear facilities? Fourthly, had the British Government taken the necessary measures to prevent the spread of radiation when it had participated in the attacks on those nuclear facilities?²¹⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the reply given by the representative of Iraq about withdrawal was not the full answer required to get back on all fours with the Council's own resolutions. What was needed was a firm commitment to withdraw and the taking of concrete steps implementing it. Unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait was simply not negotiable. The speaker noted the categorical assertion by the representative of Iraq that his country applied the Geneva Conventions in respect of prisoners of war, and expressed the hope that the Government of Iraq would now fulfil all its obligations in that regard, and that it would, in particular, notify the names of the prisoners and give the International Committee of the Red Cross unconditional access to them. Commenting on the Iraqi communiqué, the speaker said that the offer of withdrawal was hedged about by conditions that contradicted any apparent willingness to accept resolution 660 (1990). As to the three draft resolutions circulated by Cuba, two of them — about the setting up of an ad hoc committee of the Council and the use of the Secretary-General's good offices — were unnecessary, and one, on the bombing of Iraq, was unacceptable.²¹⁸

The representative of the United States stated that, given Iraq's intransigence, the best and only way to bring the conflict to the earliest possible conclusion was to press ahead on all fronts, military and diplomatic. There was no contradiction between the two. Pressure on the battlefield had to be complemented by efforts to convince Iraq that it had to come to terms with reality. The future and credibility of the United Nations were at stake and the effort to stop aggression through international collective security could not and would not falter. A ceasefire without concrete implementation of withdrawal would not accomplish the objectives of resolution 660 (1990) and would not bring the aggression to a close. The speaker stressed that the coalition was acting under the authority given to it by the Security Council and that its goals, which were simple and straightforward, would be achieved by all its members, in cooperation with the other countries of the Middle East. In keeping with those goals, the coalition had done all it could to minimize civilian casualties, even though Iraq had deliberately placed military materiel and command-and-control centres in or near schools, medical facilities, places of worship and public buildings. This stood in stark contrast with the terror policy of Iraq, which had launched indiscriminate attacks on the civilian population of Saudi Arabia and of Israel, in an effort both to widen and change the nature of the conflict. Iraq had also committed atrocities against Kuwaiti civilians, threatened to use chemical weapons, unleashed an environmental disaster and flouted the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War. The speaker added that, just as a collective effort was required to defeat the aggressor, a collective effort would be needed to work for justice and security in the future. He stressed that respect for the sovereignty of the peoples of the Gulf and the Middle East must lie at the heart of such an effort. The United States joined others in saying that the future of the Gulf region was in the hands of its own people and looked to the Gulf States to take the lead in developing new security arrangements after two major wars in 10 years. No regional State should be excluded and the United Nations and the rest of the international community had a role in encouraging such arrangements. The United States also believed that the time had come to deal with arms proliferation and arms control in the region and that a programme of economic recovery, in which Iraq should participate, had to accompany the effort to improve security. Its hope was that this tragedy would open new prospects for peace in the Gulf and for conciliation and solutions in the Middle East as a whole and that it would confirm the role of the Security Council as a force for collective security.²¹⁹

With the concurrence of the members of the Council, the President then suspended the meeting until the following week.

Upon the resumption of the 2977th meeting on 23 February 1991, the President drew the attention of Council members to a number of documents.²²⁰

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics informed the Council of the results of talks held in Moscow during the past few days with the special representative of Iraq. Iraq had agreed to comply with Security Council resolution 660 (1990), that is, immediately and unconditionally to withdraw all its troops from Kuwait to the positions occupied on 1 August 1990. The withdrawal of troops would begin the day after a ceasefire and a halt to all land, sea and air hostilities. The withdrawal of troops would be carried out over 21 days, and troops would be withdrawn from Kuwait City in the course of the first four days. Immediately after the completion of the withdrawal of troops from Kuwait, the reasons for the adoption of other Security Council resolutions would have lapsed, and those resolutions would thus cease to be in force. All military prisoners of war would be released and repatriated in the course of three days following a ceasefire and cessation of hostilities. Confirmation, monitoring and observance of the ceasefire and the withdrawal of troops would be carried out by observers and/or peacekeeping forces to be determined by the Security Council. This proposal raised real prospects for a peaceful settlement of the conflict. It could be further improved, but it represented the best that the Soviet Union had been able to achieve, and stemmed from the unanimity displayed by the international community and the Security Council throughout the conflict. Calling for continued efforts towards a peaceful resolution of the crisis, the speaker observed that all Security Council resolutions should be complied with and that all existing proposals should be integrated into the settlement.²²¹

The representative of the United States said that, while the Soviet announcement represented a serious and useful effort, major obstacles remained. The world had to make sure that Iraq had in fact renounced its claim to Kuwait and accepted all relevant Security Council resolutions. Only the Security Council could lift sanctions against Iraq, and the world needed to be assured in concrete terms of Iraq's peaceful intentions before such action could be taken. So, in a final effort to obtain Iraqi compliance with the will of the international community, his Government, after consulting with the Government of Kuwait and its other coalition partners, had declared that a ground campaign would not be initiated against Iraqi forces if, prior to noon, Saturday, 23 February, New York time, Iraq publicly accepted the following terms and authoritatively communicated that acceptance to the United Nations: Iraq had to begin large-scale withdrawal from Kuwait by noon, New York time, Saturday, 23 February, and complete it in one week; within the first 48 hours, Iraq had to remove all of its forces from Kuwait City and allow for the prompt return of the legitimate Government of Kuwait; in cooperation with the International Red Cross, Iraq had to release within 48 hours all prisoners of war and third-country civilians being held against their will and return the remains of killed and deceased servicemen; Iraq had to remove all explosives and booby traps, cease combat-aircraft flights over Iraq and Kuwait, except for transport aircraft carrying troops out of Kuwait, and allow coalition aircraft exclusive control over, and use of, all Kuwaiti airspace; and it must cease all destructive actions against Kuwaiti citizens and property and release all Kuwaiti detainees. The coalition forces would not attack retreating Iraqi forces and would exercise restraint so long as the withdrawal proceeded in accordance with the above-stated guidelines and there were no attacks on other countries. However, any breach of those terms would bring an instant and sharp response from them, in accordance with Security Council resolution 678 (1990). The speaker also pointed out that the idea of declaring that Security Council resolutions on Iraq-Kuwait somehow ceased to exist, were null and void or without effect, was unacceptable. Those resolutions called for actions that remained to be taken. Once Iraq had fully complied with them, the Council might examine whether to introduce the novel practice of declaring a resolution as ceasing to be in force, or null and void, or without further effect. It was not a practice, however, that should be taken on lightly.²²²

to the peaceful initiative of the Soviet Union and underlined that the Security Council had to fulfil its responsibilities by considering and adopting an appropriate peace plan. The representatives of Cuba, Ecuador and Yemen supported India's suggestion that the Security Council should remain in continuous session, if necessary, to try to sort out a plan of action and that its non-permanent members had a special role to play in this respect. The representative of Zaire believed that all members of the Council should take part in its formal and informal work, with a view to finding the most appropriate way to take the Soviet-Iraqi proposals into account. The representative of Yemen noted that, in view of Iraq's acceptance of Security Council resolution 660 (1990), matters had to return to the Council. He wondered whether any party, including the members of the coalition, had the right to escalate military action without returning to the Council.²²³

The representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government stood firmly by the offer set out by the United States on behalf of a number of allies of Kuwait. Commenting on the six points worked out by the Soviet Government with the Iraqi Foreign Minister, he noted that some of them contradicted Iraq's purported acceptance of resolution 660 (1990). He concentrated on the fourth point, relating to the status of the Security Council's resolutions after an Iraqi withdrawal, which seemed to be fundamentally flawed. It was wrong to state that the resolutions would lose their force after an Iraqi withdrawal. Formally, only the Security Council could make that judgement. Furthermore, it was not the case that the reasons for adopting a number of those provisions would have been removed.²²⁴

On that point, the representative of Romania agreed that only the Security Council could lift the sanctions against Iraq. In his view, the question of declaring null and void a number of the resolutions on the situation needed careful consideration. Such a nullification should not be viewed as a precondition to Iraqi action.²²⁵

At the same meeting, the Secretary-General appealed to the Security Council to seize the opportunities that had been created to bring the destructive conflict to a speedy end in consonance with the Council's resolutions. Since the beginning of the crisis, there had been devastation on a vast scale, with incalculable consequences for a vital and strategically most important region of the world. The United Nations had the obligation both to uphold the principles which had prompted the Security Council's resolutions, and to respond to the supreme moral imperative of preventing further destruction of life. Those two objectives should not be irreconcilable.²²⁶

The representative of Kuwait stated that his country agreed with the plan and programme announced by the United States. He stressed that Iraq should inform the Secretary-General in writing of its acceptance of all the Security Council resolutions and that its legislative authorities must abrogate all legislation concerning the annexation of Kuwait. He called upon the Council to demand that Iraq cease its inhuman practices against the Kuwaiti people, its crimes against the Kuwaiti economy and environment, and the destruction of the Kuwaiti social and economic infrastructure.²²⁷

The representative of Egypt made similar points regarding the need for Iraq to rescind its annexation of Kuwait and the need for an official communication by Iraq to the Secretary-General in regard to its acceptance of all Security Council resolutions. He insisted on the necessity of an immediate withdrawal by Iraq, to be followed at once by negotiations between Iraq and Kuwait. He also stressed that the Council's resolutions could not be rescinded or regarded as null and void before being fully implemented. Finally, referring to India's proposal for discussions by the 10 non-permanent members, he warned against "formalistic attempts to procrastinate". Any effort had to focus on calling upon Iraq to withdraw its forces and accept the Security Council's resolutions unconditionally.²²⁸

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the proposal that the Council should urgently continue work on the plan of action to produce an integrated solution of the crisis on the basis of the provisions worked out in Moscow and the proposals of the United States and other members of the coalition.²²⁹

With the concurrence of the members of the Council, the President then suspended the meeting.

Upon the resumption of the 2977th meeting on 25 February 1991, the President of the Council drew the attention of the Council members to several documents.²³⁰

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics reported to the Security Council that the President of his country had received a message a few hours before from the President of Iraq, informing him that the Iraqi leadership had decided, in accordance with resolution 660 (1990), immediately to withdraw all its troops from Kuwait, and that an order to that effect had already been issued. The message contained a request that the Soviet Union make urgent efforts for the adoption of a resolution of the Security Council calling for a ceasefire, adding that the time frame for the implementation of the troop withdrawal, which had already begun, would be very brief. The speaker stressed that since, as the Iraqis had declared, the troop withdrawal had actually begun, the Security Council could adopt the relevant decision.²³¹

The representative of Yemen welcomed the announcement of the Iraqi withdrawal and proposed that the Council adopt a resolution that would affirm in its preamble all the relevant resolutions adopted by the Council. It would then demand a ceasefire, determine the period within which the withdrawal would take place — a short period of time — and organize supervision by the United Nations of the withdrawal process.²³²

The representative of the United States made it clear that, up to that point, the coalition forces continued to prosecute their efforts to remove Iraqi forces from Kuwait, using the military force authorized by the Council. At that stage, the United States saw no reason to change that approach since there was no evidence on the ground of an Iraqi withdrawal. The speaker reaffirmed that retreating forces would not be attacked if they laid down their arms and left. Anxious to have a serious proposal put forward by Iraq, he hoped that its representative would attend the Council meeting and state the position of his Government. He also wished to hear from the President of Iraq personally and publicly. In view of the many duplicitous statements made by Iraq in the past, he asked Iraq to make clear that it was prepared to accept the Security Council's resolutions and the method of implementation contained in the statement of the coalition partners made on their behalf by the President of the United States on 22 February.²³³

The representative of Kuwait reiterated that Iraq had to rescind all resolutions and decisions regarding the annexation of Kuwait and send an official letter to the Security Council or the Secretary-General, which must include acceptance of all the Security Council resolutions. That was the only thing that could lead to the consideration of any other measures to be taken later.²³⁴

The representative of Iraq, whose arrival had been welcomed by the representative of India, recalled that several members at the Council table had protested at his not mentioning Kuwait in previous statements. He noted that Kuwait had always existed as a geographic fact, but that its constitutional status had been in question. With respect to the official position of his Government on resolution 660 (1990), he affirmed that his Government completely supported what the Soviet Ambassador had told the Council. While accepting resolution 660 (1990), which it sought to implement fully, it had already issued orders to Iraqi troops in Kuwait to withdraw to the positions they had held before 2 August 1990. His country was interested in completing its withdrawal as quickly as possible, in a manner that guaranteed the safety of its troops. He therefore reiterated his request that the Council should immediately adopt a resolution for a ceasefire, establishing the necessary machinery to guarantee respect for the ceasefire and the completion of the withdrawal of Iraqi troops as soon as possible. In concluding, he warned that certain parties, whose aims entailed the elimination of Iraq and its military capability, would, in response to Iraq's request to implement resolution 660 (1990), find pretexts to violate it. They would set conditions and preconditions incompatible with the spirit and letter of the resolution.²³⁵

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed satisfaction at speaking after the representative of Iraq because it was essential that the Council conduct its business on the basis of the clearly defined and announced policy of the Government of Iraq, and it was useful to have had that now. It was worrying, however, that the representative of Iraq seemed to be stating that his country had no problem with describing Kuwait as a geographical area, but that he did not accept it as a constitutional entity. That was at the heart of all the problems. Secondly, he had mentioned only resolution 660 (1990), as if that resolution were somehow different in nature from all other Security Council resolutions on the subject. Such a division did not exist in the jurisprudence of the Council. All those resolutions were a single corpus of international law adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, as exemplified by resolution 678 (1990), which demanded that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions. Finally, the representative of Iraq had not responded to the document issued on 22 February by the United Kingdom and other Governments cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, setting out the basis on which they would be prepared to consider the withdrawal from Kuwait by Iraqi forces and the military and political provisions that would accompany the withdrawal. The speaker hoped the representative of Iraq would be able to respond to that document so that they could move forward.²³⁶

The representative of China called on the parties concerned to exercise the utmost restraint. He believed that the Security Council should give serious consideration to the role it should play and help to promote Iraq's speedy and complete withdrawal and a comprehensive and peaceful solution of the Gulf crisis.²³⁷

The representative of Iraq reiterated that his Government was eager to see the Council adopt a resolution that would guarantee the complete and rapid implementation of resolution 660 (1990), after which measures should be adopted to implement what could or should be implemented in other resolutions. In that respect, he pointed out that some of those resolutions had already been implemented.²³⁸

The representative of Kuwait emphasized that selectivity regarding the measures adopted by the Council against Iraq's aggression was unacceptable.²³⁹

The representative of Cuba said that he had heard neither the representative of the Soviet Union nor the representative of Iraq say that, in order to implement resolution 660 (1990) fully and thus withdraw Iraqi troops from Kuwait, anyone was demanding the nullification or modification of the Council's resolutions. It had been requested simply that the Council should take the basic measures that had always been a part of the process of the withdrawal of military forces in any conflict situation. He was worried that, at a time when the Council should be taking decisions that would permit it finally to achieve implementation of the principal resolution adopted with regard to the crisis, it would once again be paralysed. If it failed to act, his delegation would protest vehemently.²⁴⁰

With the concurrence of the members of the Council, the President then suspended the meeting.

Decision of 2 March 1991 (2977th meeting, part II): adjournment of the private meeting

Upon the resumption of the 2977th meeting on 2 March 1991, the President (Austria) drew the attention of the Council members to a number of documents.²⁴¹ These included letters dated 27 February 1991 from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council and to the Secretary-General, respectively,²⁴² confirming Iraq's agreement to comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent resolutions; and his letter of the same date addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴³ stating Iraq's intention to release prisoners of war immediately.

In accordance with the understanding reached in the course of the Council's prior consultations, the President then proposed to adjourn the private meeting. He drew attention to a draft communiqué²⁴⁴ prepared by the Secretariat for the part of the Council's meeting that had been held in private, in accordance with rule 55 of the provisional rules of procedure of the Council. He also recalled that the verbatim record of that portion of the meeting would be circulated as an unrestricted document, in accordance with rule 49. The Council thereupon approved the draft communiqué.

At its 2978th meeting, on 2 March 1991, the Council continued its consideration of the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait". The Council invited the representatives of Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by the United States,²⁴⁵ and informed them that Belgium, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and Zaire had joined in sponsoring the draft resolution. He also drew their attention to 18 amendments to the resolution, submitted by Cuba.²⁴⁶

The representative of the United States presented a number of oral revisions to the draft resolution which he understood were generally agreeable to the members of the Council.²⁴⁷

The representative of Cuba said that his country's amendments were self-explanatory. They sought to ensure that the Council was able to establish a ceasefire and that it would fully assume its responsibility for the way in which the ceasefire was implemented and for the other steps to be taken to restore international peace and security in the region. Other amendments aimed at adjusting the language of the draft resolution to achieve a sense of balance and moderation.²⁴⁸

The Council then commenced the voting procedure on the draft resolution, as orally revised, and the proposed amendments. The President stated that he intended to put the amendments to the vote in the order envisaged by rule 36 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure.²⁴⁹

Speaking before the vote on the amendments, the representative of the United States observed that, in the opinion of the sponsors, the profusion of amendments submitted by Cuba was not helpful; their number and form did not improve the text of the draft resolution. Since the sponsors regarded the text in its current form as effective, balanced and appropriate, it was their intention not to support those amendments.²⁵⁰

The Council proceeded to vote on the amendments as follows:

(a) The amendment in document S/22300, seeking to delete the words "and reaffirming" from the first preambular paragraph, received 2 votes in favour, 1 against and 12 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(b) The amendment in document S/22301, seeking to delete the words "Article 25 of" from the second preambular paragraph, received 1 vote in favour, none against, and 14 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(c) The amendment in document S/22302, seeking to delete the words "pursuant to resolution 678 (1990)" from the fifth preambular paragraph, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(d) The amendment in document S/22304, seeking to delete the whole of preambular paragraph 8, received 1 vote in favour, none against, and 14 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(e) The amendment in document S/22310, seeking to add the phrase "and in conformity with article 118 of the Third Geneva Convention of 1949" between the words "International Committee of the Red Cross" and "return the remains" in operative paragraph 3 (c), received 6 votes in favour, none against, and 9 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(f) The amendment in document S/22311, seeking to delete the phrase starting with the words “in the areas of Iraq where ...” up to the end of operative paragraph 3 (d), received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(g) The amendment in document S/22312, seeking to delete the whole of operative paragraph 4, received 3 votes in favour, none against, and 12 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(h) The amendment in document S/22317, seeking to delete the whole of operative paragraph 7, received 2 votes in favour, none against and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(i) The amendment in document S/22305, seeking to replace operative paragraph 1 with the words “Welcomes the restoration of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(j) The amendment in document S/22315, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Decid[ed] to declare null and void all provisions contained in the pertinent resolutions of the Security Council regarding trade in foodstuffs and in all other products essential for the health and well-being of the Iraqi people”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(k) The amendment in document S/22306, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Decid[ed] an immediate ceasefire”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(l) The amendment in document S/22307, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Request[ed] the Secretary-General to immediately dispatch a military observer mission to the area with the aim of monitoring and supervising compliance with the ceasefire decided above” was not put to the vote. The representative of Yemen suggested that the representative of Cuba might wish to withdraw that amendment since the preceding amendment calling for a ceasefire had not been adopted.²⁵¹ The representative of Cuba stated that he was not withdrawing the amendment, but since it was connected with the amendment just rejected, the suggestion not to vote on it seemed logical.²⁵²

(m) The amendment in document S/22308, seeking to replace the chapeau in operative paragraph 2 with the words “Notes that Iraq has committed itself to”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(n) The amendment in document S/22309, seeking to replace the introductory phrase in operative paragraph 3 with the words “Further notes that Iraq is fully willing to”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(o) The amendment in document S/22314, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Request[ed] the Secretary-General to urgently draw up plans for the deployment of a United Nations peacekeeping force in the area, in consultation with the countries where it would be deployed, and report back to the Security Council for consideration and approval”, received 5 votes in favour, none against, and 10 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(p) The amendment in document S/22313, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Affirm[ed] the obligation of all Member States to respect fully the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and Kuwait” and noted “the commitment of the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under paragraph 2 of Security Council resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end as soon as possible”, received 2 votes in favour, none against, and 13 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(q) The amendment in document S/22303, seeking to replace the phrase starting with the words “and the objective in resolution ...” in the sixth

²⁵¹ Ibid., p. 16.

preambular paragraph by the words “and the role that the United Nations has to play in restoring and maintaining international peace and security in the region”, received 4 votes in favour, none against, and 11 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

(r) The amendment in document S/22316, seeking to insert a new operative paragraph by which the Council would have “Request[ed] all Member States, the United Nations, the specialized agencies, as well as other international organizations to provide, on an urgent basis, humanitarian assistance, including foodstuffs and medical supplies, to Iraq and Kuwait”, received 5 votes in favour, none against, and 10 abstentions and was not adopted, having failed to obtain the necessary majority.

The Council then began its voting procedure on the draft resolution, as orally revised by the representative of the United States on behalf of the sponsors.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen stated that, although the draft resolution had a number of positive aspects that could contribute to a peaceful diplomatic solution of the crisis, it was deficient in several respects: (1) it did not call for a ceasefire, although it contained arrangements relating to the release of prisoners of war and the removal of mines which usually accompanied a ceasefire; (2) it did not mention the end of the embargo against Iraq, particularly with regard to food; (3) it did not attribute a role to the United Nations or its Secretary-General, particularly at this early phase of the ending of the crisis; (4) it did not refer in any way to the withdrawal of the alliance troops now on Iraqi territory; and (5) paragraph 4 of the draft resolution related to the continued use of force, which seemed strange and excessive since Iraqi troops had been completely withdrawn from Kuwait and the purposes of resolution 660 (1990) had been implemented. The speaker added that the Council should start without delay to ensure the implementation of the other resolutions relating to other disputes in the region, particularly the Arab-Israeli conflict.²⁵³

The representative of Cuba remarked that the Council was now involved in the voting process on the draft resolution although 24 hours had not yet elapsed since it was first officially presented to the non-permanent members of the Council. His delegation did not claim to abide by this rule of courtesy regarding the submission of draft resolutions, but wished that fact to be noted. He stated that his delegation would vote against the draft resolution since it was another step towards conduct that would constitute a violation of the Charter. The text reiterated that resolution 678 (1990) remained in effect, as did its provisions, by which the Council had relinquished its fundamental obligation to preserve international peace and security and authorized others to take this on without monitoring or supervision of any kind. By paragraph 4, the Council would once again relinquish its obligations in this regard and place them on the shoulders of some States, in language that could be used for any purpose upon which the generals decided. The draft resolution did not — as the Security Council was obliged to do — establish a ceasefire, but established conditions for one that might in fact increase tensions and complicate a situation that was already quite complex. Nor did it give any functions to the United Nations, the Security Council or the Secretary-General. Moreover, some parts of the text appeared to be designed to justify the military occupation of the territory of Iraq, which his delegation rejected.²⁵⁴

The representative of Zimbabwe regarded the draft resolution as an important step in the process of normalizing the situation in the Gulf and in the Middle East region as a whole. Although his country would have preferred the Council to formalize a ceasefire immediately, it understood that the draft resolution constituted a necessary first step towards such formalization. It welcomed the intention of the States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait to bring their military presence in Iraq to an early end, as expressed in the last preambular paragraph of the text, and the provisions that facilitated the rescission of the annexation of Kuwait. At the same time, it hoped that no situation would arise in which paragraph 4 would be invoked to resume military operations in the area. The speaker added that Zimbabwe would have preferred to have representatives of the Secretary-General present during the meeting of the military commanders to arrange the military aspects of the cessation of hostilities referred to in paragraph 3 (b). Touching upon the responsibilities of the Council with respect to other political problems of the region, he said that the international community now expected the Council to maintain the same standards it had applied in dealing with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait — where it had acted with speed, resolve and single-mindedness to uphold its resolutions and international law — as it addressed the other issues in the Middle East, particularly the question of the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel. He concluded that the credibility and integrity of the Council would be damaged and international law undermined if the Council continued to be perceived as inconsistent and as guilty of applying double standards.²⁵⁵

The draft resolution,²⁵⁶ as orally revised, was then put to the vote. It received 11 votes in favour, 1 against (Cuba) and 3 abstentions (China, India, Yemen), and was adopted as resolution 686 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990 and 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990,

Recalling the obligations of Member States under Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also paragraph 9 of resolution 661 (1990) regarding assistance to the Government of Kuwait and paragraph 3 (c) of that resolution regarding supplies strictly for medical purposes and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs,

Taking note of the letters dated 27 February 1991 from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council and to the Secretary-General, confirming Iraq's agreement to comply fully with all of the resolutions noted above, and of his letter of the same date addressed to the President of the Security Council stating Iraq's intention to release prisoners of war immediately,

Noting the suspension of offensive combat operations by the forces of Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990),

Bearing in mind the need to be assured of Iraq's peaceful intentions, and the objective expressed in resolution 678 (1990) of restoring international peace and security in the region,

Underlining the importance of Iraq taking the necessary measures which would permit a definitive end to the hostilities,

Affirming the commitment of all Member States to the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Iraq and Kuwait, and noting the intention expressed by the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end as soon as possible consistent with achieving the objectives of that resolution,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Affirms that all twelve resolutions noted above continue to have full force and effect;

2. Demands that Iraq implement its acceptance of all twelve resolutions noted above and in particular that Iraq:

(a) Rescind immediately its actions purporting to annex Kuwait;

(b) Accept in principle its liability under international law for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq;

(c) Immediately release under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Red Cross Societies or Red Crescent Societies all Kuwaiti and third-State nationals detained by Iraq and return the remains of any deceased Kuwaiti and third-State nationals so detained;

(d) Immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, the return to be completed in the shortest possible period;

3. Also demands that Iraq:

(a) Cease hostile or provocative actions by its forces against all Member States, including missile attacks and flights of combat aircraft;

(b) Designate military commanders to meet with counterparts from the forces of Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990) to arrange for the military aspects of a cessation of hostilities at the earliest possible time;

(c) Arrange for immediate access to and release of all prisoners of war under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross and return the remains of any deceased personnel of the forces of Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990);

(d) Provide all information and assistance in identifying Iraqi mines, booby traps and other explosives as well as any chemical and biological weapons and material in Kuwait, in areas of Iraq where forces of Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990) are present temporarily, and in the adjacent waters;

4. Recognizes that during the period required for Iraq to comply with paragraphs 2 and 3 above, the provisions of paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990) remain valid;

5. Welcomes the decision of Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990) to provide access to and commence immediately the release of Iraqi prisoners of war under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross, as required by the terms of the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, of 12 August 1949;

6. Requests all Member States, as well as the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations in the United Nations system, to take all appropriate action to cooperate with the Government and people of Kuwait in the reconstruction of their country;

7. Decides that Iraq shall notify the Secretary-General and the Security Council when it has taken the actions set out above;

8. Also decides, in order to secure the rapid establishment of a definitive end to the hostilities, to remain actively seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China was gratified to see that all parties to the conflict had now suspended their military action. In his country's view, the Security Council should play a positive role in establishing a formal and stable ceasefire in the Gulf region and in seeking a practical formula for a political solution within the framework of the relevant Security Council resolutions. Although the resolution just adopted referred to securing the establishment of a definitive end to the hostilities, it fell short of stating that the Council should have an important role to play with regard to the arrangement and monitoring of the ceasefire. In fact, it extended the time limit during which resolution 678 (1990) remained effective. That went against the desire of the peoples of all countries for an early end to the war and for the achievement of peace. It was well known, moreover, that China had stood throughout for settling conflicts through negotiations and had abstained in the vote on resolution 678 (1990). In those circumstances, the Chinese delegation found it difficult to vote in favour of the draft resolution.²⁵⁷

The representative of India said that his delegation's approach to the problem before them was guided by two broad considerations: re-establishment of peace and security in the area as soon as possible, and the role of the United Nations and the Security Council. With regard to the resolution just adopted, his delegation had a number of concerns. The important element of a permanent or formal ceasefire was missing. Moreover, the procedure to verify compliance by Iraq with whatever it was required to do for a ceasefire was vague. His delegation would have preferred to have the Secretary-General involved in that process. A further concern was that a provision kept open the possibility of the resumption of hostilities, which was unacceptable. Yet another point of concern was the continuation of sanctions, which were playing havoc not only with Iraq's economy but also with the economies of India and many other countries. It was for these reasons that India had abstained in the vote. The speaker added that his country believed that the United Nations had an important role in re-establishing the conditions of peace in the area by providing a tangible presence: even a token United Nations presence would provide renewed hope and assurance to the people in the area.²⁵⁸

The representative of the United States observed that, since the end of November 1990, the Council had focused on the implementation of resolution 678 (1990). Key goals it had adopted had now been achieved: aggression had been decisively beaten and Kuwait liberated. With the resolution just adopted, the Council turned its attention from the war to the challenge of building lasting peace and security. The first priority was to secure a definitive end to hostilities. The resolution set out the measures which Iraq must take and the arrangements which must be put in place to bring that about: Iraq must make clear that it no longer harboured aggressive intent, and must take the steps needed immediately to implement the 12 preceding Security Council resolutions. Until it was clear that Iraq had complied with those requirements, the provisions of resolution 678 (1990), authorizing Kuwait and those cooperating with Kuwait to use all necessary means to ensure Iraqi compliance with the Council resolutions, clearly would remain in effect. The United Nations and the Security Council had been and remained at the centre of the effort to fulfil the overarching tasks set by the previous 12 resolutions: to repel aggression and to build genuine peace and stability. In the resolution just adopted, the Council was providing a broad framework for dealing with the latter, new phase of its task. At the same time, the United States, other members of the Council and other States in the region were beginning to consult on the future steps which would be required to ensure that the peace secured was a lasting one. The nations of the region would clearly take the lead in finding answers to those questions. In the long and difficult road ahead, the Council, too, had a most important role to play. Its task now, the one started upon in the resolution just adopted, was to point the way to building a peaceful and secure system which would deter the repetition of aggression and suffering seen over the past seven months.²⁵⁹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics noted that for the first time the international community had shown its united will in the face of the seizure of one State by another and had been able to bring the aggressor to heel. He hoped that this precedent would prevent the emergence in the future of similar situations. The Council now faced some priority tasks. First and foremost, it must exclude the resumption of any type of military activities. That was the purpose of the resolution just adopted. In the near future, the Council would have to become deeply involved in the final political settlement of the conflict and the elimination of the consequences of Iraqi aggression. The international community also faced the urgent task of beginning to work out post-crisis arrangements in the region, an important element of which had to be the establishment of a security system that not only marked the culmination of recent events, but was a safeguard against military conflicts in the future. Like the previous speaker, the Soviet Union considered that the security structure in the Gulf must be based primarily on the interests of the countries of the region, adding that Iraq must play a positive role in it. It was natural, moreover, that the establishment of that system should involve a role for the United Nations, including the Security Council and its permanent members. The speaker added that the conflict had put into sharp relief the fact that the international community must make the most determined efforts to convene an international conference on the Middle East; his country believed that such a conference would enable long-term peace and security for the entire region to be guaranteed.²⁶⁰

²⁶⁰ Ibid., pp. 46-50.

The representative of France attributed the international community's success in restoring the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait to two essential factors: the unanimous and unequivocal condemnation by the States Members of the United Nations of the aggression against Kuwait; and action by the Security Council, working cohesively and with determination. He took note of Iraq's acceptance of all the resolutions adopted by the Security Council on behalf of the international community, which was a prerequisite for the re-establishment, on a sound and lasting basis, of stability in the region. The resolution just adopted was an indispensable step; it charted the course for a final cessation of hostilities, which France hoped could be announced soon. The United Nations was now faced with a prodigious undertaking. It must first consolidate effectively the cessation of hostilities and then, together with the countries of the region and all interested parties, define the conditions for the lasting restoration of peace and security in the region. The Security Council, in close coordination with the Secretary-General, would continue fully to shoulder its responsibilities. The speaker stressed that the determination the Council had shown for the past seven months, without which the liberation of Kuwait would not have been possible, must be sustained and utilized to settle other conflicts, starting with those of the Near and Middle East. France would strive to ensure that there was one law for all.²⁶¹

The representative of Belgium, too, welcomed the suspension of military operations in the Gulf and Iraq's official announcement of its commitment to comply with the 12 relevant resolutions of the Council. It was now up to the Council to make the necessary arrangements to put an end to the conflict. That was the goal of the resolution just adopted, which in its military, political and humanitarian aspects met his country's concerns. The speaker added that, above and beyond those immediate steps, the Security Council must in due course focus its attention on more long-term arrangements aimed at restoring peace and security in the region, in which the countries of the region and the active members of the coalition would have a major role to play. Belgium was convinced that the Council's action in this regard should be based on four considerations: (1) Kuwait's security must be strengthened and guaranteed, by insisting on respect for international borders; (2) a situation in which Iraq might again gain an offensive military potential and possess weapons of mass destruction must be avoided, by, initially, maintaining a military embargo against Iraq; (3) the international community must renew its efforts to arrive at a speedy, comprehensive, just and lasting solution of the Israeli-Arab conflict and the Palestinian question; and (4) a comprehensive approach to the region should be developed, one which would deal with security questions, political problems and economic cooperation — akin to the approach adopted in the period after the Second World War. That could be done through a conference on security and cooperation in the Middle East, for which it would be useful to appoint a mediator. The speaker added that Belgium hoped that, in the near future, the Council would take a stand on the necessary renunciation by Iraq of any form of appeal for and support of terrorism, on the sending of a United Nations observer force and on the lifting of the food embargo.²⁶²

The representative of the United Kingdom was gratified that, in the liberation of Kuwait, the will of the international community and the Security Council had prevailed. It was a triumph for the rule of international law and collective security. The United Nations and the international community could now turn to the more difficult task, that of assisting in the establishment of a durable system of peace and security in the Gulf region, and in the Middle East more widely, and also to the reconstruction of Kuwait and the rehabilitation of its population. First, however, it was necessary to deal with the immediate aftermath of the hostilities. Though some of that task was properly work for the military commanders in the field, it was right that the Security Council should establish the basic framework within which the conditions could be created for a definitive end to the hostilities. That was what the resolution just adopted was designed to do. The requirements it placed on Iraq were not new: they flowed from the resolutions previously adopted by the Council and from the statements previously made on behalf of the Governments assisting and cooperating with the Government of Kuwait. It was essential that they be explicitly accepted by Iraq, to permit a definite end to the hostilities. The speaker concluded that Iraq should make its contribution to the climate of confidence and reconciliation by a rapid and formal compliance with the provisions of the resolution just adopted. That would enable the Council to meet again in the near future and to take the next steps towards the restoration of international peace and stability in the area. It would then be possible to move on to the broader problems of the Middle East which so urgently needed to be resolved.²⁶³

The representative of Ecuador stated that his country had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted, as it was a positive first step towards the establishment of peace in the area and security machinery for the region. He added, however, that Ecuador would have liked to see additional elements in the resolution: namely, greater clarity with regard to the declaration of a ceasefire and a definitive cessation of hostilities; recognition of the leading role of the United Nations and the Security Council with regard to international peace and security; a request to the Secretary-General for a report on the establishment and dispatch to the region as soon as possible of an observer mission to cooperate in the establishment of lasting peace; and measures to ensure that humanitarian aid was given to all those who were suffering, whatever their nationality. Ecuador had therefore favoured some of the amendments proposed by the delegation of Cuba. In connection with paragraph 4 of the resolution, the speaker reiterated his country's desire that there should be no need to use force again to ensure compliance with the Council's resolutions.²⁶⁴

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Austria, stated that the Council's immediate task, as reflected in the resolution just adopted, was to consolidate the de facto cessation of hostilities. The next step would be the rapid establishment of a formal ceasefire. During that phase of the Council's work, serious consideration should be given, in consultation with countries of the region, to a United Nations role in monitoring such a ceasefire. At the same time, there should be a review of the resolutions adopted by the Council, including the question of sanctions, as part of the process of re-establishing peace and cooperation in the area. The speaker added that, in a third phase, the Council would have to take other important and far-reaching decisions. The Council was responsible not only for maintaining security but also for promoting peace. That should be done in cooperation with regional mechanisms. Lessons should be learned, moreover, from the Gulf crisis. One important lesson was the desirability of strengthening the preventive role of the United Nations and of the Council in particular. Another was that ultimately only political solutions would provide the necessary framework for a just and lasting settlement of this and other problems of the region. Confidence-building measures, disarmament and the strengthening of non-proliferation arrangements would have to be part of such comprehensive solutions. Noting with satisfaction the increased — almost universal — awareness that dealing with the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Palestinian problem would be especially important in the aftermath of the Gulf crisis, Austria was confident that the Security Council could make a substantial contribution to the achievement of a comprehensive settlement in the Middle East.²⁶⁵

Other members of the Council remarked on the unprecedented nature of the response to the Iraqi aggression, leading to the liberation of Kuwait, and considered its implications. The representative of Zaire noted that 28 nations had undertaken the task of ensuring the security of small States, thereby demonstrating the determination of the United Nations and the international community to institute a new era of peace based on respect for the rules of international law. He wondered whether it was not now imperative for the Security Council to take the steps that would build confidence and peace in the entire region, including the Middle East.²⁶⁶ The representative of Romania similarly considered that these positive events marked a victory for the values of international law. In his view, they should have a positive impact on the further strengthening of the role of the United Nations and its institutions in the establishment of a system of collective security.²⁶⁷ For the representative of Côte d'Ivoire, the liberation of Kuwait symbolized the triumph of justice over brutal force, marking the dawn of a new international era that he hoped would not stop at the gates of Kuwait. In his view, the action of the coalition forces, authorized by the Security Council, would find its true justification in the Council's ability to meet objectively and in a balanced way the many challenges to peace with which it would continue to be confronted. He joined other speakers in expressing the hope that the forthcoming ceasefire would be monitored by the United Nations.²⁶⁸

The representative of Kuwait expressed his gratitude that Kuwait had been liberated, thanks to the resolutions of the Security Council and the leadership of those States that had cooperated with his country to implement them. He hoped that the Iraqi regime would implement resolution 686 (1990) promptly, and would remember that the international community, through the coalition forces, would not accept any stalling tactics and had the means to impose compliance by force, if necessary.²⁶⁹

The representative of Saudi Arabia, too, expressed his thanks and appreciation to the Council for the historic role it had played in formulating a strong international position that had given the United Nations and its Charter the place that the founders had intended them to have, and to the coalition forces that had cooperated with Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to help defeat the aggression. He also expressed his appreciation to the Secretary-General for his diplomatic efforts and constructive role.

Decision of 3 March 1991 (2979th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2979th meeting, on 3 March 1991, the Council continued its consideration of the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait". In accordance with the decisions taken at the previous meeting, the President invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait to take seats at the Council table, and the representative of Saudi Arabia to take a seat at the side of the Council Chamber.

The President then stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁷⁰

The Security Council welcomes the decisions taken to date relating to food and medical needs by the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, including those just taken to facilitate the provision of humanitarian assistance including infant formula and water purification material.

It calls upon the Committee to continue to act promptly on requests submitted to it for humanitarian assistance.

It urges the Committee to pay particular attention to the findings and recommendations on critical medical/public health and nutritional conditions in Iraq which have been and will continue to be submitted to it by the World Health Organization, the United Nations Children's Fund, the International Committee of the Red Cross and other relevant organizations, consistent with the relevant resolutions, and urges these humanitarian agencies to play an active role in this process and cooperate closely with the Committee in its work.

The Council welcomes the Secretary-General's announcement that he plans to send urgently a mission led by Under-Secretary-General Martti Ahtisaari comprising representatives of the appropriate United Nations agencies to Iraq and Kuwait to assess the humanitarian needs arising in the immediate post-crisis environment. The Council invites the Secretary-General to keep it informed in the shortest possible time on the progress of his mission, on which it pledges to take immediate action.

Decision of 3 April 1991 (2981st meeting):
resolution 687 (1991)

At its 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991, the Council reserved its consideration of the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait", and invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by France, Romania, the United Kingdom and the United States,²⁷¹ which was subsequently also sponsored by Belgium and Zaire, and informed them of a technical correction in the text of paragraph 19.

He also drew their attention to a number of other documents.²⁷² These included the following: (a) letters dated 3 March 1991 from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the President of the Council and the Secretary-General,²⁷³ confirming Iraq's agreement to fulfil its obligations under Security Council resolution 686 (1991); (b) his identical letters dated 5 March addressed to the President of the Council and the Secretary-General,²⁷⁴ concerning the return of property seized by Iraq after 2 August 1990; (c) a letter dated 19 March 1991 from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General,²⁷⁵ informing him that, with regard to resolution 686 (1991), which demanded, inter alia, that Iraq "immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, the return to be completed in the shortest possible period", the members of the Security Council were of the view that the modalities for return of property from Iraq should be arranged through the Secretary-General's office in consultation with the parties, and that this procedure had the agreement of Iraq and Kuwait;²⁷⁶ and (d) a note by the Secretary-General dated 22 March 1991,²⁷⁷ circulating for the attention of all States a letter of the same date he had received from the President of the Security Council. The President had informed him that the members of the Council, in consultations of the whole held on 22 March 1991, had taken note of the decision of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, adopted at its 36th meeting on 22 March 1991, with regard to the determination of humanitarian needs in Iraq. Having considered the report of the Under-Secretary-General of 20 March 1991 on his recent visit to Iraq,²⁷⁸ as well as the report of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Security Council Committee had decided, inter alia, that there was an urgent humanitarian need to supply foodstuffs to Iraq in order to relieve human suffering, and that civilian and humanitarian imports to Iraq should also be allowed with immediate effect. Both were to be subjected to simplified procedures — simple notification for foodstuffs, and a no-objection procedure for civilian and humanitarian imports.

Speaking at the start of the discussion, the representative of Kuwait said that the draft resolution before the Council could be regarded as epitomizing all the resolutions on Kuwait that the Council had adopted earlier in implementing decisively the principles of international law and international legitimacy. That effective action revealed the Council's interest in the concept of collective security derived from the Charter of the United Nations. It also reflected the content and concepts of the new world order that the international community was determined to establish and, if need be, impose. It was no exaggeration to say that the Charter, with all its principles, had become law when the international community effectively dealt with the Iraqi aggression against Kuwait. That action proved that the Organization, with its Security Council, was an effective instrument for collective security and the maintenance of international peace and security, and that all States, large and small, could depend on the security guarantees afforded by the Charter; and it proved that the collective commitment of States to the Charter was the best guarantee for the stability, peace and security of nations. Noting that the Council was now turning to the next phase in facing up to Iraq's aggression, the speaker stressed that the completion of the political aspect of this effort was as important as the military aspect that had been carried out by the coalition forces. It was inconceivable that an aggressive regime, which had tried to eliminate a peaceful State, brutalized its population, polluted its marine environment and destroyed its oil wells, should be allowed to return to the former situation without being held fully responsible. Kuwait called upon the Council to take all necessary measures to guarantee for it and for all peoples of the region respect by the Iraqi regime for all its obligations and duties provided for in all agreements applicable to it. The speaker drew attention in this regard to the Iraqi regime's lack of credibility, noting, for instance, that although Baghdad had declared its acceptance of Security Council resolution 686 (1991), it had yet to return property looted from Kuwait and had not even issued a statement, as required under that resolution, in which it officially accepted the principle of reparations from a legal standpoint. The international community had to take a decisive and strict stand against this kind of aggressive regime to the very end. The historic draft resolution before the Council must be a shield to protect the region from the Iraqi regime in the future. It must also be a lesson for any other regime in any other part of the world that might be tempted to carry out such evils. The Council must thus deal decisively and effectively with all questions, including — in addition to reparations, guarantees and rights — the question of Iraq's armaments.²⁷⁹

resolution had gone beyond the Security Council's mandate and contravened the Charter. He affirmed, nevertheless, that Iraq had accepted resolutions 660 (1990) and 678 (1990) and the other resolutions adopted by the Council under the item entitled "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait". However, he alleged that, in their violence and brutality, the actions of the alliance had gone beyond the objectives of resolution 678 (1990), which related only to the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate authorities. He pointed to the destruction they had wrecked upon Iraq — as evidenced by the report of the mission sent to Iraq by the Secretary-General in mid-March,²⁸⁰ the bombing of civilian targets and the killing of civilian populations; and claimed that the United States and its allies should bear full responsibility for such excesses. With regard to the draft resolution before the Council, the speaker said that since Iraq had announced its commitment to all the resolutions adopted since 2 August 1990, one would have expected the draft resolution to be confined to lifting the economic blockade imposed on Iraq, freeing its frozen assets and property, and announcing a permanent ceasefire and the end of hostilities. However, the draft raised questions that previous resolutions had never tackled or had dealt with in a substantially different way.

The speaker summarized Iraq's position on the substantive paragraphs of the draft resolution as follows. On the question of boundaries, the Security Council had never before imposed disputed international boundaries on States Members of the United Nations. Iraq viewed that question and the manner in which it had been addressed in the draft resolution as an infringement upon its sovereignty and territorial integrity. The text contravened paragraph 3 of resolution 660 (1990), in which Iraq and Kuwait were called upon to begin negotiations for the resolution of their differences, among which was that of boundaries. Iraq reserved the right to demand its legitimate territorial rights in accordance with international law. As to the question of reparations, Iraq reserved its right to request reparations for all losses that it had incurred through any excess in the use of force as authorized by resolution 678 (1990). The imposition of reparations on Iraq alone and in the coercive manner of the draft resolution would only lead to the paralysis of Iraq's capacity to rebuild its economy. With regard to the question of destroying weapons, if the text aimed at restoring international peace and security in the region, Iraq's undertaking this alone would not secure that objective. The Council would have to follow it up with a similar and comprehensive integrated programme to disarm the entire region of all weapons of mass destruction. Finally, as to the economic blockade, the Government of Iraq believed that maintaining the land, sea and air blockade and the freeze of assets — in spite of all that was mentioned in the report of the United Nations mission to Iraq and in spite of the fact that Iraq had accepted the implementation of all 13 Security Council resolutions on the issue and thus removed the reasons for the sanctions — would be in contravention of the Charter of the United Nations. It could also be viewed as economic aggression and a clear violation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and covenants on human rights, foremost among which were the rights to life, dignity and freedom.²⁸¹

Speaking before the vote on the draft resolution, the representative of Yemen stated that the draft resolution before the Council included unjust and harsh conditions for Iraq and its people in order to achieve an official and formal ceasefire. He remarked on three salient features. First, the draft resolution tended to exceed the Charter and the Security Council mandate and resolutions. This was so in several respects. Echoing the views of the representative of Iraq, the speaker referred to the unprecedented and inappropriate role of the Council in the "imposition of the boundaries between Iraq and Kuwait", a task which belonged to the parties or to the International Court of Justice. Furthermore, there was no precedent whatsoever for the Security Council to guarantee the boundaries of any country, as it was being asked to do in the draft resolution. Also objectionable was the specification of the way in which Iraq should pay reparations resulting from its responsibility for the war. While agreeing that, under international law, Iraq should pay reparations, the speaker questioned why the Secretary-General should be involved in a matter that fell within the purview of the International Court of Justice. As there would no doubt be many claims made from different quarters, he suggested that a neutral party should decide on them, in accordance with specified procedures. Secondly, the draft resolution was narrow in its outlook, both politically and geographically. It did not address the real needs that must be met if long-term peace and security were to be established, not only in the Gulf area but in the region as a whole — including the Middle East. Once again there was the matter of the imposition of boundaries, instead of a call upon the two countries to negotiate; the fact that they were imposed and not agreed upon might expose them to future challenge. There was also the question of the destruction of weapons of mass destruction. Yemen supported any action aimed at eradicating weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East region. However the destruction of the Iraqi weapons alone would not help in eradicating similar weapons elsewhere in the region, and the resulting military imbalance would benefit only Israel. Thirdly, the draft resolution was characterized by the application of the same logic as that of resolution 678 (1990), in which the Council gave unlimited authority to an unlimited number of countries to do unspecified things under the banner of guaranteeing peace and security in the region. That was quite clear from the following: firstly, the draft resolution aimed only at the formal declaration of a ceasefire. Thus the state of war would continue between Iraq and the forces of the alliance until a definitive end was put to the hostilities. That would be determined by the forces of the alliance, but might take years because the cessation of hostilities was related to the guaranteeing of peace and security in the region, let alone the guaranteeing of the boundaries between Iraq and Kuwait. Second, the forces of the alliance, which occupied about 20 per cent of the territory of Iraq would, according to paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, withdraw only when certain conditions were met. Those conditions would be those accepted by the coalition forces; they were not specified in the draft resolution. Third, the United Nations would not be the party establishing security in the region, but the Security Council would have to accept or coexist with the security arrangements that would be applied because they would be made under the authority of the United Nations. Fourth, the draft resolution ignored the needs and requirements of the Iraqi people. The speaker acknowledged that the Council had approved the recommendation made by the United Nations mission that had assessed the humanitarian needs of Iraq in mid-March, and had eased the embargo on foodstuffs and humanitarian needs. However, he stressed that the insistence of the sponsors of the draft resolution that the embargo be continued with regard to the other needs of the Iraqi civilians would hurt only the Iraqi people. The speaker concluded that the delegation of Yemen would not support the draft resolution for those reasons.²⁸²

The representative of Cuba adduced similar reasons to explain why his delegation intended to vote against the draft resolution, adding that the economic sanctions should be lifted as the conditions on the basis of which they had been established had ceased to exist.²⁸³

The representative of Zaire, by contrast, indicated why his country had decided to become a sponsor of the draft resolution. It was true that the draft, the longest and most complex the Council had ever taken up, dealt with various areas which in some respects had never before been examined in the Council. The extraordinary nature of the Gulf crisis required that the Council find extraordinary solutions. His delegation believed that the areas covered by the draft resolution — boundaries, troop withdrawal, sanctions, the system of compensating for damages, the elimination of weapons of mass destruction, international terrorism — all of which were to lead to a genuine and permanent ceasefire, were essential elements for the establishment of a lasting peace. With regard to boundaries, Zaire noted that the crisis that had broken out on 2 August 1990 between Iraq and Kuwait had primarily been caused by border disputes between the two countries. As a member of the Organization of African Unity, which enshrined the principle of inviolability of borders in its Charter, Zaire believed that strict compliance with that principle would avoid potential conflicts and ensure stability among neighbouring States, both in Africa and elsewhere. The speaker pointed out, moreover, that the draft resolution acknowledged the importance of negotiations between the two countries regarding the demarcation of the boundary. It also added a key element designed to preserve the future: the Council was asked to safeguard the inviolability of that boundary. As to the withdrawal of troops, Zaire was pleased that the draft resolution advocated the deployment of a United Nations observer unit, which would enable those troops still in the region to withdraw. Regarding sanctions, Zaire had been concerned to ensure that the civilian population obtained adequate, regular supplies of foodstuffs and medicines. As those concerns had been met in the decision of the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990), it agreed with the provisions in the draft resolution. As to compensation, it was only fair that Iraq, the aggressor, should bear responsibility for its acts and pay for them. The machinery set up would ensure that the system functioned harmoniously and impartially as it had been placed under the guidance of the Secretary-General. With regard to weapons of mass destruction, Zaire believed that the countries of the region should work together to set up a collective security system. However, in the light of the dangers posed by the accumulation of such weapons in Iraq, it was appropriate that steps be taken to eliminate them. Finally, as to the establishment of a formal ceasefire, Zaire hoped that Iraq would comply quickly with its obligations in order to bring that stage closer.²⁸⁴

The representative of Zimbabwe, too, considered that the several unprecedented decisions that the Council was about to take in adopting the draft resolution had to be interpreted in the light of the unique situation created by the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq. It was Zimbabwe's understanding that measures contained in the draft resolution were intended to address some of the major issues that had led to the conflict between Iraq and Kuwait; and that some provisions, which ordinarily would have caused it great discomfort, were designed to ensure that there would be no recurrence of the tragedy inflicted upon Kuwait in August 1990. It had also noted that, in the implementation of some of the measures, the requirements of the people of Iraq, as well as the needs of the Iraqi economy, would be taken into account. Zimbabwe thought the draft had two shortcomings, however. While it believed that the objectives of a zone free from weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East and of a global ban on chemical weapons could contribute to durable stability and security in the region, it had misgivings regarding whether the approach suggested in the draft resolution constituted the best way to achieve those objectives. It would have preferred to have the measures specified in section C of the text applied within the framework of the whole region. On sanctions, Zimbabwe had expected that the Council would, in the draft resolution, proceed beyond the recent decision taken by the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) and lift all remaining restrictions on the supply of foodstuffs and essential civilian needs to Iraq. He believed that to be the appropriate response to the report of the United Nations mission to Iraq in mid-March 1991. The speaker concluded by stating that his country's interpretation of operative paragraph 32 of the draft resolution, requiring Iraq to renounce international terrorism, was that nothing contained in that paragraph referred to or applied to the struggles of peoples under occupation who were struggling for self-determination.²⁸⁵

The representative of India, noting that the draft resolution dealt with issues that the Council had never before been called upon to consider, observed that its sponsors had assured Council members that they had put together the various elements of the text in the understanding that the international community was dealing with a unique situation in the history of the United Nations, and had urged members to look at the resolution in that light. He was pleased that some of his delegation's ideas had been incorporated in the final text. India welcomed the fact that a formal ceasefire would become effective upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions of the draft resolution; that was a noteworthy improvement on resolution 686 (1990), on which India had abstained. With regard to the provisions relating to the international boundary, India insisted that it would never support any decision whereby the Council would impose arbitrarily a boundary line between two countries. Boundaries were an extremely sensitive issue that had to be settled by the countries concerned, freely in the exercise of their sovereignty. In this case, the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait had been agreed upon by the highest authorities of the respective countries as two fully independent and sovereign States, who had registered their agreement with the United Nations. Thus, the Council was not itself establishing any new boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, but was calling upon them to respect its inviolability. Concerning operative paragraph 4 of the draft resolution, by which the Council would guarantee the inviolability of the boundary, it was India's understanding that that provision did not confer authority on any country to take unilateral action under any of the previous resolutions of the Council. Rather, the sponsors had explained that, in case of any threat or actual violation of the boundary in future, the Council would meet to take, as appropriate, all necessary measures in accordance with the Charter. Having long stressed that the United Nations and Secretary-General should have a role in the post-crisis situation in the region, India welcomed the fact that the United Nations was now being called upon to send an observer unit to monitor the border between Iraq and Kuwait. Although it would have preferred to have a United Nations contingent also deployed between the Iraqi troops and the forces of countries cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, it noted that it was the intention of those countries to withdraw their forces once the United Nations observer unit was deployed along the Iraq-Kuwait border. On sanctions, India was pleased that the Council had taken action in devising a much-simplified procedure to meet humanitarian needs. However, it thought that the Council should have gone further and lifted the sanctions against the supply of all the commodities listed in Mr. Ahtisaari's report to the Secretary-General of 20 March 1991. India believed, moreover, that all non-military sanctions against Iraq should be lifted as soon as Iraq conveyed acceptance of the draft resolution under consideration. With regard to military sanctions, it was glad that the sponsors had introduced an element of review. As for the framework and measures aimed at creating a durable peace and stability in the region, while India fully supported the objective, it was not convinced that the implementation of the provisions of the draft resolution would, by itself, create the necessary conditions or atmosphere for solving the basic conflicts there. It shared the view of others that the region would not enjoy lasting peace and stability until the complex of issues dividing the Arabs and the Israelis was resolved in a just and mutually satisfactory manner. In India's view, the consideration of those issues should not be delayed any longer. As to modalities, the speaker recalled that his country had consistently held that regional initiatives or arrangements for peace and stability deserved encouragement, provided they evolved through negotiations based on the exercise of the free and sovereign will of the countries of the region. Such arrangements could not be imposed by external pressure nor could they be lasting if they were of a discriminatory nature taken in the global context. Nor was it legitimate to make such arrangements under the mandatory provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter. The international community, acting under the Charter, could at best encourage, acknowledge and, if requested

by the countries concerned, take appropriate action to impart legitimacy to them.²⁸⁶

The draft resolution,²⁸⁷ as orally revised, was then put to the vote, and adopted by 12 votes in favour, 1 against (Cuba) and 2 abstentions (Ecuador, Yemen), as resolution 687 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990, 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990 and 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991,

Welcoming the restoration to Kuwait of its sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity and the return of its legitimate Government,

Affirming the commitment of all Member States to the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Kuwait and Iraq, and noting the intention expressed by the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under paragraph 2 of resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end as soon as possible consistent with paragraph 8 of resolution 686 (1991),

Reaffirming the need to be assured of Iraq's peaceful intentions in the light of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait,

Taking note of the letter dated 27 February 1991 from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the President of the Security Council and of his letters of the same date addressed to the President of the Council and to the Secretary-General, and those letters dated 3 March and 5 March he addressed to them, pursuant to resolution 686 (1991),

Noting that Iraq and Kuwait, as independent sovereign States, signed at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters", thereby formally recognizing the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait and the allocation of islands, which Agreed Minutes were registered with the United Nations in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations and in which Iraq recognized the independence and complete sovereignty of the State of Kuwait with its boundaries as specified in the letter of the Prime Minister of Iraq dated 21 July 1932 and as accepted by the ruler of Kuwait in his letter dated 10 August 1932,

Conscious of the need for demarcation of the said boundary,

Conscious also of the statements by Iraq threatening to use weapons in violation of its obligations under the Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, signed at Geneva on 17 June 1925, and of its prior use of chemical weapons, and affirming that grave consequences would follow any further use by Iraq of such weapons,

Recalling that Iraq has subscribed to the Final Declaration adopted by all States participating in the Conference of States Parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol and Other Interested States, held in Paris from 7 to 11 January 1989, establishing the objective of universal elimination of chemical and biological weapons,

Recalling also that Iraq has signed the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, of 10 April 1972,

Noting the importance of Iraq ratifying the Convention,

Noting also the importance of all States adhering to the Convention and encouraging its forthcoming review conference to reinforce the authority, efficiency and universal scope of the Convention,

Stressing the importance of an early conclusion by the Conference on Disarmament of its work on a convention on the universal prohibition of chemical weapons and of universal adherence thereto,

Aware of the use by Iraq of ballistic missiles in unprovoked attacks and therefore of the need to take specific measures in regard to such missiles located in Iraq,

Concerned by the reports in the hands of Member States that Iraq has attempted to acquire materials for a nuclear-weapons programme contrary to its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968,

Recalling the objective of the establishment of a nuclear-weapon-free zone in the region of the Middle East,

Conscious of the threat that all weapons of mass destruction pose to peace and security in the area and of the need to work towards the establishment in the Middle East of a zone free of such weapons,

Conscious also of the objective of achieving balanced and comprehensive control of armaments in the region,

Conscious further of the importance of achieving the objectives noted above using all available means, including a dialogue among the States of the region,

Noting that resolution 686 (1991) marked the lifting of the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990) in so far as they applied to Kuwait,

Noting also that despite the progress being made in fulfilling the obligations of resolution 686 (1991), many Kuwaiti and third-State nationals are still not accounted for and property remains unreturned,

Recalling the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, opened for signature in New York on 18 December 1979, which categorizes all acts of taking hostages as manifestations of international terrorism,

Deploring threats made by Iraq during the recent conflict to make use of terrorism against targets outside Iraq and the taking of hostages by Iraq,

Taking note with grave concern of the reports transmitted by the Secretary-General on 20 March and 28 March 1991, and conscious of the necessity to meet urgently the humanitarian needs in Kuwait and Iraq,

Bearing in mind its objective of restoring international peace and security in the area as set out in its recent resolutions,

Conscious of the need to take the following measures acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,

1. Affirms all thirteen resolutions noted above, except as expressly changed below to achieve the goals of the present resolution, including a formal ceasefire;

2. Demands that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands set out in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters", signed by them in the exercise of their sovereignty at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 and registered with the United Nations;

3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to lend his assistance to make arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, drawing on appropriate material including the maps transmitted with the letter dated 28 March 1991 addressed to him by the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations, and to report back to the Council within one month;

4. Decides to guarantee the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary and to take, as appropriate, all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, after consulting with Iraq and Kuwait, to submit within three days to the Council for its approval a plan for the immediate deployment of a United Nations observer unit to monitor the Khawr 'Abd Allah and a demilitarized zone, which is hereby established, extending ten kilometres into Iraq and five kilometres into Kuwait from the boundary referred to in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters"; to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the demilitarized zone and to observe any hostile or potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State against the other; and also requests the Secretary-General to report regularly to the Council on the operations of the unit and to do so immediately if there are serious violations of the zone or potential threats to peace;

6. Notes that as soon as the Secretary-General notifies the Council of the completion of the deployment of the United Nations observer unit, the conditions will be established for the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990) to bring their military presence in Iraq to an end consistent with resolution 686 (1991);

C

7. Invites Iraq to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the Protocol for the Prohibition of the Use in War of Asphyxiating, Poisonous or Other Gases, and of Bacteriological Methods of Warfare, signed at Geneva on 17 June 1925, and to ratify the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on Their Destruction, of 10 April 1972;

8. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally accept the destruction, removal, or rendering harmless, under international supervision, of:

(a) All chemical and biological weapons and all stocks of agents and all related subsystems and components and all research, development, support and manufacturing facilities related thereto;

(b) All ballistic missiles with a range greater than one hundred and fifty kilometres, and related major parts and repair and production facilities;

9. Decides also, for the implementation of paragraph 8, the following:

(a) Iraq shall submit to the Secretary-General, within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution, a declaration on the locations, amounts and types of all items specified in paragraph 8 and agree to urgent, on-site inspection as specified below;

(b) The Secretary-General, in consultation with the appropriate Governments and, where appropriate, with the Director-General of the World Health Organization, within forty-five days of the adoption of the present resolution shall develop and submit to the Council for approval a plan calling for the completion of the following acts within forty-five days of such approval:

(i) The forming of a special commission which shall carry out immediate on-site inspection of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities, based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the special commission itself;

(ii) The yielding by Iraq of possession to the Special Commission for destruction, removal or rendering harmless, taking into account the requirements of public safety, of all items specified under paragraph 8 (a), including items at the additional locations designated by the Special Commission under paragraph (i) and the destruction by Iraq, under the supervision of the Special Commission, of all its missile capabilities, including launchers, as specified under paragraph 8 (b);

(iii) The provision by the Special Commission to the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of the assistance and cooperation required in paragraphs 12 and 13;

10. Decides further that Iraq shall unconditionally undertake not to use, develop, construct or acquire any of the items specified in paragraphs 8 and 9, and requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Commission, to develop a plan for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with the present paragraph, to be submitted to the Council for approval within one hundred and twenty days of the passage of the present resolution;

11. Invites Iraq to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, of 1 July 1968;

12. Decides that Iraq shall unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapon-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to the above; to submit to the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency within fifteen days of the adoption of the present resolution a declaration of the locations, amounts and types of all items specified above; to place all of its nuclear-weapon-usable materials under the exclusive control, for custody and removal, of the Agency, with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission as provided for in the plan of the Secretary-General discussed in paragraph 9 (b); to accept, in accordance with the arrangements provided for in paragraph 13, urgent on-site inspection and the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items specified above; and to accept the plan discussed in paragraph 13 for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of its compliance with these undertakings;

13. Requests the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, through the Secretary-General and with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission as provided for in the plan of the Secretary-General referred to in paragraph 9 (b), to carry out immediate on-site inspection of Iraq's nuclear capabilities based on Iraq's declarations and the designation of any additional locations by the Special Commission; to develop a plan for submission to the Council within forty-five days calling for the destruction, removal or rendering harmless as appropriate of all items listed in paragraph 12; to carry out the plan within forty-five days following approval by the Council and to develop a plan, taking into account the rights and obligations of Iraq under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with paragraph 12, including an inventory of all nuclear material in Iraq subject to the Agency's verification and inspections to confirm that Agency safeguards cover all relevant nuclear activities in Iraq, to be submitted to the Council for approval within one hundred and twenty days of the adoption of the present resolution;

14. Notes that the actions to be taken by Iraq in paragraphs 8 to 13 represent steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction and all missiles for their delivery and the objective of a global ban on chemical weapons;

D

15. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the steps taken to facilitate the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, including a list of any property that Kuwait claims has not been returned or which has not been returned intact;

E

16. Reaffirms that Iraq, without prejudice to its debts and obligations arising prior to 2 August 1990, which will be addressed through the normal mechanisms, is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage — including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources — or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations as a result of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait;

17. Decides that all Iraqi statements made since 2 August 1990 repudiating its foreign debt are null and void, and demands that Iraq adhere scrupulously to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt;

18. Decides also to create a fund to pay compensation for claims that fall within paragraph 16 and to establish a commission that will administer the fund;

19. Directs the Secretary-General to develop and present to the Council for decision, no later than thirty days following the adoption of the present resolution, recommendations for the Fund to be established in accordance with paragraph 18 and for a programme to implement the decisions in paragraphs 16 to 18, including the following: administration of the Fund; mechanisms for determining the appropriate level of Iraq's contribution to the Fund, based on a percentage of the value of its exports of petroleum and petroleum products, not to exceed a figure to be suggested to the Council by the Secretary-General, taking into account the requirements of the people of Iraq, Iraq's payment capacity as assessed in conjunction with the international financial institutions taking into consideration external debt service, and the needs of the Iraqi economy; arrangements for ensuring that payments are made to the Fund; the process by which funds will be allocated and claims paid; appropriate procedures for evaluating losses, listing claims and verifying their validity, and resolving disputed claims in respect of Iraq's liability as specified in paragraph 16; and the composition of the Commission designated above;

20. Decides, effective immediately, that the prohibitions against the sale or supply to Iraq of commodities or products other than medicine and health supplies, and prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 661 (1990), shall not apply to foodstuffs notified to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait or, with the approval of that Committee, under the simplified and accelerated “no-objection” procedure, to materials and supplies for essential civilian needs as identified in the report to the Secretary-General dated 20 March 1991, and in any further findings of humanitarian need by the Committee;

21. Decides to review the provisions of paragraph 20 every sixty days in the light of the policies and practices of the Government of Iraq, including the implementation of all relevant resolutions of the Council, for the purpose of determining whether to reduce or lift the prohibitions referred to therein;

22. Decides also that upon the approval by the Council of the programme called for in paragraph 19 and upon Council agreement that Iraq has completed all actions contemplated in paragraphs 8 to 13, the prohibitions against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq and the prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto contained in resolution 661 (1990) shall have no further force or effect;

23. Decides further that, pending action by the Council under paragraph 22, the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait shall be empowered to approve, when required to assure adequate financial resources on the part of Iraq to carry out the activities under paragraph 20, exceptions to the prohibition against the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq;

24. Decides that, in accordance with resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent related resolutions and until it takes a further decision, all States shall continue to prevent the sale or supply to Iraq, or the promotion or facilitation of such sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of:

(a) Arms and related materiel of all types, specifically including the sale or transfer through other means of all forms of conventional military equipment, including for paramilitary forces, and spare parts and components and their means of production for such equipment;

(b) Items specified and defined in paragraphs 8 and 12 not otherwise covered above;

(c) Technology under licensing or other transfer arrangements used in the production, utilization or stockpiling of items specified in paragraphs (a) and (b);

(d) Personnel or materials for training or technical support services relating to the design, development, manufacture, use, maintenance or support of items specified in paragraphs (a) and (b);

25. Calls upon all States and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with paragraph 24, notwithstanding the existence of any contracts, agreements, licences or any other arrangements;

26. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with appropriate Governments, to develop within sixty days, for the approval of the Council, guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of paragraphs 24, 25 and 27, and to make them available to all States and to establish a procedure for updating these guidelines periodically;

27. Calls upon all States to maintain such national controls and procedures and to take such other actions consistent with the guidelines to be established by the Council under paragraph 26 as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the terms of paragraph 24, and calls upon international organizations to take all appropriate steps to assist in ensuring such full compliance;

28. Agrees to review its decisions in paragraphs 22 to 25, except for the items specified and defined in paragraphs 8 and 12, on a regular basis and in any case one hundred and twenty days following the adoption of the present resolution, taking into account Iraq’s compliance with the resolution and general progress towards the control of armaments in the region;

29. Decides that all States, including Iraq, shall take the necessary measures to ensure that no claim shall lie at the instance of the Government of Iraq, or of any person or body in Iraq, or of any person claiming through or for the benefit of any such person or body, in connection with any contract or other transaction where its performance was affected by reason of the measures taken by the Council in resolution 661 (1990) and related resolutions;

G

30. Decides that, in furtherance of its commitment to facilitate the repatriation of all Kuwaiti and third-State nationals, Iraq shall extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross by providing lists of such persons, facilitating the access of the International Committee to all such persons wherever located or detained and facilitating the search by the International Committee for those Kuwaiti and third-State nationals still unaccounted for;

31. Invites the International Committee of the Red Cross to keep the Secretary-General apprised, as appropriate, of all activities undertaken in connection with facilitating the repatriation or return of all Kuwaiti and third-State nationals or their remains present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990;

H

32. Requires Iraq to inform the Council that it will not commit or support any act of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods and practices of terrorism;

I

33. Declares that, upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the above provisions, a formal ceasefire is effective between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990);

34. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to take such further steps as may be required for the implementation of the present resolution and to secure peace and security in the region.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States heralded resolution 687 (1991) as unique and historic. It endeavoured to get at the core problems which had led to the Gulf crisis and laid the groundwork for the permanent ceasefire and for the withdrawal of coalition forces from Iraqi territory. It established clear incentives for rapid implementation. As soon as Iraq accepted the provisions of the resolution, a formal ceasefire would become effective, and as Iraq met the stipulations of the resolution, the sanctions regime would be modified, the role of the Secretary-General in overseeing the return to normal relations would be solidified, the coalition forces would be withdrawn, and the various mechanisms created by the resolution would come into being. The resolution relied heavily on the Secretary-General and the United Nations for its implementation, in an unprecedented elaboration of the role of the United Nations in peacekeeping and peacemaking. They were involved in the demarcation of the Iraq-Kuwait border, the deployment of observers, the activation of a special commission to oversee the elimination of weapons of mass destruction, the creation of a compensation regime, the return of Kuwaiti property and the control of arms sales to Iraq. The resolution was tough, but fair. It was fair because it set out the path by which Iraq could take its place again in the world community. It was desirable that that happen with an Iraq that was protected from dismemberment. The Council's task now, consistent with its responsibilities under Chapter VII, was to establish peace in such a way that Iraq never again threatened Kuwait's sovereignty and integrity. For that reason, the resolution demanded that Iraq and Kuwait should respect their international boundary, agreed upon in 1963, asked the Secretary-General to lend his assistance to make arrangements with the two countries to demarcate the boundary and decided to guarantee its inviolability. Noting that the circumstances before the Council were unique in the history of the United Nations, and that the resolution was tailored exclusively to those circumstances, the speaker stressed that the United States did not seek, nor would it support, a new role for the Security Council as the body that determined international boundaries. Border disputes were issues to be negotiated directly between States or resolved through other pacific means of settlement. Next, the resolution created a demilitarized zone and called for the immediate deployment of an observer force; its purpose was to deter threats to peace through its very presence astride the Iraq-Kuwait border. It also dealt with the problem of weapons of mass destruction and the missiles with which to deliver them. Extraordinary care had been taken in those sections of the resolution to be precise and thorough, as required by the extraordinary circumstances of Iraq's past use of, and threats to use or develop, such weapons. Since the region could not be secure if those weapons remained at Iraq's disposal, the Council had decided that they must be eliminated under the supervision of a Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency. The resolution broke further new ground in requiring Iraq to forswear future efforts to develop such weapons and in establishing a mechanism for international monitoring of Iraq's compliance. In order to facilitate the work of the Special Commission, the United States proposed to play an active role in that body where it and other permanent members of the Security Council had necessary expertise which they could make available. Finally, on the measures to rebuild the peace, the text made clear that this attempt by the international community to deal with the unique problem posed by Iraq took place in a regional context.

The speaker added that other major steps had been taken in the area of liability for damage and compensation. The resolution established a process of settlement by which all who had suffered direct damage or injury as a result of the illegal Iraqi aggression could claim and receive compensation. It created a fund, supported by Iraq's contribution of a certain percentage of its oil revenues, to pay compensation for future claims and a Commission to administer the fund. The Secretary-General would have a key role in bringing that process into being and would make recommendations to the Council. On the question of sanctions, the resolution created a dynamic and flexible process, which linked the removal of sanctions to the implementation of the resolution. That was the incentive to implement fully the resolution as soon as possible. The Council also provided for the continuation of the return of Kuwaiti property. In addition, as a result of Iraq's unprecedented taking of hostages and its open threats to use terrorism in the recent conflict, the resolution required a commitment from Iraq that it would not in the future commit or support acts of terrorism or terrorist organizations. The speaker concluded by underlining the unprecedented nature of the resolution just adopted: troops had gone into battle before under the Charter of the United Nations, but the United Nations had never before taken measures to rebuild the peace such as those contained in this historic resolution. Iraq's active participation was essential for this approach to work. If stability were restored to the Gulf region and military tensions receded, the international community could turn to assisting with the reconstruction of Iraq as well as Kuwait. The United States, for its part, would exploit whatever opportunities there might be for unlocking progress on the resolution of other problems in the region, including Arab-Israeli issues.²⁸⁸

The representative of France remarked that the purpose of the resolution just adopted was to establish a proper ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait as well as the Member States cooperating with Kuwait under resolution 678 (1990), noting that it also set forth conditions for the withdrawal from Iraqi territory of the forces of the States cooperating with Kuwait. Beyond that, however, it provided important elements that should contribute in the longer term to re-establishing regional security. A number of provisions were fundamental in that regard: the guarantee of the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait; the deployment there of a United Nations observer unit; and the disarmament measures with regard to Iraq. The speaker noted that his country had been very insistent that the prohibition on Iraq's possessing biological or chemical weapons and all the arms restriction measures concerning Iraq should be seen in the context of regional measures approved by the international community. Nevertheless, France agreed that under the present circumstances their application should be confined in the immediate future to the case of Iraq. Their global and regional scope was, however, clearly brought out by the resolution, which reflected France's position on this essential point. The resolution also reaffirmed Iraq's responsibility under international law for the losses and damages of all kinds resulting from its aggression against Kuwait, and provided a mechanism for the payment of claims. The speaker pointed out that the Secretary-General and the United Nations bore heavy responsibility in each of these three areas — the border, disarmament and reparations — responding to his country's desire to see the Organization play an important role in re-establishing peace in the region. He added that France was gravely concerned about the plight of the civilian population in Iraq, which was not only suffering from serious material difficulties, but was the victim of unjustifiable violence in both the south and the north, where the inhabitants of Kurdish origin had once again, tragically, been attacked. France believed that the Security Council had a duty to say something about this situation. It recognized that the return to normal living conditions in Iraq was not dependent solely on the easing and lifting of sanctions, as had been provided for in the resolution just adopted. France appealed, therefore, to the Iraqi authorities to put an immediate end to repression in all its forms and to enter into dialogue about respect for rights, democratization of public life and the realization of the legitimate aspirations of all sections of the Iraqi people. It was essential, inter alia, that the just claim of the Kurdish community for respect for its identity within the Iraqi State be fully recognized. In conclusion, the speaker urged that the Council's momentum of the past eight months in response to the Gulf crisis should be maintained, as should its determination to defend the law, a determination that should be applied to settling other conflicts in the Near and Middle East.²⁸⁹

The representative of China said his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution just adopted since it would establish a formal ceasefire in the region. However, he pointed out that, although the resolution made it clear that the deployment of a United Nations observer unit would "establish conditions" for the withdrawal of foreign military forces, it failed to provide an explicit time frame for that withdrawal. Furthermore, the resolution included some unnecessary restrictions on the lifting of economic sanctions against Iraq. Stressing that the Iraqi people were innocent, the speaker stated that, in the light of the development of the situation, the Security Council should ease and lift economic sanctions as soon as possible, so as to bring the economy of all the countries in the region back to normalcy at an early date. China also believed that the Security Council should be responsible for handling questions concerning the implementation of the resolution; there should be no other interpretation. It was of the view, moreover, that the general goal of the post-war arrangements in the Gulf region should be to ensure a lasting peace in the region and peaceful coexistence of peoples of all countries there. The relevant arrangements should be made mainly by the countries in the Gulf region, in conformity with the interests of their peoples, and with respect for the principles of State sovereignty, territorial integrity, and non-interference in internal affairs.²⁹⁰

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics remarked on the successful interaction between the permanent members and the members of the Security Council as a whole, which had enabled the Council to elaborate a sound international legal document in a relatively short time — in the form of the resolution just adopted —, thereby drawing a line under one of the most serious regional conflicts of recent times and promoting the establishment of lasting peace and stability in the Gulf region, and in the long run in the Middle East as a whole. The Kuwait crisis and the process of addressing it had been a serious test of the new system of international relations following the end of the cold war, which the international community, in the form of the United Nations and its Security Council, had passed. The Security Council had proved its ability to implement its obligation under the Charter of the United Nations to maintain and restore international peace and security. He stressed that resolution 687 (1991) aimed not only at restoring justice but at issuing a serious warning to all those who might be inclined to embark on the path of aggression, occupation and annexation. The crux of the resolution, as other speakers had observed, was the establishment of a permanent ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and those States cooperating with Kuwait, after official notification by Iraq of its acceptance of the resolution. He emphasized, in that regard, that the deployment on the boundary between Kuwait and Iraq of United Nations observers would create conditions for the withdrawal of the multinational forces from the region. An important element in the process was the demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait in accordance with the agreement to that effect deposited with the United Nations. It was of prime importance, in his view, to observe the provision that the task of ensuring the inviolability of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait lay with the Security Council, which, to that end, could take all necessary steps in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The speaker further observed that the resolution paved the way for a post-crisis settlement. The most acute issue in that regard was that of creating an effective barrier against the use of weapons of mass destruction in the region. Of great importance from that viewpoint were the provisions in the resolution regarding Iraq's destruction of chemical and biological weapons and longer-range missiles, which represented a direct threat to countries in the region, and the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency in supervising nuclear sites in Iraq. It was also important that all Middle Eastern countries accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and to international agreements prohibiting chemical and biological weapons. He noted that an important function in ensuring the post-crisis settlement in the region belonged to the United Nations, which should play the role of a reliable guarantor of security. That derived logically from the role of the Security Council in organizing the collective efforts to repel the Iraqi aggression, and from Security Council resolution 598 (1987) on the situation between Iran and Iraq. Although the speaker considered that a key role in determining the parameters of such a settlement must belong to the States of the region, he cautioned that the creation of bloc groupings should not be allowed, as they would lead to perpetuating old and promoting new problems and disagreements. The post-crisis settlement should not be aimed against anyone, but should rather be intended to promote cooperation among all the States of the region concerned, as well as those States that were not directly involved but made an important contribution to the maintenance of peace and stability there. In that context, he emphasized that Iraq, as a sovereign State, must take its rightful place in the political and economic infrastructure of the region. He concluded by observing that, with the adoption of resolution 687 (1991), detailed work should begin on its technical aspects and the financial implications of its implementation. Considerable work in preparing the necessary plans and recommendations would have to be done by the Secretary-General. The Council, for its part, should play a key role in keeping under constant supervision the entire process of implementing the resolution and take such additional steps as might be required as its provisions were implemented.²⁹¹

The representative of Ecuador considered the resolution just adopted to be of vital importance for two reasons: it formally marked the end of hostilities in the Gulf conflict and sought to establish the foundations for a stable, permanent peace in the region; and its provisions reflected a genuine advance towards consolidating the rule of law in international relations. Many of its measures constituted a suitable response by the international community, and the Security Council in particular, to the crisis, which his country supported. Ecuador had misgivings, however, in respect of section A of the resolution, concerning the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, impelling it to abstain in the vote. In taking a position on the boundary between the two countries and in requesting the Secretary-General to make arrangements with them to demarcate the boundary, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council had apparently decided that this was an exceptional case, falling outside Article 36, under which the Security Council "... should also take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court". Ecuador did not share that view. While Chapter VII of the Charter authorized the use of all necessary means to implement the resolutions of the Council, it could not confer on the Council more powers than those set forth in the Charter itself. A position of the Council in this matter, an extremely sensitive one, had to fall unequivocally within the bounds of international law and the Charter if it were not to become a fresh source of conflict. If it had been possible, therefore, to vote separately on the individual paragraphs of the draft resolution, Ecuador would have indicated its disagreement with those points dealing with the boundary. In the meantime, it had taken note with satisfaction of the statement by the representative of the United States to the effect that the present case of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait could not be considered as a precedent; its distinguishing feature was its uniqueness. The speaker added that his country also considered that the Council should approve the lifting of the sanctions, which were affecting the civilian population of Iraq. Further, it must move towards taking the necessary action, provided for by the resolution, so that the definitive withdrawal of the coalition forces could take place.²⁹²

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that resolution 687 (1991) marked an important milestone both in the Gulf crisis and in the overall development of the United Nations. The expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait and the latter's liberation marked a firm and effective determination of the world community not to allow the law of the jungle to prevail over the rule of law. They had shown that the Security Council — with not only the solidarity of its permanent members but with supporting votes from countries representing every region of the world — had been able to act to repel aggression in the way its founding fathers had intended it to do. Now the Council faced the far more difficult task of securing the peace. Just as the Security Council had the primary responsibility to reverse the aggression, so it also had the responsibility to lay sound foundations for the future and to ensure that the international community was not again confronted with such a ruthless and comprehensive challenge to international law. That was the object of resolution 687 (1991), and the yardstick by which it would be measured.

Noting that the resolution was a complex and detailed one, the speaker stressed that only such a comprehensive approach could achieve the balance between firmness and fairness which was essential if lasting peace and stability were to be achieved. He commented on three central issues. First was the question of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. He stressed that the resolution was not attempting to settle the boundary between the two countries; that had been done by the 1963 Agreement between them, which had been registered with the United Nations. Rapid demarcation of the boundary, the setting up of a United Nations unit to monitor a demilitarized zone along the frontier, and a guarantee by the Security Council to step in if it were ever violated, constituted a carefully integrated package designed to ensure that there was no repetition of the events of August 1990. A second important issue was that of arms control and, in particular, the elimination of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction and of the missiles that could be used for their delivery. The tough provisions in that area were fully warranted, in his view, for Iraq alone in the region had not only developed many such weapons but actually used them, both against a neighbouring State and against its own population, and it had threatened their use as part of its diplomacy. He noted, however, that the resolution clearly situated the action against Iraq's weapons of mass destruction within the wider framework of work towards a region free of weapons of mass destruction. Thirdly, there was the question of compensation for the damage inflicted on Kuwait and many others by the Iraqi armed forces and their leadership. In this sphere, the speaker stated, the resolution sought to tread a path between the two extremes of either overlooking the need for compensation or imposing a crippling economic burden. It accordingly made financial provision for meeting claims out of a limited proportion of Iraq's future oil revenues.²⁹³

The representative of Austria observed that, by adopting such a comprehensive resolution, the Council had assumed grave and unprecedented responsibilities. His delegation was satisfied to see some of its ideas reflected in the text, particularly with regard to humanitarian aspects. The resolution contained important provisions that should help to alleviate the grave situation faced by the Iraqi civilian population. However, they could only form the beginning of a larger process: a comprehensive, internationally concerted system of relief operations would be necessary to bring the fundamental basics of civilian life back to normal. Austria was also gravely concerned about reports of heavy fighting and bloodshed in Iraq with disastrous consequences for the civilian population, in particular in the area inhabited by Kurds and others. With a view to safeguarding the human rights of the Kurds and other persons threatened by the armed repression of the Iraqi Government forces, the Government of Austria had endorsed both the request of Turkey that the Security Council should deal with that alarming situation and take effective measures, and the position of France that the Security Council should pronounce itself on these pressing issues. The speaker added that some elements of the Council's new resolution were particularly relevant to the task faced now of maintaining the peace. One was the deployment of observers. Austria had already declared its readiness to participate in such an operation. It looked forward to the Secretary-General's plan, in particular to the proposed duration of the operation. Austria saw it as a provisional measure that should contribute to creating conditions conducive to negotiations. On the financing of the operation, the speaker wondered whether consideration might be given to an idea put forward previously by other members of the Council, namely, the provision of special contributions by those who benefited most by such an operation and were financially in a position to make them, be they States or private entities. In conclusion, he suggested that the Council should discuss possible lessons from the Gulf crisis — such as the need to strengthen the preventive capacity of the United Nations and to look more closely at the arrangements for United Nations enforcement action.²⁹⁴

The representative of Romania underlined the importance of paragraph 33 of the resolution just adopted, by which the Security Council declared that, upon official notification by Iraq to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions of the resolution, a formal ceasefire would be effective between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990). Romania expected that Iraq would soon make the required notification concerning its acceptance of the resolution. The speaker also noted with interest the provisions of the resolution concerning the creation of a fund to pay compensation for claims addressed to Iraq by foreign Governments, nationals and corporations. His delegation understood that the implementation of those provisions would not affect the implementation of recommendations of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990). Requests for assistance by Member States under Article 50 of the Charter should be given the most serious attention by the Council. Romania also emphasized the practical importance of paragraph 17 of resolution 687 (1991), by which the Council decided that all Iraqi statements made since 2 August 1990 repudiating its foreign debt were null and void, and demanded that Iraq adhere scrupulously to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt.²⁹⁵

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Belgium, welcomed the fact that the official cessation of hostilities, as embodied in the resolution just adopted, was the culmination of a long process designed to restore the rule of law, in accordance with the means laid down in the Charter. While the resolution brought down the curtain on a painful episode, it opened a new chapter by defining for the Gulf region some of the principles that should henceforth govern relations between States. The Belgian delegation was pleased to note that a number of matters to which it attached great importance figured prominently in the resolution. Thus, for instance, it was important to make the United Nations responsible for implementing the resolution. The Organization had authorized the re-establishment of the rule of law by the legitimate use of force, and it should maintain the rule of law in peacetime. The resolution was also seriously concerned with mitigating the impact of the war on the Iraqi population: it had eased and foresaw the lifting of the food embargo; and, while insisting that Iraq pay fair compensation, the resolution in paragraph 19 made it clear that nothing was to prevent the creation of conditions for the reconstruction of the Iraqi economy. Finally, the text set out the essential measures that would allow Iraq to resume its place in the international community, including repudiating resort to and encouragement of terrorism and eliminating weapons of mass destruction, in the context of regional arms control. Turning to the human dimension, the speaker stressed the importance of respect for human rights, particularly those of ethnic and religious minorities. His delegation fully associated itself with the Secretary-General's appeal on 2 April on behalf of Kurdish and Shiite refugees. Belgium considered it essential that the Government of Iraq respect its commitment to ensure the equitable distribution of food and humanitarian aid to the Iraqi population as a whole; and that the Iraqi authorities grant humanitarian organizations unrestricted access to populations in distress.²⁹⁶

The representative of Kuwait, in a further statement, commented on some of the points raised by the representative of Iraq. He noted, inter alia, that the representative of Iraq had said that Iraq would "reserve its legitimate rights" regarding the boundary between the two countries. That put in question whether Iraq unconditionally accepted resolution 687 (1991). The speaker disputed, moreover, that there was any contradiction between the Security Council's request to demarcate the boundary, and paragraph 3 of resolution 660 (1990). The thrust of resolution 687 (1991) was demarcation of a previously agreed-upon boundary, which was not the subject of any controversy or quarrel.²⁹⁷

²⁹⁶ Ibid., pp. 127-131.

Decision of 9 April 1991 (2983rd meeting):

On 5 April 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of paragraph 5 of resolution 687 (1991).²⁹⁸ The report contained a plan for the creation and deployment of a United Nations observer unit, to be called the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM). The Secretary-General proposed a threefold mandate for UNIKOM: (a) to monitor the Khor Abdullah and a demilitarized zone extending 10 kilometres into Iraq and 5 kilometres into Kuwait from the boundary referred to in the Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters of 4 October 1963;²⁹⁹ (b) to deter violations of the boundary through its presence in and surveillance of the demilitarized zone; and (c) to observe any hostile or potentially hostile action mounted from the territory of one State to the other. He indicated that, in accordance with the established principles, UNIKOM would be under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary-General, under the authority of the Security Council. Stressing that UNIKOM would be able to function effectively only with the full cooperation of the parties, the Secretary-General stated that he had informed the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait of the proposed plan and requested confirmation that their respective Governments would cooperate with the United Nations on that basis.³⁰⁰

³⁰⁰ In an addendum to his report (S/22454/Add.3), the Secretary-General reported that the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait had confirmed that their respective Governments accepted the plan contained in his report

At its 2983rd meeting, held on 9 April 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda, and invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations,³⁰¹ and to the addition of a second preambular paragraph to the text, reading: "Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter". He also drew their attention to the following documents: letters dated 5 and 4 April 1991 from the representative of Kuwait addressed to the Secretary-General;³⁰² and a letter dated 6 April 1991 from the representative of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council.³⁰³ The latter communication enclosed a letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, the penultimate paragraph of which contained official notification of the acceptance by Iraq of resolution 687 (1991).

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 689 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the report of the Secretary-General of 5 and 9 April 1991 on the implementation of paragraph 5 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991);

2. Notes that the decision to set up an observer unit was taken in paragraph 5 of resolution 687 (1991) and that the unit can be terminated only by a further decision of the Council; the Council shall therefore review the question of its termination or continuation every six months;

3. Decides that the modalities for the initial six-month period of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission shall be in accordance with the above-mentioned report and shall also be reviewed every six months.

and would cooperate with the United Nations in its implementation.

Decision of 19 April 1991: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

On 18 April 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation of paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991).³⁰⁴ By that resolution, the Council had, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General to submit to it, for approval, a plan calling for the formation of a special commission to carry out the tasks enumerated in paragraphs 9 (b) (i-iii), 10 and 13, which concerned supervising the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and the missiles with which to deliver them. The Secretary-General's report contained his proposal for setting up the United Nations Special Commission³⁰⁵ and for making the necessary arrangements for it to begin implementing its tasks.

By a letter dated 19 April 1991,³⁰⁶ the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General as follows:

I have the honour to inform you that your report of 18 April 1991 on the implementation of paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) has been brought to the attention of the members of the Council. They agree to the proposals contained in the report.

Decision of 29 April 1991 (2985th meeting): statement by the President

At its 2985th meeting, held on 29 April 1991 in accordance with the agreement reached in the course of its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the item entitled: "The situation between Iraq and Kuwait: statement by the President of the Security Council concerning the States which have invoked Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations".

The President (Belgium) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁰⁷

The members of the Security Council have considered the memorandum dated 22 March 1991 which was addressed to the President of the Security Council by the representatives of twenty-one States which have invoked Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations owing to the special economic problems arising from the implementation of the sanctions imposed against Iraq and Kuwait under Council resolution 661 (1990).

The members of the Council have taken note of the Secretary-General's oral report to them on 11 April 1991, in which he supported the appeal launched by the twenty-one States that have invoked Article 50. The Secretary-General further informed the Council on 26 April 1991 of the conclusions reached by the Administrative Committee on Coordination at the session it has just held in Paris, where its members agreed to pursue vigorously their efforts to respond effectively to the needs of countries most affected by the implementation of resolution 661 (1990). The Secretary-General will coordinate through the Committee, within the framework of this assistance, the activities of organizations of the United Nations system.

The members of the Council have taken note of the replies from a number of States (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Luxembourg on behalf of the European Community and its twelve member States, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) which have furnished specific information on the assistance they have provided to various affected countries; they have also taken note of the replies from officials of international financial institutions, such as those received from the President of the World Bank and the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund. They invite other Member States and international financial institutions and organizations to inform the Secretary-General as soon as possible of the measures that they have taken on behalf of the States which have invoked Article 50.

The members of the Council make a solemn appeal to States, international financial institutions and United Nations bodies to respond positively and speedily to the recommendations of the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait for assistance to countries which find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990) and which have invoked Article 50.

The members of the Council note that the procedure established under Article 50 of the Charter of the United Nations remains in effect.

Decision of 20 May 1991 (2987th meeting):
resolution 692 (1991)

On 2 May 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report pursuant to paragraph 19 of resolution 687 (1991),³⁰⁸ setting out his recommendations for establishing a United Nations Compensation Fund to pay compensation for claims against Iraq and a United Nations Compensation Commission to administer the Fund. As he conceived it, the Commission would function under the authority of the Security Council and be a subsidiary organ thereof. Its principal organ would be a 15-member Governing Council composed of the representatives of the members of the Security Council at any given time. The commissioners would be experts in fields such as finance, law, accountancy, insurance and environmental assessment, who would act in their personal capacity.³⁰⁹ The Secretary-General said he would undertake the appropriate consultations, as required by paragraph 19 of resolution 687 (1991), so as to be in a position to suggest the figure which Iraq's contribution to the Fund would not exceed.³¹⁰ He also made recommendations regarding the claims procedure.³¹¹

At its 2987th meeting, held on 20 May 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda, and invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (China) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom and the United States,³¹² and informed them that Belgium, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Zaire had joined in sponsoring it.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted by 14 votes in favour to none against, with 1 abstention (Cuba), as resolution 692 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991 and 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 concerning the liability of Iraq, without prejudice to its debts and obligations arising prior to 2 August 1990, for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait,

Taking note of the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 2 May 1991 pursuant to paragraph 19 of resolution 687 (1991),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report of 2 May 1991;

2. Welcomes the fact that the Secretary-General will now undertake the appropriate consultations requested by paragraph 19 of resolution 687 (1991) so that he will be in a position to recommend to the Council for decision as soon as possible the figure which the level of Iraq's contribution to the United Nations Compensation Fund will not exceed;

3. Decides to establish the Fund and the United Nations Compensation Commission referred to in paragraph 18 of resolution 687 (1991) in accordance with section I of the Secretary-General's report, and decides also that the Governing Council of the Commission will be located at the United Nations Office at Geneva and that the Governing Council may decide whether some of the activities of the Commission should be carried out elsewhere;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the actions necessary to implement paragraphs 2 and 3 in consultation with the members of the Governing Council;

5. Directs the Governing Council to proceed in an expeditious manner to implement the provisions of section E of resolution 687 (1991), taking into account the recommendations in section II of the Secretary-General's report;

6. Decides that the requirement for Iraqi contributions will apply in the manner to be prescribed by the Governing Council with respect to all Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products exported from Iraq after 3 April 1991 as well as such petroleum and petroleum products exported earlier but not delivered or not paid for as a specific result of the prohibitions contained in resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990;

7. Requests the Governing Council to report as soon as possible on the actions it has taken with regard to the mechanisms for determining the appropriate level of Iraq's contribution to the Fund and the arrangements for ensuring that payments are made to the Fund, so that the Security Council can give its approval in accordance with paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991);

8. Requests also that all States and international organizations cooperate with the decisions of the Governing Council taken pursuant to paragraph 5, and further requests that the Governing Council keep the Security Council informed on this matter;

9. Decides that, if the Governing Council notifies the Security Council that Iraq has failed to carry out decisions of the Governing Council taken pursuant to paragraph 5, the Security Council intends to retain or to take action to reimpose the prohibition against the import of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq and financial transactions related thereto;

10. Decides also to remain seized of this matter, and requests the Governing Council to submit periodic reports to the Secretary-General and the Security Council.

Decisions of 17 June 1991 (2994th meeting):
resolutions 699 (1991) and 700 (1991)

On 17 May 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report entitled "Plan for the implementation of relevant parts of section C of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)",³¹³ concerning Iraq's demilitarization. In paragraph 9 (b) of that resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to develop and submit for approval a plan calling for the completion of the tasks enumerated in paragraphs 9 (b) (i to iii) and 10. The tasks concerned the immediate on-site inspection of Iraq's biological, chemical and missile capabilities, and its nuclear capabilities; the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of all items specified under paragraph 8 of the resolution; and the monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance in the future. The Secretary-General reported that the plan had been developed in consultation with appropriate Governments, with the Directors General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the World Health Organization, and with the newly established Special Commission. It envisaged a three-stage implementation procedure: (1) the gathering and assessment of information on the locations, amounts and types of all items specified in paragraphs 8 and 12 of resolution 687 (1991), which were to be destroyed, removed or rendered harmless; (2) the actual disposal of weapons, facilities and all other items specified in paragraphs 8 and 12; and (3) the monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance in the future. The Secretary-General observed that the third stage of the plan represented a long-term operation. A detailed plan, as called for in paragraph 10 of resolution 687 (1991), would be submitted to the Security Council for its approval, subsequent to the establishment of a complete database.

On the same day, the Secretary-General submitted to the members of the Security Council a note,³¹⁴ transmitting a letter addressed to him under paragraph 13 of resolution 687 (1991) by the Director General of IAEA, and its enclosure containing a plan for the destruction, removal and rendering harmless of items specified in paragraph 12 of that resolution, namely, “nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapon-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities” related thereto.

On 2 June 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report³¹⁵ pursuant to paragraph 26 of resolution 687 (1991), by which he was requested to develop guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq, and to establish a procedure for updating those guidelines periodically. In an annex to the report, he put forward draft guidelines that had been prepared, as requested, in consultation with appropriate Governments. The draft guidelines listed the categories of prohibited items and activities; defined the role of the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, as the organ of the Security Council responsible for monitoring the prohibitions against the sale or supply of arms to Iraq and related sanctions, as well as the Committee’s relationship with any new bodies responsible for the monitoring and verification of Iraq’s compliance with the obligations set out in paragraphs 10 and 12 of resolution 687 (1991); and set out the principles governing implementation of the arms and related sanctions against Iraq, which were to be effected at three levels: by all States, by international organizations and through intergovernmental cooperation. Those principles made it clear, inter alia, that States and international organizations were “called upon to act strictly in accordance with the arms and related sanctions, notwithstanding the existence of any contracts, agreements, licences or any other arrangements”. With regard to review of the guidelines, the Secretary-General suggested that the Council might wish to carry out such a review at the same time as its regular reviews of the economic, arms and related sanctions against Iraq, provided for in paragraph 28 of resolution 687 (1991).

At its 2994th meeting, held on 17 June 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included in its agenda the two reports of the Secretary-General and his note of 17 May. The Council invited the representative of Iraq, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Côte d’Ivoire) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States,³¹⁶ and to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States.³¹⁷ He also drew their attention to two letters from the representative of Iraq: a letter dated 9 June 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General,³¹⁸ affirming his Government’s readiness to cooperate with respect to the implementation of section C of resolution 687 (1991); and identical letters dated 11 June 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council,³¹⁹ asserting that the Government of Iraq had complied with resolution 687 (1991) and reviewing the measures taken by it in that connection.

At the same meeting, the representative of Iraq stated that his Government had both accepted resolution 687 (1991) and dealt with it positively. He reviewed in some detail the measures it had taken to implement its obligations thereunder. The speaker added that his Government wished to affirm its absolute readiness to cooperate with respect to the implementation of section C of resolution 687 (1991), and its desire not to raise any obstacle to implementation of the resolution. Unfortunately, however, his Government noted that paragraph 4 of the first draft resolution under consideration,³²⁰ concerning adoption of the Secretary-General’s plan for the implementation of section C, made the Government of Iraq liable for all the costs of carrying out the tasks entrusted to the Secretary-General. His Government rejected liability for the cost of destroying the chemical weapons. On the other hand, it affirmed its willingness to cooperate and by its own efforts voluntarily to destroy or render harmless such weapons, under the supervision and to the satisfaction of United Nations experts. The Government's participation in that way would reduce the cost of destruction and the time required for the implementation of the destruction plan, as well as the dangers arising from the destruction process.³²¹

The President then put the two draft resolutions to the vote, in the order of their submission. The first draft resolution was adopted unanimously as resolution 699 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991,

Taking note of the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 17 May 1991 pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) of resolution 687 (1991),

Also taking note of the Secretary-General's note of 17 May 1991 transmitting to the Council the text of the letter addressed to him by the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency under paragraph 13 of the above-mentioned resolution,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves the plan contained in the report of the Secretary-General of 17 May 1991;

2. Confirms that the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency have the authority to conduct activities under section C of resolution 687 (1991) for the purpose of the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of the items specified in paragraphs 8 and 12 of that resolution, after the forty-five-day period following the approval of this plan until such activities have been completed;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council progress reports on the implementation of the plan referred to in paragraph 1 every six months after the adoption of the present resolution;

4. Decides to encourage the maximum assistance, in cash and in kind, from all Member States to ensure that activities under section C of resolution 687 (1991) are undertaken effectively and expeditiously; decides also, however, that the Government of Iraq shall be liable for the full costs of carrying out the tasks authorized by section C; and requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council within thirty days for approval recommendations as to the most effective means by which Iraq's obligations in this respect may be fulfilled.

³²¹ S/PV.2994, pp. 3-12.

The second draft resolution was also adopted unanimously, as resolution 700 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990 and 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991,

Taking note of the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 2 June 1991 pursuant to paragraph 26 of resolution 687 (1991),

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report of 2 June 1991;

2. Approves the guidelines to facilitate full international implementation of paragraphs 24, 25 and 27 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991);

3. Reiterates its call upon all States and international organizations to act in a manner consistent with the guidelines;

4. Requests all States, in accordance with paragraph 8 of the guidelines, to report to the Secretary-General within forty-five days on the measures they have instituted for meeting the obligations set out in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991);

5. Entrusts the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait with the responsibility, under the guidelines, for monitoring the prohibitions against the sale or supply of arms to Iraq and related sanctions established in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991);

6. Decides to remain seized of the matter and to review the guidelines at the same time as it reviews paragraphs 22 to 25 of resolution 687 (1991) as set out in paragraph 28 thereof.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Yemen stated that, although his delegation had voted in favour of resolution 699 (1991), it wished to note two points. As Yemen had previously made clear, it had wanted the question of disarmament to be considered in a broader perspective. To deal with this problem by addressing one country exclusively would lead to a military imbalance in the region, thus jeopardizing peace and security there. It hoped, therefore, that the resolution was just the beginning and that similar measures would be taken regarding weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East. Secondly, with regard to paragraph 4 of the resolution, Yemen believed that it was unjust to call upon Iraq to defray the costs of destroying those weapons, because the process of destruction itself had been imposed on Iraq and that country was experiencing a critical economic situation as a result of the embargo and the sanctions imposed on it.³²²

The representative of Cuba also expressed concern with some elements of resolution 699 (1991). First, the Secretary-General's plan did not include a timetable for the destruction or removal of the weapons and materials in Iraq referred to in resolution 687 (1991). Moreover, while as a matter of general principle Cuba believed that each country should bear all the costs of destroying its own weapons, it urged that Iraq's capacity to pay be borne in mind, given the sanctions regime still in place and the fact that once it was lifted Iraq would have to contribute to the compensation fund. Commenting on resolution 700 (1991), the representative of Cuba said that the task of supervising compliance with the arms embargo against Iraq should have been entrusted to an organ set up for that purpose, not to the Committee established to supervise economic sanctions. His country was convinced that the economic sanctions should speedily be lifted whereas the military sanctions embodied in the arms embargo could last for quite a long time. It believed that during the period in which the two types of sanctions were dealt with by the same body, there would be various technical difficulties, which would bring excessive pressure to bear on the so-called Committee on sanctions.³²³

Decision of 26 June 1991 (2995th meeting):
adjournment of the meeting

By a letter dated 26 June 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³²⁴ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter of the same date from Mr. Rolf Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the United Nations Special Commission. The latter reported that, on 23 and 25 June 1991, Iraqi authorities had denied an IAEA/Special Commission nuclear inspection team access to facilities within the Abu Gharaib army barracks, designated for urgent inspection by the Special Commission. When finally allowed access on 26 June, the team had found no trace of either the activities involving cranes, forklifts and trucks, or the objects it had observed from a distance while awaiting entry.

At its 2995th meeting, held on 26 June 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the letter of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The representative of Iraq was invited, at his request, to participate in the discussion, without the right to vote.

The representative of the United States stated that the Government of Iraq had obstructed the work of the inspection team in carrying out the mandate to implement the destruction, removal or rendering useless of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. It was clear that Iraq was engaged in nuclear deception. The United States was deeply dismayed by Iraq's unmistakable flouting of its obligations under Security Council resolution 687 (1991). There was ample evidence from multiple sources that Iraq had been conducting a covert nuclear programme that had indicated activities related to the production of nuclear-weapon-usable material. The United States knew that Iraq had been carrying out its nuclear programme at a series of sites. Prior to the IAEA/Special Commission inspections, Iraq had begun to dismantle its nuclear infrastructure. Some of the equipment had been moved to the Abu Gharaib site. The Special Commission and IAEA had been fully briefed on that information and on the fact that the Abu Gharaib facility was being used as a temporary storage site for equipment from Iraq's undeclared uranium-enrichment programme. Iraq was required under resolution 687 (1991) to declare and make such equipment available for inspection. Instead, that equipment had been removed.

The speaker added that his country had indisputable evidence, drawn from many sources, that Iraq had been seeking to produce unsafeguarded nuclear material and to acquire nuclear weapons, contrary to its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty and its full-scope safeguards agreement with IAEA. If resolution 687 (1991) was to have any meaning, the Council had to ensure that Iraq granted the joint IAEA/Special Commission inspection team full and immediate access to designated sites. The Council had also to ensure that Iraq provided a complete declaration of all of its nuclear-weapon-related items. There was strong evidence that the Iraqis had attempted to hide substantial portions of their missile and chemical munition infrastructure from access by the Special Commission. He further noted that the Council had recently completed a review of Iraq's policies and practices and in particular its performance record regarding implementation of resolution 687 (1991). Wisely, the Security Council had made no decision to lift the economic sanctions that remained in place against Iraq. So long as Iraq failed to comply fully and unequivocally with the requirements of resolution 687 (1991), the Council should not consider altering those sanctions.³²⁵

Several other Council members expressed grave concern at Iraq's obstruction of the inspection team and its evident attempts to conceal equipment and other objects that it was required to open to inspection.³²⁶ They demanded Iraq's full compliance with the provisions of resolution 687 (1991).

The representative of Iraq maintained that his country had accepted resolution 687 (1991) and had done its best to implement all its requirements and obligations. Iraq had extended full cooperation to the IAEA mission. The mission had visited a number of sites and only the last one could not be made available for practical reasons — the inspection requested fell on an official holiday, and the team was asked to postpone its visit. It was a well-known practice of all countries that military sites could not be visited without approval through normal procedures. Obtaining the necessary permission was unavoidably delayed because of the destruction of Iraq's entire communications system.³²⁷

The meeting was then adjourned, with the President of the Council inviting the members of the Security Council to attend informal consultations immediately afterwards.

Decision of 28 June 1991 (2996th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 28 June 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³²⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted a letter of the same date from Mr. Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, who informed the Council that on 28 June 1991 the Iraqi military authorities had denied an IAEA/Special Commission team immediate access to a transportation facility east of Fallujah. While awaiting permission to enter, the team had observed vehicles within the compound, loaded with objects that it had specifically wanted to inspect, leaving through an exit to the south. When the team had attempted to photograph the vehicle movement, the Iraqi military had fired small arms into the air.

At its 2996th meeting, on 28 June 1991, the Security Council resumed its discussion of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, and included in its agenda the letters from the Secretary-General dated 26 and 28 June 1991.

The President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³²⁹

The members of the Security Council have learned with grave concern of an incident which occurred today when Iraqi military authorities denied a joint International Atomic Energy Agency/Special Commission nuclear inspection team immediate and unimpeded access to a site designated for inspection by the Special Commission under paragraphs 9 and 13 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991. In the course of this incident, the Iraqi military did not comply with a request by the Acting Chief Inspector that there should be no movement or transport of equipment pending inspection. The Iraqi military fired small arms into the air when members of the team were endeavouring to photograph loaded vehicles leaving the site. This incident followed earlier incidents on 23 and 25 June 1991 when the Iraqi military authorities denied the nuclear inspection team access to certain facilities at another designated site.

On 26 June 1991, the Council held a meeting to consider the incidents of 23 and 25 June, at which time the Permanent Representative of Iraq confirmed that Iraq had accepted resolution 687 (1991) and was doing its best to implement all the requirements and obligations imposed on it by the resolution. He further asserted that Iraq was cooperating with all United Nations missions, including the Special Commission. The President subsequently conveyed the Council's serious concern regarding the incidents to the Government of Iraq.

The members of the Council strongly deplore the incidents of 23, 25 and 28 June, and in this connection condemn the conduct of the Iraqi authorities. All these incidents constitute flagrant violations of resolution 687 (1991) and of the undertakings contained in the exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq governing the status, privileges and immunities of the Special Commission and of the inspection teams mandated under the Security Council resolution. Furthermore, these incidents demonstrate Iraq's failure to abide by its solemn undertakings to comply with all the provisions of resolution 678 (1991).

The members of the Council have decided to ask the Secretary-General to send a high-level mission to Baghdad immediately to meet with the highest levels of the Iraqi Government to convey the Council's urgent demand for unequivocal assurances that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure that no hindrances are placed in the way of the discharge of the Special Commission's mandate and that it will accord full cooperation, including immediate and unimpeded access, to the inspection teams in compliance with Iraq's obligations and commitments vis-à-vis the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency. The members of the Council have also stressed that the Government must furnish the high-level mission with unconditional guarantees for the safety and security of all personnel engaged in the performance of functions in connection with resolution 687 (1991). The mission, composed of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and the Under-Secretary-General for Disarmament Affairs, will depart New York this evening, 28 June 1991.

At this time, the members of the Council call upon Iraq to grant the International Atomic Energy Agency/Special Commission nuclear inspection team currently in Iraq immediate and unimpeded access to the objects which the team had endeavoured to inspect on 28 June 1991 and any other site deemed necessary.

The members of the Council request the high-level mission to report to it at the earliest opportunity, through the Secretary-General, on the results of its meetings with the highest levels of the Iraqi Government and, in particular, on such further undertakings by the Government to ensure compliance at all levels, including local military and civilian authorities, with Iraq's obligations under resolution 687 (1991).

The members of the Council wish to make it clear that the Security Council remains seized of this matter and that any recurrence of non-compliance would have serious consequences.

The members of the Council reiterate their views expressed in resolution 687 (1991) of the threat that all weapons of mass destruction pose to peace and security in the Middle East and of the need to work towards the establishment in the Middle East of a zone free of such weapons.

Decision of 5 August 1991: statement by the President

Following informal consultations held on 5 August 1991, the President of the Security Council made the following statement to the press, which was subsequently circulated in a letter dated 6 August 1991 from the President of the Council addressed to the Secretary-General:³³⁰

³³⁰ S/22904; recorded as a Security Council decision in Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1991, p. 20.

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 5 August pursuant to paragraph 28 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991 and paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraphs 22 to 25, as referred to in paragraph 28 of resolution 687 (1991); in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991); and in paragraph 20, as referred to in paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

Decisions of 15 August 1991 (3004th meeting):

At its 3004th meeting, held on 15 August 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. Following the adoption of the agenda, the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait were invited, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President of the Council (Ecuador) drew the attention of the Council members to three draft resolutions, the first prepared in the course of prior consultations;³³¹ the second submitted by Belgium, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States;³³² and the third submitted by France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States.³³³

The representative of Kuwait stated that Iraq's aggression against Kuwait had not been undertaken in order to settle any political, economic or border dispute, as Iraq had claimed at the beginning, but the aggression was an expansionist act. The Security Council had responded effectively to the crisis and fulfilled its responsibility, adopting resolutions to halt the aggression and mitigate the consequences of the crisis, to restore usurped rights and to ensure respect for existing conventions and boundaries. The international community had called upon Iraq to assume its responsibilities in order to put a complete and total end to its aggression and to safeguard the rights of the countries subjected to its aggression. The Council had called for a restoration of law based on justice and the tenets of the Charter. The claims of Kuwait, of the Security Council and of the international community were the basis for lifting the sanctions against Iraq. Those claims were: (1) the immediate and total return of all prisoners, Kuwaitis and Kuwait residents; (2) elimination of all weapons of mass destruction; (3) determination of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait in accordance with the 1932 Convention; (4) return of all assets stolen by Iraq from Kuwait; (5) compensation for damages incurred by Kuwait and its residents. He added that Iraq had agreed to those claims by accepting the relevant Security Council resolutions. However, Iraq seemed not to have learned from the lesson it had been given. It had refused to assume its obligations using unacceptable pretexts and illegal grounds for its actions. That might create a dangerous precedent in international relations by allowing an aggressor, after his defeat, to enjoy the fruits of his aggression, or allowing that aggressor to get away without assuming responsibility for the aggression. Iraq should be aware that there was a link between the fulfilment of its obligations and the lifting of sanctions. But despite the humanitarian and material disasters that had befallen Iraq, the policies of the Government of Iraq that had led to the crisis were continuing. They were still at the basis of the tragedy of the Iraqi people, which was now, as the speaker put it, the object of aggression “by the Iraqi regime, a regime that killed Iraqis both in the north and in the south”.

The speaker went on to say that Iraq’s crimes came within the terms of the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, adopted by the General Assembly on 26 November 1968. That Convention specifically stipulated that the effective punishment of such crimes was an important element in preventing their repetition, in the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the furtherance of cooperation among peoples and the promotion of international peace and security. He expressed the hope that the Security Council or an organ of its creation would undertake an inquiry regarding those crimes by Iraq during its occupation of Kuwait, when it oppressed the Kuwaiti people and wreaked destruction on the environment of the region. Those war crimes against mankind were detrimental to peace and were among the worst crimes in international law. The sanctions imposed by the Security Council under its resolutions did not constitute war against Iraq nor did they arise out of a vacuum. They represented a legitimate collective action in keeping with the Charter. It had been implemented against a member of the international community whose regime was violating Security Council resolutions. Iraq had exposed international peace and security in the Gulf and throughout the world to danger; that danger would continue, and the region would not recover its stability until the Iraqi regime was placed under effective international control. The sanctions did not have to be lifted until Iraq ceased to deceive the international community and violate its resolutions. He hoped that the resolutions to be adopted by the Security Council would lead to positive action by consolidating the activities of the Secretary-General and the International Committee of the Red Cross, especially since under modern standards the detention of innocent victims in unsafe conditions constituted a crime against humanity.³³⁴

The representative of Iraq presented the position of his Government on the three draft resolutions before the Council. Regarding draft resolution S/22940, he explained that Iraq’s foreign-currency revenue was almost totally dependent on its oil exports. On the basis of the production capacity of Iraqi oil fields, those exports over the next five years would not reach the level defined in July 1990 by the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, because of the destruction inflicted by aerial bombardment on Iraqi oil production and exporting facilities. With its current and expected financial resources during 1991 and thereafter, Iraq could not on its own restore the social and economic life that had prevailed before the events of January 1991. It would take intensive world efforts to compensate Iraq for the unjust damages inflicted by the aerial bombing of its civilian facilities and economic structure. Iraq therefore requested a grace period to face the major problems stifling its economy which were threatening to weaken the Iraqi people and its future generations. Iraq had also requested a decrease in the ceiling of the deduction so as not to exceed 10 per cent of its total oil revenues.

He added that the second draft resolution, contained in document S/22941, was supposed to meet the humanitarian requirements of the Iraqi people but actually aimed at exploiting them and imposing on ³³⁴ S/PV.3004, pp. 6-21.

Iraq's economy new financial sanctions and restrictions which had not been mentioned before. The provisions of the draft impinged on Iraqi national sovereignty and imposed a foreign guardianship on its people, thus depriving the legitimate Government of its powers and responsibilities with respect to its citizens. It gave foreign Powers the right to control Iraq's natural resources and subordinated the humanitarian objective of the inter-agency mission to suspect political motives. It undermined the provisions of resolution 687 (1991) and converted the partial lifting of the sanctions into colonialist restrictions that would rob Iraq of its rights to full sovereignty, interfere in its internal affairs, plunder its oil wealth and usurp its right to dispose of its own funds. He pointed out that the text should have sought to accommodate the proposal for the sale of oil to finance urgent humanitarian relief; instead, it allowed other States, through a slow and complicated mechanism, to purchase limited amounts of Iraqi oil. It laid stress not on humanitarian relief, but on the payment of sums for the expenses of the Special Commission dealing with the destruction of weapons, the Iraq-Kuwait Border Demarcation Commission and the United Nations Compensation Fund and for expenses incurred by the restitution of Kuwaiti property. The concept of the draft ran counter to the concept of sovereignty assigned by the Charter. Moreover, it constituted a grave precedent with regard to the humanitarian role of the United Nations.

Touching briefly on draft resolution S/22942, the speaker stated that he had expected the expression of satisfaction on the part of the Security Council for the cooperation enjoyed by the international teams in Iraq, but not a new resolution condemning Iraq for an isolated incident connected with the visit of the second inspection team.³³⁵

The President indicated that the Council was ready to proceed to vote on the draft resolutions before it, and said he would put them to the vote in the following order: S/22940, S/22941 and S/22942.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen commented on draft resolution S/22941. He emphasized that a full year after the imposition of comprehensive sanctions against Iraq, the Security Council was facing a humanitarian problem of tragic dimensions. On 15 July 1991, Prince Sadruddin Aga

Khan, who headed the inter-agency mission, submitted a comprehensive report on the sad human situation in Iraq. It was regrettable that the sanctions Committee, which had heard an oral report from Prince Sadruddin and other members of his mission, had been unable to take a decision on that matter. A full month after the submission of the report, the Council was seized of a draft resolution, which authorized the exemption of the sale of some Iraqi oil for a limited period of six months. Although the draft resolution would have ultimately allowed needed medicine and food to reach Iraq, it raised many questions of principle. First, there was no justification for submitting a special draft resolution on the humanitarian aspects of the situation in Iraq when the sanctions Committee possessed a mandate under paragraph 23 of resolution 687 (1991) to take decisions on that subject and to permit Iraq to export oil exclusively to meet humanitarian needs. Second, the complicated conditions in the draft resolution would lead to the creation of bureaucratic mechanisms which would delay the timely arrival of foodstuffs and medicines to Iraq. There was no reason why the Secretariat should be involved in technical and commercial operations adding to the burdens of the Organization. Third, there was no reason why that humanitarian draft resolution should be based on Chapter VII of the Charter. That question acquired a special significance in view of what might happen in the future and the position that the Council might take should Iraq reject the export of oil in accordance with the stipulated conditions. Fourth, there was no reason why the draft resolution should confuse the special humanitarian situation of millions of innocent Iraqis with financial matters related to the recovery of the cost of the Special Commission and IAEA and the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission. The Council should allow the sale of some shipments of Iraqi oil to meet the costs of international organizations. With its mandate to serve peace and security, the Council should not allow the spread of famine, which might lead to mass migrations across international borders, in addition to the possibility of instability in Iraq. That would ultimately result in jeopardizing peace and security in the area. The Council should not be used to achieve ends other than those based on, and conforming to, the Charter.³³⁶

The representative of Cuba noted that draft resolution S/22941, which claimed to be humanitarian

³³⁶ Ibid., pp. 51-60.

in connection with the economic sanctions regime, in fact consolidated the sanctions. The Council was invited to add medicine, medical supplies and foodstuffs to the sanctions regime, supposedly through an authorization subject to certain controls for the export of Iraqi oil and the acquisition of some of those supplies, but actually under what Cuba regarded as an unjustifiable and strict control system. The Council was faced with a situation which clearly suggested the need for the international community to show sensitivity with respect to the various and repeated reports emphasizing the gravity of the humanitarian situation in Iraq. It was quite unacceptable to try to use health-related supplies as instruments to attain certain political objectives. Cuba did not believe that Chapter VII of the Charter, or indeed any other Chapter of the Charter, authorized the Council to take upon itself, or to entrust to the Secretary-General, certain functions and responsibilities, which were clearly a breach of the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of States and the principle of the sovereign equality of States. The establishment of the proposed mechanism would really mean appropriating elements of Iraqi sovereignty and would seek to apply to Iraq a type of trusteeship system, which was entirely contrary to the letter and spirit of the Charter.³³⁷

At the same meeting the draft resolution contained in document S/22940 was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 705 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the note of 30 May 1991 which the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to paragraph 13 of his report of 2 May 1991 and which was also annexed to his letter of 30 May 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his note of 30 May 1991;

2. Decides that, in accordance with the suggestion made by the Secretary-General in paragraph 7 of his note, compensation to be paid by Iraq, as arising from section E of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, shall not exceed 30 per cent of the annual value of its exports of petroleum and petroleum products;

³³⁷ Ibid., pp. 63-71.

3. Decides also, in accordance with paragraph 8 of the Secretary-General's note, to review the figure established in paragraph 2 above from time to time in light of data and assumptions contained in the Secretary-General's letter of 30 May 1991 and other relevant developments.

The draft resolution contained in document S/22941 was then put to the vote. It received 13 votes in favour, 1 against (Cuba) and 1 abstention (Yemen) and was adopted as resolution 706 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions and in particular resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991, 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, 692 (1991) of 20 May 1991, 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991 and 705 (1991) of 15 August 1991,

Taking note of the report dated 15 July 1991 of the inter-agency mission headed by the Executive Delegate of the Secretary-General for the United Nations Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme for Iraq, Kuwait and the Iraq/Turkey and Iraq/Iran border areas,

Concerned by the serious nutritional and health situation of the Iraqi civilian population as described in the report and by the risk of a further deterioration of this situation,

Concerned also that the repatriation or return of all Kuwaitis and third-State nationals or their remains present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990, pursuant to paragraph 2 (c) of resolution 686 (1991) and paragraphs 30 and 31 of resolution 687 (1991), has not yet been fully carried out,

Taking note of the conclusions of the above-mentioned report, and in particular of the proposal for oil sales by Iraq to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs for the purpose of providing humanitarian relief,

Taking note also of the letters dated 14 April, 31 May, 6 June, 9 July and 22 July 1991 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq and the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations to the Chairman of the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, in regard to the export by Iraq of petroleum and petroleum products,

Convinced of the need to ensure equitable distribution of humanitarian relief assistance to all segments of the Iraqi civilian population through effective monitoring and transparency of the process,

Recalling and reaffirming in this regard its resolution 688 (1991), and in particular the importance which the Council attaches to Iraq's allowing unhindered access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq and making available all necessary facilities for their operation, and in this connection stressing the important and continuing importance of the Memorandum of Understanding between the United Nations and the Government of Iraq signed on 18 April 1991,

Recalling that, pursuant to resolutions 687 (1991), 692 (1991) and 699 (1991), Iraq is required to pay the full costs of the Special Commission and International Atomic Energy Agency in carrying out the tasks authorized by section C of resolution 687 (1991), and that the Secretary-General, in the report of 15 July 1991 that he submitted to the Council pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 699 (1991), expressed the view that the most obvious way of obtaining financial resources from Iraq to meet those costs would be to authorize the sale of some Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products; recalling also that Iraq is required to pay its contributions to the United Nations Compensation Fund and half the costs of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission; and recalling further that, in its resolution 686 (1991) and 687 (1991), the Council demanded that Iraq return in the shortest possible time all Kuwaiti property seized by it and requested the Secretary-General to take steps to facilitate this demand,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Authorizes all States, subject to the decision to be taken by the Security Council pursuant to paragraph 5 and notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs 3 (a), 3 (b) and 4 of resolution 661 (1990), to permit, for the purposes specified in the present resolution, the import, during a period of six months from the date of adoption of the resolution pursuant to paragraph 5, of a quantity of petroleum and petroleum products originating in Iraq sufficient to produce a sum to be determined by the Council following receipt of the report of the Secretary-General requested in paragraph 5, a sum, however, not to exceed 1.6 billion United States dollars, subject to the following conditions:

(a) Approval of each purchase of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products by the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, following notification to the Committee by the State concerned;

(b) Direct payment of the full amount of each purchase of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products by the purchaser in the State concerned into an escrow account to be established by the United Nations and administered by the Secretary-General exclusively to meet the purposes of this resolution;

(c) Approval by the Council, following the report of the Secretary-General requested in paragraph 5, of a scheme for the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs as referred to in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), in particular health-related materials, all of which to be labelled to the extent possible as being supplied under this scheme, and for all feasible and appropriate United Nations monitoring and supervision for the purpose of assuring their equitable distribution to meet humanitarian needs in all regions of Iraq and to all categories of the Iraqi civilian population, as well as all feasible and appropriate management relevant to this purpose, such a United Nations role to be available if desired for humanitarian assistance from other sources;

(d) The total sum of purchases authorized in the present paragraph is to be released by successive decisions of the Committee in three equal portions after the Council has taken the decision provided for in paragraph 5 on the implementation of the present resolution; notwithstanding any other provision of the present paragraph, the Council may review the maximum total sum of purchases on the basis of an ongoing assessment of the needs and requirements;

2. Decides that a part of the sum in the account administered by the Secretary-General shall be made available by him to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs, as referred to in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), and to cover the cost to the United Nations of its activities under the present resolution and of other necessary humanitarian activities in Iraq;

3. Decides also that a part of the sum deposited in the account administered by the Secretary-General shall be used by him for appropriate payments to the United Nations Compensation Fund and to cover the full costs of carrying out the tasks authorized by section C of resolution 687 (1991), the full costs incurred by the United Nations in facilitating the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, and half the costs of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission;

4. Decides further that the percentage of the value of exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq authorized under the present resolution to be paid to the Compensation Fund, as called for in paragraph 19 of resolution 687 (1991) and as defined in paragraph 6 of resolution 692 (1991), shall be the same as the percentage decided by the Council in paragraph 2 of resolution 705 (1991) for payments to the Fund, until such time as the Governing Council of the Fund decides otherwise;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, within twenty days of the date of adoption of the present resolution, a report suggesting decisions to be taken on measures to implement paragraphs 1 (a), (b) and (c), on estimates of the humanitarian requirements of Iraq set out in paragraph 2 and on the amount of Iraq's financial obligations set out in paragraph 3 up to the end of the period of the authorization in paragraph 1, as well as on the method for taking the necessary legal measures to ensure that the purposes of the present resolution are carried out and the method for taking account of the costs of transportation of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the International Committee of the Red Cross, to submit to the Council within twenty days of the date of adoption of the present resolution a report on activities undertaken in accordance with paragraph 31 of resolution 687 (1991) in connection with facilitating the repatriation or return of all

Kuwaiti and third-State nationals or their remains present in Iraq on or after 2 August 1990;

7. Calls upon the Government of Iraq to provide to the Secretary-General and appropriate international organizations on the first day of the month immediately following the adoption of the present resolution and the first day of each month thereafter until further notice, a detailed statement of the gold and foreign currency reserves it holds, whether in Iraq or elsewhere;

8. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully in the implementation of the present resolution;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

The draft resolution contained in document S/22942 was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 707 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and its other resolutions on the matter,

Recalling also the letter of 11 April 1991 from the President of the Security Council to the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations, in which he noted that on the basis of Iraq's written agreement to implement fully resolution 687 (1991), the preconditions for a ceasefire established in paragraph 33 of that resolution had been met,

Taking note with grave concern of the letters dated 26 and 28 June and 4 July 1991 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council, conveying information received from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission and from the high-level mission to Iraq which establishes Iraq's failure to comply with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991),

Recalling further the statement issued by the President of the Security Council on 28 June 1991 requesting that a high-level mission consisting of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Under-Secretary-General for Disarmament Affairs be dispatched to meet with officials at the highest levels of the Government of Iraq at the earliest opportunity to obtain written assurance that Iraq will fully and immediately cooperate in the inspection of the locations identified by the Special Commission and present for immediate inspection any of those items that may have been transported from those locations,

Having taken note with dismay of the report of the high-level mission to the Secretary-General on the results of its meetings with the highest levels of the Iraqi Government,

Gravely concerned by the information provided to the Council by the International Atomic Energy Agency on 15 and 25 July 1991 regarding the actions of the Government of Iraq in flagrant violation of resolution 687 (1991),

Gravely concerned also by the letter of 7 July 1991 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the Secretary-General and subsequent statements and findings that Iraq's notifications of 18 and 28 April were incomplete and that certain related activities had been concealed, facts both of which constitute material breaches of its obligations under resolution 687 (1991),

Noting, having been informed by the letters dated 26 and 28 June and 4 July 1991 from the Secretary-General, that Iraq has not fully complied with all of its undertakings relating to the privileges, immunities and facilities to be accorded to the Special Commission and the Agency inspection teams mandated under resolution 687 (1991),

Affirming that in order for the Special Commission to carry out its mandate under paragraph 9 (b) (i-iii) of resolution 687 (1991) to inspect Iraq's chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missile capabilities and to take possession of the elements referred to in that resolution for destruction, removal or rendering harmless, full disclosure on the part of Iraq as required in paragraph 9 (a) of resolution 687 (1991) is essential,

Affirming also that in order for the International Atomic Energy Agency, with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission, to determine what nuclear-weapon-usable material or any subsystems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to them need, in accordance with paragraph 13 of resolution 687 (1991), to be destroyed, removed or rendered harmless, Iraq is required to make a declaration of all its nuclear programmes, including any which it claims are for purposes not related to nuclear-weapon-usable material,

Affirming further that the aforementioned failures of Iraq to act in strict conformity with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) constitute a material breach of its acceptance of the relevant provisions of that resolution which established a ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region,

Affirming, moreover, that Iraq's failure to comply with the safeguards agreement it concluded with the International Atomic Energy Agency pursuant to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968, as established by the Board of Governors of the Agency in its resolution of 18 July 1991, constitutes a breach of its international obligations,

Determined to ensure full compliance with resolution 687 (1991), and in particular its section C,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Condemns Iraq's serious violation of a number of its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) and of its undertakings to cooperate with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which constitutes a material breach of the relevant provisions of that resolution which established a ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region;

2. Also condemns non-compliance by the Government of Iraq with its obligations under its safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency, as established by the Board of Governors of the Agency in its resolution of 18 July 1991, which constitutes a violation of its commitments as a party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968;

3. Demands that Iraq:

(a) Provide without further delay full, final and complete disclosure, as required by resolution 687 (1991), of all aspects of its programme to develop weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles with a range greater than one hundred and fifty kilometres and of all holdings of such weapons, their components and production facilities and locations, as well as all other nuclear programmes, including any which it claims are for purposes not related to nuclear-weapon-usable material;

(b) Allow the Special Commission, the International Atomic Energy Agency and their inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect;

(c) Cease immediately any attempt to conceal, move or destroy any material or equipment relating to its nuclear, chemical or biological weapons or ballistic missile programmes, or material or equipment relating to its other nuclear activities, without notification to and prior consent of the Special Commission;

(d) Make available immediately to the Special Commission, the Agency and their inspection teams any items to which they were previously denied access;

(e) Allow the Special Commission, the Agency and their inspection teams to conduct both fixed-wing and helicopter flights throughout Iraq for all relevant purposes, including inspection, surveillance, aerial surveys, transportation and logistics, without interference of any kind and upon such terms and conditions as may be determined by the Special Commission, and to make full use of their own aircraft and such airfields in Iraq as they may determine are most appropriate for the work of the Commission;

(f) Halt all nuclear activities of any kind, except for the use of isotopes for medical, agricultural or industrial purposes, until the Council determines that Iraq is in full compliance with the present resolution and with paragraphs 12 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991) and the Agency determines that Iraq is in full compliance with its safeguards agreement with the Agency;

(g) Ensure the complete enjoyment, in accordance with its previous undertakings, of the privileges, immunities and facilities accorded to the representatives of the Special Commission and the Agency and guarantee their complete safety and freedom of movement;

(h) Immediately provide or facilitate the provision of any transportation and medical or logistical support requested by the Special Commission, the Agency and their inspection teams;

(i) Respond fully, completely and promptly to any questions or requests from the Special Commission, the Agency and their inspection teams;

4. Determines that Iraq retains no ownership interest in items to be destroyed, removed or rendered harmless pursuant to paragraph 12 of resolution 687 (1991);

5. Requires that the Government of Iraq forthwith comply fully and without delay with all its international obligations, including those set out in the present resolution, in resolution 687 (1991), in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and in its safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency;

6. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stressed that the Government of Iraq could not be trusted because it attempted to get around Security Council resolutions, practised deception, prohibited access to certain parts of its territory to United Nations representatives, detained by force Kuwaiti nationals and nationals of other countries and persisted in refusing to allow Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to open humanitarian centres in those places where they were needed. On several occasions, the Council expressed its concern over Iraq's repeated violations of its obligations, either those imposed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) or those deriving from its commitments to IAEA. Non-compliance with those commitments had been established by the Board of Governors of that Agency. It had also indicated its deep concern over Iraq's attempts at deception. The information made available by the Chairman of the Special Commission for the elimination of weapons of mass destruction and by the Director General of IAEA following on-site inspections went overwhelmingly against the Government of Iraq. It appeared that Iraq had been involved in a clandestine research programme intended to get nuclear weapons for Iraq, in flagrant violation of its international obligations.³³⁸

The representative of the United States observed that the resolution which the Council had adopted on compliance with section C of resolution 687 (1991), on inspection and destruction of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, drew the attention of the world to

Iraq's failure to comply with resolution 687 (1991) and its repeated material breaches of its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. The primary purpose behind the resolution was to strengthen the role of IAEA and the Special Commission in performing their important task of eliminating Iraq's weapons of mass destruction capability and of ensuring that such weapons were not reacquired. The humanitarian resolution intended primarily to get humanitarian assistance to those in Iraq who needed it most. It was not a resolution lifting sanctions; in fact, it would strengthen the sanctions by preventing the Government of Iraq from seeking political and military gains through the misery of the Iraqi people, which it had itself caused. In adopting that resolution, the Council had put the Secretary-General and the Secretariat at the centre of the process of providing humanitarian assistance to Iraq.³³⁹

The representatives of Zimbabwe,³⁴⁰ China³⁴¹ and India³⁴² expressed concern over the humanitarian situation in Iraq, welcomed the steps taken by the Security Council to address the needs of the victims of the Gulf war and emphasized their views that the sovereignty of Iraq had to be respected in the implementation of the decisions of the Council. Concern was expressed by the representatives of the United Kingdom³⁴³ and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics³⁴⁴ about Iraq's persistent attempts to deceive the international community about its military programmes, in particular with regard to its activities in the nuclear sphere.

(3008th meeting): resolution 712 (1991)

On 4 September 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report pursuant to paragraph 5 of Council resolution 706 (1991).³⁴⁵ The report contained his recommendations for implementing that resolution, which provided for a mechanism whereby Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products could be sold over a six-month period, primarily to finance Iraqi imports of food, medical supplies and other essential needs.

He recommended, inter alia, the following specific measures:³⁴⁶ (a) Iraq would market and sell the petroleum through its oil authority, the State Organization for the Marketing of Oil; (b) contracts would enter into force only on approval by the Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) (sanctions Committee), and the proceeds from the sale of petroleum would be deposited by the purchaser into an escrow account established by the United Nations and administered by the Secretary-General; (c) the sanctions Committee would have ultimate responsibility for monitoring the sale of Iraqi oil, with the assistance of independent inspection agents appointed by the United Nations; and (d) purchases of the supplies to meet humanitarian needs in Iraq would be undertaken by Iraq. Monitoring of the purchases and deliveries would be undertaken by the United Nations with the assistance of inspection agents.

At its 3008th meeting, held on 19 September 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The representative of Iraq was invited, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (France) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States.³⁴⁷

The representative of Iraq observed that since the Council was considering a draft resolution calling for the implementation of resolution 706 (1991), the shortcomings and contradictions of that resolution automatically applied to the draft resolution. As he saw it, resolution 706 (1991) and the draft resolution under consideration effectively gave Iraq two choices. The first choice involved the maintenance of the state of siege with all the concomitant suffering and starvation of the Iraqi people; the second involved a limited exception to the siege, for which Iraq would in return concede its sovereignty over its oil resources, acceptance of the hegemony of some Security Council members, through United Nations bodies, over Iraq's oil reserves, and prevention of Iraq from developing and manufacturing those resources. The second choice, in practice, implied maintaining the economic boycott merely allowing the Iraqi people to obtain the minimum essential commodities necessary to avoid starvation. He believed that some members of the Council fully realized the difficulty of any practical implementation of the draft resolution. He went on to point out what he saw as technical problems in the draft resolution.³⁴⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen stated that, as the draft resolution was an extension of resolution 706 (1991), adopted the month before, the position of his country was similar to that put forward on that occasion. He stated that the draft resolution should not be politicized, as it related to humanitarian questions which transcended the differences that existed in the region. He would accordingly abstain in the vote.³⁴⁹

The representative of Cuba said that his delegation would not be able to vote in favour of the draft resolution for the same reasons as put forward at the time of the adoption of resolution 706 (1991). In his opinion, the Council's approach involved a manipulation of humanitarian issues. It would mean a prolongation and strengthening of the sanctions imposed on Iraq in circumstances which had long been unjustified. The Council was also, in his view, disregarding the principle of sovereign equality of States, and acting in a way that went beyond the attributes conferred upon it by the Charter.³⁵⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It was adopted by 13 votes in favour, 1 against (Cuba), with 1 abstention (Yemen), as resolution 712 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, and in particular resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991, 687 (1991) of 3 March 1991, 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, 692 (1991) of 20 May 1991, 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991, and 705 (1991) and 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991,

Expressing its appreciation for the report submitted by the Secretary-General on 4 September 1991 pursuant to paragraph 5 of resolution 706 (1991),

Reaffirming its concern about the nutritional and health situation of the Iraqi civilian population and the risk of a further deterioration of this situation, and underlining the need in this context for fully up-to-date assessments of the situation in all parts of Iraq as a basis for the equitable distribution of humanitarian relief to all segments of the Iraqi civilian population,

Recalling that the activities to be carried out by or on behalf of the Secretary-General to meet the purposes referred to in resolution 706 (1991) and the present resolution enjoy the privileges and immunities of the United Nations,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Confirms the figure mentioned in paragraph 1 of resolution 706 (1991) as the sum authorized for the purpose of that paragraph, and reaffirms its intention to review this sum on the basis of its ongoing assessment of the needs and requirements, in accordance with paragraph 1 (d) of that resolution;

2. Invites the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait to authorize immediately, pursuant to paragraph 1 (d) of resolution 706 (1991), the release by the Secretary-General from the escrow account of the first one-third portion of the sum referred to in paragraph 1 above, such release to take place as required subject to the availability of funds in the account and, in the case of payments to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs that have been notified or approved in accordance with existing procedures, subject to compliance with the procedures laid down in the report of the Secretary-General as approved in paragraph 3 below;

3. Approves the recommendations contained in paragraphs 57 (d) and 58 of the Secretary-General's report;

4. Encourages the Secretary-General and the Committee to cooperate, in close consultation with the Government of Iraq, on a continuing basis to ensure the most effective implementation of the scheme approved in the present resolution;

5. Decides that petroleum and petroleum products subject to resolution 706 (1991) shall, while under Iraqi title, be immune from legal proceedings and not be subject to any form of attachment, garnishment or execution, and that all States shall take any steps that may be necessary under their respective domestic legal systems to assure this protection and to ensure that the proceeds of sale are not diverted from the purposes laid down in resolution 706 (1991);

6. Reaffirms that the escrow account to be established by the United Nations and administered by the Secretary-General to meet the purposes of resolution 706 (1991) and the present resolution, like the United Nations Compensation Fund established by resolution 692 (1991), enjoys the privileges and immunities of the United Nations;

³⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 11-12.

³⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 12-13.

7. Reaffirms also that the inspectors and other experts on mission for the United Nations, appointed for the purpose of the present resolution, enjoy privileges and immunities in accordance with the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, and demands that Iraq allow them full freedom of movement and all necessary facilities;

8. Confirms that funds contributed from other sources may, if desired, in accordance with paragraph 1 (c) of resolution 706 (1991), be deposited into the escrow account as a sub-account and be immediately available to meet Iraq's humanitarian needs as referred to in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991) without any of the obligatory deductions and administrative costs specified in paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 706 (1991);

9. Urges that any provision to Iraq of foodstuffs, medicines or other items of a humanitarian character, in addition to those purchased with the funds referred to in paragraph 1 above, be undertaken through arrangements that assure their equitable distribution to meet humanitarian needs;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to take the actions necessary to implement the above decisions, and authorizes him to enter into any arrangements or agreements necessary to accomplish this;

11. Calls upon States to cooperate fully in the implementation of resolution 706 (1991) and the present resolution, in particular with respect to any measures regarding the import of petroleum and petroleum products and the export of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs as referred to in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), and also with respect to the privileges and immunities of the United Nations and its personnel implementing the present resolution, and to ensure that there are no diversions from the purposes laid down in these resolutions;

12. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representative of the United States emphasized that the limited authorization of the sale of Iraqi oil was being made within the existing sanctions regime, which remained firmly in place. The implementing resolution was a key step towards bringing the Gulf crisis to a close and towards having Iraq meet its responsibilities. He stated that it responded closely to the Secretary-General's report. It set up mechanisms to implement resolution 706 (1991), supported the Secretary-General in his implementation role, and provided for ongoing review and assessment of the needs and requirements in Iraq.³⁵¹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said he believed that the adoption of resolution 712 (1991) opened the way to the early implementation of the plan proposed by the Secretary-General for the implementation of resolution 701 (1991). He considered that, in the light of the existing humanitarian situation in Iraq, the resolution responded to the vital interests of the Iraqi people, and expected the Government of Iraq to comply with it scrupulously.³⁵²

The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the report of the Secretary-General, which formed the basis of the resolution just adopted, achieved the necessary balance between a rigorous scheme which would carry out the sense of the Council, as contained in resolution 706 (1991), to ensure that the oil exports went to finance humanitarian supplies and other objectives of the United Nations, and a scheme which would at the same time take account of a number of the concerns expressed by members of the Council and by the Government of Iraq. He was pleased to have been able to be a sponsor of the resolution, because he was convinced that it contained the potential to provide genuine relief to those in Iraq who needed it. Whether it did so or not lay as much in the hands of the Government of Iraq as in anyone else's.³⁵³

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, welcomed the adoption of resolution 712 (1991), which completed the establishment of the mechanisms that would make it possible to meet the essential needs of the Iraqi population. He hoped that those mechanisms would begin to operate as rapidly as possible in order to achieve the humanitarian objectives that his country had been pursuing.³⁵⁴

Decision of 2 October 1991: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 2 October 1991, the President of the Security Council made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:³⁵⁵

³⁵² Ibid., pp. 18-19.

³⁵³ Ibid., pp. 20-23.

³⁵⁴ Ibid., pp. 22-23.

³⁵⁵ S/23107; recorded as a Security Council decision in Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1991, p. 25.

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 2 October 1991 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regime established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 11 October 1991 (3012th meeting):

On 2 October 1991, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), entitled "Plan for future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with relevant parts of section C of Security Council resolution 687 (1991)".³⁵⁶ He recalled that, as outlined in his report of 17 May 1991, the provisions of section C of resolution 687 lent themselves to a three-stage implementation procedure: gathering and assessment of information; disposal of weapons and facilities and all other items specified in paragraphs 8 and 12 of the resolution; and ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance. He added that the first stages were being implemented and would continue until their objectives had been achieved.

The Secretary-General stated that the plan submitted in the current report addressed the third stage, ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its unconditional obligation not to use, retain, possess, develop, construct or otherwise acquire any weapons or related items prohibited under paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 687 (1991). Thus, monitoring and verification would need to cover not only military but also civilian sites, facilities, material and other items that could be used or activities that could be involved in contravention of Iraq's obligation under resolution 687 (1991). The plan also incorporated the additional obligations of Iraq under resolution 707 (1991) and the corresponding monitoring and verification activities. He recommended that the plan should enter into force directly upon its approval by the Security Council, which meant that the early stages of its implementation and the later stages of the disposal of existing prohibited weapons, facilities and related items would be conducted simultaneously. With regard to institutional arrangements, he assumed that, bearing in mind that resolutions 687 (1991) and 707 (1991) had been adopted by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the monitoring and verification tasks provided for under the plan should be entrusted to an executive body under the authority of the Security Council. That was particularly important, in his view, should any situation arise of non-compliance by Iraq with its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) or under resolution 707 (1991). He accordingly recommended that a compliance unit be organized under the Special Commission to carry out the monitoring and verification tasks provided for under the plan.

By a note dated 20 September 1991,³⁵⁷ the Secretary-General also transmitted to the Security Council a revised plan for future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with paragraph 12 of section C of resolution 687 (1991) and with the requirements of paragraphs 3 and 5 of resolution 707 (1991) submitted by the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

At its 3012th meeting, on 11 October 1991, the Council included in its agenda the report of the Secretary-General and his note. The representative of Iraq was invited, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (India) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States.³⁵⁸

The representative of Iraq stated that, although the draft resolution seemed at first sight to be a detailed procedural text regarding the implementation of paragraph 10 of resolution 687 (1991), that was not the case. The draft went far beyond the objectives of that resolution and, contrary to the provisions of the Charter, aimed to put Iraq under the permanent trusteeship of the Special Commission on armaments and to maintain the trade sanctions system indefinitely, contrary to the provisions of that resolution. He added that the draft resolution also sought to establish permanent international mechanisms to tighten control on Iraq's future and prevent it from carrying out

³⁵⁸ S/23134; subsequently adopted without change as resolution 715 (1991).

economic and scientific development. The greatest danger, however, was in the plan prepared by the Special Commission contained in the Secretary-General's report, which omitted no detail affecting civilian or military life. All those aspects, together with all Iraqi scientific and educational institutions, would be placed under tight control and severe restrictions. The speaker maintained that Iraq had accepted resolution 687 (1991) and previous resolutions and implemented their provisions in good faith. It had done so in the erroneous belief that the Council, in return, would look at the economic sanctions adopted against it. It was regrettable that, while Iraq had played its part, the Council had not only failed to fulfil its mandate but had tightened its sanctions against Iraq.³⁵⁹

The representative of the United States welcomed the excellent monitoring plans drawn up by the Special Commission and the Director General of IAEA for dealing with a very serious and difficult situation. He recalled that, over the past months, Iraq had continued to hide parts of its nuclear-weapons programme, its chemical-warfare programme, its biological programme and its missile programme. It had continued to block the cooperation that it was committed to give to the Special Commission and IAEA. There was evidence, moreover, that Iraq had been seeking to build nuclear weapons and that it had misused its peaceful nuclear facilities. Several times the Council had found Iraq in violation of its obligations under Council resolutions. He stated that that was why the monitoring and verification plan was required and why it had been so carefully prepared. He trusted that Iraq would abide by the resolution which he hoped would soon be adopted by the Council.³⁶⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that the object of the draft resolution was simply to prevent Iraq from breaking in the future the international obligations on weapons of mass destruction which it had so liberally broken in the past.³⁶¹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 715 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and its other resolutions on this matter,

Recalling in particular that under resolution 687 (1991) the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency were requested to develop plans for future ongoing monitoring and verification and to submit them to the Security Council for approval,

Taking note of the report and note of the Secretary-General, transmitting the plans submitted by the Secretary-General and the Director General of the Agency,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Approves, in accordance with the provisions of resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and the present resolution, the plans submitted by the Secretary-General and the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

2. Decides that the Special Commission shall carry out the plan submitted by the Secretary-General, as well as continuing to discharge its other responsibilities under resolutions 687 (1991), 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991 and 707 (1991) and performing such other functions as are conferred upon it under the present resolution;

3. Requests the Director General of the Agency to carry out, with the assistance and cooperation of the Special Commission, the plan submitted by him and to continue to discharge his other responsibilities under resolutions 687 (1991), 699 (1991) and 707 (1991);

4. Decides that the Special Commission, in the exercise of its responsibilities as a subsidiary organ of the Security Council, shall:

(a) Continue to have the responsibility for designating additional locations for inspections and overflights;

(b) Continue to render assistance and cooperation to the Director General of the Agency, by providing him, by mutual agreement, with the necessary special expertise and logistical, informational and other operational support for the carrying out of the plan submitted by him;

(c) Perform such other functions, in cooperation in the nuclear field with the Director General of the Agency, as may be necessary to coordinate activities under the plans approved by the present resolution, including making use of commonly available services and information to the fullest extent possible, in order to achieve maximum efficiency and optimum use of resources;

5. Demands that Iraq meet unconditionally all its obligations under the plans approved by the present resolution and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the Director General of the Agency in carrying out the plans;

³⁵⁹ S/PV.3012, pp. 2-13.

³⁶⁰ Ibid., pp. 13-14.

³⁶¹ Ibid., pp. 15-17.

6. Decides to encourage the maximum assistance, in cash and in kind, from all Member States to support the Special Commission and the Director General of the Agency in carrying out their activities under the plans approved by the present resolution, without prejudice to Iraq's liability for the full costs of such activities;

7. Requests the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Special Commission and the Director General of the Agency to develop in cooperation a mechanism for monitoring any future sales or supplies by other countries to Iraq of items relevant to the implementation of section C of resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions, including the present resolution and the plans approved hereunder;

8. Requests the Secretary-General and the Director General of the Agency to submit to the Security Council reports on the implementation of the plans approved by the present resolution, when requested by the Security Council and in any event at least every six months after the adoption of this resolution;

9. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of France stressed the importance of the resolution just adopted. The Council had thereby approved the plan for future ongoing monitoring and verification, which was the only way to ensure that Iraq would no longer be able to pursue its plans, especially those to acquire nuclear weapons. The missions of the Special Commission and IAEA had furnished ample proof of those plans and the international community was duty bound to put an end to them. He observed that the matter lay at the heart of the Security Council's responsibilities. He welcomed the unanimity that had prevailed among the Council members in that regard. He hoped, moreover, that, faced with that determination on the part of the international community, Iraq would understand that it was in its interests to comply without reservation with the obligations incumbent upon it under the plan and the resolution and cooperate with the Council and the various bodies under its authority and responsibility.³⁶²

Decision of 20 December 1991: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 20 December 1991, the President of the Security Council made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:³⁶³

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 6 December 1991 pursuant to paragraph 28 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991 and paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991). After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraphs 22 to 25, as referred to in paragraph 28 of resolution 687 (1991), in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991), and in paragraph 20, as referred to in paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

However, with a view to alleviating the humanitarian conditions for the civilian population in Iraq and in order to facilitate the utilization of paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), the Security Council Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait is requested to study immediately those materials and supplies for essential civilian and humanitarian needs as identified in the Ahtisaari report with the purpose of drawing up a list of items which may, with the Council's approval, be transferred from the "no objection" procedure to a simple notification procedure. Members of the Council may submit proposals of items for this purpose.

With regard to imports of items subject to prior approval under the "no objection" procedure by the Committee (i.e. items other than food and medicine), any member of the Committee putting forward an objection to such an import will offer a specific explanation at a meeting of the Committee.

The members of the Council are aware of reports received concerning the approximately 2,000 Kuwaitis believed to be still detained in Iraq, access by the International Committee of the Red Cross to all detainees and places of detention, the return of Kuwaiti property, and particularly the return of Kuwaiti military equipment and their bearing upon the present state of Iraqi compliance with resolution 687 (1991).

In light of the above, the Council will request the Secretary-General to prepare a factual report on Iraq's compliance with all the obligations placed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions. This report will be made available to the Council in good time before it undertakes its next review under paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991).

In the course of consultations it was noted that resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991 gave to Iraq the possibility for oil sales to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs for the purpose of providing ³⁶² Ibid., pp. 17-18.

³⁶³ S/23305; recorded as a Security Council decision in Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1991, p. 27.

humanitarian relief. However, this possibility has not yet been used.

Decision of 5 February 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 5 February 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement to the media on behalf of the Council:³⁶⁴

The members of the Council held informal consultations on 28 January and 5 February 1992 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991. The members of the Council express their thanks to the Secretary-General for his report of 25 January 1992 on Iraq's compliance with all the obligations placed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions.

After taking note of the Secretary-General's report and hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regime established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

In the context of compliance, the Council members note with concern the recent incident at Baghdad, which demonstrates a lack of Iraqi cooperation in complying with the resolutions of the Council.

In connection with the Secretary-General's report on Iraq's compliance with all the obligations placed upon it by resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the members of the Council note that while much progress has been made, much remains to be done. There is serious evidence of Iraqi non-compliance over its programmes for weapons of mass destruction and the repatriation of Kuwaitis and other third-State nationals detained in Iraq. There is still much Kuwaiti property to be returned. The members of the Council are disturbed by the lack of Iraqi cooperation. Iraq must implement fully resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions as was stated in the statement read out by the President on behalf of its members at the 3046th meeting, held on 31 January 1992, with the participation of the heads of State and Government.

The members of the Council note that with a view to alleviating the humanitarian conditions of the civilian population of Iraq and facilitating the utilization of paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991) the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait has been requested to prepare a study of those materials and supplies for essential civilian and humanitarian needs, other than medicines which have not been subject to sanctions and food shipments which have been permitted to move freely, that might be transferred from the "no objection" procedure to a simple notification procedure. The members of the Council also note the report of the Chairman of the Committee in this regard. They express their appreciation for the efforts the Chairman has made to reach a conclusion and encourage him to continue his consultations with the members of the Committee on the study and to report to the Council at an early date.

The members of the Council strongly deplore that the Iraqi authorities have decided and communicated that decision to the Secretariat to discontinue contacts with the Secretariat regarding implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991, in which the Council gives to Iraq the possibility of oil sales to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs for the purpose of providing humanitarian relief. They underscore that the Government of Iraq, by acting in this way, is forgoing the possibility of meeting the essential needs of its civilian population and therefore bears the full responsibility for their humanitarian problems. They hope that a resumption of these contacts may lead to the early implementation of the scheme set out in those resolutions to enable humanitarian supplies to reach the Iraqi people.

Decision of 19 February 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 19 February 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶⁵

The members of the Security Council express their gratitude to the Secretary-General for the special report of the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991), submitted to the Council on 18 February 1992.

The members of the Council note that while progress has been made, much still remains to be done to implement the relevant resolutions of the Council. The members of the Council are gravely concerned by Iraq's continued failure to acknowledge all its obligations under Council resolutions 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991, and its continued rejection of the plans of the Secretary-General and of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency as approved by the latter resolution for ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its obligations under paragraphs 10, 12 and 13 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

Ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's obligations is an integral part of resolution 687 (1991), which established a ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region. Such ongoing monitoring and verification is a step of the utmost importance towards the goal set out in paragraph 14 of that resolution.

Iraq's failure to acknowledge its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), its rejection up until now of the two plans for ongoing monitoring and verification and its failure to provide the full, final and complete disclosure of its weapons capabilities constitute a continuing material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991). Unconditional agreement by Iraq to implement these obligations is one of the essential preconditions to any reconsideration by the Council under paragraphs 21 and 22 of resolution 687 (1991) of the prohibitions referred to in those paragraphs.

The members of the Council support the decision of the Secretary-General to dispatch a special mission headed by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission to visit Iraq immediately to meet and discuss with the highest levels of the Iraqi Government for the purpose of securing the unconditional agreement by Iraq to implement all its relevant obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). The mission should stress the serious consequences if such agreement to implement is not forthcoming. The Secretary-General is requested to report on the results of the special mission to the Security Council upon its return.

Decision of 28 February 1992 (3058th meeting):
statement by the President

On 26 February 1992 the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a note,³⁶⁶ in which he referred to the statement made by the President of the Council on 19 February 1992, concerning the dispatch to Iraq of a special mission headed by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established under Security Council resolution 687 (1991), "to meet and discuss with the highest levels of the Iraqi Government for the purpose of securing the unconditional agreement by Iraq to implement all its relevant obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991)".³⁶⁷ By his note, the Secretary-General transmitted a letter dated 25 February 1992 addressed to him by Mr. Rolf Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, enclosing the report of the Executive Chairman on the proceedings and outcome of the special mission's visit to Baghdad.

The Executive Chairman reported, inter alia, that, at a meeting with the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq on 22 February 1992, it had been agreed that, in order to clarify their respective positions, both sides would prepare and exchange written statements. The texts of the two statements appeared in appendices I and II of the report. He reported in his conclusions that, after a careful review of the written statement by the Government of Iraq, and taking account of the discussions which had been held, the Executive Chairman had regretfully concluded that at that stage he was not able to report to the Council that he had secured from the highest levels of the Government of Iraq unconditional agreement by Iraq to implement all its relevant obligations under Council resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991).

At its 3058th meeting, held on 28 February 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the note by the Secretary-General in its agenda.

The President (United States) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁶⁸

The members of the Security Council express their gratitude to the Secretary-General for the report submitted pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of resolution 687 (1991) to the Council on 25 February 1992, transmitting the results of the special mission dispatched to Iraq by the Secretary-General pursuant to the statement of the President of the Council of 19 February 1992. The members of the Council approve in full the conclusions of the special mission as contained in the report and in particular its finding that Iraq is not prepared to give its unconditional agreement to implement all of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991.

The members of the Council deplore and condemn the failure of the Government of Iraq to provide the special mission with full, final and complete disclosure, as required by resolution 707 (1991), of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres, including launchers, and of all holdings of such weapons, their components and production facilities and locations, as well as all other nuclear programmes; and the failure of Iraq to comply with the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification presented by the Secretary-General and by the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency and approved by resolution 715 (1991). In the statement made by the President on 19 February 1992 prior to the dispatch of the special mission to Iraq, the Council noted that Iraq's behaviour constituted a material breach of resolution 687 (1991). Regrettably this continues to be the case.

Furthermore, the members of the Council equally deplore and condemn Iraq's failure, within the time prescribed by the

³⁶⁸ S/23663.

Special Commission at the request of Iraq, to commence destruction of ballistic missile-related equipment designated for destruction by the Special Commission. The members of the Council reaffirm that it is for the Special Commission alone to determine which items must be destroyed under paragraph 9 of resolution 687 (1991). Therefore, the Government of Iraq's letter of 28 February 1992 to the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission is unacceptable. Iraq's refusal to implement the determinations of the Special Commission constitutes a further material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991).

The members of the Council demand that Iraq immediately implement all its obligations under Council resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions on Iraq. The members of the Council require the Government of Iraq to communicate directly to the Council without further delay an authoritative and unconditional acknowledgement of its agreement to accept and implement the above-noted obligations, including specifically to comply with the determination of the Special Commission requiring the destruction of ballistic missile-related equipment. The members of the Council emphasize that Iraq must be aware of the serious consequences of continued material breaches of resolution 687 (1991).

The members of the Council note that an Iraqi delegation is prepared to come to New York as soon as it is invited to do so. The members of the Council have asked its President to extend such an invitation to the delegation to come to New York without further delay. The members of the Council intend in any event to continue their consideration of this question no later than the week beginning 9 March 1992.

Decision of 19 March 1992 (3061st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3061st meeting, held on 19 March 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

The President (Venezuela) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement of behalf of the Council:³⁶⁹

The Council welcomes the announcement of the Iraqi authorities that they will resume discussions with the Secretariat concerning implementation of the scheme of sales of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products, as provided for in resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991, and for the use of the proceeds of such sales in accordance with the Secretary-General's report of 4 September 1991 submitted pursuant to paragraph 5 of Security Council resolution 706 (1991) and the above-mentioned resolutions.

³⁶⁹ S/23732.

The Council also welcomes the Secretary-General's intention that these discussions be organized without delay.

The Council is prepared to authorize the regime for the sale of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products on the above basis for a like period of time as that specified in these resolutions as soon as the Secretary-General indicates that the Iraqi authorities are prepared to proceed on a date certain with the export of petroleum and petroleum products in accordance with the scheme.

The members of the Council are prepared at an appropriate time to consider possible further extensions of the time based upon Iraq's cooperation with the above and the Council's ongoing assessment of the needs and requirements in accordance with paragraph 1 (d) of resolution 706 (1991).

Decision of 27 March 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 27 March 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷⁰

The members of the Council held informal consultations on 27 March 1992 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there still was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of that resolution, as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991). The members of the Council expressed the hope that the offers of cooperation recently conveyed by Iraq will be fully matched by actual deeds.

Decision of 10 April 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 10 April 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷¹

The members of the Council have learned with great concern from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission of recent developments which appear to call for a halt in and constitute a threat to the safety and security of the Special Commission's aerial surveillance flights over Iraq. The members of the Council wish to point out that the surveillance flights are carried out under the authority of Security Council resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991. Reaffirming the right of the Special Commission to conduct such aerial surveillance flights, the members of the Council call upon the Government of Iraq to take all the necessary steps to ensure that the Iraqi military forces will not interfere with or threaten the security of the flights concerned and to comply with its responsibilities to secure the safety of the Special Commission's aircraft and personnel while flying over Iraq. The members of the Council warn the Government of Iraq of serious consequences which would ensue from any failure to comply with these obligations.

Decision of 27 May 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 27 May 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷²

The members of the Council held informal consultations on 27 May 1992 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there still was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regime established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 17 June 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 17 June 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷³

The members of the Council have noted the letter of 17 April 1992 from the Chairman of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission to the Secretary-General and express their complete support for the work of the Secretary-General and the Boundary Demarcation Commission in implementing paragraph 3 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991. They recall in this connection that through the demarcation process the Commission is not reallocating territory between Kuwait and Iraq, but is simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate the precise coordinates of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait for the first time. The task is being carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's report of 2 May 1991 for implementing paragraph 3 of that resolution. They look forward to the completion of the work of the Commission.

The members of the Council have noted with particular concern the letter of 21 May 1992 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Iraq to the Secretary-General concerning work of the Commission, which appears to call into question Iraq's adherence to resolution 687 (1991). The members of the Council are concerned in particular that the letter from Iraq of 21 May 1992 may be interpreted as rejecting the finality of the Commission's decisions notwithstanding the terms of resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's above-mentioned report, both of which were formally accepted by Iraq.

The members of the Council note with dismay that the letter recalls past Iraqi claims to Kuwait without also recalling Iraq's subsequent repudiations of these claims, inter alia, through its acceptance of resolution 687 (1991). They firmly reject any suggestion that tends to dispute the very existence of Kuwait, a State Member of the United Nations.

The members of the Council remind Iraq of its obligations under resolution 687 (1991), in particular paragraph 2 thereof, and under other relevant resolutions of the Council.

The members of the Council also remind Iraq of its acceptance of the resolutions of the Council adopted pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, which forms the basis for the ceasefire. They wish to stress to Iraq the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait being demarcated by the Commission and guaranteed by the Council pursuant to resolution 687 (1991), and the grave consequences that would ensue from any breach thereof.

Decision of 6 July 1992: statement by the
President

Following informal consultations on 6 July 1992, the President of the Security Council issued the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷⁴

The members of the Council have learned with concern of the refusal of the Government of Iraq to permit a team of inspectors sent to Iraq by the Special Commission to enter certain premises designated by the Commission for inspection.

The members of the Council recall that, under section C, paragraph 9 (b) (i), of resolution 687 (1991), Iraq is required to permit the Special Commission to undertake immediate on-site inspection of any locations designated by the Commission. This obligation is imposed as a result of a decision of the Council, taken under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. Furthermore, Iraq has agreed to such inspections as a condition precedent to the establishment of a formal ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and the Member States cooperating with Kuwait in accordance with resolution 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990. They further recall that by paragraph 3 (b) of resolution 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991, the Council has reaffirmed the relevant provision of resolution 687 (1991) and expressly demanded that Iraq "allow the Special Commission ... and their inspection teams immediate, unconditional, and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect”.

Iraq’s present refusal to permit access to the inspection team currently in Iraq to the premises designated by the Special Commission constitutes a material and unacceptable breach by Iraq of a provision of resolution 687 (1991) which established the ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region. The members of the Council demand that the Government of Iraq immediately agree to the admission of the premises concerned of the inspectors of the Special Commission as required by the Executive Chairman of the Commission, so that the Special Commission may establish whether or not any documents, records, materials, or equipment relevant to the responsibilities of the Commission are located therein.

Decision of 17 July 1992 (3098th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3098th meeting, held on 17 July 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

The President (Cape Verde) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷⁵

The Council deeply deplores the murder of a member of the United Nations Guards Contingent in Iraq on 16 July 1992 in the Governorate of Dohuk. It supports the Secretary-General’s decision to order an immediate and thorough investigation of this appalling crime. Members of the Council wish to express their sincere condolences to the family of the victim, Mr. Ravuama Dakia, and to the Government of Fiji.

The Council wishes to register its profound concern at the deteriorating security conditions affecting the safety and well-being of United Nations personnel in Iraq. It demands that attacks perpetrated against the United Nations Guards Contingent and other humanitarian personnel deployed in Iraq cease immediately and that maximum cooperation be extended by the authorities in the investigation of this crime, as well as in the protection of United Nations personnel.

President

Following informal consultations on 27 July 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁷⁶

³⁷⁵ S/24309.

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 27 July 1992 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of that resolution, as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

Decision of 26 August 1992 (3108th meeting):

At its 3108th meeting, held on 26 August 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

The President (China) drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution submitted by France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States,³⁷⁷ and read out revisions to the draft resolution in its provisional form.³⁷⁸

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Venezuela emphasized that his country considered that the process of demarcation of the Iraq-Kuwait boundary was being carried out, as pointed out in the draft resolution, in the special circumstances following Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait, which had posed a threat to international peace and security. It was Venezuela’s understanding, therefore, that the draft resolution did not establish a precedent altering the general principle expressed in Article 33 of the Charter that it was the parties directly involved in territorial dispute that should negotiate and reach an appropriate agreement to overcome their differences.³⁷⁹

The representative of Ecuador recalled that, when abstaining in the vote on resolution 687 (1991), his delegation had stated its conviction that Article 36 of the Charter did not grant the Security Council competence under Chapter VII to pronounce itself on the territorial boundary between Iraq and Kuwait or to determine any settlement intended to demarcate that boundary. Ecuador considered that the means used to implement Security Council resolutions could not give ³⁷⁷ S/24488; subsequently adopted as resolution 773 (1992).

the Council powers beyond those set out in the Charter itself, and that those means had to be in strict conformity with the norms of international law. While reiterating all the considerations his country had put forward when it abstained in the vote on resolution 687 (1991), the speaker noted that, in conformity with Article 25 of the Charter, Ecuador did not wish to place any obstacles in the way of actions which the Council might agree under that resolution.³⁸⁰

The representative of Japan said he believed that the demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait was essential to maintain peace and security in the region. Acknowledging that any boundary dispute was a very sensitive issue, he stressed that, when a third party became involved in efforts to settle it, it should do so in a manner free of any political motives. His delegation's understanding was that the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission had taken a very technical and scientific approach and had demarcated the boundary on the basis of the historical background, and various documents and maps, and had not been influenced by political considerations.³⁸¹

The draft resolution, as orally revised in its provisional form, was then put to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour, none against and 1 abstention (Ecuador), and was adopted as resolution 773 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, and in particular paragraphs 2 to 4 thereof, and its resolution 689 (1991) of 9 April 1991,

Recalling the report of the Secretary-General of 2 May 1991 relative to paragraph 3 of Security Council resolution 687 (1991), concerning the establishment of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission and the subsequent exchange of letters between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council of 6 and 13 May 1991,

Having considered the Secretary-General's letter of 12 August 1992 to the President of the Security Council transmitting the further report of the Commission,

Recalling in this connection that through the demarcation process the Commission is not reallocating territory between Iraq and Kuwait but is simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate for the first time the precise coordinates of the boundary set out in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters" signed by them on 4 October 1963, and that this task is being carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's report on the implementation of paragraph 3 of that resolution,

1. Welcomes the Secretary-General's letter of 12 August 1992 to the President of the Security Council and the further report of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission enclosed therewith;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Commission for its work on the demarcation of the land boundary, and welcomes its demarcation decisions;

3. Welcomes also the decision of the Commission to consider the eastern section of the boundary, which includes the offshore boundary, at its next session and urges it to demarcate this part of the boundary as soon as possible and thus complete its work;

4. Underlines its guarantee of the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary and its decision to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as provided for in paragraph 4 of resolution 687 (1991);

5. Welcomes further the Secretary-General's intention to carry out at the earliest practicable time the realignment of the demilitarized zone referred to in paragraph 5 of resolution 687 (1991) to correspond to the international boundary demarcated by the Commission, with the consequent removal of the Iraqi police posts;

6. Urges the two States concerned to cooperate fully with the work of the Commission;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of India reiterated his delegation's position that it would never support any decision whereby the Security Council would impose arbitrarily a boundary line between two countries. In the particular case before the Council, however, he had noted that what the Council had done was to recognize that a boundary agreed to by Iraq and Kuwait, and embodied in an agreement duly registered with the United Nations, existed, and to call upon them to respect its inviolability. The Council itself was not establishing any new boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, but only making arrangements for the demarcation of an already agreed boundary. It was in that light that his delegation viewed the work of the Boundary Commission.³⁸²

³⁸⁰ Ibid., pp. 3-5.

³⁸² Ibid., pp. 7-8.

The representative of the United States strongly supported the resolution just adopted. He quoted the fourth preambular paragraph, recalling that the Boundary Commission was not reallocating territory between Iraq and Kuwait, but was simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate for the first time the precise coordinates of the boundary. He commended the Boundary Commission for having resolutely completed its work on the land boundary. He looked forward to the Secretary-General carrying out the necessary realignment of the demilitarized zone at the earliest practicable time, with the consequent removal of the Iraqi police posts within Kuwaiti territory. He stressed that the resolution was also intended to reassure the Boundary Commission that prior Council resolutions did not preclude demarcation of the offshore boundary, and to urge the Commission to conclude its demarcation of the boundary subject to the Commission's terms of reference set out in the Secretary-General's report of 2 May 1991.³⁸³

The representative of the Russian Federation similarly stressed that the Boundary Commission was demarcating the international boundary historically existing between Iraq and Kuwait. Concluding the process of demarcation was, in his view, an important element in strengthening regional stability. He recalled that, by resolution 687 (1991), the Security Council had guaranteed the inviolability of the boundary.³⁸⁴

Decision of 24 September 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 24 September 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁸⁵

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 24 September 1992 pursuant to paragraph 21 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President of the Council concluded that there still was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regime established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution.

Decision of 2 October 1992 (3117th meeting): resolution 778 (1992)

At its 3117th meeting, held on 2 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

The President (France) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States,³⁸⁶ which Hungary and Japan had joined in sponsoring.

Speaking before the vote, the representative of China stated that his delegation believed that the following issues — payments to the United Nations Compensation Fund; the costs of carrying out the tasks authorized by section C of resolution 687 (1991); the costs of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission; and the financing of the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people — should be resolved by making full use of the established United Nations machinery, through the implementation of the Security Council resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). He noted, in that regard, that the United Nations and the Government of Iraq had, in accordance with those resolutions, held several rounds of negotiations on the export of Iraqi oil and that some progress had been made. He noted further that the Iraqi side had expressed its willingness to resume negotiations to resolve the remaining problems. He hoped that the sides would resume the negotiations soon and reach agreement on the export of Iraqi oil so that the relevant Council resolutions could be effectively implemented. In view of those circumstances, he believed that it was unnecessary to take such an extraordinary measure as the seizure of a country's frozen assets abroad. Such an action concerned the sovereignty of the country concerned and had complicated legal implications. The Chinese delegation thought the Council should be cautious on this matter. It would accordingly abstain in the vote on the draft resolution.³⁸⁷

The representative of Morocco said that his country had welcomed the machinery set up by the Council to ensure the provision of humanitarian aid and other vital needs to the people of Iraq. After long months of hesitation, Iraq and the United Nations seemed to be moving towards a certain degree of cooperation. Unfortunately, however, difficulties encountered at the talks on the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) had led some members of the Council to contemplate a new draft resolution to replace temporarily the provisions of those two resolutions. Morocco would have preferred to remain within the framework of those resolutions and to see more cooperation by the Government of Iraq. It would, nevertheless, vote in favour of the draft resolution in an attempt to create a bridge and renew dialogue. It would do so in the confidence that the measures contemplated by the draft resolution were temporary short-term measures, valid only as long as resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) were not implemented.³⁸⁸

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour, none against and 1 abstention (China), and was adopted as resolution 778 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions and in particular resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991,

Taking note of the letter of 15 July 1992 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council on Iraq's compliance with the obligations placed on it by resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and subsequent resolutions,

Condemning Iraq's continued failure to comply with its obligations under relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming its concern about the nutritional and health situation of the Iraqi civilian population, and the risk of a further deterioration of this situation, and recalling in this regard that resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) provide a mechanism for providing humanitarian relief to the Iraqi population, and that resolution 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991 provides a basis for humanitarian relief efforts in Iraq,

Having regard to the fact that the period of six months referred to in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) expired on 18 March 1992,

Deploring Iraq's refusal to cooperate in the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which puts its civilian population at risk and which results in the failure by Iraq to meet its obligations under relevant Council resolutions,

Recalling that the escrow account provided for in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) will consist of Iraqi funds administered by the Secretary-General which will be used to pay contributions to the United Nations Compensation Fund, the full costs of carrying out the tasks authorized in section C of resolution 687 (1991), the full costs incurred by the United Nations in facilitating the return of all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, half the costs of the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission and the cost to the United Nations of implementing resolution 706 (1991) and of other necessary humanitarian activities in Iraq,

Recalling that Iraq, as stated in paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991), is liable for all direct damages resulting from its invasion and occupation of Kuwait, without prejudice to its debts and obligations arising prior to 2 August 1990, which will be addressed through the normal mechanisms,

Recalling its decision in resolution 692 (1991) of 20 May 1991 that the requirement for Iraqi contributions to the Compensation Fund applies to certain Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products exported from Iraq before 3 April 1991, as well as to all Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products exported from Iraq after 2 April 1991,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Decides that all States in which there are funds of the Government of Iraq, or its State bodies, corporations, or agencies, that represent the proceeds of sale of Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products, paid for, by or on behalf of the purchaser on or after 6 August 1990, shall cause the transfer of those funds (or equivalent amounts) as soon as possible to the escrow account provided for in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) provided that this paragraph shall not require any State to cause the transfer of such funds in excess of 200 million United States dollars or to cause the transfer of more than 50 per cent of the total funds transferred or contributed pursuant to paragraphs 1 to 3 of the present resolution and further provided that States may exclude from the operation of this paragraph any funds which have already been released to a claimant or supplier prior to the adoption of the present resolution, or any other funds subject to or required to satisfy the rights of third parties, at the time of the adoption of the present resolution;

2. Also decides that all States in which there are petroleum or petroleum products owned by the Government of Iraq, or its State bodies, corporations, or agencies, shall take all feasible steps to purchase or arrange for the sale of such petroleum or petroleum products at fair market value, and thereupon to transfer the proceeds as soon as possible to the escrow account provided for in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991);

3. Urges all States to contribute funds from other sources to the escrow account as soon as possible;

4. Decides further that all States shall provide the Secretary-General with any information needed for the effective implementation of the present resolution and that they shall take the necessary measures to ensure that banks and other bodies and persons provide all relevant information necessary to identify the funds referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above and details of any transactions relating thereto, or the said petroleum or petroleum products, with a view to such information being utilized by all States and by the Secretary-General in the effective implementation of the present resolution;

5. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To ascertain the whereabouts and amounts of the said petroleum and petroleum products and the proceeds of sale referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above, drawing on the work already done under the auspices of the United Nations Compensation Commission, and report the results to the Council as soon as possible;

(b) To ascertain the costs of United Nations activities concerning the elimination of weapons of mass destruction, the provision of humanitarian relief in Iraq, and the other United Nations operations specified in paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 706 (1991);

(c) To take the following actions:

(i) To transfer to the United Nations Compensation Fund, from the funds referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above, the percentage referred to in paragraph 10 below; and

(ii) To use the remainder of funds referred to in paragraphs 1 to 3 above for the costs of United Nations activities concerning the elimination of weapons of mass destruction, the provision of humanitarian relief in Iraq, and the other United Nations operations specified in paragraphs 2 and 3 of resolution 706 (1991), taking into account any preference expressed by States transferring or contributing funds as to the allocation of such funds among these purposes;

6. Decides that for so long as oil exports take place pursuant to the system provided in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) or to the eventual lifting of sanctions pursuant to paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991), implementation of paragraphs 1 to 5 above shall be suspended and all proceeds of those oil exports shall immediately be transferred by the Secretary-General in the currency in which the transfer to the escrow account was made, to the accounts or States from which funds had been provided under paragraphs 1 to 3 above, to the extent required to replace in full the amounts so provided (together with applicable interest), and that, if necessary for this purpose, any other funds remaining in the escrow account shall similarly be transferred to those accounts or States, provided, however, that the Secretary-General may retain and use any funds urgently needed for the purposes specified in paragraph 5 (c) (ii) above;

7. Decides that the operation of the present resolution shall have no effect on rights, debts and claims existing with respect to funds prior to their transfer to the escrow account; and that the accounts from which such funds were transferred shall be kept open for retransfer of the funds in question;

8. Reaffirms that the escrow account referred to in the present resolution, like the Compensation Fund, enjoys the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, including immunity from legal proceedings, or any forms of attachment, garnishment or execution; and that no claim shall lie at the instance of any person or body in connection with any action taken in compliance with or implementation of the present resolution;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to repay, from any available funds in the escrow account, any sum transferred under the present resolution to the account or State from which it was transferred, if the transfer is found at any time by him not to have been of funds subject to the present resolution; a request for such a finding could be made by the State from which the funds were transferred;

10. Confirms that the percentage of the value of exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq for payment to the Compensation Fund shall, for the purpose of the present resolution and exports of petroleum or petroleum products subject to paragraph 6 of resolution 692 (1991), be the same as the percentage decided by the Security Council in paragraph 2 of resolution 705 (1991) of 15 August 1991, until such time as the Governing Council of the Compensation Fund may decide otherwise;

11. Decides that no further Iraqi assets shall be released for purposes set forth in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991) except to the sub-account of the escrow account established pursuant to paragraph 8 of resolution 712 (1991), or directly to the United Nations for humanitarian activities in Iraq;

12. Decides that, for the purposes of the present resolution and other relevant resolutions, the term "petroleum products" does not include petrochemical derivatives;

13. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully in the implementation of the present resolution;

14. Decides to remain seized of this matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States stated that Iraq's refusal to accept resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) — which created a mechanism to fund United Nations operations mandated by resolution 687 (1991), as well as humanitarian relief operations in Iraq, from Iraqi oil sales — had prevented its own population from receiving humanitarian relief. Moreover, it had jeopardized the continued operations of the United Nations programmes mandated by resolution 687 (1991), which the Security Council had instituted as part of its effort to restore peace and security to the region. He stressed that the resolution just adopted was a reasonable and proportionate response to Iraq's intransigence. It borrowed Iraqi assets to fund the escrow account created by resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). As those two resolutions originally contemplated, the Secretary-General would then be able to use those funds to pay for United Nations operations, such as the Special Commission, the Compensation Fund and humanitarian programmes. The speaker added that the resolution just adopted did not prevent Iraq from accepting resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). On the contrary, it provided that if Iraq did so the Iraqi funds borrowed would be returned. While he hoped that Iraq would quickly accept resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), he firmly believed that the Security Council was right in waiting no longer for Iraq to do so.³⁸⁹

Decision of 24 November 1992: statement by the President

Following informal consultations on 24 November 1992, the President of the Security Council made the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁹⁰

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 24 November 1992 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991) of 17 June 1991.

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of that resolution, as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution; and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

B. Letter dated 2 April 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Turkey to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 4 April 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of France to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 5 April 1991 (2982nd meeting): resolution 688 (1991)

By a letter dated 2 April 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹¹ the representative of Turkey stated that, owing to the action taken by the Iraqi army against the local population in northern Iraq, approximately 220,000 Iraqi citizens were being driven out of their country and were massed along the Turkish border. He asserted that these actions violated all norms of behaviour towards civilian populations and constituted an excessive use of force and a threat to the region's peace and security. He noted that, in the course of the Iraqi operations, many mortar shells had landed on Turkish territory. He requested that a meeting of the Council be convened immediately to consider the alarming situation and to adopt the necessary measures to put an end to the inhuman repression that was being carried out on a massive scale.

By a letter dated 4 April 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³⁹² the representative of France requested an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss "the serious situation resulting from the abuses being committed against the Iraqi population in several parts of Iraq, and more particularly in the Kurdish-inhabited areas". He stated that, by virtue of its repercussions in the region, the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security.

At its 2982nd meeting, on 5 April 1991, the Council included the two above-mentioned letters in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Canada, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Iraq, Ireland, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and Turkey, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President (Belgium) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States.³⁹³ He also drew their attention to several other letters, including two letters dated 3 and 4 April 1991, respectively, from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran addressed to the Secretary-

General.³⁹⁴ In his letter of 3 April, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran informed the Secretary-General that, on 2 April, an Iranian border town had become the target of continuous shelling by Iraqi artillery, and that three Iranian border guards had reportedly been killed. In an attached note verbale to the Iraqi Embassy in Tehran, the Iranian Government had called upon Iraq to cease its hostile behaviour. In his letter of 4 April, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran brought to the Secretary-General's urgent attention the desperate situation of Iraqi civilians who were crossing all along the border into his country. He stated that events in Iraq and the method by which the Iraqi military had dealt with the uprising of the Iraqi population had uprooted and driven hundreds of thousands of them towards neighbouring countries. It was estimated that about 500,000 Iraqi civilians would try to cross the border into the Islamic Republic of Iran within the next few days; more than 110,000, including 45,000 in the north, had already crossed the border. The influx of refugees, in addition to its obvious economic and social problems, had caused tension and chaos at the borders. The prolongation of the situation, with its implications for Iraq's neighbours, would have consequences that threatened regional peace and security. The magnitude of the suffering of the Iraqi refugees, its international character, and its consequences for regional peace and security made concerted international reaction by the Security Council a political and humanitarian imperative.

Speaking at the outset of the meeting, the representative of Turkey said that his Government had requested the Council meeting in view of the grave threat to the peace and security of the region posed by the tragic events taking place in Iraq. He stated that, in their attempt to quell the various insurgencies in that country, the Iraqi armed forces had attacked cities and other localities with helicopters, tanks and artillery, causing the inhabitants to flee for their safety. The situation in northern Iraq, adjacent to the borders of Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran was especially alarming. Up to 300,000 people had been driven to the Iraqi-Turkish border; of these, over 100,000 had trekked across the border and were now reported to be in Turkey. Turkey had reports that perhaps 600,000 more people were heading for the Turkish border. The area was remote, mountainous and intensely cold at this time of year. The displaced people — Kurds, Arabs and Turkomans — many of whom were women and children, had come under intense mortar fire. Many of the mortar shells had landed on the Turkish side of the border. The speaker stressed that what was going on in northern Iraq could not be considered an internal affair of that country. Given the scale of the human tragedy and its international implications, the Council could not allow itself to be relegated to the role of a mere spectator. The threat posed by these events to the security of the region was clear. In the chaotic conditions prevailing in northern Iraq, it was conceivable that a million people might be forced to move from that country to Turkey. No country could cope with such a massive influx of destitute people fleeing for their lives. Turkey would not allow its border provinces to be overwhelmed. It expected the Council to take urgent and forceful action to secure an immediate cessation of the repression of the inhabitants of northern Iraq. The Council must send a clear signal to Iraq demanding respect for international borders and respect for human rights. At the same time, Turkey was duty bound to take whatever measures it deemed necessary to prevent the anarchy and chaos reigning on the Iraqi side of the border from spilling over into Turkey.

The speaker added that Turkey was making efforts to provide humanitarian assistance to the needy people at its border and to those who had crossed into Turkey. However, this was an operation that required the full backing and support of the international community. The Secretary-General should be requested to send a humanitarian mission, urgently, to the region to assess the situation, to report on the requirements in terms of humanitarian assistance and to propose arrangements for distributing that assistance to the displaced persons. The speaker concluded by stressing that, in calling for a meeting of the Council, Turkey had no intention of interfering in Iraq's internal affairs. It recognized Article 2 (7) of the Charter and believed that it should be scrupulously observed. Turkey had taken this action because of the threat posed to the stability, security and peace of the region by Iraq's methods of repression. It firmly supported the independence, sovereignty and integrity of Iraq.³⁹⁵

The representative of Pakistan echoed the call for action by the Council. He emphasized at the outset that, as a matter of principle, his country was opposed to any form of interference in the internal affairs of any country, and stated that the territorial integrity of Iraq must be fully respected. At the same time, however, his delegation was deeply concerned at the severe repression being suffered by a large number of people in Iraq who had been forced to flee towards the borders of the Islamic Republic of Iran and Turkey. It was compelled to appear before the Council and appeal for restraint. The speaker called for an end to the military action and urged a peaceful negotiation of the issues. He said that his delegation would support the Council in any action it might take to achieve those ends and prevent the further loss of life.³⁹⁶

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran informed the Council that the number of Iraqi refugees in his country had risen from 110,000 to over 180,000 within a day, including about 120,000 in the north. It was estimated that, in the next few days, half a million Iraqi civilians would take refuge in the Islamic Republic of Iran. Other neighbouring countries were faced with similar flows of civilians escaping the Iraqi army. The situation inside Iraq had the potential to further destabilize inter-State relations in the region. It had consequences that threatened regional and international peace and security. Furthermore, no country in the region had the capability to deal with a humanitarian problem of such magnitude. For those reasons, the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran, which had long refrained from interfering in the internal affairs of Iraq, now saw the need for concerted international effort to deal with both the causes and the symptoms of the crisis. It believed that it was incumbent upon the Council to take immediate measures to put an early end to the suffering of the Iraqi people.³⁹⁷

The representative of Iraq stated that the economic embargo imposed on his country and the bombing campaign waged against it by the United States and its allies since January 1991, which had completely devastated his country's economy and basic infrastructure, had led many Iraqis to seek food, shelter and medicine in the north. Moreover, his Government had firm evidence of intervention by some neighbouring States in the internal affairs of Iraq, and their attempt to destabilize Iraq and perhaps even to partition it into many mini-States. In all parts of Iraq, saboteurs had fomented dissent, wreaked destruction on many towns and villages and killed many innocent people. The saboteurs had escaped, before facing the Iraqi army, fleeing to safe havens beyond the borders; through terror and intimidation on their way, they had convinced many innocent citizens, particularly in northern Iraq, to leave and go towards the northern and eastern international borders of the country. The Government of Iraq would welcome an international mission to ascertain the facts. It had expected that the Council would wait and find out the true facts from such a mission before taking any action. However, the Council had hastily produced a draft resolution, which constituted a flagrant, illegitimate intervention in Iraq's internal affairs and a violation of Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations.³⁹⁸

Several Council members, speaking before the vote, spoke in support of the draft resolution. The representative of Romania stated that questions pertaining to various segments or components of populations were matters of the national jurisdiction of States and that the imperative nature of Article 2 (7) of the Charter could not be disregarded. Indeed, his delegation was pleased to see this fundamental provision well reflected in the draft resolution. However, the armed repression of the Iraqi population, which had led to a massive flow of refugees across Iraq's international frontiers, was a legitimate concern of the international community. It was an important humanitarian issue and a real threat to international peace and security, which required the cooperation of all States. Romania stressed that the Council's action in this field should be guided by impartiality and objectivity. The draft resolution under consideration should not create a precedent that could be used or misused in the future for political purposes. The Council should emphasize the humanitarian nature of the issue, addressing it as a special case in the aftermath of the Gulf war. On such an issue, the solidarity of the members of the Council was essential to guarantee the success of its actions. No precedent should be established which could erode such solidarity.³⁹⁹

The representative of Ecuador observed that two fundamental principles of the Charter had informed his country's approach to this matter: the respect for human rights, as set out in the preamble; and the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other States. He stated that the situation might perhaps have been a question of internal jurisdiction in Iraq if it had not gone beyond the borders of the country; that is, if it had been solely a case of violation of human rights by a country within its own frontiers. In that case, under Chapter IX of the Charter, the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council would have been the competent bodies to deal with it. However, the situation under consideration constituted a threat to international peace and security. Therefore, the Council was competent to take a stand and adopt measures to put an end to it, while mentioning clearly in the draft resolution Article 2 (7) of the Charter. The speaker added that Ecuador was encouraged by Iraq's expression of readiness to accept a fact-finding mission; the Secretary-General would certainly have taken note of this offer, and would act under the draft resolution before them.⁴⁰⁰

The representative of Zaire also welcomed the reference to Article 2 (7) in the preamble of the draft resolution. He stressed that the issue raised in the resolution was strictly humanitarian. While the situation had to do with the internal policy of Iraq, it could have consequences that might threaten international peace and security. The Council's intervention was necessary to prevent any deterioration in the political and economic situation in the countries of a region hard hit by two successive wars.⁴⁰¹

The representative of Côte d'Ivoire stated that the recent war in the Gulf, and the consequences thereof, should encourage the Security Council towards taking preventive action as part of its role in maintaining international peace and security. In the case before them, the neighbouring countries had drawn attention to the possibility of a breach of international peace and security and to the danger that the mass exodus posed. Could the Council turn a deaf ear to their cry for help and take refuge behind the banner of non-interference in the internal affairs of another State?⁴⁰²

Other Council members, on the other hand, voiced objections to the draft resolution. The representative of Yemen said that the draft resolution, although dealing with the humanitarian issues that faced the Iraqi people, focused on only one area and one category of the Iraqi population. It attempted to politicize a humanitarian issue and set a dangerous precedent that could open the way to diverting the Council away from its basic responsibilities for safeguarding international peace and security and towards addressing the internal affairs of countries. The whole issue was not within the competence of the Security Council. The speaker particularly objected to those provisions of the draft resolution which claimed the existence of a threat to international peace and security; referred to political developments within Iraq, in violation of Article 2 of the Charter; and called for internal dialogue, in an obvious attempt to intervene in the internal affairs of Iraq.⁴⁰³

The representative of Zimbabwe recognized that the humanitarian situation was serious and affected neighbouring States. However, his country did not believe that that made the internal conflict in Iraq an issue of which the Council should be seized. The situation had arisen as a result of a domestic political conflict in Iraq and was therefore essentially an internal matter as defined in Article 2 (7) of the Charter. Addressing the situation in the manner suggested by the draft resolution would be inconsistent with the clear parameters of the Council's competence, as provided for in the Charter. The serious humanitarian situation and the question of refugees could be adequately addressed by the appropriate organs of the United Nations, including the specialized agencies.⁴⁰⁴

The representative of Cuba stated that, under Article 24 (2) of the Charter, the specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of its duties were laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII. Those Chapters did not include the questions of a humanitarian nature about which concern was being expressed in the Council. The Charter devoted Chapter IX to those questions and, under Article 60, vested responsibility for them in the General Assembly. The Security Council had no right to violate the principle of non-intervention set forth in Article 2 (7). It had no right to intervene unduly in the internal affairs of any State or in matters within the competence of other organs of the Organization. If it considered that a subject was important and required urgent action, it could request a special session of the General Assembly in accordance with Article 20. In that way, the Council would not be taking a course of action that departed from the letter and the spirit of the Charter and that turned the Organization into a system dominated by an oligarchical group which claimed powers that no one had given it. The Council was disregarding the realities of the situation, including the fact that the political problems in Iraq were not unrelated to the intervention in the country by a major Power; it was, moreover, disregarding its obligations to act strictly in accordance with the functions granted to it under the Charter.⁴⁰⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It was adopted by 10 votes in favour to 3 against (Cuba, Yemen, Zimbabwe), with 2 abstentions (China, India), as resolution 688 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Mindful of its duties and its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recalling the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter,

Gravely concerned by the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish-populated areas, which led to a massive flow of refugees towards and across international frontiers and to cross-border incursions which threaten international peace and security in the region,

Deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering involved,

Taking note of the letters dated 2 and 4 April 1991, respectively, from the representatives of Turkey and France to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council,

Taking note also of the letters dated 3 and 4 April 1991 from the Permanent Representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General, ⁴⁰⁵ Ibid., pp. 42-52.

Reaffirming the commitment of all Member States to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq and of all States in the region,

Bearing in mind the report transmitted by the Secretary-General on 20 March 1991,⁴⁰⁶

1. Condemns the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish-populated areas, the consequences of which threaten international peace and security in the region;

2. Demands that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end this repression, and in the same context expresses the hope that an open dialogue will take place to ensure that the human and political rights of all Iraqi citizens are respected;

3. Insists that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq and make available all necessary facilities for their operations;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to pursue his humanitarian efforts in Iraq and to report forthwith, if appropriate on the basis of a further mission to the region, on the plight of the Iraqi civilian population, and in particular the Kurdish population, suffering from the repression in all its forms inflicted by the Iraqi authorities;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to use all the resources at his disposal, including those of the relevant United Nations agencies, to address urgently the critical needs of the refugees and displaced Iraqi population;

6. Appeals to all Member States and to all humanitarian organizations to contribute to these humanitarian relief efforts;

7. Demands that Iraq cooperate with the Secretary-General to these ends;

8. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of China, explaining his delegation's abstention, emphasized the complexity of the question which had both internal and international aspects. According to Article 2 (7), the Council should not consider or take action on issues concerning the internal affairs of any State. As for the international aspects of the question, they should be settled through the appropriate ⁴⁰⁶ Report to the Secretary-General on humanitarian needs in Kuwait and Iraq in the immediate post-crisis environment by a mission to the area led by Mr. Martti Ahtisaari, Under-Secretary-General for Administration and Management, dated 20 March 1991 (S/22366, annex).

channels. China supported the Secretary-General in rendering humanitarian assistance to the refugees through the relevant organizations.⁴⁰⁷

The representative of India said that the international community should offer the Iraqi refugees succour and demand that conditions be created for their return in safety and dignity. It should not, however, prescribe what should be done, for that would impinge on the internal affairs of States. His delegation felt that the Council should give serious consideration to the statement of the representative of Iraq inviting the Secretary-General or the Council to send a fact-finding mission to his country. The speaker stressed that, in its resolution, the Council should have concentrated on the peace and security aspect of the situation, which was its proper mandate under the Charter, rather than on the factors that had created the present situation. It should have left the other aspects of the situation to other, more appropriate organs of the United Nations. It was in that spirit that India had suggested to the sponsors some amendments to make the resolution more balanced and appropriate for the Council. The speaker's delegation welcomed the inclusion of a reference to Article 2 (7) of the Charter — an element that had improved the resolution. However, the sponsors of the resolution had not accepted the basic thrust of his delegation's amendments, which was why it had abstained in the voting.⁴⁰⁸

The representative of France quoted the opening words of the preamble to the Charter and said that violations of human rights such as those now being observed became a matter of international interest when they took on such proportions that they assumed the dimension of a crime against humanity. That was the case in Iraq. The influx of refugees into neighbouring countries, the continued fighting in the border areas, and the increasing number of massacres were arousing indignation and threatening international peace and security in the region. The demands made in the resolution just adopted at the initiative of his Government were the minimum that the members of the international community must make in order to live up to their commitments under the Charter.⁴⁰⁹

had addressed, on an urgent basis, the plight of displaced civilians in Iraq which had tragic human consequences and presented serious implications for regional peace and security. This was, of course, a specific case that had arisen in the aftermath of the Gulf crisis. It was not the role or the intention of the Council to interfere in the internal affairs of any country. However, it was the Council's legitimate responsibility to respond to the concerns of Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran — concerns increasingly shared by other neighbours of Iraq — about the massive numbers of people fleeing, or disposed to flee, from Iraq across international frontiers because of the repression of the Iraqi regime. The transboundary impact of Iraq's treatment of its civilian population threatened regional stability. That is what the Council had addressed in the resolution just adopted.⁴¹⁰

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics remarked that his Government had reacted with understanding and concern to the appeal made by Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran to the Council in connection with the alarming situation that had come about on their borders with Iraq and the threat it posed to international peace and security in the region. The Soviet Union firmly adhered to the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States and welcomed the reference in the resolution to Article 2 (7) of the Charter. However, it shared the view expressed by the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran that the consequences that the massive transborder flow of Iraqi civilians had for regional peace and security called for joint action by the Security Council from both the political and humanitarian standpoint. It was the duty of the Council and of the world community as a whole to put an end to the conditions that were forcing hundreds of thousands of peaceful inhabitants to leave their homeland and seek refuge in neighbouring countries; this was creating a destabilizing situation in the area and posing a threat of a new international conflict.⁴¹¹

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the resolution, which accomplished two crucial tasks: it sent a strong and clear message to the Government of Iraq that it must stop the repression and killing of innocent civilians, which was at the root of the massive exodus into Turkey and the Islamic

Republic of Iran; and it gave firm backing to the Secretary-General, to the specialized agencies and to all the governmental and non-governmental organizations whose efforts were now so urgently needed if even more lives were not to be lost. His delegation could not accept the argument that this action was in some way outside the scope of the Security Council, that it was an entirely internal matter, and he was glad that the resolution made clear that it was not so. For one thing, Article 2 (7), an essential part of the Charter, did not apply to matters which, under the Charter, were not essentially domestic; questions of human rights, for example in South Africa, had often been defined in that category. Secondly, the Turkish and Iranian letters to the Council had made it clear that there was a real threat here to international peace and security. The huge surge of refugees was destabilizing the whole region. Thirdly, Iraq had international obligations, under article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, to protect, in the case of internal armed conflicts, all innocent civilians. All those factors fully justified the action by the Council.⁴¹²

The representative of Austria and the President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Belgium, expressed profound concern at the policy of repression in some regions of Iraq, which had caused major displacements of populations towards the countries neighbouring Iraq. The scale of those exoduses, the destitution of the refugees and the enormity of their needs had given rise to extremely critical situations on the borders of those States and had caused serious border incidents. The speakers concurred with previous speakers that the Council's action was justified in this case by the specific considerations arising from an exceptionally serious situation which threatened peace and security in the region.⁴¹³

A number of non-members of the Council, who were invited to make their statements after the explanations of vote, stressed the appropriateness of the Council's taking measures to deal with this matter and supported the resolution just adopted, underlining the points made in several of its paragraphs.⁴¹⁴

C. Letter dated 2 April 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Turkey to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 4 April 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of France to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Letter dated 5 March 1992 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Belgium to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

Decision of 11 March 1992 (3059th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3059th meeting, on 11 March 1992, the Security Council included in its agenda two letters addressed to the President of the Council which were considered by the Council at its 2982nd meeting on 5 April 1991: a letter dated 2 April 1991 from the representative of Turkey,⁴¹⁵ and a letter dated 4 April 1991 from the representative of France,⁴¹⁶ drawing attention to the serious situation resulting from abuses being committed against the Iraqi population in several parts of Iraq, in particular in the northern region.⁴¹⁷ The Council also included in its agenda a letter dated 5 March 1992 addressed to the President of the Council from the representative of Belgium,⁴¹⁸ in which attention was drawn to a report dated 18 February 1992 on the human rights situation in Iraq prepared by Mr. Max van der Stoel, Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights.⁴¹⁹ The representative of Belgium noted that the report referred, in paragraph 159, to Security Council resolution 688 (1991). In that resolution, the Council had called upon Iraq to “immediately end [its] repression” as “a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region”. The Special Rapporteur concluded his report by observing that, as the repression continued, the threat remained and thus extraordinary measures, such as a proposed broad-based human rights monitoring mechanism, were warranted.

The Council considered the item at its 3059th meeting, which was twice suspended and resumed, on 11 and 12 March 1992. In accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote; and extended invitations, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to Messrs. Hans Blix, Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), and Rolf Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the Special Commission.

The President (Venezuela) stated that the Council was meeting in accordance with the decision taken at its 3058th meeting, held on 28 February 1992, as indicated in the statement by the President of the Council of the same date.⁴²⁰ He recalled that on 14 February 1992 the Council had been informed about the interest of the Government of Iraq in sending a high-level technical team to respond to any questions that the members of the Council might put to it on all aspects of Iraq’s compliance with resolution 687 (1991) and other relevant resolutions. On behalf of the Council members, he welcomed the presence of the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and said that they collectively aspired to productive and constructive meetings.

The President further stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴²¹

I. GENERAL OBLIGATION

1. The resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait impose a number of general and specific obligations upon Iraq.
2. As regards the general obligation, Iraq is required, under paragraph 33 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, to give official notification to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions of that entire resolution.

3. Iraq signified its unconditional acceptance in identical letters dated 6 April 1991, addressed to the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council and in a letter dated 10 April 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, and in a letter dated 23 January 1992 from the Chargé d’affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council.

4. When the Security Council met at the level of heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992, the concluding statement made by the President (3046th meeting) on behalf of its members contained the following passage:

Last year, under the authority of the United Nations, the international community succeeded in enabling Kuwait to regain its sovereignty and territorial integrity, which it had lost as a result of Iraqi aggression. The resolutions adopted by the Council remain essential to the restoration of peace and stability in the region and must be fully implemented. At the same time the members of the Council are concerned by the humanitarian situation of the innocent civilian population of Iraq.

5. On 5 February 1992, the President issued a statement on behalf of its members in which he stated, among other things:

In connection with the Secretary-General’s report on Iraq’s compliance with all the obligations placed upon it by certain Security Council resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, of 25 January 1992, particularly resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions, the members of the Council note that while much progress has been made, much remains to be done ... The members of the Council are disturbed by the lack of Iraqi cooperation. Iraq must implement fully resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent relevant resolutions as was stated in the statement read out by the President of the Council on behalf of its members at the 3046th meeting, held on 31 January 1992 with the participation of the heads of State and Government.

6. In a statement made on behalf of the Council on 28 February 1992, the President said:

The members of the Council demand that Iraq immediately implement all its obligations under Council resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions. They require the Government of Iraq to communicate directly to the Council without further delay an authoritative and unconditional acknowledgement of its agreement to accept and implement the above-noted obligations, including specifically to comply with the determination of the Special Commission requiring the destruction of ballistic missile-related equipment. The members of the Council emphasize that Iraq must be aware of the serious consequences of continued material breaches of resolution 687 (1991).

⁴²⁰ S/23663; see also section 22.A of the present chapter.

7. I must also draw attention to the further report of the Secretary-General of 7 March 1992 on the status of compliance by Iraq with the obligations placed upon it by certain Security Council resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

8. From the aforementioned statements by the President and in view of the reports of the Secretary-General, it will be seen that, despite Iraq's statements of unconditional acceptance of resolution 687 (1991), the Council has determined that Iraq is not in full compliance with all of its obligations.

II. SPECIFIC OBLIGATIONS

9. In addition to the general obligation to accept the provisions of resolution 687 (1991) in their entirety, several Council resolutions impose specific obligations upon Iraq.

(a) Respect for the inviolability of the international boundary

10. By paragraph 2 of resolution 687 (1991) the Council demands that Iraq respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands previously agreed upon between Iraq and Kuwait. Pursuant to paragraph 3 of that resolution, the Secretary-General established a Boundary Demarcation Commission to demarcate the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. Paragraph 5 of the same resolution requires Iraq and Kuwait to respect a demilitarized zone established by the Council. The Council has been informed that Iraq has respected the demilitarized zone and that it has fully participated in the work of the Commission. It has also been informed that Iraq refuses to withdraw a number of police posts that are not in line with the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission's principle that both sides should stay 1,000 metres from the boundary line shown on the Mission's map.

(b) Weapons-related obligations

11. Section C of resolution 687 (1991) imposes certain specific obligations upon Iraq with respect to its chemical and biological weapons programmes, its ballistic-missile programmes with a range greater than 150 kilometres and its nuclear programmes. These obligations are elaborated upon in resolutions 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991. The obligations are defined in paragraphs 8 to 13 of resolution 687 (1991) and they are elaborated upon in paragraphs 3 and 5 of resolution 707 (1991) and paragraph 5 of resolution 715 (1991).

12. The information relevant to Iraq's compliance with the obligations laid down in the paragraphs of the resolutions to which I have just referred is reproduced in annex I to the Secretary-General's report of 7 March 1992.

13. By resolution 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991, the Council decided that the Government of Iraq shall be liable for the full costs of carrying out the tasks authorized by section C of resolution 687 (1991). No funds have so far been received from Iraq to meet this liability.

14. The Council has noted that since the adoption of resolution 687 (1991) progress has been made in the implementation of section C of that resolution but that much remains to be done. There is serious non-compliance with the obligations concerning the programmes for weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles and the members of the Council have found this to be a continuing material breach of resolution 687 (1991).

15. The Special Commission has informed the Council about the outstanding matters that would at the present time appear to be the most important. The Council's attention is invited again to annex I of the Secretary-General's report of 7 March 1992.

16. The Council has also noted the statement by the International Atomic Energy Agency contained in section C of the annex to the Secretary-General's report of 25 January 1992. The attention of the Council is drawn to information annexed to the further report of the Secretary-General, of 7 March 1992, relative to the two last inspections by the Agency, on Iraq's compliance with its obligations under Council resolutions as they relate to nuclear activities.

17. In a statement issued on behalf of the members of the Council, the President stated on 19 February 1992 that:

Iraq's failure to acknowledge its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), its rejection up until now of the two plans for ongoing monitoring and verification and its failure to provide the full, final and complete disclosure of its weapons capabilities constitute a continuing material breach of the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991).

18. In a further statement made on 28 February 1992 on behalf of the Council, the President said:

The members of the Council deplore and condemn the failure of the Government of Iraq to provide the Special Commission with full, final and complete disclosure, as required by resolution 707 (1991), of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres, including launchers, and of all holdings of such weapons, their components and production facilities and locations, as well as all other nuclear programmes; and the failure of Iraq to comply with the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved by resolution 715 (1991). ... Furthermore, the members of the Council equally deplore and condemn Iraq's failure, within the time prescribed by the Special Commission at the request of Iraq, to commence destruction of ballistic missile-related equipment designated for destruction by the Special Commission. The members of the Council reaffirm that it is for the Special Commission alone to determine which items must be destroyed under paragraph 9 of resolution 687 (1991).

(c) Repatriation of and access to Kuwaiti and third-State nationals in Iraq

19. As regards Kuwaiti and third-State nationals in Iraq, resolutions 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991 and 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 impose an obligation on Iraq to release, facilitate repatriation of, and arrange for immediate access to them, as well as the return of the remains of any deceased personnel of the forces of Kuwait and of the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990. Furthermore, paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991) requires Iraq to extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross in facilitating the search for Kuwaiti and third-State nationals still unaccounted for.

20. The Council was informed by the International Committee of the Red Cross in January 1992 that almost 7,000 persons have returned from Iraq to their countries since the beginning of March 1991. The Committee also stated that despite all its efforts, there are still thousands of persons reported missing by the parties to the conflict.

21. A special commission composed of the representatives of France, Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America has met under the auspices of the Committee, to try to reach an agreement on, among other things, the implementation of paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991). However, the Committee has informed the Council that it has not yet received any information as to the whereabouts of the persons reported missing in Iraq. Nor has it received detailed and documented information on the search conducted by the Iraqi authorities. Finally, it is also still awaiting information on persons who have died while in custody.

22. The attention of the Council is drawn to paragraphs 12 to 14 of the Secretary-General's further report of 7 March 1992.

(d) Iraq's liability under international law

23. Another obligation concerns Iraq's liability under international law. In resolution 674 (1990), the Council reminds Iraq "that under international law it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq". Its liability under international law is reaffirmed in paragraph 2 (b) of resolution 686 (1991) and paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991). The latter resolution further specifies that Iraq "is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage — including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources — or injury to foreign governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait".

24. By paragraph 18 of the same resolution, the Council created a Fund to pay compensation for claims that fall within paragraph 16, to be financed by a percentage of the value of the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq. In view of the existing economic sanctions against Iraq under resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, Iraq was permitted by the Security Council under resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 April 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991 to sell a limited quantity of oil, as an exception, a portion of the proceeds from which would be used to provide financial resources for the Fund. To date, it has not availed itself of this possibility. The Council notes that this authorization is due to lapse on 18 March 1992. The members of the Council are aware of a request by Iraq for a five-year moratorium on meeting its financial obligations, including payments into the Compensation Fund.

(e) Repayment and servicing of Iraq's foreign debt

25. With regard to another obligation, the Council demands, in paragraph 17 of resolution 687 (1991), that Iraq scrupulously adhere to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt.

26. The attention of the Council is drawn to paragraphs 17 and 18 of the Secretary-General's further report of 7 March 1992.

(f) Return of property

27. I now turn to the question of return of property. The Security Council, in paragraph 2 (d) of resolution 686 (1991), demands that Iraq immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property seized by it, to be completed in the shortest possible period. The members of the Council have noted with satisfaction that, as stated in the further report of the Secretary-General, Iraqi officials involved with the return of property have extended maximum cooperation to the United Nations to facilitate the return.

(g) Monthly statements of gold and foreign currency reserves

28. Another obligation is set out in paragraph 7 of resolution 706 (1991), under which the Government of Iraq is required to provide to the Secretary-General and appropriate international organizations monthly statements of its gold and foreign currency reserves. To date, no such statements have been provided to the Secretary-General or to the International Monetary Fund.

(h) Undertaking not to commit or support acts of international terrorism

29. By paragraph 32 of resolution 687 (1991), Iraq is required not to commit or support acts of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods, and practices of terrorism.

30. The Council notes Iraq's statements contained in identical letters dated 11 June 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council, and in a letter dated 23 January 1992 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council that it is a party to international conventions against terrorism and that it has never pursued a policy favourable to international terrorism as defined by international law.

(i) Security Council action with respect to the Iraqi civilian population

31. Resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) provide a means for Iraq to meet its obligations to supply its civilian population with needed humanitarian assistance, particularly food and medicine. To date, Iraq has refused to implement these resolutions. In fact after initiating discussions with secretariat representatives on implementation, Iraq abruptly terminated the discussions.

III. SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 688 (1991)

32. I should now like to refer to the demands by the Council with respect to the Iraqi civilian population. In paragraph 2 of resolution 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, the Security Council demands that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, end the repression of its civilian population. In paragraphs 3 and 7, the Council insists that it allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq, and demands its cooperation with the Secretary-General to these ends.

33. The Council remains deeply concerned at the grave human rights abuses that, despite the provisions of resolution 688 (1991), the Government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population, in particular in the northern region of Iraq, in southern Shi'a centres and in the southern marshes. The Council notes that this situation is confirmed by the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the human rights situation in Iraq of 5 March 1992 and by the comments of the Office of the Executive Delegate of the Secretary-General for the United Nations Humanitarian Assistance Programme for Iraq, Kuwait and the Iraq/Turkey and Iraq/Iran border areas contained in the further report of the Secretary-General of 7 March 1992.

34. The members of the Council are particularly concerned at the reported restrictions on the supplies of essential commodities, in particular food and fuel, which have been imposed by the government of Iraq on the three northern governorates of Dohuk, Erbil and Sulaymaniyya. In this regard, as the Special Rapporteur has noted in his report, inasmuch as the repression of the population continues, the threat to international peace and security in the region mentioned in resolution 688 (1991) remains.

IV. CONCLUDING OBSERVATION

35. In view of the observations on the record of Iraq's performance, the Council has considered itself justified in concluding that Iraq has not fully complied with the obligations placed upon it by the Council. It is the Council's hope and expectation that this meeting will prove an invaluable opportunity to advance in the consideration of this issue as required in the interest of world peace and security, as well as that of the Iraqi people.

The representative of Austria said the Council meeting was a welcome opportunity to take stock and to enable members of the Council to evaluate to what extent its previous decisions had been implemented and to what extent it might need to take further action. Noting that the picture emerging regarding Iraq's compliance with relevant binding decisions of the Council was very disturbing, he commented on two main areas. With regard to the humanitarian and human rights situation in Iraq, he observed that at the same time that the Government of Iraq was protesting against the embargo imposed by the international community, it had blocked the import of food, fuel and medicines to some areas of the country, in particular those inhabited by the Kurds. Repressive measures also continued to affect the southern marshes. The detailed report by the Special Rapporteur contained additional information on massive human rights violations by the Government, further documenting the absence of full Iraqi compliance with resolution 688 (1991). It was deplorable, moreover, that the Government of Iraq had not used the possibility of oil sales to finance the purchase of food, medicine and other civilian supplies to meet the humanitarian needs of the civilian population, as envisaged by resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). The speaker urged Iraq to resume the talks with the Secretariat on the implementation of that scheme immediately. His second main area of concern was Iraq's failure to provide all the information required under resolutions 687 (1991) and 707 (1991), and to acknowledge its obligations and provide the declarations required under the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved by resolution 715 (1991). He pointed out that, under the relevant resolutions of the Council, a continuing material breach of its obligations placed Iraq in a situation which might have serious consequences, as had been emphasized repeatedly in recent statements by Presidents of the Council. The speaker recalled, further, that the Council's decisions in 1991 had been seen as part of a broader effort to establish peace and security in the area and the region as a whole. Almost one year later, that objective had not yet been achieved. Indeed, if one believed recent reports, a new arms race in that volatile region was already well under way. He concluded, however, that with regard to collective security and the role of the United Nations as a whole in dealing with conflicts, in many ways a new beginning had been made in the context of the Gulf conflict; some important steps had been taken towards establishing a system of collective security.⁴²²

The representative of the United Kingdom welcomed the presence of a high-level delegation from Iraq headed by the Deputy Prime Minister; it was essential that the Iraqi leadership hear directly from the Council the extent and nature of its concern about Iraq's non-compliance with resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions and get a clear, first-hand impression of the Council's determination that its resolutions be fully implemented. He recalled that following the bimonthly review of sanctions completed on 5 February, the Council had asked its then President to convey its negative conclusions to the Government of Iraq and that it was in response that Iraq had asked for the opportunity for the present debate. The discussion was therefore about compliance or, rather, the lack of compliance. On this, the key text was the presidential statement endorsed by the Council at its meeting at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992, in which it was affirmed that "The resolutions adopted by the Council remain essential to the restoration of peace and stability in the [Gulf] region and must be fully implemented".⁴²³ He observed that the Secretary-General's reports of 25 January and 7 March provided a detailed picture of the degree of Iraqi non-compliance with the Council's resolutions.⁴²⁴ His Government had noted a number of serious problem areas arising under resolution 687 (1991), including the following: demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait; the issue of weapons of mass destruction, where the Iraqi performance had from the beginning been one of evasion, dissimulation and often dishonesty; the question of the return of Kuwaiti property; the issue of compensation for the victims of Iraqi aggression; the release of detainees; and the matter of performance bonds. In the sector of weapons of mass destruction, the Council was now confronted with three serious issues: Iraq's failure to make full and complete disclosure of its programmes; its refusal to acknowledge its obligations for long-term monitoring; and its resistance in implementing the Special Commission's determinations on the material and installations that needed to be destroyed. The speaker hoped that as a result of the current debate the Iraqi authorities would understand the absolute need for them to comply promptly on these three points. He insisted that there was no scope for negotiations in relation to them. The determination of which items needed to be destroyed, for example, was for the Special Commission and IAEA and for them alone. Nor was it acceptable that the Council should be drawn into a discussion of what it would or would not do if Iraq complied with its obligations. The obligation to comply was an absolute, not a conditional, one. The speaker added that Iraq had also failed to comply with resolution 688 (1991), which had been adopted in response to a threat to international peace and security arising from its brutal military action against the civilian population in the Kurdish and Shia areas of the country, resulting in a massive flood of refugees across the frontiers of its neighbours. Far from engaging in the envisaged dialogue, Iraq had for several months operated an economic blockade against some of those areas, particularly the Kurdish areas, frustrated the opening of United Nations humanitarian centres in some of the Shia areas, and in many other ways acted inconsistently with the resolution. The contents of the report to the Commission on Human Rights by the Special Rapporteur on Iraq, Mr. Max van der Stoep, were, moreover, horrifying and revealed that Iraq was in serious breach of its human rights obligations under the Charter of the United Nations, international covenants on human rights and customary international law as embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The speaker stressed that neither the United Kingdom Government nor the Security Council had ever or now had a quarrel with the people of Iraq, who had suffered so much from the transgressions and miscalculations of their rulers; they remained committed to doing what they could to alleviate the suffering. To that end, sanctions on food had been lifted as soon as Kuwait had been liberated and, in September 1991, a scheme providing for fair and equitable arrangements for the export of Iraqi oil to finance the import of humanitarian supplies had been adopted. Iraq had, regrettably, refused to cooperate in the implementation of the scheme, set out in resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). It was therefore the intransigence of the Government of Iraq and not the action of the Security Council that was the cause of the suffering of the Iraqi people. The speaker concluded by reiterating that it was only through full compliance with all relevant Security Council resolutions that peace and stability could be brought again to the Gulf region. He hoped Iraq would heed the call to comply and would not miscalculate as it had done the year before.⁴²⁵

The representative of France stated that his country was dedicated to the complete and rigorous implementation of resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions, which imposed on the Government of Iraq clear and precise obligations. He reaffirmed that once Iraq abided by those resolutions, the sanctions regime could be lifted. Neither France nor the Security Council wished to starve the Iraqi civilian population in order to put pressure on its leaders. On the contrary, ways had been sought and found to feed the population, notably through the adoption of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which allowed Iraq to sell a certain quantity of its oil and to buy food and medicine. Deploring the fact that the Iraqi authorities had refused to make use of those resolutions, the speaker urgently called upon them to do so. The Government of Iraq would otherwise bear the sole responsibility for the suffering of its citizens, since it had the means to put an end to it. He said that France and the Council pursued two objectives, which had been laid down in resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991): to eliminate the weapons of mass destruction accumulated by Iraq and to ensure that Iraq's industrial capacity was not used to rebuild its military potential once that had been destroyed. Iraq was far from having fully implemented those resolutions, as evidenced by its failure to make full disclosure of its military programme and to commit itself unconditionally to comply with the two plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved by the Council. Those plans were legally binding, and it was unacceptable that Iraq had still not committed itself to their application. The speaker also noted other matters in the policies and practices of the Government of Iraq causing great concern, notably the blockade against Kurdistan and reports that the Government was trying to impose similar measures on certain areas in the south, while continuing to reject the presence of United Nations officials or members of humanitarian organizations. The Government's policy of repression, which deprived large sections of the Iraqi population of their fundamental rights, was a direct violation of resolution 688 (1991), to whose implementation France was also dedicated. The highly critical nature of the general human rights situation in Iraq, as highlighted in the recent report of the Special Rapporteur, was also of great concern. In that context, France could not accept an easing or lifting of sanctions. Nor did it accept the theory that if Iraq complied with a certain percentage of Security Council resolutions the Council must lift the sanctions by a similar proportion. In the first place, as long as Iraq hid documents and materials, on what basis could the Council make a finding of compliance? Moreover, a resolution was not divisible; it must be implemented in full, not according to the proportion that was to the liking of the Iraqi authorities. The speaker concluded by hoping that Iraq would understand that only a policy of cooperation with the United Nations could meet its national interests and the interests of its people. The only way for the Iraqi authorities to achieve their objective — the lifting of sanctions — was therefore fully and unconditionally to abide by their obligations.⁴²⁶

The representative of the United States remarked that during the past year no subject had preoccupied the Council more than its efforts to restore international peace and security in the Gulf in the aftermath of Iraq's aggression against Kuwait. By resolution 687 (1991), the Council had established a detailed framework for that purpose, which required Iraq to take precise steps on many issues and which had been accepted by Iraq. Adoption of that resolution had been one of the most important actions ever taken by the Council, responding to the hope of mankind to make the United Nations an instrument of peace and stability. That resolution had led to a number of others to implement its specific parts and spell out Iraq's obligations. The Council was meeting that day because its requirements had not been met. Unfortunately, from the beginning Iraq had tried to obfuscate and evade its obligations. The Council had agreed in resolution 687 (1991) that if the Gulf region was to enjoy peace and security, Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles had to be permanently eliminated. That required Iraq's cooperation. Iraq had failed, however, to make full and complete disclosure of its weapons programmes, without which the inspectors would never know if all such weapons had been located and destroyed. In the absence of full disclosure, one would have to conclude that the destruction could not categorically be proved to be complete. In the same sphere, Iraq had failed to destroy, as required, materiel and weapons production facilities designated by the Special Commission. The Council continued to support the proposition that the Special Commission, and not Iraq itself, must determine which facilities were required under Security Council resolutions to be destroyed. That was not a matter for negotiation, but for a final determination by the Special Commission, which must be observed by Iraq. Iraq had further failed to agree unconditionally, as required by resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), to implement the ongoing monitoring and verification plans. As the Council insisted on the necessity of assuring the international community that Iraq would not reacquire those destabilizing weapons, there was no alternative to Iraqi acceptance and implementation of those resolutions. The speaker added that Iraq also had a poor record of compliance with its other obligations under resolution 687 (1991): on border issues, the return of property, and the repatriation of third-country nationals. Like previous speakers, he observed that, although Iraq had repeatedly criticized the Council for causing shortages of food, medicine and other essential humanitarian supplies, it had not taken advantage of the mechanism provided by resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) to improve the welfare of the Iraqi population. Moreover, Baghdad persisted in actions of repression against its civilian population, particularly in the predominantly Kurdish-inhabited areas of the north and in the predominantly Shia-inhabited areas of the south, which had led the Special Rapporteur to conclude that the threat to international peace and security referred to in resolution 688 (1991) continued. In conclusion, as the President of the Council had stated in his opening statement, the Council demanded and expected Iraqi actions to comply with Council resolutions. Without full and unconditional compliance, the chances of lifting sanctions were nil. Once again, the Council stood at a critical junction in its consideration of restoring and maintaining international peace and security in the Gulf region. The United States Government and the Council would be watching closely Iraqi actions in the future. By disdaining and failing to comply with the Council's resolutions, Iraq risked making yet another tragic and fateful miscalculation, the full consequences of which the Government of Iraq would once again have to bear.⁴²⁷

The representative of the Russian Federation shared the view expressed by previous speakers that Iraq's refusal fully to abide by its obligations under the Council's resolutions had created a dangerous situation. Iraq had failed to satisfy the preliminary conditions for the implementation of the weapons-related provisions of the relevant resolutions. It had not provided the Special Commission and IAEA with a comprehensive, final and complete picture of all aspects of its proscribed weapons programmes; nor had it agreed unconditionally to implement all of its obligations under resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) regarding the programme of ongoing monitoring and verification of its renunciation of such weapons. At the same time, Iraq had created obstacles to the Special Commission's work, particularly in recently refusing to destroy, within the timetable laid down by the Commission, equipment relating to ballistic missiles. Paragraph 9 of resolution 687 (1991) clearly indicated that such equipment must be destroyed and that Iraqi attempts to dispute that demand were unacceptable. An unsatisfactory situation also existed concerning the implementation of other provisions of resolution 687 (1991), notably those regarding access to and the return of third-country nationals, the return of seized Kuwaiti property, and the repayment and servicing of the country's foreign debt. Another subject of particular concern was the repressive policy of the Iraqi authorities with regard to the civilian population of the country, in particular in those regions in which the Kurds lived and in the south of the country, in violation of the provisions of resolution 688 (1991). At the same time, the Government of Iraq had refused to avail itself of the opportunity provided by resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) to sell a certain quantity of its oil to finance the purchase of essential humanitarian goods. The Russian Federation thus expressed regret that, while refusing to proceed to a full and genuine implementation of the Council's decisions, the Iraqi regime should intensify the sufferings of the Iraqi people and block any mitigation of them. The speaker added that the report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights revealed a most disturbing situation in the field of human rights in Iraq, which had a direct bearing on the question of the implementation of resolution 688 (1991). The Special Rapporteur had come to the conclusion that the Government of Iraq was responsible for widespread and systematic violations of human rights of the most serious nature, namely, mass executions, torture and genocide. The Russian Federation was under the impression that Baghdad was still not fully aware of the seriousness of what Iraq had done. For the first time since the Second World War one State had occupied and annexed another sovereign State Member of the United Nations, violating its obligations under the Charter and the fundamental principles of international law. Moreover, Iraq had drawn up and was beginning to implement a programme for the production of nuclear weapons; it was making preparations to manufacture biological weapons; and it had threatened to use chemical weapons, which it had used in the past, thus making the threats particularly ominous. In response, the Security Council had drawn up and reaffirmed a programme of measures aimed at halting those actions, which were most threatening to international peace and security, and at preventing their recurrence. The vital interests of all Member States demanded an immediate and unconditional implementation of that programme. In conclusion, the speaker stressed that instead of confrontation with the Council, Iraq must immediately and fully implement all of the Council's demands.⁴²⁸

The representative of China welcomed the opportunity for the Council to have a dialogue with the Iraqi delegation, hoping it would help to realize the objectives contained in the relevant Security Council resolutions. China, like other members of the Council, was of the view that the resolutions adopted by the Council remained essential to the restoration of peace and stability in the Gulf region and must be fully implemented. The speaker was pleased to note, as pointed out by the Secretary-General in his report, that significant progress had been made in the implementation of some of the important parts of the resolutions. However, since much remained to be done, he hoped that Iraq would continue to cooperate with the parties concerned and earnestly fulfil its obligations. At the same time, China was concerned that the difficult situation confronting the innocent Iraqi people continued to deteriorate; it was not fair to prolong their suffering and hardship. China's position in this respect remained unchanged from that enunciated at the time of the adoption of resolution 687 (1991): it favoured the timely and gradual lifting of economic sanctions against Iraq in the light of the development of the situation. It was out of humanitarian considerations, moreover, that China had supported the reasonable proposal — put forward by the non-aligned States members of the Council in the Committee established by Security Council resolution 661 (1990) — that the “no objection” procedure should be changed to a “simple notification” procedure in allowing Iraq to import civilian products. That would help to alleviate the difficulties of the Iraqi people and be conducive to an early economic recovery in the countries of the region. The speaker concluded by expressing the hope that the meeting would have a positive impact on the implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions, so that the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Gulf countries would be safeguarded and respected by the international community.⁴²⁹

The representative of Japan observed that the tragic consequences of Iraq's actions continued to be felt, with the people of Kuwait continuing to suffer from the effects of Iraq's aggression in terms of human lives lost, material destruction and environmental degradation. As they strove to rebuild their lives and their country, Iraq's responsibility for their suffering was not forgotten and the Iraqi leadership was held accountable for the consequences of its aggression. In refusing to cooperate with the Council and to respect its resolutions, the Government of Iraq was demonstrating its defiance not only of the Council but also of the international community as a whole. Iraq's leaders must realize that they were not in a position to decide which provisions they would implement and which ones they would not. There was no room for negotiation. Like previous speakers, the representative of Japan also expressed concern for the innocent people of Iraq as they continued to face severe hardship: they must also be counted among the victims of their Government's aggressive actions and its refusal to implement the Council's resolutions. However, he noted that by refusing to export oil as laid out by the Council and by creating obstacles to the activities of various humanitarian agencies, the Government of Iraq was denying its own people access to the humanitarian relief that had been made available. Japan once again urged Iraq to implement all relevant Security Council resolutions, noting that the Council had already made known its position: namely, that if Iraq continued to be in material breach of its obligations, that would have serious consequences.⁴³⁰

The representative of Hungary similarly stressed that the Council's resolutions in this matter could not be viewed as a basis for negotiation. Moreover, as the President's statement at the end of the Council's meeting at the level of Heads of State and Government in January had reaffirmed, they must be implemented in full. While Hungary believed that dialogue was useful to clarify differences in points of view and eliminate possible misunderstandings, it stressed that the current dialogue between the Council and Iraq could not be a free-ranging discussion: its sole subject must be the implementation by Iraq of the relevant Council resolutions. The speaker deplored the fact that Iraq had not yet fully complied with those resolutions, citing as cause for concern the same deficiencies that had been mentioned by previous speakers. He concluded that his country believed that the only way that the sanctions imposed on Iraq could be loosened would be for Iraq to implement the Council's resolutions in full, adding that Iraq must be aware of the serious consequences of continuing its serious derelictions in this area.⁴³¹

The representative of India stated that one basic premise of the Council's meeting was the importance of respect for and full implementation of Council resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter on the issue under consideration. All countries, including Iraq which had expressly accepted resolution 687 (1991), the basic document, assumed the responsibility to comply with and implement those decisions. Noting that the Council had before it the Secretary-General's reports of 25 January and 7 March 1992 on the extent of Iraq's compliance with the obligations placed upon it by the relevant Council resolutions,⁴³² the speaker said that those detailed and informative reports were the only basis on which the Council could and should conduct its work. His delegation had taken note of the Secretary-General's assessment that significant progress had been achieved in respect of section C of resolution 687 (1991), but that much remained to be done. What remained must also be implemented. The necessity of compliance with all mandatory provisions of the resolutions, which were inherently integral, had been underlined by the Council on numerous occasions. A second premise of the meeting, in India's view, should be the need for a humanitarian approach. The Council was aware of the hardships suffered by innocent civilians in Iraq, but there had been meagre progress in that area; it had yet to accept formally the proposal of the non-aligned members that items of undeniable humanitarian need be transferred from the "no objection" procedure to the "notification" category. Another important issue in addressing the humanitarian aspects of this crisis — or indeed any other crisis that invoked Security Council action under Chapter VII of the Charter — was the operation of Article 50 of the Charter. India had, on several occasions, reiterated the need to strengthen the overall impact and influence of Council action by the activation, in concrete terms, of Article 50, enabling countries that faithfully implemented Council resolutions to obtain redress wherever such implementation adversely affected them.⁴³³

During the course of the debate, a number of other speakers stated that for the Council to remain credible it must see that Iraq strictly respected its obligations.⁴³⁴ They called upon Iraq to fulfil unconditionally the decisions of the Council, which had been reiterated by the President and by previous speakers. Like others, they also expressed concern at the humanitarian and human rights situation in the country.

The representative of Iraq remarked that this was his country's first opportunity at that level to submit its point of view before the Council in respect of the latter's dealings with Iraq. He stated that resolution 687 (1991), in which the Council had formulated the measures necessary for an official ceasefire to be declared, set out measures and conditions that were unprecedented in United Nations history: they transcended by a large degree the initial limits and declared objectives of the Council's previous resolutions. Iraq had expressed its views on that resolution, but had accepted it to ward off the dangers threatening its people and had seriously endeavoured to implement its provisions. Indeed, as the letter dated 23 January 1992 from the Iraqi Minister for Foreign Affairs made clear, the fundamental contents of the resolution had already been implemented. Focusing on aspects that had been the source of problems and allegations against Iraq, the speaker stated that the weapons, munitions and delivery systems prohibited by resolution 687 (1991) had been or were being destroyed. Moreover, the equipment used, or allegedly used, in producing such items had been identified and its use had either been frozen or converted to civilian industries not prohibited by that resolution. All this was taking place under the supervision of the inspection teams. The allegations regarding the detention of Kuwaiti nationals were false, and Iraq had requested the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to determine the facts. So, too, were the allegations regarding Kuwaiti property: that had been listed and in many cases returned. The speaker reaffirmed that Iraq had fulfilled the most fundamental part of sections A, B, D and H of resolution 687 (1991). The implementation of the remaining measures, which by their nature required some time, was proceeding properly, with Iraq's serious and professional cooperation. Yet the Council had continued to declare, after each compliance review since June 1991, that Iraq had not yet fully complied with resolution 687 (1991), which meant that the economic embargo remained in force and the suffering of 18 million Iraqis continued unmitigated. The extent of Iraq's fulfilment of that resolution had been ignored under pressure from a small but influential number of members of the Security Council. Those countries had not stopped at Iraq's compliance with resolution 687 (1991) as a condition for lifting the economic sanctions, but had announced that they would not be prepared to lift the embargo until the political leadership of Iraq had been replaced. They continued to reiterate that precondition, despite its flagrant contradiction of the principles of the Charter and the Council's own resolutions. The problems created by certain members of the inspection teams who served the objectives of those countries had, moreover, been exploited to adopt new Council resolutions containing provisions even more extreme than those in resolution 687 (1991).

The representative of Iraq expressed his country's willingness to cooperate in connection with a number of issues that had been raised, particularly in the presidential statement of 28 February, while underlying the need for respect for Iraqi sovereignty, dignity and national security. It was ready to continue cooperating with the Special Commission and IAEA to accomplish the tasks stipulated in resolution 687 (1991); to continue providing information to complete the picture in accordance with the goals of that resolution; to reach a practical solution to the question of verification of Iraq's capabilities to produce prohibited weapons in the future; and to establish a practical mechanism to address the issue of the equipment covered by the provisions of paragraph 8 of resolution 687 (1991), with a view to rendering that equipment harmless. On the question of completing the information and data, about which doubts and allegations continued to be expressed, Iraq proposed that a technical meeting be held between Iraqi representatives and representatives of the Special Commission, and attended by all members of the Security Council. At that meeting, the Commission could put its demands and questions relating to resolution 687 (1991), and the information and documentation presented by Iraq could be reviewed. A comprehensive report on the situation could then be submitted to the Council. By those means, the Council's demand for a full, complete and final declaration of the programmes in question would be met in a scientific, objective and reliable manner. The speaker also proposed a "common" discussion to resolve the issues of ongoing monitoring and the fate of machinery and equipment capable of dual use. Noting that the Council had entrusted certain tasks to the Special Commission, he insisted that those tasks should remain technical in nature. The Council should not relinquish its authority in taking the final decision on matters of a political and legal nature relating to the destiny of a free people and the fate of their property. Keeping matters vague and unresolved, and preserving for the Special Commission alone the absolute power of issuing decisions, meant that the fate of property belonging to the Iraqi people would remain indefinitely in the hands of a body that did not exist under the Charter, without allowing Iraq any say in the matter. The speaker added that the Council's understanding of the principles and the legitimate and logical demands presented by Iraq would lead to an "objective, equitable and just implementation" of the substantive obligations placed upon Iraq in resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), in a manner which would satisfy the Council.

Finally, on the subject of the economic embargo, the representative of Iraq reiterated that, despite the extent of Iraq's implementation of the provisions of resolution 687 (1991), the Council had not budged an inch in its position. Nor had the Council taken into consideration adherence to the Charter and international law in respect of the rights of the civilian population. Thirteen months after the establishment of the ceasefire and the adoption of resolution 660 (1991) imposing the economic embargo, the people of Iraq remained deprived of their right to lead a normal life and had to import all their humanitarian needs. Although, in theory, Iraq was allowed to import food and medicine, its assets in other countries continued to be frozen. Moreover, when the Council adopted a resolution allowing Iraq to export limited quantities of oil in order to be able to pay for food and medicine, it had included, both in the resolution itself and in the implementation plan, an endless list of preconditions which infringed upon Iraq's sovereignty and security: preconditions which constituted flagrant interference in its internal affairs, and which stemmed from ill-intended political objectives. The preconditions had practically prevented Iraq from meeting its people's need for food and medicine. The speaker called upon the Council to abandon that position in favour of an objective and fair one. In concluding, he requested the President of the Council to allow him some time, perhaps at a meeting the next day, to comment on the points raised in the statement made by the President and on the concerns expressed by several members.⁴³⁵

The President then stated that the meeting would, as agreed, be suspended until later that afternoon when other speakers would make statements. The Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq would have an opportunity to make a statement either at the end of that meeting or the next morning. Before suspending the meeting, the President invited the members to assemble for informal consultations shortly before the meeting resumed.

At the resumed 3059th meeting, also on 11 March 1992, Mr. Hans Blix, Director General of IAEA, focused on the Agency's work in the three areas of its mandate: the mapping of nuclear programmes and facilities in Iraq intended, or susceptible of being used, for the production of nuclear weapons or weapon-usable materials; the removal, destruction or rendering harmless of proscribed items; and the planning and performance of ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with the Council's resolutions in the nuclear sphere. Considerable work had been accomplished, which would not have been possible without Iraq's cooperation. However, the results would have come sooner and with much less pain if Iraq had fully and spontaneously complied with its obligations under the Council's resolutions and the exchange of letters with the Secretary-General. Instead, Iraq had often followed a pattern of denial of clandestine activities until the evidence was overwhelming, followed by cooperation until the next case of concealment was revealed. In a number of cases serious confrontations had occurred when IAEA inspection teams had been denied unrestricted access to sites or the removal of pertinent documents. In the face of those attitudes, IAEA could not have carried out the inspection programme and the mapping of the Iraqi nuclear programme but for the firm and consistent support of the Security Council. The current meeting of the Council was testimony to the continuation of that support in view of concrete difficulties which the Special Commission and IAEA were encountering. After 10 months of work in the identification and mapping of Iraq's extensive efforts to acquire nuclear-weapon capability, a fairly consistent and coherent picture of its nuclear programme was emerging. However, some gaps or grey areas remained. In view of those and Iraq's track record of non-revelation, inspections needed to continue and might even be necessary as future monitoring and verification began. A general shortcoming in Iraq's attitude had been the lack of full and explicit acceptance of resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), which the speaker considered to be an expression not only of reluctance but of resistance, which was incompatible with the binding nature of those resolutions. The Security Council's insistence on this matter was important, both as a question of its authority and as a matter that underlay the many specific points of non-compliance that had been noted by IAEA.⁴³⁶ While IAEA had noted some improvements in the attitudes of the Iraqi authorities during recent inspections, lack of cooperation and non-compliance persisted in respect of the provision of information on sources of procurement of critical material and equipment. Further, the initial information needed to establish the future ongoing plan for monitoring and verification, required to be supplied by Iraq under resolution 715 (1991), had been provided only in a partial and incomplete way. A statement by Iraq of its readiness to provide procurement information and to complete the information required under resolution 705 (1991) would eliminate important hurdles.

⁴³⁵ Ibid., pp. 91-115.

⁴³⁶ A detailed list of such points was set out by IAEA in documents S/23514 and S/23687.

As to the removal, destruction or rendering harmless of proscribed nuclear items, the Director General of IAEA stated that large facilities and amounts of equipment required for the production of nuclear weapons and nuclear-weapon-usable material had been destroyed, removed or rendered harmless. New facilities could not easily be built without detection, and the import or production of new relevant equipment would meet great obstacles. Dual-use items were being placed under Agency seal and their destruction or release was being dealt with on a case-by-case basis. Release of such items, and any request for the use of proscribed facilities in non-proscribed activities would have to be evaluated in the light of the possibility of effective monitoring of agreed-upon use. Although the Agency had not so far met with resistance by Iraq to its request for destruction, removal or rendering harmless of proscribed nuclear items, it was aware that the Special Commission had encountered such resistance. The Security Council's support for the authority of the Special Commission and IAEA to determine what was to be destroyed, removed or rendered harmless and Iraq's corresponding duty to accept and to implement such requests was, therefore, much appreciated. The speaker added that what remained in Iraq was a large cadre of highly trained scientists and engineers who had been engaged in its nuclear programme. It was important that that cadre, reportedly currently engaged in the civilian reconstruction of the country, remain engaged in non-proscribed activities. In conclusion, the speaker stated that it was essential that the measures prescribed by the Council for Iraq succeed — not only to allay fears about Iraq reviving a programme of weapons of mass destruction, notably nuclear weapons, but also to demonstrate that international verification was a viable means to create confidence. That experience was necessary if actions taken in Iraq were to represent steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free of weapons of mass destruction, as envisaged in paragraph 14 of resolution 687 (1991). The International Atomic Energy Agency was committed to the successful implementation of the Council's resolutions on Iraq and looked to the Security Council for guidance and support in its efforts to contribute to that result.⁴³⁷

Mr. Rolf Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, stated that the Commission had one fundamental aim — to be able to report to the Security Council as soon as possible that Iraq had fully met all its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) as elaborated upon in resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). However, the speed with which the Commission could carry out its responsibilities and report the successful execution of its task was largely determined by the degree of Iraq's cooperation, openness and transparency. With regard to the disclosure of all aspects of its prohibited programmes, Iraq had provided some information, but it was neither complete nor systematic. Nor was it accompanied by credible documentary and material evidence. In brief, Iraq had not provided the full, final and complete disclosure as required by resolution 707 (1991). Indeed, it had not even acknowledged that resolution. Instead of making such disclosure, Iraq had proposed a dialogue in which the Commission would seek to elicit the information from Iraq through an inquisitorial approach, thus shifting the onus of seeking and compiling the information to the Commission whereas the Council's decisions properly placed that onus on Iraq. With respect to the Commission's responsibility for the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of Iraq's weapons and capabilities in the proscribed areas, the speaker stated that the destruction of weapons already declared by Iraq was under way with Iraqi cooperation, and that cooperation had been good. However, the disposal of the capabilities for the production of such weapons was another matter. Although Iraq was required to destroy, under the supervision of the Special Commission, all its proscribed missile capabilities, it had recently refused to proceed with the destruction of certain missile-producing capabilities identified for destruction by the Commission. Iraq was continuing to refuse to comply with the Commission's decision despite the presidential statement of 28 February 1992, which had clearly reaffirmed that it was for the Special Commission alone to determine which items had to be destroyed under paragraph 9 of resolution 687 (1991). Iraq had argued, moreover, that nearly every building and every piece of equipment that had been devoted to its proscribed-weapons programmes should be kept and converted to what it had said would be civilian use, contending that otherwise the Special Commission would be depriving the country of its civilian industrial base. The speaker rejected this argument: not a single structure or item which had or would be earmarked for destruction had formed part of Iraq's civilian industrial base. The Special Commission would be failing in its responsibility to the Council if it did not ensure that items used by Iraq for production of weapons of mass destruction were destroyed, removed or rendered harmless. The latter would involve modifying the items to such a degree as to render them incapable of use by Iraq in prohibited activities or amenable to reconversion.

As to the third stage of the Commission's responsibilities — the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) — the existence of an impasse was now amply confirmed. By its resolution 707 (1991), the Council had approved the plans for monitoring and verification submitted by the Secretary-General and by the then Director General of IAEA. In January 1992, Iraq had reaffirmed its position that the plans were aimed at objectives that were incompatible with the letter and spirit of the Charter, the norms of international law, and international and humanitarian pacts and covenants. Although Iraq had recently claimed that this did not amount to a rejection of the plans, the Commission could not understand it otherwise. Iraq's rejection was confirmed, moreover, by its failure to submit two declarations required under the Commission's plans, which would provide the basic information needed to set up a satisfactory monitoring regime. Iraq had argued that the plans infringed upon its independence, sovereignty and national security. However, they had been formulated on the basis of existing international norms and those under negotiation for the forthcoming international convention on the elimination of chemical weapons, which was intended to have universal application. To the extent that general provisions in the plans appeared intrusive, that was largely a result of Iraq's conduct: the intrusive elements had been approved by the Council against a background of concealment, movement of proscribed items and violation of the privileges and immunities of inspection teams. If Iraq cooperated, they need not be invoked. The speaker added that prompt and successful implementation of all the stages of the work of the Special Commission and IAEA required that their facilities, privileges and immunities be fully respected. That flowed from the Council's resolutions, relevant international conventions to which Iraq was a party, and from the express provisions of the status agreement between the United Nations and Iraq which had entered into force on 14 May 1991. He concluded that, in the absence of the undertaking by Iraq to comply fully with the Council's decisions, and until practical experience was gained to confirm that such an undertaking was being honoured, the Special Commission would be seriously hindered in those phases of its operations concerning the identification and destruction of proscribed items and would be precluded from instituting the ongoing monitoring and verification phase. In such a situation, the possibility of the Special Commission's certifying Iraq's compliance with its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) did not even arise.⁴³⁸

At the same meeting, the representative of Kuwait observed that his country was the main beneficiary of rights enshrined in the operative paragraphs of resolution 687 (1991), implementation of which rested upon the Iraqi regime. With regard to the general nature of that resolution and Iraq's obligations, he made the following points. Resolution 687 (1991) was binding on Iraq for two reasons. First, it had been adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter and therefore was binding not only on Iraq, as a main party, but also on all other countries. Secondly, the Iraqi legislature, the National Assembly, had accepted the resolution unconditionally, thus negating all reservations and remarks made by Iraq in its preliminary letter of acceptance, which the Council had rejected. Iraq had, accordingly, become absolutely bound to implement resolution 687 (1991), without any negotiation concerning its provisions or any interpretation of them by Iraq. Implementation was to be in accordance with the interpretations, mechanisms and reports prepared by the Secretary-General and approved by the Council. Iraq's conduct in regard to the operative paragraphs of resolution 687 (1991) demonstrated, however, that it had reneged on its absolute acceptance of the resolution and was attempting to evade its obligations. By way of example, the speaker elaborated on Iraq's lack of compliance with the provisions of resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991) relevant to Kuwait regarding the repatriation of prisoners of war and missing persons who were Kuwaiti or third-country nationals; the demarcation of the boundary between ⁴³⁸ Ibid., pp. 126-137.

Iraq and Kuwait; and the return of stolen Kuwaiti property. The speaker added that other conduct by Iraq demonstrated its lack of seriousness regarding the letter and spirit of those resolutions. The continued presence of the seven Iraqi police posts inside Kuwaiti territory represented a violation by Iraq of Kuwait's sovereignty and territorial integrity. Iraq continued to reject, moreover, resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), authorizing the export of Iraqi oil to finance the purchase of humanitarian goods and to pay its contribution to the compensation fund. That intransigence on the part of Iraq was harmful both to the Iraqi people and to those large numbers of people affected by the Iraqi invasion of and aggression against Kuwait who would benefit from the compensation fund. Finally, the most blatant example of Iraq's violation of the Council's resolutions was the fact that it declined to reveal and destroy all stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction and accept the monitoring regime. The speaker concluded that Iraq's failure to meet its obligations created a grave situation which implied two risks: the continued aggressive intentions of that regime towards its neighbours and towards security and peace in the region; and the intent to make use of such capabilities if they escaped destruction. At the current meeting, the Council was called upon, in the presence of the high-level Iraqi delegation, to guarantee that peace and security in the area were not obstructed by the capricious, aggressive nature of the Iraqi regime.⁴³⁹

The President of the Council then announced a period set aside for directing questions at the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq who, in accordance with his request, would deal with them at the meeting the next morning.⁴⁴⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom sought clarification of the nature and scope of the four points made by the Deputy Prime Minister concerning Iraq's willingness to cooperate with the Special Commission and IAEA: were those undertakings entirely unqualified and unconditional; and did its readiness to reach a practical mechanism regarding the issue of equipment covered by paragraph 8 of resolution 687 (1991) — which referred to chemical and biological weapons and ballistic weapons — relate also to nuclear matters, which were dealt with in paragraph 12. He also addressed the ideas put forward by the Deputy Prime Minister for involving the Security Council in discussions about the handling of weapons of mass destruction. On this, the President's introductory statement and the presidential statement of 28 February had made it clear that the view of the Council was that it was not its business to get involved in the detailed decisions that had to be taken by the Special Commission and IAEA. The speaker sought Iraq's assurance that if certain determinations and decisions were taken by those bodies, Iraq would accept them as fully binding and would implement them. That was very important for the Council to know. Outside the scope of the weapons of mass destruction section of resolution 687 (1991), the speaker asked whether, if the Council renewed resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), the Government of Iraq would be prepared to resume the contacts with the Secretariat with a view to implementing a scheme which would enable humanitarian supplies to reach the people of Iraq. Finally, he expressed regret that the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq had not addressed his country's obligations under resolution 688 (1991), and asked when the Government of Iraq intended to lift the economic blockade on a part of its country so that any humanitarian supplies which were sent by the United Nations agencies or others would be able to reach all parts of the Iraqi population.⁴⁴¹

The representative of the United States prefaced his questions with some comments on the statement by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq. He observed that the statement appeared to be directed towards trying to destroy, at least in part, the confidence of the Security Council in the Special Commission and IAEA and their work. In several areas it suggested that the Council now had to put itself into the process of actually implementing its own resolutions. Even worse, perhaps, it suggested that the Council should enter into a negotiating process with Iraq for the implementation of what were mandatory resolutions of the Council. This perhaps reflected a continued fundamental misunderstanding on the part of Iraq about mandatory resolutions and a serious miscalculation of the intention and purpose of the Council in dealing with Iraq's programmes of weapons of mass destruction in particular. Iraq suggested that it would be ready to negotiate what it would declare under resolution 687 (1991), and which elements of its prohibited weapons programmes it would be willing to destroy. The former was obligatory under the resolution; the latter ignored the firm position of the Council that the Special Commission and IAEA would be the technical mechanism for the designation of what should be destroyed, rendered harmless or removed in the Iraqi programme and in its production base. Roughly the same proposal had been made in the Iraqi statement with respect to the issue of long-term monitoring. Again, long-term monitoring plans presented by the Council to Iraq and approved in mandatory resolutions were clearly not subject to negotiation. The speaker stressed that a drawn-out discussion and negotiation of compliance with resolutions was not in the interest of regional peace and stability. Nor was it the intention of the members of the Council or provided for in the resolutions with which Iraq must comply. Other portions of the Iraqi statement seemed merely to repeat the old arguments of the past. There was little that was new and it did not serve to advance the process of Iraqi compliance, which was deeply disappointing. The United States was also disappointed, as were others, at the absence of any references in the statement to resolution 688 (1991), or to the important United Nations role in providing humanitarian assistance to the citizens of Iraq, or any discussion of what Iraq would do to alleviate the plight particularly of the Kurds and the Shia. On the other hand, the speaker responded positively to the Iraqi promise to publish the names of missing persons in several Iraqi newspapers once a week for a period of several weeks, which appeared to break new ground. He observed, finally, that Iraq had made frequent references to its sovereignty and to internal affairs. However, Iraq knew full well that the Council was operating with regard to its resolutions on Iraq under Chapter VII of the Charter. Such resolutions were mandatory and fell under the last portion of paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter, which made it clear that the principle of non-intervention “shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII”. The measures that Iraq complained of were clearly enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

The representative of the United States then addressed a few questions to the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq. They concerned the readiness of Iraq: (1) to make full, final and complete disclosure of its programmes of weapons of mass destruction; (2) to commence destruction of its ballistic missile production and repair facilities; (3) to return to IAEA

the nuclear documents seized from and never returned to a Special Commission inspection team; (4) to provide unconditional acceptance of the long-term monitoring and verification plans, and to observe the privileges and immunities to be accorded to the Special Commission and IAEA; (5) to accept the work of the Boundary Commission and to remove its border police posts from the Kuwaiti side of the border on the map used by the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission; (6) to resolve the matter of the missing Kuwaitis and third-country nationals; (7) to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people by implementing resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991); (8) to return seized Kuwaiti property; and (9) to begin providing the Secretary-General and appropriate international organizations with monthly statements of its gold and foreign currency reserves.⁴⁴²

The representative of India, focusing on an issue of humanitarian concern raised by members of the Council, asked the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq to confirm that Iraq would be able in the near future to expedite the full repatriation of Kuwaiti and other foreign nationals in cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross.⁴⁴³

The representative of France stated that his delegation found the comments made by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq unacceptable as they challenged the resolutions of the Council and the mechanisms laid down and endorsed in them. He posed three questions concerning when Iraq would be able to provide a full and complete picture of its military programme; when it would make known to the Council its unconditional acceptance of the monitoring plan approved under resolution 715 (1991); and when it would open the United Nations humanitarian centres in Kurdistan and in the south of the country, and lift the blockade it had imposed on part of its population.⁴⁴⁴

The President thereupon suspended the meeting until the following day.

Decision of 12 March 1992 (3059th meeting):
statement by the President

At the second resumption of the 3059th meeting, on 12 March 1992, the President stated that, in accordance with the request made by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, the latter was being afforded the opportunity to make a statement in response to the introductory statement made by the President on behalf of the Council and to the questions and concerns expressed by the members in the course of the Council's deliberations the previous day.⁴⁴⁵

The representative of Iraq, commenting first on the statement by the President, observed that regarding respect for the international boundary, there was no fundamental problem. There was a minor problem: the withdrawal of five Iraqi police posts, which Iraq had asked be deferred until the demarcation of the boundary had been completed. On the weapons-related obligations, he reaffirmed that all weapons prohibited under resolution 687 (1991) and their subsystems had been destroyed. As to disclosure, Iraq was ready to make full, comprehensive and final declarations of all weapons programmes specified in that resolution. It was ready immediately to begin detailed technical meetings with the Special Commission and IAEA with a view to providing a complete picture, provided that the Council defined a limited time frame for that task. With regard to the "destruction ... or rendering harmless" of the relevant equipment, Iraq was committed to the provisions of resolution 687 (1991) as they stood. The speaker reiterated, however, that the current interpretation of this subject was not in line with the text of the resolution. Destruction had to be limited to equipment that could be used only in the production of prohibited weapons. He called on the Council to meet Iraq's legitimate request with respect to equipment that could be used for civilian purposes or other non-prohibited purposes: namely, that such equipment be rendered harmless or converted to non-prohibited purposes, and that provision be made to verify such use. With respect to verification, Iraq, through its acceptance of resolution 687 (1991), had accepted the principle of future verification of compliance. However, the speaker reaffirmed that Iraq's national sovereignty and territorial integrity must be respected, and asked the Security Council to guarantee those principles. His delegation was ready to engage in a constructive dialogue with the Special Commission and IAEA with a view to providing the information that had been requested and agreeing on practical arrangements falling within the framework of the mandate and objectives defined by the Council — but not going beyond them to serve either political or intelligence purposes. On the matter of detainees, the speaker stated that the competent Iraqi authorities were ready to take all necessary measures to publish in Iraqi newspapers the names of the missing third-country nationals and to arrange for visits by ICRC representatives to prisons and detention camps. As to the question of its liability under international law, Iraq had accepted the resolutions imposing such liability; it insisted, however, that compensation should be based on international legal provisions, which called for justice and fairness. With regard to its obligation regarding debts and interest, Iraq declared that it respected its obligations, but could not meet them if the embargo were not lifted and it could not export its oil and recover its normal economic situation. As to the return of property, the speaker referred to a point made in the President's introductory statement, in which the members of the Council had noted with satisfaction that, as stated in the further report of the Secretary-General, Iraqi officials had extended maximum cooperation to the United Nations to facilitate the return.

On the question of Iraq's exporting oil to meet the basic humanitarian needs of its people, the speaker recalled that he had proposed a practical way to dispel suspicions that Iraq might use the proceeds for other purposes: Iraq would sell oil to Council members and confine its own purchases to the permanent members of the Council so that they could determine how the revenues were spent. Unfortunately, the regime laid out in resolution 706 (1991), adopted under Chapter VII, had political implications that would lead to interference in Iraq's internal affairs. However, if the Council remained prepared to look into this question, Iraq remained willing to respond. It was ready to resume talks with the Secretariat to work out practical arrangements monitored by the United Nations. The speaker hoped in this regard that the Council would not renew resolution 706 (1991), and that it would be able to separate this operation from any new resolution. Including it in a Council resolution was impractical as problems might be encountered in implementing the machinery: such problems could be dealt with through a dialogue with the Secretariat rather than returning once again to the Council, where there was a risk of running into complications involving another resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter.

As to resolution 688 (1991), Iraq still considered it to be a blatant interference in its internal affairs. The Iraqi authorities had, nevertheless, cooperated with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General coordinating international relief efforts, with whom they had signed a memorandum of understanding, and with all the international agencies and organizations extending assistance to the Iraqi people throughout the country. With regard to the Kurds, a dialogue with the Kurdistan Front had resulted in a new formula for autonomy for the Kurds in Iraq, but it was ultimately not accepted by the Front. Subsequent acts of destruction and sabotage against Government authorities in the northern governorates had made it imperative for the Government to withdraw the administrative apparatus from that area, which was controlled by Kurdish parties. It was they — not the central Government — who bore responsibility for the distribution of supplies. There was no blockade of these governorates, only precautionary measures in the form of checkpoints to prevent smuggling into other countries. The speaker also denied that there was any persecution of the Shiites in Iraq. Concerning the reference to terrorism, he recalled that Iraq had affirmed its commitment in that respect. Finally, in relation to the President's statement, he requested that Iraq be allowed to appear before the Council every two months to take part in its review of the country's compliance with the Council's resolutions, in order to have the opportunity to explain its position. Touching briefly on the questions that had been asked by Council members, the speaker noted that most of them had been dealt with in his two statements.⁴⁴⁶

The representative of the United States stated that much of what they had just heard was a repetition of what had been said before, though he welcomed the reopening of contacts between Iraq and the Secretariat — previously terminated by Iraq — on the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991). Once again, the Council had heard that Iraq wished to meet and negotiate its commitments under resolution 687 (1991). And, once again, there was broad and general acceptance of a resolution, but with all kinds of new provisos, reservations, preconditions and so forth. The speaker reminded the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq that these were mandatory resolutions, which must be complied with in full, and that there had been a long period of 11 months during which extensive discussions had been held with the Special Commission and IAEA — all of which had made it clear what was required. It was for Iraq to cooperate in making full and complete disclosure about its weapons-of-mass-destruction programmes, and in the destruction of those programmes. The United States would have liked, moreover, to hear a full and clear commitment on Iraq's part to accept the long-term monitoring programme and to comply with it. The speaker was left with the unfortunate conclusion that, with respect not only to weapons of mass destruction, but to all the other elements of the resolution, including the very important humanitarian ones, the Council was once again in a cat-and-mouse game: there was every willingness to discuss at great length but no willingness to accept the need for compliance, much less to begin the actions to comply. That was unfortunate. It was a miscalculation which he hoped would not continue.⁴⁴⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom considered that the exchange had shown that the problems of compliance would never be resolved by words: they would have to be resolved by deeds. In so far as the Deputy Prime Minister had shown some willingness on one or two points to indicate a shift in the position of his Government, that would have to be put to the test — in the work that now had to continue to be done by IAEA and the Special Commission, in the work being done by ICRC, and in the work done by the Secretary-General in the humanitarian area and in the implementation of resolution 688 (1991) — to see whether it resulted in compliance.⁴⁴⁸

The President, with the concurrence of the members of the Council, then once again suspended the meeting and invited the members to join him immediately for consultations.

Following consultations among the members of the Council, the President made the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁴⁹

In concluding the present stage of the consideration of the item on the agenda, I have been authorized, following consultations among members of the Council, to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:

The views of the Council having been expressed through its President and by the statements of its members on the extent of compliance by the Government of Iraq with its obligations under the relevant Security Council resolutions, the Council has listened with close attention to the statement by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and his responses to the questions posed by Council members.

The members of the Council wish to reiterate their full support for the following statement, made by the President of the Security Council on their behalf at the opening of the 3059th meeting.

In the view of the Council, the Government of Iraq has not yet complied fully and unconditionally with those obligations, must do so and must immediately take the appropriate actions in this regard. It hopes that the goodwill expressed by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq will be matched by deeds.

adjournment of the meeting

By letters dated 7 August 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁵⁰ the representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States requested an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider further the continuing repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, which threatened international peace and security in the region, and the failure of the Government of Iraq to cooperate under resolution 688 (1991).

At its 3105th meeting, on 11 August 1992, the Security Council included the four above-mentioned letters in its agenda and invited the representative of Iraq, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The President (China) also drew attention to the requests contained in the four letters that the Council should extend an invitation to Mr. van der Stoel, in his personal capacity, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. The representatives of India, Ecuador and Zimbabwe, and the President, in his capacity as the representative of China, expressed reservations about such an invitation, on the grounds that the competence of the Council was to deal with matters bearing upon international peace and security and that matters relating to human rights ought to be dealt with by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council or the Commission on Human Rights. However, they noted that the invitation to Mr. van der Stoel was being extended strictly in his personal capacity and not in his capacity as Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on Iraq. Moreover, it fell within the scope of resolution 688 (1991) and should be understood to reflect all the limitations inherent in that resolution itself.⁴⁵¹ The President stated that those observations would be reflected in the records of the Security Council. In the absence of any objections, the Council agreed to extend an invitation under rule 39 to Mr. van der Stoel.

The President then drew the attention of the Council members to several other documents.⁴⁵² These included a letter dated 3 August 1992 from the representative of Belgium addressed to the President of the Council,⁴⁵³ transmitting part I of an interim report on the situation of human rights in Iraq prepared by ⁴⁵² Letter dated 3 August 1992 from the representative of Belgium to the President of the Security Council (S/24386); letter dated 6 August 1992 from the representative of Iraq to the Secretary-General (S/24388); and letter dated 10 August 1992 from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the Secretary-General (S/24414).

Mr. van der Stoel. The report focused in particular on the situation in the southern marshes, whose civilian population was being subjected to military attacks, forced relocations and an internal economic blockade by the Government of Iraq. It also elaborated on a previous recommendation that human rights monitors should be sent to all parts of Iraq to assess the Government's compliance with resolution 688 (1991).⁴⁵⁴ The documents also included a letter dated 10 August 1992 from the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran addressed to the Secretary-General, observing, inter alia, that "The campaign of total annihilation of large segments of the Iraqi population, which has recently been intensely escalated in the southern marshlands of Iraq against the mostly Shiite inhabitants ..., can lead to conditions similar to those in the spring of 1991, threatening regional and international peace and security".⁴⁵⁵

Mr. van der Stoel stated that the Ministry of Health of Iraq had provided him with information that suggested that the health of the Iraqi population was rapidly deteriorating. Large parts of the population, moreover, could not afford the high prices for adequate food. This underlined the need for a quick breakthrough in the negotiations on the implementation — on the basis of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) — of the so-called "food for oil" formula, which could bring about a rapid improvement in the nutritional situation. There was also an increased need for uninterrupted international humanitarian assistance. Against that background, he expressed alarm that the humanitarian aid programme in Iraq was grinding to a halt. Refusals to grant and renew visas rapidly, travel and fuel restrictions, and continuous harassment rendered the work of international humanitarian organizations virtually impossible. The Government of Iraq, while condemning the United Nations embargo as inhuman and endangering the health situation of the country, had itself imposed a food blockade against the Kurds in the north and the Shiites in the southern marshes, which constituted a threat to the most basic human right: the right to life. The life of those populations was also threatened more directly. In the north, there was intermittent shelling by Government forces of parts of the Kurdish area. In the area of the southern marshes, recent artillery bombardments and attacks by fixed-wing aircraft pointed to the start of a major military effort by the Government to restore its control over the region whatever the cost in human lives. Recalling in this connection the operations by the Government of Iraq against the Kurds in the late 1980s which had resulted in the extermination of part of the population, the speaker expressed the hope that members of the Council would agree that everything possible should be done to avoid a repetition of that tragedy. He concluded that the Government of Iraq was in violation of resolution 688 (1991) because it had not ended its policy of repression, as demanded in the resolution, and it had not respected the obligation to allow international humanitarian organizations access throughout Iraq. He expressed the conviction that if a full implementation of that resolution could not be ensured, many thousands of innocent people were in danger of losing their lives.⁴⁵⁶

The representative of Iraq echoed the view expressed by some Council members that it would have been inappropriate for the Council to invite Mr. van der Stoel in his capacity as Special Rapporteur since the Council had no mandate in matters of human rights, and noted that he had been invited in his personal capacity. He added that the report of the Special Rapporteur, which had been presented to the Council a few days before the current meeting, should have been taken up first by the Commission on Human Rights rather than by the Security Council. Given the gravity of his allegations, he wondered why the Special Rapporteur had not first sought clarification from the Government of Iraq about the alleged violations of human rights. He refuted some of the main points that had been emphasized in the report — concerning the indiscriminate military attacks against the civilian population in the marshes; the forced relocation of the marsh Arabs in the south; an internal economic blockade; and the so-called Third River project. While he acknowledged that Government forces often carried out raids on the marshes, he contended that this was to track down and arrest deserters, murderers, smugglers and foreign infiltrators taking refuge there. It was those criminal elements, not the Government forces, which attacked the marsh Arabs and their property. The speaker concluded that, regardless of its merits or demerits, the report was an illegal attempt to help accomplish an illegal aim: namely, to dismember Iraq by calling for permanent human rights observers and eventually to establish another so-called safe haven in the south.⁴⁵⁷

The representative of the United States said it was evident from Mr. van der Stoel's statement that Iraq was in clear and direct violation of resolution 688 (1991), requiring Iraq to end repression of its citizens and allow humanitarian organizations access to all those in need. Saddam Hussein was guilty of human rights abuses throughout the country involving every ethnic and religious group. The United States believed it was appropriate for the Council to address those wider issues as well as the violations cited by Mr. van der Stoel in his report to the Council. It urged him to issue his report on conditions in northern Iraq as soon as possible. Saddam Hussein was also obstructing the work of those who sought to help the people of Iraq. His Government had refused to issue visas to replacements for United Nations guards who had rotated out of the country, while those who remained were being constantly harassed. Those guards performed an essential job: they provided a measure of protection for United Nations personnel and equipment; and were an important symbol of the United Nations humanitarian commitment in Iraq. If the Council accepted that Iraq could control the entry of United Nations personnel by denying visas, Iraqi intransigence could reduce the number of United Nations guards to 127 of a needed contingent of 500 within a week. With a reduced number of United Nations guards, and with United Nations personnel unable to travel between Baghdad and the north, the Government of Iraq could increase its harassment of groups throughout the country that relied on the United Nations presence to care for their humanitarian needs. In recent months, the world had witnessed a resurgence of Iraq's cruel treatment of its citizens in the north. Events in southern Iraq, particularly the recent bombing of Shia villages, showed an equally heinous disregard for the human rights of the Iraqi people. The speaker recalled that, in 1991, the Council had condemned the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including in the Kurdish populated areas, finding it a threat to international peace and security. At that time, the United States Government and other Governments had concluded that the situation was so serious and Iraqi intransigence so manifest that additional measures had to be taken to prevent further Iraqi repression of the civilian population. Now, the situation existed not only in the north but also in the south of Iraq. It was imperative that Iraq, without further delay and deception, abide by all relevant Security Council resolutions, including resolution 688 (1991), end its economic blockade of the north and south, renew the United Nations humanitarian programme in Iraq, and cease its repression in the southern marshes.⁴⁵⁸

The representative of Belgium observed that it had been useful and important for Mr. van der Stoel, who was monitoring events in Iraq, to be heard by the Council. The plight of the Shia civilians in the southern marshes and of other populations, particularly the Kurds, was pitiful and getting worse. The difficulties faced by the United Nations staff in charge of structuring humanitarian assistance operations added to his delegation's concerns. Furthermore, his country had information indicating that the harsh repressive measures used by the Iraqi regime now extended to the population of Baghdad itself, a development that showed continuing disdain for the goals and principles of the Charter and constituted a violation by Iraq of various international human rights instruments. The Security Council had, in this respect, imposed specific obligations on Iraq. The speaker recalled, notably, that resolution 687 (1991) provided for a review by the Council of the embargo imposed on Iraq in the light of the policy and practices followed by its Government, and that resolution 688 (1991) demanded that Iraq immediately end its repression of the civilian population. The President of the Council had, moreover, made a statement on 11 March 1992 which included the following passage: "The Council remains deeply concerned at the grave human rights abuses that, despite the provisions of resolution 688 (1991), the Government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population". To Belgium's profound regret, nothing in that text was any less true now. The repression that was being inflicted on the Iraqi people was not only a massive and flagrant violation of human rights; it could once again gravely jeopardize the peace and security of the entire region. It was therefore important, in this sphere as well, for the Council to observe with extreme watchfulness the behaviour of the Government of Iraq. The repression committed by the Iraqi authorities, like its attitude towards other matters covered by resolution

687 (1991), prevented Iraq from reassuming its place in the international community.⁴⁵⁹

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that his country attached great importance to the full and consistent implementation of the resolutions of the Security Council which were intended to eliminate the consequences of the Iraqi aggression against Kuwait and to establish a lasting peace and security in that region. Accordingly, like other Council members, the Russian Federation was seriously alarmed by reports of a continuing policy of repression against the civilian population in various parts of Iraq, which constituted a direct violation of the demand in resolution 688 (1991) that Iraq, as a contribution to the removal of the threat to international peace and security in the region, should end the repression against its own civilian population. Useful information on the tragic situation of many population groups in Iraq as the result of the policy of their own Government had just been given to the Council by Mr. van der Stoel. The Russian delegation had received with particular alarm the information provided by the Secretary-General at informal consultations on 7 August 1992 about the worsening situation regarding the safety of United Nations personnel in Iraq. The increasingly frequent attempts to intimidate United Nations personnel and the instances of attempts on their lives were totally unacceptable. Those and other facts revealed the obvious unwillingness of the Iraqi authorities to have witnesses to their repressive actions against the civilian population and their efforts to interfere with the activities of representatives of the international community in Iraq. That was also the conclusion the Russian Federation drew from the fact that Baghdad had so far avoided extending the memorandum of understanding with the United Nations. The deep concern of members of the Security Council at the failure to comply with resolution 688 (1991) had been indicated on a number of occasions, including at the Council meeting in March 1992 in which a high-level Iraqi delegation had participated. However, there had not yet been any adequate response by Baghdad to the Council's demands. The letter dated 6 August 1992 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq to the President of the Security Council⁴⁶⁰ and the statement made at the current meeting by the representative of Iraq were further evidence of that fact. The Russian delegation emphasized the groundlessness and uselessness of any attempt by Iraq to test the firmness of the Council's determination to obtain Iraq's full and unconditional compliance with all Council decisions, including resolution 688 (1991). Only by constructive cooperation with the international community could Iraq avoid the serious consequences it would face if it continued on its course of confrontation with the Security Council.⁴⁶¹

The representative of France noted that Mr. van der Stoel's testimony was extremely disquieting. It confirmed that throughout Iraq elementary human rights were being trampled upon and that repression against the civilian population was continuing, in the north as well as in the south. It also confirmed that resolution 688 (1991) was being disregarded by the Government of Iraq. While the United Nations, the specialized agencies and the non-governmental organizations were exerting remarkable efforts to bring relief to the civilian population, the Government was placing ever-greater obstacles in the way of humanitarian action. In fact, it was seeking to put an end to that action. The French delegation attached particular importance to the presence of the contingent of United Nations guards, which must be enabled to carry out the task given to it by the Secretary-General. It was essential, therefore, that the memorandum of understanding between Iraq and the United Nations of 18 April 1991 be renewed. France would follow very closely the negotiations, which it understood had just been revived. The speaker concluded by recalling that the year before the Security Council had found that the repression by the Baghdad authorities constituted a threat to international peace and security. The Government of France, along with others, had taken measures to protect the population in the north, which at that time was particularly affected. The situation that existed now in the south was equally serious. The international community could not remain indifferent to the fate of the population in the south; it had to do everything possible to prevent further massive violations of human rights and to prevent an exodus.⁴⁶²

The representative of the United Kingdom found the report to the Council by Mr. van der Stoel — which related principally to resolution 688 (1991) and was therefore very much a matter for the Council — to be deeply disturbing. However, he found the comments by the Iraqi representative to be even more disturbing in their failure to address the horrific facts. With regard to the state of health in Iraq, he observed that the failure of the Government of Iraq to implement the scheme under resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which would have enabled it to buy foodstuffs and medicines for the people of Iraq, was itself a tragedy which contributed to the repression by the Government of its population in contravention of resolution 688 (1991). He agreed with Mr. van der Stoel's statement that the humanitarian programme was desperately needed in all parts of Iraq — and that included the work of the United Nations guards, which was vital for the well-being of the Iraqi population in all parts of the country. His Government therefore welcomed the news that the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs had been invited to visit Baghdad and hoped that the Government would renew the memorandum of understanding forthwith. The speaker added that it was clear from Mr. van der Stoel's account that Iraq was engaged in a full-scale repression of the Shia population in the southern marshes, and that the north was suffering from an economic blockade, both actions in defiance of the Council and its resolution 688 (1991). Like previous speakers, he recalled the Council's conclusion the year before that the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including the Kurdish-populated areas but also in the south, which had led to a massive exodus of refugees to Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran, itself threatened international peace and security. His Government and a number of others had felt that the situation was so serious and Iraqi intransigence so evident that measures had to be taken to help prevent the population from being further repressed. That situation now appeared to exist in the south of Iraq as it had the year before in the north. In concluding, the speaker stated that, if the Government of Iraq wished the Council to accept the claim that its intentions were good, three things had to be done immediately: one was to end the economic blockade of the north of Iraq; the second was to stop the forceful repression in the south of Iraq; and the third was to renew the memorandum of understanding.⁴⁶³

The representative of Hungary considered the participation of Mr. van der Stoel in the Council's meeting an important contribution towards enhancing

the awareness of the link between the way a Government treats its own citizens and the way it acts in the international arena, as well as the link between enforcing respect for human rights and maintaining international peace and security. Resolution 688 (1991) and the presidential statement of 11 March 1992 had clearly recognized this relationship by keeping the question of repression in Iraq under review by the Council. The speaker urged the Iraqi authorities to put an end to the repression of the civilian population throughout the country, to permit the continuance of humanitarian relief efforts unhindered and to implement the relevant Security Council resolutions. He concluded by reiterating a point made by his delegation at the summit meeting of Security Council members in January: for Hungary, respect for human rights and the rights of national minorities was not merely a legal or humanitarian question; it was also an integral part of international collective security, as exemplified during and after the Gulf crisis, and more recently in the conflict among the southern Slav peoples. It was indispensable, therefore, for the Council, in the context of its peacebuilding efforts, to take an unambiguous stand for the protection of those rights whenever and wherever they were flagrantly violated.⁴⁶⁴

A number of other speakers similarly deplored the continuing repression by the Iraqi Government of the civilian population in many parts of the country, which threatened international peace and security in the region.⁴⁶⁵ They urged Iraq to implement the relevant Security Council resolutions and to renew the memorandum of understanding with the United Nations.

The meeting was then adjourned.

General informed the Council about the negotiations with Iraq in August on the extension of the memorandum of understanding governing the Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme in Iraq. The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, assisted by the Coordinator and senior officials from the United Nations programmes and agencies participating in the humanitarian programme, had held five rounds of talks with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq, discussions with the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, and several technical meetings with Government Ministers and officials. Iraq had taken the position that, in view of the changed circumstances since the adoption of the two preceding memorandums, the humanitarian programme should be based on transitional arrangements moving from an emergency phase towards “normalization” and regular cooperation with United Nations agencies. In that context, it considered that some of the exceptional measures provided for in the two earlier agreements were no longer applicable. The Secretary-General reported that, despite extensive negotiations, wide divergences remained in the positions of the two parties on certain key issues. Thus, for example, the Government insisted that United Nations sub-offices would no longer be permitted, although access on a functional basis would be granted for project implementation, whereas the United Nations considered such field stations to be essential for the effective implementation of the humanitarian programme throughout Iraq. The Government also wished to limit the overall strength and the location of the United Nations guards, which the United Nations found unacceptable, insisting upon the continued deployment of guards, with a ceiling of 500, in view of the grave security conditions prevailing in the country. The Government had also urged that every effort should be made to exempt humanitarian requirements from the imposition of sanctions, stressing the suffering these continued to inflict on the civilian population. In the course of the discussions, the Government had expressed particular concern at the declarations of impending action aimed at imposing an exclusion zone for Iraqi aircraft below the 32nd parallel. The Secretary-General had been asked to take up this issue, which the Government maintained was in contravention of international law. The Deputy Prime Minister had explicitly linked the implications of those declarations to the continued presence of the humanitarian programme in the south of the country and the Government’s refusal to permit the maintenance of sub-offices under a renewed memorandum of understanding. He had further indicated that in the event of such an exclusion zone being put into effect, any eventual memorandum of understanding would no longer be tolerated on Iraqi territory. Moreover, in view of the possibility of demonstrations in the Basrah area, he had suggested that any remaining humanitarian personnel in the south be withdrawn to Baghdad to ensure their safety. That had been done. The Secretary-General added that, although no agreement had been reached, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq had expressed the view that there would be another opportunity “in a short while” to discuss the humanitarian programme and to reach a formula for the extension of the memorandum of understanding. In the meantime, he had given the Government’s assurance that “a de facto memorandum of understanding existed” and that cooperation would be extended to the office of the Coordinator and United Nations programmes and agencies based in Baghdad.

The Secretary-General concluded that, from the United Nations perspective, the Government’s position prevented the Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme from providing effective humanitarian assistance to vulnerable groups in Iraq. No further United Nations presence, in terms of sub-offices or guards, was currently permitted in the south of the country. At the same time, the Programme’s implementation in the northern governorates had been brought to a halt. In the absence of a United Nations presence in the south, a reliable assessment of conditions prevailing in that region would not be possible; while in the north the population would be placed at serious risk if adequate food and fuel were not pre-positioned by November and should the Government not reinstate adequate food rations by then. He warned that such a situation could well lead to a renewed and large-scale displacement of the population.

At its 3112th meeting, held on 2 September 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the Secretary-General’s letter in its agenda.

The President (Ecuador) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁶⁷

⁴⁶⁷ S/24396.

The Security Council is deeply concerned at the current situation of the Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme in Iraq, as outlined in the Secretary-General's letter of 24 August 1992 to the President of the Security Council, including its reference to Iraq's failure to renew its Memorandum of Understanding with the United Nations.

The Council recalls its statement of 17 July 1992, in which the Council expressed its profound concern at the deteriorating conditions affecting the safety and well-being of United Nations personnel in Iraq. The Council is particularly disturbed by Iraq's continuing failure to ensure the safety of United Nations personnel and the personnel of non-governmental organizations.

The Council expresses its concern regarding the conduct and statements of Iraq on the Programme which are inconsistent with the previous Council resolutions that demand that Iraq cooperate with the international humanitarian organizations.

The Council affirms that the critical humanitarian needs of vulnerable groups in Iraq require the speedy conclusion of arrangements that would ensure the continuation of the Programme. In this respect, the Council considers unrestricted access throughout the country and the assurance of adequate security measures as essential prerequisites for the effective implementation of the Programme. To this end, the Council fully endorses the Secretary-General's insistence upon appropriate field offices for participating United Nations agencies and programmes and the continuing deployment of the United Nations Guards. The Council strongly supports the Secretary-General's continuing efforts to sustain a United Nations and non-governmental organization humanitarian presence throughout Iraq, and urges him to continue to use all resources at his disposal to help all those in need in Iraq. The Council urges Iraq in the strongest possible terms to cooperate with the United Nations.

Decision of 23 November 1992 (3139th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3139th meeting, held on 23 November 1992 in accordance with the agreement reached in the course of its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the letters addressed to the President of the Security Council dated 2 and 4 April 1991 and 5 March 1992 from the representatives of Turkey, France and Belgium, respectively.⁴⁶⁸ The agenda also included two subsequent letters from the representative of Belgium addressed to the President of the Council: by a letter dated 3 August 1992,⁴⁶⁹ he transmitted part I of the interim report on the situation of human rights in Iraq prepared by Mr. van der Stoep, Special Rapporteur of the Commission of Human Rights; by a letter dated 19 November 1992,⁴⁷⁰ the representative of Belgium noted that the Council would be holding a meeting concerning Iraq on 23 November 1992, recalled that the Council had undertaken in previous decisions to continue its discussion of the repression in Iraq, and stated that the latter remained a matter of grave concern to his Government. The item was considered by the Council at its 3139th meeting, which was twice suspended and resumed, on 23 and 24 November 1992.

Pursuant to an agreement reached in its prior consultations, the Council invited the representatives of Iraq and Kuwait, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended invitations under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Messrs. Hans Blix, Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Rolf Ekeus, Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, and Jan Eliasson, Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and the Emergency Relief Coordinator. The President (Ecuador) then drew the attention of the members of the Council to the request contained in the letter of 19 November from the representative of Belgium that the Council extend an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Mr. van der Stoel. The representatives of China and Zimbabwe reiterated the reservations that they had expressed about such an invitation at the 3105th meeting on 11 August 1992. The representative of China also expressed a reservation about the references to the interim report of the Special Rapporteur on human rights and to the members' public meeting with Mr. van der Stoel contained in the text of the statement that was to be made shortly by the President of the Council.⁴⁷¹ The President stated that the observations that had been made would appear in the records of the Council. In the absence of any objections, the Council then agreed to invite Mr. van der Stoel under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure. The Council also invited the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President also drew the attention of the Council members to two other documents.⁴⁷² Welcoming the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, he stated that the Council members all hoped that the meetings would be very productive and constructive. He recalled that, in a letter dated 10 November 1992,⁴⁷³ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq had informed the Council of the wish of the Government of Iraq to send an official high-level delegation to United Nations Headquarters in order to pursue a dialogue with the Council on Iraq's implementation of its obligations under certain resolutions of the Council.

The President then stated that, following prior consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following introductory statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁷⁴

I. GENERAL OBLIGATION

1. The resolutions concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait impose a number of general and specific obligations upon Iraq.
2. As regards the general obligation, Iraq is required, under paragraph 33 of resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, to give official notification to the Secretary-General and to the Security Council of its acceptance of the provisions of that entire resolution.
3. Iraq signified its unconditional acceptance in identical letters dated 6 April 1991, addressed to the Secretary-General and to the President of the Security Council and in a letter dated 10 April 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, and in a letter dated 23 January 1992 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council.

II. SPECIFIC OBLIGATIONS

4. In addition to the general obligation to accept the provisions of resolution 687 (1991) in their entirety, several Council resolutions impose specific obligations upon Iraq.

(a) Respect for the inviolability of the international boundary

5. By paragraph 2 of resolution 687 (1991) the Council demands that Iraq respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocations of islands previously agreed upon between Iraq and Kuwait. Pursuant to paragraph 3 of that resolution, the Secretary-General established a Boundary Demarcation Commission to demarcate the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. Paragraph 5 of the same resolution requires Iraq and Kuwait to respect a demilitarized zone established by the Council.

6. Iraq did not participate in the work of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission at its July 1992 and October 1992 sessions. Iraq has refused up to now to withdraw a number of police posts that are not in line with the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission's principle that both sides should stay 1,000 metres from the boundary line shown on the Mission's map. The Council in paragraph 2 of resolution 773 (1992) of 26 August 1992 welcomed the Commission's land demarcation decisions and, in paragraph 5, the intention of the Secretary-General to carry out at the earliest practicable time the realignment of the demilitarized zone to correspond to the international boundary demarcated, by the Commission, with the consequent removal of the Iraqi police posts.

7. In response to the letter dated 21 May 1992 from the Foreign Minister of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General, the Council in a 17 June 1992 statement stressed to Iraq the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait being demarcated by the Commission and guaranteed by the Council pursuant to resolution 687 (1991). In this statement, members of the Council also noted with dismay that the above-mentioned letter recalled past Iraqi claims to Kuwait without also recalling Iraq's subsequent repudiation of these claims. The members of the Council firmly rejected any suggestion that tended to dispute the very existence of Kuwait. Resolution 773 (1992) underlined the Council's guarantee of the above-mentioned international boundary and its decision to take as appropriate all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as provided for in paragraph 4 of resolution 687 (1991).

(b) Weapons-related obligations

8. Section C of resolution 687 (1991) imposes certain specific obligations upon Iraq with respect to its chemical and biological weapons programmes, its programmes for ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres and its nuclear programmes. These obligations are elaborated upon in resolutions 707 (1991) of 11 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991. The obligations are defined in paragraphs 8 to 13 of resolution 687 (1991) and they are elaborated upon in paragraphs 3 and 5 of resolution 707 (1991) and paragraph 5 of resolution 715 (1991).

9. By resolution 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991, the Council decided that the Government of Iraq shall be liable for the full costs of carrying out the tasks authorized by section C of resolution 687 (1991). No funds have so far been received from Iraq to meet this liability.

10. The Council has noted that since the adoption of resolution 687 (1991) progress has been made in the implementation of section C of that resolution but that much remains to be done. In particular, Iraq needs to provide the full, final and complete disclosure of all aspects of its programmes for weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres. There is a particular and vital requirement for complete information, including credible documentary evidence on Iraq's past production, suppliers and consumption of all prohibited items, and its past capacity to produce such items.

11. Iraq must also acknowledge clearly its obligations under resolution 715 (1991) and the two plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved thereunder. It must agree to implement these obligations unconditionally. In this connection the Council notes the letter of 28 October 1992 from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Iraq addressed to the Secretary-General seeking a review of the terms and provisions not only of resolution 715 (1991) but also resolution 707 (1991). It is accordingly clear that Iraq seems unprepared to comply with the obligations already prescribed.

12. The Special Commission has informed the Council about the outstanding matters that would at the present time appear to be the most important. The Council has noted the report of the Secretary-General of 19 October 1992 on the status of the implementation of the plan for the ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with relevant parts of section C of Security Council resolution 687 (1991).

13. The Council has also noted the second report of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of 28 October 1992 on the implementation of the Agency's plan for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq's compliance with paragraph 12 of resolution 687.

14. In a statement issued on behalf of the members of the Security Council on the Special Commission's right to conduct aerial surveillance flights in Iraq, the President stated on 10 April 1992 that:

The members of the Council wish to point out that the surveillance flights are carried out under the authority of Security Council resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 715 (1991) of 11 October 1991. Reaffirming the right of the Special Commission to conduct such aerial surveillance flights, the members of the Council call upon the Government of Iraq to take all the necessary steps to ensure that the Iraqi military forces will not interfere with or threaten the security of the flights concerned and to comply with its responsibilities to secure the safety of the Special Commission's aircraft and personnel flying over Iraq.

The President also said that:

The members of the Council warn the Government of Iraq of the serious consequences which would ensue from any failure to comply with these obligations.

15. The Special Commission, on 15 October 1992, informed the Council of actions endangering the safety and security of the Commission's inspection teams in Iraq, including a systematic campaign of harassment, acts of violence, vandalism and verbal denunciations and threats at all levels. The President of the Council issued on the same day a statement to the media stressing the Council's particular concern for the safety of the Commission's inspectors.

16. In a further statement made on 6 July 1992 on behalf of the members of the Council concerning the Government of Iraq's refusal to permit access to certain premises by a team of inspectors, the President said:

Iraq's present refusal to permit access to the Inspection Team currently in Iraq to the premises designated by the Special Commission constitutes a material and unacceptable breach by Iraq of a provision of resolution 687 (1991) which established the ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region. The members of the Council demand that the Government of Iraq immediately agree to the admission to the premises concerned of the inspectors of the Commission as required by the Chairman of the Special Commission, so that the Commission may establish whether or not any documents, records, materials, or equipment relevant to the responsibilities of the Commission are located therein.

In its resolution 707 (1991) the Council demands that Iraq allow the Special Commission, the International Atomic Energy Agency and their inspection teams immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to any and all areas, facilities, equipment, records and means of transportation which they wish to inspect. Therefore, the Council cannot accept Iraq's insistence that there must be a limit on access by the inspection teams.

(c) Repatriation of and access to Kuwaiti and third-State nationals in Iraq

17. As regards Kuwaiti and third-State nationals in Iraq, resolutions 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991 and 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 impose an obligation on Iraq to release, facilitate repatriation of, and arrange for immediate access to them, as well as the return of the remains of any deceased personnel of the forces of Kuwait and of the Member States cooperating with Kuwait pursuant to resolution 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990. Furthermore, paragraph 30 of resolution 687 (1991) requires Iraq to extend all necessary cooperation to the International Committee of the Red Cross in facilitating the search for Kuwaiti and third-State nationals still unaccounted for.

18. In spite of its best ongoing efforts, the Committee has not received information as to the whereabouts of the persons reported missing in Iraq. Nor has it received detailed and documented information on the search conducted by the Iraqi authorities. Following the 11-12 March 1992 Council meeting with the Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister, Iraq published in its press lists of those believed missing detained inside Iraq. The Committee has still not received permission to visit Iraqi prisons and detention centres in accordance with its standard criteria. Very few missing persons detainees have been released since March 1992, while hundreds are believed still to be inside Iraq.

(d) Iraq's liability under international law

19. Another obligation concerns Iraq's liability under international law. In resolution 674 (1990), the Council reminded Iraq that "under international law it is liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq". Its liability under international law is reaffirmed in paragraph 2 (b) of resolution 686 (1991) and paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991). The latter resolution further specifies that it "is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage — including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources — or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of its unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait".

20. By paragraph 18 of the same resolution, the Council created a fund to pay compensation for claims that fall within paragraph 16, to be financed by a percentage of the value of the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq. In view of the existing economic sanctions against Iraq under resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, Iraq was permitted by the Council under resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991 to sell a limited quantity of oil, as an exception, a portion of the proceeds from which would be used to provide financial resources for the Fund. To date, it has not availed itself of this possibility. The Council noted that this authorization lapsed on 18 March 1992 but indicated its readiness to authorize the regime for the sale of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products for a like period of time as that specified in these resolutions and also its readiness to consider possible further extensions, as set out in the statement of 19 March 1992, made by the President on behalf of the Council. Since then Iraq has not shown any willingness to resume discussions about implementing these resolutions. The members of the Council are aware of a previous request by Iraq for a five-year moratorium on meeting its financial obligations, including payments into the United Nations Compensation Fund.

21. In view of Iraq's refusal to cooperate in the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) after several rounds of technical discussions with the Secretariat, the Council adopted on 2 October 1992 resolution 778 (1992) which mandates that certain frozen Iraqi assets be transferred to an escrow account opened by the United Nations. A portion of these funds will be transferred to the Compensation Fund.

(e) Repayment and servicing of Iraq's foreign debt

22. With regard to another obligation, the Council demands, in paragraph 17 of resolution 687 (1991), that Iraq scrupulously adhere to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt.

(f) Non-entitlement to claims deriving from the effects of the measures taken by the Security Council in resolution 661 (1990) and related resolutions (para. 29 of resolution 687 (1991))

23. According to information received with regard to this item, Iraq has attempted to enforce some claims under which it would have benefited from a contract frustrated by the coming into effect of the terms of resolution 661 (1990), in particular, through the confiscation of the property of foreign companies and organizations left in Iraq.

(g) Return of property

24. I now turn to the question of return of property. The Security Council, in paragraph 2 (d) of resolution 686 (1991), demands that Iraq immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property seized by it, to be completed in the shortest possible period. The members of the Council have previously noted with satisfaction that Iraqi officials involved with the return of property have extended cooperation to the United Nations to facilitate the return of such property. However, much property, including military equipment and private property, remains to be returned.

(h) Monthly statements of gold and foreign currency reserves

25. Another obligation is set out by paragraph 7 of resolution 706 (1991), under which the Government of Iraq is required to provide to the Secretary-General and appropriate international organizations monthly statements of its gold and foreign currency reserves. To date, no such statements have been provided to the Secretary-General or to the International Monetary Fund.

(i) Undertaking not to commit or support acts of international terrorism

26. By paragraph 32 of resolution 687 (1991), Iraq is required not to commit or support acts of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods and practices of terrorism.

27. The Council notes Iraq's statements contained in identical letters dated 11 June 1991 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council and the Secretary-General, and in a letter dated 23 January 1992 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Iraq to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council that it is a party to international conventions against terrorism and that it has never pursued a policy favourable to international terrorism as defined by international law.

(j) Security Council action with respect to the Iraqi civilian population

28. Resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) provide a means for Iraq to meet its obligations to supply its civilian population with needed humanitarian assistance, particularly food and medicine. Resolution 778 (1992) mandates that certain frozen Iraqi assets be transferred to an escrow account opened by the United Nations and urges States to contribute funds from other sources to the escrow account. A portion of these funds will be used for humanitarian assistance.

III. SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 688 (1991)

29. I should now like to refer to the demands by the Security Council with respect to the Iraqi civilian population. In paragraph 2 of resolution 688 (1991), the Council demands that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, end the repression of its civilian population. In paragraphs 3 and 7, the Council insists that it allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq, and demands its cooperation with the Secretary-General to these ends.

30. The Council remains deeply concerned at the grave human rights abuses that, despite the provisions of resolution 688 (1991), the Government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population, in particular in the northern region of Iraq, in southern Shia centres and in the southern marshes. The Security Council notes that this situation is confirmed by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights in his report on the human rights situation of 5 March 1992 and in part I of his report of 3 August 1992. The members of the Council recall their public meeting with Mr. Max van der Stoep on 11 August 1992.

31. The members of the Security Council take note of the renewal on 22 October 1992 of the Memorandum of Understanding providing the framework for urgent humanitarian assistance throughout the country between the United Nations and the Government of Iraq.

IV. CONCLUDING OBSERVATION

32. In view of the observations on the record of Iraq's performance, and without prejudice to further action by the Security Council on the question of the implementation of its relevant resolutions by Iraq, the Council has considered itself justified in concluding that Iraq has up to now only selectively and then partially complied with the obligations placed upon it by the Council. It is the Council's hope that this meeting will prove a valuable opportunity to impress once again upon Iraq the imperative need for full compliance and to obtain from Iraq undertakings which would constitute an advance in the consideration of this issue as required in the interest of world peace and security, as well as that of the Iraqi people.

The representative of the United Kingdom concentrated on four areas of major political significance in which he said there had been prevarication, concealment, defiance, repression and non-compliance with the Council's resolutions. The first was the Iraq-Kuwait boundary. In recent months there had been a pattern of Iraqi actions and behaviour which completely invalidated Iraq's formal acceptance of Kuwait's existence within boundaries to be demarcated under an objective United Nations process. Most serious of all was the reassertion by Iraq of its claim to Kuwait in statements by Government ministers, officials, and in the Government-controlled media in Iraq. This struck at the very heart of the ceasefire resolutions, and called into question Iraq's commitment to resolution 687 (1991). The second area of concern was that of weapons of mass destruction. Iraq had still not complied with its obligation under resolution 707 (1991) to provide a full, final and complete declaration of its weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missile programmes. It had also failed either to recognize or to accept its obligations under resolution 715 (1991), which provided for long-term monitoring and verification by inspection. He observed that the Foreign Minister of Iraq, in a letter of 28 October 1992, had called for a review of those two resolutions, which sounded like an attempt to escape from those obligations altogether. That would not be acceptable: without long-term monitoring and verification there could be no certainty that Iraq would not start the whole process over again. Since the Council's meeting in March, Iraq had had a very mixed track record over inspections. Although there had been some cooperation at the field level, the situation had been markedly different at the political level, access to the Ministry of Agriculture building in Baghdad having been denied. There had been hostile and inaccurate statements by Iraqi leaders about United Nations inspection teams and serious harassment of inspectors. The inspectors must be allowed to go about their work unhindered and in safety and be allowed access to wherever their work took them, without limits. The third area of concern mentioned by the speaker was the question of detainees. The detention of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals continued, he stated, and Iraq had still not agreed to ICRC standard procedures for visits to places of detention in Iraq. That was a serious humanitarian issue where Iraqi behaviour was clearly at variance with its obligations under international law and Security Council resolutions. The fourth area of concern was the matter of Iraq's treatment of its own citizens. Throughout the crisis, the Council's quarrel had been with the Government of Iraq, not with the Iraqi people. The Council had accordingly adopted resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which would have created an exemption from the sanctions regime to permit Iraq to export oil to pay for humanitarian imports. Iraq had persistently refused to operate this fair and equitable scheme, in blatant disregard of the needs of its own people. However, the offer remained on the table. Iraq had also prevaricated over renewal of its memorandum of understanding with the United Nations, the basis for the United Nations humanitarian programmes in Iraq. The renewed memorandum of understanding, agreed to in October, did not meet all the United Nations aspirations, particularly in the south, and concerns remained about the security of humanitarian personnel in northern Iraq. The Government had, moreover, consistently ignored the Council's demand in resolution 688 (1991) that it cease the repression of its own people. The speaker concluded that only when the leaders of Iraq heeded what was being said in the Council and took decisive steps to remedy these shortcomings would they be able to get off on a new foot.⁴⁷⁵

The representative of the United States noted that, in the face of Iraqi intransigence, the Council's efforts must continue undiminished. More than two years after Iraq's unprovoked aggression against Kuwait, and despite the concerted will of the world community, the Council still saw its requirements honoured only partially. It must know when Iraq would comply fully and completely with all its relevant resolutions, and should hold the senior Iraqi delegation attending the meeting to the strictest standards of accountability. The speaker recalled that resolution 687 (1991), which required Iraq to take precise steps on many issues, had been formally accepted by Iraq in a letter of 6 April 1991.⁴⁷⁶ Subsequently, a series of resolutions had spelled out Iraq's obligations in detail. Many of those resolutions were necessary because, from the first, Iraq had evaded its obligations. In a letter to the Council on 28 October 1992, the Foreign Minister of Iraq had challenged the implementation of resolution 687 (1991). The United States rejected that challenge: if the Gulf region were to enjoy peace and security, Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles had to be permanently eliminated. That goal required Iraq's cooperation in two areas: the full and complete disclosure of its weapons programmes; and long-term monitoring and verification. Although some progress had been made in this regard since March, Iraq had left many gaps in its declarations to the Special Commission and to IAEA, which were essential for establishing a proper baseline for long-term monitoring and compliance. Even more worrisome was Iraq's call, in the Foreign Minister's letter of 28 October, for the Security Council to conduct a radical review of resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), which demanded that Iraq allow full access to all sites and accept a long-term monitoring regime. The letter also questioned the Special Commission's operation of surveillance helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft. Those views raised further doubts about Iraq's readiness to comply fully with all relevant resolutions of the Council. The speaker reiterated that the United States objected to, and would not countenance, an Iraqi belief that Baghdad could decide for itself what the Council intended by its resolutions. Iraq's record on boundary issues, notably its non-participation in the work of the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission, was also disappointing, and the Foreign Minister's recollection in May of past Iraqi claims to Kuwait was disturbing. The boundary issue and Iraq's challenge to Kuwait's sovereignty reached to the very cause of the Gulf war. In response, the Council had adopted resolution 773 (1992), which emphasized the importance of the Boundary Demarcation Commission and underlined the inviolability of the boundary. When the demarcation of the land boundary was completed, the Iraqi regime was expected to accept in full the Commission's work. The speaker added that Iraq had not fulfilled other obligations of resolution 687 (1991), including repatriation of, and access to, detained Kuwaiti and third-country nationals, allowing access by ICRC to detention facilities in Iraq, and the return of Kuwaiti property. The Iraqi regime's repression of its civilian population, which had led to the adoption of resolution 688 (1991), too, continued to be of concern. The Baghdad regime's response to that resolution had been an economic blockade of the north. It had also subjected the civilian communities in the southern marshes to food blockades, air attacks, artillery bombardments, forced relocations and torture. Within weeks of Mr. van der Stoep's report to the Council in August detailing these human rights abuses, the United States and its coalition partners had launched Operation Southern Watch, which monitored the implementation of resolution 688 (1991) and deterred the most serious forms of repression by the Iraqi military authorities, through the enforcement of a no-fly zone south of the 32nd parallel. Although that operation had been successful, Baghdad's repression by other means continued in the south, which the United States and the rest of the international community deplored. Additional steps would be considered if the Iraqi regime continued to violate resolution 688 (1991) or other Security Council resolutions. The speaker anticipated that the Iraqi delegation might tell the Council of human suffering brought about by economic sanctions established under resolution 661 (1990). However, he recalled that there had never been a prohibition on importing medical supplies into Iraq, that the embargo on food had come to an end in April 1991, and that large quantities had been subsequently imported, but that the Iraqi regime had manipulated food distribution as an instrument of repression. Furthermore, resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) had offered Iraq the opportunity to sell oil to finance purchases of food, medicine and humanitarian supplies. In discontinuing discussions on how to implement those resolutions, Iraq had chosen not to meet the essential needs of its civilian population and therefore bore full responsibility for the humanitarian suffering in the country. In conclusion, the speaker observed that, without full and unconditional Iraqi compliance with all relevant resolutions, his Government saw no reason to lift sanctions against Iraq.⁴⁷⁷

The representative of Zimbabwe addressed four areas of Iraq's incomplete or lack of compliance with Security Council resolutions of particular concern to his delegation: the repatriation of, and access to, Kuwaiti and third-country nationals still unaccounted for in Iraq; the return of all Kuwaiti property; respect for the inviolability of the international boundary between Iraq and Kuwait as determined by the Boundary Commission; and the humanitarian situation. With regard to the latter, Zimbabwe was disappointed that resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) remained unimplemented. It believed that their implementation would go a long way towards taking care of the many victims of various nationalities, including Kuwaitis, who were still awaiting compensation for their suffering, loss and injury as a result of the hostilities in the Gulf on the one hand, and alleviating the humanitarian situation of the Iraqi civilian population who had suffered as a result of the war and the subsequent regime of sanctions, on the other. Finally, while Zimbabwe would insist that Iraq meet its obligations under Security Council resolutions, it was also important for the Council, while undertaking its reviews, to avoid the temptation to shift the goalposts. Where compliance had occurred, that had to be recognized. It was important for the prestige and credibility of the Council that it remained focused on the legitimate goals and objectives for which the sanctions regime had been imposed on behalf of the international community as a whole.⁴⁷⁸

The representative of France said that resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions imposed clear and precise obligations on the Government of Iraq. He reiterated his country's stance that once Iraq complied with those resolutions the sanctions regime could be lifted. Like previous speakers, he noted various aspects of the Government's policies and practices that were cause for serious concern. With regard to weapons of mass destruction, the Council was pursuing two objectives: to eliminate such weapons stockpiled by Iraq; and to ensure that the Iraqi industrial capacity would not be used to rebuild its military potential once the latter had been destroyed. Those objectives had been set forth in resolutions 687 (1991), 707 (1991) and 715 (1991). Iraq was far from having fully complied with those resolutions. On the humanitarian side, France deplored the fact that the Iraqi authorities had broken off talks on the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which provided a mechanism for improving the standard of living of the Iraqi civilian population as a whole. The blockade imposed by the Iraqi authorities against Kurdistan was, moreover, causing a difficult health and humanitarian situation there and creating the risk of another exodus of populations towards neighbouring States. Armed operations, in which the Iraqi forces were engaged in the southern marshes, were another illustration of a repressive policy. That policy was depriving major portions of the Iraqi population of their fundamental rights, and was a direct violation of resolution 688 (1991) to whose implementation France remained deeply committed. Finally, the speaker was seriously concerned about the extremely critical human rights situation in Iraq, as highlighted in the reports prepared by the Special Rapporteur. In summary, what the Security Council expected of Iraq, over and above the technical details of the resolutions, was two very simple things. First, the Government of Iraq must live in peace with its neighbours — by accepting frontiers, by forgoing its expansionist designs against a less powerful neighbour, and by repudiating clearly the development of weapons of mass destruction. With regard to such weapons, the international community must not let down its guard, lest Iraq return to its aggressive designs. Secondly, the Government must live in peace with its people, by seeking a settlement with the Kurds and the Shiites of Iraq and by giving priority to ensuring the subsistence and well-being of its civilian population. The speaker concluded that, in those two areas, the Government had not made any progress. It knew, however, that if it were to accede to those two demands, it could bring about the lifting of sanctions.⁴⁷⁹

The representative of Japan stated that his country was sympathetic towards the Iraqi people, who were innocent victims of their Government's policy, and it supported the humanitarian efforts of the United Nations to ease their suffering. However, only the Iraqi leadership could resolve the situation by complying with all the relevant Security Council resolutions, and by reaching agreement with the United Nations on the export of Iraqi oil. Although some progress had been made on the implementation of the Council's resolutions, Iraq still refused to accept resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), which called for future monitoring by the Special Commission and IAEA. On the contrary, Iraq had demanded that the Council change the terms of those two important resolutions. Moreover, as had been stated by previous speakers, Iraq continued to make territorial claims over Kuwait and refused to cooperate with the Boundary Demarcation Commission. The plight of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals held prisoner in Iraq was also of concern to Japan. The speaker reiterated his country's position that the Government of Iraq did not have the right to interpret the Council's resolutions or to choose which provisions it would implement and which ones it would not. It should comply fully with the provisions of all resolutions. While Japan welcomed the opportunity to exchange views with the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, there must be no misunderstanding. The situation would not improve until the Government of Iraq decided to cooperate fully with the Council and the United Nations as a whole.⁴⁸⁰

At the first resumption of the 3139th meeting, on 23 November 1992, the representative of the Russian Federation observed that the questions involved in settling the consequences of Iraq's aggression against Kuwait were extremely important from the point of view of ensuring international peace and security. He hoped that the participation of the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq in the meeting would prove useful to their successful resolution. While noting that Iraq had recently demonstrated a more open and reasonable attitude and had presented additional data on the prohibited military programmes, he stated that a full picture of Iraq's activities covered by resolution 687 (1991) did not yet exist; nor was there any certainty as to the completeness and accuracy of the information presented by Iraq concerning those programmes. Moreover, Iraq's failure to acknowledge its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), and its attempts to replace performance of its obligations with discussions concerning the clear demands of the Council, were making it impossible to carry out activities involved in monitoring and verification in accordance with the Council's decisions. Similarly, the Council could not overlook Iraq's essentially hostile attitude towards the activities of United Nations inspectors and acts that had threatened their personal safety and had caused material damage to United Nations property. Other facts also attested to an unconstructive attitude on the part of the Iraqi authorities: their refusal to cooperate with the Boundary Demarcation Commission, the detention of citizens of third countries by Iraqi military patrols in the demilitarized zone, including parts of Kuwaiti territory, and the delay in releasing Kuwaitis captured by Iraq and returning Kuwaiti property, including military property. Furthermore, the Iraqi authorities had reportedly confiscated the property of a number of foreign companies and organizations, including Russian ones, which constituted a violation of paragraph 29 of resolution 687 (1991). The Russian delegation was also concerned that Iraq had not complied with resolution 688 (1991), regarding ensuring respect for human rights in Iraq. It concluded from the foregoing that the Government of Iraq was continuing to evade conscientious and complete implementation of its obligations under Security Council resolutions. The Russian delegation had frequently raised with the Iraqi leadership the question of the inadmissibility of attempts to contest in any way the binding decisions of the Security Council, which was responsible to the world community for preventing the recurrence of such instances of adventurism as Iraq's aggression against Kuwait. It hoped that the present discussion would help Iraq to understand better the Council's position and make its Government more aware that it must comply vigorously and completely with all the provisions of Security Council decisions binding upon it that had been adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.⁴⁸¹

The representative of Morocco hoped that the dialogue with the Deputy Prime Minister would lead to positive results and a better understanding that would enable the Council to achieve the objectives laid down in its resolutions, and ultimately contribute to the final restoration of peace and stability to the Gulf region. As an Arab country, Morocco had itself greatly suffered from the region's fratricidal crisis and its disastrous consequences, which continued to devastate the Arab world. The speaker stated that he had no intention of reviewing the various questions dealt with in the introductory statement by the President of the Council, which had been "complete and useful". His purpose was to identify and stress certain developments and positive trends, without however overlooking those areas in which work remained to be done. He noted the Iraqi authorities' growing readiness to cooperate with the inspection missions, in particular with the Special Commission. His delegation also welcomed the signing of the renewed memorandum of understanding governing the inter-agency humanitarian programme in Iraq, which provided a realistic framework of cooperation between the United Nations and Iraq. His country remained very much concerned, however, by the serious humanitarian situation in Iraq. The speaker recalled, in this context, the moral obligation of the Council to do all in its power to ease the suffering of the innocent civilian population. He therefore appealed to all members of the Council that the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) should initially take a more flexible, tolerant and responsible approach to the subject of goods related to Iraq's humanitarian needs. At the same time, Morocco was very much aware that in the humanitarian field, as in all the areas targeted by the Council's relevant resolutions, the Iraqi authorities must also continue to discharge their duties and obligations. It believed that respect for those resolutions remained essential to the restoration of peace, stability and prosperity in the Gulf region, and hoped that Iraq would continue to do all it could to cooperate with the United Nations bodies and to discharge the obligations incumbent upon it.⁴⁸²

A number of other Council members echoed the views of previous speakers, expressing concern about Iraq's non-compliance with its obligations under resolution 687 (1991) and related subsequent resolutions, notably regarding weapons disclosure and inspections, respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait, and humanitarian and human rights matters.⁴⁸³ Several of those members noted, with regard to sanctions, that they were not intended as a punishment and were not aimed at the Iraqi people, but had been imposed to bring about compliance by Iraq with its obligations.⁴⁸⁴ It followed, in their view, that they would not be revised or lifted until such compliance had been achieved. Responsibility for the maintenance of the sanctions regime was thus fundamentally in the hands of the Government of Iraq.

The representative of Iraq asserted that his country had complied with resolution 687 (1991) despite its “arbitrarily iniquitous nature”. He stated that the Foreign Minister of Iraq had submitted an updated and complete factual report dated 19 November 1992 on the measures taken by Iraq in implementation of section C of that resolution,⁴⁸⁵ and listed them briefly. The measures included the following: all weapons that the Council had prohibited Iraq from possessing had been destroyed, while the remaining chemical materials were under the control of Special Commission teams and being destroyed systematically; all equipment used or claimed to have been used in the production of weapons prohibited by resolution 687 (1991) had been identified by the Special Commission and IAEA; numerous inspection operations had been carried out, without prior notice, at various sites throughout Iraq; and Iraq had provided detailed information to the inspection teams. With regard to the inspections, the speaker quoted from the letter of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq dated 28 October 1992,⁴⁸⁶ alleging that most of the inspection teams had behaved in a hostile, confrontational and provocative manner. They had, moreover, based their inspection plans not on scientific and technical considerations but on “the tendentious reports and data intended to provide a cover for biased and predetermined actions that were supplied to them by the intelligence agencies of certain States with well-known political designs against Iraq”. The speaker contended that, despite Iraq’s compliance with the obligations imposed on it by resolution 687 (1991), the Security Council had refused to discharge its own obligations towards the people and the State of Iraq. It had not looked into the issue of implementing, either partially or completely, paragraph 22 of that resolution, which required it to lift the embargo on the import of commodities and products originating in Iraq and to lift the prohibitions against financial transactions related thereto. The Council had recently, moreover, placed obstacles in the way of Iraq using its frozen assets abroad in order to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people for food, medicine and other essentials. The members of the Council had not implemented the sanctions Committee’s decision which allowed them to free Iraqi assets for the purpose of meeting those needs. The adoption by the Council of resolution 778 (1992) had then closed the door completely against Iraq’s using the remainder of its frozen assets abroad to provide for its urgent humanitarian needs. The sanctions Committee, meanwhile, had persisted in its shameful conduct of preventing Iraq from obtaining its needs. The speaker asserted that keeping the embargo in place against Iraq amounted to the perpetration of the crime of genocide against the people of Iraq. Thousands of children had died and the Iraqi population as a whole continued to suffer from dire shortages of food and medicine, while being denied many other essentials of human existence.

The representative of Iraq added that, at the same time, the Council had done nothing to follow up on another vital aspect of resolution 687 (1991) that related to other countries in the region: namely, paragraph 14, in which the Council noted that the actions to be taken by Iraq in relation to its weapons-related obligations represented “steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free from weapons of mass destruction and all missiles for their delivery and the objective of a global ban on chemical weapons”. He quoted in this connection once again from the letter of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq dated 28 October 1992, alleging that Israel and the Islamic Republic of Iran possessed such weapons of mass destruction and concluding that those facts not only raised acutely the question of the double standards the Council applied in the resolutions it adopted but also confirmed the selective and biased approach the Council took in dealing with the various parts of its resolutions, particularly with regard to resolution 687 (1991). The speaker also reiterated the call made by his Foreign Minister in the same letter for the series of arbitrary measures adopted by the Council in addition to resolution 687 (1991) to be fundamentally reviewed, since circumstances had changed and a stable relationship existed between the Iraqi authorities and the Special Commission and IAEA. He repeated Iraq’s call for a halt to the use of foreign helicopters by the inspection teams and the activities of United States U-2

“spy planes”. He emphasized, moreover, that special care should be taken in all the activities of United Nations missions to respect Iraq’s sovereignty and dignity. Finally, stressing the importance of security and stability in the region and the need to deal in a balanced manner with all its countries, the speaker called for the adoption of comprehensive measures all over the region, as provided for in resolution 687 (1991). Iraq should be part of those measures rather than the country that was singled out in regard to their application. It was ready for constructive and responsible cooperation to that end.⁴⁸⁷

Mr. Hans Blix, speaking in his capacity as Director General of IAEA, recalled that, under paragraph 13 of resolution 687 (1991), he had been directed to carry out three tasks with a view to dismantling Iraq’s nuclear capability: first, to identify, through on-site inspections, Iraq’s nuclear capability; secondly, to destroy, remove or render harmless all nuclear weapons, nuclear-weapon-usable material, any subsystems or components, or any related research, development, support or manufacturing facilities; and, thirdly, to develop and implement a plan for the future ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq’s compliance with the requirement not to acquire or develop a nuclear-weapon capability. Taken together, the implementation of those tasks and the completion of the necessary actions by Iraq, critically important by themselves, were seen as part of the steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free of weapons of mass destruction. Since the speaker’s report to the Council in March, important parts of the first two tasks had been fulfilled and the Agency had begun implementing elements of the third task. The first task — the complete mapping of Iraq’s nuclear capabilities — required the Agency to identify all Iraq’s nuclear-relevant resources and the foreign sources of supply and technology. Through inspection visits and discussions with the Iraqi authorities, a fairly comprehensive picture of Iraq’s nuclear programme had emerged. However, the Agency could not be certain that it was complete. Iraq’s unwillingness to reveal foreign sources of equipment, material and technology made it difficult to ascertain whether all nuclear-related imported equipment and material had been identified. Moreover, new information, positively evaluated by the Special Commission and the Agency, could point to sites which would require inspection —

after designation by the Special Commission. The Agency therefore saw a need for continued on-site inspection. With regard to the second task, the Agency had, with the active cooperation of the Iraqi authorities, destroyed or rendered harmless key buildings, equipment and material related to the clandestine nuclear programme. It expected cooperation in these matters to continue. IAEA had now begun to phase in elements of the third task — that of long-term monitoring and verification. This had met with some cooperation and some resistance from the Iraqi side. The Iraqi authorities continued to challenge the legitimacy of the plans approved by the Council under resolution 715 (1991). Of particular concern was the letter of 28 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq,⁴⁸⁸ which restated Iraq’s non-acceptance of resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) in strong terms. The speaker reiterated his view that the lack of full and explicit acceptance of those resolutions ignored their binding nature, and also appeared to ignore Iraq’s own explicit acceptance of resolution 687 (1991), which in paragraph 12 imposed on Iraq the obligation to accept the plan for ongoing monitoring and verification in the nuclear sphere. He reported further that Iraq continued to delay compliance with repeated requests for clear and complete information on items to be reported to IAEA under that plan. In the important area of procurement information, there was no full, final and complete disclosure; there was hardly any disclosure. On the basis of the foregoing, the speaker stated that he could not conclude that Iraq had fully complied with its obligations under the relevant resolutions as they related to the tasks conferred upon IAEA.⁴⁸⁹

Mr. Rolf Ekeus, speaking in his capacity as Executive Chairman of the Special Commission, provided an analogous general assessment of where things stood with regard to the Commission’s three-fold responsibilities, namely, (1) the identification of Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction in the fields assigned to the Commission and the related programmes for their procurement and production; (2) the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of proscribed items and facilities; and (3) the institution of a credible system of ongoing monitoring and verification of Iraq’s compliance with its obligations not to acquire again such weapons of mass destruction. He noted that the speed with which the Commission could discharge its responsibilities was in large measure determined by the degree of Iraq's cooperation. The first stage was not yet complete. Iraq had still not provided the full, final and complete disclosure of all aspects of its programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction, as called for by resolution 707 (1991). With regard to the second stage, Iraq's cooperation continued to be good in the destruction of weapons that it had declared, particularly chemical weapons. Regarding the disposal of the capabilities for the production of weapons of mass destruction, the impediments to the destruction of certain missile-producing capabilities reported in March had been overcome, following a strong reaction by the Security Council and its members to Iraq's refusal to carry out the Commission's instructions. Indeed, the speaker noted that all cases of destruction of major facilities under resolution 687 (1991) had required strong backing by Council members before it was possible to carry out the destruction. The second stage of the Commission's activities remained incomplete, however; many items and facilities remained under seal pending a final decision on whether they should be destroyed, removed or rendered harmless for subsequent use in permitted activities under international monitoring. The third stage, though, was where the most serious problems arose. The impasse reported in March had persisted. Iraq had consistently refused to acknowledge the existence of its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) and under the plans for ongoing monitoring and verification approved by the latter resolution, adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. From the outset, Iraq had indicated that it was willing to accept ongoing monitoring and verification only in principle, and on its own terms. Those terms appeared to be Iraq's exclusive understanding of paragraphs 10 and 12 of resolution 687 (1991). This was an understanding that placed the most severe limitations — expressed as considerations of sovereignty, national security, dignity and non-interference in Iraq's internal affairs and industrial development, as interpreted by Iraq — on any form of monitoring. That position was clearly enunciated in the letter of 28 October 1992 addressed to the Secretary-General by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Iraq,⁴⁹⁰ in which Iraq declared that resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) constituted a flagrant violation of Iraq's sovereignty and called upon the Council "to conduct a radical review, on a basis of justice and fairness, of the terms and provisions of these two resolutions". In the Commission's view, that letter, taken as a whole, was a most retrograde step and illustrated that the promises made of a new approach and renewed cooperation were without real substance. To the extent that Iraq had taken any steps in regard to ongoing monitoring and verification, it had done so in a manner that did not meet the requirements of resolution 715 (1991) and the Commission's plan approved thereunder.

Continuing, the Executive Chairman stressed that the Special Commission, as a subsidiary organ of the Council, could not, in the face of Iraq's consistent and unyielding opposition to the Council's regime for monitoring and verification, fully institute it. Once Iraq acknowledged its obligations under resolution 715 (1991) and the plans approved thereunder, the Commission could, though, determine the extent to which Iraq's legitimate concerns could be accommodated within the requirements for a credible system of monitoring and verification. There could be no doubt, however, that if Iraq refused that acknowledgement and if sanctions and the oil embargo were to be lifted, the effectiveness of the Special Commission in Iraq would be gravely impaired. This was clearly confirmed by the Foreign Minister's letter of 28 October, in which he had also reiterated objections to essential aspects of the Commission's operations in the country, in particular its air transportation, helicopter and high-altitude surveillance activities — all clearly authorized by Council resolutions adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter. If, therefore, sanctions and the oil embargo were to end without Iraq's unconditional acceptance of its obligations under resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991), the Commission's air transportation and aerial surveillance would be halted by withdrawal of Iraq's de facto acquiescence, and monitoring and verification would be reduced purely to visits to such installations as Iraq selected and at such times as it permitted. The speaker added that, since March, the Commission had had to defend vigorously the privileges and immunities of its inspectors and staff in Iraq, in particular their safety and security. However, its frequent protests appeared to be bearing some fruit and there were currently fewer incidents of individual harassment than had recently been the case. As to the conduct of inspection personnel and other staff, which had been the subject of remarks in the Foreign Minister's letter of 28 October, they had acted in the most professional manner, often in most difficult and trying circumstances, in seeking to identify and map out Iraq's programmes. If, on occasion, their activities had appeared intrusive, that had been brought about by lack of cooperation by Iraq and by a sincere desire on the part of the inspection teams to ensure that the Council's mandates were carried out. Finally, the speaker observed that, in making a determination under paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) — which linked the lifting of the oil embargo to Iraq's compliance with section C of that resolution — the Security Council would, of course, take into account all information available to it, over and above what was reported by the Special Commission and by IAEA. However, he trusted that prime importance would be attached to the assessments of the Commission and the Director General of IAEA as the Council's executives under section C of resolution 687 (1991). He looked forward to the day when positive results could be placed before the Council. He regretted, however, that if the course currently pursued by Iraq continued, the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission would have to repeat its March assessment — namely, that the possibility of the Special Commission's certifying Iraq's compliance with its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) did not even arise.⁴⁹¹

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator reported that, on the basis of the new memorandum of understanding between the United Nations and the Government of Iraq, signed on 22 October, a plan of action for a six-month period ending on 31 March 1993 had been finalized to respond to the humanitarian needs of the civilian population throughout Iraq. The inter-agency programme, which entailed the delivery of fuel, food and medical services, covered all regions of Iraq, but emphasized the urgency of bringing humanitarian assistance to the northern provinces because of the impending harsh winter conditions and the internal supply restrictions to that part of the country. It was in an active implementation stage within the framework of available financial resources. The speaker emphasized that for the success of this important and complex operation, it was now essential to have the full cooperation of the Government of Iraq and the financial support of the Member States for the humanitarian programme to Iraq.⁴⁹²

Mr. van der Stoel recalled that, at the Council meeting on 11 August, he had concluded on the basis of the evidence he had received that Iraq had still not ended its policy of repression of the Iraqi civilian population, and was therefore continuing its refusal to comply with resolution 688 (1991). The Government of Iraq had repeatedly stated that this conclusion was subjective and biased. However, it had been arrived at by using the yardsticks of the international human rights instruments to which Iraq had acceded. The Government had also repeatedly referred to special circumstances, such as the war between Iran and Iraq, the Gulf war, the uprisings in the spring of 1991 and the economic embargo, all of which it alleged had had a negative impact on the human rights situation in Iraq. There was not the slightest doubt, however, that the norms of applicable international law did not allow, even in special circumstances, summary or arbitrary executions and forced disappearances or torture. All that had happened in Iraq, not incidentally but on a massive scale. Moreover, there were reasons to fear that even if the special circumstances were to disappear, the violations of human rights would continue. The present order in Iraq had all the characteristics of a totalitarian system and precluded full respect of human rights obligations. The speaker recalled, further, that resolution 688 (1991) also insisted that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq and make available all necessary facilities for their operations. Events, especially in the course of 1992, had increasingly made it clear that Iraq refused to implement in full that part of the resolution. As the Secretary-General had put it in his letter of 24 August to the President of the Security Council, "the Government's position prevents the inter-agency humanitarian programme from providing effective assistance to vulnerable groups in Iraq". United Nations personnel participating in the programme had repeatedly been subjected to harassment, vandalism and violence, mostly in Government-controlled areas. Although a new memorandum of understanding had eventually been signed on 22 October, United Nations sub-offices and guards were no longer allowed in the south of the country, notwithstanding the Secretary-

⁴⁹² Ibid., pp. 118-122.

General's warning in the above-mentioned letter that, in the absence of a United Nations presence in the south, a reliable assessment of conditions prevailing in that region would not be possible. Notwithstanding Iraq's explicit assurances to the contrary, discrimination existed with respect to access to food and health care. The people in the marshlands to the south were subjected to a complete blockade, while the supply of food and fuel reaching the three Kurdish governates in the north had steadily diminished during the year. If the Government of Iraq did not change its policy rapidly and completely, thousands of lives were at risk. The speaker concluded by observing that when a Government tried to deny the right to life to a specific community within the State, the question inevitably arose as to whether it was engaging in genocidal practices. He hoped it would not prove necessary to pose that question, and that the Government of Iraq would make the necessary efforts to prevent a new disaster for the Kurdish people and the population of the southern marshes.⁴⁹³

The representative of Kuwait regretted that Iraq had still not met all its obligations under the relevant Security Council resolutions. Indeed, it seemed to have backed away from some of the basic obligations it had undertaken by its unqualified acceptance of resolution 687 (1991). Perhaps the most obvious example was Iraq's lack of compliance with the Boundary Demarcation Commission and its continued lack of respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kuwait. The situation of Kuwaiti and third-country nationals who were prisoners and detainees, moreover, remained unchanged. Kuwait hoped, in this regard, that the Council would establish a link between the elimination or easing of any form of sanctions against Iraq and the release of the last prisoner and a full account of every missing person. Iraq had also so far failed to comply with its obligations under resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991) to return Government and private property stolen from Kuwait and to pay compensation. The speaker rejected the Government of Iraq's interpretation of resolution 687 (1991), which regarded the lifting of economic sanctions as related to the destruction of the weapons of mass destruction under section C of that resolution. That was an erroneous interpretation, a selective wish by Iraq. Resolution 687 (1991) aimed at restoring and maintaining peace and stability in the region. The sanctions emanating from it were accordingly linked to the full implementation of all the provisions of the resolution. The Council should therefore examine carefully and fairly such questions as whether Iraq renounced, permanently and unreservedly, the use of force against Kuwait; would fully accept and respect the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait as demarcated by the Boundary Commission; and would provide full and immediate access to prisoners of war and other detainees and missing persons, and return them to their countries. These matters, among others, related to essential conditions for future peace and stability in the region and tested the seriousness of the Iraqi regime's commitment to the rule of law. If Iraq continued to fail to fulfil its obligations, Kuwait believed that the Council should, under paragraph 34 of resolution 687 (1991), take such further measures as might be required for the implementation of that resolution and to secure peace and security in the region.⁴⁹⁴

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran refuted the allegations made by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq of a so-called Iranian military build-up, particularly in the area of weapons of mass destruction. He said that Iraq's main objective after its defeat in Kuwait had been to portray the Islamic Republic of Iran as the threat in the region, and to distract the attention of the international community in general and the Council in particular from its non-compliance with Security Council resolutions.⁴⁹⁵

The President then stated his intention, with the agreement of the members of the Council, to suspend the meeting, and invited the members of the Council to meet immediately for consultations.

Decision of 24 November 1992 (3139th meeting): statement by the President

At the second resumption of the 3139th meeting, on 24 November 1992, the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq was given an opportunity to respond to the opening statement made by the President on behalf of the Council and to the questions and concerns expressed by members of the Council during the deliberations the previous day. He maintained that, despite the unjust and arbitrary nature of resolution 687 (1991) and the other resolutions, his country had met the obligations imposed on it, particularly the most substantive ones — those relating to the economic embargo. On the question of boundaries, he stated that Iraq had decided not to participate in the activities of the Boundary Demarcation Commission as its views were not listened to, but it had not hindered the Commission's activities. On the question of missing persons, he asserted that Iraq detained no such persons and that it was cooperating with the Red Cross in searching for them and trying to ascertain their fate. As to why Iraq did not allow the Red Cross to visit the detention centres in the country, he claimed that there were none — only ordinary prisons which the Red Cross was free to visit. With regard to the issue of "Iraq's liability under international law", he reiterated the need for the procedures themselves to be in conformity with international law. Claims for compensation must be linked to fault and damage. Moreover, the party directly concerned should be represented: Iraq, however, was not represented in any way in the machinery that dealt with such claims. As to its foreign debt, he repeated that Iraq could neither repay its debt nor service the interest when there was an economic embargo against it. The speaker denied claims that Iraq had expropriated the property of other countries and companies, maintaining that it had informed those concerned that certain equipment would be used in agricultural and service projects in order to mitigate the suffering of the Iraqis caused by the embargo and that all rights accruing to them from such use would be fully respected. He also challenged the accuracy of allegations that many items of property, including military equipment and private property, had not yet been returned. As for international terrorism, Iraq had reaffirmed its commitments in that regard. It had never engaged in such acts. In relation to resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), the speaker reiterated that they had been adopted not to mitigate the suffering of the Iraqi people, but with the aim of interfering in the internal affairs of Iraq. In three rounds of negotiations with the United Nations, Iraq had tried but failed to reach agreement on a reasonable arrangement that would meet the urgent humanitarian needs of its people, because the influential Powers in the Security Council which were behind the drafting of the two resolutions had frustrated those efforts. In any event, talk of those two resolutions after Iraq had met so many of its obligations relating to the economic embargo was but an attempt to divert attention from the essential issue: namely, the lifting of the economic embargo, in line with paragraph 22 of resolution 687

(1991). Efforts should be deployed in that direction, which alone would make it possible to address the suffering of the Iraqi people. As for what had been said on resolution 688 (1991), the speaker reiterated that Iraq considered that resolution to be a "blatant interference in the internal affairs of Iraq". Nevertheless, it had signed three memorandums of understanding with the United Nations and was cooperating constructively with the Organization on the implementation of the most recent one, of 22 October 1992. He noted generally that the statement made by the President on behalf of the Council had not referred to the substantive achievements made in the implementation of section C of resolution 687 (1991), while the statements of Messrs. Blix and Ekeus had referred to some of those achievements. The speaker renewed his call on the Council to seriously consider discharging its obligations towards Iraq, especially those under paragraph 22 of resolution 687 (1991) which were legally and practically linked with the implementation of paragraphs 8 to 13 of that resolution. In conclusion, he reaffirmed Iraq's desire to continue the dialogue with the Council and to continue clarifying the facts, with a view to reaching better understanding and constructive cooperation between them.⁴⁹⁶

The President then proposed, with the consent of the members of the Council, to suspend the meeting, and invited the members to meet immediately for consultations.

At the third resumption of the 3139th meeting, also on 24 November 1992, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴⁹⁷

The views of the Security Council having been expressed through its President and by the statements of its members on the extent of compliance by the Government of Iraq with its obligations under the relevant resolutions, the Council has listened with close attention to the statements by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq. The Council regrets the lack of any indication in the statements by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq of how the Government of Iraq intends to comply with the resolutions of the Council. It also regrets the baseless threats, allegations and attacks launched by the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq against the Council, the Special Commission, the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Iraq-Kuwait Boundary Demarcation Commission and the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. The Council rejects in toto these threats, allegations and attacks.

Having heard all the interventions in the debate, the Council reiterates its full support for the statement made by the President of the Council on its behalf at the opening of the 3139th meeting.

In the view of the Council, while there have been some positive steps, the Government of Iraq has not yet complied fully and unconditionally with its obligations, must do so and must immediately take the appropriate actions in this regard.

Decision of 24 November 1992: statement by the President

On 24 November 1992, following consultations among the members of the Security Council, the President of the Council made the following statement on their behalf:⁴⁹⁸

The members of the Security Council held informal consultations on 24 November 1992 pursuant to paragraphs 21 and 28 of resolution 687 (1991) and paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

After hearing all the opinions expressed in the course of the consultations, the President concluded that there was no agreement that the necessary conditions existed for a modification of the regimes established in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), as referred to in paragraph 21 of that resolution; in paragraphs 22 to 25 of that resolution, as referred to in paragraph 28 of that resolution and in paragraph 6 of resolution 700 (1991).

23. The situation in the Middle East

Decision of 30 January 1989 (2843rd meeting): resolution 630 (1989)

On 24 January 1989, pursuant to resolution 617 (1988) of 29 July 1988, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on the United Nations Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) for the period from 26 July 1988 to 24 January 1989.¹ He observed that the Force's ability to carry out the tasks that the Council had assigned to it in 1978 was still blocked. Israel continued to refuse to withdraw its forces from Lebanon, and the "security zone" it controlled in southern Lebanon had become a focus of attack, both by those aiming to attack Israel itself and by those with the aim of liberating Lebanese territory from foreign occupation. Attempts by armed elements to infiltrate Israel, which had increased substantially during 1988, and retaliatory air and commando raids by Israel, often far to the north of the UNIFIL area of operation, meant that international peace and security were a long way from being restored. The failure to elect a new President of the Republic and the subsequent existence of two rival governments in Beirut had prevented UNIFIL from making any progress towards fulfilment of its third task, which was to assist the Government in ensuring the return of its effective authority in southern Lebanon. The Secretary-General added that another negative factor had been the continuing harassment of UNIFIL personnel by various armed groups in the area. UNIFIL had endeavoured to provide protection and security to the civilian population, protesting against forced expulsions of Lebanese civilians from their homes in the Israeli-controlled area by the so-called "South Lebanon Army", control, and forced recruitment of local men to that army. UNIFIL had also pursued its efforts to provide humanitarian assistance in its area of operation. The Secretary-General reported further that the Lebanese authorities on both sides in Beirut had stressed their hope that the Security Council would renew the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months, and that Lebanon had submitted a request for an extension of the Force's mandate. The Syrian authorities also supported an extension. The Israeli authorities continued to take the position that Israel's presence in Lebanon was a temporary arrangement, which was necessary for ensuring the security of northern Israel so long as the Government of Lebanon was not able to exercise effective authority and prevent its territory from being used to launch attacks against Israel. They did not consider that UNIFIL, as a peacekeeping force, could assume that responsibility.

The Secretary-General acknowledged that, given the negative developments thus described, and in particular the continuing inability of UNIFIL to carry out its original mandate, it was understandable that questions had been asked about whether the Force should be maintained at its current strength. He presented four countervailing considerations that he thought the Council would wish to take into account in considering Lebanon's request for a mandate extension: the Council's conviction that a solution to the problems of southern Lebanon lay in the full implementation of resolution 425 (1978); the valuable role played by UNIFIL in controlling the level of violence in southern Lebanon; the Force's humanitarian support to the population in its area of operation; and its role — as seen by the people of Lebanon as a whole — as a symbol of the international community's commitment to the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of their country. On the basis of those arguments, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council should accede to Lebanon's request and renew the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.

At its 2843rd meeting, on 30 January 1989, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. At the same meeting, the President (Malaysia) drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 19 January 1989 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General by which the Government of Lebanon requested the Security Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.² The Government was convinced that, in spite of the difficult conditions in southern Lebanon due to the continuing occupation by Israel in the so-called "security zone", the presence of UNIFIL continued to be highly necessary, and constituted an important factor of stability and an international commitment to the upholding of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon. The Government reaffirmed the terms of the UNIFIL mandate, as laid down in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions, and stressed the need to enable UNIFIL to implement that mandate.

The President also drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 630 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 24 and 27 January 1989, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 19 January 1989 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1989;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Decision of 31 March 1989 (2851st meeting):
statement by the President

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Senegal) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, she had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁴

The members of the Security Council express their grave concern at the recent deterioration of the situation in Lebanon, which has left many victims among the civilian population and caused considerable material damage.

In view of the threat that this situation poses to peace, security and stability in the region, they express encouragement and support for all ongoing efforts to find a peaceful solution to the Lebanese crisis, notably those made by the Ministerial Committee of the League of Arab States led by Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Kuwait.

They urge all the parties to put an immediate end to the confrontations, to respond favourably to the appeals launched for an effective ceasefire and to avoid any action that might further heighten the tension.

They reaffirm their support for the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

The members of the Security Council also stress the importance of the role of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and reaffirm their resolve to continue to keep the evolution of the situation in Lebanon under close review.

Decision of 24 April 1989 (2858th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2858th meeting, held on 24 April 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council renewed its consideration of the item. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵

The members of the Security Council, gravely concerned by the sufferings caused to the civilian population by the worsening situation in Lebanon, reaffirm their statement of 31 March 1989, in which, in particular, they urged all parties to respond favourably to the appeals for an effective ceasefire.

They reiterate their full support for the action of the Ministerial Committee of the League of Arab States led by Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Kuwait, in order to put an end to the loss of human lives, to alleviate the sufferings of the Lebanese people and to achieve an effective ceasefire indispensable for a settlement of the Lebanese crisis.

They invite the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the Ministerial Committee of the League of Arab States, to make all possible efforts and to make all contacts which could be deemed useful for these same purposes.

Decisions of 30 May 1989 (2862nd meeting): resolution 633 (1989) and statement by the President

On 22 May 1989, pursuant to resolution 624 (1988) of 30 November 1988, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) for the period from 18 November 1988 to 22 May 1989, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).⁶ He stated that, in accordance with its mandate and in cooperation with the parties, UNDOF had continued to supervise the observance of the ceasefire between Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic and to supervise the area of separation to ensure that there were no military forces within it. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained quiet and there had been no serious incidents. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) had been dealt with in his report on the situation in the Middle East,⁷ submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 42/209 B of 11 December 1987. The Secretary-General observed that, despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached.⁸ He continued to hope that determined efforts would be made by all concerned to tackle the problem in all its aspects, with a view to arriving at a just and durable peace settlement, as called for by the Council in its resolution 338 (1973). In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended, with the agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 30 November 1989.

At its 2862nd meeting, on 30 May 1989, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 633 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1989;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, following the adoption of resolution 633 (1989), the President of the Council made the following statement:¹⁰

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 24: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 31 July 1989 (2873rd meeting): resolution 639 (1989) and statement by the President

On 21 July 1989, pursuant to resolution 630 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 25 January to 21 July 1989.¹¹ He regretted that, after another difficult period, UNIFIL remained unable to implement its mandate under resolution 425 (1978). The Force had again been unable to make progress towards deployment to the international border. Israel, maintaining the policy described in previous reports, had kept its forces in Lebanon and strengthened its hold on the so-called "security zone" where positions occupied by its own forces and those of the South Lebanon Army had increased by 18.5 per cent during the period under review. At the same time, there had been an increase both in attempts by armed elements to infiltrate Israel and in attacks by the Israeli Air Force on targets in Lebanon well to the north of the UNIFIL area. International peace and security had therefore not been restored. UNIFIL efforts relating to its third task — to assist the Government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area — would also remain frustrated as long as the tragic situation in Beirut remained unresolved.

At the same time, however, UNIFIL had certain positive achievements to its credit, such as its significant role in controlling the level of violence in its area of operation and in providing humanitarian assistance to the people of southern Lebanon. Its presence also had a symbolic value: it underlined the conviction of the Security Council and the international community that the solution to the problems of southern Lebanon lay in the full implementation of resolution 425 (1978), and symbolized the international community's commitment to the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Lebanon. The Secretary-General pointed out, however, that the cost of those contributions was high. UNIFIL and its personnel were exposed to considerable dangers, and the Force had suffered loss of life and other casualties during the current mandate period as a result of harassment of its personnel by various armed groups in the area. He stated that significant efforts had been undertaken to improve further the security of UNIFIL personnel and facilities, and renewed his appeal to the parties concerned to cooperate with the Force with a view to enhancing the security of its members and helping them carry out their tasks. Meanwhile, by a letter dated 13 July 1989 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹² the representative of Lebanon had conveyed his country's request to the Council to extend the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months, adding that the renewal of the Force's mandate was "a desideratum for both Government and people of Lebanon and one which clearly and self-evidently enjoys the consensus of all leaders and all classes of the people". The Secretary-General observed that, as a result of that request, the Council was faced with a complex decision. On the one hand, there were the frustrations and dangers which resulted from the fact that UNIFIL was prevented from carrying out its mandate. On the other hand, there was the positive contribution of UNIFIL and the considerable distress that would be caused in Lebanon if the Council were to make any substantial change in the Force's strength or deployment. He believed that the prevailing view among the members of the Council was that due weight should be given to the latter consideration and that this was not the moment to make radical changes, especially when international efforts were under way to resolve the wider Lebanese crisis. The Secretary-General accordingly recommended that the Council extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months, until 31 January 1990, in accordance with Lebanon's request.

At its 2873rd meeting, on 31 July 1989, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of agenda, the President (Yugoslavia) drew the attention of the Council members to the above-mentioned letter of 13 July 1989 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General in which the Government of Lebanon requested the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further six-month period, and to take action for the implementation of the resolutions it had adopted on the matter since 1978.¹³

The President also drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.¹⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 639 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 21 July 1989, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 13 July 1989 from the representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 January 1990;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting, after the adoption of resolution 639 (1989), the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁵

The members of the Security Council note with deep regret and sorrow that, during the current mandate period, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon has suffered additional loss of life and other casualties as a result of various serious incidents in the area of its deployment, including the harassment of its personnel by various armed groups and forces.

The members of the Council convey in this regard their deep-felt sympathy and condolences to the Governments of Ireland, Norway and Sweden and, through them, to the bereaved families of the victims and pay tribute to the valiant action, courage and self-sacrifice manifested by all the members of the Force, in service of the ideals of peace in the region.

They take note with great concern of reports appearing today that Lieutenant Colonel Higgins may have been murdered in Lebanon and, should these reports prove to be true, express their outrage that such a cruel and criminal act should be committed against an officer who serves the United Nations on a peacekeeping mission in Lebanon. They draw attention to Security Council resolution 638 (1989) adopted this morning, condemn all acts of hostage-taking and abduction and demand the immediate safe release of all hostages and abducted persons wherever and by whomever they are being held.

Given the serious situation in the zone of Force operations, the members of the Council consider it important to reaffirm their profound concern over the safety and security of Force personnel, who are exposed to constant threats and danger.

The members of the Council note with appreciation that, as stated in the latest Secretary-General's report on the Force, "significant efforts have been undertaken to improve further the security of Force personnel and facilities" during the current mandate period.

They call upon all parties to do their utmost in order to ensure the effective reinforcement of the security of the members of the Force and to enable the Force to carry out its mandate, as laid down in Security Council resolution 425 (1978).

Decision of 15 August 1989 (2875th meeting):
statement by the President

By a letter dated 15 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁶ the Secretary-General, in the exercise of his responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations, requested an urgent meeting of the Council. In his opinion, the current crisis in Lebanon posed a serious threat to international peace and security. He stressed that the United Nations had a responsibility to prevent further bloodshed in the country and to support the wider efforts, led by the League of Arab States, for a resolution of the conflict. As a step in that direction, the Secretary-General believed that an effective ceasefire was imperative. What was required was a concerted effort by the Council as a whole to impress upon the parties to the conflict that there was an immediate need to halt all military activities and to adhere to a ceasefire so that the efforts of the Tripartite Committee of Arab Heads of State¹⁷ might continue unimpeded.

At its 2875th meeting, on 15 August 1989, the Council included the Secretary-General's letter in its agenda. At the same meeting, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (Algeria) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸

In response to the urgent appeal addressed to the Security Council by the Secretary-General in his letter of 15 August 1989, the Council met immediately and, without prejudice to any subsequent action by it, adopted the following statement:

Deeply concerned at the further deterioration of the situation in Lebanon, the Security Council profoundly deplores the intensification of the shelling and the bitter fighting in recent days. It expresses its great disquiet at the loss of human lives and the untold sufferings that it causes to the Lebanese people.

The Council reaffirms its statement of 24 April 1989 and urgently appeals to all the parties to put an immediate end to all operations and to all firing and shelling on land and at sea. It firmly appeals to all the parties to observe a total and immediate ceasefire. It also appeals to them to do everything possible to secure the consolidation of the ceasefire, the opening of the lines of communication and the lifting of the sieges.

The Council expresses its full support for the Tripartite Committee of the Arab Heads of State in the efforts it is making with a view to putting an end to the trials of the Lebanese people through the establishment of an effective and definitive ceasefire and the putting into effect of a plan for the settlement of the Lebanese crisis in all its aspects by guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon. It appeals to all States and to all the parties likewise to support the efforts of the Tripartite Committee.

In this context, the Council invites the Secretary-General to pursue all appropriate contacts, in liaison with the Tripartite Committee, in order to ensure observance of the ceasefire, and to keep it informed on the matter.

Decision of 20 September 1989 (2884th meeting): statement by the President

At its 2884th meeting, held on 20 September 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed consideration of the item entitled "The situation in the Middle East: letter dated 15 August 1989 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council". The President (Brazil) stated that, ¹⁷ The Tripartite Committee comprised the Kings of Morocco and Saudi Arabia and the President of Algeria.

following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council.¹⁹

The members of the Security Council, recalling their statement of 15 August 1989, welcome the resumption of the work of the Tripartite High Arab Committee set up to resolve the Lebanese crisis.

In this regard, they once again express to the Tripartite High Committee full support in its efforts to stop the bloodshed and to establish an atmosphere conducive to ensuring security, stability and national reconciliation in Lebanon.

They strongly urge respect for the appeal by the Tripartite High Committee for an immediate and comprehensive ceasefire, the implementation of the security arrangements and the establishment of the necessary conditions for national reconciliation in Lebanon.

They express their full support to the Tripartite High Committee in its action to put into effect a plan for the settlement of the Lebanese crisis in all its aspects by guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

The members of the Security Council welcome the contacts maintained by the Secretary-General of the United Nations since 15 August 1989 with the members of the Tripartite High Committee and invite him to pursue these contacts and to keep the Council informed.

Decision of 7 November 1989 (2891st meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2891st meeting, held on 7 November 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council renewed its consideration of the item. The President (China) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁰

The members of the Security Council recall their statements of 15 August and 20 September 1989, in which they have expressed their full support for the Tripartite High Committee of Arab Heads of State in its action for the implementation of a settlement plan for the Lebanese crisis in all its aspects by guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

In this spirit, they welcome the election of the President of the Lebanese Republic and the ratification of the Taif Agreement by the Lebanese Parliament. The members of the Council pay particular tribute to the high sense of responsibility and to the courage of the Lebanese members of Parliament. An essential stage has thus been accomplished on the road to restoring the Lebanese State and establishing renovated institutions.

In the aftermath of this constitutional election, the members of the Council call upon all Lebanese to stand resolutely by their President with a view to uniting the aspirations of the Lebanese people to achieve peace, dignity and harmony.

At this historic moment, the members of the Security Council urge all sectors of the Lebanese people, including the armed forces, to come to the support of their President in order to achieve the goals of the Lebanese people which are the restoration of the unity, independence and sovereignty of Lebanon on its entire territory, so that Lebanon can reassume its role as a leading centre of civilization and culture for the Arab nation and for the world.

Decision of 22 November 1989 (2894th meeting): statement by the President

At its 2894th meeting, held on 22 November 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council renewed its consideration of the item. The President (China) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²¹

The members of the Security Council express their deep indignation and dismay over the assassination of Mr. René Moawad, President of the Lebanese Republic, earlier today in Beirut. They express their sympathy and condolences to the family of the late President, to the Prime Minister and to the Lebanese people.

The members of the Council strongly condemn this cowardly, criminal and terrorist act for what it is, an attack upon the unity of Lebanon, the democratic processes and the process of national reconciliation.

The members of the Council recall their statement of 7 November 1989, and reaffirm their support for the efforts undertaken by the Tripartite High Committee of the League of Arab States and for the Taif Agreement. These remain the only basis for guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

The members of the Council reiterate their call of 7 November to all sectors of the Lebanese people to continue the process of achieving the goals of the restoration of the Lebanese State and the establishment of renovated institutions that had started with the election of President Moawad and the appointment of Prime Minister Salim al-Hoss. Democratic Lebanese institutions must be strongly supported and the process of national reconciliation must go forward. This is the only way that Lebanese national unity can be fully restored.

The members of the Council solemnly reaffirm their support for the Taif Agreement, ratified by the Lebanese Parliament on 5 November 1989. In this regard, they urge all Lebanese people to exercise restraint, to rededicate themselves to the urgent task of national reconciliation and to demonstrate their commitment to democratic processes.

The members of the Security Council are convinced that all those who seek to divide the people of Lebanon through such cowardly, criminal and terrorist acts of violence cannot, and will not, succeed.

Decisions of 29 November 1989 (2895th meeting): resolution 645 (1989) and statement by the President

On 22 November 1989, pursuant to resolution 633 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 23 May to 21 November 1989, and on the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).²² He stated that UNDOF had continued, with the cooperation of the parties, to perform its functions effectively. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained quiet and there had been no serious incidents. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) had been dealt with in his report on the situation in the Middle East,²³ submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 43/54 A of 6 December 1988. The Secretary-General observed that, despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached.²⁴ He continued to hope that determined efforts would be made by all concerned to tackle the problem in all its aspects, with a view to arriving at a just and durable peace settlement, as called for by the Council in its resolution 338 (1973). In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended, with the agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 30 May 1990.

At its 2895th meeting, on 29 November 1989, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁵ The draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 645 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately Security Council resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 1990;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, following the adoption of resolution 645 (1989), the President made the following statement:²⁶

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 24: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decision of 27 December 1989 (2903rd meeting): statement by the President

At its 2903rd meeting, held on 27 December 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council renewed its consideration of the item. The President (Colombia) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁷

Recalling their statements of 7 November 1989 and 22 November 1989, and relevant Security Council resolutions, the members of the Council reaffirm their full support for the efforts undertaken by the Tripartite High Committee of the League of Arab States and for the Taif Agreement. These remain the only basis for guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

In this regard, the members of the Council welcome the election of Elias Hrawi as successor to the late René Moawad as President of the Lebanese Republic and the appointment of the Lebanese Government led by the Prime Minister Salim al-Hoss.

The members of the Council reaffirm the urgency of continuing the process of national reconciliation and political reform embodied in the Taif Agreement, and they express their deep concern over obstacles that have delayed progress in achieving these goals.

The members of the Council support President Hrawi's efforts in implementation of the Taif Agreement to deploy Lebanese Government forces to restore central government authority over all Lebanese territory.

The members of the Security Council reiterate their call on the Lebanese people, and in particular all Lebanese Government officials, civilian and military, to support their President and the constitutional process initiated at Taif to achieve peacefully the restoration of the unity, independence and sovereignty of Lebanon on its entire territory.

Decision of 31 January 1990 (2906th meeting):

On 25 January 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 22 July 1989 to 25 January 1990.²⁸ He stated that UNIFIL was still unable to implement the mandate given to it by the Council in resolution 425 (1978). Israel, maintaining the policy outlined in previous reports, had again increased the positions occupied in southern Lebanon by the Israel Defense Forces and the de facto forces. It had also further strengthened its hold on what UNIFIL referred to as the "Israel controlled area" — the so-called "security zone" — by introducing there some elements of a civilian administration in which a leading role was given to the de facto forces. At the same time attempts by armed elements to infiltrate Israel and air and ground attacks by the Israeli forces on targets in Lebanon well to the north of the UNIFIL area had continued. The Secretary-General observed, however, that there had been positive developments in Lebanon, including the election of a new President and the appointment of a new Government committed to deploying Lebanese Government forces to restore central government authority over all Lebanese territory, in implementation of the Taif Agreement. He stated that UNIFIL stood ready to play its part in assisting the restoration of the Government's authority in southern Lebanon, including deployment of units of the Lebanese Army there. He accordingly recommended that the Council accede to Lebanon's request, and extend the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months. In making that recommendation, however, he also drew the Council's attention to the fact that there had been no easing of the difficulties faced by UNIFIL, such as loss of life and other casualties as well as continuing harassment.

At its 2906th meeting, on 31 January 1990, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Côte d'Ivoire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 11 January 1990 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁹ The Government of Lebanon requested the Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further six-month period and to take action for the implementation of the resolutions it had adopted on the matter since 1978. It contended that the renewal of the Force's mandate was of particular significance at a time when the new constitutionally elected government, with the support of the international community, had embarked on the realization of one of the most important national goals, namely extending central government authority over all Lebanese territory.

The President also drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 648 (1990), which reads:

²⁹ S/21074.

³⁰ S/21117.

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 25 January 1990, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 11 January 1990 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1990;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

Decisions of 31 May 1990 (2925th meeting): resolution 655 (1990) and statement by the
President

On 22 May 1990, pursuant to resolution 645 (1989), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 22 November 1989 to 21 May 1990, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).³¹ He stated that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained quiet and there had been no serious incidents. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) had

At its 2925th meeting, on 31 May 1990, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Finland) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 655 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

At the same meeting, following the adoption of resolution 655 (1990), the President made the following statement:³⁵

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 24: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 31 July 1990 (2931st meeting): resolution 659 (1990) and statement by
the President

On 24 July 1990, pursuant to resolution 648 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 26 January to 24 July 1990.³⁶ He stated that Israel's attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained unchanged. Israel continued to build up the de facto forces, the so-called "South Lebanon Army", and to improve their ability to reinforce quickly the strength of the Israel Defense Forces inside Lebanon. A consequence of that policy was that the Israeli-controlled area was becoming increasingly separated from the rest of Lebanon. Although hostile incidents in the UNIFIL area were fewer during the current mandate period than in the corresponding period in 1989, the Israel Defense Forces and the de facto forces had carried out many air and artillery attacks on targets to the north of the UNIFIL area. For its part, UNIFIL had continued its efforts to prevent its area of operation from being used for hostile activities, achieving a high degree of calm in those parts that lay outside the Israeli-controlled area. Recent months had seen a noteworthy increase in economic activity in those parts, with UNIFIL establishing some new positions close to the edge of the Israeli-controlled area in order to foster the confidence necessary for investment. UNIFIL had also continued to press the Israeli authorities to end the shelling of civilian targets by the de facto forces and to withdraw those forces from certain positions that were most frequently responsible for such firing and that attracted attacks by armed elements. In carrying out its duties, the Force had again suffered fatalities, leading the Secretary-General to reiterate his appeal to the parties to cooperate with it, respect its international and neutral status and avoid exposing its members to danger. He concluded that, although it had not yet been possible for UNIFIL to carry out in full its mandate, the Force continued to make an important contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security in a volatile area. He accordingly recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.

At its 2931st meeting, on 31 July 1990, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Malaysia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to two letters dated 16 July 1990 and 25 July 1990 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General.³⁷ In his letter of 16 July 1990, the representative of Lebanon conveyed his Government's request that the mandate of UNIFIL be extended for a further period of six months. At a time when it had patiently embarked on a policy of extending its authority over its national territory, the Government was persuaded that the presence of UNIFIL in southern Lebanon remained essential. However, renewal of its mandate should not be considered as an alternative to the fulfilment of its original mandate. Israel had continued its daily acts of aggression against the civilians of southern Lebanon, and had been engaged in the process of linking the economic and administrative infrastructure of southern Lebanon to its own. That "creeping annexation" should be stopped through the immediate implementation of resolution 425 (1978). In his letter of 25 July 1990, the representative of Lebanon informed the Secretary-General that the Israeli occupation forces were building a road in the Kawkaba region, where UNIFIL was stationed. Despite the attempts of UNIFIL to stop them, the Israelis had finished the road by force, injuring a member of UNIFIL. Strongly condemning such practices, the Government of Lebanon called on the international community to take all necessary steps to put an end to the Israeli practices and acts of aggression.

³⁷ S/21396 and S/21409.

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.³⁸ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 659 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 24 and 26 July 1990, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Taking note of the letter dated 16 July 1990 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 January 1991;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting, the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:³⁹

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, submitted in conformity with resolution 648 (1990) of 31 January 1990.

They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Security Council extends the mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978, the members of the Council again stress the need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and for the efforts of the Lebanese Government to extend its authority over all Lebanese territory.

The members of the Security Council take this opportunity to commend the troops of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon and the troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decision of 24 September 1990: letter from the President of the Security Council to the Secretary-General

By a letter dated 24 September 1990, the President of the Security Council informed the Secretary-General as follows:⁴⁰

The members of the Security Council agreed, during their consideration in consultations on 31 July 1990 of the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon on the occasion of the renewal of the mandate of the Force to request that a review of the scale and deployment of the Force be carried out by the Secretariat in the light of the performance of its functions since its establishment in 1978 and with a view to fully implementing resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978. The Council is mindful of the great benefit that the presence of the Force continues to contribute to Lebanon. The members of the Council also agreed that the review should be carried out during the interim period of six months for which the mandate of the Force was extended on 31 July 1990, that is, prior to the expiration on 31 January 1991 of the current mandate.

The members of the Council were of the view that such a review would accord with the spirit of the statement made by the President on behalf of the Council at the 2924th meeting, held on 30 May 1990, in connection with the Council's consideration of the item entitled "United Nations peacekeeping operations", and would provide the Council with a basis on which to assess whether existing arrangements for the Force should be maintained or changed.

Decisions of 30 November 1990 (2964th meeting): resolution 679 (1990) and statement by the President

On 23 November 1990, pursuant to resolution 655 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 22 May to 23 November 1990, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).⁴¹ He stated that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained quiet and there had been no serious incidents. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) would be dealt with in his report on the situation in the Middle East,⁴² to be submitted shortly pursuant to General Assembly resolution 44/40 A of 4 December 1989. The Secretary-General observed that, despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached.⁴³ He continued to hope that determined efforts would be made by all concerned to tackle the problem in all its aspects, with a view to arriving at a just and durable peace settlement, as called for by the Council in its resolution 338 (1973). In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended, with the agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 31 May 1991.

At its 2964th meeting, on 30 November 1990, the Security Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁴⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 679 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 31 May 1991;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, after the adoption of resolution 679 (1990), the President made the following statement:⁴⁵

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 23: "Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached." That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 30 January 1991 (2975th meeting): resolution 684 (1991) and statement by the President

On 23 January 1991, pursuant to resolution 359 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 25 July 1990 to 22 January 1991,⁴⁶ and on the results of a review of the scale and deployment of UNIFIL,⁴⁷ carried out in accordance with the request made by the members of the Council on 31 July 1990.⁴⁸ The review concluded that the scale and deployment of UNIFIL were determined by two main factors: the Council's commitment to resolution 425 (1978) as the correct solution to the problem of southern Lebanon; and the interim tasks that the Force had carried out with the Council's approval (controlling the level of hostilities in its present area of deployment and providing humanitarian support to the civilian population) until it was enabled to carry out its original tasks of confirming the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restoring international peace and security and assisting the Government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area. The review took note of the fact that UNIFIL faced certain difficulties and dangers owing to the anomaly that arose from giving a peacekeeping force a mandate to prevent its area from being used for hostile activities when those activities included resistance to an occupation against which the Security Council had repeatedly pronounced itself. It was clear that the solution to that anomaly must lie in the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanese territory, accompanied by the progressive assumption by the Lebanese Army of responsibility for security in the present area of deployment of UNIFIL. Finally, the review recommended that, for the time being, there should be no substantive change in the Force's function or in its deployment but that certain measures should be taken to streamline the Force which would produce a saving of some 10 per cent in its military strength.⁴⁹

In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council of recent consultations with the Lebanese authorities on the implementation of their decision relating to the deployment of the army to the south. He had welcomed the idea of the progressive deployment of the army to southern Lebanon as a necessary first step in the restoration of the Government's effective authority there. UNIFIL stood ready to cooperate with the Lebanese Army when it reached the UNIFIL area and to begin progressively transferring to it responsibility for security. Meanwhile, Israel's attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. The Israeli authorities continued to build up the de facto forces in the Israeli-controlled area and to increase the military positions held by them and the Israel Defense Forces. For its part, UNIFIL continued, to the best of its ability and in accordance with its mandate, to prevent its area of operation from being used for hostile activities. Hostile activities in the UNIFIL area had again declined during the current mandate, but the Israel Defense Forces and the de facto forces had carried out many air and artillery attacks on targets to the north of the UNIFIL area. A high degree of calm and tranquillity prevailed in those parts of the UNIFIL area that lay outside the Israeli-controlled area and economic activity continued to increase there. In order to foster the confidence necessary for such investment, UNIFIL had established further new positions close to the edge of the Israeli-controlled area. The Secretary-General concluded that, although it had not yet been possible for UNIFIL to carry out in full the mandate given to it in 1978, the Force continued to make an important contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security in a volatile area. He accordingly recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months, until 31 July 1991.

At its 2975th meeting, on 30 January 1991, the Council included the Secretary-General's report on UNIFIL in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Zaire) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 14 January 1991 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General, conveying his Government's request to the Security Council to extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.⁵⁰ He stated that some major constructive developments had taken place since the last renewal of the Force's mandate: a Government of national unity had been formed; the army had assumed complete control of the Greater Beirut area; and the Council of Ministers had decided to further deploy the Lebanese Army in certain regions in the south and the western Bekaa adjacent to the area occupied by Israel. That would serve as a prelude to the full implementation of resolution 425 (1978), when the Government and the Lebanese Army, with the help of UNIFIL, would extend the Government's authority over the entire south up to the internationally recognized boundaries. In Lebanon's view, the time had come for the Council not to tolerate any more Israel's continuous occupation of Lebanese land and to demand the prompt implementation of resolution 425 (1978), which Israel consistently flouted under the pretext of its security and in violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁵¹ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 684 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General of 23 and 28 January 1991 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, and taking note of the observations expressed therein, and without prejudice to the views of the Member States thereon,

Taking note of the letter dated 14 January 1991 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1991;

2. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

3. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

4. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978), 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting, after the adoption of resolution 684 (1991), the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁵²

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon submitted in conformity with Security Council resolution 659 (1990) of 31 July 1990.

They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of the Force for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978, the members of the Council again stress the need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and for the recent efforts of the Lebanese Government to extend its authority over all Lebanese territory.

The members of the Council take this opportunity to commend the troops of the Force and the troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 31 July 1991 (2997th meeting): resolution 701 (1991) and statement by
the President

On 21 July 1991, pursuant to resolution 684 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 23 January to 20 July 1991.⁵⁸ In Lebanon, outside the Israeli-controlled area, progress in the implementation of the Taif Agreement had continued. The Government of Lebanon had, in particular, declared its intention to dissolve and disarm all Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias by 30 September 1991. Significant steps in this regard had been taken in parts of southern Lebanon outside the UNIFIL area of operation. Important progress had also been achieved in the deployment of the Lebanese Army in southern Lebanon, as part of the Government's plans for the return of its effective authority in the area. UNIFIL had continued to discuss with the Lebanese authorities arrangements for the progressive transfer to the Lebanese Army of responsibility for security in the areas currently controlled by UNIFIL. It was envisaged that the transfer would proceed in parallel with movement by UNIFIL southwards towards the border and the progressive withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Israeli-controlled area, thus bringing about the implementation of resolution 425 (1978). Israel, while taking note of the efforts of the Government of Lebanon to restore its authority in southern Lebanon, was not at present prepared to modify the security arrangements which, in spite of resolution 425 (1978), it had established on Lebanese territory. Nor did it consider that UNIFIL, as a peacekeeping force, could replace those arrangements. In the meantime, although UNIFIL endeavoured to prevent its area from being used for hostile activities, recent weeks had seen a significant increase both in resistance operations inside the Israeli-controlled area and in harassment of villages to the north of it, by the Israel Defense Forces and de facto forces inflicting death, injury and material loss on the civilian population. UNIFIL did all it could to protect civilians but its ability to do so was limited when they were the subject of deliberate attack. Moreover, the Force itself continued to be exposed to many dangers. The Secretary-General believed, however, that the Council would again judge that, although it had not yet been possible for UNIFIL to carry out in full the mandate given to it in 1978, the

Force continued to make an important contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security in a volatile area. In addition, recent positive developments in Lebanon had improved the prospects of its being able to carry out that part of its mandate which required it to assist the Government in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area. He accordingly recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months, until 31 January 1992. The Secretary-General also recalled the main recommendations made in the Secretariat's review of the scale and deployment of UNIFIL, which he believed to be on the right lines, and noted that the Council had not yet taken formal action on them.

At its 2997th meeting, on 31 July 1991, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Cuba) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 15 July 1991 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General, conveying his Government's request that the Security Council extend the mandate of UNIFIL for a further period of six months.⁵⁹ He stated that, since the last renewal of the Force's mandate, the Government had extended its authority beyond the Greater Beirut area towards the north, east and south and, in accordance with the timetable of the Taif Agreement, militias previously operating in those areas had been disbanded and their weapons turned in to the Lebanese Army. One exception to Lebanon's success remained, however; that was in the southern most region of the country, where Israel imposed its reign of terror over the civilian population. The Government was sparing no effort to extend its sovereignty over southern Lebanon, in fulfilment of Security Council resolution 425 (1978). Israel, however, had amplified its refusal to withdraw from southern Lebanon and had intensified its aggressions by extending its attacks beyond the occupied zone. Senior Israeli officials were declaring publicly that they had no intention of withdrawing from the so-called "security zone" and would continue to strengthen Israel's proxy militia there. Lebanon insisted that it was no longer acceptable that the occupation of southern Lebanon be allowed to stand, in violation of the Charter as well as numerous Security Council resolutions, and demanded the prompt implementation of resolution 425 (1978).

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 701 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982 and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 21 July 1991, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Recalling the report of the Secretariat team of 28 January 1991, and without prejudice to the views of Member States thereon,

Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁶¹

The members of the Security Council have noted with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon submitted in conformity with resolution 684 (1991) of 30 January 1991.

They reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. The members of the Council take this opportunity to commend the troops of the Force and the troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 29 November 1991 (3019th meeting): resolution 722 (1991) and statement by the President

On 22 November 1991, pursuant to resolution 695 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 21 May to 20 November 1991, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).⁶² He stated that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained generally quiet and there had been only one serious incident. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) had been dealt with in his report on the situation in the Middle East,⁶³ submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 45/83 A of 13 December 1990. The Secretary-General observed that, despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached.⁶⁴ He continued to hope that determined efforts would be made by all concerned to tackle the problem in all its aspects, with a view to arriving at a just and durable peace settlement, as called for by the Council in its resolution 338 (1973). In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended, with the agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 31 May 1992.

At its 3019th meeting, on 29 November 1991, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Romania) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁶⁵ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 722 (1991), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

(a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;

(c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, following the adoption of resolution 722 (1991), the President made the following statement:⁶⁶

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 24: “Despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continues to be potentially dangerous and is likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem can be reached.” That statement of the Secretary-General reflects the view of the Security Council.

Decisions of 29 January 1992 (3040th meeting): resolution 734 (1992) and statement by
the President

On 21 January 1992, pursuant to resolution 701 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 21 July 1991 to 21 January 1992.⁶⁷ He observed that the period under review had been more difficult than preceding ones both for UNIFIL and for the inhabitants of southern Lebanon. Hostilities between Lebanese resistance groups and the Israel Defense Forces/de facto forces had intensified and the number of casualties had increased. UNIFIL had continued to do its best to prevent its area of deployment from being used for hostile activities and to protect civilians caught up in the conflict, although its ability to do the latter was limited by the amount of firing directed at UNIFIL itself. Hostilities in the UNIFIL area had generally focused on certain Israel Defense Forces/de facto forces positions that were close to population centres and in areas where UNIFIL was deployed. The Secretary-General endorsed the proposal made by his predecessor to the Government of Israel that the Israel Defense Forces/de facto forces be withdrawn from these positions, which would then be taken over by UNIFIL: such a move would have a beneficial effect and the proposal merited an early and positive response. He remarked further that the Lebanese Army’s forthcoming assumption of responsibility for a part of the UNIFIL area of operation was encouraging, and would certainly contribute to internal stability and to the restoration of the Government’s authority in the area. Israel’s general attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained, however, as described in previous reports. The Israeli authorities had recently added that, following the beginning of the Arab-Israeli peace talks, all problems between Israel and Lebanon — including the interpretation and implementation of resolution 425 (1978) and subsequent resolutions of the Security

Council — should be dealt with in the bilateral talks in the framework of the peace process. Meanwhile, Israel continued to maintain the de facto forces and to consolidate its hold over the Israeli-controlled area, which was increasingly being separated from the rest of Lebanon. The Secretary-General concluded that, while the situation had remained difficult and UNIFIL was still far from being able to carry out its mandate, the Force’s contribution to stability in this very volatile region remained important. It was all the more valuable at a time when Arabs and Israelis were engaged in peace negotiations. He therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the mandate of UNIFIL for another period of six months, until 31 July 1992. He also urged the Council to approve the recommendations summarized in paragraph 59 of the review of the scale and deployment of UNIFIL,⁶⁸ submitted to the Council by his predecessor on 28 January 1991. Like his predecessor, he considered the recommendations to be on the right lines: they would permit a reduction of some 10 per cent in the military strength of UNIFIL without affecting the Force’s operational capability to carry out the tasks assigned to it by the Security Council.⁶⁹

At its 3040th meeting, on 29 January 1992, the Security Council included the Secretary-General’s report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the members of the Council to the following letters addressed to the Secretary-General: two letters dated 17 January 1992 and 21 January 1992 from the representative of Lebanon;⁷⁰ and a letter dated 27 January 1992 from the representative of Israel.⁷¹

In his letter of 17 January 1992, the representative of Lebanon transmitted his Government’s request for an extension of the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months. He stated that, since the last renewal of the Force’s mandate, some major constructive developments had taken place, which had further strengthened the position of the Lebanese Army and internal security forces in the south: the Army had confiscated all heavy and medium weapons and banned all forms of armed presence in areas under its control; deployment of the Lebanese

Army had proceeded smoothly in areas in the south, in coordination with UNIFIL; and consultations were under way to ascertain the best way in which the Lebanese Army could take over additional areas from UNIFIL. Israel, however, had amplified its refusal to withdraw from southern Lebanon despite the participation of both countries in the Arab-Israeli peace conference, which had begun in Madrid and proceeded to Washington. As a pretext for perpetuating its occupation of the south, Israel sought to destabilize Lebanon so as to prevent the Lebanese Army from keeping law and order. Calling the attention of the Council to the gravity of the increase in hostilities in southern Lebanon, the Government of Lebanon implored the Council to take new and unprecedented steps to bring an end to the violence, through the prompt implementation of its resolution 425 (1978), which would enable the Government to extend its authority over the entire south of the country and up to its internationally recognized boundaries. In his letter of 21 January 1992, the representative of Lebanon stated that Israel had continued its attacks on villagers and their property in the south of the country. As a result, at least 80 per cent of the villagers had fled and one of the villages had been incorporated into Israel's so-called "security zone". The Government condemned these latest acts of aggression, and alerted the international community to the fact that Israel was seeking to extend the zone which it occupied in Lebanese territory, even as it participated in the Middle East peace negotiations under way in Washington. It reserved its right to call on the Security Council to consider ways and means of putting an end to Israel's constant, unwarranted, attacks in southern Lebanon, in the light of the threat they posed to international peace and security.

In his letter of 27 January 1992, the representative of Israel drew attention to the escalation of terrorist activities in southern Lebanon since the deployment of the Lebanese Army in the area. He stated that the Government of Lebanon had done nothing to halt or prevent the activities of Hizbullah and other terrorist organizations, which continued to use civilian centres as bases of operation. On the contrary, it had tacitly and explicitly encouraged them to continue with their acts of terrorism. The Government of Lebanon had thus demonstrated its unwillingness to abide by its international obligations to prevent activities within its territory directed towards organizing, instigating, assisting and participating in acts of violence and terror across Israel's northern border. Such obligations were part of the Charter of the United Nations and other related international norms and declarations, particularly the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.⁷² Drawing attention to the 35,000 Syrian troops and hundreds of Iranian Revolutionary Guards stationed on Lebanese soil, the representative asserted that Syrian interference in Lebanese internal affairs made a mockery of Lebanon's sovereignty and was a clear violation of its territorial integrity and political independence. He maintained that his Government's position regarding southern Lebanon remained unchanged. Israel had no territorial claims on any part of Lebanese territory. However, Lebanon had failed to carry out its international obligations and to prevent the use of its territory for acts of terrorism against Israel. The latter had therefore found it necessary to undertake security functions and patrols in a narrow zone of the south of Lebanon, aimed at detecting and preventing the organization of terrorist activities and access by terrorist elements to Israel's northern border areas. Such security arrangements were essential and would be maintained as long as there existed a threat that acts of violence and terror would continue to emanate unimpeded from Lebanon. In conclusion, the representative asserted that the appropriate forum for the resolution of outstanding issues between the two countries lay in the bilateral negotiations which had been taking place within the framework of the peace process.

The President also drew the attention of the Council members to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁷³ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 734 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982, and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

⁷² General Assembly resolution 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970.

⁷³ S/23483.

Having studied the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon of 21 January 1992, and taking note of the observations expressed therein,

Recalling the addendum of 28 January 1991 to the Secretary-General's report of 22 January 1991,

Taking note of the letter dated 17 January 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Lebanon to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

Responding to the request of the Government of Lebanon,

1. Decides to extend the present mandate of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon for a further interim period of six months, that is, until 31 July 1992;

2. Approves the overall objective of the Secretary-General, as set out in paragraph 33 of his report of 21 January 1992 on the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, aimed at promoting the greater effectiveness of the Force;

3. Approves in particular the recommendations summarized in paragraphs 59 (c) (i) and (ii) of the addendum of 28 January 1991 to the report of the Secretary-General of 22 January 1991;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to consider further, in consultation with the troop-contributing countries, how to achieve the overall objective referred to in paragraph 2 above, and to take action on the objectives in paragraphs 2 and 3 above;

5. Reiterates its strong support for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries;

6. Re-emphasizes the terms of reference and general guidelines of the Force as stated in the report of the Secretary-General of 19 March 1978, approved by resolution 426 (1978), and calls upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Force for the full implementation of its mandate;

7. Reiterates that the Force should fully implement its mandate as defined in resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) and all other relevant resolutions;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Government of Lebanon and other parties directly concerned with the implementation of the present resolution and to report to the Security Council thereon.

At the same meeting, after the adoption of resolution 734 (1992), the President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁴

in conformity with Council resolution 701 (1991) of 31 July 1991.

The members of the Council reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

As the Council extends the mandate of the Force for a further interim period on the basis of resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978, the members of the Council again stress the need for the implementation of that resolution in all its aspects. They reiterate their full support for the Taif Agreement and commend the Lebanese Government for its successful efforts to deploy units of its army in the south of the country in full coordination with the Force. The members of the Council urge all the parties concerned to support the Force fully.

The members of the Council express their concern over the continuing violence in southern Lebanon and urge all parties to exercise restraint.

The members of the Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend the Force's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decision of 19 February 1992 (3053rd meeting): statement by the President

By a letter dated 17 February 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁵ the representative of Lebanon requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the latest acts of aggression by Israel against the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon and its continuous occupation of southern Lebanon and part of the Bekaa. Those aggressions and the occupation, he stated, constituted "a flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations and Security Council resolutions" and posed a grave threat to international peace and security.

At its 3053rd meeting, on 19 February 1992, the Council included the letter from the representative of Lebanon in its agenda. The President (United States) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁷⁶

The members of the Council are deeply concerned about the renewed and rising cycle of violence in southern Lebanon and elsewhere in the region. The Council deplores in particular the recent killings and the continued violence, which threatens to claim additional lives and to destabilize the region further.

The members of the Council call upon all those involved to exercise maximum restraint in order to bring such violence to an end.

The members of the Council reaffirm their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries, as set out in resolution 425 (1978) of 19 March 1978. In this context, they assert that any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

The members of the Council express their continued support for all efforts to bring peace to the region on the basis of resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973. The members of the Council urge all the parties concerned to work vigorously to enhance the ongoing peace process.

Decisions of 29 May 1992 (3081st meeting): resolution 756 (1992) and statement by
the President

On 19 May 1992, pursuant to resolution 722 (1991), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 21 November 1991 to 19 May 1992, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).⁷⁷ He stated that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. During the period under review, the situation in the Israel-Syria sector had remained generally quiet and there had been no serious incidents. The search for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and, in particular, the efforts undertaken to implement resolution 338 (1973) had been dealt with in his report on the situation in the Middle East,⁷⁸ submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 45/83 A. The Secretary-General observed that, despite the present quiet in the Israel-Syria sector, the situation in the Middle East as a whole continued to be potentially dangerous and was likely to remain so, unless and until a comprehensive settlement covering all aspects of the Middle East problem could be reached.⁷⁹ He continued to hope that determined efforts would be made by all concerned to tackle the problem in all its aspects, with a view to arriving at a just and durable peace settlement, as called for by the Council in its resolution 338 (1973). In the prevailing circumstances, the Secretary-General considered the continued presence of UNDOF in the area to be essential. He therefore recommended, with the agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 30 November 1992.

At its 3081st meeting, on 29 May 1992, the Council included the Secretary-General's report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.⁸⁰ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 756 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1992 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force,

Decides:

- (a) To call upon the parties concerned to implement immediately its resolution 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973;
- (b) To renew the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force for another period of six months, that is, until 30 November 1992;
- (c) To request the Secretary-General to submit, at the end of this period, a report on the developments in the situation and the measures taken to implement resolution 338 (1973).

At the same meeting, after the adoption of resolution 756 (1992), the President made the following statement:⁸¹

In connection with the resolution just adopted on the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, I have been authorized to make the following complementary statement on behalf of the Security Council:

As is known, the report of the Secretary-General of 19 May 1992 on the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force states, in paragraph 20: "Despite the present quiet in the

Decisions of 30 July 1992 (3102nd meeting): resolution 768 (1992) and statement by
the President

On 21 July 1992, pursuant to resolution 734 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNIFIL for the period from 22 January to 21 July 1992.⁸² He observed that, during this period, the situation in southern Lebanon had been marked by a continuously high level of firing, and that UNIFIL had been severely hampered in carrying out its tasks by the amount of firing directed at its personnel. At the same time, a source of encouragement had been the Lebanese Army’s assumption of responsibility for a part of the UNIFIL area of operation, which represented a further important step towards the restoration of the Government’s authority in southern Lebanon. Meanwhile, Israel’s general attitude to the situation in southern Lebanon and to the UNIFIL mandate remained as described in previous reports. In summary, UNIFIL had once again been prevented from carrying out its mandate, and the parties to the conflict in southern Lebanon continued to be locked in a vicious cycle. In the absence of the cooperation which was essential to the success of any peacekeeping operation, the efforts of UNIFIL had merely succeeded in limiting the consequences of the parties’ actions, something upon which they seemed to have come to rely. The Force’s contribution to stability in the region remained nevertheless important, particularly at a time of negotiation. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council accept the request of the Government of Lebanon and extend the Force’s mandate for another period of six months, until 31 January 1993.

At its 3102nd meeting, on 30 July 1992, the Council included the Secretary-General’s report in its agenda. Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Cape Verde) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 15 July 1992 from the representative of Lebanon addressed to the Secretary-General, transmitting his Government’s request that the Council extend the UNIFIL mandate for a further period of six months.⁸³ He stated that, since the last renewal of the Force’s mandate, the Government of Lebanon had continued to consolidate the peace, national unity and security which were necessary for lasting stability. In that context, it had established plans for displaced persons; in conformity with the principles and timetable of the Taif Agreement, it had taken the decision to collect all light weapons — a process under way in different regions of the country; and it had taken the decision to conduct in the coming weeks the nation’s first parliamentary elections in 20 years. Moreover, UNIFIL had handed over part of one of its sectors to the Lebanese Army, enabling UNIFIL to strengthen its own deployment elsewhere in its area of operation. Israel, on the other hand, was doing everything in its power to undermine the process of consolidating national unity. Despite the participation of both countries in the Arab-Israeli peace conference, Israel had intensified its efforts to destabilize and terrorize Lebanon. In perpetuating its occupation of the south, Israel had subjected Lebanese citizens to daily air raids and bombardments. The Lebanese Government drew the Council’s attention to Israel’s “perpetual state of attack” against Lebanon, and its flagrant routine incursions beyond the area under its occupation. It urged the Council to take new and vigorous steps to bring an end to Israel’s reign of terror, through the prompt implementation of resolution 425 (1978) and galvanization of the mechanism set out in resolution 526 (1978), which would enable the Lebanese Government to extend its authority over the entire south of the country up to its internationally recognized boundaries. The time had come for the Council to institute a timetable for the implementation of resolution 425 (1978).

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.⁸⁴ The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 768 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 425 (1978) and 426 (1978) of 19 March 1978, 501 (1982) of 25 February 1982, 508 (1982) of 5 June 1982, 509 (1982) of 6 June 1982, and 520 (1982) of 17 September 1982, as well as all its resolutions on the situation in Lebanon,

The members of the Council take this opportunity to express their appreciation for the continuing efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff in this regard and commend the Force's troops and troop-contributing countries for their sacrifices and commitment to the cause of international peace and security under difficult circumstances.

Decisions of 25 November 1992 (3141st meeting): resolution 790 (1992) and statement by the President

On 19 November 1992, pursuant to resolution 756 (1992), the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on UNDOF for the period from 20 May to 19 November 1992, and on the implementation of resolution 338 (1973).⁸⁶ He stated that UNDOF had continued to perform its functions effectively, with the cooperation of the parties. agreement of the Syrian Arab Republic and Israel, that the Council extend the mandate of the Force for a further period of six months, until 31 May 1993.

24. The situation in the occupied Arab territories

Decision of 17 February 1989 (2850th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 8 February 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹ the representative of Tunisia, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation in the "occupied Palestinian territory".

By a letter dated 9 February 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,² the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People supported that request.

At its 2845th meeting, on 10 February 1989, the Council included the two letters in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2845th, 2846th, 2847th, 2849th and 2850th meetings, on 10, 13, 14 and 17 February 1989.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the following to participate in the discussion: the representatives of Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia and Yemen; and, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States. At its subsequent meetings, the Council also invited the following to participate in the discussion: at the 2846th meeting, the representatives of Bahrain, Democratic Yemen, Lebanon, Pakistan, Qatar, the Sudan and Zimbabwe; at the 2847th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Indonesia, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Japan, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Nicaragua, Turkey and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, and, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference; at the 2849th meeting, the representatives of India, Cuba, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Morocco and Panama; and at the 2850th meeting, the representative of the United Arab Emirates.

At the 2845th meeting, the President (Nepal) informed the Council members that he had received a letter dated 9 February 1989 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Observer Mission of Palestine,³ requesting that, in accordance with previous practice, the Council invite the representative of the Permanent Observer Mission of Palestine to participate in the debate, and enquired if any member wished to speak on the request.

The representative of the United States explained that he would vote against the proposal on two grounds. First, he believed the Council did not have before it a valid request to speak. Second, he maintained that the observer of the Palestine Liberation Organization should be granted permission to speak only if the request complied with rule 39 of the rules of procedure. In the United States view, it was unwarranted and unwise for the Council to break with its own practice and rules.

The Council then decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁴

The President then drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 7 February 1989,⁵ by which the representative of Palestine informed the Secretary-General of the deterioration of the situation in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel as a result of additional repressive measures taken by the latter.

In his statement, the representative of Palestine urged the Security Council to take three facts into consideration in its deliberations: the extreme gravity of the situation, the inaction of the Security Council for a considerable period of time, and Israel's non-compliance with Security Council resolutions 605

(1987), 607 (1988) and 608 (1988), and with international law and treaties. He denounced the recent measures taken by Israel in the occupied Palestinian territory including the demolition of houses and the use of plastic bullets against unarmed civilians. Stressing the unity of the Palestinian people inside and outside the occupied territories, he defined the intifada as a new form of popular resistance against occupation. The speaker added that history, international law, and the Charter of the United Nations had taught that resistance to occupation by any means, including violence, was legitimate and that it was even required for the achievement of freedom. Yet the intifada was limited to demonstrations, strikes and boycotts. The representative of Palestine also recalled a number of historic decisions taken by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in order to achieve peace. He mentioned first the declaration of independence of the State of Palestine by the Palestine National Council, on 15 November 1988 in Algiers, which was in line with General Assembly resolution 181 (II) providing for the creation of two States in Palestine, one Jewish and the other Arab. He then cited a political statement by the Palestine National Council which reflected a new position accepting Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), and called for the International Peace Conference on the Middle East under United Nations auspices to be convened on the basis of the above-mentioned resolutions and the national and political rights of the Palestinian people, and to be attended by the permanent members of the Security Council and the parties to the conflict, including the Palestine Liberation Organization, on an equal footing. Finally, he referred to the peace initiative, based on the Palestine National Council's position which the Chairman of the PLO Executive Committee had announced before the General Assembly at Geneva on 13 December 1988. He noted that these steps had been welcomed throughout the world, that 94 States had recognized the new Palestinian State, and that the United States had announced the opening of a dialogue with the PLO, thus ending 13 years of boycott. While Israel had rejected the Palestinian appeal for peace, an overwhelming majority of States had voted in its favour through General Assembly resolution 43/176, in which the Assembly requested the Council to consider measures needed to convene the International Peace Conference on the Middle East, including the establishment of a preparatory committee. The speaker believed that the situation was now ripe for the Council to begin to move in that direction, particularly in view of the positive attitude of the Secretary-General and his constant readiness to contribute to the work required. Meanwhile, he urged the United Nations to provide the necessary protection for the Palestinian people in the occupied territory.⁶

The representative of Tunisia, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, recalled the resolutions adopted by the Council in 1987 and 1988, and the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report of 21 January 1988, and noted that Israel had responded to those initiatives with contempt, arrogance and aggression. The increased Israeli repression could not be justified by the Palestinian uprising, which was not an aggression against Israel, but an act of self-defence. He stressed that the Palestinian leadership had opted for the path of peace, basing itself on international legitimacy as embodied in General Assembly and Security Council resolutions, whereas Israel remained intransigent. For the speaker, the Security Council had the responsibility to consider the situation, which represented a grave danger to international peace and security. He expressed hope that the Council would adopt all appropriate measures with a view to ending the repressive measures being taken by Israel, protecting the Palestinians and hastening the convening of an international peace conference.⁷

The representative of Senegal, speaking on behalf of her country and in her capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, urged an appropriate response from the international community and immediate action by the Security Council to ensure that Israel abided by its obligations under the 1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. She invited the Council to discuss the best means of translating into reality the peace message of the Chairman of the PLO, who had accepted a settlement on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), and the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. The speaker also pointed out that it was incumbent on the Council to implement the decisions and recommendations of the General Assembly on this issue, in particular those calling for an international peace conference on the Middle East. In that regard she noted that the proposed international peace conference enjoyed broad support not only at the United Nations, but also within organizations such as the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, and the European Economic Community. She finally appealed to all Council members to help to establish a policy of dialogue among all the parties.⁸

The representative of Jordan expressed the hope that the Security Council, which had last met on the issue before it 10 months previously, would take a firm and effective decision commensurate with the seriousness of the situation in the occupied Arab territories and the latest developments regarding the question of Palestine as a whole. It was essential, as a first step, to take the measures necessary to ensure the protection of the Palestinian people, recommended in the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988,⁹ pending progress towards the achievement of a comprehensive peace settlement which should begin at once. The Security Council should also work to bring about the desired peaceful settlement. Stressing the recent move made in this direction by the Palestine National Council, the speaker stated that Israel, for its part, should make a sincere contribution to the promotion of a peaceful settlement by withdrawing from the occupied territories and by recognizing the national rights of the Palestinian people, in particularly its right to self-determination.¹⁰

The representative of Egypt noted that the important development of the Palestinian position and the many initiatives undertaken by the PLO had led to an American-Palestinian dialogue that demanded a favourable response from the Government of Israel and recognition by it of the need to speak with the representatives and leaders of the Palestinian people. Egypt believed that a comprehensive political settlement guaranteeing the right of the peoples of the region to self-determination and the security of all the States of the region was the only way to achieve stability. To hasten the achievement of that end, Israel should first recognize the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories, and then all the parties concerned should agree to hold direct talks within the framework of the International Peace Conference and on the basis of Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. The speaker called upon the Security Council to take a decisive stand on the situation in the occupied Arab territories, which had become more alarming since it had last been considered.¹¹

The representative of Israel stated that his country had always sought political accommodation, coexistence and peace with all its neighbours. He stressed that Israel had repeatedly called for dialogue and direct negotiations to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict, despite wide-ranging threats to its security and survival. The so-called uprising in the territories administered by Israel since 1967 was the latest manifestation of the conflict. Contrary to what had been said, Israel was facing large-scale rioting and widespread violence resulting in hundreds of people injured, sometimes fatally. It was this irrational pursuit of terror and violence, to which the PLO was contributing, that prevented the beginnings of a political solution in the territories. Israel believed that, in order to reach a political solution, an attempt should be made to introduce a gradual and pragmatic approach of confidence-building measures. Interim solutions were possible and could be reached in a relatively short period of time, but could not be attained under the threat of firebombs and violence. The speaker further stated that Israel had two objectives: to restore tranquillity in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, and to reach peace agreements with its neighbours. It was determined to resolve the ultimate status of the territories — taking into account the legitimate rights of the Palestinian Arab residents — through direct negotiations with its neighbours and the Palestinian Arabs residing in the administered territories, on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Israel opposed an international conference which, in its view, would be convened to implement a predetermined outcome, which would not provide for direct negotiations but act as a substitute for them. He added that Israel did not object in principle to third party assistance. Direct negotiations could take place under the auspices of the United States and the Soviet Union, or the Secretary-General of the United Nations, or both, provided that such auspices constituted the framework of the negotiations and did not intervene in their substance. The speaker concluded that if negotiations started with Arab States and representatives of the Palestinians living in the territories, a solution recognizing both Israel's security needs and the Palestinians' legitimate rights would be found.¹²

During the course of the debate, most of the speakers called for the convening of an international peace conference under the auspices of the United Nations with the participation of the permanent members of the Security Council and the parties to the conflict, including the PLO, on an equal footing.¹³ Some of them supported the setting up of a preparatory committee with a view to convening the international conference.¹⁴ Others stressed the need for the Council to adopt urgently measures to ensure protection of the Palestinians in the occupied territories.¹⁵ One speaker was in favour of the Council adopting compulsory measures against Israel.¹⁶

At the 2846th meeting, on 13 February 1989, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic stated that the Council was meeting amidst great hope that it would at last be able to shoulder its responsibility and would take immediate effective measures to put an end to Israel's massacre of the population of the occupied Arab territories. He recalled the Secretary-General's report submitted to the Council pursuant to resolution 605 (1987),¹⁷ which described the tragic situation and the incredible conditions in which the Palestinian people were living under Israeli occupation. He added that the report demonstrated clearly that the Palestinian people in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip completely rejected the Israeli occupation. The report also contained a legal analysis of the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention for which the Council had a special responsibility, and an account of Israeli violations of its provisions that had also been the subject of Security Council resolutions 452 (1979), 465 (1980), 468 (1980), 471 (1980) and 478 (1980). The speaker called upon the Council to take urgent measures, including the imposition of sanctions against Israel, to compel it to desist from its brutal practices, and to ensure its earliest and urgent withdrawal from all Arab occupied territories.¹⁸

The representative of Malaysia stated that this was a historic opportunity not to be missed. The Palestinian leadership had taken decisions for peace and the United States had begun discussions with Palestine. Certain Western countries too were engaged in efforts that would build on the prospects for a settlement. All efforts should now converge in an international peace conference on the Middle East under United Nations auspices. He pointed out that the Security Council was the repository body to implement the yet unfulfilled General Assembly resolution 181 (II), which partitioned Palestine into a Jewish State and a Palestine State. As such the Council could not be removed from all the above-mentioned developments. The General Assembly in resolution 43/176 of 20 December 1988 had also made clear the responsibilities and the role of the Security Council. The speaker called on the Council to consider measures to convene an international conference, including the establishment of a preparatory committee.¹⁹

The representative of Lebanon stated that the Israeli practices of deportation and expulsion had also been extended to Lebanon, in particular in the southern part of the country and the occupied zones. In addition to that Israel had, since the beginning of the year, implemented a policy of expulsion from the occupied parts of southern Lebanon. The speaker characterized expulsions and deportations as crimes against humanity and stressed that those who had been expelled and deported had the right to demand that the international community and the Security Council see to it that they returned to their homes. He appealed to the Council to halt the Israeli practices and to speed up the peace process.²⁰

The representative of Zimbabwe recalled the position of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries on the issue of the Arab occupied territories: namely, that no comprehensive, just and durable solution to this problem could be achieved without the total and unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied since 1967, and the regaining and exercise in Palestine of the legitimate and inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to return to their homes and the right to national independence, as well as the right to establish a sovereign, independent State in Palestine. He stated that the Council had a duty to start the peace process, even through such modest beginnings as regular consultations with the Secretary-General and all the members of the Council. Such consultations could be structured later. In the meantime, the Council should fulfil its obligations and take the necessary measures to protect the lives and property of the Palestinians in the occupied territories.²¹

At the 2847th meeting, on 14 February 1989, Mr. A. Engin Ansay, speaking on behalf of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, recalled that the last Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers had reaffirmed its support for the Palestinian struggle, its condemnation of Israel's policy of expansion, occupation and repression and its rejection of any partial and individual solutions which would disregard the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people or ignore the Palestine Liberation Organization, their sole legitimate representative. The Conference had also mandated its Secretary-General to maintain contacts with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and other regional and international organizations with a view to implementing the relevant Security Council resolutions and the Fourth Geneva Convention. The speaker called upon the international community, particularly the parties directly concerned, to urgently convene the international peace conference with the full and equal participation of the PLO and to recognize the independent Palestinian State.²²

The representative of Japan stated that peace in the Middle East should be achieved as quickly as possible through, first, the withdrawal of Israel's armed forces from all territories occupied since 1967; secondly, the recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, including the right to establish an independent State; and, thirdly, the recognition of Israel's right to exist. He insisted that as the international community continued to strive to attain a negotiated settlement, it should not forget the need to alleviate the social and economic difficulties besetting the Palestinian people. His Government had taken steps to increase significantly its contributions to the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East in an effort to improve the quality of life of the Palestinians in the occupied territories.²³

At the 2849th meeting, on 17 February 1989, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the Security Council could not and should not remain indifferent to acts of lawlessness which were systematically perpetrated by the occupying Power in the Arab lands. Peace could not be built upon violence against the peoples of neighbouring countries but only through a policy of good-neighbourliness towards other peoples and rejection of attempts to retain the territories of other peoples through violence. Referring to General Assembly resolution 43/176 calling for the convening of the International Peace Conference on the Middle East, the speaker pointed out that the request of the General Assembly that the Security Council consider measures needed to convene the Conference, including the beginning of preparatory work, was particularly significant from the point of view of initiating the settlement process. Believing that real prospects had emerged for such a settlement, he urged the Council to seize this unique opportunity to start the peace process in accordance with General Assembly resolution 43/176.²⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the further deterioration of the situation in the occupied territories, brought about by a cycle of violence and counter-violence, had drawn new attention to the fundamental problems underlying the conflict, that Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) remained unfulfilled and that Israel continued to occupy territories which did not belong to it. The ultimate solution to that problem, to be resolved at an international conference, would have to take account of the Palestinian right to self-determination as well as all parties' concerns. In the meantime, the military occupation of the territories laid heavy responsibilities on Israel in terms of international law. The United Kingdom could not accept that the need to maintain law and order could be used as a pretext to override the specific and unambiguous obligations placed upon the occupying Power under the terms of the Fourth Geneva Convention. Israel should abide fully by its obligations under that Convention, including the obligation under article 27 which required it to treat the population of the occupied territories humanely at all times. Noting that the need for a political solution was recognized by all concerned, including Israel, the speaker emphasized that the members of the Council, whose responsibilities in this matter went back to the first days of the United Nations, stood ready to help.²⁵

The representative of China stated that the Israeli authorities bore an unshirkable responsibility for the rapid deterioration of the situation in the occupied territories. His delegation hoped that the Council would respond resolutely and prevent further deterioration of the situation. Recalling several Council resolutions affirming the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied Arab territories, he said that Israel was duty-bound to comply with those resolutions, implement the Convention, and assure the Palestinians of their basic right to life. Pointing out the need for a comprehensive settlement of the Middle East question, he mentioned that an increasing number of countries had advocated the convening of an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations. China hoped that Israel would desist from its erroneous policy of force and cooperate with the international community in the peace process.²⁶

At the 2850th meeting, also on 17 February 1989, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.²⁷

Under the operative part of the draft resolution, the Council would have called upon Israel to abide by the relevant resolutions of the Security Council, as well as to comply with its obligations under the Fourth

Geneva Convention and to desist forthwith from its policies and practices that were in violation of the provisions of the Convention; called furthermore for the exercise of maximum restraint; affirmed the urgent need to achieve, under the auspices of the United Nations, a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict, and expressed its determination to work towards that end; and requested the Secretary-General to follow the implementation of the resolution.

The representative of France, having expressed deep concern at the deterioration of the situation in the occupied territories, noted, however, that a glimmer of hope for peace had appeared recently and that it should be grasped. Israel was entitled to live within secure and recognized boundaries. The Palestinian people was entitled to possess a country, a land, and in that land to organize itself according to the structures it chose. France believed that it was urgent that preparations be made for the holding of an international conference with the participation of all parties concerned as well as the permanent members of the Security Council.²⁸

Before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that his country remained seriously concerned over the events in the occupied territories and had actively engaged in diplomatic efforts to defuse tensions, by urging restraint on all sides and denouncing acts of violence from whatever quarter. The United States maintained that the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to the occupied territories and that Israel had an obligation to comply with it, but did not view Israeli practices in the territories in a vacuum. As the occupying Power, Israel had a responsibility recognized under international law to maintain order and security in the territories, a task that the intifada had made more difficult. The speaker indicated that his delegation would vote against the draft resolution because it was flawed and would not advance the prospects for peace in the Middle East. In severely criticizing Israeli policies and practices, it did not take into sufficient account the context in which they occurred, or the excesses of the other side. Neither Palestinian acts of violence nor those committed by Israelis could be condoned. The situation could only be resolved in the context of an overall negotiated settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute, grounded in Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338

(1973), taking into account both the security of the State of Israel and the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. Furthermore, the complex issues involved could not be resolved in New York by third parties, but only in the region by the parties themselves. If the Council was to play a positive role in that process, it could not do so by adopting unbalanced resolutions, but by urging reconciliation and mutual understanding while denouncing violence by all sides.²⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. There were 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States), and the draft resolution was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country's vote in favour of the draft resolution, which made use of certain language to describe territories occupied by Israel since 1967, did not imply any change in its view of the status of those territories.³⁰

The representative of Palestine underlined the great efforts made to submit a text acceptable to all. He regretted the decision of the United States to break with unanimity and to use its right of veto, which made it impossible for the Council to address the grave situation in the occupied Arab territories and to shoulder its responsibilities. Hoping that the Council's decision would not lead to a further deterioration of the situation and that it will not encourage the occupying Power to adopt further repressive measures and to defy the principles of international law, he remained confident that the Council would be able to address the situation more effectively in the future.³¹

Decision of 9 June 1989 (2867th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 31 May 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,³² the representative of the Sudan, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory.

At its 2863rd meeting, on 6 June 1989, the Council included the letter in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2863rd to 2867th meetings, from 6 to 9 June 1989.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Bahrain, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia and Yemen to participate in the discussion without the right to vote; and extended an invitation under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure to Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, and to Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. At the same meeting, the Council also decided, by a vote of 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.³³ At its subsequent meetings, the Council invited the following to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: at the 2864th meeting, the representatives of Democratic Yemen, Israel, Kuwait, Pakistan and Qatar; at the 2865th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, Cuba, Japan and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; and at the 2866th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, the German Democratic Republic, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania and Zimbabwe.

At the 2863rd meeting, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several other documents.³⁴

The representative of Palestine stated that the Council was meeting to address Israel's new acts of State terrorism such as the attacks carried out by settlers on Palestinian civilians, the closing of schools by the Israeli authorities, depriving the Palestinians of the right to education, the recent obligation to wear identity cards, and acts of desecration of the Koran by Israeli soldiers. He denounced Israel's policy of settlement and deportation in the occupied territories and characterized the intifada as the legal obligation for the Palestinians to resist occupation. Israel, for its part, had the legal obligation to respect and treat humanely the population in the occupied territories. The speaker recalled in this regard that under the Charter the Members of the United Nations undertook to respect and carry out the decisions of the Security Council, which had reaffirmed on several occasions the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories. The High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention, including all the Council members, were duty-bound to ensure respect for that Convention. However, no action had been taken to that effect. Though fully informed of the situation, the Council had been prevented by one of its members from fulfilling its duty. The speaker emphasized that the Council was meeting to consider "exclusively" the recommendations on ways and means to ensure the safety and protection of Palestinian civilians contained in the last report, of 25 November 1980, of the Commission established under resolution 446 (1979) to examine the situation relating to the settlements in the occupied Arab territories.³⁵ However this should not in any way be construed as an appeal to the Council to forgo its responsibility to contribute towards the achievement of a comprehensive, just and durable peace in the Middle East through political and diplomatic means under the auspices of the United Nations, and precisely in exercise of the powers vested in the Council by the Charter to maintain international peace and security. He concluded by calling upon the Council to provide international protection to the occupied Arab territories.³⁶

Speaking on behalf of the Arab Group, the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic stated that the Security Council had once again been convened to adopt the necessary emergency measures to ensure the protection of the Palestinian people and the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from the occupied Arab territories. He noted that since the Council last met many massacres had been carried out by the Israeli armed forces and settlers. The speaker voiced his concern over the increased participation of Israeli settlers in acts of repression. Quoting from the Secretary-

General's report of 21 January 1988,³⁷ he said that the central issue was the continuing occupation by Israel of the territories captured in 1967. The occupation was an act of aggression which the Council should act to end. Also referring to the Secretary-General's report he emphasized that the Secretary-General had recommended to the Council to consider making a solemn appeal to the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention that had diplomatic relations with Israel to use all means at their disposal to ensure respect for the Convention. The speaker concluded that only recourse to Chapter VII of the Charter would compel Israel to end its massacres and to withdraw from the occupied territories.³⁸

The representative of Senegal, speaking also in her capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, said that the current meeting to discuss the situation in the occupied territories was taking place in the face of the Council's near-paralysis, Israel's intransigent insistence on its policy of occupation, domination and repression, and the numerous delays holding up the convening of the international peace conference on the Middle East. She stressed that only political action could meet the aspirations of the Palestinian people. The speaker further stressed that the ideals of peace, justice and freedom that formed the basis of the Charter should cause the Security Council to support the solidarity that was growing in favour of the restoration of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people in conformity with the wish of the United Nations, the Non-Aligned Movement, the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Organization of African Unity. It was high time for the Council to increase its involvement by taking appropriate action. In that regard, the speaker also drew the attention to the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988.³⁹

During the debate, most of the speakers called for immediate action by the Security Council to protect the Palestinian people in the occupied territories and to compel Israel to apply the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention to those territories, and urged the Council to consider the report of the Secretary-General of January 1988, which contained recommendations in this regard.⁴⁰ One speaker called upon the Council to adopt measures under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.⁴¹

At the 2864th meeting, on 7 June 1989, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.⁴²

Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have recalled, in particular, its resolutions 446 (1979), 465 (1980), 607 (1988) and 608 (1988), as well as the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988⁴³ and the recommendations contained therein. Under the operative part, the Council would have strongly deplored Israel's policies and practices which violated the human rights of the Palestinian people as well as vigilante attacks against Palestinian towns and villages and desecration of the Holy Koran; called upon Israel, as the occupying Power and as a High Contracting Party to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949, to accept the de jure applicability of the Convention to the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and fully to comply with its obligations under that Convention; recalled the obligations of all the High Contracting Parties, under article 1 of the Convention, to ensure respect for the Convention in all circumstances; demanded that Israel desist forthwith from deporting Palestinian civilians from the occupied territory and ensure the safe and immediate return of those already deported; expressed great concern about the prolonged closure of schools in parts of the occupied territory and called upon Israel to permit the immediate reopening of those schools; and requested the Secretary-General to continue to monitor the situation, to make timely reports to the Council, including on ways and means to ensure respect for the Convention and protection of Palestinian civilians, and to submit the first such report no later than 23 June 1989.

The representative of Algeria stated that the responsibilities of the Security Council towards the Palestinian people were as clear as its duties regarding the restoration of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. According to the speaker, the Council's failure to act respecting the necessity to guarantee adequate international protection would be a failure to assist a people in danger. Any measure should include the full implementation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and United Nations supervision. To that end, a minimal draft resolution had been submitted to the members of the Council, indicating the measures that were indispensable to the protection of the Palestinians in the occupied territories. The speaker stressed that being limited in scope, the draft resolution should enjoy the Council's unanimous support. He warned that failure to adopt it would be seen as an encouragement to repression and a reward for the occupier's violence.⁴⁴

Mr. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, underlined the United Nations historic and special responsibility towards the people of Palestine. The speaker recalled the position of the Eighteenth Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers on the Palestinian question, in March 1989, in particular its call for the occupied territories to be placed under the provisional control of the United Nations and for international forces to protect the Palestinian citizens and supervise Israel's withdrawal from those territories. It also held the view that all settlements were null and void as well as illegal and requested the United States to develop and promote its dialogue with the PLO and adopt an impartial stand by recognizing the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people. With respect to Israel's election plan, he said that a democratic election could not take place under the rules of occupation, which denied the right to various forms of political expression and activity that were intrinsic to genuine democratic choice. He recalled that the Arab summit held in Casablanca in May 1989 had fully supported the Palestinian stand on that issue, namely that the elections should take place after the Israeli withdrawal and under international supervision. Only on the basis of withdrawal could steps towards peace be negotiated, elections held, and the final status of the West Bank and Gaza determined. Action by the Council was needed in that respect, as well as in regard to the current situation in Palestine.⁴⁵

Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, charged that Israel attempted to routinize the casualties of the Palestinians and to marginalize the United Nations and its Security Council, reducing it to a platform for verbalizing frustration while ensuring it would not be an instrument of consequential resolution. On the other hand, the Arabs were determined to render the Council functional, credible and effective. That was reflected in the fact that the Arab League summit had advocated a central role for the Council in preparing an international conference and bringing about a peaceful outcome to the conflict. In connection with Israel's elections proposal, the speaker held that it was lacking in credibility and in respect for the Palestinian State's authority to designate its own negotiators. As for the negotiations themselves, there was a need to define the goal. Negotiations would need to be about how to structure, phase and determine the independent State of Palestine. The Palestinians' right to self-determination was no more negotiable for the Arab States than Israel's right to exist within the pre-1967 borders as proclaimed by the international community.⁴⁶

The representative of Yemen stated that it was the Council's duty to make Israel comply with its obligations under all the instruments, including treaties, it accepted as a State on its admission to membership in the United Nations. He took note of several positive events, including the proposal to hold elections in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the advancement of certain United States ideas on a peaceful settlement by means of elections as well as statements made by its officials. However the call for elections would not contribute effectively to the achievement of a comprehensive peace, unless and until the Council endorsed a comprehensive peace plan that would set a specific time frame for its implementation and be guaranteed by the permanent members and all parties to the conflict. He added that if the Council were to accept an international peace conference, it would have to make Israel commit itself to withdrawing its forces from the occupied territories and to replacing them with an international force to be deployed for a specific period of time to supervise free and fair elections. The same force would later oversee the exercise by the Palestinian people of its right to self-determination. The speaker concluded by saying that the Council would be held fully accountable for the adverse consequences of a delayed political solution to the problem.⁴⁷

At the 2865th meeting, on 8 June 1989, the representative of Egypt stated that the Israeli policy, confronted with the intifada, had worsened the situation in the occupied territories. This was a good indicator of whether Israel truly wished to live in peace with its neighbours. As a first step Israel had to fulfil its commitments under international treaties dealing with the protection of civilian persons in time of war and respond favourably to the constructive initiatives put forward by the PLO. He further stated that, given the radicalization of the situation in the occupied territories, which was fraught with very serious dangers to peace and security, it had become even more necessary to take urgent action. He called upon the Security Council to adopt, by consensus, a resolution expressing the international community's repudiation of the situation. Acknowledging that members of the Council bore a share of the responsibility for achieving peace in the region, the speaker stressed that the brunt of it lay with the Palestinians and the Israelis. A just political settlement required negotiations between the representatives of the two parties involved.⁴⁸

The representative of Israel said that the statements made by some representatives of the Arab Group in the General Assembly and the Security Council served as additional proof that the Arab-Israeli conflict could not be resolved in an international conference, nor by blatant accusations, extreme demands and futile debates in the Council. The speaker observed that the United Nations succeeded in furthering peaceful solutions in cases where the parties to the conflict genuinely wished for peace and were ready for dialogue and direct negotiations. He warned that the Arab-Israeli conflict had not yet reached that stage. Peace could not be achieved while violence reigned, Syrian troops occupied Lebanon in the name of "peacekeeping", and the PLO daily initiated terror against fellow Palestinians as well as Israelis. The speaker told the Council that the Government of Israel, which categorically opposed all acts of violence, had approved a peace initiative on 14 May 1989, calling for the simultaneous implementation of the following components. First, the peace between Israel and Egypt, based on the Camp David accords, should serve as a corner-stone for enlarging the circle of peace in the region. Secondly, peace should be achieved between Israel and those Arab States that still maintained a state of war with it so that a comprehensive settlement could be concluded. Thirdly, an international endeavour was needed to improve the living conditions of residents of the Arab refugee camps in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. Fourthly, Israel proposed that free and democratic elections be held in those districts to choose a representation to conduct negotiations for a transitional period of self-rule. At a later stage, negotiations would be carried out for a permanent solution during which all options would be examined and peace between Israel and Jordan would be achieved. The complexity of the issues involved in negotiations and the depth of emotion of all sides made some transitional period essential.⁴⁹

The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic charged that Israel did not want peace. It wanted more land and expansion through settlements. The Golan was annexed in the full view of the world, and contrary to the will of the international community. Israel occupied southern Lebanon and had established a so-called security zone, which was nothing other than occupation. He warned that, if the Council did not adopt the measures dictated by its mandate and provided by the Charter, Israel would continue to pursue its expansionist policies. Peace could be based only on Israel's total and unconditional withdrawal from all occupied Arab territories, and the Palestinian people's exercise of its inalienable rights to self-determination and the establishment of an independent State on its national soil. Such a settlement should be arrived at within the framework of an international conference under United Nations auspices, in conformity with the relevant resolutions of the Organization. Replying to Israel's comment about the role of the Syrian Arab Republic in Lebanon, the speaker underlined that his country was in Lebanon at the latter's request and had been authorized by the other Arab countries to help all the Lebanese parties to reach agreement and to settle their problems. The Syrian Arab Republic itself was not a party to the dispute there. On the other hand, he contended, Israel was an occupying Power in Lebanon which it had invaded in 1982 and from which it refused to withdraw despite the relevant Security Council resolutions calling for such action.⁵⁰

At the 2867th meeting, on 9 June 1989, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics referred to the general world trend towards establishing a new system of global and regional relations. He said that one of its main distinguishing features was an increase in efforts by the United Nations to seek ways of unblocking conflict situations and finding practical solutions to them. At this important stage, no part of the world should be left out of this process of improvement in the international atmosphere. Unfortunately, there had been no real movement towards untying the Middle East knot — one of the oldest and most difficult. The speaker expressed his belief that the tragedy of the Palestinians was the tragedy of all the peoples living in the Middle East. A solution to it was to be found through a comprehensive settlement. His delegation considered that favourable conditions had now been established in the region for peace. The broadest possible consensus had been reached on the core of the matter, through support for the convening of an international conference on the Middle East. The shift to peace in the region had been also facilitated by the balanced and constructive policy adopted by the PLO. The speaker appealed to Israel to reconsider its negative position and become involved in the international efforts for peace. Stressing the peacemaking potential of the Security Council, he recalled his country's proposals for a special meeting of the Council at the level of foreign ministers and multilateral and bilateral talks among the interested parties, carried on directly or indirectly through mediators. He supported the draft resolution which he called an humanitarian one, carefully balanced and a compromise.⁵¹

The representative of Finland noted that the parties concerned agreed on at least one thing, that the continuation of the present situation was untenable and that there had to be a change. In his opinion what was needed was bold steps by the occupying Power. The role of the Israeli settlers also deserved special attention. Israeli settlements in the occupied territories were clearly a violation of international law. Ensuring full respect for the principles regarding the protection of civilians under occupation was one of the steps. In this regard the speaker endorsed the conclusions contained in the Secretary-General's report as fully valid. He hoped that the activities of the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) would be further supported and strengthened. He also stressed the importance of having additional future reports by the Secretary-General on conditions in the occupied territories.⁵²

The representative of France maintained that the Security Council could not remain indifferent to the escalation of repression by the occupying forces in the West Bank and Gaza, and the repeated attacks by Israeli settlers against Palestinian villages. The international community should live up to its responsibilities, and it was necessary for the permanent members of the Council, together with the parties directly concerned, to begin laying the groundwork for an international peace conference that would deal with all aspects of the conflict.⁵³

The representative of the United Kingdom underlined the urgent need for the two sides to come together in direct negotiations that would prepare the way for a comprehensive settlement. In that respect he welcomed the declared commitment of the PLO to peace with Israel, and described the Israeli Government's proposals for elections in the occupied territories as another useful step forward. He called upon Israel to give a clear promise of progress towards negotiations and a solution based on territory for peace, in fulfilment of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Regretting the representative of Israel's description of the proceedings in the Council as a "futile debate", the speaker welcomed the fact that the other speakers had concentrated on the need for measures to protect the population under occupation. He hoped that the Council would consider urgently what action it could take in that regard.⁵⁴

Speaking before the vote, the representative of the United States stated that he was deeply disturbed by the continuing violence in the occupied territories. He appealed to all parties to refrain from acts of violence and, in particular, to Israel to utilize methods of maintaining order that did not result in unnecessary deaths and casualties. He said that his Government was engaged in active efforts to help reach a negotiated settlement for a comprehensive peace, based on Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). As a practical step in that direction, free and fair elections in the occupied territories, grounded in a broader political process, provided a basis for moving ahead. He welcomed the initiative of the Government of Israel, while acknowledging that much work needed to be done to bridge the differences between the Israelis and the Palestinians and between the Israelis and the Arabs over how such elections would be conducted. Recalling that his Government had repeatedly urged the Security Council to refrain from unhelpful, divisive and one-sided rhetoric in addressing the Arab-Israeli problem, the speaker stated that the draft resolution fell short of that goal. The United States agreed with certain aspects of the text, such as its affirmation of the applicability of the Geneva Convention to the occupied territories, the condemnation of the actions of settlers, and the opposition to the deportation of Palestinians. However, he continued, it was an unbalanced text, making sweeping condemnations of Israeli policies and practice, without reference to any of the serious acts of violence by the other side. He indicated that the United States, which took seriously its responsibilities as a member of the Security Council, would vote against the draft resolution which did not enhance the role of the Council and the United Nations in the peace process.⁵⁵

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States) and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country's vote in favour of the draft resolution, which made use of certain language to describe territories occupied by Israel since 1967, did not imply any change in its view of the status of those territories.⁵⁶

Reflecting on the voting, the representative of Palestine rejected the argument that the draft resolution was unbalanced. He asked whether the United States, which had proposed removing the expression "including Jerusalem" from the reference in the text to the occupied territories, had changed its position on the status of Jerusalem. He questioned the United States Government for speaking about free elections for a people who were being denied the right to self-determination.⁵⁷

By a letter dated 30 June 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁸ the representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, in his capacity as the Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested the convening of an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, in particular the deportation of Palestinian civilians.

At its 2870th meeting, on 6 July 1989, the Council included the letter in its agenda and considered the matter at the same meeting. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council decided to invite the representative of Israel, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁵⁹

At the same meeting, the President (Yugoslavia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 29 June 1989 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General,⁶⁰ in which he informed the Council that the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, had deteriorated further with Israel's deportation of eight Palestinians to southern Lebanon on 29 June 1989, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and Security Council resolutions 607 (1988) and 608 (1988). The President also drew the attention of the Council to several other documents,⁶¹ including a draft

The representative of Israel charged that the Council consistently attempted to censure Israel for its measures, while ignoring the intense and continuous violence that had necessitated them. He stated that Israel, which had the unequivocal responsibility to ensure the safety and security of all inhabitants, had acted with the utmost restraint and within the confines of local and international law. It chose not to utilize the death penalty expressly contemplated by the Fourth Geneva Convention, preferring to exercise less severe measures in conformity with article 63 of the Hague Regulations. The speaker indicated that those expelled were given the opportunity fully to exercise their legal rights during lengthy legal proceedings, which lasted nearly a year. He added that should quiet be restored the possibility of their return would be considered. The speaker noted that while several extreme political events had recently disturbed the global order, the Council was being asked to meet to criticize Israel only. Maintaining that the Council should call for the cessation of all violence and encourage dialogue and peace, he stressed that draft resolutions such as the one before the members did not promote those goals.⁶³

Before the vote, the representative of the United States recalled his Government's opposition to the practice of deportations because they violated article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and were unnecessary to maintain order and unhelpful to the peace process. But it was also important for members of the Council to understand that Israel, which for many years had been dealing with a very difficult situation, was presented with new challenges to its security. The United States, which was actively engaged in seeking to assist the parties to come together for interim and final status arrangements leading to a comprehensive peace, believed that there was no military solution but only a negotiated solution. While regretting the deportation of an additional eight Palestinians, and agreeing with the call for Israel to desist from further such acts, he asserted that raising the issue in the Council, in the form in which it was being presented, would not help to reduce tensions.

⁶³ S/PV.2870, pp. 12-17.

That was why the United States delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution. For the record, the speaker affirmed that his Government objected to the phrases "occupied Palestinian territories", and "Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and ... the other occupied Arab territories", considering that those phrases describe the territories demographically, were limited to territories occupied in 1967 and did not prejudge their status. Jerusalem should remain undivided and its final status be decided through negotiations.⁶⁴

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (United States), as resolution 636 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 607 (1988) of 5 January 1988 and 608 (1988) of 14 January 1988,

Having been apprised that Israel, the occupying Power, has once again, in defiance of those resolutions, deported eight Palestinian civilians on 29 June 1989,

Expressing grave concern over the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories,

Recalling the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and in particular articles 47 and 49 thereof,

1. Deeply regrets the continuing deportation by Israel, the occupying Power, of Palestinian civilians;

2. Calls upon Israel to ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied Palestinian territories of those deported and to desist forthwith from deporting any other Palestinian civilians;

3. Reaffirms that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to the Palestinian territories, occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and to the other occupied Arab territories;

4. Decides to keep the situation under review.

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representative of Palestine expressed confidence that the Council would take further steps to ensure that the Fourth Geneva Convention was respected, that the Palestinian civilians would return safely and

immediately to their homes, and that Israel would not undertake any more deportations.⁶⁵

Decision of 30 August 1989 (2883rd meeting):

By a letter dated 29 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁶⁶ the representative of Qatar, on behalf of the Group of Arab States, requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory, and in particular the deportation of Palestinian civilians. At its 2883rd meeting, on 30 August 1989, the Council included the letter in its agenda, and considered the matter at the same meeting.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representative of Israel, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁶⁷

The President (Algeria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.⁶⁸

He then drew their attention to a letter dated 28 August 1989 from the Observer of Palestine,⁶⁹ in which the Council was informed that Israel had expelled five Palestinians from the occupied Palestinian territory to Lebanon and France on 27 August 1989, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and Security Council resolutions 607 (1988), 608 (1988) and 636 (1989) and requested that appropriate measures be taken. The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 29 August 1989 from the representative of Lebanon.⁷⁰

The representative of Israel asserted that the increase of violence was the direct response of the PLO to the challenge posed by his country's peace initiative of April 1989. Many more Palestinians than Israelis had been, in recent months, the casualties of PLO violence. This violence was intended to intimidate the local population and ensure absolute PLO domination. The speaker stated that, despite the violence, his Government was determined to pursue the dialogue with local Palestinian leaders. Extensive talks were held between the Government of Israel and leaders from all elements of Palestinian society in order to reach an agreement as to the modalities and process of holding free and democratic elections in the territories. While admitting that international law placed the responsibility to maintain public order and safety in the "administered" territories on Israel, he emphasized that Israel did not accept the de jure applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district, but acted de facto in accordance with its humanitarian provisions. Israel's Supreme Court had examined repeatedly the proper interpretation and application of article 49 of the Convention and held that while mass deportations were prohibited under that article, the expulsion of individuals was allowed. In his concluding remarks, the speaker drew attention to the inability of the Council to respond in an effective manner to the indiscriminate slaughter perpetrated recently by the Syrian Arab Republic and its proxies in Lebanon while taking quick action when it came to Israel. Yet he invited the nations of the Middle East to support the peace initiative, and called on the Council to encourage a breakthrough in the current stalemate.⁷¹

Before the vote, the representative of the United States reiterated his Government's opposition to deportations. He stated that despite the Security Council's last call on Israel to desist from further deportations, in resolution 636 (1989), it had proceeded with further deportations. It was in this context that his Government would not oppose the draft resolution, but abstain. In conclusion, he recorded once again his country's objection to the wording of the draft resolution regarding the occupied Palestinian territories.⁷²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote. It was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (United States), as resolution 641 (1989) which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 607 (1988) of 5 January 1988, 608 (1988) of 14 January 1988 and 636 (1989) of 6 July 1989,

Having been apprised that Israel, the occupying Power, has once again, in defiance of those resolutions, deported five Palestinian civilians on 27 August 1989,

Expressing grave concern over the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories,

Recalling the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and in particular articles 47 and 49 thereof,

1. Deplores the continuing deportation by Israel, the occupying Power, of Palestinian civilians;

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representative of Palestine expressed the hope that preparations would be initiated under the supervision of the United Nations for the convening of the international peace conference.⁷³

Decision of 7 November 1989 (2889th meeting): rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 3 November 1989, addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁷⁴ the representative of Kuwait, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested an immediate meeting of the Council to consider the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory.

At its 2887th meeting, on 6 November 1989, the Council included the letter in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2887th, 2888th and 2889th meetings, on 6 and 7 November 1989.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Israel, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended an invitation to Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, under rule 39 of the provisional rules of procedure. At the same meeting, the Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁷⁵ At the 2888th meeting, the Council invited the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the 2887th meeting, the President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Algeria, Colombia, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Nepal, Senegal and Yugoslavia.⁷⁶ Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have recalled its relevant resolutions on the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, in particular 605 (1987), and the Geneva Convention, and taken note of General Assembly resolution 44/2 of 6 October 1989. Under its operative part, the Council would have strongly deplored the policies and practices of Israel which violated the human rights of the Palestinian people, and in particular the siege of towns, the ransacking of homes, and the illegal and arbitrary confiscation of their property and valuables; reaffirmed the applicability of the Geneva Convention to the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem, and called upon Israel to abide by the Convention; also called upon Israel to desist from its policies and practices and lift its siege; urged that Israel return the confiscated property to its owners; and requested the Secretary-General to conduct on-site monitoring of the situation in the occupied territory, and to submit periodic reports thereon.

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a note by the Secretary-General dated 16 October 1989,⁷⁷ transmitting the text of paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 44/2, in which the Assembly requested the Council to examine with urgency the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory with a view to considering measures needed to provide international protection to the Palestinian civilians in the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem.

The President further drew the attention of the Council to two letters dated 23 and 30 October 1989 from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General,⁷⁸ in which he described the most recent measures taken by Israel against the Palestinian people and requested the Council to take immediate measures to protect the Palestinian civilians and to ensure respect for the Fourth Geneva Convention.

The representative of Kuwait, speaking also on behalf of the Group of Arab States, said that the meeting had been requested by the Arab Group because of the gravity of the situation and the Council's delay in examining the situation to consider measures for the protection of Palestinians in accordance with General Assembly resolution 44/2. According to the representative, the dimensions and significance of Israeli policies were most recently manifested in Beit Sahur, where houses were ransacked, roads closed, and property confiscated. The matters had gone further with the so-called renovation of the temple of Solomon near Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. The Arab Group expected that Israeli plundering of Palestinian properties and the expropriation of property and means of production in an attempt to force entrepreneurs to pay the so-called tax dues would lead to widespread civil disobedience whose effects would spread to other areas. The speaker called upon the Council to adopt all the necessary measures to compel Israel to end its onslaught on the population and to comply with the Fourth Geneva Convention, and to pay reparations for the damage resulting from its blockade of Beit Sahur. He insisted that it was high time for the Council to carry out in-depth, objective reviews and assessments of the reasons and factors preventing implementation of its resolutions.⁷⁹

The representative of Palestine said that the members of the Council were meeting to ensure respect, as High Contracting Parties, for the Fourth Geneva Convention, and as members of the Council jointly to carry out their obligations under the Charter of the United Nations to consider a request made by the General Assembly in resolution 44/2. He charged Israel with committing "State crimes" in Beit Sahur by confiscating the property of innocent civilians and imposing taxation by brute force for the maintenance and perpetuation of foreign occupation. Referring to the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988,⁸⁰ which the speaker described as being the result of an on-the-spot examination of the situation, he called upon the members of the Council to request, on a priority basis, that the Secretary-General submit such on-the-spot reports as often as needed. He added that the Council should also demand that Israel return the stolen property to the victims or compensate them for damage. Lastly, the speaker noted that the United States Government had authorized massive additional economic and military aid for Israel and expressed fear that it would provide additional funds for the military occupation and the atrocities committed in the occupied territories. He urged the United States to join in a consensus, so that the Secretary-General might at least be enabled to immediately dispatch or assign a monitoring team to provide the Council with on-the-spot reports.⁸¹

During the course of the debate, other speakers expressed concern about Israel's repressive measures against the Palestinian civilians in Beit Sahur and its intervention against UNRWA offices and personnel in the West Bank and Gaza.⁸² Stating that the Council had a responsibility to ensure the protection of Palestinians, they called upon it to consider the recommendations outlined in the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988. They maintained that a peaceful settlement of the problem had to be based on the ending of the Israeli occupation, the realization of the legitimate rights of the Palestinians to self-determination, and the recognition of the right of Israel to live in secure and recognized borders. Several speakers appealed to the Council to address the question through an international peace conference with the equal participation of the PLO. One representative called upon the Council to establish the conditions necessary for the convening of that conference.⁸³ Another appealed to the permanent members of the Council to take practical steps and to begin considering the early establishment of a preparatory committee for the conference.⁸⁴

At the 2888th meeting, the representative of Senegal, speaking also in her capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, stated that repression was growing and that the raids launched against Beit Sahur clearly demonstrated that Israel was seeking a military solution to the Palestinian problem. She stated that the Security Council should do more with regard to the Middle East by initiating and overseeing the peace process on the basis of the guidelines set out in General Assembly resolution 43/176. She hoped that the Council would work with the Secretary-General to organize the international peace conference on the Middle East, and adopt the draft resolution to assure impartial and international protection for Palestinians. The speaker added that, in carrying out the peace process, the Council would need the support and assistance of all its members, especially of its permanent members.⁸⁵

The representative of Israel contended that if there was any deterioration in the situation, it involved not the efforts of the Israeli authorities to maintain public order and safety, but the escalation in inter-Palestinian violence. He held that the draft resolution, orchestrated by the Arab States in their campaign of political jihad against Israel, ignored the murder of Palestinians by the PLO and directed its fury at entirely legal measures, such as tax collection. The charge that Israel, by collecting taxes in Beit Sahur, had violated international law, was baseless, since the collection of taxes, dues, tolls and other forms of payment was permitted under the Hague Regulations. By customary international law, the occupant might even utilize for its own purpose the balance left over after administration costs had been met. Instead, Israel had used the funds to finance the provision of services for the Palestinian residents and had complemented them with its own funds whenever necessary. The speaker asserted that countries which claimed to be concerned about the welfare of the Palestinians resorted to the Security Council only to attack Israel. He recalled that negotiations were being undertaken at that time between Israelis and Palestinian representatives from Judea, Samaria and Gaza with the goal of opening a dialogue. He concluded by saying that his country's peace initiative was the only realistic, viable and practical endeavour towards a solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.⁸⁶

The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking also in his capacity as Chairman of the Coordinating Bureau of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, expressed concern at the fact that, owing to the positions of some, the United Nations was not in a position to play an appropriate role in the consideration of this problem, which had the potential of posing one of the most serious threats to peace and stability. The non-aligned countries had repeatedly pointed out the need for the continued consideration of the problem of Palestine in the Council. They expected the Council on this occasion to take resolute action and, as a first step, to secure implementation and compliance with resolution 605 (1987). At the same time they believed the Council should become more involved by seeking the most suitable basis for opening the process leading to a political solution of the problem, on the basis of resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and other relevant United Nations resolutions. The speaker recalled that at their ninth summit conference in Belgrade the non-aligned countries had reaffirmed the position that the most realistic and acceptable way to achieve a solution was the early convening of an international conference under United Nations auspices.⁸⁷

Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, said that the Arab Group had asked for the meeting to affirm its commitment to salvaging peace in the Middle East through the United Nations and the Security Council. He stated that Israel's intention, through the proliferation of settlements in the occupied territories, was to distort the unity of the Palestinian people and to facilitate the annexation of the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem.

That intent was evident in Israel's past declarations of the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem as part of its territory, its deliberate failure to define the land of the 1967 occupation, and its refusal to evacuate the lands it had occupied in 1947. Israel wanted to be treated as an occupant when it collected taxes but did not want to be considered as such when deporting Palestinians. The speaker reiterated the support of the Arab League for the international conference to be sponsored by the United Nations and stressed that any peace negotiations would have to be undertaken with the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.⁸⁸

At the 2889th meeting, on 7 November 1989, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics condemned the Israeli authorities' repressive actions against the Palestinian people and their attempts to impede the humanitarian work of UNRWA. He expressed concern over the use of force against the Agency's international staff and the arrests and detention of staff members as well as the raids against the Agency's offices in the occupied territories. He noted the discrepancy between Israel's assurances regarding a political settlement, and its actual policy with regard to the intifada. The speaker recalled his country's proposal in February aiming at improving the situation in the region and stated that the Soviet Union was ready to cooperate actively with all parties, the United Nations, and the Secretary-General in the convening of a conference to find a peaceful settlement in the Middle East. In supporting the draft resolution, he stressed the need to bring into play the potential of the Security Council.⁸⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom deplored the recent raids by the Israeli forces on UNRWA premises in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which he described as a violation of the privileges and immunities of a United Nations body. He informed the Council that his Government had received disturbing reports of the situation in Beit Sahur. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the tax strike by the citizens of Beit Sahur, due legal process should be followed. Furthermore, there was no excuse for the illegal and arbitrary confiscation of Palestinian property. Britain condemned both the killing of civilians by the Israeli forces and the killing of so-called Palestinian collaborators. The speaker held that elections should take place in the occupied territories on the basis of land for peace, in fulfilment of Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). That could set in motion a process leading to an international peace conference under United Nations auspices.⁹⁰

The representative of France stated that, whatever the justifications offered, the events in Beit Sahur and the methods employed by the Israeli army should be condemned. He also condemned the occupation authorities for forbidding access to the town by representatives of foreign States and called upon Israel to respect its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention. The speaker stressed that lasting peace could only be based on mutual recognition by Palestinians and Israelis of each other's respective rights and aspirations. In that sense, a comprehensive political settlement should ensure Israel's right to live within secure and recognized borders, and the equally important right of the Palestinians to a homeland in which they could establish the political structures of their choice. The international community had a duty to perform in that regard, and negotiations between the parties directly concerned should take place within the framework of an international peace conference.⁹¹

The representative of China supported the draft resolution and was in favour of the Council's taking action to check the Israeli authorities' suppression of Palestinians. He reiterated the recent proposal by his Government on a peace settlement. First, the Middle East question should be settled through political means and all parties should refrain from using force. Secondly, an international peace conference should be convened under the auspices of the United Nations, with the participation of the five permanent members of the Council and the parties to the conflict. Thirdly, the concerned parties should hold various forms of dialogue, including a direct dialogue between Israel and the PLO. Fourthly, Israel should stop suppressing Palestinian residents in the occupied areas and withdraw from the occupied territories. Accordingly the security of Israel should be also guaranteed. Fifthly, the State of Palestine and the State of Israel should extend mutual recognition and their peoples coexist peacefully.⁹²

The President then put the draft resolution to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States), and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Following the vote, the representative of the United States stated that his Government had raised directly with Israel its concerns over the blockade of Beit Sahur, the interference with the operations of UNRWA, school closures and other questions. Yet, he said, the United States was not willing to support unbalanced draft resolutions, which criticized Israeli actions without regard for the situation in the occupied territories, and did not refer to the Palestinians' acts of violence against Israelis and other Palestinians. While supporting efforts by the Secretary-General to visit the occupied territories to report periodically on the situation, the United States did not agree with the request in the draft resolution that the Secretary-General conduct on-site monitoring, since it connoted a permanent, ongoing presence on the ground. In the view of the United States, which was engaged in intensive efforts to help launch an Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, repeated recourse to the Council with one-sided draft resolutions did not contribute to this process or to a real reduction of confrontation in the occupied territories but exacerbated tensions and distracted the parties from addressing the critical issues.⁹³

The representative of Canada emphasized that the territories referred in the text were the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem, and Canada's vote in favour did not indicate any change in its view on the status of those territories.⁹⁴

The representative of Palestine blamed the United States for blocking the Secretary-General's and the Security Council's involvement in the search for a comprehensive settlement, as requested by the General Assembly. Referring to United States individual action he stated that the situation did not permit such action. Action should be collective. Furthermore, on-site monitoring of crimes committed in a territory under occupation did not entail any unnecessary violation of the sovereignty of the State of Israel. Therefore it was the duty of the United Nations to have a presence in the territories to report on such violations.⁹⁵

Letter dated 12 February 1990 from the Permanent Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council

By a letter dated 12 February 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁹⁶ the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics requested that a meeting of the Security Council be convened to consider the Israeli moves to settle the occupied territories, which ran counter to the Fourth Geneva Convention and to the decisions of the United Nations and were obstructing the peace effort in the Middle East. He called upon the Council to request the Government of Israel not to permit any action which might alter the demographic structure of the occupied territories.

At its 2910th meeting, on 15 March 1990, the Council included the letter in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2910th to 2912th, 2914th, 2915th and 2920th meetings, from 15 to 29 March, and on 3 May 1990.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Israel, Jordan and Senegal, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States. At the same meeting, the Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States) and 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.⁹⁷

At the 2912th meeting, the Council invited the representatives of Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Yemen and Yugoslavia to participate in the discussion. It also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to Mr. A. Engin Ansay, Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. At its subsequent meetings, the Council invited the following to participate: at the 2914th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, Morocco and the United Republic of Tanzania; at the 2915th meeting, the representatives of Afghanistan, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Kuwait and Nicaragua; and at the 2920th meeting, the representatives of Greece and Turkey.

At the 2910th meeting, the President (Democratic Yemen) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.⁹⁸

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the meeting had been convened because his Government had come to the conclusion that the question of Israel's action in settling the occupied territories with persons who had never lived in those territories was extremely serious and affected matters of security in the Middle East. The settlement in the occupied Arab territories of immigrants arriving from the Soviet Union caused deep concern in his country. Noting that appeals were made to his country to prevent Soviet Jews from emigrating to Israel, he pointed out that it was impossible for the Soviet Union to prevent its Jewish citizens from doing so, because it would be contrary to the policy of equal rights and freedoms for all citizens, including the right to emigrate, resulting from the democratization of Soviet legislation. The responsibility lay with Israel, which should prohibit its citizens and others from settling in the occupied territories in accordance with article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. Instead, the Government of Israel was planning to build some 4,000 homes on the West Bank for the settlement of immigrants. The Soviet Union, however, hoped that the Government of Israel would make an assessment of the situation and not permit actions liable to alter the demographic structure of the occupied territories. Pointing out that very few of the Soviet Jews leaving the Soviet Union wanted to live in Israel, the speaker encouraged Western countries, including the United States which had recently cut the number of entry permits for Soviet Jews, to grant residence to them. In the Soviet Union's view, the Council should focus on the three following elements: confirmation of the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem; disagreement by the Council with the intention of the Government of Israel to settle immigrants in the occupied territories in contravention of the provisions of the Geneva Convention, in particular article 49, which prohibits the settlement of non-native inhabitants in occupied lands; and an appeal by the Council to the Government of Israel not to permit actions liable to alter the demographic structure of the occupied territories. The speaker also stressed the importance of balancing the interests of all parties concerned within the framework of an international conference. A comprehensive settlement should be based on Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), the exercise by the Palestinian people of its right to self-determination, and the right of all parties to existence within internationally recognized borders. As part of the practical preparations for a conference, he agreed that there could be purposeful bilateral and multilateral contacts to find compromise decisions, including interim ones. He supported also the commencement of preparatory work for the peace conference within the framework of the Security Council.⁹⁹

The representative of Palestine stated that the immigration of Soviet Jews and their settlement in the occupied territories was an act of aggression against national Palestinian rights and an usurpation of Palestinian land in preparation for expelling the Palestinian people, as happened in 1948 where approximately 1 million Palestinians were expelled. The massive organized Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union to Palestine was no more than a continuation of the Zionist invasion of the Palestinian and Arab lands. The speaker indicated that, despite all the suffering of the Palestinian people, their aim remained peaceful coexistence. They had offered constructive initiatives which were met on the Israeli side by an escalation of violence, a strengthening of the occupation and persistence in the practice of eviction. He regretted that the United States remained hesitant to agree to the convening of an international peace conference and insisted on pursuing unilateral efforts which proved to be inadequate and futile. It was also inadequate for the Council to adopt a resolution or to issue a statement. The Council should take measures similar to the actions taken against the Pretoria regime. Equally important was the stand expected to be taken by the United States and the Soviet Union against the organized massive immigration.¹⁰⁰

The representative of Malaysia said that the Israeli policy of encouraging mass Jewish immigration and its policy of territorial occupation of Palestinian lands, leading to their eventual annexation, could not be condoned and should be condemned by the Council. It was imperative that the Council sent a clear and unequivocal message to the Government of Israel that it deplored its policies and practices, including the illegal opening-up of settlements in the occupied territories, and that Israel should desist forthwith from those practices. It was equally imperative that the Council declare the illegality of those settlements and reaffirm the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to its land, including the right of return. Israel should be pressured by the collective weight of international opinion, if not by sanctions, to respect its international obligations. At the same time Governments should refrain from providing financial assistance to Israel for the purpose of developing settlements in the occupied territories. In the speaker's opinion, there was a special responsibility on the part of the sender country to ensure they did not open the floodgates of Jewish emigration to Israel and on the part of the traditional recipient countries not to erect artificial barriers against those intending to emigrate. The speaker added that, pending the settlement of the Palestinian problem, which could only be achieved via the formula "land for peace", his Government urged the Council to reconsider the Secretary-General's report of 21 January 1988 in order to provide protection for the inhabitants of the occupied territories.¹⁰¹

During the course of the debate, several speakers referring to the systematic settlement of Soviet Jews in the occupied territories as another phase in the Israeli occupation aimed at replacing Palestinians with settlers, in order to change the demographic composition of those territories and ultimately to annex them, stating that these practices were contrary to the Fourth Geneva Convention and to Security Council resolution 465 (1980). They condemned Israel's intensification of its expansionist policy at a time when there were promising steps towards the restoration of peace in the Middle East. They appealed, in various terms, to the Council to take firm action to stop the settlements.¹⁰² A number also called upon the Council to appeal to all States to refrain from giving any assistance to Israel that might be used in establishing new settlements.¹⁰³ A few speakers appealed to the Council to consider deterrent measures under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.¹⁰⁴

At the 2911th meeting, on 15 March 1990, the representative of Jordan, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, pointed out that the history of Jewish immigration to Palestine was closely linked to the course of the Israeli-Arab conflict. Indeed, this immigration was the reason behind the conflict and its continuation a major factor in the persistence of the conflict. The arrival of huge numbers of immigrants and their settlement in the occupied Arab territories meant the continuation of the creeping annexation of those territories and the expulsion of their rightful inhabitants. He warned that, as a result of that immigration, Israel might sooner or later annex the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. It might also commit the crime of deporting the Palestinian people en masse, called "transferral" in Israel. In this regard, the speaker drew attention to recent statements by the Israeli authorities in which it was said, inter alia, that those immigrants had the freedom to settle wherever they wanted and that this large-scale immigration required the establishment of a Greater Israel. He deplored the attitude of countries which had set quotas or shut their doors to Jewish immigration and indicated that in the case of the Soviet Union those immigrants had left the country carrying travel documents and not passports, which meant they could not return. It was a matter of evacuation not emigration. It was unfair to allow Jews from all parts of the world to settle in the occupied territories and to deny the Palestinian refugees in the diaspora their right to return to their land. The Council ought to act in an effective manner which meant that it had to use its powers to implement its resolutions. What was expected of the Council was, inter alia, the suspension of that immigration to Israel or its redirection to other countries, reaffirmation of its past resolutions and of the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention, and a request to the Secretary-General to monitor the implementation of the resolution to be adopted by the Council on this matter and to submit a report.¹⁰⁵

The representative of Senegal, speaking also as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, said that it had been reported that the settlers already living in the occupied territory were actively encouraging new immigrants to come to the occupied territory and that the Government of Israel was offering large cash bonuses, low-interest mortgages and practically free land. She added that reliable sources noted the existence in the West Bank of a growing campaign to break up families, and, as a result of Israeli-imposed restrictions, tens of thousands of Palestinians who had returned to the occupied territory after the 1967 war with limited-residence permits and who remained in the territory were regarded as foreigners by the occupation authorities, who expelled several hundred Palestinians in 1989, for the most part women and children. Senegal supported the right of each individual to emigrate to the country of his choice, but could not agree that the exercise of that right could be imposed by a third Power, to the detriment of the host populations. As for the Committee, it joined in the appeals made to the Government of Israel to implement the Fourth Geneva Convention and the relevant resolutions of the Security Council and to refrain from actions likely to alter the demographic composition of the occupied Palestinian territory.¹⁰⁶

The representative of Israel stated that the immigration of Soviet Jews to Israel was the culmination of a long and strenuous international struggle in which the free world had played a leading role. This momentous development was particularly critical when the darker side of democratization was generating a resurgence of virulent anti-semitism. The speaker maintained that at the same time an “ugly campaign” was being waged by Arab States, with the aim of halting the immigration of Jews to Israel, which lay at the foundation of the existence of the State of Israel. He charged that by doing so they were opposing that very existence. The Arab claim that Israel intended to displace Palestinians by settling Jewish immigrants in their place was a preposterous charge. As a matter of fact, over 99 per cent of the immigrants had settled in Israel’s main urban centres. Moreover, far from displacing Palestinians, Israel had been the only party actively engaged in rehabilitating them through a family reunification plan. The speaker pointed out that it was neither the time nor the place to focus on the contentious issues and mutual grievances that lay at the heart of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Disagreement should and would be addressed when negotiations commenced.¹⁰⁷

At the 2912th meeting, on 27 March 1990, the representative of Egypt said that the question before the Council was whether Israel’s settlement of parts of its population in the occupied Palestinian territories was an exercise of human rights or an attempt to establish an illegal fait accompli under that pretext. Egypt did not take issue with the emigration of the Soviet Jews, or others, to Israel of their own volition, provided that they also had the right to return and that certain criteria be applied to that emigration to ensure that those participating in it were not settled in the occupied Arab territories. However, if enabling emigrants to leave their country of origin resulted in their settling in the occupied Arab lands and contributed to the expulsion of the indigenous population, that presented a paradox in which humanitarian law was violated in the name of human rights. The speaker stated that certain conclusions could be drawn regarding the future intentions of Israel from the practice of altering the demographic composition of the occupied territories. Those intentions, if proved true, would entail actions in blatant violation of a cardinal principle of the Charter of the United Nations, namely, the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by force, which was the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). Immigration to Israel, coupled with settlements, constituted a serious threat to the peace process in the Middle East and jeopardized endeavours to build confidence among the Israelis and the Palestinians. The two super-Powers had an instrumental role to play on both counts. He called upon Israel to terminate any settlement activity in the occupied territories and appealed to the Council to unequivocally reaffirm the illegality of such Israeli practices.¹⁰⁸

The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic stated that his country's position was best reflected in the resolution adopted by the Council of the League of Arab States on 13 March 1990, in which it, inter alia, deplored Israel's settlement policies as constituting an act of aggression against the right of the Palestinian people to their land and as representing a threat to Arab national security. Furthermore, it called upon the international community to put an end to the emigration of Soviet Jews and to guarantee all the national rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to return, as set forth in General Assembly resolution 194 (III) of 11 December 1948. He charged that there was a long-standing intention to forge ahead with the establishment of the greater Zionist State in the Arab region by means of expanding at the expense of the neighbouring States. That was evidenced by the fact that Israel had annexed the Syrian Golan. The Syrian Arab Republic considered the settlement of Jewish immigrants in the Golan as an act of aggression against Syrian sovereignty and territorial integrity. Their settlement in any other part of the occupied Arab territories was an equally grave matter.¹⁰⁹

The representative of China said that Israel's establishment of settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory was illegal and posed a threat to the existence of the Palestinian people and the security of the Arab countries, aggravating the tense situation in the region. He called on Israel to give up its erroneous policy and to demonstrate good faith and flexibility. He also proposed that the Council should take unequivocal steps to stop Israel's settlement of immigrants in the occupied territories, and appealed to the countries directly involved to cooperate.¹¹⁰

At the 2914th meeting, on 28 March 1990, the representative of Yugoslavia, speaking on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, expressed concern about the announced intention of the Government of Israel to settle Jewish immigrants from the Soviet Union in the occupied territories. He stated that the Foreign Ministers of non-aligned countries, in a meeting held on 11 March, had warned that such organized, mass actions undermined the peace process and were in flagrant violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. They called upon the Security Council to take resolute action to prevent such attempts and declare them illegal, null and void. The Council should consider measures for the protection of the Palestinian civilian population under Israeli occupation and call upon all States not to provide Israel with any assistance to be used specifically in connection with settlements in the occupied territories. The speaker concluded by saying that it was high time that the Council got actively involved in the efforts to find a peaceful and just solution to the Middle East crisis.¹¹¹

The representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic stated his concern regarding the propaganda campaign being waged in certain circles around the growing emigration of Jewish persons from the Soviet Union, in particular the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, to Israel. He charged that Israel was exploiting the Jewish immigration for its aggressive and expansionist plans, with the intention of sabotaging the peace negotiations. The speaker stated that the main problem was the illegal settling in Palestinian territories, regardless of whether it was by compulsion or voluntary. He appealed to Israel to support the convening of an international conference with the equal participation of the PLO, and called upon the Council to take a decision that would halt Israel's practice of settlements.¹¹²

At the 2915th meeting, on 29 March 1990, the representative of France reaffirmed that his delegation considered illegal the settlements in the occupied territories and called upon Israel to respect its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention. He said that the proposals made by Israeli authorities in the past weeks, including their call for increased Jewish settlement, failed to create the climate of confidence essential for any progress towards a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. An international peace conference, with the participation of all parties concerned, was the most appropriate framework for direct negotiations among the parties.¹¹³

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that Israel had been settling its citizens in the occupied territories for nearly a quarter of a century, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly. The problem was being aggravated by the arrival of Soviet Jews in the occupied territories. Welcoming the liberalization of Soviet emigration controls, the speaker however stated that the freedom of Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel should not be made at the expense of the rights, homes and land of the Palestinian people. He pointed out that the settling of those Jews was not only illegal but also politically misguided because it threatened the peace process. Noting that the past 18 months had seen some positive developments, he called upon the Government of Israel not to jeopardize the prospects of peace by either allowing or encouraging Jewish immigrants to settle in the occupied territories.¹¹⁴

On 12 April 1990, a draft resolution in provisional form, sponsored by Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Ethiopia, Malaysia and Zaire, was circulated among the members of the Council.¹¹⁵ In the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have expressed awareness of the immigration of Jews to Israel and concern regarding Israeli statements about settling them in the occupied territories. It would have recalled General Assembly resolution 194 (III), which had stipulated that the Palestinian refugees wishing to return to their homes should be permitted to do so, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return. Under the operative part, the Council would have, inter alia, considered that the policies and practices of Israel of settling parts of its civilian population and new immigrants in the occupied territories were violations of the rights of the Palestinian people and the population of the other occupied Arab territories; called upon Israel to desist from such practices or any other action to alter the physical character and demographic composition of those territories; and called upon all States not to provide Israel with any assistance to be used in connection with settlements.

By a letter dated 23 April 1990,¹¹⁶ the observer of Palestine brought to the attention of the Secretary-General that, on 11 April 1990, a group of Israelis had moved into a property belonging to the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate in Jerusalem. Consequently, Palestinians had demonstrated in protest and the Israeli police had used force to disperse the procession, resulting in the assault on the Patriarch. In a further letter dated 27 April 1990,¹¹⁷ the observer also brought to the attention of the Secretary-General that, on 26 April 1990, the Israeli army had opened fire on Palestinian civilians in the occupied territories, resulting in the killing of five persons and the wounding of hundreds.

At the 2920th meeting, on 3 May 1990, the representative of Greece expressed concern at the events that had taken place in the Christian Quarter of East Jerusalem, where settlers had occupied the St. John Hospice, owned by the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem and situated in the heart of the Christian Quarter of the Old City. He informed the Council that his Government had asked for the immediate eviction of the settlers. He also shared the Secretary-General's view on the involvement of some Israeli officials in the financial transactions that had led to the move of Jewish settlers to the Christian Quarter.¹¹⁸

The representative of Palestine said that what prompted an immediate request that the Council should continue considering the situation was the alarming news that Israeli troops had confined 120,000 Palestinians to their homes, sealing off half of the West Bank to prevent violence at a so-called religious seminary established by Israeli settlers in Nablus. The speaker also recalled that a number of memorandums had been submitted to the President of the Council about the incidents that took place during the Holy Week against the property of the Patriarchate in Jerusalem. Those last two incidents were an indicator that the illegal occupation was turning into a holy war. The speaker noted that those settlements could not have been established if they had not been provided for financially. In this regard, he warned that the new loan for housing provided by the United States on the guarantee that it would not be used to establish settlements in the occupied territories might still be misused. The Palestinian people demanded the establishment of an effective United Nations presence to monitor events such as those that had occurred in the Jabalya refugee camp, where Palestinians had been killed recently by Israeli soldiers. Reminding the Council that it had before it a draft text that had been circulating for weeks, without being put to the vote, he asked what prevented the Council from taking effective action against Israel.¹¹⁹

The representative of Egypt pointed out that the Council had been convened to consider the recent developments, before it had concluded consultations on the draft resolution regarding Israel's settlement of immigrants in the occupied territories. Egypt condemned the acquisition by force of the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate's premises in Jerusalem, the violence employed against the Patriarch, and the role of the Government of Israel in that action. The speaker stressed that the international community had repeatedly emphasized that the status of the Arab city of Al-Quds Al-Sharif must not be violated or unilaterally modified. By the same token, rules of international law should be scrupulously observed, as should United Nations resolutions, particularly Security Council resolutions 242 (1967), 267 (1969) and 465 (1980), which considered East Jerusalem an integral part of the occupied Arab territories. This continued to be the firm position of the Government of Egypt and this policy was unalterable. Finally, the speaker called upon the Council to unanimously adopt an objective and decisive resolution commensurate with the issue.¹²⁰

rejection of a draft resolution

By a letter dated 21 May 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹²¹ the representative of Bahrain, in his capacity as Chairman of the Group of Arab States, requested the convening of an immediate meeting of the Council to consider "the crime of collective murder committed by Israel against the Palestinian people".¹²²

At its 2923rd meeting, held on 25 and 26 May 1990 at Geneva, the Council included the letter in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2923rd and 2926th meetings, on 25, 26 and 31 May 1990.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the following, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote: the representatives of Bahrain, Bangladesh, Egypt, Gabon, India, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Morocco, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sri Lanka, the Syrian Arab Republic, Tunisia, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia. It also decided to extend an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People; to Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States; and to Mr. Nabil T. Maarouf, Assistant Secretary-General for Palestine and Al-Quds of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. At the 2926th meeting, the Council invited the representatives of Japan and Pakistan, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

At the 2923rd meeting, the Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite Mr. Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization, at the request of the observer of Palestine, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.¹²³

At the 2923rd meeting, the President of the Council (Finland) drew the attention of the members of the Council to several documents.¹²⁴

The representative of Palestine, Mr. Yasser Arafat, stated that the request for the convening of an urgent meeting stemmed from the realization that the situation had reached an extremely dangerous point. The "massacre" perpetrated by the Israeli forces against Palestinian workers had been followed by the killing of more than 25 Palestinians and the injury of 2,000 more in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Jerusalem in the past five days. The speaker asserted that it was not the insanity of an individual that was responsible for the "Black Sunday massacre", as Israeli officials had claimed, but the insanity of a system haunted by illusions of racial superiority and an obsession with expansion for a "Greater Israel". He then gave an account of the sufferings of the Palestinian people over the past 30 months. Pointing out that Israel, although established by a decision of the United Nations, was the only State which ignored and challenged United Nations resolutions and which did not commit itself to implementing them, and warning that through its practices, threats and war, it was leading the Middle East to an unprecedented catastrophe given its stockpile of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and threatened international peace and security, he urged the Security Council, in particular its permanent members, to shoulder its responsibility and implement United Nations resolutions relating to the Arab-Israeli conflict before it was too late. The speaker regretted what he saw as the unlimited support of the United States for Israel which impeded all peace initiatives in the Middle East, including the United States proposals themselves. He stated that the PLO, whose peace initiative had received the support of the peace-loving forces inside Israeli society and had been positively received among Jewish groups abroad, remained flexible towards international initiatives, including the five-point plan of the United States. He concluded by suggesting the following measures. First, the designation by the Secretary-General of a permanent special envoy to work on the peace process; second, the adoption by the Council of a resolution to provide international protection to Palestinians and to supplement the United Nations observer force stationed in Jerusalem; third, the adoption by the Council of a resolution to stop immigration to the occupied territories; fourth, an immediate meeting of the permanent members of the Council to prepare for the convening of the international peace conference on the Middle East; and fifth, the imposition of sanctions on Israel in accordance with Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations. Finally, the Council should form a committee composed of its members to investigate Israel's crimes against humanity.¹²⁵

The representative of Bahrain, speaking on behalf of the Group of Arab States, praised the Council's readiness to hear all views, in particular those of the President of Palestine. Hoping that there would be no other obstacles to working at United Nations

Headquarters, leading to another transfer of the Council's meetings, he appealed to the United States to respect its commitments as a host State. Stating that the situation in the occupied territories had worsened as a result of the practices of the Israeli authorities and the suppression of the intifada, he referred to international reports which confirmed that 700 Palestinians had been killed in the first two years of the intifada, 25,000 wounded since 1987 and 5,000 arrested. He believed that the only way to deal with the current situation was by adopting a strong resolution condemning Israeli's acts and sending international peacekeeping forces to protect the population in the occupied Palestinian Arab territories.¹²⁶

The representative of Jordan appealed to the Council to react favourably to the requests made by the President of Palestine, Yasser Arafat, regarding the measures to be taken to protect Palestinians. He expressed regrets and frustration over the fact that each time the Council met to consider the situation in the occupied Arab territories it was because of grave events taking place in that region, whereas in recent times there had been increasing number of Council meetings devoted to the positive evolution of the situation in other parts of the world. The event that led the Council to meet again was the result of a growing extremism, which was fed by the policies of the Israeli leadership. He held that any responsible body would demand that sanctions be imposed on Israel, which spared no effort to kill any peace initiative. The speaker hoped that the Council would take the necessary measures to ensure international protection of the Palestinian people and send an international fact-finding mission to Israel and the occupied territories to investigate the events in question in order to take the necessary measures to see that Israel abided by the relevant international conventions, including the Fourth Geneva Convention.¹²⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom expressed concern at the murder of Palestinians by an Israeli civilian and at the response of the Government of Israel to the spontaneous demonstrations by Palestinians provoked by that incident. He, however, noted that the due process of law against the civilian had already begun in Israel. He pointed out the bankruptcy of the policy of the status quo, and regretted that Israel, where a political crisis had frozen all movement since mid-March, was unable to proceed on the basis of the five points proposed by the United States. It was essential that a dialogue start between Israel and a credible and genuinely representative Palestinian delegation, followed by an international conference to reach a settlement on the basis of land for peace, security for Israel, and self-determination for the Palestinians. The United Kingdom was ready to look at proposals for further United Nations involvement in the region. The speaker called upon Israel to exercise the utmost restraint in the occupied territories and to move rapidly towards the creation of a Government able and determined to take the peace process forward.¹²⁸

The representative of Israel objected to the convening of the Council on four grounds. First, it was convened to retard peace and security and to inflame passions and to incite violence, as revealed by the different attitudes of Israel and the Arabs to the attacks on Jews. Where Jews had been killed, Israel had called for restraint whereas the PLO and most Arab capitals had hailed the killers. Second, it was an attempt to violate international law and to encroach on Israel's rights and duties under the Fourth Geneva Convention as the responsible governing Power in the territories. The speaker said that there had never been a call for the convening of the Council when violence had broken out in other countries and put down. It appeared to him that Israel was judged by a unique standard. He maintained that there was no need for additional observers to the most reported and monitored area of the world. He further pointed out that sending observers to protect the civilian population in internal disputes, or in what were termed occupied territories, had no precedent. Third, it was a springboard for total war on Jewish immigration, a war that had begun in 1922, against Israel's very existence and its right, like any other sovereign nation, to accept people. The recent call of the PLO for the right to return meant the flooding of Jaffa, Acre, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem with Palestinians in order to bring about Israel's dissolution. Fourth, it was a prelude to an Arab summit that would meet the following week in Baghdad to discuss war against Israel. The speaker reiterated Israel's commitment to peace and recalled its plan, the components of which were non-belligerency pacts between Israel and the Arab States, free elections, the rehabilitation of refugee camps and a period of autonomy followed by negotiations over the final status of the territories of Judea, Samaria and Gaza.¹²⁹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the decision of the Council to hold the meeting at Geneva testified to its desire to hear the representatives of all concerned parties, including the leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which he qualified as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. He agreed that the Israeli who had opened fire on unarmed workers could be called a madman, but questioned the rightfulness of the orders of Israeli generals to fire on defenceless civilians. Expressing concern at the escalation of violence, he supported the establishment of a team of international observers that could subsequently be converted into a permanent standing body.¹³⁰

Referring to the issue of Israeli settlement of Jewish immigrants under the Council's consideration since March, the representative of China stated that it was unfortunate that, before the Council could wind up its deliberation on a draft resolution on this issue, a tragedy had occurred in which more than a dozen peaceful Palestinian labourers in the occupied territories were killed in a single day. He wanted to put on record the strong condemnation of his Government for the criminal acts of the Israeli authorities who instead of protecting the population slaughtered it. He warned that, if Israel did not change its erroneous policy, the situation would threaten peace and security in the Middle East and the world. The international community should take effective steps to bring pressure on Israel, which had obstinately refused to hold any dialogue with the PLO and had rejected the international peace conference. The speaker expressed disappointment about the failure of the Council to play its expected role with regard to the Middle East issue and stated that the Council should do something "tangible".¹³¹

The representative of France described the meeting of the Council at Geneva with the participation of the PLO leader as exceptional. This meant that its members had realized that the situation had reached a degree of tension demanding urgent action. He observed that at the origin of the latest tragedy lay an Israeli's act of madness, leading to violent demonstrations against which the Israeli army reacted harshly. Drawing attention to the months-long paralysis in the peace process, due to the crisis in the Government of Israel, he appealed to the Council to call upon Israel, in the strongest possible terms, to respect its obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention. But he added that the Council should do more and consider some of the proposals made by Mr. Yasser Arafat. He supported the sending as soon as possible of a United Nations fact-finding mission to the territories for the emplacement of United Nations observers.¹³²

The representative of Senegal, speaking in her capacity as Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, said that the Committee's view was that the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council, should make Israel guarantee the safety of the Palestinian civilian population and join in the international consensus on the convening of an international peace conference. The Committee also trusted that the Council would adopt decisions in line with general opinion and that observers would be sent promptly to the occupied Palestinian territories to restore peace and security. That was the only position the Committee could take, for the Organization's credibility was at stake.¹³³

During the course of the debate some speakers supported the idea of sending United Nations forces and observers in the occupied territories.¹³⁴ One speaker supported the use of the Secretary-General's good offices.¹³⁵ A few speakers called upon the Council to impose sanctions on Israel.¹³⁶

Following a suspension, the meeting resumed on 26 May 1990. The representative of Egypt stated that the occupied territories were not the property of Israel, but the lands of the Palestinian people whose right to an independent State had been confirmed by General Assembly resolution 181 (II). Israel, which had been created in accordance with that resolution, destroyed its very basis for existence by denying the same right to Palestinians. He held that the Fourth Geneva Convention did not confer upon Israel competence to govern the occupied territories, but entrusted it with certain powers on a provisional and exceptional basis. The speaker rejected the argument made by Israel that the international control and monitoring of those territories would be a violation of Israel's sovereignty or an interference in its internal affairs, on the grounds that all parties to the Convention were under obligation to ensure respect for it. He further stated that immigration and return were the two sides of the same coin and the establishment of new settlements was incompatible with United Nations decisions on the Palestinian refugees' right to return. He asked the Council to ensure the protection of the Palestinian people and expressed support for the establishment of a permanent United Nations presence in the occupied territories.¹³⁷

Speaking after a further suspension, Mr. Clovis Maksoud, Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States, deplored the attempt by the representative of Israel to pre-empt the results of the meeting and to exercise a "veto power" by rejecting any decision the Council would take. He stressed that the West Bank, Gaza and East Jerusalem were occupied territories and Israel was bound to abide by the Geneva Conventions. Yet Israel made a distinction between de facto and de jure compliance by maintaining that it chose to be bound only by certain aspects of the Conventions.¹³⁸

The representative of Lebanon feared that the Israeli State's practices were aimed at the total displacement of the Palestinian people. He asserted that it wanted to create "Greater Israel" by displacing the Palestinian people and settling thousands of them in Lebanon. He expected the Council to play its role and secure the implementation of its own resolutions in the Middle East, including Lebanon.¹³⁹

The meeting was suspended briefly to hold informal consultations in a separate room, following which the meeting resumed.

Before adjourning the meeting, the President informed the members of the Council that, as agreed in the consultations, informal consultations would be held at United Nations Headquarters in New York on Tuesday, 29 May 1990.

At the 2926th meeting, on 31 May 1990, the President drew the attention of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Yemen, and Zaire.¹⁴⁰ Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have reaffirmed the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the territories occupied since 1967. Under the operative part, the Council would have established a commission consisting of three members of the Council, to be dispatched immediately to examine the situation relating to the policies and practices of Israel in the Palestinian territories including Jerusalem; requested the commission to submit its report to the Council by 20 June 1990, containing recommendations on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of Palestinians; and also requested the Secretary-General to provide the commission with the necessary facilities to enable it to carry out its mission.

The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to several other documents.¹⁴¹

The representative of Israel observed that, with the exception of one or two representatives, all the members of the Security Council who had spoken so far had called only on Israel to act with restraint. None of them had called on the Palestinians to cease rioting or on the PLO to cease its acts of terror. By containing such violence, Israel had only exercised its legal obligation to uphold public order. If Israel were to be labelled an "occupying Power", then it was the exclusive legal authority in the territories under the Fourth Geneva Convention, and would therefore not accept the appointment of a commission to examine the situation. The speaker concluded by urging the members of the Council to vote against the draft resolution.¹⁴²

Following a brief suspension of the meeting, the President put the draft resolution to the vote. It received 14 votes in favour and 1 against (United States), and was not adopted, owing to the negative vote of a permanent member of the Council.

Speaking in explanation of vote, the representative of the United States said his Government would support practical steps that responded to the spiral of troubling events, but such steps should not set back the effort to move forward on the peace process. While the United States continued to support the dispatching of a special envoy of the Secretary-General to look at the situation, it could not support the draft resolution, because it promoted a different vehicle that could be misused to generate more controversy in the region. What was really essential for the peace process was an endeavour to be undertaken by the parties themselves.¹⁴³

The representative of Palestine regretted that one permanent member invoked its arbitrary powers to deny the Council its responsibilities and the ability to carry out its tasks in response to an alarming situation. By casting a negative vote, the United States made clear that it was against the Council's commissioning of a delegation to examine the situation and report to it; a practical step that would ensure the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians. He hoped that the Government of the United States would eventually realize that it was obligated by the Charter of the United Nations to permit the Council to discharge its duties in an equitable way. Despite the rejection of the draft resolution, the speaker assured the Council that the Palestinian people would still recognize it as their last resort.¹⁴⁴

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics regretted that the members of the Council had been unable to convince the representative of the United States not to block the totally non-confrontational, balanced, moderate and logical draft resolution. In his opinion, the occupied Palestinian territories were territories in which innocent people were dying. It was the duty of the Council to clarify why that was taking place and to decide on what had to be done. It was therefore totally incomprehensible why the Council should be deprived of studying the state of affairs on site.¹⁴⁵

The representative of Cuba stressed that the Council, which once again was prevented from performing its functions under the Charter, still had the obligation to put an end to the situation. The Council was not created to impose anyone's view, but to make it possible for the United Nations to respond swiftly and effectively on everyone's behalf.¹⁴⁶

The representative of Yemen interpreted the negative vote cast by the United States as a vote of no confidence in the Council. Maintaining that the item was not closed, he called upon the United States to change its attitude and to respond to the wishes of the other 14 members.¹⁴⁷

Decision of 19 June 1990: statement by the President

On 19 June 1990, following consultations, the President of the Security Council issued the following statement on behalf of the members of the Council:¹⁴⁸

The members of the Council strongly deplore the incident which occurred on 12 June 1990 in a clinic belonging to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, located near Shati' camp in Gaza, in which several innocent Palestinian women and children were wounded by a tear-gas grenade thrown by an Israeli officer.

They are dismayed to find that the penalty imposed on that officer has been commuted.

They reaffirm that the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, is applicable to the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and request the High Contracting Parties to ensure respect for the Convention.

The members of the Council call upon Israel to abide by its obligations under that Convention.

Decision of 13 October 1990 (2948th meeting): resolution 672 (1990)

By a letter dated 26 September 1990 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹⁴⁹ the representative of Yemen requested an urgent meeting of the Council to consider the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory.

At its 2945th meeting, on 5 October 1990, the Council included the letter in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2945th, 2946th, 2947th and 2948th meetings, on 5, 8, 9 and 12 October 1990.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Israel and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. It also extended an invitation, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, to the delegation of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. At the same meeting, the Council decided further, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Canada, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.¹⁵⁰ At its subsequent meetings, the Council invited the following to participate: at the 2946th meeting, the representatives of Algeria, Jordan, Tunisia and Yugoslavia; at the 2947th meeting, the representatives of Bangladesh, Egypt, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Mauritania, Morocco, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and the United Arab Emirates, and, under rule 39 of its provisional rules of procedure, Mr. Abdulmalek Ismail Mohamed, Office of the Permanent Observer of the League of Arab States; and, at the 2948th meeting, the representatives of India and Turkey.

At the 2945th meeting, the President (United Kingdom) drew the attention of the Council to a letter dated 19 September 1990 from the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People addressed to the Secretary-General¹⁵¹ and to two letters, dated 21 and 24 September 1990, from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General.¹⁵²

The representative of Palestine recalled that the question of Palestine had existed since the establishment of the United Nations, which had adopted the resolution on partition in 1947. He pointed out that the Organization had committed itself to the implementation of the said resolution to establish Israel, but had not done so with respect to the Arab

State of Palestine. As a matter of fact the Security Council had failed to protect the Palestinian people and to safeguard their national rights of independence and sovereignty. The United States by its veto had stopped the Council from deterring Israel's policies and had prevented the imposition of any sanctions on Israel. Meanwhile the tension had continued to escalate in the occupied territories. What had happened a few days ago was another massacre to add to the list. The speaker made it clear that, unless the question of Palestine was addressed in a serious and responsible manner, there would be no way to find a solution that would restore security and stability to the Middle East region. The speaker appealed to the members of the Council to have a single, universal standard for implementation that would be relevant to all resolutions. He also called on the Council to make every effort to implement its previous resolutions on the question of Palestine, to take the necessary measures to protect the Palestinian people and to put an end to the Israeli occupation.¹⁵³

The representative of Yemen acknowledged that the meeting was taking place at a time when the events in Gaza might not seem important in comparison with the crisis in the Gulf. Yet the events in question would test whether the Council could implement all its resolutions with the same diligence, enthusiasm and commitment. He cautioned that, if the Council did not act cohesively and consistently on all questions, it would be thought that there was a double standard. His delegation would, at a later time, submit a draft resolution on Israel's recent practices calling upon Israel to abide by the Geneva Convention and upon the Secretary-General to make an effort to protect the Palestinians.¹⁵⁴

The meeting was suspended.

Following the suspension, the representative of Israel praised the Council's decisive action against Iraqi aggression, but regretted that two dissenting members, one of whom had requested the current meeting at the urging of the PLO, had not taken part in the united response. In his view, the PLO had many motives for the convening of the emergency meeting. The first motive was to divert attention from the open alliance of the PLO with Iraq. The second was to convene the Council as a "primer" for the General

Assembly's debates on the Middle East to be held in November. The third was to sow division and disunity among the members of the international coalition mustered against the Iraqi aggression against Kuwait by pointing at Israel in order to make everyone, including the Arab States, forget the instantaneous support of the PLO for Iraq. The speaker maintained that the situation in the territories was more peaceful than at any other time since December 1987, and asserted that the calm was thanks to Israel's policy of restraint. Israel was doing everything in its power to create an atmosphere conducive to democratic elections and coexistence. He then gave his account of the events of 20 September 1990. He said that an Israeli civilian, called up for his reserve duty, was driving in a civilian car, dressed in civilian clothes when he took a wrong turn into El-Bureij refugee camp in Gaza and was killed by a lynch mob. In order to ensure that such lynchings did not occur again, the Israel Defense Forces had decided to expedite existing plans to broaden the road on which the incident occurred. Contrary to the PLO claim, that decision had not been an act of collective punishment. Also false were the PLO allegations that 200 houses were to be demolished. On the contrary, 26 stores and 7 residential buildings had been demolished, and their owners would receive full financial compensation for any loss. The speaker concluded by saying that the grave threat to international peace and security was Iraq and its weapons of mass destruction, not the situation in El-Bureij.¹⁵⁵

Mrs. Absa Claude Diallo, Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, noted that, since the beginning of the intifada, the Security Council had fallen short of ensuring protection for the Palestinians. She emphasized once again the primary responsibility of the Council and, in that regard, urged the Council to consider the question of Palestine with the same sense of urgency and determination as shown in the Gulf crisis and to set up an appropriate system for effective protection of the population in the occupied territories.¹⁵⁶ She also welcomed the statement of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the five permanent members of the Security Council¹⁵⁷ and hoped it would motivate the Council.

During the course of the debate, most of the speakers emphasized the need for a just and lasting negotiated solution based on Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973) and called upon the Council to promote the convening of an international conference on the Middle East.¹⁵⁸ Many of them called upon the Council to take action to protect the Palestinians. In that regard, some supported the dispatching of a fact-finding mission made up of the members of the Council,¹⁵⁹ while others were in favour of the Secretary-General sending a mission to examine the situation in Jerusalem.¹⁶⁰ A few were in favour of the adoption by the Council of deterrent measures against Israel making implicit or explicit reference to Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁶¹

At the 2946th meeting, on 8 October 1990, the President drew the attention of the Council members to a letter of the same date from the Permanent Observer of Palestine addressed to the President of the Security Council.¹⁶² The representative stated that the members of the Israeli Army had opened fire on Palestinians who were trying to prevent the aggression by a group of Israelis against Haram al-Sharif (Al-Aqsa Mosque) in Jerusalem, and called upon the Security Council to invoke the powers invested in it by the Charter to put an end to such criminal acts by the occupying Power, Israel. The President said that, as the resumption of the consideration of the item took place against the background of a profoundly shocking outbreak of violence in Jerusalem, he had agreed to the request of the Permanent Observer of Palestine and of Israel to speak again in the debate.¹⁶³

The representative of Palestine welcomed the Secretary-General's immediate expression of his concern over the eruption of violence in Jerusalem. He transmitted to the Council a message from the Palestinians in the occupied territory that Israel, using the cover of the Gulf crisis, was, by building more settlements, beginning to implement its plan to take over Jerusalem. Regretting that the Council was ignoring the Palestinian people's plea for protection at a time when it was prepared to send troops to the Gulf region, the letter appealed for international intervention. Recalling that the United States had vetoed a draft resolution, submitted on 31 May 1990, calling for a fact-finding commission composed of the members of the Council, he stated that the Palestinian people would like to see the Council react as resolutely as in other cases with respect to the carrying out of its decisions. He called once again for the immediate dispatch by the Council of a commission to investigate the events in Jerusalem.¹⁶⁴

The representative of Israel stated that the attack perpetrated against Jewish worshippers who were converging on the Western Wall on the occasion of the holy Day of Tabernacles was premeditated. The discovery of stores of rocks and flammable material at the scene and the fact that thousands of Arabs assembled on the Temple Mount on a Monday, which was not a day of Moslem mass worship, had left no doubt about it. He reminded the Council that the session had been convened prior to this latest development, during a long period of calm in the territories. Arguing that this incident would profit only the PLO and Saddam Hussein, he warned against the exploitation of the Council as a forum for incitement.¹⁶⁵

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the Council should express its unconditional condemnation of the situation and take swift and firm measures in connection with it. Drawing the attention of the Council to the joint statement made on 28 September 1990 by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the five permanent members,¹⁶⁶ he said that his Government regarded the immediate achievement of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace as the final objective of a settlement.¹⁶⁷

The representative of China appealed to the Security Council to take immediate action to protect, in a practical manner, the life and property of the Palestinian residents in the occupied territory. He hoped that the Council's recent unanimity and effectiveness would provide new opportunities for the peace process in the Middle East. Asserting that a political settlement should provide for Israel's withdrawal from all occupied territories, mutual recognition of the State of Palestine and the State of Israel, and peaceful coexistence between the Arab and Jewish peoples, he supported the convening of an international conference.¹⁶⁸

The representative of France said that the Council could not remain passive, given the seriousness of the situation in Jerusalem. It was important that the Council had urgent access to on-the-spot information in order to enable the international community to take a position on the ways and means of ensuring effective protection for the Palestinian people. The French delegation was prepared to consider any proposal along those lines. The Council should also urge Israel to respect fully the Fourth Geneva Convention. The proposed international conference continued to be the best approach for a comprehensive settlement.¹⁶⁹

The representative of Romania shared the view that the Council should assume its responsibility in promoting and defending world peace by ensuring the implementation of pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly and the Council itself. He supported the exercise of the good offices of the Secretary-General and hoped that the Council would identify constructive consensus solutions that could receive the full cooperation of all the parties to the conflict.¹⁷⁰

The representative of Algeria, speaking on behalf of the States of the Arab Maghreb Union,¹⁷¹ said that the convening of the Council was necessary in order to show that the crisis in the Gulf could not be used as a pretext to give Israel a free hand. It was now up to the Council, in its new-found unanimity, to demonstrate that its diligence and firmness was not selective and would be evident in every situation where universally accepted principles should be defended or legitimate rights restored. Having inaugurated a new attitude by resorting for the first time to the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the Council could no longer do less for the Palestinian people. A draft resolution that would soon be presented to the Council advocated simple and non-controversial action by the United Nations to protect Palestinians. The Council's attitude towards that draft was at stake.¹⁷²

The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking also in his capacity as the Chairman of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, drew the attention of the Council to a statement adopted on 4 October 1990 by the Foreign Ministers of the Non-Aligned Countries. The statement emphasized that the prompt solution of the Gulf crisis should contribute to approaching the Arab-Israeli conflict with equal determination and urgency, and that it was the right time for the Council to take concrete and effective action to reactivate the peace process. A solution was only possible on the basis of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination, including the establishment of its own State; Israel's withdrawal from occupied territories; the right of all States in the region to live in peace and security within internationally recognized boundaries; and the Palestinian refugees' right to return. The Council should urgently proceed to prepare the convening of the international peace conference under the auspices of the United Nations, with the equal participation of all directly concerned parties, including the PLO, and the permanent members of the Council. Pending progress towards a political settlement, all necessary measures should immediately be taken to protect the Palestinian people in the occupied territories. The Council should take a resolute stand on the implementation of its resolutions and the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention.¹⁷³

At the 2947th meeting, on 9 October 1990, the representative of Kuwait, speaking on behalf of the Group of Arab States, said that the world should not stand powerless while Israel suppressed the unarmed Palestinian people and desecrated one of the holiest sites of Islam. He asked the Council to call upon Israel to desist forthwith from such practices and to provide full protection for all the Islamic Holy Places in Jerusalem, to send a fact-finding mission to the occupied Palestinian lands and report on them; and to provide international protection to the Palestinian people under occupation.¹⁷⁴

The representative of Iraq recalled that the United States and its allies, advocating international legitimacy and compliance with Security Council resolutions, had taken unprecedented measures against Iraq by enforcing sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations and mobilizing military forces in the region. He contrasted that with the case of Israel.¹⁷⁵

On the same day, the representatives of Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Yemen and Zaire submitted a draft resolution sponsored by their delegations.¹⁷⁶ Under the preambular part of the draft resolution, the Council would have reaffirmed the applicability of the Geneva Convention to the occupied Arab territories including Jerusalem. Under the operative part, the Council would have decided to establish a commission consisting of three of its members to be dispatched immediately to examine the situation in Jerusalem; requested the commission to submit its report to the Council by 20 October 1990, containing recommendations on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation; and asked the Secretary-General to provide the commission with the necessary facilities for carrying out its mission.

At the 2948th meeting, on 12 October 1990, the President drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution submitted by Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and sponsored also by Côte d'Ivoire, Finland, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Zaire.¹⁷⁷ He also drew the attention of the members to several other documents.¹⁷⁸

The representative of Palestine expressed discontent at the way the United States had acted in attempting to block a rapid agreement in the Council and in exerting pressure to prevent the adoption of the kind of resolution warranted by the situation. Palestine was dissatisfied with the inadequate draft resolution under consideration because it did not reflect the position expected from the Council in keeping with its traditions and the Charter, and because the draft would not have the necessary positive impact required by the realities. This in spite of the fact that it was expected to be adopted unanimously, which in itself was a positive phenomenon if taken separately from the draft resolution. Palestine did not expect Israel to feel bound by the draft resolution, which would inevitably lead the Council to convene a further meeting to address the problem anew.¹⁷⁹

Before putting the draft resolution to the vote, as agreed in the Council's prior informal consultations, the President stated that he had been asked to clarify the meaning of the reference in the text to "the territories occupied by Israel since 1967". He said that it was his understanding that those words included Jerusalem.¹⁸⁰ In connection with the draft resolution, he made the following statement:¹⁸¹

In the informal consultations of members of the Council which led up to the consideration of this draft resolution, the Secretary-General explained that the purpose of the mission which he would be sending to the region would be to look into the circumstances surrounding the recent tragic events in Jerusalem and other similar developments in the occupied territories, and to submit by 24 October 1990 a report containing findings and recommendations to the Council on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation. He recalled, however, that under the Fourth Geneva Convention the principal responsibility for ensuring the protection of the Palestinians rested with the occupying Power, namely Israel.

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and was adopted unanimously as resolution 672 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 476 (1980) of 30 June 1980 and 478 (1980) of 20 August 1980,

Reaffirming that a just and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict must be based on its resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973 through an active negotiating process which takes into account the right to security for all States in the region, including Israel, as well as the legitimate political rights of the Palestinian people,

1. Expresses alarm at the violence which took place on 8 October at the Haram al-Sharif and other Holy Places of Jerusalem resulting in over twenty Palestinian deaths and the injury of more than one hundred and fifty people, including Palestinian civilians and innocent worshippers;

2. Condemns especially the acts of violence committed by the Israeli security forces resulting in injuries and loss of human life;

3. Calls upon Israel, the occupying Power, to abide scrupulously by its legal obligations and responsibilities under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, which is applicable to all the territories occupied by Israel since 1967;

4. Requests, in connection with the decision of the Secretary-General to send a mission to the region, which the Council welcomes, that he submit a report to the Security Council, before the end of October 1990, containing his findings and conclusions and that he use as appropriate all of the resources of the United Nations in the region in carrying out the mission.

Following the vote, the representative of Cuba stated that he had voted in favour of the resolution for three reasons. First, to express solidarity with the PLO and the Palestinian people; second, because the Council had, after overcoming countless obstacles, been able to join its voice to the others; third, because there was really no other possibility. The Council could not fail to adopt such a text, despite the fact that it left much to be desired.¹⁸²

The representative of Malaysia stated that a number of important concessions had been made, especially by the non-aligned caucus, in order to arrive at a general agreement. However, Malaysia had supported the resolution to maintain the recent spirit of cooperation within the Council, and, above all, to enable the Council to move forward in a practical fashion in support of the effort of the Secretary-General to send a mission to the region. Malaysia's position on the resolution was that paragraph 3 included Jerusalem. It also understood that the Council would take seriously the findings and recommendations of the Secretary-General and act upon them immediately after the submission of the mission's report. The adoption of the resolution was a historic event for the Council, with the United States joining the other members of the Council for the first time to condemn in clear terms the actions of the Israeli security forces.¹⁸³

The representative of Canada, referring to the compromises made by all members, said that there were no winners or losers in the Council after its adoption of a very significant resolution. The members of the Council would be put to test again when the Secretary-General submitted his report at the end of the month.¹⁸⁴

The representative of Zaire said he expected that report to contain recommendations about the measures the Council would take to protect the Palestinian people.¹⁸⁵

The representative of Colombia qualified the unanimous adoption of the resolution as a very important step which, he hoped, would be the beginning of a new phase in which a permanent member of the Council would commit itself to changing its traditional position. He pointed out that no link should be established between the situation created by the invasion of Kuwait and that experienced by the Palestinian people, since the two had different origins and developments. Yet, both were the result of violent occupation and a refusal to comply with Security Council resolutions. Any formula that solved the Iraq-Kuwait problem should take into account the problems of the Middle East, and of Palestine in particular.¹⁸⁶

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the hope that the Council's consideration of the Secretary-General's report would enable it to adopt effective measures to protect the civilian population living in the occupied territories and to discuss ways and means to give immediate impetus to the process of a settlement in the Middle East.¹⁸⁷

The representative of the United States supported the resolution, which condemned both the provocative and reactive acts of violence, reaffirmed the obligations and responsibilities of the occupying Power under the Fourth Geneva Convention, and reaffirmed that a just and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict should be based on resolutions 242 (1967) and

338 (1973). The resolution should not be misinterpreted, however. It did not empower the Council to address any subject beyond the matters directly contained in the resolution, which neither addressed the status of the Middle East peace process nor changed the role of the United Nations in that regard.¹⁸⁸

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of the United Kingdom, expressed satisfaction at the unanimous adoption of the resolution, a factor that would compensate for whatever imperfections might be found in the text. The resolution sent two strong signals. The first was a clear condemnation of the events of 8 October. The second was the request by the members of the Council that the Secretary-General help them find ways to improve the situation of the Palestinian people. The members would certainly not find it easy to deal with the recommendations of the Secretary-General, but they had made a good start with the resolution and would take the matter up promptly once they received the report.¹⁸⁹

The representative of Israel regretted that the resolution failed to condemn the unprovoked attack on Jewish worshippers, which was the cause of the tragic event in Jerusalem. It was also regrettable that the Security Council had fallen into the trap laid by Saddam Hussein and his PLO supporters who had incited the riots in order to divert attention from Iraq's aggression in the Gulf. Asserting that such a resolution could not contribute to the efforts to restore tranquillity, normalcy and peace, he hoped that the Arab extremists would not view it as an internationally sanctioned licence to further violence.¹⁹⁰

At its 2949th meeting, held on 24 October 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories and the letter dated 26 September 1990 from the representative of Yemen to the President of the Security Council.¹⁹¹

In accordance with the decisions taken at the previous meetings on the item, the President renewed the previously issued invitations to participate. He also invited the representative of the Sudan, at his request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote.

The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia and Yemen.¹⁹² He also drew their attention to a letter dated 23 October 1990 from the sponsors of the draft resolution addressed to the President of the Council,¹⁹³ requesting the holding of a formal meeting of the Council to put the draft resolution to the vote.

The President also drew attention to several other documents,¹⁹⁴ including a letter dated 19 October 1990 addressed to the Secretary-General,¹⁹⁵ in which the observer of Palestine brought to his attention that the situation in the occupied Palestinian territory continued to deteriorate at an alarming pace. He requested immediate action by the Council, given the situation, Israel's rejection of Security Council resolution 672 (1990), and its refusal to receive the Secretary-General's mission.

In regard to the events which took place on 8 October at Haram al-Sharif, the representative of Israel told the Council that an independent commission of enquiry had been appointed to investigate the incident. Despite the fact that Israel regretted both the content and the tone of resolution 672 (1990), it had expressed its readiness to assist the Secretary-General in preparing the report requested by the Council. Yet, even according to the terms of reference of resolution 672 (1990), which referred to the Fourth Geneva Convention, Israel was the exclusive authority in the territory under its control, which included its capital, Jerusalem. The speaker contrasted the Council's condemnation of Israel with its inaction in the face of the actions by Syrian troops in Lebanon. He rejected the contention that Iraq's aggression against Kuwait was comparable to the Arab-Israeli war of June 1967. Iraq had committed an unprovoked act of aggression expressly prohibited under Article 2 (4) of the Charter, while Israel had resorted to the use of force in lawful exercise of its inherent right to self-defence under Article 51. Iraq had invaded the territory of a recognized sovereign State, while Israel administered the territories of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district, which were under no defined sovereignty. Security Council resolution 660 (1990), determining clearly and unequivocally that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait constituted a breach of international peace and security, applied Chapter VII of the Charter. By contrast, resolution 242 (1967) did not condemn Israel's use of force, but rather affirmed the right of every State in the area to "live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries". The resolution called for withdrawal from "territories", not from "the territories". Resolution 660 (1990), on the other hand, demanded that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally from all the territory of Kuwait. While Israel had accepted resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), Iraq rejected every Security Council resolution relating to it. Moreover, resolution 242 (1967) set forth the guiding principles for all sides to follow. Israel was under no obligation to do anything unilaterally prior to the completion of negotiations.¹⁹⁶

The representative of Palestine noted the slow pace of the Council in dealing with the rejection by the Government of Israel of Council resolution 672 (1990) and its refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General. He drew certain conclusions from the situation. First, Israel was in flagrant violation of the Charter of the United Nations. The speaker hoped that the draft resolution would send a clear signal of the Council's intent. Second, the Council should not shirk its responsibilities by laying them at the door of any other party, even the Secretary-General. Third, when the Council considered the report containing the Secretary-General's recommendations and conclusions on the protection of the Palestinian people, it would have to adopt concrete measures. Tangible, physical measures, such as deploying a peace force in the occupied territories to observe the situation and report to the Council and the Secretary-General, were needed.¹⁹⁷

¹⁹⁷ Ibid., pp. 26-35.

The representative of the Sudan stated that certain principles of justice and norms of international law should be kept in mind when dealing with the Israeli-Arab conflict. First, the city of Jerusalem was an integral part of the occupied Palestinian territories and the capital of the State of Palestine. Resolutions 476 (1980) and 478 (1980) had declared null and void the "basic law" of Israel designating Jerusalem as its capital. Second, the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to the occupied Arab territories. Third, the United Nations, represented by the Security Council, should support the Palestinian people in regaining its inalienable national rights, including the right to return, to self-determination, and to an independent State on its land under the leadership of PLO. Fourth, the Middle East would never know peace until Israel withdrew from all occupied territories and a comprehensive solution to the question of Palestine was reached through the convening of an international peace conference. Fifth, the Council should discharge its responsibilities in order to strengthen the principles of the United Nations and reinforce its credibility. In the light of Israel's defiance of resolution 672 (1990) and refusal to accept the Secretary-General's mission, he called upon the Council to impose sanctions on Israel under Chapter VII of the Charter.¹⁹⁸

The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic, responding to the representative of Israel, characterized the Israeli representative's accusations against the Syrian Arab Republic as paradoxical, and maintained that his country was doing its best to restore Lebanese legitimacy. Israel should immediately and unconditionally withdraw from southern Lebanon in accordance with United Nations resolutions, so that Lebanon could regain its sovereignty.¹⁹⁹

Speaking before the vote, the representative of Yemen said that Israel rejected Security Council resolution 672 (1990) despite the fact that the resolution, to a certain degree, took account of Israel's sensitivities and did not call for the establishment of a Security Council mission. In the resolution, the Council did not even make a direct request to the Secretary-General to send a mission, because Israel refused to have anything to do with Security Council resolutions. Instead, the Council discreetly welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to send a mission and called upon him to submit a report.²⁰⁰

Quoting Article 24 (1) of the Charter of the United Nations, the representative of Zaire stated that the logical consequence of the responsibility that the Member States had conferred upon the Council under that Article could be seen in Article 25 of the Charter, which committed all Members of the United Nations to accept and carry out the decisions of the Council in accordance with the Charter. In this regard he deplored Israel's refusal to accept the Secretary-General's mission and called it an obstruction to the Council's due exercise of its functions of maintaining peace and security. Faced here with a question of principle in terms of the spirit and the provisions of the Charter, his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution and appealed to Israel not to continue to flout the most elementary rights of the Palestinian people and to accept the United Nations mission.²⁰¹

The representative of Malaysia said that the draft resolution on which the Council was about to vote would not be necessary but for Israel's rejection of resolution 672 (1990) and its refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General. The draft resolution underlined firmly the Council's insistence that all aspects of resolution 672 (1990) be fully complied with, and that Israel had to permit the mission of the Secretary-General to proceed. It was unacceptable that the unanimity of the Council should be made an issue, to the extent that it became an obstacle to correct action. Malaysia was convinced that the Council's position regarding Palestine and the occupied territories enjoyed the full support of the overwhelming majority of the States Members of the United Nations. The responsibility to address the problem of the safety and protection of the Palestinians lay entirely with the Council.²⁰²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 673 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming the obligations of Member States under the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming also its resolution 672 (1990) of 12 October 1990,

Having been briefed by the Secretary-General on 19 October 1990,

Expressing alarm at the rejection of resolution 672 (1990) by the Israeli Government, and its refusal to accept the mission of the Secretary-General,

Taking into consideration the statement of the Secretary-General relative to the purpose of the mission he is sending to the region and conveyed to the Council by the President on 12 October 1990,

Gravely concerned at the continued deterioration of the situation in the occupied territories,

1. Deplores the refusal of the Israeli Government to receive the mission of the Secretary-General to the region;
2. Urges the Israeli Government to reconsider its decision and insists that it comply fully with resolution 672 (1990) and permit the mission to proceed in keeping with its purpose;
3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Security Council the report requested in resolution 672 (1990);
4. Affirms its determination to give full and expeditious consideration to the report.

Decisions of 20 December 1990 (2970th meeting): statement by the President and resolution 681 (1990)

On 1 November 1990, pursuant to paragraph 4 of resolution 672 (1990), the Secretary-General submitted to the Security Council a report,²⁰³ containing his findings about the events which took place in Jerusalem on 8 October 1990 and conclusions on the question of the protection of civilians in the occupied territories. The Secretary-General informed the Council that, owing to Israel's refusal to receive the mission, he had been unable to secure independent information, on the spot, about the circumstances surrounding the recent events in Jerusalem and similar developments in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. However, widespread coverage had been given by the international press, a number of inquiries conducted and a number of Israeli and Palestinian individuals and groups had expressed willingness to provide information to the Secretary-General's mission, had it been sent to the area. While there were conflicting opinions as to what had provoked the clashes, observers on the spot had stated that live ammunition was used against Palestinian civilians. On the issue of the protection of the Palestinian civilian population in the occupied territories, the message that was repeatedly conveyed to the Secretary-General by the Palestinians was that far more was required on the part of the international community. The overall feeling among the Palestinians was that only an impartial presence mandated by the United Nations would be able to protect them. In this regard attention had been drawn to the military observers stationed in Jerusalem, the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO). The Secretary-General recalled that he had sent a Personal Representative during June 1990 to the area to look into the question of protection in the occupied territories and to report back to him personally. On 13 July, in a statement to the Council, he had said that he intended to pursue his initiative with the Israeli authorities to persuade them to comply fully with their obligations under the Fourth Geneva Convention. The Israeli authorities had indicated at that time that they would be implementing new measures in the territories. Unfortunately he had not been able to follow up on the discussions. In his concluding observations, the Secretary-General pointed out that the cooperation of Israel was essential to the implementation of any measures of protection. He nevertheless suggested that the Council call for a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention to discuss possible measures under the Convention. With regard to the Palestinian appeals for a United Nations presence, he stressed that he did not have the competence to act on his own. This was a matter on which the Council would have to decide.

At its 2953rd meeting, on 7 November 1990, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The Council considered the item at its 2953rd, 2954th, 2957th, 2965th to 2968th and 2970th meetings.

At the 2953rd meeting, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to three letters addressed to the Secretary-General: letters dated 2 and 5 November 1990 from the observer of Palestine²⁰⁴ and a letter dated 30 October 1990 from the representative of Italy.²⁰⁵

The representative of Palestine, recalling that his delegation had previously objected to the Security Council's shifting the burden of its responsibilities on to the shoulders of others, stated that it was inevitable that the Secretary-General would transfer the responsibility back to the Council without any direct recommendations. It was now up to the Council to make a full decision by choosing from the options available. The speaker derived four major conclusions from the Secretary-General's report. The first point was Israel's handling of Council resolutions 672 (1990) and 673 (1990) which was in blatant violation of the Charter of the United Nations, in particular Article 25, and of the requirements for membership in the Organization. He believed that the Council should take real action by using the enforcement measures under the Charter to oblige Israel to implement those resolutions. The second point concerned the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories and the suffering of the Palestinian people under Israeli occupation. The description in the report of the Israeli practices clearly demonstrated the need for the Council to act immediately to protect the Palestinian people. The third point concerned the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories. On the one hand Israel rejected the de jure applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied territories, but on the other hand it presented itself as the Power responsible for the maintenance of law and order under the same Convention. The speaker called for the Council to instruct Israel to accept the de jure applicability of the Convention and supported the designation of an alternative protecting Power and the holding of a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Geneva Convention. The fourth point concerned the concrete and practical measures the Council should adopt to protect the Palestinian civilians. The speaker believed that the Council should deploy a United Nations observer force in the occupied Palestinian territory in order to secure the protection of civilians. But what the Palestinian delegation really wanted was for the Council to deploy an armed international emergency force to replace the Israeli forces in the occupied territories. Such action would permit the United Nations to supervise the transition period until a final settlement was reached, enabling the Palestinian people to exercise its right to self-determination and sovereignty. The fundamental task before the Council was to achieve a political settlement to the Middle East conflict by convening an international peace conference, under the auspices of the United Nations with the equal participation of the PLO. The Security Council, particularly its permanent members, should undertake the necessary preparations. The Palestinian delegation was ready to cooperate fully to reach an agreement.²⁰⁶

The representative of Lebanon, speaking on behalf of the Arab Group, contrasted the immediate levying of sanctions against Iraq under Chapter VII of the Charter with the continuing impunity of Israel, despite the existence of over 100 resolutions and condemnations against it. Referring to the Secretary-General's report he welcomed his suggestion that the Council invoke the Fourth Geneva Convention against a State Member of the United Nations by calling a meeting of the Convention's signatories for the first time since the Convention came into force. He pointed out that the Secretary-General had made it clear that the Council had the authority to establish a protecting Power for the Palestinians. The Secretary-General's assessment was that only an impartial presence properly mandated by the United Nations could provide a credible sense of protection. He added that the Council was urged to consider the possibility of expanding the mandate of UNTSO, stationed in Jerusalem, or dispatching a new United Nations observer force to the occupied territories.²⁰⁷

The representative of Israel accused the Arab States of having continuously breached the Charter of the United Nations and the basic principles of international law vis-à-vis his country. More specifically he accused the Syrian Arab Republic, Lebanon, Jordan, Iraq and Saudi Arabia, among others, of breaching Article 2 (3 and 4) of the Charter. Turning to the report of the Secretary-General, he had to view with deep regret the suggestions made therein. He claimed that the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention regarding its application vis-à-vis a High Contracting Party dealt with the seizure by one Power of territory under the sovereignty of another Power. This could not be said to apply to the territories of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district since they had been illegally occupied by Jordan. Therefore the attempt to impose the de jure application of the Convention was aimed at prejudicing unilaterally the political status of the territories in question. Israel could not accept the unprecedented idea of calling for a meeting of the High Contracting Parties. It had the sole responsibility for the administration of the territories and it would not accommodate demands for deploying a United Nations observer force, expanding the mandates of the United Nations personnel, and all other attempts to infringe on its sovereignty and authority. Stating that in the case of the incident on the Temple Mount the Council had rushed to judgement without taking into account facts such as incitements by the muezzins through loudspeakers to attack Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall, the speaker informed the Council that the independent commission of inquiry appointed by his authorities had completed its investigations and that its conclusions were conveyed to the Secretary-General.²⁰⁸

The representative of Palestine rejected the allegation that appeals had been made by the muezzins to incite Palestinians to violence. He called upon the President to arrange for the showing of a videotape so that the Council would learn the real nature of those appeals.²⁰⁹

During the course of the debate, most of the speakers endorsed the Secretary-General's proposals contained in his report to call a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention and for a United Nations presence in the occupied territories to ensure effective protection for Palestinians, in ways ranging from establishing a monitoring mechanism to deploying international military observers, including the possibility of expanding the mandate of UNTSO in Jerusalem.²¹⁰ One speaker stated that Israel's withdrawal from the occupied territories should be brought about even through resort to Chapter VII of the Charter.²¹¹ Another called upon Israel to fulfil its obligations in accordance with Article 25 of the Charter.²¹²

At the 2954th meeting, on 9 November 1990, the representative of Yugoslavia, speaking also on behalf of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, stated that there was an urgent need to take specific action to ensure the safety and protection of Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation. The non-aligned countries expected the Council to take action in that regard. In their opinion a United Nations presence in the occupied territories would be the most effective to provide such protection and would be conducive to a lasting solution in the longer run.²¹³

The representative of Palestine said that the videotape he was about to show to the Council proved three things. First, the repression of Palestinians had no relation to the Israelis' claims that the lives of the praying Jewish faithful had been threatened. Second, the degree of brutality of the occupation forces could not be construed as mere self-defence or an attempt to control the situation. Third, what the muezzins and clerics had said through the loudspeakers were the exact opposite of what the Israeli representative had claimed.²¹⁴

Upon the request of the representative of Palestine, a videotape was displayed in the Council Chamber.²¹⁵

At the 2965th meeting, on 5 December 1990, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to the occupied territories and that Israel should abide by its obligations under it, as had been reiterated in the declaration on the Middle East adopted by the European Council on 27 and 28 October 1990. Emphasizing the need to protect the Palestinian civilians, he said that the suggestion in the Secretary-General's report for a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Convention merited careful study. He felt that the prospect of such a meeting would send a strong signal to Israel. The Palestinian appeals for an impartial presence properly mandated by the United Nations needed to be given greater clarity before any decision could be taken. The speaker believed that whatever the steps the Council would take, they should be realistic. However, these measures could only be a temporary palliative. The Security Council must never lose sight of the need to find a solution to the Arab-Israeli problem as a whole. His Government reiterated its support for the principle of convening, at an appropriate time, an international peace conference.²¹⁶

The representative of Palestine called upon the Council to establish a permanent presence of the United Nations and its personnel in the occupied Palestinian territories to monitor the situation and submit periodic reports to the Council. That was the bare minimum the Council should undertake to provide international protection to the people of Palestine, so that they were not left with the only option available, namely the legitimate response of self-defence with all the means approved by international norms and instruments.²¹⁷

At the 2966th meeting, on 8 December 1990, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics officially requested that the meeting be adjourned, in the interest of the Security Council reaching a decision. Following a procedural discussion, the proposal was put to vote and adopted by 9 votes in favour to 4 against (Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia, Yemen), with 2 abstentions (China, France).

The President, speaking in his capacity as the representative of Yemen, recalled that the first version of the draft resolution had been put before the Council on 8 November 1990²¹⁸ and the first amended version on 26 November 1990.²¹⁹ The Council now had before it the second amended version.²²⁰ The great difference between the first and the final version was a result of the spirit of cooperation and concession the sponsors of the draft resolution had displayed. He said that his delegation had insisted on mentioning Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973), the occupation, and the entire crisis in all its aspects because the Council could not limit its consideration to the protection and safety of the Palestinians. He also stressed that he had no wish to link the crisis in the Gulf to the one in the Middle East. He called upon the big Powers, especially the United States and the Soviet Union, to work towards a solution.²²¹ After resuming his functions as President, and following three statements by representatives, of a largely procedural nature, the President adjourned the meeting.

At the 2967th meeting, on 10 December 1990, the President proposed suspending the meeting in order to continue the informal consultations. The proposal was agreed to by consensus.

Upon the resumption of the meeting, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics requested that the meeting be adjourned. The representative of Malaysia opposed the motion on the grounds that the new text submitted to the Council was a package agreement that went even further than the second revision, which, in the sponsors' opinion, could well have found agreement. The representative of the United States supported the motion on the grounds that further progress could be made in the Council's deliberations. The representative of the United Kingdom also supported the proposal. The proposal was put to the vote and adopted by 9 votes in favour to 4 against (Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia, Yemen), with 2 abstentions (China, France). The meeting was adjourned.

At the 2968th meeting, on 12 December 1990, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics requested the adjournment of the meeting. Without debate, the request was put to the vote and adopted by 9 votes in favour to 4 against (Colombia, Cuba, Malaysia, Yemen), with 2 abstentions (China, France). The meeting was adjourned.

At the 2970th meeting, on 19 December 1990, the representative of Finland, in response to a request made by the representative of the United Kingdom, reported, in accordance with the agreement reached in informal consultations, that his delegation had tried to work towards a text that could be adopted unanimously by the Council. His delegation had been working on an arrangement that would include the adoption of both a resolution and a presidential statement. In that connection, it had circulated to the members of the Council a working paper, the contents of which were almost agreed, despite some remaining problems. One of the difficulties related to what wording should be used to describe the reference to the presidential statement in a preambular paragraph of the draft resolution. Other difficulties related to the last two paragraphs of the draft presidential statement and concerned the reference to an international conference and whether the word "parties" to such a conference should be used, as well as the inclusion or exclusion of a paragraph emphasizing that the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Iraq-Kuwait situation should be addressed independently.²²²

The representative of the United Kingdom proposed that the meeting be suspended and that the Council immediately consider the report of the representative of Finland in informal consultations of the whole, without further delay. Following a procedural discussion, the request was put to the vote and adopted by 9 votes in favour to 6 against (China, Colombia, Cuba, France, Malaysia, Yemen). The meeting was suspended to a later date to be decided by the President.

At the resumed 2970th meeting, on 20 December 1990, the President drew the attention of the members to a draft resolution prepared in the course of the Council's consultations.²²³ He also drew attention to several other documents.²²⁴

The President then made the following statement on behalf of the members of the Security Council:²²⁵

The members of the Council reaffirm their determination to support an active negotiation process in which all relevant parties would participate leading to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace to the Arab-Israeli conflict through negotiations which should be based on Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973 and should take into account the right to security of all States in the region, including Israel, and the legitimate political rights of the Palestinian people.

In this context they agree that an international conference, at an appropriate time, properly structured, should facilitate efforts to achieve a negotiated settlement and lasting peace in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

However, they are of the view that there is not unanimity as to when would be the appropriate time for such a conference.

In the view of the members of the Council, the question of the Arab-Israeli conflict is important and unique and must be addressed independently, on its own merits.

Speaking before the vote on the draft resolution, the representative of Ethiopia said that he would vote in favour of the draft resolution because he believed that its adoption would contribute to the ultimate solution of the problem.²²⁶

The representative of France expressed regret at the persistent refusal of the Israeli authorities to receive the Secretary-General's mission. The draft resolution contained very reasonable provisions such as the reaffirmation of the de jure applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to all territories, including Jerusalem, the convening of a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Convention and the request to the Secretary-General to monitor the situation with the help of United Nations personnel and report to the Council. The speaker also welcomed the Council's recognition in the presidential statement of the need for an international conference to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict.²²⁷

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 681 (1990), which reads:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming the obligations of Member States under the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming also the principle of the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war, set forth in resolution 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967,

Having received the report of the Secretary-General submitted in accordance with resolution 672 (1990) of 12 October 1990 on ways and means of ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, and taking note in particular of paragraphs 20 to 26 thereof,

Taking note of the interest of the Secretary-General to visit and to send his envoy to pursue his initiative with the Israeli authorities, as indicated in paragraph 22 of his report, and of their recent invitation extended to him,

Gravely concerned at the dangerous deterioration of the situation in all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and at the violence and rising tension in Israel,

Taking into consideration the statement made by the President of the Security Council on 20 December 1990 concerning the method and approach for a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Arab-Israeli conflict,

Recalling its resolutions 607 (1988) of 5 January 1988, 608 (1988) of 14 January 1988, 636 (1989) of 6 July 1989 and 641 (1989) of 30 August 1989, and alarmed by the decision of the Government of Israel to deport four Palestinians from the occupied territories in contravention of its obligations under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his report;

2. Expresses its grave concern over the rejection by Israel of its resolutions 672 (1990) of 12 October 1990 and 673 (1990) of 24 October 1990;

3. Deplores the decision by the Government of Israel, the occupying Power, to resume the deportation of Palestinian civilians in the occupied territories;

4. Urges the Government of Israel to accept the de jure applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to all the territories occupied by Israel since 1967 and to abide scrupulously by the provisions of the Convention;

5. Calls upon the High Contracting Parties to the said Convention to ensure respect by Israel, the occupying Power, for its obligations under the Convention in accordance with article 1 thereof;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the International Committee of the Red Cross, to develop further the idea, expressed in his report, of convening a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the said Convention and to discuss possible measures that might be taken by them under the Convention and, for this purpose, to invite the Parties to submit their views on how the idea could contribute to the goals of the Convention, as well as on other relevant matters, and to report thereon to the Council;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to monitor and observe the situation regarding Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, making new efforts in this regard on an urgent basis, and to utilize and designate or draw upon the United Nations and other personnel and resources present there, in the area and elsewhere, needed to accomplish this task and to keep the Security Council regularly informed;

8. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit a first progress report to the Security Council by the first week of March 1991 and to report every four months thereafter, and decides to remain seized of the matter as necessary.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of Zaire said he considered the essence of resolution 681 (1990) to be its request to the Secretary-General to continue examining the situation in the occupied Palestinian territories and to report to the Council on any human rights violations by the security forces. He supported the convening of a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention and the convening of an international peace conference.²²⁸

²²⁶ S/PV.2970 (Part II), pp. 4-7.

The representative of Finland supported a meeting of the High Contracting Parties which could produce an authoritative interpretation regarding the scope and applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention.²²⁹

The representative of Malaysia noted what he saw as three important elements in the resolution. The first was the convening of a meeting of High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention. The second was the request that the Secretary-General monitor and observe the situation in the occupied territories. In his view, that was the core of the resolution and should serve as the centrepiece of all future efforts by the Council to protect Palestinians. The third was the Council's acceptance of the convening at an appropriate time of the international peace conference on the Middle East, which was by necessity in the form of a presidential statement. This was a major event. For the first time what had been urged by the General Assembly year after year had been accepted by all members of the Council. The resolution also restored the proper reference to Jerusalem as part of the occupied Palestinian territories. Future action by the Council should be free of the tendencies to set barriers, including procedural devices, deliberately used to delay the proper and early consideration of the issue.²³⁰

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that his Government had pursued three objectives in the negotiations. First, to endorse proposals which might improve the well-being of the Palestinians. Second, to address the wider issue of the Arab-Israeli peace process. The British Government accordingly supported the convening of an international conference at an appropriate time. Third, to ensure that any reference to the conference did not lend itself to an interpretation that a link was made between the question of Palestine and the crisis in the Gulf. The British Government, in line with the Council's stand in the presidential statement, firmly rejected the linkage that the Government of Iraq was promoting.²³¹

²³⁰ Ibid., pp. 16-19.

²³¹ Ibid., p. 26.

The representative of the United States stated that his Government supported the resolution, but believed that there were other elements that should have been included in the text, such as a reference to the use of violence by the Palestinians. The United States vote for the resolution in no way indicated a change in its policy on any issue related to the Arab-Israeli conflict. First, the United States did not support a resolution that would seek to convene an international conference. Although a properly structured conference might be useful, the timing was not appropriate, because the Gulf crisis and the Arab-Israeli dispute should not be linked. Secondly, the United States maintained that the Fourth Geneva Convention applied to all occupied territories and regarded the phrase "Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967" as being merely demographically and geographically descriptive, not indicative of sovereignty. Finally, it deplored the decision of the Government of Israel to resume deportations. Clarifying his Government's views on several elements of the resolution, the speaker said that a premature decision to convene a meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Geneva Convention could undermine the safety and protection of the Palestinians and have adverse impacts on the future implementation of the Convention. Furthermore, the United States, while strongly supporting the efforts of the Secretary-General to monitor and report on the situation, believed that no activity should be undertaken that would alter the separate and well-defined mandates of the various United Nations organizations in the region and elsewhere.²³²

The representative of Yemen stated that his delegation would have liked a much stronger resolution with regard to three points: Israel's resumption of deportations, the protection of the Palestinians, and the international conference on the Middle East.²³³

The representative of Israel stated that the Council's call upon the States parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention to ensure that Israel respect the Convention, and the request that the Secretary-General develop the idea of convening a meeting of the High Contracting Parties were unprecedented. As for the Council's request to the Secretary-General to make renewed efforts to monitor and observe, the speaker recalled that the tasks and powers of the United Nations personnel in the area had been agreed upon with Israel. Therefore altering such an agreement would be highly inappropriate and impractical. He also described the reference in the presidential statement to an international peace conference as a tool to impose a predetermined outcome, and suggested instead the holding of bilateral and direct negotiations between Israel and its neighbours. Regarding the Council's expression of alarm at Israel's exercise of its legal right to issue expulsion orders against four leaders of Hamas, he found it regrettable that the Council was not alarmed by, and did not even mention, the murders Hamas had committed against Jews. He contended that the practice of singling out one country undermined the inviolable principles of universality and sovereign equality, and that peace and security would never be achieved by discriminating against the Jewish State.²³⁴

The representative of Palestine noted the substantial progress the Council had made towards protecting the Palestinian people by unanimously adopting a resolution and authorizing a presidential statement. The Palestinian delegation did differ with certain parts of the resolution and the presidential statement but the political realities of the international situation, as well as the balance within the Council, required constant compromise. Regretting that the Council had not adopted a resolution at an earlier stage, the speaker hoped that a permanent member, which in the past had used its veto repeatedly in relation to the Middle East, would not prevent the adoption of any resolution in the future.²³⁵

Decision of 4 January 1991 (2973rd meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2973rd meeting, held on 4 January 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Belgium, France, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37

²³⁴ Ibid., pp. 58-62.

or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²³⁶

The President (Zaire) drew the attention of members of the Council to a letter dated 31 December 1990 from the observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General,²³⁷ in which he called upon the international community to act immediately to protect the Palestinian people and to implement relevant Security Council resolutions, the most recent of which was resolution 681 (1990). The President also drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 31 December 1990 from the Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People²³⁸ addressed to the Secretary-General.

The President stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²³⁹

The members of the Security Council are deeply concerned about recent acts of violence in Gaza, especially actions by Israeli security forces against Palestinians, which led to scores of casualties among those civilians.

The members of the Council deplore those actions, particularly the shooting of civilians. They reaffirm the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and request that Israel, the occupying Power, fully comply with the provisions of the Convention.

The members of the Council reaffirm their positions, most recently expressed in Council resolution 681 (1990) of 20 December 1990, and support the work of the Secretary-General in implementing that resolution. The members of the Council further urge intensified efforts by all who can contribute to reducing conflict and tension in order to achieve peace in the area.

Decision of 27 March 1991 (2980th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 2980th meeting, held on 27 March 1991 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Belgium, France, United Kingdom), to invite the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²⁴⁰

The President (Austria) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a letter dated 25 March 1991 from the observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General,²⁴¹ in which he stated that, on 24 March 1990, Israel had decided to expel four Palestinians from the occupied Palestinian territory, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and Security Council resolutions. He urged that the Council take immediate action. The President also drew the attention of the Council members to a letter dated 26 March 1991 from the Acting Chairman of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁴²

The President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁴³

The members of the Security Council are gravely concerned by the continued deterioration of the situation in the Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and especially by the current serious situation resulting from the imposition of curfews by Israel.

The members of the Security Council deplore the decision of 24 March 1991 by the Government of Israel to expel four Palestinian civilians in violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, which is applicable to the above-mentioned territories, and in contravention of relevant resolutions of the Security Council.

The members of the Security Council also call upon Israel to desist from deporting Palestinians and to ensure the safe return of those deported.

Recalling Security Council resolution 681 (1990) and other Security Council resolutions, the members of the Security Council will keep the situation described in the first paragraph under review.

Decision of 24 May 1991 (2989th meeting):

By a letter dated 22 May 1991 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁴⁴ the representatives of Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Ecuador, India, Yemen, Zaire and Zimbabwe requested the urgent convening of a meeting of the Council to examine the situation created by Israel's recent deportation of four Palestinians from the occupied territories.

At its 2989th meeting, on 24 May 1991, the Council included the letter in its agenda, and invited the representatives of Algeria, Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Malaysia and the United Arab Emirates, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 3 abstentions (Belgium, France, United Kingdom), to invite the observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²⁴⁵ The Council considered the item at its 2989th meeting.

The President (China) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.²⁴⁶ He also drew their attention to several other documents.²⁴⁷

The representative of Palestine stated that the Council was meeting to consider the situation following Israel's deportation of four Palestinians from Gaza on 18 May 1991, in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and repeated Security Council resolutions and several presidential statements. The deportations went hand in hand with an escalation in the building of new settlements and the expansion of the older ones, increasing the need for international protection of Palestinians, until the Israeli occupation was brought to an end. The speaker contended that

Israel would not have been able to act as it had, had it not been backed by some States that had great weight in the Council. The State that had endorsed “peace for land” as one of the basic requirements for a peaceful solution and had declared settlements to be the main obstacle towards its achievement should compel Israel to withdraw from the occupied territories. Recalling that all members of the Council had agreed in a presidential statement to the idea of an international conference, the speaker stated that the appropriate time for holding it had arrived and that preparations to that end should begin. Concluding, he rejected the idea of any conference not based on international legitimacy and not held under United Nations auspices.²⁴⁸

The representative of Israel asserted that the four men expelled by Israel were convicted criminals who had continued terrorist activities under orders from abroad, despite their conditional release from prison in 1985. Following appeal, the Supreme Court had decided to uphold the expulsion orders. The speaker stressed that Israel did not have a general policy of expulsions, but resorted to the removal of instigators of violence as a measure of last resort in line with its international responsibility to preserve public safety in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district. He maintained that the people of Israel yearned for peace, which could be achieved not by convening the Council to win points against Israel but only through face-to-face negotiations.²⁴⁹

The representative of Lebanon reminded the Council that Israel had thrown Palestinians into his country. He reiterated his Government’s objection to Israel’s violation of Lebanese sovereignty and territory by its practices, which ran counter to the Charter and the relevant Security Council resolutions, and his condemnation of the expulsion and deportation of the four Palestinians in contravention of article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. He urged the Council to take on the task of repatriating the four Palestinians.²⁵⁰

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 694 (1991), which reads:

²⁴⁸ S/PV.2989, pp. 9-17.

²⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 21-26.

²⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 27-31.

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolution 681 (1990) of 20 December 1990,

Having learned with deep concern and consternation that Israel has, in violation of its obligations under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and acting in opposition to relevant Security Council resolutions, and to the detriment of efforts to achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East, deported four Palestinian civilians on 18 May 1991,

1. Declares that the action of the Israeli authorities of deporting four Palestinians on 18 May is in violation of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, which is applicable to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem;

2. Deplores this action and reiterates that Israel, the occupying Power, must refrain from deporting any Palestinian civilian from the occupied territories and ensure the safe and immediate return of all those deported;

3. Decides to keep the situation under review.

Following the vote, the representative of the United States restated the consistent opposition of his Government to Israel’s policy of deporting Palestinians and called once again on Israel to cease deportations. He noted that intensive efforts were under way to bring about negotiations to reach a comprehensive settlement based on Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). He informed the Council that the parties in the region agreed to hold two parallel tracks of direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab States, and Israel and the Palestinians.²⁵¹

The representative of France said that the deportation of four Palestinians was doubly regrettable both for its illegality and for its occurrence at a moment when efforts were under way to strike up a dialogue for holding a peace conference. Emphasizing the importance of Security Council resolution 681 (1990), he felt particularly strongly that this text should be implemented and expressed full support for the Secretary-General’s efforts towards that end.²⁵²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated, as the preamble to the resolution made it clear, that the action of deporting Palestinians was even more reprehensible because it occurred at a time when a ²⁵¹ Ibid., pp. 51-52.

²⁵² Ibid., pp. 61-62.

major effort was being made to set up a peace process. The Government of the United Kingdom strongly supported the efforts being made by the Secretary of State of the United States to bring the parties to the negotiating table, and appealed to all concerned to work to get the peace process under way.²⁵³

Decision of 6 January 1992 (3026th meeting):

In accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council held its 3026th meeting on 6 January 1992. Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council invited the representatives of Egypt, Israel and the Syrian Arab Republic, at their request, to participate in the discussion without the right to vote. The Council also decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate not under rule 37 or 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²⁵⁴

The President drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the Council's consultations.²⁵⁵ He also drew to the attention of the members of the Council several other documents.²⁵⁶

The representative of Palestine stated that, on 2 January 1992, the Israeli Minister of Defence had issued an order for the deportation of 12 Palestinian citizens, which had been reaffirmed by the Government of Israel despite all international reactions, including those of the permanent members of the Security Council. He noted that Israel had been carrying out the aforementioned activities during the ongoing peace process, to which all Arab parties concerned had committed themselves. As a matter of fact Israel had intensified military aggression against southern Lebanon, reaffirmed its rejection of the principle of land for peace, and refused to arrive at the first round of the Washington talks at the appointed time. Maintaining that Israel was systematically derailing the peace process, he appealed to the international community and, in particular, to the sponsors of the peace conference, to face the true Israeli position. The Council was responsible for resuscitating the peace process. The latest Israeli decision had compelled the members of the Palestinian delegation to the peace conference to suspend their journey to Washington while they awaited the decision of the leadership of the PLO in this regard. The taking of an appropriate action by the Council would undoubtedly reflect positively on the course of events.²⁵⁷

The representative of Israel asserted that the Palestinians who were to be expelled were active members of terrorist organizations and that their expulsion would help create the security and calm essential for serious peace talks. Maintaining that Israelis were being systematically attacked before each stage of the negotiations, the speaker said that his Government could not allow what might become an extended peace process to be used as a smokescreen for terrorism. Pending the achievement of a political solution to the problem as a whole, Israel was responsible for the administration of the territories. Whereas terrorist attack would be countered by military measures, political problems would be solved in the peace negotiations around the negotiating table. He said that a one-sided and unbalanced view of the situation by the organs of the United Nations, which was reflected in the draft resolution before the Council, would not contribute to the peace process, and could not but encourage more terrorist activities.²⁵⁸

The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic called Israel's decision to deport 12 Palestinian citizens a provocative action that could jeopardize the ongoing peace process and subject the Palestinian civilians to grave dangers and suffering. He considered Israel's occupation a continued act of aggression in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, aimed at expelling the Arab inhabitants and replacing them with settlers. Maintaining that it was the responsibility of the Security Council, which had adopted numerous resolutions regarding deportations, to put an end to Israel's practices, the speaker said that the application of Chapter VII of the Charter would be the best solution. Until it was applied, the explosive situation could only lead to further threats to international peace and security.²⁵⁹

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 726 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the obligations of Member States under the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its resolutions 607 (1988) of 5 January 1988, 608 (1988) of 14 January 1988, 636 (1989) of 6 July 1989, 641 (1989) of 30 August 1989, and 694 (1991) of 24 May 1991,

Having been apprised of the decision of Israel, the occupying Power, to deport twelve Palestinian civilians from the occupied Palestinian territories,

1. Strongly condemns the decision of Israel, the occupying Power, to resume deportations of Palestinian civilians;

2. Reaffirms the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem;

3. Requests Israel, the occupying Power, to refrain from deporting any Palestinian civilian from the occupied territories;

4. Also requests Israel, the occupying Power, to ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied territories of all those deported;

5. Decides to keep the matter under review.

Following the vote, the representative of the United States stated that the deportation of individuals was a violation of article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention as it pertained to the treatment of inhabitants of the occupied territories. Any persons charged with wrongdoing should be given a fair trial based on evidence and, if found guilty, be imprisoned. Condemning the increasing attacks on Israelis and Palestinians, the speaker reminded the Council that bilateral talks were scheduled to resume the following week, and appealed to the parties to avoid unilateral actions.²⁶⁰

The representative of the Russian Federation stated that, as one of the sponsors of the Middle East peace process, his country would continue to promote negotiations between Israel and the Arabs, to cooperate closely with the United States and the parties directly involved in the conflict, as well as all States which had an interest in achieving an early settlement. The Russian leadership approached the Palestinian problem with an equal degree of attention as that of the former leaders of the Soviet Union and held the view that the bilateral negotiations which had taken place in December in Washington were one more step towards a radical improvement of the situation. What was therefore required of all participants in the peace process was a maximum of restraint and a constructive spirit to maintain the favourable climate surrounding the negotiations and to prevent unnecessary difficulties. Taking into consideration the urgency of preventing the deportation of more Palestinians and the negative consequences such deportation might have for the negotiations, the resolution was a balanced text that would promote the creation of a favourable climate.²⁶¹

Decision of 4 April 1992 (3065th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3065th meeting, held on 4 April 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council resumed its consideration of the situation in the occupied Arab territories.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at his request, to participate in the discussion, not under rule 37 or rule 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²⁶²

The President (Zimbabwe) drew the attention of the members of the Council to letters dated 16 March 1992, 20 March 1992 and 1 April 1992 from the observer of Palestine addressed to the Secretary-General.²⁶³

The President stated that, following consultations among members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:²⁶⁴

The members of the Council are gravely concerned by the continued deterioration of the situation in the Gaza Strip, especially by the current serious situation in Rafah in which several Palestinians have been killed and many more injured.

The members of the Council condemn all these acts of violence at Rafah. They urge maximum restraint in order to bring the violence to an end.

The members of the Council urge Israel to abide at all times by its obligations under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, and to respect and to act in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the Security Council. The members of the Council are concerned that any escalation of violence would have serious implications for the peace process, especially at a time when negotiations to achieve a comprehensive, just and lasting peace are under way.

The members of the Council request the Secretary-General to use his good offices, in accordance with resolution 681 (1990) of 20 December 1990, regarding this situation concerning Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation.

Decision of 18 December 1992 (3151st meeting):

By a letter dated 18 December 1992 addressed to the President of the Security Council,²⁶⁵ the representative of Lebanon requested the convening of an urgent meeting of the Council to discuss the grave situation which had occurred as a result of the deportation of more than 400 Palestinians into Lebanese territory, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, rules and norms of international law, and the principle of State sovereignty. The Government of Lebanon urged the Security Council to take all necessary measures, as provided in Chapter VII of the Charter, to compel Israel to reverse its action and allow the safe return of the Palestinians to their homes.

At its 3151st meeting, held on 18 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included that letter in its agenda.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the Council decided, by 11 votes to 1 (United States), with 4 abstentions (Belgium, France, Hungary, United Kingdom), to invite the Permanent Observer of

Palestine, at his request, to participate in the debate, not under rule 37 or 39 but with the same rights of participation as under rule 37.²⁶⁶

The President (India) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of its prior consultations.²⁶⁷ He also drew their attention to several other documents.²⁶⁸

The representative of Palestine stated that, on 16 December 1992, the Government of Israel had ordered the deportation of 418 civilians, and that on 17 December, under a court order, the authorities had deported 383 Palestinians to Lebanon. This action represented an unprecedented qualitative escalation which not only violated the Fourth Geneva Convention and Security Council resolutions but also the sovereignty of Lebanon. At the political level, the deportation had the potential to sabotage and even destroy the ongoing peace process launched in Madrid. Reminding the Council that the Palestinian delegation had been forced to boycott the meeting the day before, pending the final decision by the PLO leadership on the principle of continuing with the process as a whole, he called upon the international community and the sponsors of the Peace Conference to make serious efforts to salvage the peace process. He also appealed to the Council to take proper action to ensure the immediate return of the deportees and to ensure that Israel would not take similar actions in the future. He hoped that the Council would unanimously adopt the draft resolution and implement its provisions promptly and rigorously.²⁶⁹

The representative of Lebanon stated that the deportation of almost 400 Palestinians into Lebanese territory, despite the opposition of its Government, constituted a serious breach of the principle of sovereignty of States and of article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. It was an act in defiance of the United Nations and its Charter, and a challenge to the Security Council, its resolutions and authority. At the political level, it would have serious consequences with respect to the internal situation in Lebanon, frustrating the Government's endeavours to restore a normal situation. It also posed an obstacle to the liberation of the southern part of the country occupied by Israel. The speaker noted with surprise that the United Nations, and the Security Council in particular, had been excluded from the efforts to achieve a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict, at a time when the Council was involved in the search for solutions to all other regional and local problems. Reminding the Security Council that Israel had defied all its resolutions on deportations, he called on the Council to use its authority, including the authority conferred by Chapter VII of the Charter, to adopt the draft resolution and to ensure the implementation of all other previous resolutions. He also requested the Council to enforce its resolution 425 (1978) to bring about Israel's total withdrawal from southern Lebanon, which would remove one of the major obstacles to the peace process and help to lessen the friction in the Middle East.²⁷⁰

The representative of Israel stated that his Government had issued temporary removal orders against members of the terrorist organizations Hamas and Islamic Jihad who, discouraged by bilateral negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbours, had been mounting a campaign of intimidation and bloodshed. He noted that the measures, which would be effective for a period of time not extending beyond two years, had been approved by the Supreme Court of Israel. Faced with extremist groups that threatened to endanger the stability and prospects for peace in the Middle East, Israel was exercising its natural right of self-defence, and it was regrettable that some members of the Council wanted to condemn it for doing so. The speaker assured the Council that Israel was fully committed to the quest for peace and would not withdraw from the talks in Washington. He warned that the Palestinians, who had rejected the partition plan in 1948 and the Camp David accords later, would make yet another great mistake by choosing to desert the negotiations and giving in to Hamas and Islamic Jihad.²⁷¹

The representative of Jordan noted that, over the past quarter century, the Council had examined the question of deportations and adopted several resolutions, the most recent of which was resolution 726 (1992). Yet it was meeting again to examine a deportation by Israel, in disregard of the Charter of the United Nations, the Fourth Geneva Convention and the Council's resolutions. The speaker contended that, contrary to Israel's statement that the deportations aimed to punish those responsible for killing the Israeli soldier and to safeguard the peace process, the real reason was the rivalry in Israeli domestic politics. He hoped that the Council would adopt a resolution to ensure the prompt return of the deportees, another to follow up on the implementation of the first, and a third affirming the applicability of the Geneva Conventions to the occupied territories and compelling Israel to respect them.²⁷²

The draft resolution was then put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 799 (1992), which reads:

The Security Council,

Recalling the obligations of Member States under the Charter of the United Nations,

Reaffirming its resolutions 607 (1988) of 5 January 1988, 608 (1988) of 14 January 1988, 636 (1989) of 6 July 1989, 641 (1989) of 30 August 1989, 681 (1990) of 20 December 1990, 694 (1991) of 24 May 1991 and 726 (1992) of 6 January 1992,

Having learned with deep concern that Israel, the occupying Power, in contravention of its obligations under the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, deported to Lebanon on 17 December 1992 hundreds of Palestinian civilians from the territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem,

1. Strongly condemns the action taken by Israel, the occupying Power, to deport hundreds of Palestinian civilians, and expresses its firm opposition to any such deportation by Israel;

2. Reaffirms the applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem, and affirms that deportation of civilians constitutes a contravention of its obligations under the Convention;

3. Reaffirms also the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon;

²⁷⁰ Ibid., pp. 12-20.

²⁷¹ Ibid., pp. 21-28.

²⁷² Ibid., pp. 28-33.

4. Demands that Israel, the occupying Power, ensure the safe and immediate return to the occupied territories of all those deported;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to consider dispatching a representative to the area to follow up with the Israeli Government with regard to this serious situation and to report to the Security Council;

6. Decides to keep the matter actively under review.

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States recalled that his Government had repeatedly urged Israel to cease deportations as a method of punishment and to comply fully with the Fourth Geneva Convention in all occupied territories. He regretted that Israel had gone ahead with the deportations, playing into the hands of those whose goal was to scuttle the peace process, and in the process imposing an unfair burden on Lebanon. Equally condemning Hamas for murdering Israelis as part of a deliberate strategy to undermine the peace process, he appealed to all parties to avoid unilateral actions that raised tensions. He reiterated that the United States regarded the phrase “all the Palestinian territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including Jerusalem” as being merely demographically and geographically descriptive and not indicative of sovereignty.²⁷³

The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation had supported the resolution because the vital interests of all the concerned parties should be to preserve and pursue the peace process. Condemning both the acts of violence — the recent murder of an Israeli military official — and the deportation of Palestinians, he called on all parties to devote themselves to the bilateral and multilateral negotiations.²⁷⁴

The representative of France condemned the acts of violence and opposed the procedure of deportation, which constituted a violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and was contrary to several Security Council resolutions. The current deportations were even more deplorable, because they were on a very large scale, constituted collective punishment and a violation of Lebanon’s sovereignty, to which the Government of France attached particular importance, and impeded the peace process.²⁷⁵

25. Marking of plastic or sheet explosives for the purpose of detection

Initial proceedings

Decision of 14 June 1989 (2869th meeting): resolution 635 (1989)

At its 2869th meeting, held on 14 June 1989 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled “Marking of plastic or sheet explosives for the purpose of detection” and considered the question at the same meeting.

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (United States) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution that had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.¹ The draft resolution was voted upon and adopted unanimously as resolution 635 (1989), which reads:

The Security Council,

Conscious of the implications of acts of terrorism for international security,

Deeply concerned by all acts of unlawful interference against international civil aviation,

Mindful of the important role of the United Nations in supporting and encouraging efforts by all States and intergovernmental organizations in preventing and eliminating all acts of terrorism, including those involving the use of explosives,

Determined to encourage the promotion of effective measures to prevent acts of terrorism,

Concerned about the ease with which plastic or sheet explosives can be used in acts of terrorism with little risk of detection,

Taking note of the International Civil Aviation Organization Council resolution of 16 February 1989, in which it urged its member States to expedite current research and development on detection of explosives and on security equipment,

1. Condemns all acts of unlawful interference against the security of civil aviation;

2. Calls upon all States to cooperate in devising and implementing measures to prevent all acts of terrorism, including those involving explosives;

3. Welcomes the work already undertaken by the International Civil Aviation Organization, and by other international organizations, aimed at preventing and eliminating all acts of terrorism, in particular in the field of aviation security;

4. Urges the International Civil Aviation Organization to intensify its work aimed at preventing all acts of terrorism against international civil aviation, and in particular its work on devising an international regime for the marking of plastic or sheet explosives for the purpose of detection;

5. Urges all States, and in particular the producers of plastic or sheet explosives, to intensify research into means of making such explosives more easily detectable, and to cooperate in this endeavour;

6. Calls upon all States to share the results of such research and cooperation with a view to devising, in the International Civil Aviation Organization and other competent international organizations, an international regime for the marking of plastic or sheet explosives for the purpose of detection.

26. The question of hostage-taking and abduction

Initial proceedings

Decisions of 31 July 1989 (2872nd meeting): statement by the President and resolution 638 (1989)

At its 2872nd meeting, held on 31 July 1989, in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled "The question of hostage-taking and abduction".

Following the adoption of the agenda, the President (Yugoslavia) drew the attention of the members of the Council to a draft resolution submitted by Canada and Finland.¹ In accordance with the agreement reached in the Council's prior consultations, the President then made the following statement:²

As we consider the adoption of the draft resolution on hostage-taking and abduction, we meet under the shadow of recent events and the cruel reports that Lieutenant-Colonel Higgins, who served the United Nations on a peacekeeping mission in Lebanon, may have been murdered today. I wish to express the full support of the Security Council for the statement made by the Secretary-General yesterday, 30 July, in this connection.

The Council will seek further facts on the developments of today, and urges those involved to act with reason, restraint and a proper respect for human life and dignity. The Council feels that it should proceed without delay to the adoption of the draft resolution that we have been discussing in private on the subject of hostage-taking and abduction.

There is a most tragic irony that our efforts to adopt a text on this matter should have coincided with the grave events of recent days.

This illustrates, with utmost clarity, that we need to underline the necessity for effective international action on the subject of hostage-taking and abduction. Indeed, the expression of the unanimous view of the Security Council will, I am sure, serve to deter such unlawful, criminal and cruel acts in the future.

Following his statement, the President put the draft resolution to the vote. It was adopted unanimously as resolution 638 (1989), which reads:

² See Resolutions and Decisions of the Security Council, 1989, p. 22.

The Security Council,

Deeply disturbed by the prevalence of incidents of hostage-taking and abduction, and the continued protracted incarceration of many of those held hostage,

Considering that the taking of hostages and abductions are offences of grave concern to all States and serious violations of international humanitarian law, having severe adverse consequences for the human rights of the victims and their families and for the promotion of friendly relations and cooperation among States,

Recalling its resolutions 579 (1985) of 18 December 1985 and 618 (1988) of 29 July 1988 condemning all acts of hostage-taking and abduction,

Bearing in mind the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, adopted on 17 December 1979, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, adopted on 14 December 1973, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, signed on 23 September 1971, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, signed on 16 December 1970, and other relevant conventions,

1. Condemns unequivocally all acts of hostage-taking and abduction;

2. Demands the immediate safe release of all hostages and abducted persons, wherever and by whomever they are being held;

3. Calls upon all States to use their political influence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law to secure the safe release of all hostages and abducted persons and to prevent the commission of acts of hostage-taking and abduction;

4. Expresses appreciation for the efforts of the Secretary-General in seeking the release of all hostages and abducted persons and invites him to continue such efforts whenever so requested by a State;

5. Appeals to all States that have not yet done so to consider becoming parties to the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft and other relevant conventions;

6. Urges the further development of international cooperation among States in devising and adopting effective measures which are in accordance with the rules of international law to facilitate the prevention, prosecution and punishment of all acts of hostage-taking and abduction as manifestations of terrorism.

27. United Nations peacekeeping operations

Initial proceedings

Decision of 30 May 1990 (2924th meeting): statement by the President

At its 2924th meeting, held on 30 May 1990 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Security Council included in its agenda the item entitled “United Nations peacekeeping operations”.

After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Finland) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹

The members of the Council note with satisfaction that the United Nations has in recent years played an increasingly important and active role in restoring and maintaining international peace and security. The peacekeeping operations of the United Nations have become a valuable instrument facilitating the settlement of international disputes. Recent successful peacekeeping operations have, for their part, contributed to the enhanced standing and effectiveness of the United Nations.

The members of the Council express their deep satisfaction with the growing support of the international community for United Nations peacekeeping and, in particular, with the participation of a growing number of Member States in the operations. They pay tribute to the Secretary-General and his staff for their tireless efforts in the conduct of those operations. They also commend States which have provided resources for such operations. Furthermore, they commend the peacekeeping forces for their exemplary and dedicated service in the cause of international peace and security.

The members of the Council consider it of vital importance that adequate resources are available for the preparation, deployment and maintenance of the United Nations peacekeeping operations. This must be underlined all the more in view of the new challenges in prospect. They urge Member States to respond positively and rapidly to requests from the Secretary-General for contributions of financial, human and material resources for the operations. They emphasize that the operations must be launched and maintained on a sound and secure financial basis and stress the importance of full and timely payments of assessed contributions. At the same time, they underscore that the operations must be planned and conducted with maximum efficiency and cost-effectiveness.

The members of the Council also emphasize the importance of political support by all Member States, and in particular by the parties concerned, for United Nations peacekeeping and for the action of the Secretary-General in conducting the operations. They stress that a peacekeeping operation is essentially a temporary measure, intended to facilitate the resolution of conflicts and disputes. Its mandate is not automatically renewable. Peacekeeping should never be construed as a substitute for the ultimate goal: an early negotiated settlement. In the light of this, the members of the Council will continue to examine carefully the mandate of each operation and, when necessary, vary it in response to prevailing circumstances.

The members of the Council, while recognizing the principle that peacekeeping should only be undertaken with the consent of the host countries and the parties concerned, urge the host countries and all parties involved to assist and facilitate in every way the successful and safe deployment and functioning of the United Nations peacekeeping operations in order to enable the fulfilment of their mandates, including the early conclusion of status-of-forces agreements with the United Nations and the provision of appropriate infrastructure support.

The members of the Council are encouraged by recent achievements of United Nations peacekeeping. Bearing in mind the primary responsibility of the Council under the Charter of the United Nations, they express their determination to continue to work jointly and in cooperation with the Secretary-General for the prevention and resolution of international conflicts. The members of the Council remain ready to consider launching new peacekeeping operations as and when necessary in the interest of international peace and security, in accordance with the principles and purposes of the Charter.

28. The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

Decision of 31 January 1992 (3046th meeting): statement by the President

On 31 January 1992, at its 3046th meeting, the Security Council met for the first time at the level of Heads of State and Government. The Council included in its agenda the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”.

After the adoption of the agenda, the President of the Council (United Kingdom) made an introductory statement, in which he stated that the Council faced new challenges and should set a new course in tackling them. He observed that the presence of so many Heads of State or Government reflected the importance they all attached to the United Nations and their commitment to its ideals. He outlined four purposes for the meeting. First, the meeting marked a turning-point in the world and at the United Nations. On the international scene, they had witnessed the end of the cold war, presenting immense opportunities but also new risks. At the United Nations, there was an opportunity for Council members to give their full backing to the new Secretary-General in carrying out his mandate. Second, Council members should reaffirm their commitment to the principle of collective security, and to the resolution of disputes in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. In that regard, they should send a clear signal that they intended to deal with threats to international peace and security through the United Nations and its Security Council. Third, Council members should consider anew the means by which collective security was upheld through the United Nations and consider how best to update and develop them. All the instruments at their disposal should be reviewed: preventive action, to avert crises; peacemaking, to restore peace through diplomacy; and peacekeeping, to reduce tensions and consolidate efforts to restore peace. In all of those endeavours, the role of the Secretary-General was, in his view, vital. Fourth, Council members should commit themselves anew to upholding international peace and security through reinforced measures of arms control. He considered that, in that sphere, the role of the United Nations — not just the Security Council, but the whole of the Organization — was an increasingly important one. He stressed further that, as they met to consider the specific responsibilities of the Security Council, the wider concerns of the international community were also in their minds. He observed that, without economic development and prosperity, lasting peace and stability would not be achieved. Equally, however, only when conditions of security and peace were assured could sustained economic development take place.¹

Commencing the discussion, the Secretary-General welcomed the historic meeting and suggested that the Council should meet at the summit level periodically, to take stock of the state of the world. He observed that, while the contours of the post-cold-war global order were still taking shape, several lessons had already been driven home. Democratization at the national level dictated a corresponding process at the global level; at both levels it aimed at the rule of law. New ways of preventing internal disputes and inter-State confrontations would need to be developed. State sovereignty was taking on a new meaning; added to its dimension of right was the dimension of responsibility. Collective security could be based only on collective confidence and good faith — confidence in the principles by which it was governed and good faith in the means by which it was sought to be ensured. With the end of the cold war, it was important to avoid the outbreak or resurgence of new conflicts, involving irredentist claims, ethnic strife, tribal wars and border disputes. He emphasized the importance of engaging in preventive diplomacy to identify potential areas of conflict and resolve crises before they degenerated into armed confrontation.²

The President of France observed that it was a time of crisis characterized by war, exodus, the break-up of States and terrorism. In his view, the following were required in response: instruments for comprehensive, universal action; a guarantee of collective security; and new forms of solidarity. With regard to instruments for universal action, it was necessary, he believed, to expand the means available to the Security Council for intervention. He called for the creation of a zone free of weapons of mass destruction in the Middle East; universal adherence to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons; and the adoption of a convention banning chemical weapons. With regard to collective security, he thought it would be jeopardized very quickly unless up-to-date conditions were created for it. France, for its part, wished to ensure the greater effectiveness of peacekeeping operations. To that end, it proposed to make available to the Secretary-General a 1,000-man contingent which could be deployed at any time, on

48 hours' notice. Such deployments would, he noted, involve activity by the Military Staff Committee, as provided for in the Charter. He also emphasized the need to develop preventive diplomacy, adding that Council members should systematically provide the Secretary-General with information on international security and give him the mandate to maintain regular contacts with the leaders of regional organizations, in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter. Lastly, he observed that security could not be conceived solely in military terms: it had an economic aspect. He recommended, accordingly, holding a world summit on social development that would rejuvenate thinking on development itself and highlight the human dimension of things.³

The President of Ecuador commended the announcement made a few hours before by the Presidents of the United States and the Russian Federation of their readiness to eliminate certain types of nuclear missiles and reduce their arsenals of other types of strategic weapons, as a major step on the road to disarmament. He considered, however, that the non-military risks to security had increased, and supported, in that regard, the proposal by the President of France to convene a summit on social development.⁴

The King of Morocco observed that the Council had not always been able to carry out its functions in the field of the maintenance of international peace and security, in particular under Chapter VI of the Charter. The Council had, for much of the time, been paralysed because of the cold war, which had been reflected in the Council by the exercise of the right of veto by the great Powers of one or other bloc. For the same reason, the Council had found itself incapable of finding satisfactory solutions to regional conflicts, which had harmful consequences in the international arena. He stressed the importance of dialogue and mediation to achieve the peaceful settlement of disputes, and urged that the Secretary-General be given all the means of preventive diplomacy to prevent the degeneration of disputes into armed conflicts. He doubted, on the other hand, that the provisions of the Charter concerning collective security could become operational unless all countries fully respected international law and unless the principle of equality of States was made a reality. In his view, the strengthening of the organs of the United Nations and of their role in the maintenance of international peace and security required that serious consideration be given to disarmament questions. At the same time, he identified underdevelopment as the greatest threat to world peace and security.⁵

The President of the Russian Federation stressed the need and opportunity that existed to implement deep cuts in strategic offensive arms and tactical nuclear weapons; to limit and even cease nuclear testing; to reduce conventional armaments and armed forces; to implement international agreements on the prohibition of chemical and bacteriological weapons; and to enhance the reliability of barriers to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. He said that the Russian Federation was fully aware of its responsibility for making the Commonwealth of Independent States a factor of stability in the world, particularly with regard to nuclear weapons. To that end, the participating States of the Commonwealth shared the view that nuclear weapons were an integral part of the strategic forces of the Commonwealth, under a single command and unified control. He welcomed the Organization's increased efforts to strengthen global and regional stability and to build a new democratic world order based on the equality of all States. He added that the Russian Federation was prepared to continue partnership among the permanent members of the Security Council, noting that the climate in the activities of that body was conducive to cooperative and constructive work. He shared the view that there was a need for a special rapid-response mechanism to ensure peace and stability. As he saw it, upon decision of the Security Council, such a force could be expeditiously activated in areas of crisis. He also expressed his country's willingness to play a practical role in United Nations peacekeeping operations and contribute to their logistical support. In addition, he affirmed that his country supported steps to consolidate the rule of law throughout the world.⁶

The President of the United States of America noted that the end of the cold war had breathed new life into the Organization, as evidenced by the previous year's events: the world had seen a newly invigorated United Nations in action as the Council had stood firm against aggression, and for the principles enshrined in the Charter. He affirmed that the Organization could count on his country's full support in the task of accelerating the revitalization and building of a vigorous and effective United Nations. The United States looked, he said, to the Secretary-General to present to the Security Council his recommendations for ensuring effective and efficient peacekeeping, peacemaking and preventive diplomacy, and looked forward to exploring those ideas together. He shared the view of others regarding the importance of banning the use of chemical weapons, and addressing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. On the latter, he recalled the unilateral steps he had announced to reduce his country's nuclear arsenal, and added that the United States was prepared to move forward on mutual arms reductions. He observed that, although the threat of global nuclear war was more distant than at any time in the nuclear era, the spectre of mass destruction remained all too real, especially as some nations continued to push to acquire weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them. He pointed to their triumph in the Gulf as testament to the United Nations mission: namely, that security was a shared responsibility. He stressed that, as on all the urgent issues facing them, progress came from acting in concert. He urged Council members, in that regard, to deal resolutely with renegade regimes, if necessary by sanctions or stronger measures, to compel them to observe international standards of behaviour. He stressed that terrorists and their State sponsors must know that there would be serious consequences if they violated international law. He emphasized that democracy, human rights and the rule of law were the building blocks of peace and freedom. In conclusion, he observed that, perhaps for the first time since its inception in San Francisco, one could look at the Charter as a living, breathing document. Their mission, as Member States, was to make it strong and sturdy through increased dedication and cooperation.⁷

The President of Venezuela stated that, in order to organize the peace, the United Nations had been compelled, owing to the circumstances of its foundation, to sacrifice sovereign equality in the fulfilment of its mandate. The right of veto had, in his view, been an extraordinary power, which had been highly useful in ensuring the survival of the Organization; without that power, the United Nations might perhaps have met the same fate as the League of Nations. Now that those risks were gone, however, he believed that the Organization should restore the basic principle underlying its validity: that of equality of rights and obligations. He added, in that regard, that the Security Council itself reflected political realities as they existed at the end of the Second World War, and not current realities. He identified several other priorities of the United Nations in maintaining peace. These included the need to strengthen regional organizations in an operational relationship with the Organization. Another priority was to meet the challenge of disarmament. He saw that task not as the exclusive responsibility of those who had confronted each other during the cold war, but as a collective responsibility, which included the development of guarantees and controls by the international community. He shared the view of others, moreover, regarding the need for a summit on social development, to address the issue of underdevelopment.⁸

The Federal Chancellor of Austria noted the new partnership in global responsibility shared by members of the Security Council — permanent and non-permanent members alike — which had enabled the Council to take a number of unanimous positions on some of the most complex and critical issues. He said that the Organization, its Secretary-General and the Security Council must act as catalysts for peaceful and constructive change. He saw four major issues in that context: the strengthening of the United Nations in peacemaking and peacekeeping; the need for further progress in disarmament and arms control, including the dismantling of weapons of mass destruction; the significance of human rights, minority rights and democratic processes for development, prosperity and peace; and the need for effective measures against poverty to create a long-term basis for stability and security in international relations. He observed that some of the recent crises had made clear the urgent need for an early reaction to potential conflicts. In his view, preventive diplomacy both by the Secretary-General and, where appropriate, by the Security Council, would have to be developed further. He suggested, in that regard, that an early deployment of peacekeeping personnel, possibly at the request of only one party to the conflict, might help to contain a dispute and facilitate a process of negotiation and compromise before the outbreak of hostilities. He strongly believed that the Security Council would have to consider the possibility of such preventive measures. He also recalled the Charter's goal of multilateral peace enforcement and the creation of an effective system of global collective security. He considered that the Council had taken a significant step in that direction when it authorized a coalition of States to use all necessary means to implement its mandatory resolutions. He suggested that another step would be to have a fresh look at Article 43 of the Charter. On the issue of arms control, non-proliferation and disarmament, which he considered as one of the most important future tasks of the Security Council, he thought that Article 26 of the Charter provided an excellent programme for future action. He stressed that the protection of human rights, especially the rights of ethnic minorities, had an important impact on the development of peaceful relations between States, and noted that the Secretary-General had rightly identified those issues as priority areas for the future work of the Organization.⁹

The Prime Minister of Belgium observed that, among the most important tasks facing the Organization, he saw three that could be implemented through the means of action at their disposal: cooperation and coordination between the United Nations and regional organizations; extension of the powers of initiative and inquiry of the Secretary-General and the Security Council; and strengthening the efficiency of United Nations peacekeeping operations. With regard to regional organizations, he thought they should be involved systematically in the Security Council's actions. He considered it promising that, in its resolutions concerning the Yugoslav crisis, the Council had constantly referred to the intervention of the European Community, as well as to the efforts made within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. On conflict prevention, he stressed the importance of the Secretary-General exercising fully his right to take initiatives. He said that the Secretary-General must invent new kinds of diplomacy; that he must take new risks to face such challenges as terrorism, the recurrence of civil wars, and the emergence of international conflicts linked to the violation of human rights. With regard to peacekeeping operations, he stressed the need to ensure the immediate availability of funds from the moment the Council decided on the launching of a peacekeeping operation. In that regard, his country proposed the creation of budgetary reserves, and would give favourable consideration to the secondment of troops and observers to the United Nations for possible deployment within such peacekeeping operations.¹⁰

The Prime Minister of Cape Verde welcomed the fact that, with the end of the cold war, the Council had developed a new approach to its work, based on cooperation, especially between its permanent members. That cooperation had enabled the Council to assist, through negotiations, in the settlement of long-standing conflicts in many parts of the world, and to take swift and decisive action to reverse aggression and restore the independence and sovereignty of Kuwait. He believed that the new era of positive cooperation in the Council should be further strengthened, in order to allow for full and regular implementation of the Charter's collective security system. In his view, the United Nations, through its Security Council, must act — as envisaged in the Charter — as the guardian of the security of nations, especially the small countries, and as a catalyst for promotion of the primacy of the rule of law in international relations. The actions and decisions of the Council in the past two years had, he thought, raised new hopes in that regard. Emphasizing that the Council should act in such a way as to strengthen its international credibility and its moral authority, he stressed that it should seek to reach decisions by consensus and avoid selective implementation of its resolutions. Highlighting the important role the Secretary-General had under the Charter in assisting the Security Council in its peacemaking efforts, by bringing to its attention any matter that might, in his judgement, threaten international peace and security, he encouraged the Secretary-General to use that prerogative. Ultimately, however, he noted, Council measures alone would not secure the permanent stability of nations or quell regional rivalries. Its role would be facilitated only when the root causes of instability and conflicts were properly addressed. He thought, therefore, that Member States should be prepared to couple the efforts of the Council with those of the United Nations system and the international community, in general, to help in finding solutions to poverty, underdevelopment and social problems: he firmly supported the initiative to convene a world summit on development.¹¹

The Premier of the State Council of China expressed his Government's views on what kind of new international order should be established that would be conducive to world peace and development. The new international order should, he stated, include the following elements. It should be based on the principles of mutual respect for the sovereign equality of Member States and non-interference in their internal affairs, as enshrined in the Charter. The human rights and fundamental freedoms of all mankind should be universally respected, but it should be recognized that they fell within the sovereignty of each country. It was neither appropriate nor feasible to demand that all countries measure up to the human rights criteria of a few countries. Nor should human rights issues be used as an excuse to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. Effective disarmament and arms control should be achieved in a fair, reasonable, comprehensive and balanced manner. Countries with the largest arsenals of nuclear and conventional weapons should take the lead in discharging their special responsibilities for disarmament. Lastly, the United Nations should play a more active role in maintaining world peace and promoting development, as well as in helping to establish a new international order. He concluded by expressing China's readiness to cooperate with other Council members, so as to expand areas of consensus, and its support for the work of the Secretary-General.¹²

The Prime Minister of India welcomed the newly effective role of the Security Council which he attributed to cohesion among the permanent members of the Council. He stressed, however, that the interpretation of the Charter, upon which the role of the United Nations rested, and the actions of the Security Council must flow from the collective will, not from the views or predilections of a few. He considered wider representation in the Security Council to be essential, to ensure its moral sanction and political effectiveness. He stressed that the Council should anticipate the consequences of its decisions, and take speedy action to address problems arising in a third country from their implementation. He noted, for example, that economic sanctions against one country could have a major impact on its trading partners. While acknowledging the obligations of the State to protect human rights, he suggested that there was a need to delineate the parameters that harmonized the defence of national integrity with respect for human rights. He fully shared the concerns expressed by several leaders on the threat posed to international peace and security by the proliferation of nuclear weapons. He added that the proliferation issue had assumed a new dimension. One was no longer faced with the possible acquisition of such weapons by a handful of threshold States, but with the possible loss of control over nuclear arsenals and the spread of nuclear weapons across the globe by a variety of means and methods. He stressed, however, that measures of preventive or punitive action on a selective basis would not achieve the results aimed at. A global approach was necessary, based on a new international consensus on non-proliferation. To be effective, that global non-proliferation regime must be universal, comprehensive and non-discriminatory and linked to the goal of complete nuclear disarmament.¹³

The Prime Minister of Japan remarked that there were three major issues confronting the United Nations as it responded to expectations for the future role it was to play in the attainment and maintenance of peace. These issues were, in his view, how the Organization would adjust to the epochal changes that had occurred; how its effectiveness in peacekeeping and peacemaking efforts could be improved; and how it could secure a sound financial base that would enable it to carry out those efforts. With regard to the first issue, he underlined the need for the United Nations itself to evolve while adapting to a changing world. Moreover, since the Security Council was at the centre of the Organization's efforts to maintain international peace and security, consideration should be given to ways of adjusting its functions, composition and other aspects so as to make it more reflective of the new era. He shared the views of others regarding the importance of peacekeeping activities. He emphasized, moreover, the need to strengthen the functions of the United Nations in the area of conflict prevention. It was essential, in his view, that the Secretary-General, who played a crucial role in United Nations mediation efforts and good offices, be given sufficient information concerning tensions that could escalate into international conflicts. He drew attention in that regard to the adoption by the General Assembly in December 1991 of the Declaration on Fact-finding by the United Nations in the Field of the Maintenance of International Peace and Security. With regard to the need for a sound financial base, he stressed that the availability of funds necessary for the start-up phase of a peacekeeping operation was essential to its safe deployment. He also underlined the importance of the States concerned — including those that would extend considerable financial support to the peacekeeping operation — becoming involved in consultations on its establishment from the earliest steps. He added that, in securing peace, the United Nations also had an important role to play in the field of arms control and disarmament. He emphasized in that context the need to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction; to conclude a convention on chemical weapons; and to work together for the smooth implementation of the recently established United Nations Register of Conventional Arms Transfers. The Security Council ought, in his view, to be seized of the developments in those areas.¹⁴

The Prime Minister of Hungary remarked that his country's dramatic past experience should encourage Member States to urge the United Nations not to leave peoples alone in their struggle for self-determination but to do its utmost to assist free and democratic development and the exercise of human rights in every country. As a Council member, Hungary wished to ensure that the new philosophy of preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping was translated into concrete and effective measures. He lauded, in that regard, the action taken the year before, under the authority of the Security Council, to liberate Kuwait: that had provided evidence of the capacity of the international community, through the Security Council, to undertake peacemaking actions and to deal with local conflicts in the interest of collective security, as set forth in the Charter. He also highlighted the Council's launching of a large-scale humanitarian operation to save the Kurds of Iraq: Hungary viewed that action taken by the Council as a manifestation of peacebuilding activity to safeguard human rights and the rights of minorities. For Hungary, respect for human rights and the rights of national minorities was not merely a legal and humanitarian question: it was also an integral part of international collective security. It was indispensable, therefore, for the Security Council to take resolute action to defend and protect those rights. He also considered that the recent decisions of the Security Council regarding the military arsenal of a Member State having committed aggression were a precedent deserving unreserved support. The limitation of the armaments and number of troops of an aggressor State, or of an aggressor army out of political control, as well as their disarmament under an international verification system, should, in his view, be a new, important dimension of the activities of the Security Council. At that historic moment, he added, the world also had to face the challenge of dismantling enormous war machines and related manpower and converting war industries to civilian uses. He noted that the future of the newly independent States in the Balkans and in the former Soviet Union hinged largely on the success or failure of that endeavour. Parallel with that process, he suggested that there should be some new creations as well. In Hungary's view, consideration should be given to the idea of the United Nations instituting a force that could be mobilized and deployed on short notice, in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter, to any conflict-stricken region.¹⁵

The Minister for Foreign Affairs and Personal Emissary of the President of Zimbabwe observed that, as the principles of the Charter must govern the global order that Member States wished to construct, and since their efforts should result in a stronger and more effective Organization, the process must begin with a re-examination of the Charter itself in the context of the changing international circumstances. A new world order, in his view, could best be constructed by re-examining the Charter, rectifying the flaws and closing the gaps that had been revealed by recent developments, and updating those provisions that had been rendered obsolete by the new international circumstances. He noted, for instance, that there had been major modifications in the application of Article 42 (Chapter VII), with respect to carrying out combined international enforcement action during the Gulf crisis. In addition, the United Nations had developed peacekeeping and peacemaking operations which were not provided for in the Charter; yet those were among the most effective and successful activities of the Organization. In that context, he sought to make some preliminary suggestions as to the changes to the Charter that his country had in mind. He called for more frequent use of Article 41 (Chapter VII), relating to collective measures not involving the use of armed force, such as economic sanctions to ensure compliance with Security Council resolutions. He pointed, however, to the inadequacy of Article 50, designed to give some protection to third countries adversely affected by such sanctions. He stressed the need to establish clear criteria to determine who deserved assistance, and standing arrangements for the mobilization of the resources needed to assist affected States. He also suggested that future collective enforcement operations must be fully accountable to the Security Council and should be representative. He believed that that could be achieved by strengthening Article 46, which gave a role to the Military Staff Committee; if it were to have such a role, however, its composition should be broadened to include non-permanent members. Consideration should also be given to extending Article 27 (3) to apply to decisions taken under Chapter VII, so that those who wielded the veto power could not block the imposition of sanctions or any other collective enforcement action where they were a party to a conflict. On the question of disarmament, he felt that it could best be dealt with in the Organization's multilateral forum and could be enhanced by the use of Article 26 and Article 47 (1), which empowered the Council to put in place a system for the regulation of armaments.

Continuing, the Foreign Minister of Zimbabwe expressed the view that, since the Security Council took decisions of major importance on behalf of the entire membership of the United Nations, that body should be made more representative of the will of the general membership. He pointed out that the Council currently represented less than 10 per cent of the United Nations membership, and that the question of equitable geographical representation also had to be addressed. On the question of human rights, he considered that established principles governing inter-State relations — such as non-interference in the internal affairs of other States — would have to accommodate efforts by the United Nations and by regional organizations to protect the basic human rights of individuals and social groups that were threatened in particular States. Citing, for example, the approach taken to the doctrine of apartheid in South Africa, he stated that massive and deliberate violations of human rights or the existence of situations of oppression and repression could no longer be tolerated anywhere in the world. He added that the Council would undoubtedly be called upon increasingly to deal with conflicts and humanitarian situations of an internal nature that could pose a threat to international peace and security. That should not, however, be used as a pretext for the intervention of big Powers in the legitimate domestic affairs of small States. There was, therefore, a need to strike a delicate balance between the rights of States, as enshrined in the Charter, and the rights of individuals, as enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In conclusion, he underlined the primacy of preventive diplomacy, which he said called for an activist role on the part of the Secretary-General in terms of Article 99 of the Charter, in bringing before the Council any matter which, in his opinion, threatened international peace and security.¹⁶

The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, citing recent Council decisions, observed that the world already had an effective instrument to uphold collective security. It was not yet a perfect instrument, however, and he hoped the meeting would set in hand work to strengthen the United Nations. He stressed the need to be more active in preventive diplomacy and crisis prevention. In that context, he said that the Secretary-General should boldly take the initiative to draw potential conflict to the Council's attention, adding that, in future, the Council must itself be prepared to act before tension became conflict. He considered that peacemaking and peacekeeping should run in parallel and that the Organization's ability to respond to the demand for both should be enhanced. He looked to the Secretary-General to give his ideas on how that might be done: he suggested that his report might look at the United Nations role in identifying, and dealing with, the causes of instability and potential crises, as well as the contribution to be made by regional bodies in helping the work of the Council. He stressed, moreover, that, if international peace and security were to be safeguarded, all States Members of the United Nations must be active in arms control. He recommended several concrete measures aimed at disarmament and non-proliferation, and announced that his Government was acting to strengthen controls on the export of specific biological materials and organisms which could be misused for weapons purposes. He added that the United Kingdom believed that all States must respect human rights and fundamental freedoms: good government was the bedrock of a stable and prosperous society. He noted, with approval, that peacekeeping operations tended now to include provision for human rights verification and free and fair elections as vital components of a peaceful settlement, and hoped that would continue to be the case. In conclusion, he pledged the full support of his Government to strengthen and enhance the United Nations capacity to respond to crisis, and incipient crisis, wherever it might threaten.¹⁷

Resuming his functions as President of the Security Council, he read out the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁸

The members of the Council have authorized me to make the following statement on their behalf.

The Security Council met at United Nations Headquarters in New York on 31 January 1992, for the first time at the level of heads of State and Government. The members of the Council considered, within the framework of their commitment to the Charter of the United Nations, "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security".

The members of the Council consider that their meeting is a timely recognition of the fact that there are new favourable international circumstances under which the Security Council has begun to fulfil more effectively its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

A time of change

This meeting of the Council takes place at a time of momentous change. The ending of the cold war has raised hopes for a safer, more equitable and more humane world. Rapid progress has been made, in many regions of the world, towards democracy and responsive forms of government, as well as towards achieving the purposes set out in the Charter of the United Nations. The completion of the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa would constitute a major contribution to these purposes and positive trends, including to the encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Last year, under the authority of the United Nations, the international community succeeded in enabling Kuwait to regain its sovereignty and territorial integrity, which it had lost as a result of Iraqi aggression. The resolutions adopted by the Council remain essential to the restoration of peace and stability in the region and must be fully implemented. At the same time the members of the Council are concerned by the humanitarian situation of the innocent civilian population of Iraq.

The members of the Council support the Middle East peace process, facilitated by the Russian Federation and the United States of America, and hope that it will be brought to a successful conclusion on the basis of Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 November 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973.

The members of the Council welcome the role the United Nations has been able to play under the Charter in progress towards settling long-standing regional disputes, and will work for further progress towards their resolution. They applaud the valuable contribution being made by United Nations peacekeeping forces now operating in Asia, Africa, Latin America and Europe.

The members of the Council note that United Nations peacekeeping tasks have increased and broadened considerably in recent years. Election monitoring, human rights verification and the repatriation of refugees have in the settlement of some regional conflicts, at the request or with the agreement of the parties concerned, been integral parts of the Security Council's effort to maintain international peace and security. The members of the Council welcome these developments.

The members of the Council also recognize that change, however welcome, has brought new risks for stability and security. Some of the most acute problems result from changes to State structures. The members of the Council will encourage all efforts to help achieve peace, stability and cooperation during these changes.

The international community therefore faces new challenges in the search for peace. All Member States expect the United Nations to play a central role at this crucial stage. The members of the Council stress the importance of strengthening and improving the United Nations to increase its effectiveness. They are determined to assume fully their responsibilities within the United Nations in the framework of the Charter.

The absence of war and military conflicts among States does not in itself ensure international peace and security. The non-military sources of instability in the economic, social, humanitarian and ecological fields have become threats to peace and security. The United Nations membership as a whole, working through the appropriate bodies, needs to give the highest priority to the solution of these matters.

Commitment to collective security

The members of the Council pledge their commitment to international law and to the Charter of the United Nations. All disputes between States should be peacefully resolved in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

The members of the Council reaffirm their commitment to the collective security system of the Charter to deal with threats to peace and to reverse acts of aggression.

The members of the Council express their deep concern over acts of international terrorism and emphasize the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts.

Peacemaking and peacekeeping

To strengthen the effectiveness of these commitments, and in order that the Security Council should have the means to discharge its primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, the members of the Council have decided on the following approach.

They invite the Secretary-General to prepare, for circulation to the Members of the United Nations by 1 July 1992, his analysis and recommendations on ways of strengthening and making more efficient within the framework and provisions of the Charter the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, for peacemaking and for peacekeeping.

The Secretary-General's analysis and recommendations could cover the role of the United Nations in identifying potential crises and areas of instability as well as the contribution to be made by regional organizations in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter in helping the work of the Council. They could also cover the need for adequate resources, both material and financial. The Secretary-General might draw on lessons learned in recent United Nations peacekeeping missions to recommend ways of making more effective Secretariat planning and operations. He could also consider how greater use might be made of his good offices, and of his other functions under the Charter.

Disarmament, arms control and weapons of mass destruction

The members of the Council, while fully conscious of the responsibilities of other organs of the United Nations in the fields of disarmament, arms control and non-proliferation, reaffirm the crucial contribution which progress in these areas can make to the maintenance of international peace and security. They express their commitment to take concrete steps to enhance the effectiveness of the United Nations in these areas.

The members of the Council underline the need for all Member States to fulfil their obligations in relation to arms control and disarmament; to prevent the proliferation in all its aspects of all weapons of mass destruction; to avoid excessive and destabilizing accumulations and transfers of arms; and to resolve peacefully in accordance with the Charter any problems concerning these matters threatening or disrupting the maintenance of regional and global stability. They emphasize the importance of the early ratification and implementation by the States concerned of all international and regional arms control arrangements, especially the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks and the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe.

The proliferation of all weapons of mass destruction constitutes a threat to international peace and security. The members of the Council commit themselves to working to prevent the spread of technology related to the research for or production of such weapons and to take appropriate action to that end.

On nuclear arms proliferation, the members of the Council note the importance of the decision of many countries to adhere to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968 and emphasize the integral role in the implementation of that Treaty of fully effective International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards, as well as the importance of effective export controls. They will take appropriate measures in the case of any violations notified to them by the Agency.

On chemical weapons, the members of the Council support the efforts of the Third Review Conference of the Parties to the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction, held at Geneva from 9 to 27 September 1991, with a view to reaching agreement on the conclusion, by the end of 1992, of a universal convention, including a verification regime, to prohibit chemical weapons.

On conventional armaments, they note the General Assembly's vote in favour of a United Nations register of arms transfers as a first step, and in this connection recognize the importance of all States providing all the information called for in the General Assembly's resolution.

In conclusion, the members of the Council affirm their determination to build on the initiative of their meeting in order to secure positive advances in promoting international peace and security. They agree that the Secretary-General has a crucial role to play. The members of the Council express their deep appreciation to the outgoing Secretary-General, Mr. Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, for his outstanding contribution to the work of the United Nations, culminating in the signing of the El Salvador peace agreements. They welcome the new Secretary-General, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, and note with satisfaction his intention to strengthen and improve the functioning of the United Nations. They pledge their full support to him, and undertake to work closely with him and his staff in fulfilment of their shared objectives, including a more efficient and effective United Nations system.

The members of the Council agree that the world now has the best chance of achieving international peace and security since the founding of the United Nations. They undertake to work in close cooperation with other United Nations Member States in their own efforts to achieve this, as well as to address urgently all the other problems, in particular those of economic and social development, requiring the collective response of the international community. They recognize that peace and prosperity are indivisible and that lasting peace and stability require effective international cooperation for the eradication of poverty and the promotion of a better life for all in larger freedom.

29. An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping

Initial proceedings

On 17 June 1992, pursuant to the presidential statement adopted by the Security Council at its summit meeting on 31 January 1992,¹ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report entitled "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping".² The report contained, as requested, his analysis and recommendations on ways of strengthening and making more efficient, within the framework and provisions of the Charter, the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping — to which he had added the closely related concept of peacebuilding.

The Secretary-General remarked on the changing context within which those issues had to be addressed. The ideological barrier that for decades had given rise to distrust and hostility had collapsed; and even though North-South issues had grown more acute, the improvement in East-West relations afforded new possibilities for successfully meeting threats to common security. It was a time of global transition, marked by contradictory trends. Regional associations of States were evolving ways to deepen cooperation and ease sovereign and nationalistic rivalries. At the same time, however, new assertions of nationalism and sovereignty had sprung up, and the cohesion of States was threatened by ethnic, religious, social, cultural or linguistic strife. Social peace was challenged, moreover, by discrimination and acts of terrorism seeking to undermine change through democratic means. While the concept of peace was easy to grasp, that of international security was more complex, for a pattern of contradictions had arisen there as well: as major nuclear Powers had begun to negotiate arms reduction agreements, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction threatened to increase and conventional arms continued to be amassed in many parts of the world. Since the creation of the United Nations in 1945, more than 100 major conflicts around the world had left some 20 million dead. The Organization had been powerless to deal with many of those crises because of the numerous vetoes cast in the Security Council, which were a vivid expression of the divisions of that period.

The Secretary-General observed, however, that with the end of the cold war there had been no such vetoes since 31 May 1990, and demands on the United Nations had surged. Its security arm had emerged as a central instrument for the prevention and resolution of conflicts and for the preservation of peace. He thought that, in the light of those changed circumstances, the Organization's aims should be the following: to seek to identify at the earliest possible stage situations that could produce conflict, and to try through diplomacy to remove the sources of danger before violence resulted; where conflict had erupted, to engage in peacemaking aimed at resolving the issues that had led to conflict; through peacekeeping, to work to preserve peace where fighting had been halted, and to assist in implementing agreements achieved by the peacemakers; to stand ready to assist in peacebuilding in its differing contexts; and to address the deepest causes of conflict: economic despair, social injustice and political oppression. The Secretary-General stressed that this wider mission for the Organization would demand the concerted attention and effort of individual States — which remained the foundation stone of this work — regional and non-governmental organizations, and the entire United Nations system.

The Secretary-General provided the following definitions for the key terms used in his report: (a) preventive diplomacy was action taken to prevent disputes from arising between parties, to prevent existing disputes from escalating into conflicts and to limit the spread of the latter when they occurred; (b) peacemaking was action to bring hostile parties to agreement, essentially through such peaceful means as those foreseen in Chapter VI of the Charter of the United Nations; (c) peacekeeping was the deployment of a United Nations presence in the field, hitherto with the consent of all the parties concerned, normally involving United Nations military and/or police personnel and frequently civilians as well — it was a technique that expanded the possibilities for both the prevention of conflict and the making of peace; (d) post-conflict peacebuilding was action to identify and support structures which would tend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid a relapse into conflict. These four areas of action, taken together and carried out with the backing of all Members, offered, he maintained, a coherent contribution towards securing peace in the spirit of the Charter.

Commencing with preventive diplomacy, the Secretary-General observed that it could be performed by the Secretary-General personally or through senior staff or specialized agencies or programmes, by the Security Council or by the General Assembly, as well as by regional organizations in cooperation with the United Nations. It required confidence-building measures; it needed early warning based on information-gathering and fact-finding; and it could involve preventive deployment and, in some situations, demilitarized zones. He stressed the need for an increased resort to fact-finding, in accordance with the Charter — initiated either by the Secretary-General, to enable him to meet his responsibilities under the Charter, including Article 99, or by the Security Council or the General Assembly.³ Various forms of fact-finding mission could be employed according to the requirements of the situation. A request by a State for the sending of a United Nations fact-finding mission to its territory should be considered without undue delay. In addition to collecting information on which a decision for further action could be taken, such a mission could in some instances help to defuse a dispute by its presence, indicating to the parties that the Organization, and in particular the Security Council, was actively seized of the matter as a present or potential threat to international security. The Secretary-General added that, in exceptional circumstances, the Council might itself meet away from Headquarters, in order not only to inform itself directly, but also to bring the authority of the Organization to bear on a given situation. In connection with early warning, he pointed to the need for close cooperation between the various specialized agencies and functional offices of the United Nations. He recommended, moreover, that the Security Council invite a reinvigorated and restructured Economic and Social Council to provide reports, in accordance with Article 65 of the Charter, on those economic and social developments that might, unless mitigated, threaten international peace and security. As for preventive deployment, the Secretary-General suggested that the time had come to consider such action in various circumstances, with the consent of the parties concerned: for example, in conditions of internal conflict; in an inter-State dispute; or where one nation feared a cross-border attack.

Turning to peacemaking, the Secretary-General noted that Chapter VI of the Charter set forth a comprehensive list of peaceful means for the resolution of conflict. He also called attention to the power of the Security Council, under Articles 36 and 37 of the Charter, to recommend to Member States the submission of a dispute to the International Court of Justice, arbitration or other dispute-settlement mechanisms. He recommended that he be authorized, pursuant to Article 96 (2), to take advantage of the advisory competence of the Court and that other United Nations organs that already enjoyed such authorization turn to the Court more frequently for advisory opinions. He stressed that when peacemaking required the imposition of sanctions under Article 41, States confronted with special economic problems should not only have the right to consult the Security Council, as provided by Article 50, but should also have the “realistic possibility” of having their difficulties addressed.⁴ In that context, he recommended that the Council devise a set of measures involving the financial institutions and other components of the United Nations system that could be put in place to insulate States from such difficulties.

On the use of military force, the Secretary-General observed that it was the essence of the concept of collective security that, if peaceful means failed, the measures provided in Chapter VII should be used, on the decision of the Security Council, to maintain or restore international peace and security. Under Article 42 of the Charter, the Council itself had the authority to take military action for that purpose. Such action would, in his view, require bringing into being, through negotiations, the special agreements foreseen in Article 43 of the Charter, whereby Member States undertook to make available to the Security Council armed forces, assistance and facilities. He felt that, under the political circumstances that then existed for the first time since the Charter was adopted, the long-standing obstacles to the conclusion of such special agreements should no longer prevail. The ready availability of armed forces on call could serve, in itself, as a deterrent since a potential aggressor would know that the Council had at its disposal a means of response. In that context, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council initiate negotiations, in accordance with Article 43, supported by the Military Staff Committee, whose composition might be augmented if necessary, in accordance with Article 47 (2) of the Charter. He added that, in his view, the role of the Military Staff Committee should be seen in the context of Chapter VII, and not in the planning or conduct of peacekeeping operations. The Secretary-General acknowledged, however, that, in practice, Article 43 forces were not likely to be available for some time to come. In the meantime, the United Nations was on occasion called upon to accomplish tasks that exceeded the mission of peacekeeping operations and the expectations of troop-contributing countries. The Secretary-General therefore recommended that the Council consider the utilization of peace-enforcement units in clearly defined circumstances and with their terms of reference specified in advance, as a provisional measure under Article 40.

As for peacekeeping, the Secretary-General observed that the nature of peacekeeping operations had evolved rapidly in recent years and that a new array of demands and problems had emerged regarding logistics, equipment, personnel and finance. In terms of personnel, he recalled that Member States had been asked in 1990 to indicate what military personnel they were prepared to make available, but that few had replied. He reiterated that request, and asked for standby arrangements to be confirmed, as appropriate.⁵ He also recommended that arrangements be reviewed and improved for training peacekeeping personnel — civilian, police or military. As for the United Nations itself, he suggested that special personnel procedures be instituted to permit the rapid transfer of Secretariat staff members to serve with peacekeeping operations; and that the strength and capability of military staff serving in the Secretariat be augmented to meet new and heavier responsibilities.⁶

With regard to post-conflict peacebuilding, the Secretary-General stressed that for peacemaking and peacekeeping operations to be truly successful, they must include efforts to identify and support structures that would tend to consolidate peace and advance a sense of confidence among people. After civil strife, measures might include, for instance, disarming the previously warring parties and the restoration of order, the custody and possible destruction of weapons, repatriating refugees, advisory and training support for security personnel, monitoring elections, advancing efforts to protect human rights, reforming or strengthening governmental institutions and promoting processes of political participation. In the aftermath of international conflict, peacebuilding might take the form of concrete cooperative projects that linked two or more countries in a mutually beneficial undertaking that could both contribute to economic and social development and enhance the confidence so fundamental to peace. The concept of peacebuilding as the construction of a new environment should be viewed as the counterpart of preventive diplomacy, which sought to avoid the breakdown of peaceful conditions. Preventive diplomacy was to avoid a crisis; post-conflict peacebuilding was to prevent a recurrence.

Turning to cooperation with regional arrangements and organizations, the Secretary-General stated that, in many cases, they possessed a potential that should be utilized in the four areas covered in his report. He thought they could render great service if their activities were undertaken in a manner consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, and if their relationship with the United Nations, and particularly the Security Council, were governed by Chapter VIII. Under the Charter, the Security Council had, and would continue to have, primary responsibility for maintaining international peace and security. Regional action, however, could lighten the burden of the Council and contribute to a deeper sense of participation, consensus and democratization in international affairs.⁷ Consultations between the United Nations and regional arrangements or agencies could do much to build international consensus on the nature of a problem and the measures required to address it. Regional organizations participating in complementary efforts with the United Nations in joint undertakings would encourage States outside the region to act supportively. Moreover, should the Council choose specifically to authorize a regional arrangement or organization to take the lead in addressing a crisis within its region, that could serve to lend the weight of the United Nations to the validity of the regional effort.⁸

⁸ Ibid., para. 65.

On the question of the safety of personnel, the Secretary-General stressed the need to devise innovative measures to deal with the dangers facing the Organization's staff. He recommended that the Security Council seriously consider what action should be taken towards those who put United Nations personnel in danger. Before deployment, the Council should keep open the option of collective measures, including those under Chapter VII, to come into effect should the purpose of the United Nations operation systematically be frustrated and hostilities occur.

As to financing, the Secretary-General proposed a set of measures to enable the Organization both to function over the longer term and to respond to crises. These included the establishment of a temporary peacekeeping reserve fund to meet the initial expenses of peacekeeping operations, pending receipt of assessed contributions.

In conclusion, the Secretary-General stressed that the Council should never again lose the collegiality essential to its proper functioning, adding that "a genuine sense of consensus deriving from shared interests must govern its work, not the threat of the veto or the power of any group of nations". He recommended that the Heads of State and Government of the members of the Council meet in alternate years, just before the general debate in the General Assembly. Such meetings would permit exchanges on the challenges of the moment and how to address them. In addition, the Council should continue to meet at the Foreign Minister level whenever warranted.

Decision of 30 June 1992 (3089th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3089th meeting, held on 30 June 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. After the adoption of the agenda, the President (Belgium) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:⁹

The Council has noted with interest and appreciation the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled "An agenda for peace" on ways of strengthening and making more efficient within the framework and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, for peacemaking and for peacekeeping, prepared pursuant to the statement adopted on 31 January 1992 at the conclusion of the meeting held for the first time by the Security Council at the level of Heads of State and Government. It is grateful to the Secretary-General for his report, which is a comprehensive reflection on the ongoing process of strengthening the Organization. In this connection, the Council welcomes the efforts made by the Secretary-General.

In reading the report, the Council has noted a set of interesting proposals addressed to the various organs of the United Nations and to Member States and regional organizations. The Council therefore trusts that all organs and entities, in particular the General Assembly, will devote particular attention to the report and will study and evaluate the elements of the report that concern them.

Within the scope of its competence, the Security Council will, for its part, examine in depth and with due priority the recommendations of the Secretary-General.

The Council also takes this opportunity to reiterate its readiness to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General in the strengthening of the Organization in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

Decision of 29 October 1992 (3128th meeting): statement by the President

At its 3128th meeting, held on 29 October 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (France) stated that, following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹⁰

Pursuant to the President's statement of 30 June 1992, the Council has begun to examine the Secretary-General's report entitled "An agenda for peace".

This consideration of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled "An agenda for peace" by the Council will be coordinated with the discussions carried out in the General Assembly. The Council welcomes in this regard the contact already established between the Presidents of the two organs and invites the President of the Council to continue and intensify such contacts.

The Council intends to examine the proposals of the Secretary-General which concern it or are addressed to it. For this purpose, the members of the Council have decided to hold a meeting at least once a month on the report, such meetings being prepared for, as necessary, by a working group.

One objective of this examination is to arrive at conclusions which would be considered during a special meeting of the Council, which will determine the date of this meeting, bearing in mind the progress of the work at the present session of the General Assembly, but it hopes to hold the meeting by next spring at the latest.

The Council has followed with close interest the views expressed by Member States in the General Assembly during the general debate as well as during the discussion on item 10 of the agenda of the General Assembly. It has also noted the report of the special session of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations. It has now identified the Secretary-General's proposals which concern it or are addressed to it.

Without prejudice to the further examination of other proposals of the Secretary-General, and taking into account the greatly increased number and complexity of peacekeeping operations authorized by the Council during recent months, the Council believes that two suggestions contained in "An agenda for peace" should be considered at this moment:

- The Council, in accordance with the recommendations contained in paragraph 51 of the Secretary-General's report, encourages Member States to inform the Secretary-General of their willingness to provide forces or capabilities to the United Nations for peacekeeping operations and the type of units or capabilities that might be available at short notice, subject to overriding national defence requirements and the approval of the Governments providing them. It further encourages the Secretariat and those Member States which have indicated such willingness to enter into direct dialogue so as to enable the Secretary-General to know with greater precision what forces or capabilities might be made available to the United Nations for particular peacekeeping operations, and on what time-scale;
- The Council shares the view of the Secretary-General in paragraph 52 of his report concerning the need for an augmentation of the strength and capability of military staff serving in the Secretariat and of civilian staff dealing more generally with peacekeeping matters in the Secretariat. The Council suggests to the Secretary-General that he report to it, as well as to the General Assembly, on this subject as soon as possible. The Secretary-General might consider in his report the establishment in the Secretariat of an enhanced peacekeeping planning staff and an operations centre in order to deal with the growing complexity of initial planning and control of peacekeeping operations in the field. The Council further suggests to Member States that they consider making available to the Secretariat appropriately experienced military or civilian staff, for a fixed period of time, to help with work on peacekeeping operations.

Moreover, the Council intends to study those paragraphs which are addressed to it, including paragraph 41 concerning the special economic problems which may concern other States when sanctions are imposed on a State, paragraphs 64 and 65 concerning the role of regional organizations, and paragraph 25 concerning resort by the United Nations to fact-finding.

Decision of 30 November 1992: statement by the President

On 30 November 1992, following consultations among the members of the Council, the President (Hungary) made the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹¹

The members of the Council continued the examination of the report of the Secretary-General of 17 June 1992 entitled “An agenda for peace”.

The members of the Council welcome and support the proposals in paragraph 25 of the report of the Secretary-General on fact-finding. They are of the view that an increased resort to fact-finding as a tool of preventive diplomacy, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the United Nations Declaration on Fact-finding for International Security and Peacemaking, particularly its guidelines, can result in the best possible understanding of the objective facts of a situation which will enable the Secretary-General to meet his responsibilities under Article 99 of the Charter and facilitate Security Council deliberations. They agree that various forms of fact-finding can be employed according to the requirements of a situation, and that a request by a State for the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to its territory should be considered without undue delay. They encourage all Member States in a position to do so to provide the Secretary-General with the detailed information needed on issues of concern, so as to facilitate effective preventive diplomacy.

The members of the Council, being aware of the increased responsibilities of the United Nations in the area of preventive diplomacy, invite the Secretary-General to consider the appropriate measures necessary to strengthen the capacity of the Secretariat for information-gathering and in-depth analysis. They also invite Member States and the Secretary-General to consider the secondment of experts to help in this regard. They urge the Secretary-General to take appropriate measures to ensure the availability at short notice of eminent persons who might share, with senior officials of the Secretariat, the burden of fact-finding missions. They note the positive role of regional organizations and arrangements in fact-finding within their areas of competence and welcome its intensification and close coordination with fact-finding efforts by the United Nations.

Bearing in mind the above-mentioned Declaration and the Secretary-General’s recommendations in his report, the members of the Council for their part will facilitate and encourage every appropriate use of fact-finding missions on a case-by-case basis and in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter.

In this context, the members of the Council note and endorse the Secretary-General’s view that in some cases a fact-finding mission can help defuse a dispute or situation, indicating to those concerned that the United Nations and in particular the Security Council is actively seized of the matter as a present or potential threat to international peace and security. Such action in the early stages of a potential dispute can be particularly effective. They welcome the Secretary-General’s readiness to make full use of his powers under Article 99 of the Charter to draw the attention of the Security Council to any matter which in his opinion may threaten international peace and security. They note with satisfaction the recent greater use of fact-finding missions, as exemplified by the missions to Moldova, Nagorno-Karabakh, Georgia, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

The members of the Council intend to continue their work on the Secretary-General’s report as indicated in the President’s statement of 29 October 1992.

Decision of 30 December 1992 (3154th meeting):
statement by the President

At its 3154th meeting, held on 30 December 1992 in accordance with the understanding reached in its prior consultations, the Council included the report of the Secretary-General in its agenda. The President (India) stated that following consultations among the members of the Council, he had been authorized to make the following statement on behalf of the Council:¹²

In pursuance of the President’s statement of 29 October 1992 in connection with the Secretary-General’s report entitled “An agenda for peace”, according to which “the Council intends to study those paragraphs which are addressed to it, including paragraph 41 concerning the special economic problems which may concern other States when sanctions are imposed on a State”, the Security Council examined the question of special economic problems of States as a result of sanctions imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

The Council shares the observation made by the Secretary-General in paragraph 41 of his report that when such sanctions are imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter, it is important that States confronted with special economic problems have the right to consult the Council regarding such problems, as provided in Article 50 of the Charter. The Council agrees that appropriate consideration should be given to their situation.

The Council notes the Secretary-General’s recommendation that the Council devise a set of measures, involving the financial institutions and other components of the United Nations system, that can be put in place to insulate States from such difficulties.

¹² S/25036.

The Council, while noting that this matter is being considered in other forums of the United Nations, expresses its determination to consider this matter further and invites the Secretary-General to consult the heads of the international financial institutions, other components of the United Nations system and Member States, and to report to the Security Council as early as possible.

The Council intends to continue its work on the Secretary-General's report as indicated in the President's statement of 29 October 1992.

Chapter IX

Decisions in the exercise by the Security Council of its other functions and powers

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council took several decisions in the exercise of functions and powers other than those relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council's practice relating to these decisions has been addressed elsewhere in this Supplement.

The practice of the Council in connection with (a) the appointment of the Secretary-General; (b) the election of members of the International Court of Justice; and (c) the partial termination of a trusteeship agreement is dealt with in chapter VI, "Relations with other United Nations organs". An exchange of letters in September 1990 between the Secretary-General and the President of the Security Council concerning the establishment under the auspices of the General Assembly of an electoral assistance mission to Haiti is also considered in that chapter.

Decisions of the Security Council on the question of the admission of new Members to the United Nations are dealt with in chapter VII.

Introductory note

This chapter deals with the practice of the Security Council in relation to the pacific settlement of disputes within the framework of Articles 33 to 38 (Chapter VI) and Articles 11 and 99 of the Charter.

The period under review was marked by a considerably expanded scope of Council action in this field,¹ which has been attributed both to the improved opportunities for conflict resolution, and the necessity to take action in relation to acute situations resulting from changes to State structures following the end of the cold war period.²

At the Council's summit meeting on 31 January 1992, on the subject of its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security,³ speakers expressed the hope that this new era would present new opportunities for the maintenance of peace and security on a global scale. At the same time, several speakers also highlighted the risks resulting from the break-up and the transformation of several Member States.

In a statement adopted at the conclusion of the summit meeting, the members of the Council reiterated that "all disputes between States should be peacefully resolved in accordance with the provisions of the Charter" and expressed the belief that there were now "new favourable international circumstances" under which the Security Council had begun "to fulfil more effectively its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security".⁴

In his report entitled "An Agenda for Peace" dated 17 June 1992,⁵ which the Secretary-General had been invited to prepare by the Council in the above-mentioned statement, the Secretary-General observed that the Organization's "security arm, once disabled by circumstances it was not created or equipped to control, ha[d] emerged as a central instrument for the prevention and resolution of conflicts and for the preservation of peace".⁶ The Secretary-General further observed that "the present determination in the Security Council to resolve international disputes in the manner foreseen in the Charter ha[d] opened the way for a more active Council role" and that "with greater unity ha[d] come leverage and persuasive power to lead hostile parties towards negotiations".⁷

Responding to that report, the General Assembly, in a resolution adopted on 18 December 1992, encouraged the Security Council "to utilize fully the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter on procedures and methods for peaceful settlements of disputes and to

of achieving international peace and security since the founding of the United Nations", but also recognized that change, however welcome, had "brought new risks for stability and security", noting that "some of the most acute problems result[ed] from changes to State structures".

⁵ S/24111. The full title of the report is "An Agenda for Peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping".

call upon the parties concerned to settle their disputes peacefully”.⁸

As Chapter VIII of this volume sets out a full account of Council proceedings with regard to the pacific settlement of disputes, the present Chapter does not discuss the practice of the Security Council aimed at the peaceful settlement of disputes in a comprehensive manner. It focuses instead on selected material that may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter were interpreted in deliberations and applied in the relevant decisions of the Council.

The manner of presenting and classifying the relevant material has been devised to set forth the practices and procedures to which the Council has had recourse in a readily accessible form. In contrast to earlier volumes of the Repertoire, the material has been categorized under thematic headings rather than individual Articles of the Charter, so as to avoid ascribing to specific Articles of the Charter Council proceedings or decisions which do not themselves refer to any such Article.

Part I illustrates how, under Article 35, Member States and non-member States have brought new disputes and situations to the attention of the Security Council. Also considered are referrals of such situations by the Secretary-General under Article 99 and the General Assembly under Article 11 (3). Part II sets out investigations and fact-finding missions mandated by the Security Council under Article 34, taking into consideration fact-finding missions by the Secretary-General in regard to which the Council expressed its support or of which it took note. Furthermore, this part will look at several instances, and one in particular, in which Member States demanded or suggested to the Council that an investigation be carried out or a fact-finding mission be dispatched. Part III provides an overview of Council recommendations and decisions, under the relevant Articles of the Charter, with regard to the pacific settlement of disputes. Specifically, it will illustrate Council recommendations to the parties to a conflict as well as Council decisions requesting the Secretary-General’s good offices in the pacific settlement of disputes. Finally, part IV will reflect constitutional discussions within the Security Council and in its communications with Member States, on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter.

Article 11, paragraph 3

The General Assembly may call the attention of the Security Council to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security.

Article 33

1. The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice.

2. The Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such means.

Article 34

The Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 35

1. Any Member of the United Nations may bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly.

2. A state which is not a Member of the United Nations may bring to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly any dispute to which it is a party if it accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the present Charter.

⁸ Resolution 47/120 A, section I, para. 3; the General Assembly also encouraged the Secretary-General and the Security Council “to engage at an early stage in close and continuous consultation in order to develop, on a case-by-case basis, an appropriate strategy for the peaceful settlement of specific disputes, including the participation of other organs, organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, as well as regional arrangements and organizations as appropriate” (ibid., para. 4).

3. The proceedings of the General Assembly in respect of matters brought to its attention under this Article will be subject to the provisions of Articles 11 and 12.

Article 36

1. The Security Council may, at any stage of a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 or of a situation of like nature, recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment.

2. The Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted by the parties.

3. In making recommendations under this Article the Security Council should also take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.

Article 37, paragraph 1

Should the parties to a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 fail to settle it by the means indicated in that Article, they shall refer it to the Security Council.

Article 38

Without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 33 to 37, the Security Council may, if all the parties to any dispute so request, make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute.

Article 99

The Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

Part I Referral of disputes and situations to the Security Council

Note

Within the framework of the Charter, Articles 35, 37 (1) and 38 are generally regarded as the provisions on the basis of which States may or, in the case of Article 37 (1), shall refer disputes to the Security Council. During the reporting period, disputes and situations were almost exclusively referred to the Security Council by communications from Member States. While Article 35 was expressly referred to in a small number of communications,⁹ most communications did not cite any specific Article as the basis on which they were submitted.¹⁰

concerning the situation in Nagorny-Karabakh (S/23896); and letter dated 7 December 1992 from the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina, concerning the deteriorating situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (S/24916). See also the verbatim record of the 2861st meeting of the Security Council held on 28 April 1989; at that meeting, the representative of Panama thanked the Council in his opening statement for having agreed to Panama's request for a meeting "to be convened on the basis of Articles 34 and 35" (S/PV.2861, p. 6).

¹⁰ In his report on the work of the Organization for 1990, the Secretary-General expressed the belief that the peacemaking capacity of the United Nations would be considerably strengthened if the Security Council had a peace agenda that was not confined to items formally included in the agenda at the request of Member States, and if it held periodic meetings to survey the political scene and identify points of danger at which preventive and anticipatory diplomacy was required (Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/45/1), p. 7). Similarly, in his annual report for 1989, the Secretary-General had proposed that the Council could meet periodically to

Under Articles 11 (3) and 99 of the Charter, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General may refer matters to the Security Council.¹¹ While during the period under review the General Assembly did not refer any matters to the Security Council under Article 11 (3),¹² the Secretary-General referred matters to the Security Council as provided for under Article 99 in a limited number of instances.

Referrals by States

No dispute or situation was submitted by a State other than a Member of the United Nations under Article 35 (2). In connection with the situation in Cyprus, an issue was raised, however, by the representative of Cyprus with regard to the submission, by a Member State, namely Turkey, of a communication from a non-State entity, namely the “Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus”.¹³ consider the state of international peace and security in different regions at the level of foreign ministers and, when appropriate, in closed session, and that, where international friction appeared likely, the Council could act on its own or request the Secretary-General to exercise his good offices (ibid., Forty-fourth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/44/1), p. 5).

¹¹ In addition, Article 11 (2) provides that the General Assembly shall refer to the Security Council questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security on which action is necessary.

¹² Numerous communications, relating to the situation in the occupied Arab territories, were, however, submitted to the Security Council by a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly — the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. Those communications are listed in chapter VI, part I, “Relations with the General Assembly”. In one such communication, a letter dated 9 February 1989 (S/20455), the Committee supported a request made by Tunisia, on behalf of the Arab Group, for an immediate meeting of the Security Council. The letter was included in the Council’s agenda as a sub-item at the 2845th meeting and further considered at the 2846th, 2847th, 2849th and 2850th meetings.

While most disputes and situations were brought to the attention of the Council by one or more of the parties to such dispute or situation, the internal conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, in Liberia and in Tajikistan were referred to the Council by other Member States.¹⁴ However, the States affected by those conflicts expressly confirmed their agreement to an intervention by the Council. In connection with the situation in Yugoslavia, which was brought to the attention of the Council in September 1991 by letters from several Member States,¹⁵ Yugoslavia, by a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 24 September 1991,¹⁶ expressly welcomed the decision to call a meeting of the Council to consider the situation. In connection with the situation in Liberia, which was brought to the attention of the Council by a letter dated 15 January 1991 from Côte d’Ivoire,¹⁷ the representative of Liberia, at the 2974th meeting on 22 January 1991, not only confirmed Liberia’s agreement to an intervention by the Council, but also expressed regret that such intervention had not occurred earlier. He recalled that his country had been trying for several months to have the Council seized of the situation and deplored the fact that the strict application of the Charter provisions relating to non-interference in the internal affairs of Member States had “hampered the effectiveness of the Council and its principal objective of maintaining international peace and security”.¹⁸ In connection with the situation in Tajikistan,¹⁹ the Government of Tajikistan, by a letter to the President of the Council dated 21 October 1992,²⁰ acknowledged that the efforts by the country's political leadership to settle the conflict by peaceful means had failed, and inter alia expressly requested the dispatch of a "peacemaking mission".

In addition to the above-mentioned internal conflicts, the situation following the intervention by the armed forces of the United States in Panama was also brought to the attention of the Security Council by a third party, namely Nicaragua, which, on 20 December 1989, requested an immediate meeting of the Security Council.²¹ Two communications emanating from different Panamanian authorities on the ground were received by the Secretary-General on the same day.²²

Referrals by the Secretary-General

In connection with the situation in the Middle East, the Secretary-General, by a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 15 August 1989,²³ in which he referred to the exercise of his responsibilities under the Charter, brought to the Council's attention the deterioration of the situation in Lebanon. In response to the Secretary-General's urgent appeal, the Council immediately convened its 2875th meeting to consider the item.

In connection with the situation in Angola, the Secretary-General, by a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 27 October 1992,²⁴ drew the Council's attention to the deteriorating political situation and the rising tension in that country. On the same day, the Council convened its 3126th meeting to consider the item.

In addition to those communications, the Secretary-General, as part of his general reporting obligations, informed the Security Council of relevant developments in matters of which the Council was seized. In his annual reports on the work of the Organization issued during the period under review, the Secretary-General deplored, however, that, owing to insufficient means of information, he was not always in the best position to assess whether and when an issue needed to be brought to the Council's attention.²⁵ In this regard, the members of the Council, in a statement by the President of the Council dated 30 November 1992, in connection with the item entitled "An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping",²⁶ expressed the view that an increased use of fact-finding, in accordance with the Charter and the Declaration adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1991,²⁷ would assist the Secretary-General to execute his responsibilities under Article 99 and facilitate the deliberations of the Council.²⁸

Nature of matters referred to the Security Council

According to Article 35, which, in the absence of evidence pointing to other Charter provisions, is commonly regarded as the basis on which matters are referred to the Security Council by States, any Member State may bring to the Council's attention "any dispute”, or “any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute”. During the reporting period, several new matters were brought to the Council’s attention, which were mostly referred to as “situations”,²⁹ and only rarely as “disputes”.³⁰ In other instances, the subject matter of the relevant communications was referred to by a different term, such as “conflict”³¹ or “incident”,³² or described in narrative form.³³

²⁸ The General Assembly, in a resolution adopted on 18 December 1992, also encouraged the Secretary-General "to continue, in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter of the United Nations, to bring to the attention of the Security Council, at his discretion, any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, together with his recommendation thereon" (resolution 47/120 A, section II, para. 4).

It should also be noted that, while the Charter provisions setting out the basis on which States may bring matters concerning international peace and security to the attention of the Security Council form part of Chapter VI of the Charter, the subject matter of communications submitted to the Council and the type of action requested in relation thereto are not limited by the scope of that Chapter. During the period under review, several communications submitted to the Council explicitly alleged a threat to regional or international peace and security,³⁴ referred to an “invasion”³⁵ or “aggression”,³⁶ or called for action under Chapter VII of the Charter.³⁷ Situations in which the Council did indeed determine the existence of a threat to the peace, a breach of the peace or an aggression are considered in Chapter XI of this volume.

In some instances, Member States challenged the referral of a matter to the Council by rejecting claims that a dispute, or a situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, as required under Article 35, did indeed exist.

internal affairs, Pakistan, by a letter dated 7 April 1989,³⁹ questioned the appropriateness of such meeting and contended that Article 35 had no bearing on the matter. Pakistan maintained that the situation was a purely internal one, in which the Afghan people were resisting the rule of an illegal and unrepresentative regime, and involved neither a dispute between Afghanistan and another country nor a situation that endangered the maintenance of international peace and security.

In several other instances, the referral of a matter to the Council was challenged for similar reasons, but without an express reference to Article 35 of the Charter.⁴⁰ As the arguments advanced in those instances were more closely related to the Council's general competences under Chapter VI of the Charter than the right of Member States to refer a dispute under Article 35, the details of those arguments are set out in part IV of the present chapter, which provides an overview of debates relating to various salient issues raised in the Council's deliberations.

Communications

Disputes and situations were generally submitted to the Council by means of a communication to the President of the Council. In several instances, however, matters were brought to the Council's attention through a communication addressed to the Secretary-General.⁴¹ Those communications either enclosed a document addressed to the Security Council,⁴² called for the convening of a Security Council meeting,⁴³ or contained a request to be circulated as a document of ⁴⁰ In connection with a letter dated 2 February 1990 from the representative of Cuba to the President of the Security Council, concerning the alleged harassment of a Cuban merchant ship by the United States (S/21120), the representative of the United States, at the 2907th meeting, stated, inter alia, that the incident was not "a spat between the United States and Cuba, although the Cuban Government, for reasons that are opaque, trie[d] to make it one" and that "the United States [saw] no reason whatsoever for the Council to consider this routine law-enforcement matter, which in no way threaten[ed] international peace and security" (S/PV.2907, pp. 34 and 37). In connection with a letter dated 25 April 1989 from the representative of Panama to the President of the Security Council (S/20606), alleging a "flagrant intervention in Panama's internal affairs by the United States", the United States contended that Panama had requested the Council meeting for reasons of internal politics only (S/PV.2861, pp. 18-27). In connection with a letter dated 3 January 1990 from the representative of Nicaragua to the President of the Security Council (S/21066), concerning the alleged interference by the United States with the residence of the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Panama, the United States disputed that the incident constituted a potential threat to international peace and security which would "require a formal Council meeting or even Council consideration of this issue" (S/PV.2905, p. 21). In connection with requests that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya fully cooperate with investigations into the terrorist acts against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, at the 3033rd meeting, on 21 January 1992, contended that the Council was not competent to consider the matter, as it was not in the nature of a political dispute (see the letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States to the Secretary-General (S/23306, S/23307, S/23308, S/23309 and S/23317); see also the discussion of this matter in part IV of the present chapter, and the opening statement of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya at the 3033rd meeting (S/PV.3033, pp. 13-15 and 22).

⁴¹ Under rule 6 of the Council's provisional rules of procedure, the Secretary-General is obliged to immediately bring such communications to the attention of all representatives on the Security Council. See letters dated 22 March 1989 from the representative of Afghanistan (S/20545); 23 December 1989 from the representative of Nicaragua (S/21051); 15 August 1990 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/21529); 11 October 1990 from the representative of Tunisia (S/21870); 24 November 1990 from the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/21964); 20 and 23 December 1991 from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States (S/23306, S/23307, S/23308, S/23309 and S/23317); and 19 October 1992 from the representative of Kyrgyzstan (S/24692).

the Security Council⁴⁴ or an express reference to Article 35 (1) of the Charter.⁴⁵

Communications by which new disputes or situations were referred to the Security Council during the period under review are listed in the table below. In addition, the letters dated 27 and 28 November 1989 from the representatives of El Salvador and Nicaragua, respectively, to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁶ have been included in the table, as the matters complained of, while forming part of the broader conflict in Central America, arose after the conclusion of the regional peace agreements by which that conflict was to be brought to an end.⁴⁷ Similarly, a complaint by Afghanistan concerning an alleged military aggression by Pakistan⁴⁸ has also been included in the table, as this matter, which was considered by the Council under the existing agenda item “the situation relating to Afghanistan”,⁴⁹ arose after the conclusion of the Geneva Agreements,⁵⁰ by which Afghanistan and Pakistan had, inter alia, undertaken to conduct their relations “in strict compliance with the principle of non-interference and non-intervention by States in the affairs of other States”.

Communications by which Member States merely conveyed information, but did not request a Council meeting or other specific Council action, have not been included in the table, as such communications cannot be considered referrals under Article 35.

⁴⁹ This item had first been included in the Council’s agenda at its 2828th meeting, on 31 October 1988. Afghanistan’s complaint of 22 March and 3 April 1989 and a letter from the representative of Pakistan dated 7 April 1989 (S/20577) were considered by the Council at the 2852nd and the 2853rd meetings, on 11 and 17 April 1989 respectively.

Part II

Investigation of disputes and fact-finding

Note

Article 34 provides that the Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation that might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuation of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. However, Article 34 does not exclude other organs from performing investigative functions nor does it limit the Council's general competence to obtain knowledge of the relevant facts of any dispute or situation by dispatching a fact-finding mission.⁵¹

The importance of fact-finding for the prevention of conflicts was highlighted by the Security Council in a statement by its President dated 30 November 1992, in connection with the item entitled "An agenda for peace: preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping".⁵² By that statement, the Security Council took note of the Declaration on fact-finding adopted by the General Assembly⁵³ and welcomed the proposals on fact-finding in the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace".⁵⁴ The members of the Council expressed the view "that an increased resort to fact-finding as a tool of preventive diplomacy ... [could] result in the best possible understanding of the objective facts of a situation, which [would] enable the Secretary-General to meet his responsibilities under Article 99 of the Charter and facilitate Security Council deliberations". In the same statement, the Council members stated that they would "facilitate and encourage every appropriate use of fact-finding missions on a case-by-case basis", endorsed the Secretary-General's view "that in some cases a fact-finding mission [could] help defuse a dispute or situation" and noted with satisfaction "the recent greater use of fact-finding missions".⁵⁵

During the reporting period, the Security Council adopted two decisions containing an express request to the Secretary-General to initiate or perform fact-finding or investigative functions. By resolution 780 (1992), the Council requested the Secretary-General to establish an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse evidence of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the ⁵¹ According to the proposals on fact-finding contained in the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace", "formal fact-finding can be mandated by the Security Council or by the General Assembly, either of which may elect to send a mission under its immediate authority or may invite the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps, including the designation of a special envoy" (S/24111, para. 25). According to the Declaration on Fact-finding by the United Nations in the Field of the Maintenance of International Peace and Security adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1991, the Security Council and the General Assembly should give preference to the Secretary-General in fact-finding (General Assembly resolution 46/59, annex, para. 15). The above-mentioned proposals on fact-finding also envisage that "in exceptional circumstances the Council may meet away from Headquarters as the Charter provides, in order not only to inform itself directly, but also to bring the authority of the Organization to bear on a given situation" (S/24111, para. 25).

⁵³ Resolution 46/59, annex (see footnote 51). In the year preceding the reporting period, the importance of fact-finding missions had already been emphasized in the Declaration on the Prevention and Removal of Disputes and Situations Which May Threaten International Peace and Security and on the Role of the United Nations in this Field (General Assembly resolution 43/51, annex, para. 1 (12)).

⁵⁴ According to those proposals, an "increased resort to fact-finding is needed". It is also suggested that "a request by a State for the sending of a United Nations fact-finding mission to its territory should be considered without undue delay" (S/24111, para. 25; see also footnote 51). Calls for improved fact-finding arrangements are also contained in the annual reports of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization (see for example, Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/45/1), p. 7; and ibid., Forty-fourth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/44/1), p. 5).

territory of the former Yugoslavia, and to report to the Council on the conclusions of that Commission.⁵⁶ In connection with the civil conflict in Liberia, and after having been requested, at the 3138th meeting on 19 November 1992, by the representatives of States members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), Liberia and several other interested States, to support ECOWAS efforts to bring peace and stability to the country, the Security Council, by resolution 788 (1992), requested the Secretary-General to dispatch a Special Representative to Liberia to evaluate the situation, and to report to the Council with any recommendations he might wish to make.

In addition to those decisions, the Security Council, in statements by its President, expressly welcomed or supported fact-finding missions dispatched by the Secretary-General to Cambodia, Moldova, Nagorny-Karabakh, Georgia, Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, among others.⁵⁷

Earlier in the reporting period, by resolution 672 (1990), the Council had welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to send a fact-finding mission to the occupied Arab territories, which decision could not be implemented because of the refusal of the occupying Power to receive that mission.⁵⁸

On a number of other occasions, Member States demanded or suggested to the Security Council that an investigation be carried out or a fact-finding mission be dispatched. Those demands and suggestions, none of which resulted in a decision by the Security Council, related to the following:

- In connection with Afghanistan's complaint about Pakistan's aggression against it,⁵⁹ the representative of Afghanistan, at the 2852nd meeting on 11 April 1989, requested that the Security Council send a fact-finding mission, consisting of Council members, to Afghanistan and Pakistan.
- In connection with El Salvador's claim that Nicaragua had committed acts of aggression against it,⁶⁰ the representative of El Salvador, at the 2896th meeting, on 30 November 1989, suggested that the Council send a mission to corroborate the facts in situ.⁶¹
- In connection with allegations made by Nicaragua concerning the actions of the United States against the residence of the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Panama on 29 December 1989,⁶² the representative of Nicaragua, at the 2905th meeting, on 16 January 1990, demanded that an investigation be carried out.⁶³
- In connection with international concerns relating to the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in parts of Iraq,⁶⁴ the representative of Iraq, at the 2982nd meeting on 5 April 1991, stated that the Government of Iraq would welcome "an international mission to be formed by the Secretary-General or the Security Council in Iraq, with full guarantees for free movement and ⁵⁷ By a letter dated 3 August 1989 (S/20769), the President of the Council informed the Secretary-General that the members of the Council agreed to his proposal, contained in a letter dated 2 August 1989 (S/20768), to dispatch a fact-finding mission to Cambodia. By a statement of the President dated 12 May 1992 (S/23904), the Council members welcomed the dispatch by the Secretary-General of a fact-finding mission to Nagorny-Karabakh. By a note by the President dated 10 September 1992, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's intention to send a goodwill mission to Abkhazia (S/24542). By a statement of the President dated 8 October 1992 (S/24637), the Council supported the Secretary-General's decision to send a mission to Georgia. By a statement of the President dated 30 October 1992, the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to send a goodwill mission to Tajikistan and Central Asia (S/24742).

- In connection with requests for the cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya with investigations into the terrorist acts against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989,⁶⁶ the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, at the 3033rd meeting on 21 January 1992, stated that “the international dimension of the alleged events might make an international investigation an appropriate means of starting to resolve the dispute” and that it “would have welcomed a neutral investigation committee”.⁶⁷

The case studies that follow set out the details of the decision-making processes involved in establishing a commission to examine breaches of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia; to dispatch a fact-finding mission to the occupied Arab territories; and summarize the arguments advanced during the debate relating to the request of Afghanistan for the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Case 1

The situation in the former Yugoslavia

Establishment of a Commission of Experts to investigate alleged violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia. In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, ⁶⁵ S/PV.2982, p. 20. The representative of Iraq further stated that he “had expected that the Security Council would wait and find out the true facts from such a mission before making haste — which [had] been its habit in past months”. See also India’s comments in support of a fact-finding mission (S/PV.2982, p. 63).

See also the reports of the Secretary-General dated 11 February and 3 March 1992 (S/23574 and S/23672), submitted pursuant to resolution 731 (1992).

the Security Council, in a statement made by its President at the 3103rd meeting, on 4 August 1992, reaffirmed that all parties were bound to comply with the obligations under international humanitarian law and that persons who committed or ordered the commission of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions were individually responsible in respect of such breaches.

At the 3106th meeting, on 13 August 1992, the Council adopted resolution 771 (1992), by which, inter alia, it called upon States and international humanitarian organizations “to collate substantiated information relating to the violation of international humanitarian law being committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia and to make this information available to the Council” and requested the Secretary-General “to submit a report to the Council summarizing the information and recommending additional measures that might be appropriate in response to the information”.

By a note dated 3 September 1992,⁶⁸ the Secretary-General transmitted to the Council a report on the situation in the territory of the former Yugoslavia submitted by the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights. In his report, the Special Rapporteur had noted “an urgent need to establish an investigative commission, under the auspices and in cooperation with the competent United Nations bodies, vested with the task of determining the fate of the thousands of persons who disappeared after the seizure of Vukovar as well as of other persons who disappeared during the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia”.⁶⁹ The Special Rapporteur emphasized that “the need to prosecute those responsible for mass and flagrant human rights violations and for breaches of international humanitarian law and to deter future violators require[d] the systematic collection of documentation on such crimes and of personal data concerning those responsible”.⁷⁰ Accordingly, the report contained a recommendation for the establishment of a commission to assess and further investigate specific cases in which prosecution might be warranted.⁷¹

At the 3119th meeting, on 6 October 1992, several speakers expressed strong support for the establishment of such commission on an urgent basis. The President of the Council, speaking in his capacity as the representative of France, believed that it was indeed “very important that the Council send a clear warning to the perpetrators of those violations, who must understand that their personal responsibility is involved”, adding that the decision to establish an investigative commission would be “part of the prospective creation by the appropriate bodies of an international penal jurisdiction to rule on such acts”.⁷² In a similar vein, the representative of Belgium noted that the establishment of the commission would make “more operational the principle contained in the Geneva Conventions regarding the personal responsibility of war criminals”.⁷³ The representative of the Russian Federation, expressing the hope that such commission would, “on the basis of carefully substantiated information, give the true picture of the violations of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law taking place on the territory of the former Yugoslavia”, stated that the decision to establish such commission would go beyond the settlement of the Yugoslav question insofar as it would also be a warning to all who violated the norms of international humanitarian law in other spheres of conflict.⁷⁴ The representative of Venezuela believed that “the decision to establish a commission of experts to investigate ... violations of international humanitarian law would be inspired by the commission that was set up in 1943 for similar purposes and later served as the basis for the proceedings of the Nuremberg tribunal”, which, in the words of the representative of Venezuela, “would not only serve to establish responsibility and punish the guilty, but would also ... constitute an important deterrent”.⁷⁵

At the same meeting, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 780 (1992),⁷⁶ by which it requested the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse the information submitted to it together with such further information as the Commission might obtain through its own investigations and efforts.⁷⁷

At the 3137th meeting, on 16 November 1992, the Council adopted resolution 787 (1992), by which it welcomed the establishment of the Commission of Experts and requested that Commission to pursue actively its investigations with regard to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia, in particular the practice of “ethnic cleansing”.

The situation in the occupied Arab territories

Proposed investigative mission to the occupied Arab territories. At the 2926th meeting, on 31 May 1990, in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the Council considered a draft resolution envisaging the establishment of a commission consisting of three Council members, which would be dispatched to the Palestinian territory “to examine the situation relating to the policies and practices of Israel” in that territory.⁷⁸ The draft resolution, which had been proposed by several Council members, was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member.⁷⁹

On 8 October 1990, after violence had erupted in the Old City of Jerusalem and resulted in the death of more than 20 Palestinians, the Permanent Observer of Palestine, at the 2946th meeting, recalled the proposal contained in the above-mentioned draft resolution and, in the light of the above tragic events, demanded the “immediate dispatch of a commission by the Council to investigate what happened in Jerusalem”.⁸⁰ At the 2947th meeting, held on the following day, several ⁷⁷ Prior to the adoption of resolution 780 (1992), the Council had requested the submission of such information by resolution 771 (1992).

⁷⁸ The commission would have been requested to submit a report containing recommendations on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation.

⁷⁹ S/21326, submitted by Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Ethiopia, Malaysia, Yemen and Zaire. A draft resolution containing almost identical provisions was submitted on 9 October 1990 but was not put to the vote (S/21851).

⁸⁰ S/PV.2946, pp. 10-11.

speakers supported the Palestinian call for an investigation or a fact-finding mission.⁸¹

At the 2948th meeting, on 12 October 1990, the Council, having been informed by the Secretary-General of his decision to send a mission to the region, considered a draft resolution by which it would welcome that decision.⁸² The President stated that the Secretary-General, in the informal consultations of the members of the Council leading up to the consideration of the draft resolution, had explained “that the purpose of the mission ... would be to look into the circumstances surrounding the recent tragic events in Jerusalem and other similar developments in the occupied territories, and to submit ... a report containing findings and recommendations to the Council on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation.”⁸³ Following the statement by the President, the draft resolution was put to the vote and adopted unanimously as resolution 672 (1990).

Having learned of Israel’s refusal to receive the proposed mission of the Secretary-General,⁸⁴ the Council convened on 24 October 1990 to continue its consideration of the situation, at its 2949th meeting. At that meeting, the representative of Israel explained that Israel had expressed its readiness to assist the Secretary-General in the preparation of a report on the relevant events, but emphasized that Israel, like any other sovereign State, was the exclusive authority in the territory under its control. The representative noted that Israel had appointed its own “independent commission of inquiry consisting of three prominent figures”, which commission would shortly “present its findings and conclusions of the chain of events, their causes and the actions of Israel’s security forces”.⁸⁵

Many speakers expressed regret at Israel’s refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General and stressed that Israel was under an obligation to comply with resolution 672 (1990).⁸⁶ It was also noted that Israel’s sensitivities had been taken into account in the Council’s approach to this matter and that in resolution 672 (1990), instead of calling for the establishment of a Council mission to investigate the incident, the Council had discreetly welcomed the Secretary-General’s decision to send a mission to the region.⁸⁷ Following further deliberations, the Security Council, on 24 October 1990, unanimously adopted resolution 673 (1990),⁸⁸ by which it deplored Israel’s refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General to the region; urged the Israel Government to reconsider its decision; and insisted that it comply fully with resolution 672 (1990) and permit the mission to proceed in keeping with its purpose.

In his report to the Security Council dated 31 October 1990, the Secretary-General noted that, owing to Israel’s refusal to receive his mission, he had been unable to secure independent information, on the spot, about the circumstances surrounding the recent events in Jerusalem and similar developments in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.⁸⁹

The report was discussed at the 2953rd meeting, on 7 November 1990, at which several speakers denounced Israel’s rejection of the above-mentioned resolutions. The representative of Israel stated, however, that Israel had the sole responsibility for the occupied territories and that it would “reject any encroachment on its sovereignty and authority”. The representative believed that the proposed mission was “not intended to ascertain facts [but was] rather a transparent attempt to encroach on Israel’s sovereignty”.⁹⁰

On 20 December 1990, the Council adopted resolution 681 (1990) in which it requested the Secretary-General to monitor and observe the situation regarding Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, to utilize and designate or draw upon

United Nations and other personnel and resources, and to keep the Council regularly informed.⁹¹

The situation relating to Afghanistan

Request for the dispatch of a fact-finding mission to Afghanistan and Pakistan. At the 2852nd to 2860th meetings, from 11 to 26 April 1989, the Council considered the situation relating to Afghanistan, having received a communication from Afghanistan alleging a military aggression by Pakistan.⁹²

The representative of Afghanistan, referring to the “dangerous implications of the aggression by Pakistan for peace and security in the region and in the world”, explained that his country was turning to the Security Council “on the basis of the obligations of the Security Council stemming from Articles 34 and 35 of the Charter” and requested that the Security Council send a fact-finding mission, consisting of Council members, to Afghanistan and Pakistan.⁹³

The representative of Pakistan stated that Articles 34 and 35 had no bearing on the current situation inside Afghanistan, as that situation in no way endangered peace and security as defined in Article 34, but rather represented the continuing “struggle of the Afghan people to overthrow an illegal and unrepresentative regime ... imposed on them by external military intervention”.⁹⁴ Many speakers agreed that Articles 34 and 35 were not applicable⁹⁵ and expressed the view that the conflict in Afghanistan had to be seen as a legitimate struggle for self-determination.⁹⁶ Several speakers also noted that a mechanism established under the Geneva Agreements, the United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan, had already repeatedly been called upon to undertake investigations, and that, therefore, no further investigative mechanism or procedure was required.⁹⁷

In contrast, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics contended that Afghanistan’s recourse to the Council was “entirely right, proper and timely”, as Afghanistan was suffering from outside interference by Pakistan.⁹⁸ This view was shared by several other speakers.⁹⁹

The Security Council concluded its consideration of the item at the 2860th meeting, on 26 April 1989, without adopting a decision.

⁹¹ In a statement adopted on 4 January 1991 (S/22046), the President of the Council expressed the support of Council members for the work of the Secretary-General in implementing resolution 681 (1990). The Secretary-General dispatched his Personal Representative to the area from 1 to 11 March 1991. The discussions held with Palestinians and Israeli officials during this period are summarized in a report to the Security Council dated 9 April 1991 (S/22472).

Part III

Decisions of the Security Council concerning the pacific settlement of disputes

Note

Chapter VI of the Charter contains various provisions according to which the Council may make recommendations to the parties to a dispute or situation. According to Article 33 (2) of the Charter, the Council may call on the parties to settle their dispute by such peaceful means as provided for in Article 33 (1). According to Article 36 (1) the Council may recommend appropriate methods or procedures of adjustment. Article 37 (2) envisages that the Council may recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate, and Article 38 provides that it may make recommendations to the parties with a view to a pacific settlement of the dispute.

As part of its efforts aimed at the peaceful settlement of conflicts within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter, the Council frequently endorsed or supported peace agreements concluded by the parties to a conflict, or recommended various methods or procedures of settlement, such as bilateral or multilateral negotiations,¹⁰⁰ mediation or conciliation efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General,¹⁰¹ or resorted to regional arrangements.¹⁰² In one instance, in connection with the situation in Cambodia, the five permanent members of the Council took the initiative of proposing concrete terms of settlement in an effort to resolve the conflict.¹⁰³

Relevant appeals and recommendations were addressed not only to States but also, in several instances, to non-State actors. This was the case, for instance, in the internal conflicts in Cambodia, Cyprus, El Salvador, Lebanon, Liberia, Somalia, Tajikistan and the former Yugoslavia, in which the Council either specifically called on the relevant factions or communities involved in the conflict or, in a more general fashion, called on all parties to the conflict.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰⁰ See for example, in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, resolution 660 (1990), by which the Council condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and called upon both countries “to begin immediately intensive negotiations for the resolution of their differences”. (Resolution 660 (1990) was adopted expressly under Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter. However, insofar as negotiations, for the purpose of the resolution, are deemed to be “provisional measures” within the meaning of Article 40, they cannot be distinguished from the parties’ efforts, required under Article 33 (1), to find a solution by peaceful means.) See also for example resolution 765 (1992), by which the Council urged all parties to the conflict in South Africa to cooperate in the resumption of the negotiation process. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan, see the statement of the President of the Security Council dated 30 October 1992 (S/24742), by which the members of the Council urged “the Government of Tajikistan, local authorities, party leaders and other groups concerned to enter into a political dialogue with a view to reaching an overall settlement of the conflict by peaceful means”.

¹⁰¹ See, for instance, in connection with the situation in Cyprus, resolution 649 (1990), by which the Council called on the leaders of the two communities to cooperate with the Secretary-General in completing an outline of an overall agreement.

the parties to cooperate with the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to restore peace. In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council, by resolutions 749 (1992), 752 (1992) and 764 (1992), called on the parties to cooperate with the efforts of the European Union to bring about a negotiated political solution. In connection with the situation in Nagorny-Karabakh, the members of the Council, by presidential statements of 26 August 1992 (S/24493) and 27 October 1992 (S/24721), appealed to the parties to cooperate with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe with a view to reaching a peaceful settlement of their disputes.

¹⁰⁴ In connection with the situation in Cyprus, the Security Council, by resolution 649 (1990), called upon the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus to pursue negotiations to reach an overall framework agreement on Cyprus. In connection with the situation in El Salvador, the Council, by resolutions 693 (1991) and 714 (1991), called on both the Government of El Salvador and FMLN to pursue constructive negotiations. In connection with the situation in Yugoslavia, the Council, by resolutions 740 (1992) and 743 (1992), called on all Yugoslav parties to cooperate with the Conference on Yugoslavia. By resolution 749 (1992), the Council called on all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina to cooperate with the efforts of the European Community, and, by resolution 757 (1992), called on the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to resume their discussions on constitutional arrangements. In connection with the situation in Tajikistan, the members of the Council, in a statement by its President dated 30 October 1992 (S/24742), urged the Government of Tajikistan, local authorities, party leaders and other groups concerned to enter into a political dialogue. In connection with the situation in Lebanon, the members of the Council, in statements by the President dated 31 March 1989 (S/20554) and 15 August 1989 (S/20790), called on all

This part of the chapter will aim to provide an overview of the Council's practice in relation to the peaceful settlement of disputes by setting out examples of the most relevant decisions adopted by the Council during the period under review. As it is not always possible to ascertain the concrete basis within the framework of the Charter on which individual Council decisions have been made, the overview sets out relevant decisions in a systematic order, without ascribing them to specific Articles of the Charter.

A. Recommendations relating to terms, methods or procedures of settlement

Set out below are instances in which the Security Council proposed or endorsed terms of settlement, or recommended methods or procedures of settlement.

By resolution 696 (1991), the Council welcomed the decision of the Government of Angola and the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola to conclude the Peace Accords for Angola.

With regard to the situation in Cambodia, following a meeting of their respective Governments in Paris on 27 and 28 August 1990, the permanent members of the Council transmitted to the Secretary-General, by a letter dated 30 August 1990,¹⁰⁵ a framework document defining "the key elements of a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict based on an enhanced United Nations role". After the Cambodian parties had indicated their parties to observe a ceasefire. In a statement by the President dated 27 December 1989 (S/21056), the members of the Council called on the Lebanese people, and in particular all Government officials, civilian and military, to support their President and the constitutional process initiated at Taif. In connection with the situation in Liberia, the members of the Council, in a statement by the President dated 22 January 1991 (S/22133), called on all parties to the conflict to cooperate with ECOWAS, and, by resolution 788 (1992), the Council called on them to respect and implement the various agreements to which they had agreed. By resolution 668 (1990), the Council urged all parties to the conflict in Cambodia to exercise self-restraint. By resolution 733 (1992), the Council urged all parties to the conflict in Somalia to promote a political settlement in Somalia, and by resolution 751 (1992) it called upon all parties, movements and factions in Somalia immediately to maintain a ceasefire.

acceptance of this framework for settlement,¹⁰⁶ the Council, by resolution 668 (1990), endorsed the framework and welcomed its acceptance by the parties. By resolution 718 (1991), the Council expressed its full support for the "comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict, signed in Paris on 23 October 1991".¹⁰⁷

In connection with peace efforts in Central America, the Council, by resolution 637 (1989), expressed its support for the Guatemala Agreement¹⁰⁸ and the Joint Declaration of the Central American Presidents,¹⁰⁹ and called upon the Presidents to continue their efforts to achieve a firm and lasting peace in Central America through the implementation of the commitments entered into in the Guatemala agreement and in the expressions of good will contained in the Joint Declaration.

By resolution 693 (1991), the Council welcomed the Mexico Agreement signed by the Government of El Salvador and the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) on 27 April 1991, and called upon both parties to pursue negotiations "urgently and with flexibility, in a concentrated format on the items agreed upon in the Caracas Agenda, in order to reach, as a matter of priority, a political agreement on the armed forces and the accords necessary for the cessation of the armed confrontation". By the same resolution, the Council called upon the parties "to pursue a continuous process of negotiations in order to reach at the earliest possible date the objectives set forth in the Mexico Agreements of 27 April 1991 and all other objectives contained in the Geneva Agreement of 4 April 1990, and to this end to cooperate fully with the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative in their efforts”.

By resolution 714 (1991), the Council welcomed the New York Agreement of 25 September 1991, by which the parties had agreed on guarantees and conditions on which to reach a peaceful settlement, including provisions permitting the reintegration of FMLN members into the civil, institutional and political life of the country. By the same resolution, the Council urged the parties to proceed, at the next round of negotiations, “at an intensive and sustained pace to reach at the earliest possible date a ceasefire and a peaceful settlement to the armed conflict in accordance with the framework of the New York Agreement”.

In connection with the situation in Cyprus, the Council, by resolution 649 (1990), called upon the leaders of the two communities to pursue efforts to reach freely a mutually acceptable agreement and “to cooperate, on an equal footing, with the Secretary-General in completing, in the first instance and on an urgent basis, an outline of an overall agreement, as agreed in June 1989”.¹¹⁰

Following the submission, on 21 August 1992, of the Secretary-General’s report on the outcome of his mission of good offices in Cyprus,¹¹¹ the Council, by resolution 774 (1992), urged the parties to pursue uninterrupted negotiations at United Nations Headquarters until an overall framework agreement was reached on the basis of the set of ideas reflected in the Secretary-General’s report of 3 April 1992.¹¹²

By resolution 750 (1992), the Council endorsed the set of ideas reflected in the Secretary-General’s report of 8 October 1991 as an appropriate basis for reaching an overall agreement, being brought to a conclusion as an integrated package mutually agreed upon by both communities.¹¹³

With regard to the situation in former Yugoslavia, the Council, by resolution 713 (1991), called on all parties to the conflict to settle their disputes “through negotiation at the Conference on Yugoslavia, including through the mechanisms set forth within it”.¹¹⁴

Following the serious deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council, by resolution 752 (1992), urged the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to participate “actively and constructively” and “on a continuous basis” in the tripartite talks on constitutional arrangements under the auspices of the Conference on Yugoslavia and “to conclude and implement the arrangements being developed at those talks”.

In a statement by the President dated 2 September 1992,¹¹⁵ the Council members expressed their full support for the Statement of Principles adopted and the other agreements reached at the London stage of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, held on 26 and 27 August 1992, and noted with satisfaction that the Conference held in London had established the framework within which an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia in all its aspects could be achieved through a continuous and uninterrupted effort.¹¹⁶

By resolution 779 (1992), the Council welcomed the Joint Declaration signed at Geneva on 30 September 1992 by the Presidents of Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), which, inter alia, reaffirmed the demilitarization of the Prevlaka peninsula, and endorsed the principles agreed by the Presidents that all statements or commitments made under duress, particularly those relating to land and property, were wholly null and void and that all displaced persons had the right to return in peace to their former homes.

By resolution 787 (1992), the Council appealed to the parties to continue negotiations for constitutional arrangements on the basis of the draft outline constitution for Bosnia and Herzegovina under the auspices of the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on the ¹¹⁰ This appeal was reiterated in a statement by the President of the Council dated 19 July 1990 (S/21400).

¹¹⁴ The appeal to the parties to cooperate with the Conference was repeated in resolutions 740 (1992), 743 (1992), 752 (1992), 762 (1992), 764 (1992) and 787 (1992), and in a statement by the President of the Council dated 2 September 1992 (S/24510).

former Yugoslavia, these negotiations to be held in continuous and uninterrupted session.

In connection with the situation in Georgia, in a statement of the President dated 10 September 1992, the Council members welcomed the principles of settlement relating to Abkhazia contained in the Final Document of the Moscow meeting of 3 September 1992 between the Russian Federation and Georgia, which affirmed the territorial integrity of Georgia, provided for the establishment of a ceasefire and constituted the basis for an overall political settlement.¹¹⁷

With regard to Lebanon, in a statement by the President dated 22 November 1989,¹¹⁸ and in several subsequent statements,¹¹⁹ the Council members reaffirmed their support for the Taif Agreement ratified by the Lebanese Parliament on 5 November 1989 as the only basis for guaranteeing the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon.

In a statement by the President dated 7 May 1992 in connection with the situation in Liberia,¹²⁰ the members of the Council expressed the belief that the Yamoussoukro Accord of 30 October 1991 offered the best possible framework for a peaceful resolution of the Liberian conflict by creating the necessary conditions for free and fair elections in Liberia. By resolution 788 (1992), the Council reaffirmed this position and called on the parties to respect and implement the various agreements to which they had agreed within the framework of the peace process.

With regard to Mozambique, the Council welcomed, by resolution 782 (1992), the signature, on 4 October 1992 in Rome, of a General Peace Agreement¹²¹ between the Government of

Mozambique and the Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (RENAMO).¹²²

In connection with the situation in Namibia, the Council, by resolution 628 (1989), welcomed the signature of the agreement between Angola, Cuba and South Africa on the one hand, and the agreement between Angola and Cuba on the other hand, both of which had been signed on 22 December 1988, and expressed its full support for those agreements.

With regard to the situation concerning Western Sahara, the Council approved, by resolution 658 (1990), the report of the Secretary-General dated 18 June 1990,¹²³ which contains the full text of the settlement proposals accepted by the parties on 30 August 1988 as well as an outline of the plan provided by the Secretary-General to implement those proposals.

B. Decisions involving the Secretary-General in the Council's efforts at the peaceful settlement of disputes

While Article 99 of the Charter provides that the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, the Charter does not otherwise describe or define the role of the Secretary-General in relation to matters of peace and security.

However, the Council's efforts aimed at the peaceful settlement of disputes frequently require the involvement of the Secretary-General, who, in coordination with the Council or at its request, facilitates peace efforts in various ways. This was reconfirmed in a statement by the President of the Council, adopted at the summit meeting held on 31 January 1992 in connection with the item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security",¹²⁴ by which the members of the Council emphasized that the Secretary-General had a crucial role to play in promoting international peace and security.¹²⁵

During the period under review, the Council frequently called on the parties to a dispute or situation to cooperate in negotiations held under the auspices of the Secretary-General, expressed support for conciliation efforts undertaken by the Secretary-General or expressly requested the Secretary-General to assume an active role in the process of achieving a political settlement.

Decisions calling on conflicting parties to cooperate with the Secretary-General's efforts have been set out above. The following overview sets out examples of decisions by which the Security Council specifically requested or welcomed the Secretary-General's endeavours in this area.

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the situation in Central America, dated 26 June 1989,¹²⁶ which provided details of the progress achieved by the Central American Governments and the role of the Secretary-General in the process, the Council, by resolution 637 (1989), expressed its full support to the Secretary-General to continue his mission of good offices, in consultation with the Council. The Council reconfirmed its support in subsequent resolutions.¹²⁷

Following the consideration of reports of the Secretary-General dated 21 December 1990 and 16 April 1991,¹²⁸ in which the Secretary-General had provided an account of his efforts to promote the achievement of a negotiated political situation to the conflict in El Salvador, the Council, by resolution 693 (1991), inter alia, commended the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative for their efforts at good offices and expressed its full support for their continuing efforts to facilitate a peaceful settlement to the conflict in El Salvador.

By resolution 714 (1991), the Council congratulated the Secretary-General and his Personal Representative for Central America for their skilful and tireless efforts which had been vital to the peace process. By resolution 729 (1992), the Council reaffirmed its support for the Secretary-General's continuing mission of good offices with regard to the Central American peace process.

The Secretary-General continued his mission of good offices in Cyprus on the basis of Security Council authorization, renewed every six months.¹²⁹

In a statement by the President dated 9 June 1989,¹³⁰ the members of the Council welcomed and reaffirmed their support for the direct talks launched in August 1988 under the auspices of the Secretary-General in the context of his mission of good offices in Cyprus, and called on the parties to cooperate with the Special Representative of the Secretary-General to achieve a negotiated, just and lasting settlement.

After a meeting between the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus, held from 26 February to 2 March 1990, had not resulted in any progress,¹³¹ the Council, by resolution 649 (1990), called upon those leaders to cooperate, on an equal footing, with the Secretary-General in completing, in the first instance and on an urgent basis, an outline of an overall agreement, and expressed its full support for the "effort of the Secretary-General in carrying out his mission of good offices concerning Cyprus".¹³²

After a set of ideas had emerged in talks held in 1991 between the leaders of the two communities in Cyprus and the representatives of the Secretary-General, the Council, in a statement made by its ¹²⁵ The General Assembly, by a resolution adopted on 18 December 1992, also encouraged the Secretary-General and the Security Council "to engage at an early stage in close and continuous consultation in order to develop, on a case-by-case basis, an appropriate strategy for the peaceful settlement of specific disputes, including the participation of other organs, organizations and agencies of the United Nations system, as well as regional arrangements and organizations as appropriate" (resolution 47/120 A, section I, para. 4).

¹³¹ See the report of the Secretary-General dated 3 April 1990 (S/23780, para. 3).

President on 13 July 1992,¹³³ endorsed the Secretary-General's intention to invite the two leaders to a joint meeting as soon as the two sides "were in agreement range on the set of ideas".

Following the submission, on 21 August 1992, of the Secretary-General's report on the outcome of his mission of good offices in Cyprus,¹³⁴ the Council, by resolution 774 (1992), reaffirmed its position, previously expressed in resolution 716 (1991), that a high-level international meeting, convened and chaired by the Secretary-General, in which the two communities and Greece and Turkey would participate, represented an effective mechanism for concluding an overall framework mechanism on Cyprus.

With regard to the situation in Cambodia, the Secretary-General informed the Council members, by a letter dated 2 August 1989 addressed to the President of the Security Council,¹³⁵ that he had attended the Conference on Cambodia convened in Paris on 30 July 1989 at the initiative of the Government of France, at which time he had expressed the view that peace in Cambodia could be achieved only in the framework of a comprehensive political settlement. By a letter dated 30 August 1990,¹³⁶ the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council transmitted to the Secretary-General a joint statement which, together with an appended framework document, defined the key elements of a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodia conflict.¹³⁷ That framework was accepted by the parties at an informal meeting held at Jakarta on 10 September 1990,¹³⁸ and endorsed by the Security Council in resolution 668 (1990), adopted on 20 September 1990.

In connection with the situation concerning Western Sahara, the Council, by resolution 658 (1990), expressed its full support for the Secretary-General in his mission of good offices and approved his report¹³⁹ containing the full text of the settlement proposals accepted by the parties on 30 August 1988, as well as an outline of his plan to implement those proposals.

By resolutions 690 (1991) and 725 (1991), the Council expressed its full support for the efforts of the Secretary-General for the organization and supervision of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.

With regard to the former Yugoslavia, the Council, by resolution 713 (1991), invited the Secretary-General to offer his assistance in relation to the collective efforts for peace and dialogue in Yugoslavia undertaken under the auspices of the States members of the European Union.

By resolution 765 (1992), the Council invited the Secretary-General to appoint a Special Representative for South Africa in order to recommend, after discussions with the parties, measures which would assist in bringing an effective end to the violence and in creating conditions for negotiations leading towards a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and united South Africa.

On 23 January 1992, by resolution 733 (1992), the Council requested the Secretary-General to assist in the process of a political settlement in Somalia.¹⁴⁰ Following a meeting of the Secretary-General with leaders of the Somali factions at a conference of national reconciliation and unity held in New York from 12 to 14 February 1992,¹⁴¹ and after further international negotiations conducted in Somalia from 29 February to 3 March 1992, a ceasefire agreement was secured.

By resolution 751 (1992), the Council requested the Secretary-General to facilitate the maintenance of a ceasefire throughout the country and to continue his consultations with all Somali parties, movements and factions towards the convening of a conference for national reconciliation and unity in Somalia. By the same resolution, the Council decided to establish a United Nations Operation in Somalia to support the Secretary-General's efforts.

With regard to the situation in Georgia, the members of the Council took note, in a statement by the President dated 10 September 1992,¹⁴² of the intention of the Secretary-General to send a goodwill mission and requested him to inform the Council periodically of the developments in Abkhazia.

In connection with alleged terrorist acts by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council requested the Secretary-General, by resolution 731 (1992), to seek the full cooperation of the Libyan Government with investigations into the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989.¹⁴³

On 25 January 1992, following consultations with the Libyan authorities, the Secretary-General, through a Special Envoy, sent a personal message to the Libyan leader, in which he expressed the hope that the matter could be resolved quickly, but emphasized that he was acting under the terms of resolution 731 (1992) and not as a mediator between the Security Council and the Libyan authorities.¹⁴⁴

With regard to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait,¹⁴⁵ several days after the Council had demanded Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait by resolution 660 (1990) and imposed a general trade embargo against Iraq by resolution 661 (1990), it adopted, on 18 August 1990, resolution 664 (1990) by which it welcomed the efforts of the Secretary-General to pursue urgent negotiations with the Government of Iraq, following the concern and anxiety expressed by the members of the Council on 17 August 1990.

By resolution 670 (1990), the Council welcomed the Secretary-General's use of his good offices to advance a peaceful resolution based on the relevant resolutions of the Council and noting with appreciation his continuing efforts to this end. The Council later stated, in resolution 674 (1990) that it reposed its trust in the Secretary-General to make available his good offices and, as he considered appropriate, to pursue them and to undertake diplomatic efforts in order to reach a peaceful solution to the crisis caused by the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait, on the basis of resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990).

¹⁴⁵ While the use of the Secretary-General's good offices is not typically associated with situations in which enforcement measures under Chapter VII of the Charter have become necessary, efforts to employ such good offices may sometimes be undertaken in parallel with the imposition of enforcement measures. As mediation and good offices are instruments typically undertaken within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter, the decisions mentioned here have been included in spite of the fact that they were adopted, in whole or in part, under Chapter VII of the Charter.

Part IV

Constitutional discussion bearing on the interpretation or application of the provisions of Chapter VI of the Charter

Note

This part of the chapter highlights the most important arguments raised in Council deliberations with regard to the interpretation of specific provisions of the Charter concerning the Council's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes. This includes in particular discussions concerning the competence of the Council to consider a dispute or situation and its power to make appropriate recommendations within the framework of Chapter VI of the Charter.

In accordance with the relevant provisions of Chapter VI, the Council shall, when it deems necessary, make recommendations in relation to disputes or situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security. Accordingly, this part will focus on discussions concerning the existence of a dispute or situation within the meaning of Chapter VI of the Charter.

When making recommendations to the parties, the Security Council is also required, pursuant to Article 36 of the Charter, to take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted between the parties, and the general rule that disputes of a legal nature should be referred to the International Court of Justice. Instances in which the requirements stipulated by Article 36 (2) and (3) became the subject of deliberations will, therefore, also be considered below.

Since the referral of a situation or dispute to the Council was challenged on the basis of distinct arguments, some situations are considered under several sub-headings.

Questions regarding the existence of a dispute

In the following instances, the referral of a situation to the Council by a Member State was challenged on the basis of an assertion that the incident in question did not constitute a dispute.¹⁴⁶

¹⁴⁶ Instances in which the existence of a dispute was denied

During the Council's deliberations at the 2835th meeting on 5 January 1989, in connection with the downing of two Libyan reconnaissance aircraft by the United States,¹⁴⁷ the United States denied that the incident was part of or related to any differences between the two countries and maintained that its aircraft had acted in self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter.¹⁴⁸

A draft resolution, submitted by several countries at the 2841st meeting, on 11 January 1989, was voted upon but was not adopted. By that draft resolution, the Council would have deplored the downing of the two Libyan aircraft; and called upon the parties to resolve their differences by peaceful means and to cooperate with the Secretary-General in an effort to bring about a peaceful settlement of the differences existing between them.¹⁴⁹

In connection with a letter dated 2 February 1990, from the representative of Cuba to the President of the Security Council,¹⁵⁰ concerning the alleged harassment of a Cuban merchant ship by the United States, the representative of the United States, at the 2907th meeting on 9 February 1990, maintained that the incident was not "a spat between the United States and Cuba", but a "routine drug-interdiction case", which was an "entirely routine and normal law-enforcement procedure on the high seas" and "in accordance with on the grounds that an incident or conflict did not involve any other State, but was essentially an internal matter, are considered in chapter XII.

¹⁴⁷ The incident was brought to the Council's attention by letters dated 4 January 1989 from the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Bahrain to the President of the Security Council (S/20364 and S/20367). Those letters, which describe the incident as an aggression, were considered at the 2835th, 2836th, 2839th, 2840th and 2841st meetings of the Council. For a more comprehensive treatment of this matter, see chapter VIII, section 3.

customary international law and practice”. Accordingly, the United States believed that such a matter did not merit Security Council consideration.¹⁵¹

Assertion that international peace and security are not endangered

In several instances, Member States, by asserting that a dispute or situation did not pose a threat to international peace and security, also challenged the Council’s general competence, under Chapter VI, to consider certain matters or make recommendations in relation thereto. Such instances may therefore be illustrated in this section even though the expression “threat to the peace” usually indicates the consideration of a situation before the Council under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In connection with a letter dated 3 January 1990 from the representative of Nicaragua to the President of the Council,¹⁵² concerning the alleged interference by the United States with the residence of the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Panama, the representative of Nicaragua, at the 2905th meeting on 17 January 1990, explained that Nicaragua had requested the Council to meet in order to obtain a resolution by which the Council would denounce that action, which he described as “a provocation designed to obtain an equivalent response — which would result in the unleashing of even broader actions against Nicaragua, with a serious threat to international peace and security”.¹⁵³

In response, the United States contended that no formal Council meeting or even Council consideration was required, as the incident did not constitute an actual or a potential threat to international peace and security, and as clear remedies for dealing with such incident already existed.¹⁵⁴ In a similar vein, the United Kingdom stated that, in its view, the matter did not constitute a threat to international peace and security or provide any basis for a Council resolution under Chapter VI of the Charter.¹⁵⁵

A draft resolution submitted by several Member States, in which the Council would have expressed its concern about the incident, was voted upon but was not adopted.¹⁵⁶

The representatives of Canada and Finland, the only other speakers in the debate, explained that they had voted for the draft resolution as the incident in question constituted a violation of general principles of international law. The representative of Finland noted, however, that he continued to have difficulty in accepting that the subject matter of the draft fell within the competence of the Security Council as defined in the Charter, as it was “not of such a character as to present a threat to international peace and security”.¹⁵⁷

In connection with alleged terrorist acts by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989, the Security Council, at its 3033rd meeting, on 21 January 1992, considered letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States to the Secretary-General, alleging the involvement of Libyan Government officials in those incidents.¹⁵⁸ The Council also considered a draft resolution proposed by the three countries, in which the Council would have condemned the destruction of the two aircraft and urged the Libyan Government to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts.¹⁵⁹

During the Council’s deliberations on the draft resolution, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya asserted that the matter was not a dispute of a political nature within the meaning of Chapter VI of the Charter, as the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had never threatened any country and could not “behave in such a way as to endanger peace and security”.¹⁶⁰

This view was not shared, however, by the sponsors of the draft resolution, who believed that the situation did constitute a threat to international peace and security.¹⁶¹ Other speakers, some of whom characterized international terrorism as a threat to international peace and security, also expressed clear support for the draft resolution,¹⁶² which was subsequently adopted as resolution 731 (1992).

The legal nature of disputes, in the light of Article 36 (3) of the Charter

Article 36 (3) of the Charter provides that the Security Council, in making recommendations under Article 36, should take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.¹⁶³

¹⁶¹ See in particular S/PV.3033, p. 79 (United States); p. 82 (France); and p. 103 (United Kingdom); and S/PV.3063, p. 67 (United States); pp. 68-69 (United Kingdom); and p. 73 (France).

¹⁶³ In his report entitled "An Agenda for peace", the Secretary-General stated that "greater reliance on the Court would be an important contribution to United Nations peacemaking" and called attention to the power of the Security Council under Articles 36 and 37 of the Charter to recommend to Member States the submission of a dispute to the International Court of Justice, arbitration or other dispute-settlement mechanism (S/24111, para. 38). Similar recommendations are contained in the Secretary-General's reports on the work of the Organization (see for example Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-fourth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/44/1), p. 6; ibid., Forty-fifth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/45/1), p. 7; and ibid., Forty-sixth Session, Supplement No. 1 (A/46/1), p. 4.). In addition to recommending greater recourse to the International Court of Justice in adjudicating disputes of a legal nature, the Secretary-General proposed that advisory opinions on the legal aspects of a dispute should be requested more often. He also suggested that, in addition to the rights granted to the General Assembly and the Security Council under Article 96 of the Charter, the Secretary-General should enjoy a right to make such requests (see A/45/1, p. 7, and A/46/1, p. 4). In order to assist developing countries that lacked the necessary

In the following instances, Member States questioned the competence of the Security Council to consider a dispute, owing to its alleged legal nature, or advanced arguments in favour of a referral of such dispute to the International Court of Justice.

In connection with the alleged terrorist acts by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989, the Council, at its 3033rd meeting, on 21 January 1992, considered letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States to the Secretary-General,¹⁶⁴ alleging the involvement of Libyan Government officials in those acts. The Council also considered a draft resolution proposed by the aggrieved countries, by which the Council would, inter alia, condemn the destruction of the two aircraft and urge the Libyan Government to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts.¹⁶⁵

At that meeting, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya asserted that the investigations undertaken in the said three countries had never proved the involvement of the Libyan State, and that the incident in question was a matter of a purely legal nature, which ought to be dealt with by the judiciary and which the Council was not competent to consider. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya emphasized that it had initiated investigatory proceedings against the two accused individuals, who would be brought to trial, and, if convicted, punished according to the provisions of Libyan law. The Libyan representative also noted that "the competent authorities in his country [had] expressed their readiness to receive investigators to participate in the investigation". He believed "that the international dimensions of the alleged events might make an international investigation an appropriate means of starting to resolve the dispute". The representative contended that, if there was an issue before the Council, it was "a question concerning a means for recourse to the Court or for implementing its decisions, the Secretary-General established a special voluntary trust fund (see A/44/1, p. 6).

conflict of jurisdiction, a dispute over the legal determination to be made in connection with a request for extradition". Accordingly, he believed that the Council ought to take into consideration that, under Article 36 (3) of the Charter, legal disputes should as a general rule be referred to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court.¹⁶⁶ More generally, the representative stated that the Council ought to recommend settlement through the divers legal channels that are available, not only within the framework of the Charter, but also under the provisions of more relevant international conventions.¹⁶⁷

Several non-members of the Council, which had been invited to participate in the debate, supported the position of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The representative of the Arab League believed that the dispute should be placed before a neutral international commission of inquiry.¹⁶⁸ The Sudan and the Islamic Republic of Iran believed that the dispute should be resolved within the framework of existing international instruments, through an international inquiry or by arbitration.¹⁶⁹ The representative of Iraq noted that there was "no precedent for such judicial disputes being brought before the Security Council."¹⁷⁰ Mauritania believed that the case appeared to be "a question essentially juridical in nature".¹⁷¹ Yemen thought that the question should be "dealt with in a legal manner".¹⁷²

However, the sponsors of the draft resolution, supported by other Council members, believed that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, which could only be appropriately addressed by the Security Council.¹⁷³

The representative of the United States stated that the matter was "a situation to which standard procedures [were] clearly inapplicable", and called upon the Council not to be "distracted by Libyan attempts to convert this issue of international peace and security into one of bilateral differences". The proposed resolution was to ensure "that the people accused be simply and directly turned over to the judicial authorities of the Governments which are competent under international law to try them". The suggestion of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that its nationals be tried elsewhere, was described by the representative as a "tortured attempt to identify or create venues that could reduce and even negate the value of the evidence so painfully collected in long and thorough investigations by the requesting States". The representative asserted that neither the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya nor indeed any other State could seek "to hide support for international terrorism behind traditional principles of international law and State practice".¹⁷⁴

The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that it was the exceptional circumstance of government involvement in terrorism that had made it appropriate for the Council to adopt a resolution urging the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to make the accused available for trial in Scotland or the United States and to cooperate with the French judicial authorities. He added that his Government was "not asserting the guilt of these men before they were tried", but that "there was serious evidence against them which they had to face in court". The representative believed that "since the crime occurred in Scotland and the aircraft was American, and since the investigation [had] been carried out in Scotland and in the United States, the trial should clearly take place in Scotland or in the United States." With regard to the suggestion that the matter be referred to an international tribunal, he noted that this was "simply not practical", that the International Court of Justice had no criminal jurisdiction and that there was no other international tribunal with such jurisdiction. The representative acknowledged that he did understand the position of those countries whose law prevented the extradition of their nationals, but noted that there was no rule of international law which precluded the extradition of nationals, adding that “indeed many countries place no bar on this and regularly do extradite their nationals”. As to prosecution in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, he stated that “it must be clear to all that the State which is itself implicated in the acts of terrorism cannot try its own officials”.¹⁷⁵

The representative of France expressed the hope that the unanimous reaction of the international community, expressed by the adoption of the proposed Security Council resolution, would induce the Libyan authorities to respond quickly to the requests of the judicial authorities conducting the investigation into the terrorist attacks.¹⁷⁶

The representative of the Russian Federation believed it to be important that, “in accordance with universally acknowledged legal norms, the judicial organs of those countries to which the downed aircraft belonged and over whose territory the crime was committed should be allowed to deal with this case”. He believed that the “international interest in this trial should ensure that it is open and impartial in nature”.¹⁷⁷

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was adopted unanimously as resolution 731 (1992). However, several Council members emphasized the exceptional nature of the case or expressed certain reservations.

The representative of Morocco felt that the Council was “touching on a principle of international law that is well established in both unwritten law and in various instruments”, namely the principle of “extradite or prosecute”. Accordingly, it could not share the view that the adoption of the draft resolution “enshrine[d] any exception to that uncontested principle of international law”.¹⁷⁸

The representative of Venezuela noted that “the inability of the General Assembly to take a stand on the establishment of an international crime tribunal [had] made it necessary for the Council to act”, noting that “although this measure [was] exceptional and [had] involved problems for many countries in the area of jurisdiction and extradition of nationals, the Council [did] have the necessary competence and [had to] be prepared to assume the enormous responsibility involved in filling this institutional gap in result of the lack of alternative machinery to deal with crimes against mankind”.¹⁷⁹

The Council resumed its consideration of the matter on 31 March 1992, at its 3063rd meeting, at which it discussed and adopted the text of resolution 748 (1992).¹⁸⁰

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya again emphasized that it would welcome a neutral investigation, or consideration of the matter by the International Court of Justice. It reaffirmed its view that a referral to the Court should have been duly considered by the Council, in accordance with Article 36 (3) of the Charter.¹⁸¹ Referring to an application it had made to the Court itself several days earlier, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya questioned why the aggrieved parties, instead of awaiting the Court’s judgment, exerted pressure on the Security Council to consider this matter at the same time at which the Court was considering it, noting also that the United States had “declared in advance its rejection of any ruling of the International Court of Justice that would not be in its favour.”¹⁸²

In statements made prior to the vote on the draft resolution, four Council members expressed themselves in favour of an appropriate role for the International Court of Justice in this matter.¹⁸³

The representative of China believed that the hearings held recently by that Court would “undoubtedly help clarify the facts and ascertain the truth through investigations”. He also stated that China was in favour of “conducting serious, thorough, fair and objective investigations of the bombing incidents”, in accordance with the Charter and the relevant principles of international law.¹⁸⁴

The representative of India, noting that the judicial proceedings before the Council had not yet run their course, believed that “a little delay on that account in the Security Council’s moving on to the next stage would have merited positive consideration”. The representative felt that “it should be feasible for these two principal organs of the United Nations to function in tandem in a manner so as to reinforce each other’s efficacy and prestige in the course of international peace and security”.¹⁸⁵

The representative of Cape Verde believed that the International Court of Justice should “have a role to play whenever a legal issue was at stake, as mentioned in paragraph 3 of Article 36 of the Charter”. He added that it would therefore be “more appropriate” for the Council to act after the International Court of Justice — which was seized of the matter — had decided what was the applicable law, if any, as to the issue of jurisdiction. The representative also explained that it would be difficult for his country to endorse measures that could run counter to its Constitution, which did not allow the extradition of its own nationals.¹⁸⁶

The representative of Zimbabwe agreed that it would have been preferable for the Council to await the outcome of the judicial proceedings. He believed that, “while there [was] no specific provision in the Charter that precluded parallel consideration of the matter by these two principal organs ... the authors of the Charter [had] intended the two bodies to complement each other’s efforts rather than proceed in a manner that could produce contradictory results”.¹⁸⁷

Similar views were held by the States non-members of the Security Council which had been invited to attend the meeting.¹⁸⁸

The sponsors of the draft resolution, supported by other Council members, believed however that the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by resolution 748 (1992) were appropriate and necessary to deal with the threat to international peace and security posed by that country’s alleged failure to implement resolution 731 (1992) and cooperate with the investigations.¹⁸⁹

Commenting on the proceedings before the International Court of Justice, the representative of the United Kingdom said he believed that the application by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to the Court was in fact “directed at interfering with the exercise by the Security Council of its rightful functions and prerogatives” under the Charter. He emphasized that the Council was “fully entitled to concern itself with issues of terrorism and the measures needed to address acts of terrorism in any particular case or to prevent it in the future”.¹⁹⁰

The representative of Venezuela agreed that, although it would have been desirable for there to be a simultaneous decision by the Court and the Council, the absence of such a decision could not inhibit the actions which one or other of them might take, since both were independent of each other. However, the representative noted that Venezuela also saw a need for International Court of Justice, to which it has been submitted, ha[d] been considering it since last Thursday” (S/PV.3063, pp. 31-32). The representative of Iraq stated that his country did “not believe that harm [would] be done to international peace and security if the Council show[ed] patience and persist[ed] in following up efforts to achieve the desired solution, especially since the International Court of Justice [was] considering the question and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya ha[d] expressed in advance its acceptance of the Court’s opinion” (ibid., p. 37). The representative of Uganda “welcomed as a positive step this issue’s being brought before the International Court of Justice” (ibid., p. 40). The representative of Jordan more generally recalled its emphasis “on the need to call upon the Security Council to resolve the conflict through negotiations, mediation and a judicial settlement, in accordance with the stipulations of Chapter VI, Article 33, of the Charter” (ibid., pp. 26-27).

¹⁸⁸ The representative of Mauritania noted that the States of the Arab Maghreb Union considered “that it could be possible to avoid the sanctions and other measures set out in the text, especially since the dispute in question seems to be basically juridical in nature and since the

the United Nations system “to be provided with legal mechanisms capable of dealing with the type of criminal activity now before the Council”. Accordingly, he reiterated Venezuela’s request “that an international criminal court be set up to complement the International Court of Justice”.¹⁹¹

With regard to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait¹⁹² at the 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991, the Council had before it a draft resolution by which it would call upon the Secretary-General to make arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between them.¹⁹³ At that meeting, several speakers expressed doubt as to whether the Council had the authority to deal with such a matter¹⁹⁴ and expressed the view that boundary questions ought to be referred to the International Court of Justice.¹⁹⁵

Referring explicitly to Article 36 (3), the representative of Ecuador stated his country’s belief that the Council, in taking a position on the territorial boundary between Iraq and Kuwait and in requesting the Secretary-General to make arrangements with both countries to demarcate the boundary, had wrongly considered this case to be an exception to the general principle requiring such disputes to be referred to the International Court of Justice.¹⁹⁶

In response, the sponsors of the draft resolution drew attention to the uniqueness of the situation, stressed that the border to be demarcated would be the international boundary previously agreed upon by the two countries,¹⁹⁷ and emphasized that the involvement of the Council in the demarcation of the boundary was not an attempt to use the Council to replace the existing principles pertaining to the settlement of boundaries.¹⁹⁸

Several speakers criticized the provisions in the draft resolution envisaging the establishment of a commission and fund to deal with reparations and compensation, and argued that the International Court of Justice, rather than the Security Council, should decide the financial claims against Iraq.¹⁹⁹

The majority of Council members expressed support for these provisions, however, observing that the question of reparations was an essential part of the post-war process.²⁰⁰

At the same meeting, the draft resolution was adopted as resolution 687 (1991).²⁰¹

Relevance of procedures for the settlement of disputes adopted by the parties, in the light of Article 33 (2) of the Charter

Article 33 (1) requires the parties to a dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, first of all to seek a solution by peaceful means, such as negotiation, conciliation or arbitration. The importance placed on the parties’ efforts to reach a settlement is also reflected in Article 36 (2), which provides that the Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted between the parties.

In the following instances, the deliberations of the Security Council turned to the question whether the Agreement concluded between Iraq and Kuwait in 1963, which was registered with the United Nations.

¹⁹⁷ The demarcation of the boundary was to be based on an priority accorded to the parties' own efforts under those provisions might, in certain circumstances, restrict the Council's competence to consider a dispute in accordance with Article 33 (2).

In connection with alleged terrorist acts by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya against Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 and UTA flight 772 on 19 September 1989, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya asserted, at the Council's 3033rd meeting, that the Council was competent only to consider a dispute "in which the parties to it [had] not followed any of the means for peaceful settlement of disputes set out in Article 33 of the Charter". Referring to certain measures the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had taken to respond to demands made by the aggrieved States, the representative reminded Council members that, in accordance with Article 36 (2) of the Charter, the Council should take into account any measures already adopted. As the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had "frequently declared its readiness to negotiate and accept mediation and other peaceful means to settle the dispute", the Council ought to "call upon the other parties to respond favourably to that expression of readiness". In particular, the Council should call on the United States and the United Kingdom to enter promptly into negotiations with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya on "proceedings leading to arbitration and the appointment of an arbitration panel".²⁰²

While several speakers supported the appeal of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to resolve the matter by the peaceful means of settlement set out in Article 33 (1),²⁰³ others believed that the situation concerned a threat to international peace and security, which could not be resolved by such means.²⁰⁴ Accordingly, they expressed support for the draft resolution before the Council, which at the same meeting was adopted as resolution 731 (1992).

Following the adoption of the resolution, the representative of the United States emphasized that the Council was dealing with a case of international terrorism, and not "some difference of opinion or approach that [could] be mediated or negotiated". For that reason, he called upon the Council not to be "distracted by Libyan attempts to convert this issue of international peace and security into one of bilateral differences".²⁰⁵ In a similar vein, the representative of France believed that "the exceptional gravity of these attacks and the considerations connected with the restoration of law and security justif[ied] this action in the Security Council".²⁰⁶ This view was shared by the representative of the United Kingdom, who saw the action taken by the Council as the "proper reaction of the international community" to the situation arising from the failure, thus far, of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya "to respond effectively to the most serious accusations of State involvement in acts of terrorism".²⁰⁷

The Council resumed its consideration of the item at the 3063rd meeting, on 31 March 1992. The Council members had before them another draft resolution proposed by the aggrieved three countries, by which the Council would impose a range of sanctions against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.²⁰⁸

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, while rejecting demands for the extradition of the two Libyan citizens accused of being implicated in the terrorist acts, again referred to its "full willingness to find a peaceful and just solution to the dispute" and declared its readiness to cooperate with all the parties concerned in the implementation of resolution 731 (1991). It maintained, however, that the Council, by adopting that resolution, had ignored "the provisions of Article 33 of the Charter concerning the settlement of disputes between Member States by peaceful means", adding that "the impasse in finding a solution [had] not been created by any lack of cooperation on the part of the Libyan authorities", but by the rejection, by the other parties, of all the initiatives the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had taken.²⁰⁹ As evidence of its assertions, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, inter alia, cited the

Secretary-General's report to the Security Council dated 3 March 1992, in which the Secretary-General had noted "a certain evolution in the position of the Libyan authorities".²¹⁰

Several other speakers reiterated their view that the parties, in accordance with Article 33, should first of all seek a solution by peaceful means.²¹¹

The sponsors of the draft resolution,²¹² echoed by several other speakers,²¹³ insisted however that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had not complied with resolution 731 (1992), that the Council was faced with a threat to international peace and security, and that there was no alternative, therefore, to taking enforcement measures.

At the same meeting, the Council adopted the draft resolution before it as resolution 748 (1992).²¹⁴

In connection with a letter dated 3 January 1990 from the representative of Nicaragua to the President of the Council,²¹⁵ alleging a violation of Nicaragua's diplomatic premises in Panama by the United States, the representative of the United States, at the 2905th meeting, on 17 January 1990, contended that, as the matter had already been dealt with diplomatically and as the United States had formally expressed its regret to the Government of Nicaragua, further consideration of the matter by the Security Council was unnecessary. More specifically, the representative stated that "in normal diplomatic practice, if an issue such as this cannot be resolved directly between those concerned, then the dean of the diplomatic corps — in this case the Papal Nuncio — mediates the incident".²¹⁶

In a similar vein, the representative of the United Kingdom, while observing that it viewed with concern any breach of the inviolability of diplomatic premises, placed emphasis on the fact that the United States had "formally and at the highest level expressed its regret to the Government of Nicaragua".²¹⁷

A draft resolution submitted by several Member States, by which the Council would have expressed its concern about the incident, was voted upon but not adopted.²¹⁸

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait,²¹⁹ the Council, at its 2981st meeting, adopted resolution 687 (1991), by which it called upon the Secretary-General to make arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between them. Several speakers expressed doubt as to whether the Council had the authority to deal with such matter²²⁰ and expressed the view that boundary questions ought to be dealt with directly by the parties concerned, through negotiations.²²¹

In response, the representative of the United States, being one of the sponsors of the relevant draft resolution,²²² drew attention to the uniqueness of the situation, stressed that the border to be demarcated would be the international boundary previously agreed upon between both countries,²²³ and emphasized that the involvement of the Council in the demarcation of the boundary was not an attempt to use the Council to replace the existing principles pertaining to the settlement of boundaries.²²⁴ Similar observations were made by the representative of the United Kingdom, who noted that the resolution was not attempting to settle the boundary, but believed that the dispute had resulted from “the failure do demarcate that boundary and the determination of Iraq to raise territorial claims that [were] incompatible with the 1963 Agreement”.²²⁵

The representative of Kuwait observed that, by adopting the resolution, the Security Council was merely calling upon the Secretary-General to offer the necessary technical aid to demarcate the border. Kuwait believed that, through the demarcation of the boundary, the Council was “testing Iraq’s credibility in regard to its respect for legal documents and treaties”.²²⁶

The representative of Venezuela noted that the demarcation of the boundary was being carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait, which posed a threat to international peace and security. It was Venezuela’s understanding, therefore, that the resolution did not alter the general principle expressed in Article 33 of the Charter that disputes of the nature currently before the Council had to be resolved by the party’s themselves through negotiation.²²⁷

This chapter deals with action taken by the Security Council with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression, within the framework of Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.

The period under review was marked by a considerably expanded scope of Council action in this field. At the summit meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992, on the subject of its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the hope was expressed that this new era would present new opportunities for the maintenance of peace and security on a global scale. At the same time, the risks resulting from the break-up and the transformation of several Member States were highlighted.¹

In a statement adopted at the conclusion of that meeting,² the members of the Council reaffirmed their commitment to the collective security system of the Charter to deal with threats to peace and to reverse acts of aggression, and expressed the belief that there were now new favourable international circumstances under which the Security Council had begun to fulfil more effectively its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.³

During the period under review, Chapter VII of the Charter was invoked by the Security Council in an increased number of its decisions, in comparison with the period covered by the preceding Supplement (1985 to 1988). Most of those decisions related to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the situation in the former Yugoslavia, but the Council also adopted measures under Chapter VII of the Charter in connection with the situation in Somalia and the situation in Liberia, and in order to ensure the full cooperation of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in establishing responsibility for the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772.⁴

³ By that statement, the members of the Council further expressed their agreement that the world now had the best chance of achieving international peace and security since the foundation of the United Nations, but also recognized that change, however welcome, had brought new risks for stability and security, noting that some of the most acute problems resulted from change to State structures. See also the Secretary-General's remarks in his report entitled "An Agenda for Peace" (S/24111, para. 8), which the Secretary-General had been invited to prepare by Council members in that statement.

In connection with items relating to the situation in Somalia, see resolutions 733 (1992), fifth preambular para.; and 794 (1992), paras. 10 and 16. In connection with the situation in Liberia, see resolution 788 (1992), para. 8. In connection with items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, see resolution 748 (1992), tenth preambular para. Two draft resolutions which were not put to the vote also contained explicit

This chapter will focus, in parts I to VIII, on selected material that may best serve to highlight how the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter were interpreted by the Council in its deliberations and applied in its decisions.⁵ Given the increase in the practice of the Council under Chapter VII during the period under review, and in order to give due focus to the key relevant elements that arose in its decisions or deliberations, several Articles that were grouped together in previous Supplements have been dealt with individually in separate parts of this chapter. Thus, parts I to IV focus on the practice of the Council in accordance with Articles 39 to 42, while part V focuses on Articles 43 to 47, part VI deals with Article 48, part VII addresses Member States' obligations under Article 49, and parts VIII and IX deal, respectively, with the practice of the Council with respect to Articles 50 and 51.

⁵ The action taken by the Council in response to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression is considered in a comprehensive manner in chapter VIII.

Part I

Determination of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression under Article 39 of the Charter

Article 39

The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted one resolution in which Article 39 was explicitly invoked. By resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, the Council determined that there existed “a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait” earlier that day. Noting that it was acting under Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter, the Council condemned the Iraqi invasion and demanded that Iraq withdraw its forces immediately and unconditionally to the positions in which they had been located on 1 August 1990.

The Council also adopted several resolutions determining, or expressing concern at, the existence of a “threat to the peace”, with regard to, for example, the situation in the Middle East (Lebanon); the situation between Iraq and Kuwait; the situation in the former Yugoslavia; the situation in Somalia; items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; and the situation in Liberia. The context in which those determinations were made and the manner in which they were formulated is set out in section A below. The Council sometimes distinguished different types of situations by describing them, variously, as threats to “international peace and security”, to “international peace and security in the region”, to “international peace and security, particularly in West Africa as a whole”, or to “peace, security and stability in the region”.⁶

⁶ See, for example, resolutions 713 (1991) (“international peace and security”); 688 (1991) (“international peace and security in the region”); 788 (1992) (“international peace and security, particularly in West Africa as a whole”); and the presidential statement of 31 March 1989 (S/20554) (“peace, security and stability in the region”).

The adoption of some of those resolutions gave rise to a constitutional discussion in the Security Council, casting light on the interpretation and application of Article 39. This discussion is reflected in section B below.

During the period under consideration, the members of the Council also identified certain generic threats to peace and security. In the statement made by the President on their behalf at the conclusion of the summit meeting held on 31 January 1992 to consider the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”, the members of the Council expressed the view that the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction constitutes a threat to international peace and security; and that the non-military sources of instability in the economic, social, humanitarian and ecological fields have become threats to peace and security.⁷

In several other instances, a threat to the peace was alleged to exist by a Member State, but no such determination was made by the Security Council.⁸

⁸ Such allegations were made and considered in connection with, for example, the following items: (a) letters dated 4 January 1989 from the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Bahrain to the President of the Council (S/PV.2835, 2836, 2839, 2840, 2841); (b) the situation relating to Afghanistan (S/PV.2852, 2853, 2855-2857, 2859, 2860); (c) the situation in Panama (S/PV.2899-2902); (d) letter dated 2 February 1990 from the representative of Cuba to the President of the Security Council (S/PV.2907); (e) the situation in the Middle East: letter dated 17 February 1992 from the representative of Lebanon to the President of the Security Council (S/PV.3053); (f) the situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh (S/PV.3072); and (g) the situation in Georgia (S/PV.3121).

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 39

1. Breach of the peace

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, the Security Council expressed alarm at the invasion of Kuwait earlier that day by the military forces of Iraq, and determined that there existed “a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait”.⁹

2. Threat to the peace

The situation in the Middle East (Lebanon)

In a statement made by the President of the Council on behalf of the members of the Council at the 2951st meeting on 31 March 1989,¹⁰ the members of the Council expressed their grave concern at the recent deterioration of the situation in Lebanon, which had left many victims among the civilian population and caused considerable material damage. They expressed the view that this situation posed “a threat ... to peace, security and stability in the region”. The members of the Council reaffirmed the statement of 31 March 1989 in a further presidential statement¹¹ made at the 2858th meeting, on 24 April 1989.¹²

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, the Council expressed alarm at “the dangers of the present crisis caused by the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait, which directly threaten international peace and security”.

⁹ The Council recalled or reaffirmed resolution 660 (1990) in many of its subsequent decisions, including resolutions 664 (1990), 665 (1990), 667 (1990), 670 (1990), 674 (1990), 678 (1990), 686 (1991) and 687 (1991).

¹² In a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 15 August 1989 (S/20789), the Secretary-General informed the Council that he regarded the crisis in Lebanon as a serious threat to international peace and security, and asked that the Council be convened urgently. In response to the Secretary-General's appeal, the Council held a meeting the same day, at which it adopted a statement (S/20790) reaffirming its statement of 24 April.

In resolution 687 (1991), of 3 April 1991, the Council stated that it was “conscious of the threat that all weapons of mass destruction pose to peace and security in the area and of the need to work towards the establishment in the Middle East of a zone free of such weapons”.

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait (repression of the Iraqi civilian population in parts of Iraq)

By resolution 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, the Council stated that it was “Gravely concerned by the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including most recently in Kurdish-populated areas, which led to a massive flow of refugees towards and across international frontiers and to cross-border incursions which threaten international peace and security in the region”.¹³

At the 3059th meeting of the Council, on 11 March 1992, the President made a statement on behalf of the Council, the relevant part of which reads:¹⁴

34. The members of the Council are particularly concerned at the reported restrictions on the supplies of essential commodities, in particular food and fuel, which have been imposed by the Government of Iraq on the three northern governorates of Dohuk, Erbil and Sulaymaniyya. In this regard, as the Special Rapporteur has noted in his report, inasmuch as the repression of the population continues, the threat to international peace and security in the region mentioned in resolution 688 (1991) remains.

The situation in the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, the Council stated that it was “Deeply concerned by the fighting in Yugoslavia, which is causing a heavy loss of human life and material damage, and by the consequences for the countries of the region, in particular in the border areas of neighbouring countries”. The Council expressed concern “that the continuation of this situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security”.

The Council recalled or reaffirmed resolution 713 (1991) in subsequent resolutions, two of which contained express references to the continued existence of a threat to international peace and security. In resolution 721 (1991), adopted on 27 November 1991, the Council stated that it was “deeply concerned by the fighting in Yugoslavia and by the serious violations of earlier ceasefire agreements, which have caused heavy loss of human life and widespread material damage, and by the consequences for the countries of the region”. The Council noted “that the continuation and aggravation of this situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security”. In resolution 743 (1992), of 21 February 1992, by which the Council decided to establish a United Nations Protection Force, the Council expressed concern “that the situation in Yugoslavia continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security as determined in resolution 713 (1991)”.

¹³ The Council reaffirmed resolution 688 (1991) in resolution 706 (1991).

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina)

In a statement made by the President on behalf of the Council at its 3070th meeting, on 24 April 1992,¹⁵ the Council noted “with deep concern the rapid and violent deterioration of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which in addition to causing an increasing number of deaths of many innocent victims further risks compromising peace and security in the region”. By resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, the Council determined “that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other parts of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constitutes a threat to international peace and security”. In resolution 770 (1992), of 13 August 1992, the Council “recognized that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to international peace and security and that the provision of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element in the Council’s effort to restore international peace and security in the area”.

In a statement made by the President on behalf of the Council at the 3132nd meeting, on 30 October 1992,¹⁶ the Council stated that it remained “concerned by the continuing conflict in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina with its resultant loss of life and material damage, which threaten international peace and security”. By resolution 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, the Council reaffirmed its determination “that the situation in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina constitutes a threat to the peace”, and reaffirmed “that the provision of humanitarian assistance in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina is an important element in the effort by the Council to “restore peace and security in the region”.

In a statement made by the President on behalf of the Council at its 3146th meeting, on 9 December 1992,¹⁷ the Council stated that it was “alarmed by the most recent reports that Serb militia in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina have renewed their offensive in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in particular against the city of Sarajevo, resulting in further loss of life and material damage as well as in endangering the security of the United Nations Protection Force and international relief workers, thus threatening international peace and security”.

Items relating to the situation in Somalia

By resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, the Council stated that it was “Gravely alarmed at the rapid deterioration of the situation in Somalia and the heavy loss of human life and widespread material damage resulting from the conflict in the country and aware of its consequences on stability and peace in the region”. The Council voiced its concern that “the continuation of this situation constitutes, as stated in the report of the Secretary-General, a threat to international peace and security”.

In four subsequent resolutions, the Council stated that it was “deeply disturbed by the magnitude of the human suffering caused by the conflict and concerned that [the continuation of] the situation in Somalia constitutes a threat to international peace and security”.¹⁸

In resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Council determined “that the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constitutes a threat to international peace and security”.

¹⁸ See, respectively, resolutions 746 (1992), 751 (1992), 767 (1992) and 775 (1992). The last two resolutions, adopted following further deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Somalia, omit the language in square brackets.

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992, the Council urged the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately to provide a full and effective response to the requests made by France, the United Kingdom and the United States to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts carried out against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772. In resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, the Council determined “that the failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests in resolution 731 (1992) constitute a threat to international peace and security”.

The situation in Liberia

In resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, the Council expressed regret “that parties to the conflict in Liberia have not respected or implemented the various accords to date, especially the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement”, and determined that “the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constitutes a threat to international peace and security, particularly in West Africa as a whole”.

B. Constitutional discussion arising in connection with Article 39

A number of issues were discussed at the meetings of the Council leading up to its determinations of the existence of a breach of the peace or threat to the peace that cast light on the interpretation and application of Article 39. These are considered below.

Military invasion constituting a breach of the peace

Case 1

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

On 2 August 1990, the Security Council met urgently, at the request of the representatives of Kuwait and the United States,¹⁹ to consider “the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi forces”. The representative of Kuwait reported that, in the early hours of that day, Iraqi forces had crossed Kuwait’s borders, penetrated Kuwait’s territory and reached the populated area of the country. They had occupied ministries, and the headquarters of the Government had been shelled. Baghdad Radio had announced that the aim of the invasion of Kuwait was to stage a coup d’état to overthrow the regime and establish a new regime and a Government friendly to Iraq. The representative assured the Council, however, that the Amir, the Prime Minister, and the Government of Kuwait remained in control in Kuwait and were defending the country’s security.²⁰

In response, the representative of Iraq claimed that the events taking place in Kuwait were “internal matters which have no relation to Iraq”. The “Free Provisional Government of Kuwait” had requested the Government of Iraq to assist it to establish security and order. The Iraqi forces would withdraw as soon as order had been restored.²¹

The representative of the United States disputed the Iraqi account of events. According to reports received from the United States Embassy in Kuwait, Iraqi military forces had crossed over into Kuwaiti territory all along the frontier and rapidly proceeded to Kuwait City where they currently were. There had been opposition to the movement of those military forces, firing and combat; Kuwaiti forces were resisting the advance of the Iraqis. The representative observed that the Iraqis had made a serious mistake: “instead of staging their coup d’état and installing this so-called free provisional government before the invasion, they got it the wrong way around: they invaded Kuwait and then staged the coup d’état in a blatant and deceitful effort to justify their action”.²²

The representative of the United Kingdom similarly condemned the “full-scale invasion” of Kuwait’s territory by Iraq. He dismissed the Iraqi account in the following terms: “Thus, we have an invasion from the outside; ... a phoney coup d’état from within; and ... the purported establishment of a puppet government”. Describing the invasion as “an unquestionable act of aggression,” he welcomed the invocation of articles 39 and 40 in the draft resolution before the Council.²³

¹⁹ See S/21423 and S/21424.

Other Council members uniformly condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait's territory, with some describing it as an act of aggression.²⁴ Nine members jointly sponsored the draft resolution, adopted as resolution 660 (1990),²⁵ by which the Council determined that there existed a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait; and, acting under Articles 39 and 40 of the Charter, condemned the invasion and demanded that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they had been located on 1 August 1990.

Consequences of the repression of a civilian population constituting a threat to the peace

Items relating to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

In response to requests contained in letters dated 2 and 4 April 1991 from the representatives of Turkey and France to the President of the Security Council,²⁶ the Council, at its 2982nd meeting, considered the situation resulting from the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in parts of Iraq. The Council had before it a draft resolution by which it would find that the consequences of the repression — which had “led to a massive flow of refugees towards and across international frontiers and to cross-border incursions” — threatened international peace and security in the region.²⁷

The representative of Turkey stated that his Government had requested the meeting in view of the “grave threat to the peace and security of the region posed by the tragic events taking place in Iraq”. He described the situation in the northern part of Iraq adjacent to the borders of Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran as especially alarming, with hundreds of thousands of displaced persons having been driven to the Iraqi-Turkish border and having trekked across it. He denied that what was going on in northern Iraq could be justified as an internal affair of that country. Given the scale of the human tragedy and its international implications, the Council could not remain indifferent but should take urgent and forceful action to secure an immediate cessation of the repression of the inhabitants of that area.²⁸ The Iranian representative, whose country was similarly affected, stated: “it is evident that the situation inside Iraq, due to its gravity and implications for the neighbouring countries, has consequences that threaten regional and international peace and security”. He, too, believed it was incumbent upon the Council to take immediate measures to put an early end to the suffering of the Iraqi people.²⁹

Opposition to Security Council involvement in the matter was voiced, on the other hand, by the representative of Iraq, and three Council members who voted against the resolution.³⁰ The representative of Iraq denied any repression by the Iraqi Government of its citizens. He described the draft resolution under consideration as an “illegitimate intervention in Iraq's internal affairs and a violation of Article 2 of the Charter, which prohibits intervention in the internal affairs of other States”.³¹ One representative took exception to the references in the draft resolution to political developments within Iraq and to its calls for internal dialogue, which he regarded as attempts to intervene in the internal affairs of Iraq, contrary to Article 2 of the Charter. His country did not, moreover, share the view expressed in the draft resolution that there was a problem threatening international peace and security, as there was no conflict or war across the borders of Iraq with its neighbours. The issue was not, therefore, within the competence of the Security Council.³² The representatives of Zimbabwe and Cuba, similarly, considered that a domestic political conflict lay at the core of the situation referred to in the draft resolution. The serious humanitarian situation that had arisen and the question of refugees gave cause for concern but could be adequately addressed, in their view, by the appropriate organs of the United Nations.

²⁵ Resolution 660 (1990) was adopted by 14 votes to none. Yemen did not participate in the voting.

²⁷ By the draft resolution (adopted, without amendment, as resolution 688 (1991)), the Council would also demand that Iraq immediately end the repression, and insist that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance.

Although the humanitarian dimensions affected neighbouring States, that did not make the internal conflict in Iraq an issue of which the Council should be seized.³³ The representative of India, who abstained in the vote, stated that his delegation had sought to focus the attention of the Council on the aspect of the threat or likely threat to peace and security in the region, rather than on the factors that had created the current situation. He believed that the Council should have concentrated on the former and left the other aspects to other, more appropriate organs of the United Nations.³⁴ The representative of China, too, while noting the international aspects of the situation in Iraq, considered that they should be settled through the appropriate channels.³⁵

Most Council members, however, rejected the argument that the matter was in some way outside the scope of the Council, that it was an entirely internal matter. They were of the view that, while the situation under consideration related to the internal policy of Iraq, the transboundary impact of Iraq's treatment of its civilian population clearly threatened peace and security in the region. They saw it as the Council's legitimate responsibility to respond to the concerns raised by Turkey, the Islamic Republic of Iran and other neighbouring countries at the huge surge of Iraqi refugees which was destabilizing the region.³⁶ The draft resolution was adopted as resolution 688 (1991).³⁷

Similar views were expressed by a number of non-members: see S/PV.2982, pp. 9-10 (Pakistan); p. 69 (Italy); p. 74 (Luxembourg); and p. 92 (Canada).

³⁷ The resolution was adopted by 10 votes to 3 (Cuba, Yemen, Zimbabwe), with 2 abstentions (China, India).

Threats to international peace and security arising from internal conflicts

Case 3

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

At the request of several Member States,³⁸ the Security Council met to consider "the deteriorating situation regarding Yugoslavia", the continuation of which was likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. The meeting was welcomed by the Government of Yugoslavia, which expressed the hope that the Council would be able to adopt a resolution that would contribute to the efforts to bring peace to all Yugoslavs.³⁹ It was held at ministerial level, 10 Council members being represented by their Foreign Ministers.

Speaking at the beginning of the debate, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Yugoslavia observed that the Council's concern with his country was fully justified: "The Yugoslav crisis threatens peace and security on a large scale. Yugoslavia is in conflict with itself". He added that the Yugoslav crisis had jeopardized not only the present and future of the Yugoslav peoples, but also peace and stability in Europe.⁴⁰

The representative of Belgium stated that it had become essential for the Council to deal with the situation in Yugoslavia. He pointed to the intensification of the fighting, the loss of human life and the significant material damage, and, above all, to the consequences for the other countries of the region, particularly the bordering countries. For Belgium, it was "obvious that this situation is a threat to regional peace and security": the threat was particularly destabilizing as it was occurring in an extremely delicate context of political and economic change in Central and Eastern Europe.⁴¹ This view was shared by other Council members, several of whom stressed the fact that the conflict had begun to spill over national borders, giving it an international dimension.⁴²

A number of Council members⁴³ emphasized that, in the light of the Charter provisions concerning non-interference in the internal affairs of a Member State, the explicit agreement of the Government of Yugoslavia to the Council's involvement in the Yugoslav crisis had been a decisive factor in their decision support the draft resolution (unanimously adopted at the meeting as resolution 713 (1991)).

The first two preambular paragraphs of resolution 713 (1991) refer explicitly to the fact that Yugoslavia had welcomed the decision to convene a meeting of the Security Council, and the statement made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Yugoslavia at the meeting. The third and fourth paragraphs read:

Deeply concerned by the fighting in Yugoslavia, which is causing a heavy loss of human life and material damage, and by the consequences for the countries of the region, in particular in the border areas of neighbouring countries,

Concerned that the continuation of this situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security.

Case 4

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (Bosnia and Herzegovina)

By resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, the Security Council determined "that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other parts of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constitutes a threat to international peace and security".

At the Council meeting at which that resolution was adopted, the Council members expressed differing views with regard to the nature of the threat. Some speakers saw the threat to the peace as emanating essentially from ethnic strife within Bosnia and Herzegovina, which threatened to spill over into other countries.⁴⁴ Others, including sponsors of the resolution, viewed the continuing outside interference in Bosnia and Herzegovina by the Belgrade authorities, both military and civilian, as the decisive factor, some describing it as aggression.⁴⁵ A number of speakers noted that Bosnia and Herzegovina was, by this time, a member of the international community, having been admitted as a State Member of the United Nations on 22 May 1992.

Despite these differences, a broad majority of Council members agreed on the need to address the threat by imposing mandatory sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁴⁶

The situation in Liberia

Following a deterioration of the situation in Liberia, which had been torn by civil conflict since 1989, the Security Council held its 3138th meeting on 19 November 1992, at the request of the representative of Benin on behalf of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS),⁴⁷ to consider the imposition of a general arms embargo on Liberia in support of sanctions imposed by ECOWAS. The request was endorsed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Liberia.⁴⁸

During the debate, the representative of Benin, speaking on behalf of an ECOWAS ministerial delegation, expressed the view that, despite the measures adopted by ECOWAS, there remained a great the region and to international peace and security" (S/PV.3082, p. 36). See also the statement by the representative of India (ibid., pp. 20-21).

⁴⁵ See, for example, the statement made by the representative of the United States: "The aggression of the Serbian regime and the armed forces it has unleashed against Bosnia and Herzegovina represent a clear threat to international peace and security" (S/PV.3082, p. 33). See also the statement made by the representative of Hungary: "To sum up, the provisions of resolution 752 (1992) are not being complied with at all, and the aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina is raging on" (ibid., p. 15). Venezuela observed that "Belgrade is waging war against other States, sovereign members of our Organization" (ibid., pp. 29-30).

risk that the civil war would spread to the entire West African subregion, and that its continuation “threatened the peace and security of the West African subregion and therefore international peace and security”.⁴⁹

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Liberia also emphasized the international dimension of the conflict in his country. He observed: “The Liberian situation has all the makings of one that could degenerate into a wider conflagration in West Africa. By its spill-over effects, it is already a clear and present danger to neighbouring Sierra Leone; it is slowly transforming West Africa into an arms market”. Accordingly, he urged that the request to the Security Council to support the measures taken by ECOWAS be perceived “in the context of the Council’s responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.”⁵⁰

Similar views were expressed by other members of the ECOWAS delegation. The Foreign Minister of Sierra Leone warned that his country faced a mortal danger to its security because of the conflict in Liberia;⁵¹ the Foreign Minister of Senegal highlighted the many destabilizing consequences the crisis in Liberia had for the 16 countries of the region.⁵²

Several members of the Council also spoke of the threat posed by the civil conflict to the peace and security of the neighbouring States and the region as a whole.⁵³ Some remarked that, with thousands of refugees spilling over into neighbouring countries, the crisis in Liberia could no longer be considered a purely domestic issue to be resolved by the Liberians themselves.⁵⁴

At the end of the debate, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 788 (1992), by which it determined “that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constitutes a threat to international peace and security, particularly in West Africa as a whole”, and imposed a general arms embargo on Liberia. In a preambular paragraph, the Council took account of the request made by the representative of Benin on behalf of ECOWAS, and of the endorsement of that request by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Liberia.

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 794 (1992), which was adopted unanimously at the 3145th meeting on 3 December 1992, the Security Council determined “that the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constitutes a threat to international peace and security”.⁵⁵

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution, most Council members, in line with the above description of the threat, expressed the view that the humanitarian situation itself necessitated the adoption of measures under Chapter VII of the Charter.⁵⁶ Some referred to the international or regional dimension of the crisis.⁵⁷

A number of Council members emphasized the unique character of the situation in Somalia and cautioned that the action taken by the Council should ⁵⁵ By a letter dated 29 November 1992 to the President of the Security Council (S/24868), the Secretary-General had concluded that the Council now had no alternative but to decide to adopt “more forceful measures to secure the humanitarian operations in Somalia”. Noting that no government existed in Somalia that could request and allow the use of force, he observed that it would be necessary for the Council “to make a determination under Article 39 of the Charter that a threat to the peace exists, as a result of the repercussions of the Somali conflict on the entire region, and to decide what measures should be taken to maintain international peace and security” (ibid., p. 3).

not be seen as a precedent.⁵⁸ Others, however, thought that Council action demonstrated its capacity to adapt to the new challenges of the post-cold-war world.⁵⁹

Insufficient action by a State against terrorism constituting a threat to the peace

Case 7

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

At its meeting on 21 January 1992, the Security Council considered letters dated 20 and 23 December 1991 from France, the United Kingdom and the United States to the Secretary-General,⁶⁰ alleging the involvement of Libyan Government officials in the destruction of Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772 and making specific requests of the Libyan authorities relating to the judicial procedures that were under way. By resolution 731 (1992), the Council urged the Libyan Government to provide a full and effective response to those requests to cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts, so as to contribute to the elimination of international terrorism. During the debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution, several members of the Council described attacks against civilian aircraft, as in the case at hand, and acts of international terrorism in general, as acts that threaten international peace and security.⁶¹ The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya asserted, however, that his country had never threatened another and could not “behave in such a way as to endanger peace and security”.⁶²

At its 3063rd meeting, on 31 March 1992, the Council adopted resolution 748 (1992), by which it determined that the failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism, and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests in resolution 731 (1992), constituted a threat to international peace and security.⁶³ Having made that determination, the Council imposed certain measures on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.⁶⁴ In the debate leading to the adoption of resolution 748 (1992), the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya contended that the situation before the Council did not involve a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, but was a legal dispute concerning who should investigate the accused and who should put them on trial. In his view, it was inappropriate, therefore, to invoke Chapter VII in the draft resolution under consideration.⁶⁵ Several Council members⁶⁶ and other Member States,⁶⁷ while not directly addressing the question of the existence of a threat to the peace, shared the view of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya that the means of peaceful settlement set out under Chapter VI of the Charter had not been exhausted and that resort to Chapter VII was premature. The sponsors of the draft resolution,⁶⁸ on the other hand, stressed that the evidence revealing the involvement of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in these acts of terrorism indicated a serious breach of international peace and security, fully justifying the adoption by the Council of measures

Further, it reaffirmed that, in accordance with the principle in Article 2 (4) of the Charter, “every State has the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when such acts involve a threat or use of force”.

Part II

Provisional measures to prevent the aggravation of a situation in accordance with Article 40 of the Charter

Article 40

In order to prevent an aggravation of the situation, the Security Council may, before making the recommendations or deciding upon the measures provided for in Article 39, call upon the parties concerned to comply with such provisional measures as it deems necessary or desirable. Such provisional measures shall be without prejudice to the rights, claims, or position of the parties concerned. The Security Council shall duly take account of failure to comply with such provisional measures.

Note

During the period under consideration, the Security Council adopted one resolution explicitly under Article 40 of the Charter. By resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, the Council, noting that it was acting under Articles 39 and 40, condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait; demanded that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions in which they had been located on 1 August 1990; and called upon Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediately intensive negotiations for the resolution of their differences.

In a number of other resolutions adopted under Chapter VII, the Security Council, without expressly referring to Article 40, also called upon the parties to comply with certain provisional measures in order to prevent an aggravation of the situation concerned. The types of measures called for included (a) the withdrawal of armed forces; (b) the cessation of hostilities; (c) the conclusion or observance of a ceasefire; (d) the negotiation of differences and disputes; (e) compliance with obligations under international humanitarian law; (f) the creation of the conditions necessary for the unimpeded delivery of humanitarian assistance; and (g) cooperation with peacekeeping efforts and humanitarian assistance. Some of the specific measures that the Council called upon the parties concerned to take are summarized chronologically in section A below, by agenda item.

A number of Council resolutions contained warnings that, in the event of failure to comply with the terms of those resolutions, the Council would meet again and consider further steps. Those warnings, which might be considered as falling under Article 40, were expressed in various ways. Frequently, the Council warned that it would consider taking further measures if its calls were not heeded.⁷⁰ In one instance, the Council signalled its decision to “consult urgently to take further concrete measures as soon as possible, under Chapter VII of the Charter”.⁷¹

During the Council’s deliberations in the period under review there was no significant constitutional discussion regarding Article 40. There were only occasional references made to it or its language to support a specific demand relating to the question under consideration.⁷² The binding effect of certain provisional measures under Article 40 was stressed by Council members, notably in connection with the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.⁷³

Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 40

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

The Council, having determined that Iraq's invasion of Kuwait constituted a breach of international peace and security, adopted a number of resolutions, by which, inter alia, it demanded that Iraq withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces to the positions where they were located on 1 August 1990;⁷⁴ called upon Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediately intensive negotiations to resolve their differences;⁷⁵ demanded that Iraq rescind its actions purporting to annex Kuwait;⁷⁶ demanded that Iraq permit and facilitate the immediate departure from Kuwait and Iraq of third-State nationals and grant immediate and continuing access of consular officials to such nationals; demanded that Iraq take no action to jeopardize the safety, security or health of such nationals; and demanded that Iraq rescind its orders for the closure of consular and diplomatic missions in Kuwait and the withdrawal of the immunity of their personnel, and refrain from any such actions in the future.⁷⁷

The Council further demanded the immediate release of those foreign nationals abducted from diplomatic premises; demanded that Iraq immediately and fully comply with its international obligations under preceding Security Council resolutions, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, and international law; and demanded that Iraq immediately protect the safety and well-being of diplomatic and consular personnel and premises in Kuwait and in Iraq and take no action to hinder the diplomatic and consular missions in the performance of their functions. The Council signalled its decision to "consult urgently to take further concrete measures as soon as possible, under Chapter VII of the Charter, in response to Iraq's continued violation of the Charter of the United Nations, of resolutions of the Security Council and of international law".⁷⁸

On 29 November 1990, the Council noted that, despite all efforts by the United Nations, Iraq refused to comply with its obligation to implement resolution 660 (1990) and subsequent resolutions. It demanded that Iraq comply fully with those resolutions, and decided, while maintaining all its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, "as a pause of goodwill", to do so. It authorized Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq fully implemented those resolutions on or before 15 January 1991, "to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area".⁷⁹

Items relating to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait

In April 1991, the Security Council condemned the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, most recently in Kurdish-populated areas, the consequences of which, it found, threatened international peace and security in the region. The Council demanded that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, end that repression, and, in the same context, expressed the hope that an open dialogue would take place to ensure that the human and political rights of all Iraqi citizens were respected. It further insisted that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organizations to all those in need of assistance in all parts of Iraq and make available all necessary facilities for their operations.⁸⁰

⁷⁴ Resolution 660 (1990), para. 2. By resolution 661 (1990), the Council imposed economic measures against Iraq to secure its compliance with that demand and to restore the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait: see also part III of the present chapter, on Article 41.

The Security Council expressed concern that the continuation of the situation in Yugoslavia constituted a threat to international peace and security. It strongly urged all parties to abide by ceasefire agreements entered into in September 1991; and appealed urgently to and encouraged all parties to settle their disputes peacefully and through negotiation at the Conference on Yugoslavia, including through the mechanisms set forth within it.⁸¹ It further strongly urged the Yugoslav parties to comply fully with an agreement signed at Geneva on 23 November 1991.⁸² It also strongly urged all States and parties to refrain from any action which might contribute to increasing tension, to inhibiting the establishment of an effective ceasefire and to impeding or delaying a peaceful and negotiated outcome to the conflict in Yugoslavia.⁸³

The Council urged all parties to honour the commitments made in November 1991 at Geneva and in January 1992 in Sarajevo.⁸⁴ The Council subsequently established the United Nations Protection Force, and once again urged all parties and others concerned to comply strictly with the ceasefire agreements signed at Geneva and Sarajevo, and urged them to cooperate fully and unconditionally in the implementation of the United Nations peacekeeping plan. It called again upon the Yugoslav parties to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia in its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.⁸⁵ It further urged all parties and others concerned to take all action necessary to ensure complete freedom of aerial movement for the United Nations Protection Force; and called upon them not to resort to violence, particularly in any area where the Force was to be based or deployed.⁸⁶

The Council appealed to all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina to cooperate with the efforts of the European Community to bring about a ceasefire and a negotiated political solution.⁸⁷ It further made a number of demands of the parties and others concerned. It demanded that (a) all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina stop the fighting immediately and respect the ceasefire signed in April 1992, and cooperate with the efforts of the European Community to bring about a negotiated political solution respecting the principle that any change of borders by force is not acceptable; (b) that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina, including by units of the Yugoslav People's Army as well as elements of the Croatian Army, cease immediately; (c) that those units of the Yugoslav People's Army and elements of the Croatian Army then in Bosnia and Herzegovina either be withdrawn, or be subject to the authority of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed; and (d) that all irregular forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina be disbanded and disarmed.⁸⁸ The Council also called upon all parties and others concerned to ensure the immediate cessation of forcible expulsions of persons from the areas where they lived and any attempts to change the ethnic composition of the population anywhere in the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Further, it called upon them to ensure that conditions were established for the effective and unhindered delivery of humanitarian assistance, including safe and secure access to airports in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In addition, the Council demanded that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with the United Nations Protection Force and the European Community Monitoring Mission, and respect fully their freedom of movement and the safety of their personnel.⁸⁹ At the end of May 1992, the Council, deploring the fact that these demands had not been complied with, imposed a broad range of economic, diplomatic and other measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).⁹⁰

The Council continued to reiterate its calls for the cessation of hostilities, the observance of ceasefire agreements and the withdrawal of armed forces.⁹¹ It also called again upon all parties concerned to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia and its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.⁹² It further called upon the parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to consider the draft outline constitution for Bosnia and Herzegovina as a basis for negotiating a political settlement of the conflict in that country and to continue negotiations for constitutional arrangements on the basis of the draft outline.⁹³

The Council also made more specific appeals in connection with efforts aimed at delivering humanitarian assistance to the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and repeatedly called on the parties to cooperate in making such assistance possible. For example, it demanded that all parties and others concerned create immediately the necessary conditions for unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to Sarajevo and other destinations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the establishment of a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport.⁹⁴ It later demanded that all parties and others concerned cooperate fully with the United Nations Protection Force and international humanitarian agencies and organizations, failing which the Council indicated that it did not exclude other measures to deliver humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and its environs.⁹⁵ Recognizing that the provision of humanitarian assistance in Bosnia and Herzegovina was an important element in its effort to restore international peace and security in the area, the Council called on States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance.⁹⁶

In the wake of reports of widespread violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia and especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including mass forcible expulsion and deportation of civilians and imprisonment and abuse of civilians in detention centres, the Council demanded that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law. It also demanded that relevant international humanitarian organizations, in particular the International Committee of the Red Cross, be granted immediate, unimpeded and continued access to camps, prisons and detention centres within the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and called upon all parties to facilitate such access.⁹⁷ The Council further decided, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia Herzegovina, must comply with these demands, failing which the Council would “need to take further measures under the Charter”.⁹⁸

Items relating to the situation in Somalia

The Security Council expressed its concern that the continuation of the situation in Somalia constituted a threat to international peace and security. It strongly urged all parties to the conflict immediately to cease hostilities and agree to a ceasefire, and to promote the process of reconciliation and of political settlement in the country.⁹⁹ It also called upon the parties to facilitate the delivery by the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other humanitarian organizations of humanitarian assistance to all those in need of it. In addition, it urged all parties to take all necessary measures to ensure the safety of personnel providing humanitarian assistance, to assist them, and to ensure full respect for the rules and principles of international law regarding the protection of civilian populations.¹⁰⁰ The Council took note of the signing of ceasefire agreements, and urged the Somali factions to honour their commitment under the agreements.¹⁰¹ It also urged all the Somali factions to facilitate the delivery by humanitarian organizations of humanitarian assistance to all those in need of it, and called on all parties, movements and factions in Mogadishu in particular, and in Somalia in general, to respect the security and safety of the technical team and the personnel of the humanitarian organizations and to guarantee their complete freedom of movement in and around Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia.¹⁰² By resolution 767 (1992), it reiterated those calls.¹⁰³

Further, it called upon all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to cooperate with the United Nations with a view to the deployment of United Nations security personnel mandated to escort deliveries of humanitarian supplies, and it called upon them to assist in the general stabilization of the situation in the country. The Council noted that, without such cooperation, it did “not exclude other measures to deliver humanitarian assistance to Somalia”.¹⁰⁴

Having determined that the deterioration of the situation in Liberia constituted a threat to international peace and security, the Security Council called upon all parties to the conflict to respect and implement the ceasefire and the various accords of the peace process, and to respect strictly the provisions of international humanitarian law.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁵ Resolution 788 (1992), paras. 6 and 5, respectively. By the same resolution, the Council decided, under Chapter VII of the Charter, to impose an arms embargo against Liberia.

Part III

Measures not involving the use of armed force in accordance with Article 41 of the Charter

Article 41

The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council imposed measures under Chapter VII, of the type provided for in Article 41, against Iraq, Yugoslavia,¹⁰⁶ the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Somalia and Liberia, after having determined, in each case, the existence of a breach of the peace or a threat to the peace.¹⁰⁷ The decisions of the Council by which those measures were imposed, altered or implemented will be set out in the following brief overview (section A).¹⁰⁸ This overview will be followed in

¹⁰⁷ In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council made such a determination in a decision prior to the resolution imposing such measures (see resolution 660 (1990), second preambular para.). In all other situations, this determination was made by the same decision by which such measures were imposed (see the study on the practice of the Security Council in connection with Article 39 in part I of the present chapter).

section B by a short summary of Member States’ views, as expressed in the Council’s deliberations, on salient issues raised in connection with these measures.

A. Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 41

1. Measures imposed against Iraq

By resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, the Council imposed a broad range of measures against Iraq in order to secure its compliance with the Council’s demand to withdraw immediately and unconditionally all its forces from the territory of Kuwait, and to restore the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait.¹⁰⁹ Those measures included, in particular, a ban on all international trade, but envisaged an exemption for imports of medicine and health supplies and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs. By the same resolution, the Council established a committee charged with monitoring the implementation of those measures.

By resolution 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, the Council authorized Member States cooperating with Kuwait to use “such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary ... to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990)”.

Chapter VII of the Charter, inter alia, called on those concerned “to ensure that measures are taken, consistent with the provisions of Article VII of annex 2 to the Paris Agreements, to prevent the supply of petroleum products to the areas occupied by any Cambodian party not complying with the military agreements”. By the same resolution, the Council undertook “to consider appropriate measures to be implemented should the Party of Democratic Kampuchea obstruct the implementation of the peace plan, such as the freezing of the assets held by the Party of Democratic Kampuchea outside Cambodia”.

By resolution 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, the Council decided that the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) was to keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under constant review, in order to make the necessary determination as to whether “humanitarian circumstances” had arisen.

By resolution 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, the Council confirmed that the embargo applied “to all means of transport, including aircraft”.¹¹⁰

By resolution 686 (1991), which was adopted on 2 March 1991 after the suspension of the military operations conducted by an alliance of States against the Iraqi forces in accordance with resolution 678 (1990),¹¹¹ the Council affirmed that all previous resolutions, including resolution 661 (1990), continued to have full force and effect.¹¹²

By resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991,¹¹³ the Council linked the termination of the measures imposed under resolution 661 (1990) to the compliance by Iraq with certain disarmament requirements, and to arrangements for the compensation of any direct loss, damage or injury suffered by foreign Governments, nationals and corporations as a result of Iraq’s unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait.¹¹⁴ By the same resolution, the Council endorsed the recommendation of the Committee established pursuant to resolution 661 (1990) to make the exemption for supplies of foodstuffs envisaged in resolution 661 (1990) immediately effective,¹¹⁵ and to allow for the import of certain materials and supplies for essential humanitarian needs.¹¹⁶

By resolution 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991, the Council authorized States to permit the import of certain quantities of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq, and decided that a portion of the proceeds of sale would be made available to the Secretary-General, to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicines and the Secretary-General and ICRC on the deteriorating humanitarian situation in Iraq, the Committee established pursuant to 661 (1990) had decided “to make, with immediate effect, a general determination that humanitarian circumstances appl[ied] with respect to the entire civilian population of Iraq in all parts of Iraq’s national territory”. The Committee had also concluded that certain essential civilian and humanitarian imports to Iraq were “integrally related to the supply of foodstuffs and supplies intended strictly for medical purposes (which [were] exempt from sanctions under the provisions of resolution 661 (1990)) and that such imports should also be allowed with immediate effect”. The Committee had further decided upon “a simple notification procedure for foodstuffs supplied to Iraq and a no-objection procedure for those civilian and humanitarian imports (other than supplies intended strictly for medical purposes)”. The Committee’s decision was brought to the attention of all Member States in a note by the Secretary-General (S/22400, annex). The relevant reports prepared by the Secretariat and ICRC were attached to a letter from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council dated 20 March 1991 (S/22366).

¹¹⁰ In resolution 670 (1990), which was adopted by 14 votes to 1 (Cuba) at the 2943rd meeting, the Council also confirmed, however, that the ban on flights to Iraq did not apply to deliveries of food in humanitarian circumstances, subject to authorization by the Council or the Committee, or supplies intended strictly for medical purposes.

¹¹¹ The suspension of combat operations was noted in the preamble to resolution 686 (1991), when the Council also referred to “the need to be assured of Iraq’s peaceful intentions, and the objective expressed in resolution 678 (1990) of restoring international peace and security in the region”.

¹¹² The resolution was adopted at the 2978th meeting, by 11 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 3 abstentions (China, India, Yemen).

¹¹³ The resolution was adopted at the 2981st meeting, by 12 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 2 abstentions (Ecuador, Yemen).

¹¹⁴ See resolution 687 (1991), para. 22.

¹¹⁵ On 22 March 1991, after having received reports from materials and supplies for essential civilian needs.¹¹⁷ Resolution 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991 comprised provisions aimed at the implementation of the goals established by resolution 706 (1991).

By resolution 778 (1992) of 2 October 1992, the Council noted that Iraq had rejected both resolution 706 (1991) and resolution 712 (1991). In the light of Iraq's refusal to cooperate in the implementation of those resolutions, and in order to generate the funds required for the purposes referred to in resolution 706 (1991), the Council therefore decided that States in which there were funds representing Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products, paid for after 6 August 1990, were to transfer such funds to the escrow account established by the United Nations in accordance with resolution 706 (1991).¹¹⁸

2. Measures imposed against Yugoslavia

Embargo on arms deliveries to the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 713 (1991), adopted on 25 September 1991 following the outbreak of hostilities in the former Yugoslavia, the Council decided, under Chapter VII of the Charter, that "for the purposes of establishing peace and security in Yugoslavia", all States were to "immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia until the Council decide[d] otherwise following consultations between the Secretary-General and the Government of Yugoslavia".¹¹⁹

¹¹⁷ The authorization was limited to a period of six months and to a value to be determined by the Council, but not to exceed US$ 1.6 billion. Each petroleum purchase was to be approved by the Committee. Petroleum imports also remained subject to the approval by the Council of a scheme for the purchase of humanitarian supplies. In addition to purchases of humanitarian supplies, the proceeds of sale were also to be used to finance war reparations, and costs incurred by the United Nations in carrying out specific tasks mandated by the Security Council.

¹¹⁸ Resolution 778 (1992) also envisaged that States in which there were Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products were to purchase or arrange for the sale of such petroleum or petroleum products at fair market value, and thereupon to transfer the proceeds to the said escrow account.

¹¹⁹ By resolution 724 (1991), the Council established a committee to monitor the implementation of the embargo

By resolution 727 (1992), which was adopted on 8 January 1992, after the disintegration of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council decided that the embargo would continue to apply to all areas that had been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding.¹²⁰

Measures imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

By resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, the Council imposed a broad range of measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), including a ban on all international trade and financial transactions, with the exception of "supplies intended for strictly medical purposes and foodstuffs".¹²¹ The measures adopted also included a suspension of scientific and technical cooperation and sports and cultural exchanges with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The objective of those measures was to ensure compliance with resolution 752 (1992) of 15 May 1992, by which the Council had demanded that all parties involved in Bosnia and Herzegovina stop fighting immediately and respect the ceasefire of 12 April 1992;¹²² that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately;¹²³ that action be taken regarding units of the Yugoslav People's Army in Bosnia and Herzegovina, including the disbanding and disarming of any units that were neither withdrawn nor placed under the authority of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina;¹²⁴ and that all irregular forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina be disbanded and disarmed.¹²⁵ imposed by resolution 713 (1991).

¹²¹ Such supplies were to be notified to the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991). The exemptions provided for under resolution 757 (1992) were subsequently expanded by resolution 760 (1992), so as to include "commodities and products for essential humanitarian need". The supply of such commodities and products was subject to approval by the Committee.

¹²² Resolution 752 (1992), para. 1.

¹²³ Ibid., para. 3.

¹²⁴ Ibid., para. 4.

¹²⁵ Ibid., para. 5.

By resolution 787 (1992) of 15 November 1992, the Council prohibited the trans-shipment of strategic goods through Yugoslavia in order to prevent their diversion in violation of resolution 757 (1992); and called upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary” to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, and all shipping on the Danube River, in order to inspect and verify cargoes and destinations.¹²⁶

3. Measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, the Council banned all international air travel to and from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, with the exception of flights approved on grounds of significant humanitarian need; imposed a ban on the supply of aircraft and aircraft components; prohibited the supply of arms and related materials to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya; required States to reduce the number and level of the staff at Libyan diplomatic and consular missions abroad; and restricted the travel of Libyan nationals suspected of terrorist activity.¹²⁷

The objective of these measures was to ensure that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist attacks against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA 772;¹²⁸ and that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would commit itself definitely “to cease all types of terrorist action and all assistance to terrorist groups”, which commitment was to be demonstrated by concrete actions.

4. Embargo on arms deliveries to Somalia

By resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, the Council decided, under Chapter VII of the Charter, that “for the purposes of establishing peace and security in Somalia”, all States were to “immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Somalia” until the Council decided otherwise”.

By resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Council called upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, “to use such measures as may be necessary” to ensure the strict implementation of the arms embargo.

5. Embargo on arms deliveries to Liberia

By resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992, the Council decided, under Chapter VII of the Charter, that “for the purposes of establishing peace and security in Liberia”, all States were to “immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia” until the Council decided otherwise.

B. Constitutional discussion relating to Article 41

This overview will focus on the principal arguments advanced in relation to Article 41 with respect to several situations before the Council. Special attention is given to those issues that were raised by or affected several Member States.

This section sets out case studies highlighting the arguments raised relating to the following issues:

- Discussion on measures under Article 41
- Humanitarian impact of measures under Article 41
- Employment of force in the implementation of measures under Article 41
- Duration of measures imposed under Article 41
- Obligations of States non-members of the United Nations to apply measures under Article 41.

1. Discussion on measures under Article 41

The question of the potential of measures under Article 41 of the Charter to form an effective instrument for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security was debated extensively during the period under review, in particular in connection with the measures imposed ¹²⁶ See resolution 787 (1992), paras. 12 and 13.

¹²⁸ By resolution 731 (1992), the Council had urged the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya immediately to provide a full and effective response to the requests of the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States to cooperate fully in the relevant investigations.

against Iraq, Yugoslavia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.¹²⁹

Case 8

Measures imposed against Iraq

At the 2933rd meeting, on 6 August 1990, at which the Security Council adopted resolution 661 (1990), several Council members expressed the hope that the measures imposed against Iraq by that resolution would help to ensure Iraq's compliance with the demand that Iraq withdraw its forces from the territory of Kuwait.

Noting that many individual States and several regional organizations¹³⁰ had condemned the Iraqi invasion, the representative of the United States observed that the resolution would "give effect to their condemnations of this invasion and to all calls for immediate and unconditional withdrawal". He stated that, by the proposed resolution, the Council would declare to Iraq that it would use the means ... provided in Chapter VII of the Charter to give effect to Security Council resolution 660 (1990). Iraq needed to learn "that its disregard for international law [would] have crippling political and economic costs, including, but not limited to, arms cut-offs". The speaker stated that the Council's concerted resolve would demonstrate that the international community did not — and would not — accept "Baghdad's preference for the use of force, coercion and intimidation".¹³¹

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that "economic sanctions should not be regarded as a prelude to anything else", and stressed that economic sanctions were "designed to avoid the circumstances in which military action might otherwise arise".¹³²

The representative of Malaysia said he hoped that the broad sanctions envisaged in the draft resolution would be of short duration, given prompt compliance by Iraq with resolution 660 (1990).¹³³

Some speakers also believed that the measures could serve as a warning to help avoid similar situations in the future. The representative of Zaire noted that his vote "should be seen as a warning to all those who might be tempted to use their military force in the future to bring about institutional changes in other countries whose only fault is to be small or militarily weak".¹³⁴ The representative of Colombia believed that, in spite of the negative consequences that might result from the imposition of the measures, they had to be adopted "for the sake of peace and future generations".¹³⁵

However, the representative of Iraq, noting that his Government had already begun to withdraw its troops, claimed that the proposed resolution would only "exacerbate the crisis in the Gulf region and impede the withdrawal of forces".¹³⁶ This view was shared by the representative of Cuba, who believed that the imposition of the proposed sanctions would tend "to complicate the situation even more at a time when Iraq [had] begun withdrawing its troops", and "would also impede the current actions and efforts of the Arab States to arrive at a solution".¹³⁷ In a similar vein, the representative of Yemen contended that "the brotherly Arab means of containing the conflict [was] the valid and effective way of dealing with it".¹³⁸

¹²⁹ The question was also addressed by several speakers during the 3046th meeting of the Council, held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 under the item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security". At that meeting, the President of the United States observed that progress in achieving the aims of the Council stemmed from "acting in concert" and urged that it was necessary to deal resolutely with "renegade regimes", and "if necessary by sanctions or stronger measures, in order to compel them to observe international standards of behaviour". Moreover, terrorists and their State sponsors should know that there would be "serious consequences" if they violated international law (S/PV.3046, p. 53). This view was also held by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe, whose representative advocated the increased use of economic sanctions to ensure compliance with Security Council resolutions (ibid., pp. 123-125).

Case 9

Arms embargo imposed against the former Yugoslavia

At the 3009th meeting, on 25 September 1991, at which the Council unanimously adopted resolution 713 (1991), a number of speakers expressly stated their hope and belief that the arms embargo imposed by that resolution would help to restore peace.

The representative of Yugoslavia, acknowledging that Yugoslavia was “in conflict with itself”¹³⁹ and that it had “not been able to resolve the crisis” on its own,¹⁴⁰ stated that it was essential “for the international community to be engaged in an active and constructive way in seeking a solution by imposing a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to all parties in Yugoslavia”.¹⁴¹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the decision to impose the embargo since the shipment of arms to Yugoslavia “could lead to a further exacerbation of the situation in the country, in the Balkans and in Europe as a whole”.¹⁴² The representative of France stated that the Council was “helping peace in Yugoslavia by decreeing a general and complete embargo on arms deliveries to that country”.¹⁴³ The Romanian representative referred to the “paramount importance” of instituting the embargo until peace and stability had been established, noting that “the illegal introduction of weapons to Yugoslavia had contributed, to a great extent, to the current obstacles in the way of a peaceful settlement of the Yugoslav crisis”.¹⁴⁴

However, at the open debates held on 13 and 16 November 1992,¹⁴⁵ after the disintegration of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and in the light of the continued application of the embargo to all areas that previously formed part of that State,¹⁴⁶ the representative of the newly founded Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, supported by a number of States non-members of the Council, contended that the continuation of the arms embargo would not help to restore peace. Instead, the cause of peace would be furthered if the embargo were selectively lifted, so that it would no longer apply to Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina emphasized that “from the victims’ perspective, self-defence does not increase conflict, but rather reduce the brutal and murderous consequences of aggression directed at civilians”.¹⁴⁷ He contended that “self-defence through legitimate and lawful authorities or through international mechanisms ... makes peace a reality, rather than an uncertain and far-off goal”.¹⁴⁸

The representative of Turkey stated that if Bosnia and Herzegovina had adequate means to protect itself, then perhaps the aggressor might be induced “to resort to dialogue to overcome differences”.¹⁴⁹ The representative of Pakistan argued that lifting the embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina would not exacerbate the conflict, contending that the experience of Croatia had indicated “that the Serbs halted their onslaught only after the Croats were enabled to put up a stiff resistance”.¹⁵⁰ The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran believed that lifting the embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina was “the only effective means to stop the aggression, short of international military action”.¹⁵¹

On the other hand, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the introduction of more arms into the region “could only lead to more killing, more suffering and the jeopardizing of efforts to deliver humanitarian supplies to those in need”.¹⁵² The representative of Ecuador agreed that the lifting of the embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina would not contribute to the cause of peace, as violence would “not be eliminated by increasing the flow of arms”.¹⁵³

¹⁴⁵ 3134th to 3137th meetings.

¹⁴⁶ By resolution 727 (1992), which was unanimously adopted at the 3028th meeting on 8 January 1992, the Council had reaffirmed the embargo and decided that it would continue to apply to “all areas that have been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding” (see paragraph 6 of that resolution and the report of the Secretary-General referred to therein (S/23363, para. 33)).

These views were shared, by Mr. Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen, co-Chairmen of the International Conference on Yugoslavia, who argued that the cause of peace would be best served by maintaining the embargo. Mr. Vance believed that lifting the arms embargo would only increase hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and could spread the conflict throughout the Balkan region.¹⁵⁴ Lord Owen observed that “prohibiting arms sales tends to dampen conflict while pushing arms sales deepens conflict”.¹⁵⁵

At its 3137th meeting, on 16 November 1992, the Council adopted resolution 787 (1992), by which it reaffirmed resolution 713 (1991) and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and thereby the continued application of the arms embargo to all parties to the conflict.¹⁵⁶

Measures imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

At the 3082nd meeting, on 30 May 1992, at which the Council adopted resolution 757 (1992), the sponsors of that resolution, supported by several other speakers, argued that the measures imposed by that resolution against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would help to facilitate a solution to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina.¹⁵⁷

The representative of the United States, acknowledging that the measures which the Council was about to take were “serious and comprehensive”, stated that his Government was “determined to see them through and if necessary to seek further measures”, until the Serbian regime changed course.¹⁵⁸ The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the measures were “designed purely and simply to try to bring about a peaceful solution; to bring the parties back to the negotiating table; to get them off the battlefield, to bring home to them that this [was] bankrupt policy, that it [would] lead nowhere”.¹⁵⁹ The representative of France stated that the purpose of resolution 757 (1992) was “not to punish or isolate certain parties, but to use pressure to promote the pursuit of peace efforts and the resumption of inter-community dialogue in Bosnia and Herzegovina”.¹⁶⁰ The representative of the Russian Federation acknowledged that, in voting for the resolution, it was “discharging its obligations as a permanent member of the Security Council for the maintenance of international law and order”.¹⁶¹ The representative of Hungary expressed the view that, by adopting the resolution, the Council was reaffirming its credibility and taking “a very important step towards the containment of aggression and the restoration of peace and stability”.¹⁶² The representative of Ecuador believed that the measures would “contribute to the restoration of common sense and good judgement, especially in the minds of the leaders in the region”.¹⁶³

The representatives of China and Zimbabwe, who abstained from voting on the resolution, expressed the concern that the measures envisaged in the resolution might be counter-productive.¹⁶⁴ The representative of China believed that sanctions would “probably lead to a further deterioration of the situation”.¹⁶⁵ The representative of Zimbabwe questioned whether the imposition of sanctions would “encourage all the parties involved to cooperate fully in reaching a negotiated solution, or militate against this essential ingredient to any lasting solution”, and whether such measures would “contribute towards confidence-building among the parties involved, or lead to desperate acts by some of the parties”.¹⁶⁶

Questions as to the usefulness of sanctions were also raised by India, which, however, “decided to defer to the collective judgement of other members of the Council” and, “in response to the international call for deterrent action”, voted in favour of the resolution (S/PV.3082, p. 24).

¹⁶⁵ S/PV.3082, pp. 9-10. China reiterated that concern at the 3137th meeting, when the Council adopted resolution 787 (1992) (S/PV.3137, p. 121).

¹⁶⁶ S/PV.3082, pp. 13-14.

Following the debate, resolution 757 (1992) was adopted with the affirmative votes of 13 members of the Council.¹⁶⁷

Case 11

Measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

At the open debate held on 31 March 1992,¹⁶⁸ in connection with the adoption of resolution 748 (1992), the sponsors of that resolution,¹⁶⁹ supported by several other speakers, argued that the imposition of the proposed measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would be in conformity with the Council's responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The representative of the United States stated that, by imposing such measures, the Council was sending a message that it would use its powers under the Charter to "preserve the rule of law and ensure the peaceful resolution of threats to international peace and security".¹⁷⁰ The representative of the United Kingdom believed that the Council was fully entitled to take such measures to address terrorism, and that any other view would "seriously weaken the Council's ability to maintain peace and security in future circumstances which are unforeseen and unforeseeable".¹⁷¹ He further contended that, by adopting resolution 748 (1992), the Council was acting "in full conformity with its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security".¹⁷²

The representative of Hungary felt that the Council had to "take further measures to ensure compliance with its own resolutions", noting that it was necessary "to act individually and collectively against any terrorist challenge ... and to do everything possible to put an end once and for all to this crime against humanity".¹⁷³ The representative of Austria, describing terrorism as "the most dangerous threat to international peace and security", agreed that it was appropriate for the Security Council "to deal firmly with this matter", noting that the proposed measures were not "punishment" but that they had been introduced "in order to make a certain member of the international community comply with its obligations under the Charter".¹⁷⁴

The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, however, contended that the measures about to be adopted by the Council would "undermine the basis of international law and open the door to chaos, with a particular threat to the future of smaller States".¹⁷⁵

The representatives of China and Zimbabwe, who abstained from voting on the resolution, believed that such measures would not help to settle the question. The representative of China stated that the imposition of such measures would "complicate the issue further, aggravate regional tension and have serious economic consequences for the countries concerned in the region".¹⁷⁶ The representative of Zimbabwe contended that the approach taken by the Council could have "far-reaching ramifications which could cause irreparable harm to the credibility and prestige of the Organization, with dire consequences for a stable and peaceful world order".¹⁷⁷

Similar views were expressed by several States non-members of the Council. The representative of Jordan felt that the adoption of the proposed draft resolution might "undermine the hopes which the Arab people and public opinion [were] pinning on reaching a peaceful settlement satisfactory to all parties".¹⁷⁸ The representative of Iraq stated that Iraq did "not believe that harm would be done to international peace and security" if the Council showed patience and persisted in following up efforts to achieve the desired solution.¹⁷⁹ The Permanent Observer of the Organization of the Islamic Conference expressed the concern that the imposition of the proposed measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya would not "help resolve the issue", but would "uselessly increase tension among members of the international

2. Humanitarian impact of measures under Article 41

The humanitarian impact of economic sanctions was addressed in the Council’s decisions and deliberations in connection with the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990) on Iraq and Kuwait, by resolution 748 (1992) on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, and by resolution 757 (1992) on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.¹⁸²

A brief summary of the Council’s decisions and debates addressing humanitarian concerns in connection with the application of those measures is set out below.

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, by which the Council imposed a general ban on all international trade with Iraq, provided that imports of medicine and health supplies would be exempted from the ban. In addition, the resolution provided that an exemption for foodstuffs would be made in the event of “humanitarian circumstances”. By resolution 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, the Council decided that the committee charged with monitoring the implementation of the sanctions, which had been established by resolution 661 (1990), would keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under constant review, in order to determine whether such “humanitarian circumstances” had arisen.

During debates held in August and September 1990,¹⁸³ the majority of the Council members, while acknowledging the humanitarian consequences which the sanctions regime would entail,¹⁸⁴ emphasized that it was important for the Council to show resolve in the face of Iraq’s breach of the peace.¹⁸⁵ Several speakers noted that the need for sanctions, and therefore the humanitarian problem, were a result of the Iraqi aggression, and the problem could only be solved once that aggression had been brought to an end.¹⁸⁶ Pending such a solution, it was generally believed that the humanitarian situation could be adequately addressed through the arrangements for humanitarian exemptions envisaged in resolutions 661 (1990) and 666 (1990).¹⁸⁷

However, some Council members opposed the sanctions regime, calling it inhuman,¹⁸⁸ or charged that

¹⁸¹ Cape Verde, China, India, Morocco and Zimbabwe abstained from voting on the resolution.

¹⁸² The issue of humanitarian sanctions was also addressed at the 3046th meeting of the Security Council, held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 under the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”. At that meeting, the Prime Minister of India emphasized that it was incumbent on the Security Council to anticipate the consequences of its decisions, arguing that it should act decisively and in a timely manner to alleviate human suffering, once the primary purpose of economic sanctions had been fulfilled (S/PV.3046, pp. 97-98). The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe called upon the Council to look once more at the effect of economic sanctions upon innocent civilians living in a State whose Government they could not change, observing that such people lacked the political means to reverse the very policies that had given rise to the offence being sanctioned (ibid., pp. 124-125).

¹⁸⁷ See, for example, the statements of the representatives of the Soviet Union (S/PV.2939, p. 72), Finland (ibid., p. 61), Malaysia (ibid., p. 60) and Zaire (ibid., pp. 44-46).

the provisions for humanitarian exemptions were inadequate or had been interpreted in an inhumane manner.¹⁸⁹

The humanitarian impact of the sanctions regime was again discussed in March and April 1991, following the suspension of the military enforcement action against Iraq,¹⁹⁰ in connection with the adoption of resolutions 686 (1991) and 687 (1991).¹⁹¹ By those resolutions, the Council affirmed the continued application of the sanctions regime, but, in the light of the prevailing humanitarian crisis in Iraq, decided to make the exemption for supplies of foodstuffs envisaged in resolutions 661 (1990) and 666 (1990) immediately effective, and to permit the import of “materials and supplies for essential humanitarian needs”, subject to approval by the Committee.¹⁹²

the access of the civilian population and the foreign nationals in Iraq and Kuwait to basic foodstuffs, medical supplies and medical assistance”. The draft resolution was not adopted, however, as it received only 3 affirmative votes (China, Cuba, Yemen).

¹⁸⁹ See in particular the statements made by the representative of Yemen at the 2939th and 2943rd meetings (S/PV.2939, p. 11, and S/PV.2943, pp. 16-17). (Yemen abstained from voting on resolution 661 (1990) and voted against resolution 666 (1990).)

While most Council members believed that these provisions appropriately addressed the humanitarian problems of the civilian population,¹⁹³ a number of speakers expressed the belief that all restrictions relating to the civilian needs of the Iraqi population should be lifted forthwith.¹⁹⁴ However, a proposal submitted by one delegation to declare null and void all restrictions regarding trade in foodstuffs and other essential civilian products did not find the required majority.¹⁹⁵

In order to generate the funds required for the purchase of humanitarian supplies exempted under resolutions 661 (1990) and 666 (1990), the Council, by resolution 706 (1991), adopted on 15 August 1991,¹⁹⁶ authorized States to permit the import of certain quantities of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq, on the condition that the purchase price for each such petroleum import was to be paid into an escrow account to be administered by the Secretary-General.¹⁹⁷

¹⁹⁵ See the amendments contained in documents S/22315 and S/22316, submitted by Cuba. The amendments formed part of a set of 18 amendments proposed by Cuba during the meeting (S/22300-S/22317). The representatives of Yemen (S/PV.2978, p. 26) and Ecuador (ibid., p. 82) agreed with the Cuban position that the resolution should have included provisions providing for the end of the sanctions regime for humanitarian reasons.

¹⁹⁷ The authorization was limited to a period of six months and to a value to be determined by the Council, but not to exceed US$ 1.6 billion. Each petroleum purchase was to be approved by the Committee. Petroleum imports also remained subject to the approval by the Council of a scheme for the purchase of humanitarian supplies. In addition to purchases of humanitarian supplies, the proceeds of sale were to be used to finance war reparations, and costs incurred by the United Nations in carrying out specific tasks mandated by the Security Council. Provisions aimed at the implementation of resolution 706 (1991) are contained in resolution 712 (1991). Both resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991) were adopted by 13 to 1 (Cuba), with 1 abstention (Yemen).

While most Council members were confident that this arrangement would help to meet the essential humanitarian needs of the Iraqi civilian population,¹⁹⁸ individual Council members believed that it would not be sufficient to alleviate the humanitarian crisis.¹⁹⁹ Some concern was also expressed with regard to the limitations that the administration of the scheme by the United Nations would impose on Iraq's sovereignty.²⁰⁰ Other speakers emphasized, however, that effective supervision and monitoring by the United Nations would be essential for the equitable distribution of humanitarian supplies.²⁰¹

The proposed arrangement failed to be implemented, however, owing to its rejection by Iraq.²⁰² In the light of Iraq's refusal to cooperate and the resulting lack of funds to implement the envisaged arrangement, the Security Council decided in October 1992 that all States in which there were funds from Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products, paid for after 6 August 1990, were to transfer such funds to the escrow account established by the United Nations in accordance with resolution 706 (1991).²⁰³

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

By resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, the Council imposed a ban on all international air travel to and from the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, a general embargo on all sales of arms and military equipment to that country, and certain restrictions on Libyan diplomatic and consular personnel. With regard to the ban on air travel, the resolution provided that exemptions would be granted for flights approved on grounds of significant humanitarian need.²⁰⁴

At the open debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution,²⁰⁵ the sponsors of the draft resolution²⁰⁶ emphasized that the scope of the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya had been tailored precisely to those areas that could be used to support international terrorism.²⁰⁷ They were not, therefore, aimed at the Libyan people, who were not responsible for the actions of their leaders.²⁰⁸ In this context, the sponsors also emphasized that the resolutions specifically provided for humanitarian exemptions from the flight ban, and noted that it was

See also the statement by the representative of India, who believed that resolution 706 (1991) tried to meet humanitarian concerns "to some extent", but noted that his delegation "would have preferred a clear and unambiguous approach to this issue" (S/PV.3004, pp. 94-97).

²⁰⁰ See in particular the statement by the representative of China, who emphasized that, in the implementation of the resolution, it would be necessary to respect the sovereignty of Iraq, and to allow it to play its proper role in the purchase and distribution of the food, medicine and other materials required to meet essential civilian needs (S/PV.3004, pp. 81-82).

²⁰¹ See for example the statements by the representatives of the United States (S/PV.3004, p. 79; and S/PV.3008, p. 18), the United Kingdom (S/PV.3004, p. 84) and Belgium (S/PV.3004, p. 92).

²⁰³ See resolution 778 (1992), adopted at the 3117th meeting. The resolution also envisaged that States in which there were Iraqi petroleum or petroleum products were to purchase or arrange for the sale of such petroleum or petroleum products at fair market value, and thereupon to transfer the proceeds to the escrow account.

²⁰⁴ According to resolution 748 (1992), exemptions were to be approved by the Committee established pursuant to that resolution, which would "consider and decide upon expeditiously any application by States for the approval of flights on the grounds of significant humanitarian need" (see resolution 748 (1992), paras. 4 (a) and 9 (e)).

the Council's intention that such exemptions would include pilgrims wishing to go to Mecca.²⁰⁹

Some speakers nevertheless expressed concern about the potential humanitarian impact which the measures imposed by that resolution would have on the Libyan people.²¹⁰

Case 14

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, the Council imposed a general ban on international trade with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). Exemptions were, however, envisaged for "supplies intended for strictly medical purposes and foodstuffs", which were to be notified to the Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991). Those exemptions were subsequently expanded by resolution 760 (1992), so as to include "commodities and products for essential humanitarian need", subject to approval by the Committee.

The potential humanitarian impact of the sanctions regime was discussed both in connection with its imposition by resolution 757 (1992) and in connection with the adoption of measures aimed at its enforcement in November 1992.²¹¹ During the debates speakers acknowledged the adverse impact of the sanctions regimes on the civilian population,²¹² but generally agreed that the Council had to display determination to enforce the measures it had adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter.²¹³

Individual speakers expressed the view, however, that continued negotiations would be preferable to the imposition of sanctions, which would only add to the suffering of the civilian population.²¹⁴

Other speakers emphasized that the right balance would have to be struck so that sanctions served as a political tool without disproportionately affecting the most vulnerable strata of the civilian population.²¹⁵

3. Employment of force in the implementation of measures under Article 41

In connection with the measures imposed against Iraq and Yugoslavia,²¹⁶ the Council, by resolutions 665 (1990) and 787 (1992) respectively, authorized States to use "such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary" to halt maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify cargoes and destinations, and to ensure strict implementation of the respective embargo regimes.²¹⁷

The debates held in connection with the adoption of those resolutions touched on the question whether such implementing measures might include the use of

²¹⁵ See in particular the statement by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who had been invited to brief the Council members at the 3134th meeting (S/PV.3134, pp. 34-35). See also the statement by the representative of France, who noted that France was determined that the sanctions should not lead to the "total isolation of the populations involved" (S/PV.3082, p. 40).

²¹⁷ In addition to those decisions, the Council, by resolution 794 (1992), called upon States to use "such measures as may be necessary" to ensure the strict implementation of the arms embargo imposed against Somalia. However, the debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution did not specifically focus on that provision of the resolution. This may partly be due to the fact that the same resolution also authorized the use of "all necessary means" to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations, which was the main focus of the debate (see S/PV.3145).

force, and whether Article 41 could be deemed to permit implicitly a “minimum use of force” to ensure the effective implementation of embargo regimes.²¹⁸ The arguments advanced by Member States in relation to this question are briefly summarized below.

Measures imposed against Iraq

One week after the adoption of resolution 661 (1991),²¹⁹ the United States informed the President of the Security Council that it had deployed military forces to the Gulf region.²²⁰ At a meeting held on the same day,²²¹ the representative of the United States explained that the increase of the United States presence in the region was in accordance with the right of collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, but also noted that the action had been taken “in consistency with Article 41 and resolution 661 (1990)”.²²² This view was shared by the representative of the United Kingdom, who announced that his Government had agreed “to contribute forces to a multinational force for the collective defence of the territory of Saudi Arabia and other threatened States in the area”, and also stated that his Government saw “the close monitoring of maritime traffic as a key element in making the embargo effective”.²²³

The representative of Iraq contended at a later meeting that the United States had “arrogated to itself the right to impose a maritime blockade against Iraq without calling it by that name”. He believed that the conduct of the United States and the United Kingdom constituted “aggression against Iraq”.²²⁴ The representative of Cuba expressed the view that the action taken by the United States military forces to guarantee the implementation of resolution 661 (1990) constituted “not only a violation of the Charter but a violation of resolution 661 (1990) itself”. The representative contended that resolution 661 (1990) did not authorize anyone “to implement the resolution by military means”, noting that resolution 661 (1990) was clearly based on Article 41 of the Charter, which refers to measures “not involving the use of force”.²²⁵

At a meeting held on 25 August 1990,²²⁶ the Council adopted resolution 665 (1990), by which it expressly authorized Member States cooperating with Kuwait to use “such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations, and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990)”.

During the deliberations in connection with the adoption of that resolution,²²⁷ the representative of the United States explained that the Council had been forced “to tighten the application of the sanctions regime”, owing to Iraq’s defiance of the Council and its resolution 661 (1990). The representative emphasized that his country, along with all the other members of the Council, intended to ensure that its resolutions and its actions had meaning and were observed. Noting that naval forces had initially been deployed “at the request of the legitimate Government of Kuwait, in accordance with the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter”, the representative stated that resolution 665 (1990) provided “an additional and most welcome basis under United Nations authority for actions to secure compliance with the sanctions mandated by resolution 661 (1990)”.²²⁸

The representative of France noted that the resolution provided for “appropriate measures” to ensure respect for the embargo, “including the minimum use of force”, but stressed that such measures had to be applied only as “a last resort” and that they ought to be “limited to what is strictly necessary”. The resolution could not be understood, therefore, “as a blanket authorization for the indiscriminate use of force”. The representative also believed that, in each case, the use of coercion would require “notification of the Security Council”.²²⁹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, while noting that the resolution was “intended to expand the array of means available for implementing the sanctions”, emphasized that measures taken ought to be “commensurate to the circumstances” and that “political and diplomatic methods should be employed to the maximum degree possible”.²³⁰

The representative of China, while voting in favour of the resolution, held a different view with regard to the interpretation of its text and expressed strong reservations with regard to its adoption. He contended that the resolution did not contain the concept of using force and recalled that the reference to a “minimum use of force” had been intentionally deleted from the draft resolution. He argued that the measures authorized by the resolution had to be taken within the framework of resolution 661 (1990), which did not provide for the use of force and would not allow force to be used for its implementation.²³¹

The representative of Yemen, who voted against the resolution, believed that the Council was moving “too quickly towards the use of force to impose the provisions of the Security Council resolutions on the embargo”.²³² The representative of Cuba, who also voted against the resolution, expressed the view that Article 41 precluded the use of force to give effect to economic measures imposed by the Council.²³³ Similar views were expressed by the representative of Iraq, who had been invited to participate in the debate.²³⁴

Reservations were also expressed by the representative of Colombia, who believed that, by adopting the resolution, the Council was in fact establishing a naval blockade and therefore acting pursuant to Article 42 of the Charter. He also criticized the proposed resolution for not clearly defining the role of the Security Council and its powers to supervise any action taken by States.²³⁵

Measures imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

In the debates leading up to the adoption of resolution 787 (1992),²³⁶ by which the Council called upon States to use “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary” to ensure that maritime shipping and shipping on the Danube did not contravene the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992), several Council members stated why they believed those measures to be necessary.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the measures were necessary to ensure that sanctions were not “breached by way of the Danube or the Adriatic”, adding that the authorities in Belgrade and the Bosnian Serbs had to be “made to realize that the cost of their policies [was] economic ruin and the status of a pariah in world affairs”.²³⁷ This view was shared by the representative of the United States, who believed that the resolution would help to prevent the Adriatic and the Danube “from being used to circumvent the embargo”, and stated that “sanctions-busters [would] be stopped and turned back”.²³⁸ The representative of Ecuador felt that the measures aimed at the surveillance and control of maritime shipping were “very important elements” that would make it possible for the sanctions to achieve their objectives.²³⁹

resolution 787 (1992), and hoped they would help to ensure the implementation of the embargo.²⁴⁰

The representative of China, who abstained from voting on the draft resolution, argued that the use of force would “only complicate the situation, sharpen the differences, intensify the hatred and make it more difficult to solve the problem”. He further noted that China was “not in favour of the use of force in any form in the settlement of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina”.²⁴¹ The question whether Article 41 could be deemed to permit implicitly the use of force to ensure the effective implementation of measures adopted under that Article was not addressed directly during the debates.

4. Duration of measures imposed under Article 41

While the measures adopted in accordance with Article 41 were generally imposed for an unspecified period, most decisions imposing such measures either set out concrete conditions for the termination of these measures,²⁴² or provided for review periods or mechanisms.²⁴³

²⁴⁰ Pakistan expressed the hope that the draft resolution would result in “effective and complete enforcement of the sanctions” (S/PV.3136, p. 33). Canada expressed its strong support for the provision of the draft resolution calling upon all States to use necessary measures to ensure strict application of the sanctions regime, and noted that it had participated in the naval task force monitoring traffic on the Adriatic coast and was participating in sanctions monitoring in neighbouring countries (S/PV.3136, p. 47). Italy, speaking in its capacity as Chairman of the Western European Union, noted that the resolution would “greatly enhance the effectiveness of the embargo” and would help the naval forces of the Western European Union and NATO in the Adriatic Sea to discover and defeat any attempt by sea to “violate or circumvent” the embargo (S/PV.3137, p. 16). Ukraine argued that the draft resolution should envisage “all the necessary steps” to strengthen the effectiveness of the sanctions (S/PV.3137, p. 86). Bangladesh also argued that the sanctions must be “strictly enforced” (S/PV.3137, p. 111).

In connection with the measures imposed against Iraq, States expressed different views with regard to the concrete conditions and the appropriate time for the termination of those measures after the withdrawal of the Iraqi forces from Kuwait. In connection with the arms embargo imposed against the former Yugoslavia, questions with regard to its continued application against Bosnia and Herzegovina were raised after Bosnia and Herzegovina had seceded from Yugoslavia and become an independent State. In connection with the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, questions were raised with regard to the evidence required for that State’s compliance with the demands contained in resolution 748 (1992).

Measures imposed against Iraq

At the 2977th meeting of the Council, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that recent talks held in Moscow between the Soviet leadership and a special representative of Iraq, Mr. Tariq Aziz, had succeeded “in making more specific the readiness expressed by the Iraqi leadership to withdraw their troops from Kuwait on the basis of the decisions of the Security Council”. Accordingly, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics believed that “immediately after the completion of the withdrawal of troops from Kuwait, the reason for the adoption of other Security Council resolutions would have lapsed, and those resolutions would thus cease to be in force”.²⁴⁴

In response, the representative of the United States noted that the steps the Iraqis were considering “would constitute a conditional withdrawal and would should the situation so require, “review the measures imposed by paragraphs 3 to 7 in the light of the compliance by the Libyan Government with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the resolution taking into account, as appropriate, any reports by the Secretary-General on his role as set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 731 (1992)”. By resolution 757 (1992), para. 16, the Council decided “to keep under continuous review the measures imposed by paragraphs 4 to 9 with a view to considering whether such measures might be suspended or terminated following compliance with the requirement of resolution 752 (1992)”.

²⁴⁴ S/PV.2977 (Part II) (closed-resumption 3), p. 296. This view was for example shared by the representative of Cuba (ibid., pp. 318-321).

also prevent the full implementation of relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions”. He noted that the world first had to make sure that Iraq had in fact “renounced its claim to Kuwait and accepted all relevant Security Council resolutions”. Accordingly, only the Security Council “could agree to lift sanctions against Iraq”, and the world needed “to be assured in concrete terms of Iraq’s peaceful intentions” before such action could be taken.²⁴⁵ He stated, therefore, that his Government could not accept the idea of declaring that Security Council resolutions somehow ceased to exist, were null and void or without effect. He cautioned that the Council “must not dismantle at the stroke of a pen” what the Council had built since 2 August until it had “reached agreement on how to restore peace and security to the area”.²⁴⁶ Similar views were expressed by the representatives of the United Kingdom,²⁴⁷ France,²⁴⁸ Romania,²⁴⁹ Kuwait²⁵⁰ and Egypt.²⁵¹

The representative of India urged the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States “to try to work out the differences between their plans of action”, and suggested to Council members “to sit together and find some way out” of what appeared to be an impasse.²⁵² The representative of China, referring to Iraq’s “positive response to the peaceful initiative of the Soviet Union”, believed that the Council should “fulfil its responsibilities by considering and adopting an appropriate plan for the peaceful settlement of the Gulf crisis”.²⁵³

The representative of Cuba believed that, as a result of the agreements reached in Moscow, the Council was obliged “to get down to work immediately to determine the specific steps and actions it should take to make it possible for a plan for a peaceful settlement of the conflict to be carried out as speedily as possible”. He argued that there was a “direct cause and effect relationship between economic sanctions as decided upon by the Council and Iraq’s failure to comply with the terms of paragraph 2 of resolution 660

(1990) — that is to say, fully to withdraw from Kuwait.”²⁵⁴

At the 2978th meeting, on 2 March 1991, following the suspension of the military operations which an alliance of States had conducted against Iraqi forces in accordance with resolution 678 (1990),²⁵⁵ several speakers again questioned the reasons for the continued application of the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990). The representative of India noted that Iraq had “officially confirmed its willingness to comply with all relevant Security Council resolutions”, and stated that it would like the Council “to begin an early examination of the question of sanctions”.²⁵⁶ The representative of Yemen, noting that the draft resolution did “not mention the end of the embargo against Iraq”, recalled that, “when the Council adopted resolution 661 (1990) and imposed a stringent embargo regime against Iraq ..., it was because it was believed that the sanctions would lead to Iraq’s withdrawal and implementation of resolution 660 (1990)”. Accordingly, the representative believed that a reference to the end of the embargo, in particular in relation to food supplies, should have been included.²⁵⁷

The representative of the United States, on the other hand, stressed that Iraq had “much to account for”, and that there was “much yet to be done to fulfil the resolutions of the Council and the requirements of international law”. The representative emphasized that “the price of aggression and its defeat” had been too high to allow it to recur.²⁵⁸ The representative of France agreed that the Organization first had to “consolidate effectively the cessation of hostilities and then ... define the conditions for the lasting restoration of peace and security in the region”.²⁵⁹ The representative of Belgium cautioned that the Council ought to “avoid a situation in which Iraq might again gain an offensive military potential”. Accordingly, it would be necessary “to maintain a military embargo against Iraq”.²⁶⁰

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 686 (1991), by which it affirmed that all previous resolutions, including resolution 661 (1990), continued to have full force and effect.²⁶¹

At its 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991, the Council discussed and adopted the text of resolution 687 (1991), by which it linked the termination of the measures imposed against Iraq by resolution 661 (1990) to, inter alia, compliance by Iraq with certain disarmament requirements.²⁶²

Prior to the adoption of resolution (687 (1991), the representative of Iraq stated that his Government believed “that maintaining the land, sea and air blockade and the freeze of assets — in spite of ... the fact that Iraq has accepted the implementation of all 13 Security Council resolutions on the issue and removed all the reasons that prompted the Security Council to adopt resolution 661 (1990) ... — would be in contravention of the Charter of the United Nations and could be viewed as an economic aggression and a clear violation of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and human rights covenants, foremost among which are the rights to life, dignity and freedom”.²⁶³

The representative of Cuba stated that the Council had “the obligation of eliminating all economic sanctions imposed against Iraq”, because these sanctions had been established on the basis of certain conditions that had ceased to exist. He believed that the Council had “persistently ignored the fact that the economic sanctions were established in order to ensure compliance with one paragraph of resolution 660 (1990), which called for the unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi troops from the territory of Kuwait”. Accordingly, he said, the Security Council, by adopting the proposed resolution, would “continue and confirm a sanctions regime that was not only unjustified, but also the cause of the ongoing problems and suffering of the Iraqi people.”²⁶⁴

The representatives of China, India, Yemen and Ecuador agreed that, in the light of the development of the situation, the measures imposed against Iraq by resolution 661 (1990) ought to be lifted.²⁶⁵

Speaking after the vote, the representative of the United States emphasized that, after having acted “to bring an end to aggression and lawlessness”, the international community, acting through the United Nations, now had to act to restore international peace and security.²⁶⁶ He believed that the resolution created a “dynamic and flexible process “which linked the removal of sanctions to the implementation of the resolution, which would be an “incentive to implement fully the resolution as soon as possible”. He stated that “upon implementation of the provisions dealing with weapons of mass destruction and the compensation regime”, the sanctions against Iraq’s exports would also be lifted.²⁶⁷

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that, just as the Security Council had the primary responsibility to reverse the aggression, so it also had the responsibility “to lay sound foundations for the future” and to ensure that it would not be again “confronted with such a ruthless and comprehensive challenge to international law”. The representative ²⁶¹ The resolution was adopted by 11 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 3 abstentions (China, India, Yemen). The preamble to that resolution refers to “the need to be assured of Iraq’s peaceful intentions and the objective expressed in resolution 678 (1990) of restoring international peace and security in the region”.

²⁶⁴ Ibid., pp. 63-67. (Cuba voted against the draft resolution.)

²⁶⁵ China, which voted in favour of the draft resolution, noted that the resolution included “some unnecessary restriction of the lifting of economic sanctions on Iraq”. Accordingly, China believed that the Security Council should “ease and lift economic sanctions as soon as possible, so as to bring the economy of all the countries in the region back to normality at an early date” (ibid., p. 97). India, which also voted in favour of the resolution, believed that “all non-military sanctions against Iraq should be lifted” as soon as Iraq conveyed acceptance of the draft resolution (ibid., p. 76). Yemen, which abstained from voting, believed that “the insistence of the sponsors of the draft resolution that the embargo be continued with regard to the needs of the Iraqi civilians would hurt only the Iraqi people” (ibid., p. 47). Ecuador, which also abstained from the vote, considered “that the Council must approve the lifting of the sanctions, which are affecting the civilian population of Iraq” (ibid., p. 108).

²⁶⁶ S/PV.2981, pp. 83-85.

added that that was the “objective of the resolution, and the yardstick by which it should be measured”.²⁶⁸

At the 3004th meeting, at which the Council, inter alia, adopted resolution 706 (1991), the representative of Iraq claimed that Iraq had satisfied all conditions set out in resolution 687 (1991) for the lifting of the measures imposed against it by resolution 661 (1991). According to the representative, “a small minority in the Council” prevented the Council from deciding that those conditions had been met.²⁶⁹ The representative also claimed that, “for all intents and purposes”, the draft resolution was “aimed at keeping the embargo in place indefinitely”, which, in his view, only affirmed “that this alliance had the sole aim of destroying Iraq as an effective Arab force influential in determining the fate of the region”.²⁷⁰

Iraq’s demand that the embargo be lifted was supported by Yemen and Cuba. The representative of Yemen, noting that all Council members had affirmed that they were “not against the Iraqi people”, asked why then some insisted on the continuation of its suffering, and why they did not lift from its shoulders the embargo that was harming and weakening Iraqi society day by day.²⁷¹ The representative of Cuba believed that the sanctions against Iraq should have been eliminated at the moment when the causes which were argued in justification of it had disappeared.²⁷²

The representative of Kuwait, however, insisted that the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990) needed to remain in effect until the Iraqi regime ceased “its actions intended to deceive the international community and violate its resolutions”.²⁷³ In particular, he noted that the lifting of the sanctions was closely linked to the return of prisoners to Kuwait in accordance with paragraphs 21 and 30 of resolution 687 (1991),²⁷⁴ as well as Iraq’s cooperation in the area of disarmament.²⁷⁵ Several Council members similarly emphasized that Iraq had not complied with its international obligations under relevant resolutions, in particular its obligations relating to the elimination of its weapons of mass destruction, as required by resolution 687 (1991).²⁷⁶

Measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Resolution 748 (1992), by which the Council imposed a broad range of measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, provided that those measures were to apply until the Council had decided that the Libyan Government had (a) complied with the demand made in resolution 731 (1992) that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya “cooperate fully in establishing responsibility for the terrorist acts against Pan Am flight 103 and UTA flight 772”, and (b) committed itself definitely “to cease all types of terrorist action and all assistance to terrorist groups”.²⁷⁷

At the Council’s 3063rd meeting, on 31 March 1992, at which the text of resolution 748 (1992) was discussed and adopted, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya observed that the conditions for the termination of the measures envisaged in that resolution left his country in a position in which it did not know when the Security Council would decide that it had complied, so that the measures could be lifted. In particular, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya believed that the provisions requiring it to renounce terrorism contained “unspecified demands”.²⁷⁸

The representative of the United Kingdom, however, believed that the members of the Council would understand why, in the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, a simple verbal commitment to renounce terrorism by itself was not adequate, noting that Council members had heard such statements from Colonel Qaddafi in the past, and that the Libyan authorities, by their own admission, had continued afterwards to give direct assistance to terrorists.²⁷⁹

²⁷⁹ Ibid., p. 71.

The representative of Austria reminded Council members that Austria had always stressed the necessity of establishing objective criteria for the provisions on the termination of sanctions. He welcomed the fact that resolution 748 (1992) envisaged that the Council, in reviewing the compliance of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, was to take into account the Secretary-General's reports on his role in seeking that State's cooperation.²⁸⁰

The representative of India, on the other hand, noting the importance of an appropriate definition of the circumstances under which the sanctions would be lifted, regretted that, although the non-aligned members of the Council, as had indeed several other delegations, had explored with the sponsors the injection of more precision in the relevant paragraphs, it had not been possible to remove the vagueness from the draft resolution on that particular point.²⁸¹

Arms embargo imposed against the former Yugoslavia

By resolution 727 (1992), adopted on 8 January 1992 after the disintegration of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council reaffirmed that the arms embargo, which it had imposed against that State by resolution 713 (1991), would continue to apply to all areas that had been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding.²⁸²

During the open debates of the Council held from 13 to 16 November 1992,²⁸³ the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina argued that, through the indiscriminate continuation of the arms embargo, it was effectively denied its right of self-defence. The representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina also contended that the cause of peace would be furthered if the embargo were selectively lifted, so that it would no longer apply to Bosnia and Herzegovina, and that through effective self-defence peace could be made a reality, rather than an uncertain and far-off goal.²⁸⁴

This view was supported by the representatives of several States non-members of the Council, including Turkey,²⁸⁵ Pakistan,²⁸⁶ the Islamic Republic of Iran²⁸⁷ and Afghanistan.²⁸⁸

Other speakers, including the Foreign Minister of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,²⁸⁹ the co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee of the International Conference on Yugoslavia²⁹⁰ and several Council members,²⁹¹ expressly warned however that a selective lifting of the arms embargo would only fuel the conflict, lead to an increase in hostilities throughout the Balkan region, and jeopardize the ²⁸⁸ S/PV.3137, pp. 56-57. In addition to the arguments pertaining to Bosnia and Herzegovina's right of self-defence, the representative of Afghanistan questioned the legality of the continued application of the arms embargo, insofar as it related to Bosnia and Herzegovina, in the light of the original purpose for which the measures had been imposed. Afghanistan argued that resolution 713 (1991) had been designed to address the conflict between Croatia and Serbia and Montenegro and that "in no legal or technical sense" did that resolution pertain to Bosnia and Herzegovina, for it had been adopted in September 1991, while the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina had arisen in April 1992. Afghanistan further argued that, from the legal standpoint, it seemed "senseless to contend that the sovereign State of Bosnia and Herzegovina should be subject to an arms embargo and sanctions because it was once part of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia".

²⁸⁹ See S/PV.3137, p. 75: "We cannot but warn, with profound concern, of the unforeseeable harmful effects of the continued sending of mercenaries, violations of the arms embargo and the ever more evident prospects of this conflict turning into a full-scale religious war."

5. Obligations of States non-members of the United Nations to apply measures under Article 41

Article 41 provides that the Security Council may call upon the Members of the United Nations to apply the measures envisaged in that Article. However, in its resolutions creating or modifying State obligations in relation to the implementation of the measures imposed against Iraq,²⁹³ Yugoslavia,²⁹⁴ Somalia,²⁹⁵ the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya²⁹⁶ and Liberia,²⁹⁷ the Council consistently called upon “all States”²⁹⁸ to comply with the relevant obligations, and in several instances explicitly referred to “all States, including States non-members of the United Nations”.²⁹⁹

Replies received from States in response to requests for information sought by the Security Council³⁰⁰ or the Secretary-General³⁰¹ in relation to their compliance with relevant obligations included communications from Switzerland and the Republic of Korea.³⁰² The communications received from these States, which, at that time, were not Members of the United Nations, either confirmed that measures had been taken to implement the relevant Council resolutions, or that measures corresponding in substance to the requirements of those resolutions were in existence or had been taken independently.

²⁹² As the arguments advanced by Member States in relation to Bosnia and Herzegovina’s right of self-defence are closely linked to the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter, details of those arguments are set out in part IX of the present chapter.

²⁹³ See resolutions 661 (1990), paras. 3-4; 670 (1990), paras. 3-6; 687 (1991), paras. 24, 29; and 778 (1992), paras. 1, 2 and 4.

²⁹⁴ Reference is made to both the former Yugoslavia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; see resolutions 713 (1991), para. 6; 724 (1991), para. 5; 727 (1992), para. 6; 740 (1992), para. 8; 757 (1992), paras. 3-9 and 11-14; 760 (1992); and 787 (1992), paras. 9-15.

²⁹⁵ See resolutions 733 (1992), para. 5; 751 (1992), para. 11; and 794 (1992), para. 16.

²⁹⁶ See resolution 748 (1992), paras. 3-6.

²⁹⁷ By resolution 788 (1992), the Council decided that “all States” should immediately implement a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Liberia.

²⁹⁸ Occasionally, the Council merely called on “States”. See for example resolution 794 (1992), by which the Council called upon States to use such measures as might be necessary to ensure strict implementation of the arms embargo which it had previously imposed against Somalia by resolution 733 (1992).

²⁹⁹ See for example resolutions 661 (1990), para. 5; 748 (1992), para. 7; and 757 (1992), para. 11.

³⁰⁰ By resolution 700 (1991), para. 4, the Council requested “all States” to report to the Secretary-General within 45 days on the measures they had instituted to meet the obligations set out in paragraph 24 of resolution 687

(1991). By resolution 748 (1992), para. 8, the Council requested “all States” to report to the Secretary-General by 15 May 1992 on the measures they had instituted for meeting their obligations relating to the sanctions imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. By resolution 757 (1992), para. 12, the Council requested all States to report to the Secretary-General by 22 June 1992 on the measures they had instituted for meeting their obligations relating to the sanctions imposed against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).

³⁰¹ In connection with the measures imposed against Iraq, see, for example, the note dated 8 August 1990 from the Secretary-General to the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of all States (S/21536, annex I), requesting them to report on measures taken to implement resolution 661 (1990); the note verbale dated 3 July 1991 from the Secretary-General to the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of all States (not issued as a United Nations document), requesting them to submit information on the measures taken to implement paragraph 4 of resolution 700 (1991). In carrying out his responsibility to report on the implementation of the sanctions imposed by resolution 713 (1991) against Yugoslavia, the Secretary-General addressed a note verbale to all States on 16 December 1991, requesting them to submit to him information on the measures instituted by them to meet their obligations relating to the implementation of the embargo (see S/23358, para. 4). In connection with the situation in Somalia, see the Secretary-General’s note verbale to all States dated 23 January 1992 (S/23693 and Corr.1, paras. 5 and 7).

³⁰² In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, see the communications from the Republic of Korea (S/21487, S/21617) and Switzerland (S/21585) relating to the implementation of measures imposed under resolution 661 (1990); and the communications from Switzerland (S/22958) and the Republic of Korea (S/23016) relating to the implementation of sanctions established in paragraph 24 of resolution 687 (1991). A communication relating to the requirements under that resolution was also received from the Holy See (S/22802). See also the communications sent by Switzerland in relation to measures imposed against the former Yugoslavia, Somalia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (S/23338, S/23612, S/23938 and S/24160).

However, in one of its responses to the Secretary-General, Switzerland noted that, as a non-member of the United Nations, it was “not in fact legally bound by the decisions of the Security Council”.³⁰³

Part IV

Other measures to maintain or restore international peace and security in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter

Article 42

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not invoke Article 42 explicitly in any of its decisions. The Council did, however, adopt a number of resolutions by which it called upon States to take “all measures necessary”³⁰⁴ to enforce demands related to the restoration of international peace and security, and which are therefore of relevance to the interpretation of Article 42. These include, in particular, resolution 678 (1990), authorizing States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to enforce the withdrawal of the Iraqi forces from the territory of Kuwait³⁰⁵ (see section A below).

³⁰⁴ “All measures necessary” was the precise wording used in resolution 770 (1992), para. 2. In resolutions 665 (1990), para. 1, 787 (1992), para. 12, and 794 (1992), para. 16, reference was made to “such measures (commensurate to the specific circumstances) as may be necessary”, and in resolutions 678 (1991), para. 2, and 794 (1992), para. 10, to “all necessary means”.

³⁰⁵ In his report entitled “An Agenda for Peace”, however, the Secretary-General expressed the view that, in the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Security Council had not actually made use of the option envisaged in Article 42, as the Council had chosen to authorize Member States to take measures on its behalf. More

Section B below describes the Council’s decisions calling upon States to take measures necessary to ensure the strict implementation of sanctions previously imposed on Iraq,³⁰⁶ Yugoslavia³⁰⁷ and Somalia.³⁰⁸ Section C deals with decisions authorizing States to use all necessary means to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian aid to Bosnia and Herzegovina and Somalia.³⁰⁹ generally, the Secretary-General stated his belief that, while action under Article 42 should be taken only when all peaceful means had failed, the option of taking it was “essential to the credibility of the United Nations as a guarantor of international security” (see S/24111, paras. 42-44).

³⁰⁶ By resolution 665 (1990), the Council called upon Member States to use “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary” to ensure the strict implementation of the sanctions imposed against Iraq by resolution 661 (1990).

³⁰⁷ The term “Yugoslavia” is intended to refer to both the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), as, by resolution 713 (1991), the Council had imposed an arms embargo against the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and, by resolution 757 (1992), had imposed a general trade embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. By resolution 787 (1992), the Council called upon Member States to use “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary” to ensure the strict implementation of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992).

³⁰⁸ By resolution 794 (1992), the Council called upon States to use “such measures as may be necessary” to ensure the strict implementation of the arms embargo imposed against Somalia by resolution 733 (1992).

³⁰⁹ See resolutions 770 (1992) and 794 (1992). While measures to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance are not primarily adopted with the aim of maintaining or restoring international peace and security, as envisaged in Article 42, they are believed to be

Section D briefly examines aspects of two peacekeeping operations established during the period under review, which are believed to have a bearing on the interpretation of Article 42 of the Charter.³¹⁰

A. Military enforcement action necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 678 (1990),³¹¹ the Council reiterated its demand that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent resolutions, and decided “to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so”; and authorized Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq fully implemented all relevant Council resolutions on or before 15 January 1991, “to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area”.³¹²

During the Council’s deliberations in connection with the adoption of resolution 678 (1990),³¹³ most members agreed that there remained no alternative to authorizing the use of “all necessary means”, as Iraq’s aggression could not be tolerated.³¹⁴ Most speakers relevant to the interpretation and application of Article 42 insofar as they are typically adopted in the context of existing threats to the peace and closely connected to the broader efforts to restore peace and security in the affected regions.

³¹⁰ As peacekeeping operations are typically deployed with the consent of the Governments involved, they are clearly different from enforcement action under Article 42. It has been thought useful, however, in connection with the consideration of such enforcement action, to draw attention to the establishment of UNIKOM under Chapter VII of the Charter, and the incorporation of certain enforcement powers in the mandate of UNPROFOR.

³¹¹ Adopted at the 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, by 12 votes to 2 (Cuba, Yemen), with 1 abstention (China). At the meeting, 13 Council members were represented at the ministerial level.

believed that the Council had already shown a great degree of patience, and emphasized that the proposed resolution gave Iraq a further period of 45 days to comply with the demands made in previous resolutions.³¹⁵ In this context it was noted that by 15 January — the date set in the resolution — the aggression would be nearly six months old.³¹⁶ Several speakers expressed confidence that the pause granted by the resolution would usher in a transition to a political settlement.³¹⁷ Other speakers emphasized the dangers of delaying the use of military force, noting that in the meantime the destruction of Kuwait and the atrocities against its people would continue.³¹⁸

However, various Council members opposed the use of force at this stage of the crisis. They cautioned that the Council should avoid taking hasty action and show patience for economic sanctions to work, bearing in mind the serious consequences that a solution through the use of force would entail.³¹⁹

The representative of Iraq asserted that, by authorizing the use of force, the Council would be acting beyond its jurisdiction. As the Council was seized of the matter, the use of force could not fall

The latter also expressed the view that, by granting some States the authorization to use military force, the Council was acting in violation of the procedures established by the Charter (ibid.).

under the provisions governing the legitimate exercise of the right of self-defence. Accordingly, the Council could authorize the use of force only if sanctions adopted in accordance with Article 41 had proved ineffective or unenforceable.³²⁰

B. Measures necessary to ensure the strict implementation of decisions taken in accordance with Article 41

By resolution 665 (1990),³²¹ the Council authorized Member States cooperating with Kuwait to use “such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations, and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990)”.³²²

During the deliberations in connection with the adoption of that resolution,³²³ its sponsors explained that the Council had been forced to tighten the application of the sanctions regime owing to Iraq’s defiance of the Security Council and resolution 661 (1990). While naval forces had initially been deployed at the request of the Government of Kuwait, in accordance with the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, the proposed resolution would provide an additional basis for actions to secure compliance with the sanctions mandated by resolution 661 (1990). While the authority granted in the proposed resolution was sufficiently broad to use armed force to ensure respect for the embargo, such force would be applied only as a last resort and would be limited to what was strictly necessary.³²⁴

³²⁰ S/PV.2963, pp. 19-21.

³²¹ Adopted at the 2938th meeting, on 25 August 1990, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen).

³²² See resolution 665 (1990), para. 1.

³²⁴ S/PV.2938, pp. 26-31 (United States); and p. 32 (France). (In this context, speakers also used the terms “minimum force” and “minimum use of force” during the debate.)

The resolution was, however, opposed by two Council members, who believed that the Council was moving too quickly towards the use of force.³²⁵ One Council member expressed the view that, if the basis for the resolution was Article 42, then, in accordance with that Article, the Council first had to determine that economic sanctions had proved insufficient before proceeding to apply measures involving the use of force.³²⁶

Other speakers, while generally supporting the proposed resolution, nevertheless cautioned that any measures taken under it ought to be proportional to the intended purposes, and that political and diplomatic methods should be employed to the maximum degree possible.³²⁷

One Council member believed that the phrase “such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary” used in the proposed resolution did not in fact contain the concept of using force, as measures taken under that resolution had to be taken within the framework of resolution 661 (1990), which did not allow force to be used for its implementation.³²⁸

³²⁸ Ibid., p. 53 (China). In this context, the representative of China recalled that the reference to a “minimum use of force” has been intentionally deleted from the draft resolution.

³²⁹ The reference to “Yugoslavia” is to both the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), as resolution 713 (1991) was imposed against the former and resolution 757 (1992) against the latter.

strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992); and reaffirmed “the responsibility of riparian States to take necessary measures” to ensure that shipping on the Danube was in accordance with resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992), including “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary to halt such shipping in order to verify cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992)”.³³¹

In the debates leading up to the adoption of that resolution,³³² its sponsors explained that these measures were necessary to prevent the Adriatic and the Danube from being used to circumvent the sanctions regime, and to make the authorities in Belgrade and the Bosnian Serbs realize the cost of their policies.³³³

Several States non-members of the Council also expressed support for the measures envisaged in the proposed resolution, and believed that they would help to ensure the implementation of the embargo.³³⁴

³³¹ See resolution 787 (1992), paras. 12 and 13.

³³² 3134th to 3137th meetings. The draft resolution (S/24808/Rev.1) was sponsored by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.

³³³ See for example the statements made by the representatives of the United Kingdom (S/PV.3135, pp. 8-9); the United States (ibid., pp. 11-12); Belgium (S/PV.3134, p. 67); France (S/PV.3135, p. 17); and the Russian Federation (S/PV.3136, p. 6).

³³⁴ Pakistan expressed the hope that the draft resolution would result in “effective and complete enforcement of the sanctions” (S/PV.3136, p. 33). Canada expressed its strong support for the provision of the draft resolution, calling upon all States to use necessary measures to ensure strict application of the sanctions regime, and noted that it had participated in the naval task force monitoring traffic on the Adriatic coast and was participating in sanctions monitoring in neighbouring countries (S/PV.3136, p. 47). Italy, speaking in its capacity as Chairman of the Western European Union, noted that the resolution would “greatly enhance the effectiveness of the embargo” and would help the naval forces of the Western European Union and NATO in the Adriatic Sea to discover and defeat any attempt by sea to “violate or circumvent” the embargo (S/PV.3137, p. 16). Ukraine argued that the draft resolution should envisage “all the necessary steps” to strengthen the effectiveness of the sanctions (S/PV.3137, p. 86). Bangladesh also argued that the sanctions must be “strictly enforced” (S/PV.3137, p. 111).

However, one Council member reaffirmed that it opposed the use of force in any form in the settlement of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, arguing that the use of force would only complicate the situation.³³⁵

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 794 (1992),³³⁶ the Council, acting under Chapters VII and VIII, called upon States, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, “to use such measures as may be necessary” to ensure strict implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 733 (1992).³³⁷

No substantive issues concerning this provision were raised during the debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution.³³⁸

C. Measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina)

By resolution 770 (1992),³³⁹ the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, called upon States “to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate in coordination with the United Nations the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina”.³⁴⁰

³³⁵ See the statement by the representative of China (S/PV.3135, p. 16).

³³⁶ Adopted at the 3145th meeting, on 3 December 1992. The draft resolution (S/24880) had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.

³³⁷ See resolution 794 (1992), para. 16.

³³⁸ The debate held at the 3145th meeting in connection with the adoption of resolution 794 (1992) was focused on the authorization, contained in that resolution, of all necessary means to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance (see section C below for details of the debate).

³³⁹ Adopted at the 3106th meeting, on 13 August 1992, by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe).

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of that resolution,³⁴¹ the sponsors of the resolution welcomed the fact that the resolution would allow for all necessary means, including the use of force, to achieve the provision of humanitarian assistance. While the use of force was not desirable, it might yet be necessary. In deciding whether military measures were needed, great weight would be given to the views of the United Nations and the humanitarian agencies. It was noted that the provision of humanitarian assistance was not only an urgent humanitarian concern but also an important element of the effort to restore peace and security in the region”.³⁴²

However, one Council member, while endorsing the objectives of resolution 770 (1992) in principle, stated that it could not agree to the authorization of the use of force, as it was precisely the continuous armed conflict that currently hindered the delivery of humanitarian assistance. Once Member States resorted to force, the armed conflict would surely be expanded and prolonged, thus further hampering the humanitarian relief work and the efforts aimed at a political solution.³⁴³

By resolution 794 (1992),³⁴⁴ the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, authorized the Secretary-General and Member States cooperating “to use all necessary means to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia”.³⁴⁵

³⁴¹ The draft resolution (S/24421) was sponsored by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.

³⁴² United Kingdom (S/PV.3106, pp. 34-36), United States (ibid., p. 38), France (ibid., p. 47). The representative of the United States observed that the adoption of resolution 770 (1992) had demonstrated that the Council too shared the belief “that the provision of humanitarian assistance [was] not only an urgent humanitarian concern but also an important element of the effort to restore peace and security in the region” (S/PV.3106, p. 38).

³⁴³ See the statement by the representative of China (S/PV.3106, pp. 50-51).

³⁴⁴ Adopted at the 3145th meeting, on 3 December 1992. The draft resolution (S/24880) had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.

³⁴⁵ See resolution 794 (1992), para. 10. The decision to take

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of the resolution, speakers emphasized that measures authorized by resolution 794 (1992) were aimed at achieving a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian relief to the Somali people, and that the use of force would be endorsed only if and when necessary to accomplish that objective.³⁴⁶ It was noted that the Council’s earlier efforts to increase security had failed. Action under Chapter VII of the Charter was therefore the only way to ensure the distribution of humanitarian supplies.³⁴⁷ While there was no desire to intervene in the internal affairs of Somalia, a humanitarian crisis of the current magnitude could not be allowed to continue. The present circumstances were unique and required special measures.³⁴⁸

D. Aspects of peacekeeping operations having potential relevance to Article 42

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolutions 686 (1991)³⁴⁹ and 689 (1991),³⁵⁰ the Council established, under Chapter VII of the action under Chapter VII was made, as noted in paragraph 7 of the resolution, pursuant to a recommendation by the Secretary-General in his letter of 29 November 1992 (S/24868).

³⁴⁶ See for example the statements by the representatives of the United States (S/PV.3145, p. 36) and France (ibid., p. 29).

³⁴⁷ See for example the statement by the representative of the United Kingdom, who noted that, in the prevailing situation, food and security were “inextricably linked” (S/PV.3145, p. 34).

³⁴⁸ China, in particular, emphasized that it saw the military operation authorized by the resolution as an exceptional action in view of the unique situation in Somalia; once a secure environment for the humanitarian relief effort in Somalia had been created, the military operation should cease (S/PV.3145, p. 17).

³⁴⁹ Adopted at the 2978th meeting, on 2 March 1991, by 11 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 3 abstentions (China, India, Yemen). The draft resolution (S/22298) was sponsored by Belgium, France, Romania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, the United States and Zaire.

³⁵⁰ Adopted unanimously at the 2983rd meeting, on 9 April 1991. The draft resolution (S/22470) had been prepared in the course of the Council’s prior consultations.

Charter, the United Nations Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM).³⁵¹

The establishment of that operation, under Chapter VII of the Charter, may be relevant to the interpretation of Article 42 insofar as it created an obligation for Iraq and Kuwait to have a military force stationed on their territory.³⁵² While the operation was deployed with the consent of both States,³⁵³ it could be terminated only by a formal decision of the Security Council, as expressly provided for in resolution 689 (1991).³⁵⁴

It should be noted however, that, while the operation was established under Chapter VII of the Charter, it was not authorized to take physical action to prevent the entry of military personnel or equipment into the demilitarized zone or assume other responsibilities that fell within the competence of the host Governments. In accordance with the concept of operations approved by the Council, UNIKOM, as an observation mission, was required to monitor and observe only.³⁵⁵

³⁵¹ By resolution 687 (1991), adopted at the 2981st meeting on 3 April 1991, the Council had established a demilitarized zone along the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, to be monitored by a United Nations observer unit. By resolution 689 (1991), the Council approved the Secretary-General's plan in his report dated 5 April 1991 (S/22454 and Add.1 and 2) for the deployment of UNIKOM.

³⁵² According to the concept of operations approved by resolution 689 (1991), UNIKOM would be composed of military contingents provided by Member States at the request of the Secretary-General and each contingent would comprise armed and unarmed military personnel. The maximum initial strength of UNIKOM was to be approximately 1,440 all ranks, of which the infantry temporarily attached to it from other established missions would be 680. It was envisaged that a group of 300 military observers would be required initially.

³⁵³ The acceptance of the Secretary-General's proposed plan by the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait was transmitted to the Council in an addendum dated 9 April 1991 (S/22454/Add.3) to the Secretary-General's report (S/22454 and Add.1 and 2).

³⁵⁴ Paragraph 2 of resolution 689 (1991) provides that "the unit can be terminated only by a decision of the Council" and that "the Council shall therefore review the question of its termination or continuation every six months".

³⁵⁵ The responsibility for the maintenance of law and order in the demilitarized zone rested with the Governments of Iraq and Kuwait, which maintained police posts in their respective parts of the zone. Police were allowed to

By resolution 776 (1992),³⁵⁶ the Council authorized the mandate and strength of the United Nations Protection Force in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNPROFOR) to be expanded in implementation of paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992), thus linking the mandate of the Force to Chapter VII, and incorporating the authorization for the use of "all measures necessary", provided for in that paragraph, in the mandate of the Force.³⁵⁷

The sponsors of resolution 776 (1992), supported by several other speakers, particularly welcomed the fact that it fully corresponded to the goals of resolution 770 (1992), by which the Council had defined the basis for resolute intervention by the international community. The armed protection of humanitarian convoys was now absolutely essential. The resolution carry only side arms. For further details, see the report of the Secretary-General (S/22454, para. 6).

³⁵⁶ Adopted at the 3114th meeting, on 14 September 1992, by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe). The draft resolution (S/24554) was sponsored by Belgium, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States.

³⁵⁷ By paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992), the Council had called upon States "to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate in coordination with the United Nations the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina". In addition to the reference to paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992), resolution 776 (1992) also refers more generally to functions outlined in a report of the Secretary-General on the UNPROFOR revised concept of operations, including the protection of convoys of released detainees if requested by the International Committee of the Red Cross. In that report, which was issued on 10 September 1992, the Secretary-General had inter alia recommended that, when providing "protective support" to convoys organized by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, UNPROFOR troops would follow normal peacekeeping rules of engagement and would thus be authorized to use force in self-defence. The Secretary-General noted, however, that self-defence was "deemed to include situations in which armed persons attempt by force to prevent United Nations troops from carrying out their mandate" (S/24540, para. 9).

would provide UNPROFOR with the necessary tools to further its difficult mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina.³⁵⁸

However, individual Council members explained that, owing to the link established in that resolution with paragraph 2 of resolution 770 (1992), they were not in a position to vote for the draft resolution.³⁵⁹ It was feared that linking the draft resolution with resolution 770 (1992) would change the non-mandatory nature of UNPROFOR as a United Nations peacekeeping operation, and that UNPROFOR would run the risk of plunging into armed conflict.³⁶⁰

Part V Decisions and deliberations having relevance to Articles 43 to 47 of the Charter

Article 43

1. All Members of the United Nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the Security Council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

2. Such agreement or agreements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.

3. The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the Security Council. They shall be concluded between the Security Council and Members or between the Security Council and groups of Members and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory States in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

Article 44

When the Security Council has decided to use force it shall, before calling upon a Member not represented on it to provide armed forces in fulfilment of the obligations assumed under Article 43, invite that Member, if the Member so desires, to participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that Member's armed forces.

Article 45

In order to enable the United Nations to take urgent military measures, Members shall hold immediately available national air-force contingents for combined international enforcement action. The strength and degree of readiness of these contingents and plans for their combined action shall be determined, within the limits laid down in the special agreement or agreements referred to in Article 43, by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

Article 46

Plans for the application of armed force shall be made by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

Article 47

1. There shall be established a Military Staff Committee to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council's military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces placed at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament.

2. The Military Staff Committee shall consist of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members of the Security Council or their representatives. Any Member of the United Nations not permanently represented on the Committee shall be invited by the Committee to be associated with it when the efficient discharge of the Committee's responsibilities requires the participation of that Member in its work.

3. The Military Staff Committee shall be responsible under the Security Council for the strategic direction of any armed forces placed at the disposal of the Security Council. Questions relating to the command of such forces shall be worked out subsequently.

4. The Military Staff Committee, with the authorization of the Security Council and after consultation with appropriate regional agencies, may establish regional sub-committees.

Note

In its decisions adopted during the period under review, the Council did not explicitly refer to Articles 43 to 47. The Council did, however, adopt a decision referring to a potential role for the Military Staff Committee, in connection with measures aimed at the enforcement of sanctions imposed against Iraq.³⁶¹

The relevance of the provisions of Articles 43 to 47, in particular as they relate to the command and control of military forces acting pursuant to an authorization by the Security Council, was repeatedly discussed in the Council's deliberations, including in connection with the adoption of decisions relating to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the situation in Somalia.

The significance of these provisions was also touched upon at the Council's summit meeting on 31 January 1992,³⁶² and in the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace"³⁶³ submitted ³⁶¹ See resolution 665 (1990), para. 4.

³⁶² 3046th meeting, held at the level of Heads of State and Government, under the agenda item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security". At that meeting, the President of France inter alia suggested an active role for the Military Staff Committee (S/PV.3046, p. 18). The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe expressed the view that future collective enforcement operations ought to be fully accountable to the Security Council and should be truly representative, which, in his view, could be achieved by strengthening Article 46 of the Charter (ibid., pp. 126-127). For further details, see chapter VI of the present volume, which sets out details of the discussions relevant to the relationship between the Security Council and the Military Staff Committee.

³⁶³ S/24111, of 17 June 1992.

pursuant to the presidential statement³⁶⁴ adopted at the conclusion of that meeting. In his report, the Secretary-General expressed the view that the detailed approach governing the use of military force in Chapter VII of the Charter now merited the attention of all Member States. He felt that under the existing political circumstances, the long-standing obstacles to the conclusion of the special agreements foreseen in Article 43 should no longer prevail, and that, therefore, the Security Council, supported by the Military Staff Committee, should initiate negotiations in accordance with that Article.³⁶⁵ These suggestions were not, however, referred to by the Council in the presidential statements adopted following its consideration of the Secretary-General's report.³⁶⁶

The brief overview which follows gives details of the Council's pertinent decisions and deliberations in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the situation in Somalia.

A. Military enforcement action for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Resolution 678 (1990),³⁶⁷ by which the Council authorized States cooperating with Kuwait "to use all necessary means" to ensure Iraq's compliance with its previous resolutions, required those States to keep the Council regularly informed on the progress of action undertaken pursuant to that authorization, but did not otherwise set out any details concerning the relationship between the Council and those States.³⁶⁸

³⁶⁶ Statements of 30 June 1992 (S/24210); 29 October 1992 (S/24728); 30 November 1992 (S/24872); and 30 December 1992 (S/25036).

³⁶⁷ Adopted at the 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, by 12 votes to 2 (Cuba, Yemen), with 1 abstention (China).

³⁶⁸ See resolution 678 (1990), para. 4.

In the debates held in connection with the adoption of the resolution,³⁶⁹ some Council members criticized the resolution for not being based on any specific article of Chapter VII of the Charter, and expressed concern that the Council would have no control over the forces whose actions it had authorized.³⁷⁰ The representative of Iraq charged that the draft resolution was unlawful, as collective enforcement action could be taken only under the command and control of the Security Council, in coordination with the Military Staff Committee, as provided for in the Charter.³⁷¹

Some members also charged that the text of the resolution was so vague that it was not limited to the purpose of enforcing previous resolutions. They warned against the use of excessive force which might lead to the destruction of Iraq and to a military confrontation on a larger scale.³⁷²

Most speakers emphasized, however, that the objective of the proposed resolution was merely to enforce the implementation of previous resolutions.³⁷³

At debates held by the Council after the commencement of military operations against the Iraqi forces,³⁷⁴ several members and non-members of the Council asserted that the military operations undertaken against the Iraqi forces in implementation of resolution 678 (1990) were not being sufficiently monitored by the Council. A number of speakers deplored in particular the fact that, following the commencement of military operations, the Council had not met formally on this matter for several weeks, even though many delegations had requested formal, open meetings to keep the situation under review.³⁷⁵

The representative of Iraq alleged that the United States and its allies were exceeding the objectives and limits of resolution 678 (1990) and violating the Charter and international humanitarian law, inter alia, by the intentional destruction of non-military targets.³⁷⁶ Several speakers expressed varying degrees of support for the Iraqi position,³⁷⁷ or more generally warned of an escalation of the military offensive that might go beyond its original objectives, and urged the allied forces to abide strictly by the humanitarian rules of war and international law.³⁷⁸

Other speakers, including in particular representatives of the sponsors of the resolution, maintained, however, that the authorization given by resolution 678 (1991) was sufficiently clear, and that the efforts of the coalition were being undertaken strictly in keeping with that resolution and the provisions of the Charter. In relation to complaints about insufficient monitoring by the Council, they emphasized that they had submitted frequent, full reports to the Council, as required under resolution 678 (1990).³⁷⁹ They asserted that the efforts of the allied forces were aimed at clear and limited objectives and

The representative of the United States also explained that the Council had not met earlier, as, in the light of Iraq's continuing refusal to acknowledge the validity of the Council's demands, an earlier meeting of the Council would not have helped to advance its objectives (S/PV.2977 (Part I), pp. 46-47).

fully in accordance with the relevant Council resolutions. They reaffirmed that those objectives did not include the destruction, dismemberment or occupation of Iraq, and that the allied forces aimed to minimize civilian casualties. It was noted that a limitation on the use of force would not facilitate the achievement of the objectives sought by all. Responding to suggestions that the fighting should be confined to the territory of occupied Kuwait, it was contended that such self-limitation would make it impossible to achieve the objectives of resolution 678 (1990), as the logistical support and resources of the Iraqi military extended far beyond the confines of Kuwait. That did not mean, however, that the allies had extended their objectives beyond those laid down in the pertinent Council resolutions, that is, Iraq's unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait and the re-establishment of Kuwait's sovereignty and independence.³⁸⁰

Following a declaration by the Iraqi leadership, on 15 February, which envisaged the possibility of an Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, several Member States expressed the view that offensive combat operations should be ceased or suspended forthwith,³⁸¹ or that at least options for a peaceful settlement of the conflict should be explored by the Council.³⁸² One Council member submitted two draft resolutions,³⁸³ the first of which envisaged the immediate resumption of negotiations without further resort to force, and the second of which envisaged that the Council "consider possible formulae for halting armed actions and achieving a peaceful settlement of the conflict".³⁸⁴

Other speakers opposed a cessation or suspension of military action at this stage, arguing that such a move would be counterproductive. It was noted that a ceasefire without concrete steps by Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait would not accomplish the objectives of resolution 660 (1990) and not bring the aggression to a close. While the declaration by the Iraqi leadership did indeed envisage withdrawal from Kuwait, it had added conditions which contravened the provisions of resolution 660 (1990). For peace initiatives to succeed, a clear and unequivocal commitment from the Iraqi leadership was needed.³⁸⁵

As noted in the preamble to resolution 686 (1991), offensive combat operations were suspended following Iraq's confirmation, on 27 February 1991, of its agreement to comply fully with all previous Council resolutions, and its intention to immediately release prisoners of war.³⁸⁶

coordinate their actions ... using, as appropriate, mechanisms of the Military Staff Committee and, after consultation with the Secretary-General, to submit reports to the Security Council and the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) ... in order to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the present resolution”.³⁸⁸

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of the resolution,³⁸⁹ its sponsors expressly acknowledged the importance of the Council’s role in monitoring the use of force,³⁹⁰ and indicated their readiness to consider a role for the Military Staff Committee in coordinating the naval interdiction.³⁹¹

Some Council members criticized the proposed resolution as not clearly defining the powers of the Security Council to supervise any action taken by States.³⁹² One Council member contended that the draft resolution violated provisions of the Charter relating to the use of force, including Articles 46 and 47, as it did not make States accountable to the Security Council for the proper exercise of the authority delegated to them, and as it did not set out how the Military Staff Committee was to assist the Council in the “employment and command of forces placed at its disposal”, as required by Article 47. It was noted that, although there was a reference to the Military Staff Committee in the draft resolution, the Committee had not been convened to draw up any plan for the deployment of forces.³⁹³

*Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina)*³⁹⁴

Resolution 787 (1992),³⁹⁵ by which the Council, inter alia, called upon States to interdict maritime shipping in order to ensure compliance with the sanctions imposed by resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992), provided that such action was to be taken “under the authority of the Security Council”. The resolution also required States concerned “to coordinate with the Secretary-General on the submission of reports to the Security Council” regarding actions taken pursuant to that authorization.³⁹⁶

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of the resolution,³⁹⁷ one Council member expressed concern that the Security Council and the United Nations as a whole should retain full authority and responsibility over the execution of enforcement action authorized by the Council, but noted that the cooperation of the sponsors in amending the resolution to provide for effective coordination, through the Secretary-General, of the actions that Member States

³⁹⁰ See for example the statement by the representative of France, who believed that “in each case, the use of coercion [would] require notification of the Security Council” (S/PV.2938, p. 32). The representative of Finland stated that any action by the naval forces concerned would require close attention in order to ensure that such action served the purposes intended by the Security Council (ibid., p. 47).

³⁹¹ See the statements by the representatives of the United States (S/PV.2938, pp. 29-30) and the Soviet Union (ibid., pp. 41 and 43). At an earlier meeting in relation to the same item, the representative of the Soviet Union had already expressed his delegation’s readiness “to undertake consultations immediately in the Military Staff Committee, which, under the Charter of the United Nations, can perform very important functions” (S/PV.2934, p. 12).

³⁹² S/PV.2938, pp. 8-11 (Yemen); pp. 13-16 (Cuba); and pp. 21-25 (Colombia). See also the statement by the representative of Iraq, who asserted that resolution 665 (1990) vested no real authority in the Security Council, the Military Staff Committee or the Secretary-General in supervising the use of force. He contended that the Council had “no right to deprive itself of its own authority, or to delegate that authority to a number of States, unless the Charter [was] properly amended” (ibid., pp. 67-71).

³⁹³ S/PV.2938, pp. 12-17 (Cuba). See also the statement made by the representative of Iraq at the same meeting (S/PV.2938, pp. 67-70).

C. Decisions authorizing the use of all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina)

Resolution 770 (1992),³⁹⁹ by which the Council called upon States to take all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina, required those States to take such action “in coordination with the United Nations”, and to report to the Secretary-General on measures they were taking in coordination with the United Nations to carry out the resolution; and furthermore required the Secretary-General to report to the Council on a regular basis on the implementation of the resolution.⁴⁰⁰

While the sponsors of the resolution⁴⁰¹ emphasized that, in accordance with those provisions, all action taken under it would be closely coordinated with the United Nations,⁴⁰² two Council members, who did not oppose the purposes of the resolution in principle, nevertheless abstained from voting on it, as they felt it would be imperative that an operation that could involve the use of force should be under the command and control of the United Nations, in strict conformity with the provisions of the Charter.⁴⁰³

³⁹⁸ See the statement by the representative of India (S/PV.3137, p. 6). China and Zimbabwe abstained from voting on the resolution as they generally opposed the measures authorized by it.

³⁹⁹ Adopted at the 3106th meeting, on 13 August 1992, by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (China, India, Zimbabwe).

The situation in Somalia

By resolution 794 (1992),⁴⁰⁴ by which the Council authorized the Secretary-General and Member States cooperating “to use all necessary means to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia”, the Council authorized “the Secretary-General and Member States concerned to make the necessary arrangements for the unified command and control of the forces involved”.⁴⁰⁵ The Council furthermore provided that the arrangements for the unified command and control of the forces would reflect the offer by the United States to take the lead in organizing and commanding such an operation.⁴⁰⁶ By the same resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General and, as appropriate, the States concerned to report to the Council on a regular basis, the first such report to be made no later than 15 days after the adoption of the resolution, on the implementation of the resolution and the attainment of the objective of establishing a secure environment so as to enable the Council to make the necessary decision for a prompt transition to continued peacekeeping operations.⁴⁰⁷ regard at the 3114th meeting, in connection with the adoption of resolution 776 (1992), which incorporated the authorization given by resolution 770 (1992) in the mandate of UNPROFOR; S/PV.3114, pp. 6-8 (India); and pp. 3-4 (Zimbabwe).

⁴⁰⁵ See resolution 794 (1992), para. 12. The decision to take action under Chapter VII was made, as noted in paragraph 7 of the resolution, pursuant to a recommendation by the Secretary-General in his letter of 29 November 1992 (S/24868). In that letter, the Secretary-General had proposed to the Council a number of options for the establishment of a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations. One of those options (the fifth option) was for the Council to mandate an “enforcement operation” under United Nations command and control.

⁴⁰⁶ See resolution 794 (1992), para. 12, which referred to an offer by the United States described in the Secretary-General’s letter of 29 November 1992. According to the letter, the United States had informed the Secretary-General that “if the Security Council were to decide to authorize Member States to use forceful means to ensure the delivery of relief supplies to the people of Somalia, the United States would be ready to take the lead in organizing and commanding such an operation, in which a number of other Member States would also participate” (see S/24868).

⁴⁰⁷ See resolution 794 (1992), para. 18.

At the debate held in connection with the adoption of the resolution,⁴⁰⁸ a number of speakers emphasized that the operational concept underlying the resolution recognized the fundamental role of the United Nations in scrutinizing the operation, as the Security Council and the Secretary-General would play an essential role throughout its duration.⁴⁰⁹

However, several other speakers, while acknowledging that the resolution incorporated opinions expressed by many delegations regarding the strengthening of United Nations control over such an operation, noted that they would have preferred an arrangement under which the United Nations kept effective political command and control, in full conformity with the provisions of the Charter. Even though some provisions for United Nations monitoring had been made, the resolution still took the form of authorizing certain countries to take military actions, which might adversely affect the collective role of the United Nations.⁴¹⁰

⁴⁰⁸ The draft resolution (S/24880) had been prepared in the course of the Council's prior consultations.

Part VI

Obligations of Member States under Article 48 of the Charter

Article 48

1. The action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine.

2. Such decisions shall be carried out by the Members of the United Nations directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies of which they are members.

Note

During the period under review, the Council adopted one decision referring expressly to Article 48. By resolution 670 (1990), which was aimed at strengthening the sanctions regime imposed on Iraq and Kuwait, the Council expressed its determination "to ensure respect for its decisions and the provisions of Articles 25 and 48 of the Charter".⁴¹¹ By that resolution, the Council further affirmed that any acts of the Government of Iraq which were contrary to Articles 25 or 48 of the Charter were null and void.⁴¹²

In other resolutions, the Council underlined the mandatory nature of measures imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter without specifically referring to Article 48. When imposing sanctions on Iraq and Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council in each case expressly stated in its decisions that States were to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the resolutions, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted before the date of the resolution.⁴¹³ By the same decisions, the Council required States to report on their compliance with present resolution by a State or its nationals or through its territory, measures directed at the State in question to prevent such evasion (para. 12).

⁴¹³ In connection with the measures imposed against Iraq and Kuwait, see resolutions 661 (1990), para. 5; 670 (1990), para. 3; and 687 (1991), para. 25. In connection with the measures imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, see resolution 748 (1992), para. 7. In connection with the measures imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, see resolution 757 (1992), para. 11.

⁴¹¹ See resolution 670 (1990), seventh preambular para.

⁴¹² Ibid., eighth preambular para. By the same resolution, the Council decided to consider, in the event of evasion of the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) or of the relevant prohibitions,⁴¹⁴ and provided that implementation reports received by States were to be examined by committees specifically mandated to monitor the implementation of sanctions, and to consider any information concerning violations of relevant State obligations.⁴¹⁵ In order to ensure full compliance with relevant prohibitions, the Council, by subsequent decisions, called on States to take “such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary” to enforce the sanctions regimes imposed on Iraq and Kuwait and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.⁴¹⁶

In accordance with Article 48, action required to carry out the Council’s decisions “shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine”, both “directly and through their action in the appropriate international agencies”.

In its decisions imposing measures not involving the use of armed force, in accordance with the provisions of Article 41 of the Charter, the Council consistently called upon “all States” to comply with relevant prohibitions.⁴¹⁷ In connection with the measures imposed on Iraq and Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Council expressly included “States non-members of the United Nations” among those to whom its decisions were addressed,⁴¹⁸ and also required international organizations to act strictly in accordance with their provisions.⁴¹⁹

While the decisions referred to above were formulated so as to achieve universal compliance and to create binding obligations for all States, decisions

⁴¹⁴ In connection with the arms embargo imposed against the former Yugoslavia, the Council, by resolution 724 (1991), para. 5, requested all States to report to the Council within 20 days on the measures they had instituted for meeting their obligations. In connection with the sanctions regime imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Council, by resolution 757 (1992), para. 12, requested all States to report to the Secretary-General within 23 days on the measures they had taken. In connection with sanctions imposed on Iraq and Kuwait, the Council, by resolution 700 (1991), para. 4, requested all States to report to the Secretary-General within 45 days on their compliance with the prohibitions set out in resolution 687 (1991). In connection with the measures imposed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council, by resolution 748 (1992), para. 8, requested all States to report to the Secretary-General within 45 days on their compliance with that resolution.

⁴¹⁵ In connection with the measures imposed on Iraq and Kuwait, see resolutions 661 (1990), para. 6 (b); and 700 (1991), para. 4. In connection with the measures imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, see resolution 748 (1992), para. 9. In connection with the measures imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, see resolution 757 (1992), para. 13. Attention is also drawn to resolution 751 (1992), para. 11, providing for the establishment of a sanctions committee to monitor the implementation of the arms embargo imposed on Somalia by resolution 733 (1992).

⁴¹⁷ In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, see resolutions 661 (1990), paras. 3-4; 670 (1990), paras. 1-6; and 687 (1991), paras. 24 and 29. In connection with items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia and in Bosnia and Herzegovina, see resolutions 713 (1991), para. 6; and 757 (1992), paras. 3-9. In connection with the situation in Somalia, see resolution 733 (1992), para. 5. In connection with items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, see resolution 748 (1992), paras. 3-6. In connection with the situation in Liberia, see resolution 788 (1992), para. 8.

⁴¹⁸ See resolutions 661 (1990), para. 5; 748 (1992), para. 7; and 757 (1992), para. 11, calling on “all States, including States non-members of the United Nations” to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of those resolutions.

⁴¹⁹ In connection with the measures imposed on Iraq and Kuwait, see resolution 670 (1990), para. 11, by which the Council affirmed that the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other organizations in the United Nations system were required to take such measures as may be necessary to give effect to the terms of resolution 661 (1990) and that resolution. In resolutions 687 (1991), para. 25, and 700 (1991), para. 3, the Council more generally called on “all States and international organizations” to act in accordance with their provisions. In connection with the measures imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, see resolutions 748 (1992), para. 7, and 757 (1992), para. 11, respectively, both of which require all States and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with their provisions.

providing for the use of “all measures necessary”⁴²⁰ to enforce previous resolutions of the Council rather took the form of authorizations or calls on States willing and in a position to take such action. While such authorizations or calls were often addressed to “States” in general,⁴²¹ in some instances they were more specifically addressed to “Member States cooperating”⁴²² or “Member States in a position to do so”.⁴²³ However, one decision, adopted in connection with the implementation of sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, explicitly affirmed the responsibility of “riparian States” to take all necessary measures to ensure that shipping on the Danube did not infringe the prohibitions previously imposed by the Council.⁴²⁴ Some of the decisions authorizing the use of all necessary measures expressly envisaged possible action through regional agencies or arrangements.⁴²⁵

⁴²⁰ “All measures necessary” was the precise wording used in resolution 770 (1992), para. 2. In resolutions 665 (1990), para. 1; 787 (1992), para. 12; and 794 (1992), para. 16, reference was made to “such measures (commensurate to the specific circumstances) as may be necessary”, and in resolutions 678 (1991), para. 2; and 794 (1992), para. 10, to “all necessary means”.

⁴²¹ See resolutions 770 (1992), para. 2; 787 (1992), para. 12; and 794 (1992), para. 16.

⁴²² By resolution 665 (1990), para. 1, the Council specifically called on “those Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait which are deploying maritime forces to the area” to take measures necessary to ensure the strict implementation of the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990). By resolution 678 (1990), para. 2, the Council authorized “Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait” to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions. By resolution 794 (1992), para. 10, the Council authorized “Member States cooperating” to implement an offer by the United States to establish an operation to create a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian relief supplies in Somalia.

⁴²³ By resolution 794 (1992), para. 11, the Council called on all Member States in a position to do so to provide military forces and make other contributions to an operation aimed at creating a secure environment for the delivery of humanitarian relief supplies in Somalia.

⁴²⁴ See resolution 787 (1992), para. 13.

⁴²⁵ By resolution 770 (1992), para. 2, the Council called upon States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina. By resolution 787 (1992), para. 12, the Council called upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as might be necessary to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992). By resolution 794 (1992), para. 16, the Council called upon States, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures as might be necessary to ensure strict implementation of the arms embargo imposed on Somalia by resolution 733 (1992). In all of those decisions the Council indicated that it was acting under both Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter.

Part VII

Obligations of Member States under Article 49 of the Charter

Article 49

The Members of the United Nations shall join in affording mutual assistance in carrying out the measures decided upon by the Security Council.

Note

During the period under review, the obligation of States to join in affording mutual assistance assumed specific relevance in connection with decisions under Chapter VII of the Charter by which the Security Council authorized or called on Member States to take all measures necessary to enforce the Council’s resolutions. While such authorizations or calls were primarily addressed to States willing and in a position to take relevant enforcement action, the Council regularly requested all States to provide appropriate support and assistance to those States. Such requests were made by the decisions described below. The Council did not adopt any resolutions containing an explicit reference to Article 49.

By resolution 665 (1990),⁴²⁶ in which the Council called on Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait to use such measures as may be necessary to ensure implementation of resolution 661 (1990),⁴²⁷ the Council requested all States to provide, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, such assistance as might be required by the States concerned.⁴²⁸

By resolution 678 (1990),⁴²⁹ by which the Council authorized⁴³⁰ Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and subsequent relevant resolutions,⁴³¹ the Council requested all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of that authorization.⁴³²

By resolution 787 (1992), by which the Council called on States to take action under Chapter VII of the Charter to ensure strict implementation of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992),⁴³³ the Council requested

all States to provide such assistance as might be required by those States.⁴³⁴

By resolution 794 (1992),⁴³⁵ by which the Council authorized action under Chapter VII of the Charter to establish a secure environment for a humanitarian relief operation in Somalia, and called on Member States in a position to do so to provide military forces or make other contributions,⁴³⁶ the Council requested all States, in particular those in the region, to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken by those States.⁴³⁷

In addition to the above provisions relating to the obligation of States to afford mutual assistance in connection with action involving the use of “all measures necessary”, States were reminded of their obligations under Article 49 in connection with the implementation of economic sanctions. In particular, in a statement by the President of the Council on 29 April 1991,⁴³⁸ the Council members appealed to all States to provide assistance to those States facing special economic problems as a result of their compliance with the sanctions imposed on Iraq and Kuwait by resolution 661 (1990).⁴³⁹

⁴²⁶ Adopted at the 2938th meeting, on 25 August 1990, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen).

⁴²⁷ Resolution 661 (1990), by which the Council imposed sanctions on Iraq, was adopted at the 2933rd meeting, on 6 August 1990, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen).

⁴²⁸ See resolution 665 (1990), para. 3.

⁴²⁹ Adopted at the 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, by 12 votes to 2 (Cuba, Yemen), with 1 abstention (China).

⁴³⁰ See resolution 678 (1990), para. 2.

⁴³¹ See resolution 660 (1990), adopted at the 2932nd meeting, on 2 August 1990, by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention member (Yemen).

⁴³² See resolution 678 (1990), para. 3.

⁴³³ See resolution 787 (1992), para. 12; 678 (1990), para. 3. Contributions were to be made in cash or in kind. Cash contributions were to be channelled to the States or operations concerned through a fund to be established by the Secretary-General.

⁴³⁴ See resolution 787 (1992), para. 15.

⁴³⁵ Adopted unanimously at the 3145th meeting, on 3 December 1992.

Part VIII

Special economic problems of the nature described in Article 50 of the Charter

Article 50

If preventive or enforcement measures against any state are taken by the Security Council, any other state, whether a Member of the United Nations or not, which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution of those problems.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council expressly recalled the rights of States under Article 50 of the Charter in three of its decisions, adopted in connection with the imposition of sanctions on Iraq and Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).⁴⁴⁰

In connection with the implementation of measures imposed on Iraq and Kuwait⁴⁴¹ and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,⁴⁴² a number of Member States were confronted with special economic problems, and requested consultations and assistance in accordance with Article 50.⁴⁴³ Those requests were examined by the relevant sanctions committees, which transmitted their observations and recommendations to the Security Council.⁴⁴⁴

⁴⁴¹ See resolution 661 (1990), paras. 2-4. For subsequent modifications to the measures imposed by that resolution, see resolutions 666 (1990), para. 1; 670 (1990), paras. 3-6; 687 (1991), paras. 20, 24 and 29; and 778 (1992), paras. 1-2, 4. For further details, see part III of the present chapter.

⁴⁴² See resolution 757 (1992), paras 3-9. For subsequent modifications of the measures imposed by that resolution, see resolutions 760 (1992) and 787 (1992), paras. 9-10. For further details, see part III of the present chapter.

⁴⁴³ For details of relevant communications from affected States, see the case studies below.

⁴⁴⁴ For details of such recommendations, see in particular the report dated 18 September 1990 (S/21786) and the letters dated 19 and 21 December 1990 and 18 March 1991 (S/22021, Add.1 and 2), submitted to the Council

In response to a recommendation by the Iraq/Kuwait sanctions Committee, the Council called on all States, United Nations organizations and financial organizations to respond effectively to the problems of the most affected States.⁴⁴⁵

Questions relating to the application and interpretation of Article 50 were also considered at the 3046th meeting of the Council, which was held at the level of Heads of State and Government to consider the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”,⁴⁴⁶ and in the report of the Secretary-General entitled “An Agenda for Peace”,⁴⁴⁷ submitted pursuant by the Iraq/Kuwait sanctions Committee.

⁴⁴⁵ See the statement by the President of the Council dated 29 April 1991 (S/22548).

⁴⁴⁶ At that meeting, the need to address economic problems arising in third countries was stressed in particular by the Prime Minister of India and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe. The Prime Minister of India observed that, while some consequences of Council decisions might be unintended, they could affect those whom they were least intended to affect, such as the trading partners of a State subject to economic sanctions. Noting that, for developing countries, that impact could be catastrophic, the Prime Minister stressed that the Council needed to take speedy and parallel action to address problems arising in a third country from the implementation of its resolutions, if the Council’s decisions were to continue to command adherence and support (S/PV.3046, pp. 97-98). The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe remarked that, “although Article 50 was designed to give some protection to [third] States, the experience of the Gulf war had shown that some gaps need[ed] to be closed”. Noting that “the application of sanctions against Iraq [had] brought hardship to many countries in the region and beyond”, he contended that “the fact that representations continue[d] to come to the sanctions Committee from the most affected States ... demonstrated the inadequacy of Article 50”. He further observed that there was a need for “clear criteria for determining who deserved assistance and standing United Nations arrangements for the mobilization of the resources needed to assist the affected States” (ibid., pp. 123-125).

to a request made by the Council at that meeting.⁴⁴⁸ In his report, the Secretary-General observed that it was important “that States confronted with special economic problems not only have the right to consult the Security Council regarding such problems, as Article 50 provides, but also have a realistic possibility of having their difficulties addressed”. Accordingly, the Secretary-General recommended “that the Security Council devise a set of measures involving the financial institutions and other components of the United Nations system that can be put in place to insulate States from such difficulties”, noting that such measures would be “a matter of equity and a means of encouraging States to cooperate with decisions of the Council”.⁴⁴⁹

In a statement made by the President,⁴⁵⁰ the Council expressed its determination to further consider the above-mentioned recommendation of the Secretary-General, and requested the Secretary-General in this regard to consult the heads of the international financial institutions, other components of the United Nations system and Member States.

⁴⁴⁸ In a presidential statement issued at the conclusion of the summit meeting on 31 January 1992 (S/23500), the Council had invited the Secretary-General to “report on ways of strengthening and making more efficient within the framework and provisions of the Charter the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, for peacemaking and for peacekeeping”.

⁴⁴⁹ Prior to the submission of the report, by a letter to the Secretary-General dated 26 May 1992, a number of Member States had expressed concern that there was “no machinery guaranteeing an adequate response to requests for assistance under Article 50 of the Charter”. Accordingly it was felt that “such machinery should be set up in order to compensate for secondary effects on third States of sanctions imposed under Chapter VII of the Charter” (see S/24025 and Corr.1, annex, para. 15).

Decisions of the Security Council relating to Article 50

The following case studies set out an overview of the Council’s proceedings relevant to Article 50 of the Charter in connection with the measures imposed against Iraq and Kuwait, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Case 20

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait (in connection with the implementation of measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990))

Shortly after the adoption of resolution 661 (1990), by which the Council, imposed a general ban on all international trade with Iraq and Kuwait,⁴⁵¹ several Member States, in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter, informed the Council of the economic problems with which they were confronted as a consequence of complying with those measures, and requested consultations with a view to finding an appropriate solution.⁴⁵²

On 22 August 1990, the Council entrusted the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990) with the task of considering communications received from States confronted with such problems.⁴⁵³

⁴⁵¹ See resolution 661 (1990), paras. 2-4. For subsequent modifications to the measures imposed by that resolution, see resolutions 666 (1990), para. 1; 670 (1990), paras. 3-6; 687 (1991), paras. 20, 24 and 29; and 778 (1992), paras. 1-2, 4. For further details, see part III of the present chapter.

⁴⁵² See in particular the communication transmitted by Jordan on 20 August 1990 (S/21620).

⁴⁵³ The Committee was entrusted with this task at the Council’s consultations of the whole held on that day: see the Committee’s report dated 18 September 1992 (S/21786, para. 2). At the 2939th meeting, on 13 September 1990, a number of speakers expressed the hope that the Council would address more effectively the economic problems encountered by third States, in particular the unique economic difficulties faced by Jordan: see S/PV.2939, p. 13 (Yemen); pp. 23-30 (Cuba); p. 59 (Malaysia); p. 63 (Romania); and pp. 68-70 (Colombia). See also the statements made by France (ibid., p. 51) and the United Kingdom (ibid., p. 58). Other speakers emphasized, however, that these problems could be best overcome through the liberation of Kuwait: S/PV.2939, p. 72 (Soviet Union); and p. 81 (Kuwait).

The Committee transmitted to the Council a report concerning the need to address the unique economic difficulties faced by Jordan, and the problems resulting from the influx of refugees and displaced persons into its territory.⁴⁵⁴ According to the Committee's recommendations, the Secretary-General was to undertake, in cooperation with the Government of Jordan, a full assessment of the situation, with suggestions for appropriate remedies, including especially the supply of petroleum and its derivatives.⁴⁵⁵

By a letter dated 24 September 1990,⁴⁵⁶ the President of the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to implement the Committee's recommendations.

On the same day, the Council, by resolution 669 (1990), noted the fact that an increasing number of requests for assistance under Article 50 of the Charter had been received, and requested the Committee to examine those requests and make recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.⁴⁵⁷

The Committee transmitted such recommendations by letters dated 19 and 21 December 1990 and 18 March 1991.⁴⁵⁸ In those letters, the Committee recognized that the States concerned urgently required assistance in coping with the special economic problems resulting from their compliance with the measures imposed by resolution 661 (1990), and called on all States, the competent organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations system, as well as the international financial institutions and the regional development banks, to provide the affected States with such assistance.

By letters dated 21 December 1990 and 21 March 1991,⁴⁵⁹ the President of the Council requested the Secretary-General to implement the Committee's recommendations.

1990 (S/22021) related to requests received from Bulgaria, Tunisia, Romania, India, Yugoslavia, Lebanon and the Philippines. The letter dated 21 December 1990 (S/22021/Add.1) related to requests received from Sri Lanka, Yemen, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Mauritania, Pakistan, the Sudan, Uruguay, Viet Nam, Bangladesh and the Seychelles. The letter dated 18 March 1991 (S/22021/Add.2) related to requests received from the Syrian Arab Republic and Djibouti. For details of communications from affected States, see the following documents: Bangladesh: S/21856 (9 October 1990); Bulgaria: S/21477, S/21573, S/21576 and S/21741 (9 August, 21 August and 11 September 1990); Czechoslovakia: S/21750, S/21837 and S/22019 (13 September, 2 October and 19 December 1990); Djibouti: S/22209 (8 February 1991); India: S/21711 and S/22013 (5 September and 19 December 1990); Jordan: S/21620 (20 August 1990); Lebanon: S/21686 and S/21737 (31 August and 10 September 1990); Mauritania: S/21789 and S/21818 (18 and 24 September 1990); Pakistan: S/21776 and S/21875 (14 September and 12 October 1990); Philippines: S/21712 and S/22011 (5 September and 18 December 1990); Poland: S/21808 (21 September 1990); Romania: S/21643 and S/21990 (27 August and 7 December 1990); Seychelles: S/21891 and S/22023 (19 October and 20 December 1990); Sri Lanka: S/21627, S/21710 and S/21984 (24 August, 5 September and 6 December 1990); Sudan: S/21695 and S/21930 (4 September 1990 and 6 November 1990); Syrian Arab Republic: S/22193 (31 January 1991); Tunisia: S/21649 and S/22015 (24 August and 19 December 1990); Uruguay: S/21775 and S/22026 (13 September and 20 December 1990); Viet Nam: S/21821 and S/22004 (25 September and 15 December 1990); Yemen: S/21615 and S/21748 (23 August and 12 September 1990); Yugoslavia: S/21618, S/21642 and S/22014 (23 August, 24 August and 19 December 1990).⁴⁵⁹ S/22033 and S/22398. These letters followed the model of the President's letter dated 24 September 1990 (S/21826).

⁴⁵⁴ S/21786 dated 18 September 1990.

⁴⁵⁵ The Committee had furthermore recommended that the Secretary-General develop methods for receiving information from States about action being taken to alleviate Jordan's situation, and to appoint a Special Representative to coordinate the assistance being given to Jordan. In its report, the Committee had also appealed to all States to provide immediate technical, financial and material assistance to Jordan to mitigate the consequences of the difficulties it was facing. In addition, it had called upon the agencies, organs and bodies of the United Nations system to intensify their programmes of assistance in response to the pressing needs of Jordan.

⁴⁵⁶ S/21826.

⁴⁵⁷ Resolution 669 (1990), adopted unanimously at the 2942nd meeting, on 24 September 1990, dealt exclusively with this matter. At a Council meeting held on the following day, at which 13 Council members were represented by their Ministers for Foreign Affairs, a number of speakers touched upon the Council's responsibility under Article 50: see S/PV.2943, p. 7 (Secretary-General); pp. 21-22 (Cuba); p. 31 (United States); p. 37 (Canada); p. 51 (China); p. 62 (Malaysia); and pp. 71-72 (Romania).

⁴⁵⁸ S/22021 and Add.1 and 2. The letter dated 19 December

Following a further collective appeal from affected Member States on 22 March 1991,⁴⁶⁰ the members of the Council, in a statement by the President of the Council,⁴⁶¹ took note of efforts undertaken by United Nations bodies,⁴⁶² several Member States⁴⁶³ and international financial institutions⁴⁶⁴ to respond effectively to the needs of the most affected States, invited other Member States and international organizations to provide information on the measures they had taken, and appealed for a positive and speedy response, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee.

Resolution 674 (1990)⁴⁶⁵ is relevant in this context. The Council reminded Iraq that under international law it was liable for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States, and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq.⁴⁶⁶ Resolutions 687 (1991) and 692 (1991), of 3 April 1991 and 20 May 1991 respectively, by which the Council decided to create a fund and a commission to compensate claims by foreign Governments, nationals and corporations are also relevant.⁴⁶⁷

Case 21

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (in connection with the implementation of measures imposed by resolution 748 (1992))

In resolution 748 (1992), by which the Council imposed a broad range of enforcement measures against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya,⁴⁶⁸ the Council expressly recalled “the right of States, under Article 50 of the Charter, to consult the Security Council where they find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures”.⁴⁶⁹

The resolution also provided that the Committee entrusted with the task of monitoring the implementation of the enforcement measures was “to give special attention to any communications in accordance with Article 50 of the Charter of the United ⁴⁶⁰ See S/22382. The affected Member States noted that the appeals launched by the Secretary-General pursuant to the recommendations of the Committee had not evoked responses commensurate with their urgent needs (S/22382, para. 4). They urged the Council to give renewed attention to their problems, with a view to finding “quick and effective solutions”, and appealed to donor States to respond urgently and effectively by providing assistance through the allocation of additional financial resources, both via bilateral channels and by supporting the actions of the competent organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations system (ibid., paras. 6 and 8). In a memorandum annexed to the letter, it was noted that the economic, financial and commercial losses incurred by the Member States as a result of their full compliance with the measures imposed against Iraq had been estimated at more than $30 billion.

⁴⁶¹ Adopted at the 2985th meeting, on 29 April 1991 (S/22548).

⁴⁶² Efforts undertaken by the United Nations system were coordinated by the Secretary-General through the Administrative Committee on Coordination.

⁴⁶³ Official correspondence was addressed to the Secretary-General by the following States: Belgium (S/22537: letter dated 26 April 1991); Denmark (S/22538: letter dated 26 April 1991); Japan (S/21673: letter dated 29 August 1990); Luxembourg (S/22541: letter dated 26 April 1991); the Netherlands (S/22553: letter dated 29 April 1991); New Zealand (S/22296: note verbale dated 1 March 1991); and Spain (S/22539: letter dated 26 April 1991). In addition, Luxembourg submitted a communication on behalf of the European Union (S/22542: letter dated 27 April 1991). Replies received by the Secretary-General from Austria, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Liechtenstein, Norway, Portugal, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union were made available to the Council but were not circulated as documents of the Council.

⁴⁶⁴ Reference was made in particular to communications from the President of the World Bank and the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, which were made available to the Council but were not circulated as documents of the Council.

⁴⁶⁵ Adopted at the 2951st meeting, on 29 October 1990, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen).

⁴⁶⁶ Iraq rejected such liability (S/PV.2951, p. 36). The representative of Cuba questioned whether Iraq was to shoulder exclusively the responsibility for damages related to the Council’s decisions on Iraq, and whether the Council would thus be indirectly avoiding its responsibilities under Article 50 (ibid., p. 61).

⁴⁶⁷ At the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 687 (1991), some speakers raised questions concerning the relationship between the envisaged compensation mechanism and the responsibility of the Security Council under Article 50 (S/PV.2981, p. 67 (Cuba); and p. 126 (Romania)).

⁴⁶⁸ Adopted at the 3063rd meeting, on 31 March 1992, by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions (Cape Verde, China, India, Morocco, Zimbabwe).

⁴⁶⁹ Resolution 748 (1992), ninth preambular paragraph.

Nations from any neighbouring or other State with special economic problems that might arise from the carrying out of the measures".⁴⁷⁰ No such communications were received during the period under review.⁴⁷¹

Case 22

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia (in connection with the implementation of measures imposed by resolution 757 (1992))

In resolution 757 (1992),⁴⁷² by which the Council imposed a broad range of measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Council expressly recalled "the right of States, under Article 50 of the Charter, to consult the Council where they find themselves confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of preventive or enforcement measures".⁴⁷³

By communications⁴⁷⁴ addressed to the Secretary-General during the period from 22 June to 14 December 1992, six States informed the Council of economic difficulties suffered as a consequence of implementing the measures imposed by resolution 757 (1992), and requested consultations under Article 50, or indicated that they might seek such consultations in due course.

In its report of 30 December 1992,⁴⁷⁵ the Security Council Committee established pursuant to resolution 724 (1991)⁴⁷⁶ observed that the effective implementation of the sanctions had had an adverse impact on the economies of a number of countries, particularly those neighbouring the territory of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, some of which had addressed the Committee on the matter.⁴⁷⁷

⁴⁷⁰ Ibid., para. 9 (f). At the 3063rd meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom observed that the reference to Article 50 had been included at the request of affected States in the region (S/PV.3063, p. 71). The representative of India argued that, in the light of past experience, the resolution should have included a clearer acknowledgement of the Council's responsibility to address the economic problems encountered by third States, with a commitment to take concrete, practical and effective measures to address urgently all such problems brought to its notice (ibid., p. 58). For other statements touching upon the Council's responsibility to address the potential consequences of the resolution for third States, see S/PV.3063, p. 61 (China); p. 58 (India); p. 26 (Jordan); p. 36 (Iraq); and p. 41 (Uganda).

⁴⁷¹ However, by a letter dated 15 May 1992 to the Secretary-General (S/23939), Bulgaria indicated its intention to submit such request.

⁴⁷² Adopted at the 3082nd meeting, on 30 May 1992, by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (China, Zimbabwe).

⁴⁷³ See resolution 757 (1992), sixteenth preambular paragraph. At the 3082nd meeting, several speakers touched upon the potential economic consequences for third States; see S/PV.3082, pp. 9-10 (China); p. 23 (India); and p. 17 (Hungary).

⁴⁷⁴ See the following communications addressed to the Secretary-General: letters dated 22 June and 20 July 1992 from the representative of Romania (S/24142 and Add.1); letter dated 19 June 1992 from the representative of Slovenia (S/24120); note verbale dated 22 June 1992 from the representative of Hungary (S/24147); and note verbale dated 11 August 1992 from the representative of Algeria (S/24426); see also note verbale dated 25 September 1992 from the representative of Czechoslovakia to the President of the Security Council (S/24602); and letter dated 14 December 1992 from the representative of Bulgaria to the President of the Council (S/24963).

⁴⁷⁶ The Committee, which had first been mandated to monitor the implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 713 (1991), was charged by resolution 757 (1992) with the monitoring of the measures imposed by that resolution (see resolution 757 (1992), para. 13).

⁴⁷⁷ S/25027, para. 23.

Part IX

The right of self-defence in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter

Article 51

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council reaffirmed the principle set out in Article 51 in one decision relating to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait.⁴⁷⁸ In the Council's subsequent deliberations in connection with this matter, speakers expressed differing views, however, with regard to the measures taken by some States in reliance on the right of collective self-defence.

The Council also debated the application and interpretation of Article 51 in connection with the use of armed force by the United States in Panama, and in connection with an incident involving the downing of two Libyan aircraft by United States forces. In these instances, Council deliberations touched on the question whether the United States was justified in relying on its right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter.

In connection with the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council considered Bosnia and Herzegovina's claim that, through an arms embargo imposed by the Council, Bosnia and Herzegovina was prevented from exercising its right of self-defence.⁴⁷⁹ ⁴⁷⁸ Resolution 661 (1990).

⁴⁷⁹ The arms embargo had originally been imposed by resolution 713 (1991) against the former Yugoslavia. By resolution 727 (1992), the Council affirmed that the arms embargo would continue to apply to all areas that had

At a meeting held in connection with the situation relating to Afghanistan,⁴⁸⁰ the representative of Afghanistan indicated his Government's intention to rely on its right of self-defence in response to alleged interference and aggression by Pakistan.

The arguments advanced during the Council's deliberations in connection with those incidents and situations are set out in the case studies below (section A).

These case studies will be followed by a brief overview in section B of instances in which the right of self-defence was invoked in official correspondence, but which did not give rise to any constitutional discussion relevant to Article 51.

A. Constitutional discussion relating to the invocation of the right of self- defence under Article 51

In the following instances, the invocation of the right of self-defence by a Member State gave rise to a discussion relevant to the application and interpretation of Article 51.

Case 23

Incident involving the downing of Libyan reconnaissance aircraft

By a letter dated 4 January 1989,⁴⁸¹ the representative of the United States informed the Council that, in accordance with Article 51, United States forces operating lawfully above international waters of the Mediterranean sea had exercised their inherent right to self-defence in response to hostile actions by the military forces of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding.

⁴⁸⁰ 2857th meeting. For details of Pakistan's position in relation to this matter, see the verbatim record of the 2859th meeting.

⁴⁸¹ S/20366.

By letters of the same date⁴⁸² addressed to the President of the Security Council, the representatives of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Bahrain described the incident as an aggression by the United States forces, and requested that the Security Council be convened immediately.

The Security Council held its 2835th meeting on 5 January 1989 to consider this matter. The Council further discussed the incident at the 2837th and 2839th to 2841st meetings, on 6, 9 and 11 January 1989 respectively.

During the Council's deliberations, the representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya alleged that the United States forces had shot down two unarmed Libyan reconnaissance aircraft on routine patrol near the Libyan coast, and that the incident had been "an act of premeditated, deliberate aggression as a prelude to a large-scale aggression".⁴⁸³ He contended that the United States had resorted to a deliberate misinterpretation of Article 51 in order to "justify aggression".⁴⁸⁴

The representative of the United States maintained that the action by the United States aircraft had been taken in response to provocation and threat from armed Libyan aircraft, in accordance with internationally accepted principles of self-defence.⁴⁸⁵ The representative stated that the United States aircraft had been operating on a routine training mission in international airspace, and that they had been tracked in a hostile manner by armed Libyan aircraft. Only after repeated futile attempts to avoid those aircraft had they shot them down in a clear and unambiguous act of self-defence.⁴⁸⁶ The representative of Canada stated that his delegation had "accepted the United States explanation for its actions during the incident".⁴⁸⁷ The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized the importance his Government attached "to upholding the freedom of ships and aircraft to operate in international waters and airspace and their inherent right to self-defence as recognized by Article 51 of the Charter".⁴⁸⁸

However, many speakers, both members and non-members of the Council, supported the position of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and described the action taken by the United States as an act of aggression and a violation of international law and the Charter.⁴⁸⁹ Several speakers specifically stated that attempts to justify the use of force against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by invoking the right of self-defence were untenable.⁴⁹⁰ The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics asserted that the reference by the United States representative to Article 51 of the Charter, relating to self-defence, was "absolutely unfounded". He noted that nobody had attacked the aircraft or ships of the United States and that if arbitrary action, further armed clashes and utter anarchy in international airspace were to be avoided, the military aircraft of one State could not be entitled to open fire on the aircraft of another State simply because those aircraft had come too close to them in international airspace.⁴⁹¹ The representative of the League of Arab States asserted that there was no justification for intercepting and destroying those Libyan aircraft, which were flying above international waters.⁴⁹² The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic alleged that the incident was a link in a series of aggressive measures and actions which the United States Administration had been taking against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya since 1981, when the United States Navy downed two Libyan aircraft near the Libyan coast.⁴⁹³ The representative of Finland warned that "in an age of military high technology, the resort to so-called pre-emptive self-defence without warning [could] have very dangerous consequences."⁴⁹⁴ The representative of Czechoslovakia pointed out that the exercise of the right of self-defence pursuant to Article 51 of the Charter was contingent on the objective existence of circumstances provided by the Charter, not to be confused with the subjective perceptions of military commanders. He added that otherwise the provisions of Article 51 on self-defence would cease to be a mere exception to the general ban on the use of armed force and become, conversely, an instrument of complete and irreversible destruction of this ban.⁴⁹⁵

At the Council's 2841st meeting, seven Member States⁴⁹⁶ jointly submitted a draft resolution⁴⁹⁷ by the adoption of which the Council would have deplored the downing of the two Libyan reconnaissance aircraft and called upon the United States to suspend its military manoeuvres off the Libyan coast. The draft was put to the vote but was not adopted, owing to the negative votes of three permanent members.⁴⁹⁸

The situation relating to Afghanistan

By a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 3 April 1989,⁴⁹⁹ the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan requested the convening of an emergency meeting to consider "Pakistan's military aggression and its overt and covert interference in the internal affairs of the Republic of Afghanistan".⁵⁰⁰

During the Council's deliberations on this matter,⁵⁰¹ Afghanistan reiterated its allegations against Pakistan, claiming, inter alia, that peace, stability and security in South-West Asia were threatened, and drawing attention to the "dangerous implications of the aggression by Pakistan for peace and security in the region and in the world".⁵⁰² Afghanistan claimed that if the Security Council failed "to adopt necessary measures for defusing the present tense situation, and Pakistani aggression and intervention" against Afghanistan continued, Afghanistan would have no choice but to rely on its right of self-defence.⁵⁰³

The representative of Pakistan, on the other hand, asserted that the situation in Afghanistan was a purely internal matter, and that there was no threat to regional or international peace and security. He contended that the developments in Afghanistan represented the resistance of the Afghan people against the rule of an illegal and unrepresentative regime that had been imposed on them by external military intervention.⁵⁰⁴

The situation in Panama

By a letter dated 20 December 1989,⁵⁰⁵ the representative of the United States informed the President of the Security Council, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, that United States forces had exercised their "inherent right of self-defence under international law by taking action in Panama in response to armed attacks by forces under the direction of Manuel Noriega".

By a letter of the same date,⁵⁰⁶ the representative of Nicaragua requested the President of the Security Council to convene the Council urgently "to consider the situation following the invasion of the Republic of Panama by the United States".

The Council held its 2899th meeting on 20 December 1989 to consider the matter. The representative of Nicaragua asserted that the United States had committed "an act of aggression" against Panama, which constituted a "threat to international peace and security", and for which international law could "provide no justification".⁵⁰⁷ In a similar vein, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that the invasion of Panama by

In a letter dated 6 July 1989 from the representative of Afghanistan to the Secretary-General, Afghanistan again indicated that it would need to make "necessary use" of the right of self-defence against alleged interference and aggression from Pakistan (see S/20716).

United States troops was “a flagrant violation of the elementary norms of international law and the Charter”. The representative believed that statements to the effect that Panama had been threatening the national interests of the United States were unsubstantiated.⁵⁰⁸ The Chinese delegation expressed “its utmost shock and strong condemnation of that aggressive action of the United States”.⁵⁰⁹

The representative of the United States, on the other hand, asserted that the United States had resorted to military action “only after exhausting the full range of available alternatives,” and had done so “in a manner designed to minimize casualties and damage”.⁵¹⁰ He recalled that General Noriega had declared a state of war against his country and that, in implementation of that declaration, an unarmed American serviceman had been killed and others had been threatened. He contended that the Noriega regime had in fact declared war considerably earlier through its drug-trafficking activities, which threatened democratic societies as surely as the use of conventional military forces.⁵¹¹

The representatives of the United Kingdom and Canada agreed with the position expressed by the United States that, after the failure of numerous attempts to resolve the situation peacefully, the United States had been justified in using force, as a last resort, against a regime that had itself turned to force.⁵¹²

The Council continued its discussion of this matter at its 2900th to 2902nd meetings. During the deliberations, several speakers, representing both members⁵¹³ and non-members⁵¹⁴ of the Council, deplored or condemned the military intervention and, in some instances, explicitly rejected the argument that the United States had acted in self-defence. The representative of Cuba asserted that “the armed aggression by the United States against Panama, in flagrant violation of United Nations principles and norms, [had] no justification whatsoever”.⁵¹⁵ The representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya described the invocation of Article 51 as a “fallacious legal pretext”.⁵¹⁶ The representative of Algeria argued that the action taken by the United States “was fraught with a potential threat to the security of small States through an abusive and erroneous interpretation of the provisions of the Charter”.⁵¹⁷

At the 2902nd meeting, a draft resolution submitted by seven Member States⁵¹⁸ was voted upon but was not adopted owing to the negative votes of three permanent members.⁵¹⁹ Under that draft resolution, the Council would have, among other things, strongly deplored the intervention in Panama by the armed forces of the United States, which constituted a flagrant violation of international law and of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of States; and demanded the immediate cessation of the intervention and the withdrawal of the United States armed forces from Panama.⁵²⁰

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

By resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, by which the Council imposed a general trade embargo on Iraq in order to secure the withdrawal of its forces from the territory of Kuwait, the Council affirmed “the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence, in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter".⁵²¹

At the 2934th meeting, the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom stated that, at the request of Governments in the region, they had deployed forces to the area, in order to help protect Saudi Arabia and other threatened States in the area. Both representatives emphasized that the action was taken in accordance with Article 51, noting that the application of that Article to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait had been expressly affirmed by resolution 661 (1990).⁵²² The representative of the United States further stated that the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the large Iraqi military presence on the Saudi frontier had created "grave risks of further aggression in the area". His Government and others were therefore "sending forces with which to deter further Iraqi aggression".⁵²³ The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the presence of British forces, particularly naval forces, in the area would "be of added advantage in the context of securing the effective implementation of resolution 661 (1990)".⁵²⁴

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on the other hand, while not directly commenting on the deployments, stated that his Government was "against reliance on force and against unilateral decisions". He added that, in his delegation's view, the surest, wisest way to act in a conflict situation was "to make collective efforts and to make full use of the machinery of the United Nations". He further emphasized that it was important "to reject actions which might pour oil on the fire", and indicated that his delegation was prepared to undertake consultations immediately in the Military Staff Committee, which, under the Charter of the United Nations, could perform very important functions.⁵²⁵ The representative of China, while reiterating that the sovereignty and independence of Kuwait needed to be restored and respected, called upon "all concerned parties to exercise restraint and refrain from any actions that might further complicate the situation".⁵²⁶ The representative of Cuba asserted that certain Powers were taking "unilateral measures which were not in accordance with the decisions taken by the Council", adding that an "arbitrary interpretation of the right to self-defence" could not be used to justify war and interventionism in the Middle East.⁵²⁷

By a letter dated 12 August 1990,⁵²⁸ the representative of Kuwait informed the President of the Security Council that, in the exercise of its inherent right of individual and collective self-defence and pursuant to Article 51 of the Charter, his country had "requested some nations to take such military or other steps as ... necessary to ensure the effective and prompt implementation of Security Council resolution 661 (1990)". By a letter of the same date,⁵²⁹ the representative of Saudi Arabia informed the Council that his country had "exercised its legitimate right, as enshrined in Article 51 of the Charter" and had "welcomed the forces of fraternal and other friendly States which [had] expressed their willingness to support the Saudi Arabian armed forces in the defence of the Kingdom".⁵³⁰

⁵³⁰ In a letter dated 27 August 1990 to the Secretary-General, the representative of Egypt noted that a resolution adopted at the Extraordinary Arab Summit Conference held at Cairo on 10 August 1990 had recommended "to comply with the request of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the other Arab States of the Gulf that Arab forces should be deployed to assist their armed forces in defending their soil and territorial integrity against any external aggression" (S/21664, para. 6). In a letter dated 17 January 1991 to the Secretary-General, the representative of Egypt also noted that the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait had created a situation which "impelled Saudi Arabia and some of the Gulf States, in exercise of their inherent right of legitimate self-defence, to request the aid and military assistance of their brothers and friends" (S/22113). However, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, in a letter dated 15 August 1990 to the Secretary-General, claimed that

The deployment was subsequently confirmed by letters dated 9 August (S/21492) and 13 August 1990 (S/21501) addressed to the President of the Security Council, from the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom respectively.

⁵²⁴ Ibid., p. 18.

By a letter dated 16 August 1990,⁵³¹ the United States informed the Council that, in accordance with Article 51, and at the request of the Government of Kuwait, its military forces had joined that Government in taking actions to intercept vessels seeking to engage in trade with Iraq and Kuwait in violation of the sanctions imposed by resolution 661 (1990). These actions were being taken by the United States “in the exercise of the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence, recognized in Article 51 of the Charter”. The letter also stated that the military forces of the United States would use force “only if necessary and then only in a manner proportionate to prevent vessels from violating such trade sanctions contained in resolution 661 (1990)”.

At the 2937th meeting of the Council, a number of speakers expressed concern about the resort to military action in reliance on Article 51. The delegation of China believed that the military involvement by the great Powers was “not conducive to the settlement of the present crisis”, and called once again on the parties concerned “to exercise restraint, so as to avoid any action that could cause a further deterioration of the situation”.⁵³² In a similar vein, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics felt that it was important “to stop military activities, to prevent them from spreading to other countries and to restore respect for international law”. The representative noted that his Government intended “to act exclusively within the context of collective efforts for the settlement of this conflict”.⁵³³

The representative of Iraq asserted that the United States, followed by the United Kingdom, had “arrogated to itself the right to impose a maritime blockade against Iraq without calling it by that name”, and that those two States were attempting “to impose a certain interpretation of Article 51 of the Charter”.⁵³⁴ The representative of Yemen contended that the “utilization of this military blockade by one State without taking into consideration the role assumed by the Security Council for the safeguarding of international peace and security [was] an act that [was] not defensive in character”.⁵³⁵ The representative of Cuba asserted that the terms of the Charter were being twisted and implemented unilaterally, noting that Article 51 recognized the right of self-defence only “until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security”.⁵³⁶

In response to these comments, the representative of the United States cited the text of a letter which he had submitted to the Council on 9 August, informing the Council that the United States had deployed forces in the area “in exercise of the inherent right of self-defence, recognized in Article 51, in response to developments and requests from Governments in the region, including requests from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, for assistance”.⁵³⁷

At its 2938th meeting, the Council adopted resolution 665 (1990), by which it called upon “those Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait which are deploying maritime forces to the area to use such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990)”.

In connection with the adoption of resolution 665 (1990), the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom maintained that the resolution only provided an additional basis of authority, as sufficient legal authority to take such measures had already existed under Article 51.⁵³⁸ More specifically, the representative of the United States asserted that resolution 665 (1990) did not diminish the legal authority of Kuwait and other States to exercise their inherent right of self-defence.⁵³⁹

At the 2963rd meeting, the Council adopted resolution 678 (1990), by which it authorized Member there was “absolutely no justification for invoking Article 51 of the Charter in the current situation” (S/21529). Iraq, in a letter dated 13 November 1990 to the Secretary-General, asserted that the purpose of the “American military build-up” was an attack on Iraq rather than the defence of Saudi Arabia (S/21939).

States “to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area”.

During the deliberations held at that meeting, the representative of Iraq argued that the resolution was not justified under any Charter provisions and that it could not be justified under Article 51, as, under that Article, “the use of force [was] limited to the period until the Security Council [was] seized of the matter”, beyond which point “any use of force [had to] be deemed to be an aggression”.⁵⁴⁰

The representative of Malaysia, while expressing support for resolution 678 (1990), underlined that his delegation had not agreed to any attempt to apply Article 51 of the Charter unilaterally once the Council was seized of the matter. Thus, any proposed use of force had to be brought before the Council for its prior approval, in accordance with the specific provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter. The representative expressed regret that this point was not clearly reflected in resolution 678 (1990).⁵⁴¹

The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina

At its 3028th meeting, the Council unanimously adopted resolution 727 (1992), by which it affirmed that the arms embargo previously imposed against the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia would continue to apply to “all areas that ha[d] been part of Yugoslavia, any decisions on the question of the recognition of the independence of certain republics notwithstanding”.⁵⁴²

At the 3134th meeting, held on 13 November 1992, after the disintegration of the former Yugoslavia, the representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina asserted that the continued application of the arms embargo against his country prevented it from exercising its inherent right of self-defence under Article 51. He argued that, if the Security Council would not take any direct steps to protect his country, then it should yield and fully recognize his country’s “sovereign and absolute right to self-defence”. The representative also maintained that, “from the victim’s perspective, self-defence does not increase conflict, but rather reduce the brutal and murderous consequences of aggression directed at civilians”. He contended that “self-defence through legitimate and lawful authorities or through international mechanisms ... makes peace a reality rather than an uncertain and far-off goal”.⁵⁴³

The discussion of this matter was resumed at the Council’s 3135th to 3137th meetings, at which a number of States non-members of the Council supported Bosnia and Herzegovina’s position.⁵⁴⁴

⁵⁴⁰ S/PV.2963, pp. 19-20. Previously, at the Council’s 2951st meeting, on 29 October 1990, the representative of Iraq had similarly argued that no State had the right to unilaterally use force against his country, as the Security Council was seized of the situation (S/PV.2951, pp. 13-17).

⁵⁴¹ S/PV.2963, p. 76. At a subsequent meeting, held on 15 February 1991, the representative of Malaysia stated his understanding that the military action against Iraq was a “United Nations-authorized international enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter, not a result of Article 51 and certainly not a war between any of the allied countries and Iraq per se”. The representative added that no country, however powerful, could “arrogate to itself the right to conduct the war entirely on the basis of its own imperatives and interests” (S/PV.2977 (Part II) (closed — resumption 1), p. 171).

⁵⁴² Resolution 727 (1992), para. 6. A recommendation to this effect had been made by the Secretary-General in his report dated 5 January 1992 (S/23363, para. 33). The arms embargo against the former Yugoslavia had been imposed by resolution 713 (1991).

The representative of Turkey suggested that “if the Bosnian Government had adequate means to defend itself, this would deter the aggressor from pursuing a policy based on the use of force and perhaps induce it to resort to dialogue to overcome differences”.⁵⁴⁵ Similarly, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran asserted that the selective lifting of the arms embargo was “the only effective means to stop the aggression, short of international military action”.⁵⁴⁶ The representative of the Comoros questioned whether the Council, as the organ entrusted with the maintenance of peace and security, had any moral justification to “withhold from the weak, aggressed people of Bosnia and Herzegovina the right to defend themselves”, and whether it did not have “the moral responsibility and obligation to give a fighting chance to the victim of aggression”.⁵⁴⁷ The representative of Lithuania believed that if the international community could not provide effective defence, it could not “morally deny the right of self-defence to the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina”. He contended that it was “morally and legally unacceptable” to continue “to impose a stranglehold on a victim engaged in a life or death struggle”.⁵⁴⁸ The representative of Qatar asserted that “the application of the embargo to victim and aggressor alike [was] cynical and preposterous and [went] against the human conscience”. Claiming that the continuation of the arms embargo amounted to “support for the aggressor”, he believed that the international community was “duty-bound to enable Bosnia and Herzegovina to defend itself as long as [it was] unable to ward off the Serbian aggression by recourse to the provisions of the Charter”.⁵⁴⁹

The representative of the United Kingdom stated, on the other hand, that the introduction of more arms into the region “could only lead to more killing, more suffering and the jeopardizing of efforts to deliver humanitarian supplies to those in need”.⁵⁵⁰ The representative of Ecuador agreed that the lifting of the embargo against Bosnia and Herzegovina would not contribute to the cause of peace, as “violence [would] not be eliminated by increasing the flow of arms”.⁵⁵¹

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia warned of the “unforeseeable harmful effects of the continued sending of mercenaries, violations of the arms embargo and the ever more evident prospects of this conflict turning into a full-scale religious war”.⁵⁵²

These views were shared by Mr. Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen, co-Chairmen of the International Conference on Yugoslavia, who argued that the cause of peace would be best served by maintaining the embargo. Mr. Vance believed that lifting the arms embargo would only increase hostilities in Bosnia and Herzegovina and could spread the conflict throughout the Balkan region.⁵⁵³ Lord Owen observed that “prohibiting arms sales tends to dampen conflict while pushing arms sales deepens conflict”.⁵⁵⁴

At the 3137th meeting, the Council adopted resolution 787 (1992), by which it reaffirmed resolution 713 (1991) and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and thereby the continued application of the arms embargo to all parties to the conflict.⁵⁵⁵

In the following instances, Member States invoked the right of self-defence in correspondence which did not give rise to any significant constitutional discussion with direct relevance to Article 51.

The situation between Iran and Iraq

By a letter dated 7 January 1989 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁵⁵⁶ the representative of Iraq, referring to the alleged non-compliance of the Islamic Republic of Iran with the ceasefire concluded five months earlier, asserted that Iraq was “fully willing to defend itself”.

In response, the representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran, by a letter dated 23 January 1989 addressed to the Secretary-General,⁵⁵⁷ claimed that Iraq was relying on its right of self-defence merely in order “to justify its preparations to launch yet another war of aggression against the Islamic Republic of Iran”.

By a letter dated 25 August 1992 from the representative of Azerbaijan addressed to the President of the Security Council,⁵⁶¹ Azerbaijan asserted that Armenia was “openly continuing its armed aggression against Azerbaijan”, and stated it had been “compelled to take the necessary measures to exercise its right of self-defence and re-establish its sovereignty and territorial integrity”.

Introductory note

Chapter XII covers the consideration by the Security Council of Articles of the Charter not dealt with in the preceding chapters. It consists of six parts: parts I and II deal with consideration of the purposes and principles of the United Nations, particularly with regard to Article 1 (2) in part I and various provisions of Article 2 in part II, parts III, IV and V deal with consideration by the Council of the provisions of Articles 24, 25 and 26, respectively, which relate to the functions and powers of the Council. Part VI focuses on the consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter regarding regional arrangements.

Part I

Consideration of the provisions of Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter

Article 1, paragraph 2

[The purposes of the United Nations are:]

To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace.

Note

During the period under review, there were no explicit references to Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter contained in any of the resolutions or other decisions adopted by the Security Council. However, the Council adopted a number of decisions in support of the principle of self-determination. In the case of Namibia, which, in 1989, was the last remaining colony on the African continent, the Council's decisions helped to pave the way towards national independence and sovereignty (case 1). In connection with the situation concerning Western Sahara, the Council worked towards the holding of a referendum by which the people of Western Sahara would be able to choose between independence and integration with Morocco (case 2).¹ With respect to Cambodia, the Council actively supported a political settlement which would enable the Cambodian people to exercise its right to self-determination through free and fair elections (case 3).² In connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the Council reiterated its position that a just and lasting solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict must take into account the legitimate political rights of the Palestinian people (case 4).³ In connection with the status of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Council noted that three constituent parts of the Trust Territory had opted to exercise their right of self-determination. Accordingly, the Council declared that the Trusteeship Agreement had terminated with respect to those entities (case 5).⁴

In addition to these cases, the principle of self-determination was discussed or referred to during the Council's deliberations in connection with the situation relating to the former Yugoslavia, the situation in Cyprus, the situation relating to Afghanistan and the question of South Africa.

In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, a number of Council members, while stressing the need for a peaceful settlement of the crisis, emphasized that any political solution needed to be based on the principle of self-determination.⁵

The Security Council, by resolution 724 (1991), para. 7, urged all States and parties not to impede a negotiated solution which would "permit all the peoples of Yugoslavia to decide upon and to construct their future in peace". (A similar paragraph had already been included in resolution 713 (1991), para. 7, but in that resolution reference had been made to "all Yugoslavs" rather than "all the peoples of Yugoslavia". By resolution 752 (1992), adopted on 15 May 1992, the Council urged the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to constructively continue their discussions on constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina, and demanded that all interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina cease immediately. On 18 and 20 May 1992, the Council recommended the admission as sovereign States of three of the former constituent republics, namely Croatia, Slovenia and Bosnia and Herzegovina (see resolutions 753 (1992) and 754 (1992), of 18 May 1992, and 755 (1992), of 20 May 1992). During the Council's debates held in connection with the situation in Cyprus, the representative of the Turkish Cypriot side, supported by the representative of Turkey, argued that any negotiated settlement would have to be based on the political equality of the two peoples in the island, and would require a genuine commitment to the right of self-determination for both peoples.⁶ The representative of Cyprus, supported by the representative of Greece,⁷ rejected the suggestion that the Turkish Cypriot community were a people entitled to a separate right of self-determination,⁸ and maintained that a solution to the conflict should be based on the territorial integrity of Cyprus, in accordance with relevant Security Council resolutions.⁹

The Security Council, in its decisions adopted during the period under review, called upon the leaders of the two communities to pursue their efforts to reach freely a mutually acceptable solution providing for the establishment of a bi-communal and bi-zonal federation, and reaffirmed its position that the fundamental principles of a settlement were the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and non-alignment of the Republic of Cyprus (see in particular resolutions 649 (1990) of 12 March 1990; 716 (1991) of 11 October 1991, para. 4; 750 (1992) of 10 April 1992, para. 2; and 774 (1992) of 26 August 1992, para. 2). See also the statement made by the President of the Council on 23 December 1991 (S/23316). In this context, it may be interesting to note the Secretary-General's comments in his report dated 8 March 1990 (S/21183): the Secretary-General recalled that, in drawing up the mandate for his mission of good offices in Cyprus, the Council had envisaged a solution based on the existence of one State of Cyprus comprising two communities. Noting that in the course of recent discussions, the representative of the Turkish Cypriot side had stated that the term "communities" should be used synonymously with the term "peoples", each having a separate right to "self-determination", the Secretary-General stated that he had informed the two parties that any change in terminology could alter the conceptual framework to which all had so far adhered. See also the Secretary-General's report dated 19 December 1991 (S/23300), submitted to the Council, pursuant to resolution 716 (1991).

During the Council's deliberations in connection with the situation relating to Afghanistan, the representative of Afghanistan, supported by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and several other speakers, argued that Pakistan's alleged support for the creation of an "interim government" on its territory amounted to interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and a violation of the Afghan people's right to self-determination.¹⁰ The representative of Pakistan, however, supported by a number of other speakers, expressed the view that it was not foreign interference which prevented the Afghan people from exercising their right to self-determination, but rather "the unrepresentative regime which [had been] imposed as a result of foreign military intervention".¹¹

In connection with the question of South Africa, a number of speakers described the struggle against

The situation in Namibia

By resolutions 629 (1989) and 632 (1989),¹³ the Security Council emphasized its determination to ensure the early independence of Namibia through free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations, in accordance with a settlement plan which it had first approved by its resolution 435 (1978), adopted more than a decade earlier.¹⁴

By resolution 643 (1989),¹⁵ the Council reaffirmed its commitment to carrying out the continuing legal responsibility over Namibia until its independence “to ensure the unfettered and effective exercise by the people of Namibia of their inalienable rights to self-determination and genuine national independence in accordance with resolutions 435 (1978) and 640 (1989)”.¹⁶

In accordance with the above-mentioned decisions, elections for a constituent assembly were held from 7 to 11 November 1989, and certified by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General as having been free and fair.¹⁷

On 20 November 1989,¹⁸ the members of the Security Council, in a statement by the President of the Council,¹⁹ welcomed the successful conclusion of the elections in Namibia, and reaffirmed the continuing important role of the United Nations in ensuring the implementation of the settlement plan, in particular with a view to the adoption of a constitution by the constituent assembly.

The constitution was adopted on 9 February 1990, and entered into force on 21 March 1990, which day marked the accession of Namibia to independence in accordance with Council resolution 435 (1978).²⁰

On 17 April 1990,²¹ the Council unanimously adopted resolution 652 (1990), recommending to the General Assembly that the Republic of Namibia be admitted to membership in the United Nations.²²

After the resolution was adopted, speakers welcomed the historic occasion represented by the achievement of independence by the last colony on the African continent, and commended the positive role that had been played by the United Nations in that

¹⁴ By the same decisions, the Council also authorized the emplacement of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group, which had already been envisaged in resolution 435 (1978). By resolution 640 (1989), adopted at the 2882nd meeting on 29 August 1989, the Council reaffirmed its commitment to the decolonization of Namibia through the holding of free and fair elections under the supervision and control of the United Nations.

¹⁵ Adopted at the 2886th meeting, on 31 October 1989.

process.²³ Commenting specifically on the role of the Security Council, the Secretary-General stated that it was a source of great satisfaction that ultimately a solution to the question of Namibia had been reached on the basis of a settlement plan that had been adopted by the Council 12 years earlier.

Case 2

The situation concerning Western Sahara

On 18 June 1990, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the situation concerning Western Sahara,²⁴ containing the text of a settlement plan that had been accepted in principle by the parties to the conflict.²⁵ He noted that the main elements of the settlement plan were a ceasefire and the holding of a referendum to enable the people of Western Sahara, in the exercise of their right to self-determination, to choose between independence and integration with Morocco. The plan would thus ensure that the necessary conditions existed for the holding of a free and fair referendum. By resolution 658 (1990),²⁶ the Council approved the settlement plan contained in the Secretary-General's report.

By resolution 690 (1991),²⁷ the Council expressed its full support for the efforts of the Secretary-General for the organization and the supervision, by the United Nations in cooperation with the Organization of African Unity, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara, and decided to establish a United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara.

²⁷ Adopted at the 2984th meeting, on 29 April 1991.

By its resolution 725 (1991),²⁸ the Council reiterated its support for the Secretary-General's efforts, but noted with concern "the difficulties and delays encountered in the implementation of the settlement plan regarding the question of Western Sahara".

The Council members confirmed their continued support for the implementation of the settlement plan in several letters²⁹ transmitted during the course of 1992, in response to reports of the Secretary-General on the United Nations operation in Western Sahara,³⁰ and the obstacles encountered by it.

In a letter dated 22 December 1992 to the President of the Council,³¹ the Secretary-General concluded with much regret that the considerable efforts made by his Special Representative over the past several months to reach agreements with all parties on the major aspects of the settlement plan had not achieved the desired results. He therefore felt obliged to take concrete steps towards the holding of the referendum, notwithstanding the continued absence of the agreements sought. In his forthcoming report, to be submitted in January 1993, he intended to set forth the various steps that should be taken in order to hold the referendum at the earliest possible date.

The situation in Cambodia

By a letter dated 30 August 1990,³² the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council transmitted to the Secretary-General a joint statement, adopted in New York two days earlier, defining the key elements of a proposed framework for a comprehensive political settlement of the Cambodian conflict based on an enhanced United Nations role. fundamental principle of the framework was “to enable the Cambodian people to determine their own political future through free and fair elections, organized and conducted by the United Nations in a neutral political environment with full respect for the national sovereignty of Cambodia”. By resolution 668 (1990),³³ the Council endorsed this framework for a comprehensive political settlement. It further noted³⁴ that the efforts of the permanent members, as well as efforts by France and Indonesia in their capacity as Co-Chairs of the Paris Conference on Cambodia,³⁵ were “aimed at enabling the Cambodian people to exercise their inalienable right to self-determination through free and fair elections organized and conducted by the United Nations in a neutral political environment with full respect for the national sovereignty of Cambodia”.

By resolution 717 (1991)³⁶ the Security Council welcomed the progress made towards a comprehensive political settlement, noting that such a settlement would enable the Cambodian people to exercise its inalienable right to self-determination through free and fair elections organized and conducted by the United Nations.

By resolution 745 (1992),³⁷ the Council again expressed its desire to contribute “to the assurance of the right to self-determination of the Cambodian people through free and fair elections”, and approved the Secretary-General’s implementation plan for the mandate envisaged in the agreements on a comprehensive political settlement.³⁸

By resolution 792 (1992),³⁹ the Council determined that elections were to be held in April/May 1993.⁴⁰

The situation in the occupied Arab territories

During the Council’s deliberations in connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the representative of Palestine reiterated the Palestinian position that peace could not be established unless the Palestinian people was allowed to exercise its right to self-determination and to establish an independent State on its national soil.⁴¹ He requested that the Council consider deploying a United Nations observer force in the occupied Palestinian territory, which would permit the United Nations to supervise the transition towards a final settlement, and enable the Palestinian people to exercise its right to self-determination.⁴²

The representative of Israel, on the other hand, stated that his country sought to resolve the ultimate status of the territories and of the Palestinian Arab residents through direct negotiations with Israel’s neighbours and the Palestinian Arabs residing in the territories, on the basis of Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973). He observed that a solution recognizing both Israel’s security needs and the Palestinians’ legitimate rights might be found if negotiations were to begin with Arab States and representatives of the Palestinians living in the territories.⁴³

A significant number of speakers reiterated their support for the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination⁴⁴ and for the establishment of a the right to determine their own political future through the free and fair election of a constituent assembly.

In its decisions,⁴⁷ the Council reaffirmed that a just and lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict had to be based on a process which took into account the right to security for all States in the region, including

Case 5

Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands

On 22 December 1990,⁴⁸ the Council considered a draft resolution⁴⁹ on the applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands.⁵⁰

Speaking before the vote, the representative of New Zealand recalled that, some years earlier, these three island groups had indicated their desire for independent political status. The speaker noted that the United Nations had long been guided in its approach to decolonization by the principle that the wishes of the people should be uppermost in the process of political self-determination. On the basis of the express wish of the people of the three island groups concerned, New Zealand endorsed the call for the partial termination of the Trusteeship Agreement.⁵¹

⁵¹ S/PV.2972, pp. 9-12.

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 683 (1990),⁵² by which it recalled that the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory, in conformity with Article 76 of the Charter, had obligated the Administering Authority to promote the development of the Trust Territory towards self-government or independence. Noting that the peoples of three constituent parts of the Trust Territory had freely exercised their right to self-determination through plebiscites observed by visiting missions of the Trusteeship Council, the Council determined that the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement had been fully attained. The applicability of the Trusteeship Agreement with respect to those entities had therefore terminated.⁵³

⁵² The resolution was adopted by 14 votes to 1 (Cuba).

⁵³ By resolution 683 (1990), the Council also expressed the hope that the people of Palau would be able in due course to complete the process of freely exercising their right to self-determination. Speaking after the vote, most speakers noted that the resolution just adopted had been designed to facilitate the exercise of the right to self-determination by the peoples of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands and the Northern Mariana Islands, and that ending the trusteeship status would make it possible for the Territories concerned fully to implement the status that their respective peoples had freely chosen (S/PV.2972, p. 13 (France); pp. 14-16 (China); pp. 26-27 (United Kingdom); pp. 27-28 (United States); pp. 28-30 (Soviet Union); and pp. 30-31 (Ethiopia)).

Part II

Consideration of the provisions of Article 2 of the Charter

A. Article 2, paragraph 4

Article 2, paragraph 4

All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

Note

This note describes the action taken by the Security Council in the form of resolutions, presidential statements and other decisions in connection with Article 2 (4). It is followed by six case studies which present the discussions that arose in the Council pertaining to that Article.

During the period under review, the Council adopted one resolution which contained an explicit reference to Article 2 (4).⁵⁴ By resolution 748 (1992), by which it imposed sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council reaffirmed that, “in accordance with the principle in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, every State has the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when such acts involve a threat or use of force”.⁵⁵

The Council also adopted 13 presidential statements,⁵⁶ in which it invoked the provisions of Article 2 (4) or the principle enshrined therein. In six presidential statements relating to the situation in the Middle East, the members of the Council reaffirmed “their commitment to the full sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity and national unity of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries”. In this context, they asserted that “any State shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations”.⁵⁷ In six other presidential statements issued on the occasion of the admission to membership in the United Nations of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina and Georgia, respectively, the members of the Council “noted with great satisfaction” each State’s “solemn commitment to uphold the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, which include the principles relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes and the non-use of force”.⁵⁸ The statements made on the occasion of the admission of Armenia and Azerbaijan, respectively, were recalled in a further presidential statement concerning the situation in Nagorny-Karabakh, “in particular the reference to the principles in the Charter of the United Nations relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes and the non-use of force”.⁵⁹

During the period under review, the Council adopted several resolutions and presidential statements that contained implicit references to the principle enshrined in Article 2 (4).

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council condemned the invasion and, subsequently, the continued occupation of Kuwait by the military forces of Iraq.⁶⁰ In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the members of the Council condemned publicly and unreservedly the use of force and called upon all regular and irregular military forces involved to act in accordance with this principle.⁶¹ In connection with the situation in Georgia, the members of the Council recalled the commitment by the parties not to resort to the use of force.⁶²

In a number of instances, the Council reaffirmed the principles of territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of States and asked that they be fully respected.⁶³ The Council also reaffirmed the

The Council also reaffirmed that the taking of territory by force or any practice of “ethnic cleansing” is unlawful and unacceptable, and would not be permitted to affect the outcome of the negotiations on constitutional arrangements for the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁷⁰ It further called on all parties and others concerned to respect strictly the territorial integrity of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and affirmed that any entities unilaterally declared or arrangements imposed in contravention thereof would not be accepted.⁷¹ The Council also expressed concern about possible developments which could undermine confidence and stability in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia or threaten its territory.⁷²

In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council demanded that all forms of interference from outside Bosnia and Herzegovina, including by units of the Yugoslav People’s Army as well as elements of the Croatian Army, cease immediately, and that Bosnia and Herzegovina’s neighbours take swift action to end such interference and respect the territorial integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina.⁷³ In a number of cases, the Council appealed for an end to interference from outside States in the form of “foreign military assistance”,⁷⁴ including through “support for irregular forces”,⁷⁵ overt or covert “supply of aid to irregular forces or insurrectional movements”,⁷⁶ and “infiltration of irregular units and personnel”.⁷⁷ In connection with the situation in Angola, the Council stressed the importance of all States refraining from taking any actions which could undermine the peace agreement there.⁷⁸ In connection with the situation in Liberia, the Council also called on the parties to the conflict to respect and implement the various accords of the peace process ..., including refraining from actions which endanger the security of neighbouring States,⁷⁹ and, conversely, called on Member States to exercise self-restraint in their relations with all parties to the Liberian conflict and to refrain from any action that would be inimical to the peace processes.⁸⁰ In other instances, the Council called upon all States and/or parties in neighbouring countries to refrain from any action which might contribute to increasing tension, to inhibiting the establishment of an effective ceasefire and to impeding or delaying a peaceful and negotiated outcome to the conflict.⁸¹ The Council also deplored “the false alarm by South Africa ... concerning the alleged movement of forces of the South West Africa People’s Organization across the Namibia-Angola border” and called on that State to desist from any such further action.⁸²

In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council considered that acts of violence committed by Iraq against diplomatic missions and their personnel, including violations of diplomatic premises and abduction of personnel enjoying diplomatic immunity as well as foreign nationals present in such premises, constitute aggressive acts and a flagrant violation of its international obligations which strike at the root of the conduct of international relations in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and strongly condemned such acts.⁸³

In connection with the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council expressed its concern at the worldwide persistence of acts of international terrorism in all its forms, including those in which States are directly or indirectly involved, which endanger or take innocent lives, have a deleterious effect on international relations and jeopardize the security of States,⁸⁴ and expressed its conviction that the suppression of such acts is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security.⁸⁵ It decided that the Libyan Government must commit itself definitely to cease all forms of terrorist action and assistance to terrorist groups and that it must promptly, by concrete actions, demonstrate its renunciation of terrorism.⁸⁶ In connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, the Council required Iraq to inform the Council that it will not commit or support any act of international terrorism or allow any organization directed towards commission of such acts to operate within its territory and to condemn unequivocally and renounce all acts, methods and practices of terrorism.⁸⁷ The Council further expressed concern at, or deplored, statements by Iraq “threatening to use weapons in violation of its obligations”, reports that “Iraq has attempted to acquire military materials for a nuclear-weapons programme contrary to its obligations”, and threats by Iraq “to make use of terrorism against targets outside Iraq and the taking of hostages by Iraq”.⁸⁸

In a number of cases, the Council called on parties to respect and maintain ceasefire agreements and condemned violations of such agreements.⁸⁹ It also called for the cessation of hostilities and/or acts of violence, including violations of international humanitarian law, and the exercise of restraint or the cessation of provocative actions.⁹⁰ In some instances, the Council also called for the withdrawal of troops from foreign territory.⁹¹ In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council demanded that those units of the Yugoslav People's Army and elements of the Croatian Army now in Bosnia and Herzegovina must either be withdrawn, or be subject to the authority of the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed with the weapons placed under effective international monitoring.⁹² The Council strongly condemned any violations of international humanitarian law, including those involved in the practice of "ethnic cleansing", and demanded that all parties and others concerned in the former Yugoslavia, and all military forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina, immediately cease and desist from all breaches of international humanitarian law, including from actions such as those described above.⁹³ It further called on all parties in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina to fulfil their commitments to put into effect an immediate cessation of hostilities and to negotiate, continuously and in uninterrupted session, to end the blockades of Sarajevo and other towns and to demilitarize them, with heavy weapons under international supervision.⁹⁴

Similar calls for the respect and maintenance of ceasefire agreements, the cessation of hostilities, including violations of international humanitarian law, and the exercise of restraint were made in the context of internal conflicts.⁹⁵ In connection with the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council called upon all parties and others concerned to ensure that forcible expulsions of persons from the areas where they lived and any attempts to change the ethnic composition of the population, anywhere in the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, cease immediately.⁹⁶ In another case, the Council condemned the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq, including in the Kurdish populated areas, the consequences of which threatened international peace and security in the region and demanded that Iraq, as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end that repression.⁹⁷

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

None of the decisions of the Security Council mentioned above concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait gave rise to a constitutional discussion of Article 2 (4). Pertinent arguments with reference to the provisions of that paragraph were however made in the course of the Council's deliberations on the item.

On the one hand, Kuwait described the military invasion by Iraq as "a flagrant violation of the Charter, particularly in paragraphs 3 and 4 of its Article 2", which made it incumbent on the Security Council to shoulder its responsibilities to maintain international peace and security, including the protection of Kuwait's security, sovereignty and territorial integrity. It affirmed that the existing differences between Kuwait and Iraq should be dealt with by peaceful means and negotiations, and not through the use of force, in accordance with international norms, instruments and laws, "first and foremost the Charter of the United Nations".¹⁰⁰

On the other hand, Iraq held that the events taking place in Kuwait were internal matters and that Iraq was pursuing no goal or objective in Kuwait. The Government of Iraq had acted solely on the basis of a request for assistance from the Free Provisional Government of Kuwait to establish security and order. The Iraqi forces would withdraw as soon as order had been restored, as requested by the Free Provisional Government of Kuwait.¹⁰¹

In the course of the Council's consideration of the item, Council members and non-members condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait as an act of military aggression in flagrant violation of the Charter, international law and all fully accepted norms of international behaviour.¹⁰² They reaffirmed the principles of prohibition of the use or threat of force, non-interference in the internal affairs of States, and respect for territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence,¹⁰³ emphasizing that such principles were particularly important to small States.¹⁰⁴ Further reaffirming the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes,¹⁰⁵ they condemned the acquisition of territory by force as a violation of the Charter and international law¹⁰⁶ and rejected the

Items relating to the situation in the former Yugoslavia

None of the decisions of the Security Council mentioned above concerning the situation in the former Yugoslavia gave rise to a constitutional discussion of Article 2 (4). Several pertinent arguments with reference to the provisions of that paragraph were however made in the course of the Council's deliberations on the item.

Council members and non-members reaffirmed the principles of prohibition of the use or threat of force,¹⁰⁹ respect for territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence, and peaceful settlement of disputes.¹¹⁰ They affirmed the unacceptability of any modification of external or internal borders or acquisition of territory through the use of force,¹¹¹ including on the basis of separatist policies¹¹² or through policies of "ethnic cleansing", genocide or human rights abuses.¹¹³ According to one member, "all the parties to the conflict must understand that there is no alternative to a political settlement of the crisis in Bosnia and Herzegovina and that any attempts to bring about a military solution to these problems by force of arms, in particular by establishing so-called ethnically pure States, constitute a crime against their own people and against all humankind".¹¹⁴

Following the admission of Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina to membership in the United Nations,¹¹⁵ Council members reaffirmed the principles of non-interference in the internal affairs of States, and respect for territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of States,¹¹⁶ as well as their opposition to aggression against a Member State, including through military support from outside to irregular or insurrectionist forces in materiel and personnel.¹¹⁷ On the other hand, it was also argued that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina was “essentially a civil war”.¹¹⁸

Case 8

The situation in Central America

The decision adopted by the Security Council under this item¹¹⁹ did not give rise to a constitutional discussion of Article 2 (4). Pertinent arguments with reference to the provisions of the paragraph were however made in the course of the Council’s deliberations on the item.

On the one hand, it was argued that in its consideration of the situation in Central America, the Security Council had “adopted resolutions containing a series of principles and recommendations for all States”. They included “the right of all States of the region to live in peace and security, free from outside interference; the avoidance of any measure or attempt to destabilize or undermine other States and their institutions; respect for sovereignty and the inalienable right of peoples freely to choose their own political, economic and social system; the development of relations in accordance with the interests of the peoples, excluding outside interference, subversion, direct or indirect coercion and threats of any kind; the non-use against any State in the region of any measure that could impede the pursuit of peace, and renunciation of support for or promotion of such measures; and an immediate halt to any kind of aid, whether given openly or covertly, by any Government, within the region or outside, to irregular forces or insurgent forces operating in the region”.¹²⁰ Those principles and recommendations provided rights but they also imposed obligations on the parties concerned “so that third-party States are not provided with an opportunity to justify intervening” in the crisis.¹²¹

Specifically, the provision of assistance to “anti-democratic irregular forces” or “minority insurgent groups” in El Salvador by the Government of Nicaragua in the form of “weapons, military equipment, logistic support or sanctuary”, or “moral, propaganda and diplomatic support”, was denounced as amounting to a “violation of the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other States and the commission of acts of aggression as defined in international instruments”, including the Charter of the United Nations and the various agreements supporting the Central American peace process.¹²² With reference to the actions of the United States in Nicaragua, it was claimed that the United States had “armed and managed the counter-revolutionary forces” and that such actions could be considered “not as an external factor but as a cause of destabilization, both in the region and within each of the Central American countries”.¹²³ In particular, the United States’ decision to postpone the demobilization of the contras in Nicaragua was qualified as “plain interference in Nicaragua’s domestic politics” and “a clear violation” of the agreements supporting the Central American peace process.¹²⁴

In response to those arguments, it was stated that the United States had ceased all lethal aid to the Nicaraguan resistance, in compliance with the agreements supporting the Central American peace process.¹²⁵ The massive rearming of the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional in El Salvador, however, had been made possible by the Governments of Nicaragua and Cuba. It was claimed that Nicaragua was aiding “an insurrectionist group whose political representatives had received less than 4 per cent of the recent vote and which had returned to fight the constitutionally elected Government [of El Salvador], in direct violation of the peace process”. Such aid was “not only military in nature but was also perpetuating the worst kind of inhumane aid — the abetting of guerrilla terrorism that resulted in the tragic loss of more lives”.¹²⁶ That was why, on the other hand, “economic, military and humanitarian assistance” was being provided by the United States to El Salvador, “as aid directed to a constitutionally elected Government in support of the peace process and used to offset guerrilla damage and attacks on the economy and infrastructure of that country”. It was argued that such continued “support of the

The situation in Panama

The decision adopted by the Security Council under this item¹²⁸ did not give rise to a constitutional discussion of Article 2 (4). Pertinent arguments relating to the provisions of that Article were however made during the Council’s consideration of the item.

With explicit reference to Article 2 (4), the Charter of the United Nations and/or norms of international law, Council members and non-members reaffirmed the principles of peaceful settlement of dispute, non-interference in the internal affairs of States, respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of States, and prohibition of the threat or use of force,¹²⁹ including through policies of destabilization and coercion.¹³⁰ It was argued that the application of such principles allowed no exception¹³¹ and should not be selective,¹³² and that the use of force “[could not] be approved per se, whatever the causes”.¹³³ The view was also expressed that major Powers and/or permanent members of the Security Council were expected to assume a special responsibility in upholding those principles,¹³⁴ which were deemed to be of particular importance to small Member States.¹³⁵

Specifically, it was stated that “the pretext of protection of American citizens used to justify intervention was the same pretext reasserted time and again by Governments and doctrines of the United States to attempt to justify what cannot be justified and legitimize acts of force and violence”.¹³⁶ No ethical or legal norm, however, could make aggression a legal act and make the use of force a moral principle.¹³⁷ Similarly, it was argued that whatever arguments the United States used to try to justify its action in Panama, it remained a flagrant violation of the elementary norms of international law and the Charter.¹³⁸ In this connection, it was explicitly stated that reliance by the United States on Article 51 of the Charter did not justify its action in Panama,¹³⁹ as it reflected “the shamelessness of those who, themselves guilty of the crime of aggression, try to pass themselves off as victims”.¹⁴⁰ It was also noted that “the military intervention undertaken by the United States in Panama was a disproportionate response”.¹⁴¹

On the other hand, it was argued that the United States action took place on the basis of Article 51 of the Charter and was “designed to protect American lives as well as to defend the integrity of the Panama Canal Treaties”.¹⁴² In this regard, it was observed that the Charter, in Article 51, did recognize a basic exception to the prohibition of the use of force and affirmed the inherent right to self-defence which was vested in Member States.¹⁴³ After examination of “all circumstances” to determine whether or not there were “compelling reasons” which justified the United States action in Panama, it was believed that such compelling reasons did exist.¹⁴⁴ It was further argued that the United States had “consulted with the democratically elected leadership of Panama” prior to its actions in that country.¹⁴⁵ Support for the use of force undertaken by the United States was affirmed in this context “as a last resort ... against a régime which had itself turned to force to subvert the democratic process” in Panama and “with the agreement of the Panamanian leaders who had won [the last] election”.¹⁴⁶

Doubts were expressed, however, that democracy could be promoted by foreign military means.¹⁴⁷ It was argued that “any effort aimed at eliminating an authoritarian and usurping power is legitimate, provided that the foundation of international relations is not undermined. That foundation is after all but an expression in the international arena of the profound desire of the peoples of the United Nations to make democracy the sole alternative to anarchy in international relations”.¹⁴⁸ In that perspective, rejection of authoritarianism could be seen as twofold: “repudiation of the use of force against one’s own people and of the use of power politics among the peoples of the world”.¹⁴⁹

Items relating to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

In the course of the Council’s consideration of this item, under which no decision was taken, pertinent arguments were made concerning the provisions of Article 2 (4).

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya argued that the United States had committed an act of premeditated, deliberate aggression by shooting down, without any justification, two unarmed Libyan reconnaissance aircraft on routine patrol near the Libyan coast. The act was described as a prelude to a large-scale attack upon the economic and military installations in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and as forming part of the United States policy of aggression against that country. That policy had reached a peak under the current United States Administration, subjecting the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya to threats, provocations and acts of aggression. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya claimed that the United States systematically conducted provocative naval and air manoeuvres in its territorial waters and in its airspace in an attempt to draw the country into military confrontation and that a continuing campaign of disinformation to destabilize the country had paved the way for the United States’ latest aggression. It called upon the Council to condemn the American military aggression, and to take all measures to put an end to the aggression and to use whatever means were necessary to prevent its repetition. It also urged the Council to call upon the United States, to withdraw its naval fleet and to put an end to its provocative manoeuvres directed against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.¹⁵⁰ Indignation was also expressed on behalf of the Group of Arab States at the “unwarranted act of aggression” by the United States. The Arab States believed such acts of aggression would continue unless deterrent measures were taken to end military operations of that kind. The Council was called upon to condemn such irresponsible acts of aggression, to adopt appropriate measures to prevent their repetition against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and to shoulder its responsibility under the Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security in the region.¹⁵¹

The United States argued that it was the aggrieved party and not the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, whose air force had aggressively challenged routine operations conducted by the United States well beyond the 12-mile limit of the territorial seas claimed by the Government of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The action by the United States aircraft, in response to provocation and threat by two armed Libyan fighter aircraft, was fully consistent with internationally accepted principles of self-defence. The United States Government had so informed the Secretary-General and the President of the Council under Article 51 of the Charter.¹⁵²

Council members and non-members¹⁵³ characterized the action taken by the United States as an act of aggression in violation of international law and the Charter, which posed a threat to peace and security in the region. They rejected the claim of self-defence invoked by the United States and urged the Council to condemn the act of aggression and to take measures to prevent the recurrence of such acts. Several speakers¹⁵⁴ appealed for the exercise of restraint and the prevention of further escalation of tension, some recalling the importance of the Charter principles relating to the non-use or threat of force against territorial integrity or economic independence of any State and the peaceful settlement of disputes. It was held that the Council would not be living up to its responsibilities if it did not assert strongly that actions of States conform with international obligations in compliance with the norms regulating relations, particularly respect for sovereignty and inviolability and refraining from the threat or use of force against States.¹⁵⁵

Other speakers¹⁵⁶ accepted the explanation of the United States for its actions. One member explained that it would vote against a draft resolution before the Council on this item,¹⁵⁷ owing, inter alia, to a reference contained therein to the definition of aggression, which could imply a deliberate will on the part of the United States to create the incident.¹⁵⁸

However, pertinent arguments were made concerning the provisions of that Article during the Council's consideration of the item.

In the course of the Council's consideration of resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992), members and non-members of the Council denounced and condemned acts of international terrorism,¹⁶⁰ State-sponsored terrorism¹⁶¹ or acts of terrorism in which States had been involved directly or indirectly,¹⁶² including "through material, political or moral assistance to terrorists".¹⁶³ It was held that the "logic of confrontation" which fed into terrorism in all its forms and manifestations was "in contradiction with the principles and purposes of the Charter, which in Article 2, paragraph 4, calls upon Members of our Organization to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force".¹⁶⁴ It was also noted, however, that resolution 731 (1992) of 21 January 1992 was "limited strictly to acts of terrorism involving State participation".¹⁶⁵ It was exceptional by its nature and could not be considered in any way as a precedent but was intended only "for those cases in which States are involved in acts of terrorism".¹⁶⁶

By resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, the Council imposed, under Chapter VII of the Charter, a sanctions regime on both Iraq and Kuwait, as detailed in paragraphs 3 to 8 of the resolution.¹⁶⁸ In paragraph 9, however, the Council decided that “notwithstanding paragraphs 4 to 8 above, nothing in the present resolution shall prohibit assistance to the legitimate Government of Kuwait”, and it called upon all States (a) to take appropriate measures to protect assets of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and its agencies; and (b) not to recognize any regime set up by the occupying Power.¹⁶⁹

By resolution 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992, concerning the situation in the former Yugoslavia, the Council expressed its “concern at the indications that the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991) [was] not being fully observed, as noted in paragraph 21 of the report¹⁷⁰ of the Secretary-General”.¹⁷¹

By resolution 787 (1992) of 16 November 1992, the Council expressed its deep concern “about reports of continuing violations of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia by its resolutions 713 (1991) and 724 (1991) of 15 December 1991”.¹⁷² By the same resolution, the Council requested “all States to provide in accordance with the Charter such assistance as may be required” by those States acting in accordance with its authorization to use such measures, commensurate with the specific circumstances, as might be necessary to halt inward and outward maritime and riparian shipping, in order to ensure the strict implementation of the arms embargo imposed by resolution 713 (1991) and the sanctions imposed by resolution 757 (1992).¹⁷³

Statements were made during the course of the Council’s consideration of the draft text¹⁷⁴ of resolution 787 (1992) that also have a bearing on the principle set out in Article 2 (5). Some States¹⁷⁵ called for a partial lifting of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991), so as to allow Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise its right of self-defence. They also referred to the need to assist Bosnia and Herzegovina to that end.¹⁷⁶ It was argued that “from the standpoint of justice and equality, a policy that would prevent Bosnia from obtaining military assistance to enable it to exercise its legitimate right to self-defence [was] untenable”.¹⁷⁷ It was up to all, therefore, including the Security Council, “to ensure that assistance of all types — military and material — be provided to Bosnia so that it could defend itself against aggression”.¹⁷⁸ The international community was called upon “to provide all necessary material, military and moral support to enable the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to exercise its right of self-defence”.¹⁷⁹ Furthermore, those who were in a position to and had the will to provide appropriate assistance which would “help the Bosnians to deter Serbian aggression” were requested to hasten in doing so.¹⁸⁰ In that context, the representative of Croatia noted that his Government had offered “military help to the Croats in Bosnia and Herzegovina and to the Bosnian

C. Article 2, paragraph 6

Article 2, paragraph 6

The Organization shall ensure that states which are not members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

There were no explicit references to the provision of Article 2 (6) in the resolutions or decisions of the Security Council. The Council did, however, adopt three resolutions¹⁸² which touched upon the provisions of Article 2 (6). Each of those resolutions contained a specific reference to the cooperation of States non-members of the United Nations in the imposition of sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter. All three resolutions may be seen as implicitly invoking the provisions of Article 2 (6) in order to call on States non-members of the United Nations to comply with the principle enshrined in Article 2 (5).

In resolution 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, by which the Council imposed sanctions on Iraq, the Council called upon “all States, including States non-members of the United Nations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution notwithstanding any contract entered into or licence granted before the date of the present resolution”.¹⁸³

In resolution 748 (1992) of 31 March 1992, by which it imposed sanctions on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, the Council called upon “all States, including States not members of the United Nations, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted before 15 April 1992”.¹⁸⁴

In resolution 757 (1992) of 30 May 1992, by which it imposed sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Council called upon “all States, including States not members of the United Nations, and all international organizations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution, notwithstanding the existence of any rights or obligations conferred or imposed by any international agreement or any contract entered into or any licence or permit granted prior to the date of the present resolution”.¹⁸⁵

In addition, the Council adopted several resolutions and presidential statements containing provisions that might be construed as implicit references to Article 2 (6). In connection with the situation in the occupied Arab territories, the Council called upon “the High Contracting Parties to the [1949 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War] to ensure respect by Israel, the occupying Power, for its obligations under the Convention in accordance with article 1 thereof”.¹⁸⁶ In other cases, provisions of the Council’s resolutions were addressed to “all States”. The majority of those provisions related to the application of sanctions and embargoes, the Council deciding that “all States” should take steps to impose measures in accordance with the relevant sanctions regime, or calling upon “all States” to take measures connected with the implementation or administration of sanctions.¹⁸⁷ By other provisions not directly related to the imposition, implementation or administration of sanctions, the Council requested “all States” to undertake a variety of actions, including: (i) to support peace initiatives,¹⁸⁸ including by voluntary contributions;¹⁸⁹ (ii) to contribute to international cooperation in a particular field;¹⁹⁰ (iii) to provide appropriate support to or to cooperate with a Council-mandated body or force;¹⁹¹ (iv) to provide assistance or support to the United Nations and its programmes or agencies;¹⁹² (v) to provide assistance to States acting pursuant to resolutions of the Council;¹⁹³ (vi) to take steps to ensure the cooperation of parties to a dispute or conflict with initiatives of the United Nations;¹⁹⁴ (vii) to support humanitarian efforts;¹⁹⁵ (viii) to use political influence to achieve a certain objective;¹⁹⁶ (ix) to ratify certain international legal instruments;¹⁹⁷ (x) to refrain from recognition of a declared annexation;¹⁹⁸ and (xi) to refrain from actions which could undermine peace initiatives or increase tensions in a particular situation.¹⁹⁹

In one resolution, the Council reminded “all States” of their obligation to “observe strictly” certain specified resolutions of the Security Council.²⁰⁰ Some resolutions distinguished between obligations placed on “Member States” and obligations placed on “all States”.²⁰¹

Other resolutions adopted by the Council contained different forms of language. In resolution 670 (1990), the Council addressed a decision to “each

The Council adopted a number of resolutions during the period under review preceding the admission to membership in the United Nations of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), in which it called upon or demanded action by “all States” or “all parties and others concerned”.²⁰⁷

The Council also adopted two presidential statements in which it called for action from “all States”.²⁰⁸ It adopted five presidential statements concerning the situation in the Middle East by which it imposed a duty on “any State”; in that case, the Council asserted that “any State [should] refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations”.²⁰⁹

None of those decisions gave rise to a constitutional discussion of Article 2 (6). On a number of occasions, however, Council members made implicit references to Article 2 (6) by calling for action from “all States”²¹⁰ or interpreting provisions of resolutions as authorizing actions by “all States”.²¹¹ Further, several references were made to the obligation of “all States” to comply with the Council’s resolutions and the Charter.²¹² In one instance, a distinction was expressed between the respective duties of Member States and all States with regard to the situation under discussion.²¹³

D. Article 2, paragraph 7

Article 2, paragraph 7

Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council adopted one resolution which contained an explicit reference to Article 2 (7).²¹⁴ In the Council debates in relation to the adoption of a number of resolutions, there were explicit references to paragraph 7 of Article 2, while on other occasions the principle of the Charter provision regarding the principle of non-interference in domestic affairs was referred to. A debate on the interpretation of the Article was also held in connection with the adoption of resolution 688 (1991) and in connection with the adoption of resolution 706 (1991) regarding the establishment of a programme to ameliorate the humanitarian situation in Iraq.

More generally, the principle enshrined in Article 2 (7) and, in particular, its impact on the Council’s ability to address situations of civil war and massive violations of human rights, was also discussed at the Council’s summit meeting on the item entitled “The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security”.²¹⁵

Repression of the Iraqi civilian population in parts of Iraq; resolution 688 (1991)

In response to requests from Turkey and France,²¹⁶ the President of the Security Council called an urgent Council meeting on 5 April 1991,²¹⁷ to discuss concerns with regard to the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in parts of Iraq. The Council adopted resolution 688 (1991) by which it, inter alia, condemned the repression, and demanded that Iraq, “as a contribution to removing the threat to international peace and security in the region, immediately end this repression”.

The representative of Turkey stated that his Government had requested the meeting “in view of the grave threat to the peace and security of the region posed by the tragic events taking place in Iraq”. He highlighted both the human suffering of those affected and the impact of the flow of refugees on his country.²¹⁸

The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran, whose country was similarly affected, stated that it was evident “that the situation inside Iraq, due to its gravity and implications for the neighbouring countries, ha[d] consequences that threaten[ed] regional and international peace and security”.²¹⁹

The representative of France expressed the view that “violations of human rights such as those now being observed become a matter of international interest when they take on such proportions that they assume the dimension of a crime against humanity”. He added that “the influx of refugees, the continued fighting in the border areas [and] the increasing number of massacres [were] arousing indignation and threatening international peace and security in the region".²²⁰

The representative of the United States, while reaffirming that it was "not the role or the intention of the Security Council to interfere in the internal affairs of any country", stated that it was "the Council's legitimate responsibility" to respond to concerns by Iraq's neighbours "about the massive number of people fleeing, or disposed to flee, from Iraq across international frontiers because of the repression and brutality of Saddam Hussein".²²¹

The representative of the United Kingdom reminded Council members that human rights questions, for example in South Africa, had often been found not to be "essentially domestic" matters within the meaning of Article 2 (7). The situation could not, therefore, be described as an entirely internal matter. In any event, the situation was of international concern, as "the huge surge of refugees [was] destabilizing the whole region".²²²

Several other speakers agreed that the situation constituted a threat to peace and stability in the region, in particular in view of the large-scale outflow of refugees from Iraq across international borders.²²³

The representative of Iraq, on the other hand, asserted that the refugees were in fact "saboteurs who [had] penetrated through the borders" and were now escaping to safe havens. Accordingly, he described the action to be taken by the Council as "a flagrant, illegitimate intervention in Iraq's internal affairs and a violation of Article 2 of the Charter prohibiting the intervention in the internal affairs of other States".²²⁴

The representative of India, who abstained from the vote on the draft resolution, noted that he would have preferred the Council to focus its attention "on the aspect of the threat or likely threat to peace and security in the region", and that the Council should have left the other aspects to "other, more appropriate organs of the United Nations".²²⁵

The representative of China, while expressing sympathy for the difficulties confronting Turkey and the Islamic Republic of Iran as a result of the influx of refugees, observed that the matter was "a question of great complexity, because the internal affairs of a country [were] also involved". He reminded Council members that, according to Article 2 (7) of the Charter, the Council should "not consider or take action on questions concerning the internal affairs of any State".²²⁶

The representative of Yemen noted that, according to Article 2 of the Charter, it was "not within the Council's purview to address internal issues in any country". He stated that Yemen did not share the view that there was a problem threatening international peace and security, as there was "no conflict or war taking place across the borders of Iraq with its neighbours". Accordingly, he stated that the draft resolution was an attempt "to politicize the humanitarian issue", which could set "a dangerous precedent that would open the way to diverting the Council away from its basic functions and responsibilities for safeguarding international peace and security".²²⁷

The representative of Cuba asserted that Article 2 (7) set strict limits on Security Council authority, and that the existence of a humanitarian emergency did not permit the Council to disregard those limits, especially where the Charter empowered other organs of the United Nations to address humanitarian issues.²²⁸ A similar view was taken by the representative of Zimbabwe.²²⁹

The majority of speakers, while emphasizing that as a matter of principle they were opposed to any form of interference in the internal affairs of any country, agreed that Council action was required, and believed that the text of the draft resolution adequately addressed the situation.²³⁰

²²¹ Ibid., pp. 57-58. The representative of the United States conceded, however, that the resolution addressed a special case following the end of the Gulf war and should not be viewed as a general precedent for future Security Council action.

A number of speakers expressly welcomed the explicit reference to Article 2 (7) contained in the preamble to the resolution as acknowledging the limits of United Nations authority to intervene in the internal affairs of Member States.²³¹

In connection with proposals made at meetings in August and November 1992,²³² however, that Mr. Van der Stoel, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Iraq, be invited to give a briefing, the representatives of China and India stressed that the Council should restrict its deliberations and actions to its sphere of competence under the Charter. The Council had primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. It should exercise caution in the manner in which it interpreted that mandate. It could not discuss human rights situations per se or make recommendations in that regard. The representatives considered it inappropriate, therefore, that the Security Council should invite the Special Rapporteur to participate in the meetings of the Council.²³³ This position was supported by the delegation of Zimbabwe.²³⁴

The representative of Ecuador, on the other hand, observed that the invitation to Mr. Van der Stoel (in that case) did not affect or increase the normal authority of the Council as it fell within the scope of a resolution already adopted, and should be understood to reflect all the limitations inherent in that resolution itself. Recalling that by resolution 688 (1991) the Council had condemned the acts of repression committed by Iraq against the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of the country, and found this repression and its consequences to be a threat to peace and security in the region, the representative noted that the Special Rapporteur would thus be providing information on matters that were within the purview of the Council.²³⁵

Issues raised in connection with the establishment of a programme to ameliorate the humanitarian situation in Iraq; resolution 706 (1991)

In the deliberations held in connection with the adoption of resolution 706 (1991), by which the Council established a programme under which Iraq would be permitted to sell certain quantities of petroleum and petroleum products in order to finance the purchase of foodstuffs, medicine and supplies essential for civilian needs, issues in connection with the principle enshrined in Article 2 (7), were raised.

The representative of Iraq argued that the programme set out in resolution 706 (1991) would impinge on Iraq's national sovereignty and impose a "foreign guardianship" on the Iraqi people. It would deprive the Government of Iraq of its "powers and responsibilities with respect to its citizens and abolish its role in caring for them and providing for their livelihood, their daily need for foodstuffs and health and medical services". He alleged that the resolution involved "colonialist restrictions that would rob Iraq of its right to full sovereignty, interfere in its internal affairs, plunder its oil wealth and usurp its right to dispose of its own funds".²³⁶ He asserted that the attempt to impose a United Nations supervision system was aimed at "derogating from Iraq's sovereignty".²³⁷

The representative of Cuba stated that the establishment of the mechanism proposed by the resolution would mean "appropriating elements of Iraqi sovereignty and would seek to apply to Iraq a type of trusteeship". He contended that the Charter did not authorize the Council "to take upon itself certain functions and responsibilities, or to entrust them to the Secretary-General, which are clearly a breach of the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of States and of the principle of the sovereign equality of States".²³⁸

The representative of China stated that the resolution had to be implemented with full respect for the sovereignty of Iraq, which was entitled to play a role in the purchase and distribution of food, medicine and other materials to meet essential civilian needs.²³⁹

²³⁷ Ibid., p. 41.

²³⁸ Ibid., pp. 68-70.

²³⁹ Ibid., p. 82.

The representative of India stated that humanitarian assistance should be provided through means consistent with the Charter, “particularly the all-important principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of countries”. It was especially important that the measures adopted did not adversely affect or undermine the sovereignty of Iraq, whose consent would therefore be of “cardinal importance”. He believed that the provisions in the resolution did not “call for arrangements of a tutelary kind that might have the effect of interfering in Iraq’s internal affairs”. That was to be borne in mind by the Secretary-General when making his recommendations on the implementation of the resolution.²⁴⁰

The representative of Ecuador considered “that supervision and monitoring by the United Nations should not lead the Organization to engage in actions at variance with permanent respect for the principles of the Charter, particularly paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 2”.²⁴¹

The representative of Zimbabwe expressed “reservations regarding those provisions of the resolution encroaching on national sovereignty”, and believed that “monitoring arrangements could have been put in place to ensure transparency, without infringing on sovereignty”.²⁴²

A number of speakers underlined the need for strict monitoring and supervisions.²⁴³

The representative of the United States noted that the importance of vigilant monitoring of the distribution of humanitarian assistance, to deter its diversion to privileged sectors of Iraqi society or its misuse at the expense of those most in need, could not be overemphasized.²⁴⁴

The representative of France believed that “very specific modalities for the sale of Iraqi oil, for the use of the resources thus generated and for the distribution of essential goods thus purchased” were indispensable to meet the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi population as a whole, as the Government of Iraq could not be trusted.²⁴⁵

Similarly, the representative of the United Kingdom believed that, “in view of the past record of the Iraqi Government”, effective United Nations monitoring arrangements for the oil sales and the equitable distribution of humanitarian supplies were indeed essential.²⁴⁶

Initial response to the situation in the former Yugoslavia; resolution 713 (1992)

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 713 (1992)²⁴⁷ by which the Council, inter alia, determined that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, and imposed a complete embargo on all deliveries of arms and military equipment to Yugoslavia, the representative of Yugoslavia emphasized his country’s historic devotion to the principle of non-interference and the sovereign right of all States to decide their own future, but acknowledged that the Council’s concern was fully justified. He observed that Yugoslavia was “in conflict with itself” and believed that the Yugoslav people were no longer capable of solving the crisis by themselves. He also expressed his belief that “the Yugoslav crisis threaten[ed] peace and security on a large scale”.²⁴⁸

Several members of the Council placed emphasis on the fact that the conflict had begun to spill over national borders and that it was, therefore, of international concern,²⁴⁹ while others emphasized that, in the light of the Charter provisions prohibiting the intervention by the United Nations in the internal affairs of any State, the explicit agreement of the Government of Yugoslavia to the Council’s involvement in the Yugoslav crisis had been a decisive

Response to the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina; resolution 757 (1992) and 770 (1992)

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 757 (1992),²⁵¹ by which the Council determined that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in other parts of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constituted “a threat to international peace and security”, Council members expressed differing views with regard to the nature of that threat. While several speakers perceived the conflict as a foreign aggression against Bosnia and Herzegovina,²⁵² others saw the threat to the peace as emanating essentially from ethnic strife within Bosnia and Herzegovina.²⁵³

In spite of those differences, a broad majority of Council members agreed on the necessity of addressing the threat by adopting measures under Chapter VII of the Charter.²⁵⁴ The representatives of China and Zimbabwe,²⁵⁵ however, were of the view that the situation ought to be addressed by negotiations rather than action under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In the discussions held in connection with the adoption of resolution 770 (1991),²⁵⁶ by which the Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, called upon States “to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate in coordination with the United Nations the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina”, the representative of China stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the resolution “solely out of humanitarian considerations”. He further noted that China deemed the invoking of Chapter VII of the Charter to be inappropriate and placed China’s reservations on record. Noting that Chapter VII of the Charter could be invoked only under situations that seriously threatened international peace and security, not under other circumstances, he stated his delegation’s view that the invoking of Chapter VII in the resolution should not constitute a precedent.²⁵⁷

Most other members of the Council expressly welcomed the action taken by the Council in response

Yemen and Zimbabwe, in particular, voiced the concern that the proposed draft resolution could be seen as Security Council involvement in matters essentially related to the domestic affairs of a Member State. The representative of Yemen noted the tendency of the Council to deal with new problems posed by internal conflicts “experimentally” and warned that such an approach ran counter to the principles of the Charter, including the principles of respect for sovereignty of States and non-intervention in their domestic affairs. He stressed the importance of observing Charter principles and avoiding experimentation in settling internal disputes (S/PV.3009, p. 32 (Zimbabwe); pp. 33 and 36 (Yemen)). See also the letter dated 25 September 1991, from the representative of Canada to the President of the Security Council, in which Canada stated that, although the concept of sovereignty was fundamental to statehood, the concept of sovereignty had to respect higher principles; no longer would the wanton destruction of human life be considered a matter of purely internal concern (S/23076).

The situation relating to Afghanistan

By a letter to the President of the Security Council dated 3 April 1989,²⁵⁹ the representative of Afghanistan requested the convening of an emergency meeting to consider “Pakistan’s military aggression and its overt and covert interference in the internal affairs of the Republic of Afghanistan”.²⁶⁰

Afghanistan reiterated its allegations against Pakistan during the Council’s debates on this matter,²⁶¹ claiming that “peace, stability and security in South-West Asia” were threatened, and drawing attention to the “dangerous implications of the aggression by Pakistan for peace and security in the region and in the world”. He requested the Security Council “to take all urgent measures within its competence” under the Charter “to stop Pakistani aggression and intervention against Afghanistan”.²⁶²

The representative of Pakistan, on the other hand, maintained that the situation in Afghanistan was a purely internal one and represented the continuing “struggle of the Afghan people to overthrow an illegal and unrepresentative regime that [had been] imposed on them by external military intervention”.²⁶³

A number of speakers were also of the view that, following the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan, the situation in Afghanistan was no longer an international dispute, and therefore not a matter for Council involvement.²⁶⁴

Numerous other speakers, however, contended that the continued support given by Pakistan and the United States to Afghan rebel groups in their attempt to overthrow the lawful Government of Afghanistan constituted a serious threat to international peace and security in the region. Accordingly, the situation could not be seen as an internal matter, and had been properly brought before the Security Council.²⁶⁵

The situation in Liberia

At a meeting held on 22 January 1991,²⁶⁶ the Liberian representative recalled that his country had been trying for several months to have the Council seized with the situation in his country. He deplored the fact that the strict application of the Charter provisions relating to non-interference in the internal affairs of Member States had “hampered the effectiveness of the Council and its principal objective of maintaining international peace and security”. This raised the question whether it would be necessary to review, and perhaps reinterpret, the Charter provisions calling for non-interference in the internal affairs of Member States.²⁶⁷

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 788 (1992),²⁶⁸ by which the Council determined the existence of a threat to international peace and security, and imposed a general arms embargo on Liberia, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Liberia emphasized the international dimension of the civil war, stating that the conflict, by its spillover effects, was “already a clear and present danger to neighbouring Sierra Leone”, which might be “slowly transforming West Africa into an arms market”. He insisted that the civil war had to be “perceived in the context of the Council’s responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security”.²⁶⁹

Similar views were expressed by other speakers.²⁷⁰

²⁷⁰ The representative of the Russian Federation believed that “the failure of some belligerent Liberian groups to implement the plan for a peaceful settlement in Liberia agreed to under the auspices of ECOWAS [would] lead to an exacerbation of the situation in that country and [was] fraught with danger not only to neighbouring States but also to international peace and security, particularly in West Africa” (S/PV.3138, p. 66). This view was shared by the representative of China, who felt that the conflict “had threatened the peace and security of the neighbouring States and the region as a whole” (ibid., p. 71). The representative of Cape Verde noted that the dimension that the conflict in Liberia had assumed had become “a destabilizing factor in West Africa as a whole and pose[d] a real threat to international peace and security” (ibid., p. 69). The representative of Ecuador felt that the extension of the consequences of the crisis to neighbouring countries had given the crisis an “international character” and that “the persistence of the problem threatened the peace and security of the subregion as a whole” (ibid., p. 81). The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Benin, speaking on behalf of ECOWAS, feared that there remained a great risk that the civil war would spread to the entire West

The situation in Somalia

During the debate held in connection with the adoption of resolution 794 (1992),²⁷¹ by which the Council determined that “the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia” constituted a threat to international peace and security,²⁷² most Council members agreed that the humanitarian situation itself necessitated the adoption of measures under Chapter VII of the Charter,²⁷³ without expressly

African subregion and that its continuation “threatened the peace and security of the West African subregion and therefore international peace and security” (ibid., pp. 8-11 and 97). The representative of Senegal believed that the war posed a “genuine threat to the peace and security of the 16 countries of ECOWAS” and was, therefore, a “destabilizing factor for the countries of the region” (ibid., p. 22). The representative of Zimbabwe noted that the conflict had now “spilled over into neighbouring countries and thus present[ed] a threat not only to the region but to international peace and security” (ibid., p. 62). The representative of Egypt agreed that the situation posed a “threat to peace and security in the region of West Africa and, therefore, [made] it incumbent upon the Security Council to act” (ibid. pp. 93-95).

²⁷² By a letter dated 29 November 1992 to the President of the Security Council (S/24868), the Secretary-General had advised the Council that there was no alternative but to adopt “more forceful measures to secure the humanitarian operations in Somalia”. Noting that no government existed in Somalia that could request and allow the use of force, he observed that the Council had “to make a determination under Article 39 of the Charter that a threat to the peace existed, as a result of the repercussions of the Somali conflict on the entire region, and to decide what measures should be taken to maintain international peace and security”. In this context, it may be interesting to note, however, that resolution 794 (1992) does not contain any reference to the “repercussion of the Somali conflict on the entire region”.

²⁷³ S/PV.3145. See for example the statement made by the representative of the Russian Federation: “The Russian delegation is convinced that, at the present juncture, resolution of the crisis requires the use of international armed forces under the auspices of the Security Council to ensure the delivery and safe keeping of the humanitarian assistance and its distribution to the country’s starving population” (S/PV.3145, p. 26). See also the statement made by the representative of the United Kingdom: “The international community has no wish to intervene in the internal affairs of [Somalia], but

referring to any specific regional or international implications of the crisis.²⁷⁴

While a number of Council members emphasized the unique character of the situation in Somalia, and cautioned that the action taken by the Council should not be seen as a precedent,²⁷⁵ other members of the Council saw the new nature of the threat posed by the situation in Somalia as symptomatic for the new challenges to which the United Nations and the international community had to adapt.²⁷⁶

Case 19

The situation in the occupied Arab territories

Following the eruption of violence in the Old City of Jerusalem, which had resulted in the death of more than 20 Palestinians, the Council adopted resolution 672 (1990).²⁷⁷ The Council welcomed the

it cannot stand by and permit a humanitarian crisis of this magnitude to continue" (ibid., p. 35). The representative of France noted that, in adopting resolution 794 (1992), the Council had "demonstrated its determination to put an end to the suffering of the Somali people", adding that the commitment was "part of the principle of establishing access to victims and of the right to emergency humanitarian assistance" (ibid., p. 29).

²⁷⁴ A few such references were however made during the debate. See S/PV.3145, pp. 19-20 (Cape Verde); p. 42 (Venezuela); p. 44 (Morocco); and p. 38 (United States).

²⁷⁶ The representative of the United States noted that, "by acting in response to the tragic events in Somalia, the international community [was] also taking an important step in developing a strategy for dealing with the potential disorder and conflicts of the post-cold-war world" (S/PV.3145, p. 36). The representative of France believed that by the resolution the United Nations had "demonstrated its capacity to adapt to new challenges" (ibid., p. 30). The representative of Hungary felt that it would "be difficult, confronted with world public opinion, for the international community to avoid its responsibility to meet the challenges arising in hotbeds of crisis as serious as the one that [was] continuing to tear Somalia apart" (ibid., p. 48).

²⁷⁷ Adopted at the 2948th meeting, on 12 October 1990. See also the verbatim records of the 2946th and 2947th meetings held in connection with the same matter on 8 and 9 October 1990 respectively. See also the case study on the proposed fact-finding mission (chapter X,

Secretary-General's decision to send a fact-finding mission to the region, to look into the circumstances surrounding the recent tragic events in Jerusalem and other similar developments in the occupied territories, and to submit a report containing findings and recommendations to the Council on ways and means for ensuring the safety and protection of the Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation.²⁷⁸

Having learned of Israel's refusal to receive the proposed mission of the Secretary-General,²⁷⁹ the Council met on 24 October 1990.²⁸⁰ At that meeting, the representative of Israel explained that Israel had expressed its readiness to assist the Secretary-General in the preparation of a report on the relevant events, but emphasized that Israel, like any other sovereign State, was the exclusive authority in the territory under its control. The representative noted that Israel had appointed its own "independent commission of inquiry consisting of three prominent figures", which would "present its findings and conclusions on the chain of events, their causes and the actions of Israel's security forces".²⁸¹

Many speakers expressed regret at Israel's refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General, and underlined that Israel was under an obligation to comply with resolution 672 (1990).²⁸² It was also noted that Israel's sensitivities had been taken into account in the Council's approach to this matter, and that resolution 672 (1990), instead of calling for the establishment of a Council mission to investigate the incident, had discreetly welcomed the Secretary-General's decision to send a mission to the region.²⁸³

Following further deliberations, the Council, on 24 October 1990, unanimously adopted resolution 673 (1990),²⁸⁴ by which it deplored Israel's refusal to receive the mission of the Secretary-General to the region; urged the Government of Israel to reconsider its decision; and insisted that it comply fully with resolution 672 (1990) and permit the mission to proceed in keeping with its purpose.

In his report to the Council, however, the Secretary-General noted that, owing to Israel's continued refusal to receive his mission, he had been unable to secure independent information about the circumstances surrounding the recent events.²⁸⁵

In the Council's consideration of the report, several speakers again denounced Israel's rejection of the above-mentioned resolutions.²⁸⁶ The representative of Israel, however, was of the view that the proposed mission was "not intended to ascertain facts" but rather "a transparent attempt to encroach upon Israel's sovereignty". He maintained that Israel had the sole responsibility for the occupied territories, and reiterated that Israel would "reject any encroachment on its sovereignty and authority".²⁸⁷

On 20 December 1990, the Council adopted resolution 681 (1990), by which it expressed its grave concern over the rejection by Israel of resolutions 672 (1990) and 673 (1990) and requested the Secretary-General to monitor and observe the situation regarding Palestinian civilians under Israeli occupation, and to keep the Council regularly informed.

Case 20

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

During the Council's summit meeting on the item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security",²⁸⁸ speakers discussed the question how the concept of national sovereignty and the principle of non-interference in domestic affairs could be reconciled with the need to address violations of human rights²⁸⁹ and threats posed by internal conflicts.²⁹⁰ Many speakers expressed the view that the principle of non-interference should not be interpreted in a way which would prevent the Council from addressing such threats and violations.²⁹¹

The Secretary-General observed that, in the context of changes in the global order, and in the light of new challenges to the collective security of States, the concept of State sovereignty had taken on a new meaning. It comprised not only a "dimension of right", but also a "dimension of responsibility, both internal and external". Although a violation of State sovereignty was and would remain an offence against the global order, its misuse could "undermine human rights and jeopardize a peaceful global life".²⁹²

The President of the Russian Federation believed that the protection of human rights and freedoms could not be considered an internal matter for States, as it was an obligation under the Charter and other international legal instruments. The Council was therefore called upon to underline the collective responsibility for the protection of human rights and freedoms.²⁹³

“possessions of the State”, but universal rights, stated that “in Asia, in Africa, in Europe [and] in the Americas, the United Nations must stand with those who seek greater freedom and democracy”.²⁹⁴

The President of Ecuador observed that “the liberty of States, which is called sovereignty, is not undermined but rather is strengthened by the establishment of international organizations”.²⁹⁵

The President of Venezuela believed that it was necessary to “adapt the traditional concept of national sovereignty, incorporating into it the transnational responsibilities implicit in the interdependence of all our nations”.²⁹⁶

The Federal Chancellor of Austria expressed the view that many items on the Council’s agenda were increasingly related to internal conflicts that, sooner or later, could affect international peace and security.²⁹⁷ He emphasized that States should not be permitted to use “outdated interpretations of legal documents as protective walls behind which human rights [could] be systematically and massively violated with total impunity”.²⁹⁸

The Prime Minister of Belgium emphasized that States had a responsibility to the international community at large to respect the human rights of their peoples. He asserted further that “the raison d’être of the principle of non-interference [was] to allow States to foster in freedom the well-being of their peoples”. He warned, however, that no Government should use that principle as a legal argument to condone abuses of human rights, and that State rights were subservient to human rights.²⁹⁹

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Hungary stated that “respect for human rights and the rights of minorities [was] not merely a legal and humanitarian question [but] also an integral part of international collective security”, and that it was “indispensable for the Security Council to take resolute action to defend and protect these rights”.³⁰⁰

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe asserted that established principles governing international relations, such as that of non-interference in the internal affairs of other States, would have to accommodate efforts by the United Nations and by regional organizations to protect the basic human rights of individuals and social groups. Recalling the international concern for and action against apartheid, the Minister asserted that “[m]assive and deliberate violations of human rights” and “situations of oppression and repression” could no longer be tolerated anywhere. He cautioned, however, that the Council would have to exercise great care to avoid using such conflicts as a pretext for intervention by big Powers in the legitimate domestic affairs of small States.³⁰¹

While the speakers quoted above generally supported international action to counter gross violations of human rights, the Chinese Premier emphasized that, while human rights and fundamental freedoms should be fully respected, these matters fell within the sovereignty of each State. It was neither appropriate nor workable to demand that all States measure up to the human rights criteria or models of one country or a small number of countries. He emphasized that “such basic principles as the sovereign equality of Member States and non-interference in their internal affairs, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, should be observed by all its Members without exception”. While China was ready to engage in dialogue and to cooperate on an equal footing with other countries with regard to human rights, it would oppose any interference in the internal affairs of other countries under the pretext of human rights.³⁰²

Article 24

1. In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf.
2. In discharging these duties the Security Council shall act in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. The specific powers granted to the Security Council for the discharge of these duties are laid down in Chapters VI, VII, VIII and XII.
3. The Security Council shall submit annual and, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly for its consideration.

occasions during the proceedings of the Council.³⁰⁴ The cases below reflect the practice of the Council touching upon the provisions of Article 24 as illustrated by its decisions and deliberations in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait and the responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.

Case 21

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 2981st meeting of the Council, on 2 April 1991, some speakers contended, without invoking Article 24 explicitly, that the Security Council was assuming powers not granted to it under the Charter of the United Nations.³⁰⁵ The representative of Yemen stated that "imposition of the boundaries between Iraq and Kuwait" was counter to resolution 660 (1990), which called on the parties to negotiate to resolve their differences. The Security Council had never before set boundaries; that task had always been left to negotiations, or the International Court of Justice. Furthermore, there was "no precedent whatsoever" for the Security Council to guarantee the boundaries of any country.³⁰⁶ The representative of Cuba affirmed that international boundaries should be respected and that the Security Council had the obligation to ensure that they were not violated. He contended, however, that the Council totally lacked "the authority to demand respect for certain border lines, or to demarcate them, or to determine in what part of what region of the world those boundaries [were] violable, boundaries in respect to which it proclaim[ed] the determination to shoulder special responsibility".³⁰⁷ The representative of Ecuador argued that the case of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait was not one of the exceptions envisaged in Article 36, the relevant provision of which provides “that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice”. He added that Chapter VII of the Charter authorized the use of all necessary means to implement the resolutions of the Council; it could not confer on the Council more powers than those set forth in the Charter. The speaker noted with satisfaction the statement of the representative of the United States to the effect that the present case of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait could not be considered in any way an applicable precedent and that its character as an exception was its distinguishing feature.³⁰⁸

Other speakers, on the other hand, maintained that the Council was not creating a new boundary in the case of the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.³⁰⁹ The representative of India, while emphasizing that boundaries had to be settled freely by countries in exercise of their sovereignty and could not be arbitrarily imposed by the Council, observed that the Council was not engaging itself in establishing any new boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. Rather, the draft that would become resolution 687 (1991) recognized an existing boundary that had been agreed to by the two countries in exercise of their full sovereignty, and it called upon those countries to respect the boundary’s inviolability. It was India’s understanding that the provision of the draft resolution that guaranteed the inviolability of the boundary did “not confer authority on any country to take unilateral action under any previous resolutions of the Security Council”. The sponsors of the draft resolution had explained to his delegation that, in the case of a threat to or violation of the boundary, the Council would meet to take, as appropriate, all necessary measures in accordance with the Charter.³¹⁰

The representative of the United States maintained that the task at hand, which was consistent with Chapter VII of the Charter, was to establish peace in such a way that Iraq never again threatened Kuwait’s sovereignty and integrity. For that reason, the Council in resolution 687 (1991) demanded that Iraq and

Kuwait respect their boundary as agreed upon in 1963, requested that the Secretary-General assist in arranging the demarcation of the boundary, and decided to guarantee its inviolability. The United States did not seek a new role for the Security Council as the body that determined international boundaries. Border disputes were issues to be negotiated directly between States or resolved through other pacific means of settlement.³¹¹

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stressed that resolution 687 (1991) aimed not only at restoring justice but also at issuing a serious warning to all those who might be inclined to embark on the path of aggression, occupation and annexation. He emphasized that the crux of the resolution was the establishment of a permanent ceasefire between Iraq and Kuwait and those States cooperating with Kuwait, after official notification by Iraq of its acceptance of the resolution. He stressed, in that regard, that the deployment on the boundary between Kuwait and Iraq of United Nations observers would create conditions for the withdrawal of multinational forces from the region. An important element in the process was the demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait in accordance with the agreement to that effect deposited with the United Nations. It was of prime importance to observe the provision that the task of ensuring the inviolability of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait lay with the Security Council, which, to that end, could take all necessary steps in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.³¹²

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that rapid demarcation of the boundary, the establishment of a United Nations observer unit to monitor a demilitarized zone along the frontier and a guarantee by the Security Council to step in if ever it were violated again were a carefully integrated package designed to ensure there would be no repetition of the invasion by Iraq. The intention was not to overturn the principle that it was for the parties to negotiate and reach agreement. Naturally, the Council had a duty to respond when disputes over boundaries arose and came to threaten international peace and security.³¹³

At the same meeting the Council adopted resolution 687 (1991) by 12 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 2 abstentions (Ecuador, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

...

2. Demands that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary and the allocation of islands set out in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters", signed by them in exercise of their sovereignty at Baghdad on 4 October 1963 and registered with the United Nations;

3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to lend his assistance to make arrangements with Iraq and Kuwait to demarcate the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, drawing on appropriate material including maps transmitted with the letter dated 28 March 1991 addressed to him by the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the United Nations, and to report back to the Council within one month;

4. Decides to guarantee the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary and to take, as appropriate, all necessary measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations;

At its 3108th meeting, on 26 August 1992, the Council again considered the demarcation of the boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. The representative of Ecuador reiterated the argument that Article 36 of the Charter did not grant the Security Council competence under Chapter VII to pronounce itself on the territorial boundary between Iraq and Kuwait, or to determine any settlement intended to demarcate that boundary. The means used to implement Security Council resolutions could not endow the Council with powers beyond those set out in the Charter itself, and moreover those means had to be in strict conformity with international law.³¹⁴ The representative of Venezuela regarded the process of demarcation in the context of the special circumstances following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, which had posed a threat to international peace and security. The draft resolution did not establish a precedent altering the general principle expressed in Article 33 of the Charter, that the parties directly involved in disputes should negotiate in order to overcome their differences.³¹⁵ The representative of India reiterated that boundaries were extremely sensitive issues and should be freely settled by the parties in the exercise of their sovereignty. In the present case, the Council itself was not establishing any new boundary between Iraq and Kuwait. Rather, it was simply making arrangements for the demarcation of an already agreed-upon boundary.³¹⁶ The representative of the Russian Federation observed that concluding the demarcation of the boundary in accordance with resolution 687 (1991), which guaranteed the inviolability of the boundary, was an important element in strengthening regional stability.³¹⁷

At the same meeting, the Council adopted resolution 773 (1992) by 14 votes to none, with one abstention (Ecuador). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

...

Recalling in this connection that through the demarcation process the Commission is not reallocating territory between Iraq and Kuwait but is simply carrying out the technical task necessary to demarcate for the first time the precise coordinates of the boundary set out in the "Agreed Minutes between the State of Kuwait and the Republic of Iraq regarding the restoration of friendly relations, recognition and related matters", signed by them in exercise of their sovereignty at Baghdad on 4 October 1963, and that this task is being carried out in the special circumstances following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and pursuant to resolution 687 (1991) and the Secretary-General's report on the implementation of paragraph 3 of that resolution,

4. Underlines the guarantee of the inviolability of the above-mentioned international boundary and its decision to take all appropriate measures to that end in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as provided for in paragraph 4 of resolution 687 (1991);

Case 22

The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security

At its 3046th meeting, on 31 January 1992, the Security Council met at the level of Heads of State and Government, to consider the responsibility of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.

In the course of the debate, speakers underlined the need to guarantee and strengthen the system of collective security.³¹⁸ The primary task of the Council was summed up as being to prevent, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, crises such as war, the break-up of States and terrorism.³¹⁹ It was also held that the United Nations, through the Security Council, had to act as the guardian of the security of nations, especially of small countries, and that it should serve as a catalyst for the promotion of the primacy of the rule of law in international relations.³²⁰ It was also noted that the provisions of the Charter concerning collective security could not become operational unless all countries fully respected international law and unless the principle of equality among States was made a reality.³²¹ In addition, it was stated that the collective enforcement arrangements of the United Nations should ensure uniformity, with action being taken irrespective of the identity of the aggressor or of the victim.³²²

A number of speakers addressed the Council's decision-making and the veto. It was stated that the actions of the Security Council should flow from the "collective will" of the international community and not from the "views or predilections of a few".³²³ As the Council took decisions of major importance on behalf of the entire membership of the United Nations, its decisions should be representative of the will of the general membership.³²⁴ It was also observed that history had largely superseded the circumstances on which the veto had been based, and that the risks the veto had been designed to counter no longer existed. The time had come for the Organization to restore the basic principle underlying its validity: that of the equality of rights and obligations.³²⁵ The protection and advancement of human rights was referred to by a number of speakers. On the one hand, there were those who proposed that the principle of non-interference ought not to be invoked to condone human rights abuses and that the Security Council had a role to play in the protection of human rights. Thus, it was stated that human rights and freedoms were not an internal matter of States, but rather that they constituted obligations under the Charter, international covenants and conventions. The Council was thus called upon to underscore the protection of human rights and freedoms.³²⁶ It was further suggested that the Security Council should deal with cases of serious violations of human rights at an early stage and support action taken elsewhere to put an end to unacceptable situations that could pose a direct threat to international peace and security.³²⁷ One speaker underlined that for his country "respect for human rights and the rights of national minorities [was] not merely a legal and humanitarian question: it [was] an integral part of international collective security". Therefore, it was indispensable for the Council to take resolute action to defend and protect those rights.³²⁸

On the other hand, a number of speakers, while affirming the importance of human rights, considered that such rights should not be defined unilaterally or be used to determine the relations between States.³²⁹ It was contended that the issue of human rights fell within the sovereignty of each country. Further, although human rights were valued, the human rights issue ought not to be used as pretext for interference in the internal affairs of other countries.³³⁰ It was stated that the established principles governing inter-State relations — such as that of non-interference in the internal affairs of States — would have to accommodate efforts by the United Nations and regional organizations to protect the basic human rights of individuals and social groups. In the future the Council would be called upon to consider an increasing number of conflicts and humanitarian situations of a domestic nature that could pose threats to international peace and stability. Great care would thus have to be taken to ensure that those domestic conflicts were not used as a pretext for the intervention of big Powers in the legitimate domestic affairs of small States, or that human rights issues were not used for the purpose of destabilizing other Governments. The question of when a domestic situation warranted international action — either by the Council or regional organizations — called for the establishment of principles to guide such decisions.³³¹ The need for the Council to engage in preventive action was also raised during the debate.³³² The Chancellor of Austria noted that recent crises underlined the need for an early reaction to potential conflicts. The instrument of preventive diplomacy, including by the Security Council, would have to be developed further. The Council would also have to consider the possibility of the preventive deployment of peacekeeping personnel.³³³ The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom underlined that in future the Council would have to be prepared to act before tension became conflict.³³⁴

At the close of the meeting, the President, on behalf of the members, made a statement containing several references to the responsibility of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security.³³⁵ The statement in part reads:

The Security Council met at United Nations Headquarters in New York on 31 January 1992, for the first time at the level of Heads of State and Government. The members of the Council considered, within the framework of their commitment to the Charter of the United Nations, "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security".

The members of the Council consider that their meeting is a timely recognition of the fact that there are new favourable international circumstances under which the Security Council has begun to fulfil more effectively its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

A time of change

This meeting of the Council takes place at a time of momentous change. The ending of the cold war has raised hopes for a safer, more equitable and more humane world. Rapid progress has been made, in many regions of the world, towards democracy and responsive forms of government, as well as towards achieving the purposes set out in the Charter of the United Nations. The completion of the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa would constitute a major contribution to these purposes and positive trends, including to the encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

³³⁵ Statement by the President of 31 January 1992 (S/23500).

Last year, under the authority of the United Nations, the international community succeeded in enabling Kuwait to regain its sovereignty and territorial integrity, which it had lost as a result of Iraqi aggression. The resolutions adopted by the Council remain essential to the restoration of peace and stability in the region and must be fully implemented. At the same time the members of the Council are concerned by the humanitarian situation of the innocent civilian population of Iraq.

The members of the Council support the Middle East peace process, facilitated by the Russian Federation and the United States of America, and hope that it will be brought to a successful conclusion on the basis of Council resolutions 242 (1967) of 22 October 1967 and 338 (1973) of 22 October 1973.

The members of the Council also recognize that change, however welcome, has brought new risks for stability and security. Some of the most acute problems result from changes to State structures. The members of the Council will encourage all efforts to help achieve peace, stability and cooperation during these changes.

The international community therefore faces new challenges in the search for peace. All Member States expect the United Nations to play a central role at this crucial stage. The members of the Council stress the importance of strengthening and improving the United Nations to increase its effectiveness. They are determined to assume fully their responsibilities within the United Nations in the framework of the Charter.

The absence of war and military conflicts among States does not in itself ensure international peace and security. The non-military sources of instability in the economic, social, humanitarian and ecological fields have become threats to peace and security. The United Nations membership as a whole, working through the appropriate bodies, needs to give the highest priority to the solution of these matters.

Commitment to collective security

The members of the Council pledge their commitment to international law and to the Charter of the United Nations. All disputes between States should be peacefully resolved in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

The members of the Council reaffirm their commitment to the collective security system of the Charter to deal with threats to peace and to reverse acts of aggression.

The members of the Council express their deep concern over acts of international terrorism and emphasize the need for the international community to deal effectively with all such acts.

In conclusion, the members of the Council affirm their determination to build on the initiative of their meeting in order to secure positive advances in promoting international peace and security. They agree that the Secretary-General has a crucial role to play.

Part IV Consideration of the provisions of Article 25 of the Charter

Article 25

The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter.

Note

During the period under review, the Council adopted four resolutions that explicitly invoked Article 25 of the Charter.³³⁶ By three of those resolutions the Council emphasized Iraq's obligation to comply with Council resolutions.³³⁷ By one of those three resolutions the Council also called upon all States to carry out their obligations to implement sanctions against Iraq.³³⁸ By the fourth resolution the Council recalled the provisions of Article 25 before deciding to establish the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR), which was to implement the United Nations peacekeeping plan for Yugoslavia.³³⁹

In addition, Article 25 was touched upon, without being invoked explicitly, in a large number of resolutions³⁴⁰ and statements³⁴¹ made by the President on behalf of the members of the Council, as well as in one draft resolution³⁴² that was voted upon but not adopted by the Council. Those resolutions and presidential statements were directed at Member States in particular, at States in general, or at multiple parties, not all of which were Member States.

In provisions directed at one or more Member States, the Security Council called upon, demanded or insisted that a Member State comply with Council must comply with Council resolutions;³⁵⁰ and noted that a Member State's failure to comply with Council resolutions constituted a material breach of its resolutions.³⁵¹

In provisions directed at States in general, the Council called upon "all States" or "States" to implement measures contained in its resolutions,³⁵² and reminded "all States" of their obligation to observe its resolutions.³⁵³ In provisions addressing multiple parties to a dispute, at least one of which was a Member State, the Council reaffirmed the responsibility of parties to implement a settlement plan in accordance with a Council resolution;³⁵⁴ demanded that parties comply with its resolutions;³⁵⁵ called upon parties to implement its resolutions;³⁵⁶ called upon parties to cooperate with a peacekeeping force in the implementation of its mandate;³⁵⁷ condemned the refusal of parties to comply with its resolutions;³⁵⁸ urged parties to act in a manner consistent with its resolutions;³⁵⁹ and stressed the need for full compliance with its resolutions.³⁶⁰

A number of explicit references were also made to Article 25 and its binding nature during the debates in the Council.³⁶¹ The Council did not however engage in any constitutional discussion concerning Article 25 that went beyond upholding long-established views about its significance, interpretation and application. Article 25 was explicitly invoked in a special report dated 18 September 1990 of the Security Council Committee established by resolution 661 (1990) concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait,³⁶² and in a letter dated 19 December 1990 from that Committee's Chairman to the President of the Council,³⁶³ as well as in several communications from Member States³⁶⁴ in connection with the mandatory sanctions against Iraq. Article 25 was also explicitly invoked in four notes by the Secretary-General, dated 26 September and 4, 10 and 22 October 1990,³⁶⁵ by which he transmitted to the members of the Council the text of communications received from the International Civil Aviation Organization on the situation in the Gulf area.

The deliberations and decisions of the Council concerning the situation between Iraq and Kuwait touched upon two aspects of the application of Article 25, namely Iraq's obligation to comply with the Council's decisions, and the obligation of Member States in general to implement the measures applied against Iraq under Chapter VII of the Charter (see case 23 below).

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

At the 2933rd meeting of the Council, on 6 August 1990, during which the Council adopted resolution 661 (1990), speakers referred both to Iraq's obligation to comply with resolution 660 (1990) and to the obligation of Member States to implement the sanctions to be applied against Iraq by resolution 661 (1990). The representative of the United States noted that the draft resolution responded both to Iraq's aggression against Kuwait and to "Iraq's unacceptable failure to comply with resolution 660 (1990), a mandatory resolution which is binding on all Member States".³⁶⁶ The representative of France observed that Iraq was required "to implement without delay or condition" resolution 660 (1990), which was "binding on all States".³⁶⁷ The representative of Canada stated that the decisions of the Council were binding on all Member States, including Iraq, and warned that Iraq's failure to comply with the terms of resolution 660 (1990) left the Council with "no alternative but to consider what further measures can be applied to give effect to the resolution".³⁶⁸

The representative of the United States observed that the draft resolution was binding upon all Member States. He further contended that paragraph 5 made it clear that the draft resolution spoke "to all States, Members and non-members alike".³⁶⁹ At subsequent meetings, other speakers expressed the view that the sanctions were binding upon all States, without referring explicitly to States Members of the United Nations.³⁷⁰

The excerpts from decisions reproduced below reflect the practice of the Council in interpreting and applying Article 25 in relation to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait. At its 2933rd meeting, the Council adopted resolution 661 (1990) by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

1. Determines that Iraq so far has failed to comply with paragraph 2 of resolution 660 (1990) and has usurped the authority of the legitimate Government of Kuwait;

...

5. Calls upon all States, including States non-members of the United Nations, to act strictly in accordance with the provisions of the present resolution notwithstanding any contract entered into or licence granted before the date of the present resolution;

...

At its 2938th meeting, on 25 August 1990, the Council adopted resolution 665 (1990) by 13 votes to none, with two abstentions (Cuba, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

...

Gravely alarmed that Iraq continues to refuse to comply with resolutions 660 (1990), 661 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990) and in particular at the conduct of the Government of Iraq in using Iraqi flag vessels to export oil,

1. Calls upon those Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait which are deploying maritime forces to the area to use such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping, in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions related to such shipping laid down in resolution 661 (1990);

2. Invites Member States accordingly to cooperate as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) with maximum use of political and diplomatic measures, in accordance with paragraph 1 above;

³⁷⁰ S/PV.2938, p. 33 (Canada); S/PV.2977 (Part II) (closed), p. 108 (Belgium); and S/PV.2978, p. 77 (India).

At its 2939th meeting, on 13 September 1990, the Council adopted resolution 666 (1990) by 13 votes to 2 (Cuba, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

...

Deeply concerned that Iraq has failed to comply with its obligations under Security Council resolution 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990 in respect of the safety and well-being of third-State nationals, and reaffirming that Iraq retains full responsibility in this regard under international humanitarian law including, where applicable, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949,

...

2. Expects Iraq to comply with its obligations under resolution 664 (1990) in respect of third-State nationals and reaffirms that Iraq remains fully responsible for their safety and well-being in accordance with international humanitarian law including, where applicable, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949;

At its 2940th meeting, on 16 September 1990, the Council adopted resolution 667 (1990) unanimously. The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990 and 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990,

Determined to ensure respect for its decisions and for Article 25 of the Charter,

Considering further that the grave nature of Iraq's actions, which constitute a new escalation of its violations of international law, obliges the Council not only to express its immediate reaction but also to consult urgently in order to take further concrete measures to ensure Iraq's compliance with the Council's resolutions,

...

1. Strongly condemns aggressive acts perpetrated by Iraq against diplomatic premises and personnel in Kuwait, including the abduction of foreign nationals who were present in those premises;

2. Demands the immediate release of those foreign nationals as well as all nationals mentioned in resolution 664 (1990);

3. Also demands that Iraq immediately and fully comply with its international obligations under resolutions 660

(1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990), the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law;

5. Reminds all States that they are obliged to observe strictly resolutions 661 (1990), 662 (1990), 664 (1990), 665 (1990) and 666 (1990);

At its 2943rd meeting, on 25 September 1990, the Council adopted resolution 670 (1990) by 14 votes to 1 (Cuba). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990 and 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990,

Condemning Iraq's continued occupation of Kuwait, its failure to rescind its actions and end its purported annexation and its holding of third-State nationals against their will, in flagrant violation of resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990), 664 (1990) and 667 (1990) and of international humanitarian law,

Determined to ensure by all necessary means the strict and complete application of the measures laid down in resolution 661 (1990),

Determined also to ensure respect for its decisions and the provisions of Articles 25 and 48 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Affirming that any acts of the Government of Iraq which are contrary to the above-mentioned resolutions or to Articles 25 or 48 of the Charter, such as Decree No. 377 of 16 September 1990 of the Revolutionary Command Council of Iraq, are null and void,

...

7. Calls upon all States to cooperate in taking such measures as may be necessary, consistent with international law, including the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation of 7 December 1944, to ensure the effective implementation of the provisions of resolution 661 (1990) or the present resolution;

...

9. Reminds all States of their obligations under resolution 661 (1990) with regard to the freezing of Iraqi assets, and the protection of the assets of the legitimate Government of Kuwait and its agencies, located within their territory and to report to the Security Council Committee regarding those assets;

At its 2951st meeting, on 29 October 1990, the Council adopted resolution 674 (1990) by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Cuba, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, resolution 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990 and 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990,

Condemning the actions by the Iraqi authorities and occupying forces to take third-State nationals hostage and to mistreat and oppress Kuwaiti and third-State nationals, and the other actions reported to the Council, such as the destruction of Kuwaiti demographic records, the forced departure of Kuwaitis, the relocation of population in Kuwait and the unlawful destruction and seizure of public and private property in Kuwait, including hospital supplies and equipment, in violation of the decisions of the Council, the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law,

Calling upon Iraq to comply with its relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 660 (1990), 662 (1990) and 664 (1990),

Reaffirming its determination to ensure compliance by Iraq with its resolutions by maximum use of political and diplomatic means,

1. Demands that the Iraqi authorities and occupying forces immediately cease and desist from taking third-State nationals hostage, mistreating and oppressing Kuwaiti and third-State nationals and any other actions, such as those reported to the Council and described above, that violate the decisions of the Council, the Charter of the United Nations, the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963 and international law;

3. Reaffirms its demand that Iraq immediately fulfil its obligations to third-State nationals in Kuwait and Iraq, including the personnel of diplomatic and consular missions, under the Charter, the above-mentioned Geneva Convention, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, general principles of international law and the relevant resolutions of the Council;

...

10. Requires that Iraq comply with the provisions of the present resolution and its previous resolutions, failing which the Council will need to take further measures under the Charter;

At its 2963rd meeting, on 29 November 1990, the Council adopted resolution 678 (1990) by 12 votes to 2 (Cuba, Yemen), with 1 abstention (China). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990 and 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990,

Noting that, despite all efforts by the United Nations, Iraq refuses to comply with its obligations to implement resolution 660 (1990) and the above-mentioned subsequent relevant resolutions, in flagrant contempt of the Security Council,

Determined to secure full compliance with its decisions,

...

1. Demands that Iraq comply fully with resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions, and decides, while maintaining all its decisions, to allow Iraq one final opportunity, as a pause of goodwill, to do so;

2. Authorizes Member States cooperating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully implements, as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the above-mentioned resolutions, to use all necessary measures to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area;

At its 2978th meeting, on 2 March 1991, the Council adopted resolution 686 (1991) by 11 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 3 abstentions (China, India, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990 and 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990,

Recalling the obligations of Member States under Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations,

2. Demands that Iraq implement its acceptance of all twelve resolutions noted above and in particular that Iraq:

(a) Rescind immediately its actions purporting to annex Kuwait;

(b) Accept in principle its liability under international law for any loss, damage or injury arising in regard to Kuwait and third States and their nationals and corporations, as a result of the invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq;

(c) Immediately release under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Red Cross Societies or Red Crescent Societies all Kuwaiti and third-State nationals detained by Iraq and return the remains of any deceased Kuwaiti and third-State nationals so detained;

(d) Immediately begin to return all Kuwaiti property seized by Iraq, the return to be completed in the shortest possible period;

At its 2981st meeting, on 3 April 1991, the Council adopted resolution 687 (1991) by 12 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 2 abstentions (Ecuador, Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 662 (1990) of 9 August 1990, 664 (1990) of 18 August 1990, 665 (1990) of 25 August 1990, 666 (1990) of 13 September 1990, 667 (1990) of 16 September 1990, 669 (1990) of 24 September 1990, 670 (1990) of 25 September 1990, 674 (1990) of 29 October 1990, 677 (1990) of 28 November 1990, 678 (1990) of 29 November 1990 and 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991,

...

1. Affirms all thirteen resolutions noted above, except as expressly changed below to achieve the goals of the present resolution, including a formal ceasefire;

...

24. Decides that, in accordance with resolution 661 (1990) and subsequent related resolutions and until it takes a further decision, all States shall continue to prevent the sale or supply to Iraq, or the promotion or facilitation of such sale or supply, by their nationals or from their territories or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of:

(a) Arms and related materiel of all types, specifically including the sale or transfer through other means of all forms of conventional military equipment, including for paramilitary forces, and spare parts and components and their means of production for such equipment;

(b) Items specified and defined in paragraphs 8 and 12 not otherwise covered above;

(c) Technology under licensing or other transfer arrangements used in the production, utilization or stockpiling of items specified in paragraphs (a) and (b);

(d) Personnel or materials for training or technical support services relating to the design, development, manufacture, use, maintenance or support of items specified in paragraphs (a) and (b);

25. Calls upon all States and international organizations to act strictly in accordance with paragraph 24, notwithstanding the existence of any contracts, agreements, licences or any other arrangements;

...

27. Calls upon all States to maintain such national controls and procedures and to take such other actions consistent with the guidelines to be established by the Council under paragraph 26 as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the terms of paragraph 24, and calls upon international organizations to take all appropriate steps to assist in ensuring such full compliance;

At the 2996th meeting of the Council, on 28 June 1991, the President (Côte d'Ivoire) made a statement on behalf of the Council.³⁷¹ The statement reads in part:

The members of the Council strongly deplore the incidents of 23, 25 and 28 June 1991 and in this connection condemn the conduct of the Iraqi authorities. All these incidents constitute flagrant violations of resolution 687 (1991) ... Furthermore, these incidents demonstrate Iraq's failure to abide by its solemn undertaking to comply with all the provisions of resolution 687 (1991).

At its 3004th meeting, on 15 August 1991, the Council adopted resolution 707 (1991) unanimously. The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolution 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and its other resolutions on this matter,

...

Determined to ensure full compliance with resolution 687 (1991), and in particular its section C,

...

1. Condemns Iraq's serious violation of a number of its obligations under section C of resolution 687 (1991) and of its undertakings to cooperate with the Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency, which constitutes a material breach of the relevant provisions of that resolution which established a ceasefire and provided the conditions essential to the restoration of peace and security in the region;

³⁷¹ S/22746.

5. Requires the Government of Iraq forthwith to comply fully and without delay with all its international obligations, including those set out in the present resolution, in resolution 687 (1991), in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and its safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency;

At its 3008th meeting, on 19 September 1991, the Council adopted resolution 712 (1991) by 13 votes to 1 (Cuba), with 1 abstention (Yemen). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions, and in particular resolutions 661 (1990) of 6 August 1990, 686 (1991) of 2 March 1991, 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, 688 (1991) of 5 April 1991, 692 (1991) of 20 May 1991, 699 (1991) of 17 June 1991, and 705 (1991) and 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991,

...

11. Calls upon States to cooperate fully in the implementation of resolution 706 (1991) and the present resolution, in particular with respect to any measures regarding the import of petroleum and petroleum products and the export of foodstuffs, medicines and materials and supplies for essential civilian needs as referred to in paragraph 20 of resolution 687 (1991), and also with respect to the privileges and immunities of the United Nations and its personnel implementing the present resolution, and to ensure that there are no diversions from the purposes laid down in these resolutions;

At its 3012th meeting, on 11 October 1991, the Council adopted resolution 715 (1991) unanimously. The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its resolutions 687 (1991) of 3 April 1991 and 707 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and its other resolutions on this matter,

5. Demands that Iraq meet unconditionally all its obligations under the plans approved by the present resolution and cooperate fully with the Special Commission and the Director General of the Agency in carrying out the plans;

...

At the 3058th meeting of the Council, on 28 February 1992, the President (United States) made a statement on behalf of the Council.³⁷² The statement reads in part:

³⁷² S/23663.

The members of the Council demand that Iraq immediately implement all its obligations under Council resolution 687 (1991) and subsequent resolutions on Iraq.

At its 3117th meeting, on 2 October 1992, the Council adopted resolution 778 (1992) by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention (China). The resolution reads in part:

The Security Council,

Recalling its previous relevant resolutions and in particular resolutions 706 (1991) of 15 August 1991 and 712 (1991) of 19 September 1991,

...

Condemning Iraq's continued failure to comply with its obligations under relevant resolutions,

...

Deploring Iraq's refusal to cooperate in the implementation of resolutions 706 (1991) and 712 (1991), which puts its civilian population at risk and which results in the failure by Iraq to meet its obligations under relevant Council resolutions,

...

13. Calls upon all States to cooperate fully in the implementation of the present resolution;

At the resumed 3139th meeting of the Council, on 24 November 1992, the President (Ecuador) made a statement on behalf of the Council.³⁷³ The statement reads in part:

In the view of the Council, while there have been some positive steps, the Government of Iraq has not yet complied fully and unconditionally with its obligations ... and must immediately take the appropriate actions in this regard.

Part V

Consideration of the provisions of Article 26 of the Charter

Article 26

In order to promote the establishment and maintenance of international peace and security with the least diversion for armaments of the world's human and economic resources, the Security Council shall be responsible for formulating, with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee referred to in Article 47, plans to be submitted to the Members of the United Nations for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments.

Note

During the period under review, the Security Council did not adopt any decisions touching directly on Article 26. Council members did, however, address the issues of disarmament, arms control and weapons of mass destruction in a presidential statement adopted at the 3046th (summit) meeting held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 under the agenda item entitled "The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security".³⁷⁴ The relevant part of the statement by the President on behalf of the Council included a section entitled "Disarmament, arms control and weapons of mass destruction", which reads:

The members of the Council, while fully conscious of the responsibilities of other organs of the United Nations in the fields of disarmament, arms control and non-proliferation, reaffirm the crucial contribution which progress in these areas can make to the maintenance of international peace and security. They express their commitment to take concrete steps to enhance the effectiveness of the United Nations in these areas.

The members of the Council underline the need for all Member States to fulfil their obligations in relation to arms control and disarmament; to prevent the proliferation in all its aspects of all weapons of mass destruction; to avoid excessive and destabilizing accumulations and transfers of arms; and to resolve peacefully in accordance with the Charter any problems concerning these matters threatening or disrupting the maintenance of regional and global stability. They emphasize the importance of the early ratification and implementation by the States concerned of all international and regional arms control arrangements, especially the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks and the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe.

The proliferation of all weapons of mass destruction constitutes a threat to international peace and security. The members of the Council commit themselves to working to prevent the spread of technology related to the research for or production of such weapons and to take appropriate action to that end.

On nuclear arms proliferation, the members of the Council note the importance of the decision of many countries to adhere to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968 and emphasize the integral role in the implementation of that Treaty of fully effective International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards, as well as the importance of effective export controls. They will take appropriate measures in the case of any violations notified to them by the Agency.

On chemical weapons, the members of the Council support the efforts of the Third Review Conference of the Parties to the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction, held at Geneva from 9 to 27 September 1991, with a view to reaching agreement on the conclusion, by the end of 1992, of a universal convention, including a verification regime, to prohibit chemical weapons.

On conventional armaments, they note the General Assembly's vote in favour of a United Nations register of arms transfers as a first step, and in this connection recognize the importance of all States providing all the information called for in the General Assembly's resolution.

In their statements at the summit meeting, several Council members touched on aspects of the Security Council's role in the areas of arms control, non-proliferation and disarmament.³⁷⁵ Two representatives made explicit reference to Article 26. One of them saw a more active involvement of the Council in these areas as one of its most important future tasks, observing that, in Article 26, the Charter had given the Council an excellent programme for future action.³⁷⁶ Another suggested that multilateral disarmament could further be boosted by the use of the provisions of Article 26 and of paragraph 1 of Article 47, which empowered the Council, with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee, to put in place a system for the regulation of armaments. He thought that those provisions, which had been dormant since the founding of the Organization, would have rendered unnecessary the ad hoc creation by resolution 687 (1991) of the Special Commission dealing with the disarmament measures imposed on Iraq. In his view, an opportunity still existed to utilize those provisions in implementing the disarmament measures for the wider Middle East region provided for in that resolution.³⁷⁷

Consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII of the Charter

Article 52

1. Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations.

2. The Members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

3. The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council.

4. This Article in no way impairs the application of Articles 34 and 35.

Article 53

1. The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception of measures against any enemy state, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, provided for pursuant to Article 107 or in regional arrangements directed against renewal of aggressive policy on the part of any such state, until such time as the Organization may, on request of the Governments concerned, be charged with the responsibility for preventing further aggression by such a state.

2. The term enemy state as used in paragraph 1 of this Article applies to any state which during the Second World War has been an enemy of any signatory of the present Charter.

Article 54

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Note

During the period under review, there was a significant increase in the cooperation between the Security Council and regional arrangements or agencies. The resolutions and presidential statements adopted by the Council reveal an increased awareness of regional organizations and of their growing role or potential role in international peace and security. While in 1989 there were no references in Security Council resolutions to regional organizations, and in 1990 only one such reference,³⁷⁸ since 1991 that picture has been transformed. Many resolutions and presidential statements adopted in 1991 and 1992 referred to regional organizations in the context of conflict situations in Africa: Liberia, Somalia, South Africa, Western Sahara; in Asia: Cambodia and Tajikistan; in Central America; in Europe: the former Yugoslavia and Nagorny-Karabakh; and in the Middle East: Iraq and Kuwait, and the situation in the Middle East. Such resolutions sometimes expressly recalled Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations, or expressed appreciation of regional efforts aimed at the settlement of a conflict, or supported cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, or endorsed regional efforts. Most of those references concerned attempts at the peaceful settlement of a dispute. The period under consideration also saw the first ³⁷⁸ Resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, in relation to the situation between Iraq and Kuwait.

authorization by the Security Council of the use of force by a regional organization.

These developments in the Council's practice are dealt with below in four sections. Section A sets out some of the institutional context within which the developments occurred, notably the recommendations made by the Secretary-General in his report entitled "An Agenda for Peace". Section B provides an overview of the Council's encouragement of efforts undertaken by regional organizations in the peaceful settlement of disputes. Section C notes two instances in which Member States challenged the Council's competence to consider a dispute on the basis of Article 52. Section D sets out the three instances in which the Council authorized the use of force by a regional organization.

A. General consideration of the provisions of Chapter VIII

At the meeting of the Security Council held at the level of Heads of State and Government on 31 January 1992 to consider the responsibility of the Council in the maintenance of international peace and security, several Council members spoke of the need to make greater use of Chapter VIII of the Charter and stressed the importance of strengthening cooperation and coordination between the Council and regional organizations.³⁷⁹ In a presidential statement made at the conclusion of the summit meeting, the members of the Council invited the Secretary-General to prepare his analysis and recommendations on ways of strengthening and making more efficient, within the framework and provisions of the Charter, the capacity of the United Nations for preventive diplomacy, for peacemaking and for peacekeeping. The statement also suggested that the Secretary-General's analysis and recommendations could cover, inter alia, "the contribution to be made by regional organizations in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter in helping the work of the Council".

³⁷⁹ S/PV.3046, pp. 19-20 (France); p. 56 (Venezuela); p. 69 (Belgium); and p. 138 (United Kingdom).

In the Secretary-General's report entitled "An Agenda for Peace",³⁸⁰ in which he responded to the Council's request, he contended that regional organizations, in many cases, possessed a potential that should be utilized for preventive diplomacy, peacekeeping, peacemaking and post-conflict peacebuilding. He noted, in particular that, while the Security Council had and would continue to have primary responsibility for maintaining international peace and security, "regional action as a matter of decentralization, delegation and cooperation with United Nations efforts could not only lighten the burden of the Council but also contribute to a deeper sense of participation, consensus and democratization in international affairs". The Secretary-General suggested that this might be achieved in several ways:

Consultations between the United Nations and regional arrangements or agencies could do much to build international consensus on the nature of a problem and the measures required to address it. Regional organizations participating in complementary efforts with the United Nations in joint undertakings would encourage States outside the region to act supportively. And should the Security Council choose to authorize a regional arrangement or organization to take the lead in addressing a crisis within its region, it could serve to lend the weight of the United Nations to the validity of the regional effort.³⁸¹

Following a preliminary examination of the Secretary-General's report, the Council adopted a presidential statement on 29 October 1992 in which it expressed its intention to study further the paragraphs of the report concerning the role of regional organizations.³⁸² In a presidential statement of 30 November 1992, adopted in connection with their continued examination of the report, the members of the Council noted the positive role of regional organizations and arrangements in fact-finding within their areas of competence and welcomed its intensification and close coordination with fact-finding efforts by the United Nations.³⁸³

B. Encouragement by the Security Council of efforts undertaken by regional organizations in the pacific settlement of disputes

During the period under review, the Security Council encouraged a wide variety of peace efforts undertaken by regional arrangements or agencies, and/or requested the Secretary-General to undertake such efforts in cooperation with regional arrangements. The Council's activity in this regard is highlighted below, by region.

Africa

With regard to Liberia, the Security Council commended the role played by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and its various organs to resolve the conflict, and took action in support of that subregional organization. At the Council's first meeting on the situation in Liberia, on 22 January 1991, the representative of Nigeria, speaking in his capacity as Chairman of the group of Ambassadors of countries members of ECOWAS at the United Nations, stated that, in response to the tragic civil war in Liberia, the leaders of ECOWAS had authorized and supported the operations of a ceasefire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG). The mandate of ECOMOG, he explained, was not to take sides, but to reconcile the sides, and to restore peace, normalcy and stability to the country. He said that ECOWAS should be commended for acting in ways that promoted the principles of the Charter by stepping in to prevent the situation in Liberia from degenerating into a situation likely to constitute a real threat to international peace and security.³⁸⁴ In a presidential statement adopted at the same meeting,³⁸⁵ the members of the Council commended the efforts made by the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS to promote peace and normalcy in Liberia, and called upon the parties to the conflict to continue to respect the ceasefire agreement which they had signed and to cooperate fully with ECOWAS to restore peace and normalcy in the country. In a presidential statement of 7 May 1992,³⁸⁶ the members of the Council commended ECOWAS and its various organs, in particular the Committee of Five on Liberia,³⁸⁷ for their untiring efforts to bring the Liberian conflict to a speedy conclusion, and renewed their call to the parties to the conflict to respect and implement the various accords of the peace process of the Committee of Five.

At the Council's second meeting on the situation in Liberia, on 19 November 1992, the representative of Benin, speaking on behalf of the Chairman of ECOWAS, recalled the initiatives taken by ECOWAS aimed at a peaceful settlement of the Liberian conflict. He also explained its decision on sanctions and requested the Council's support to make that decision binding on the international community.³⁸⁸ Several other speakers, including the Foreign Minister of the Interim Government of Liberia, a ministerial delegation of ECOWAS, and the representative of Senegal speaking on behalf of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and its acting Chairman, similarly appealed to the Council to support or endorse the actions taken by ECOWAS.³⁸⁹ Some speakers referred specifically to the role being played by ECOMOG in accordance with Chapter VIII of the Charter.

At the same meeting, the Council adopted its first resolution on Liberia — resolution 788 (1992) of 19 November 1992 — in which, after recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council commended ECOWAS for its efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia, welcomed the endorsement and support by OAU of those efforts, and called upon ECOWAS to continue its efforts to assist in the peaceful implementation of the Yamoussoukro IV Agreement. The Council also called upon all parties to the conflict to respect and implement the ceasefire and the various accords of the peace process, and requested all States to respect the measures established by ECOWAS to bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict in Liberia. Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Council imposed an arms embargo on Liberia, on the basis, inter alia, of the request made by ECOWAS and taking into account a letter from the Government of Liberia endorsing that request.

In connection with Somalia, three different regional organizations — the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States (LAS) and the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) — joined efforts with the United Nations. By resolution 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Secretary-General of OAU and the Secretary-General of LAS, to contact all parties involved in the conflict, to seek their commitment to the cessation of hostilities in order to permit the humanitarian assistance to be distributed, to promote a ceasefire, and to assist in the process of a political settlement of the conflict in Somalia. After a joint delegation from the United Nations, OAU, LAS and OIC engaged the Somali parties in intensive negotiations in Mogadishu from 29 February to 3 March 1992, a ceasefire agreement was secured on 3 March.³⁹⁰ At the Council's meeting on 17 March 1992, several speakers welcomed the cooperation between the United Nations and regional organizations, pointing to the joint mission as a constructive example.³⁹¹ By resolution 746 (1992), adopted at the same meeting, the Council expressed its appreciation to the regional organizations, including OAU, LAS and OIC, for their cooperation with the United Nations in the effort to resolve the Somali problem, and requested the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with those three organizations, to continue his consultations with all Somali parties, movements and factions towards the convening of a conference on national reconciliation and unity in Somalia. The Council reiterated these views in resolutions 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992 and 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992. By resolution 775 (1992) of 28 August 1992, the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue, in close cooperation with the three organizations, his efforts to seek a comprehensive political solution to the crisis in Somalia.

With regard to South Africa, by resolution 772 (1992) of 17 August 1992, the Council invited other relevant regional and intergovernmental organizations, such as OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Community, to consider deploying their own observers in South Africa in coordination with the United Nations and the structures set up under the National Peace Accord. The members of the Council reiterated that invitation in a presidential statement of 10 September 1992.³⁹² Those three organizations cooperated with the United Nations in monitoring the transitional process and the elections in South Africa.³⁹³

In the case of Western Sahara, by resolution 658 (1990) of 27 June 1990, the Council expressed its full support for a mission of good offices pursued jointly by the Secretary-General and the Chairman of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of OAU, with a view to settling the question of Western Sahara. The Council called upon the two parties to cooperate fully with the joint mission. By resolutions 690 (1991) of 29 April 1991 and 725 (1991) of 31 December 1991, the Council expressed its full support for the organization and the supervision, by the United Nations in cooperation with OAU, of a referendum for self-determination of the people of Western Sahara.

Asia

In connection with the situation in Cambodia, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and individual States from several regions were brought together with the parties to the Cambodian conflict at an international conference, to work with the United Nations. In resolution 668 (1990) of 20 September 1990, the Council took note with appreciation of the efforts of the countries of ASEAN and other countries involved in promoting the search for a comprehensive political settlement.

With regard to the situation in Tajikistan, in a presidential statement of 30 October 1992,³⁹⁴ the Council welcomed the efforts made by the member countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, on the initiative of Kyrgyzstan, and those undertaken by other States to help Tajikistan to resolve the crisis.

It invited the Government of Tajikistan and all other parties to the conflict to cooperate actively with all those efforts.

Central America

In Central America, the end of armed conflict involved a highly complex effort which was initiated by leaders of the region and conducted by individual States, groups of States and the Organization of American States (OAS). By resolution 637 (1989) of 27 July 1989, the Council recognized the important contribution of the Contadora Group and its Support Group in favour of peace in Central America. In a presidential statement of 8 December 1989,³⁹⁵ the members of the Council expressed their firm support for the efforts being made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Secretary-General of OAS in the peace process.

Europe

Efforts undertaken by the European Community and its member States, with the support of States participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), were endorsed by the Council as being of central importance in helping to resolve the various conflicts and disputes in the former Yugoslavia. Support for those regional efforts evolved into joint diplomatic and peacekeeping efforts with the United Nations.

By resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991, the Council, recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, expressed its full support for the collective efforts for peace and dialogue undertaken under the auspices of the States members of the European Community, with the support of the States participating in CSCE, and imposed an arms embargo on Yugoslavia in support of measures taken by the European Community and its member States.³⁹⁶ In a presidential statement of

³⁹⁶ By letters dated 5 and 22 July, 6 and 21 August and 20 September 1991 addressed to the Secretary-General, the representative of the Netherlands transmitted the texts of statements and declarations on Yugoslavia adopted by the European Community, expressing the intention of seeking, through the Security Council, the support of the international community for the European efforts (S/22775, S/22834, S/22898, S/22975 and S/23059).

7 January 1992,³⁹⁷ the members of the Council underlined the continuing importance of the role played by the European Community Monitoring Mission. In resolutions 740 (1992) of 7 February 1992 and 743 (1992) of 21 February 1992, the Council, recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, called upon the Yugoslav parties to cooperate fully with the Conference on Yugoslavia in its aim of reaching a political settlement consistent with the principles of CSCE.

By resolution 749 (1992) of 7 April 1992, the Council appealed to all parties and others concerned in Bosnia and Herzegovina to cooperate with the efforts of the European Community to bring about a ceasefire and a negotiated political solution. In a presidential statement of 24 April 1992, the Council welcomed the efforts of the European Community and the Secretary-General aimed at prevailing upon the parties to respect the ceasefire signed under the auspices of the European Community; approved the decision of the Secretary-General to accelerate the deployment in Bosnia and Herzegovina of a number of military observers from UNPROFOR; and expressed the view that their presence, like that of the monitors of the European Community, should help the parties to implement their commitment to respect the ceasefire. The Council also expressed its support for the efforts undertaken by the European Community in the framework of the discussions on constitutional arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina under the auspices of the Conference on Yugoslavia, and urged the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina to participate actively and constructively in those talks. In subsequent resolutions, the Council, recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, reiterated its call that all parties continue their efforts in the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia and that the three communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina resume their discussions on the constitutional arrangements.³⁹⁸

By resolution 764 (1992) of 13 July 1992, the Council requested the Secretary-General to keep close contact with the developments within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia and to assist in finding a negotiated political solution for the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In a presidential statement of 17 July 1992, the Council indicated that it had decided, in principle, to respond positively to the request for the United Nations to make arrangements for the supervision by UNPROFOR of all heavy weapons, in accordance with the London Agreement entered into by the parties that day.³⁹⁹ On 21 July 1992, the Secretary-General submitted to the Council a report on the implementation and resource implications of that decision.⁴⁰⁰ He concluded that the conditions did not exist for him to recommend that the Security Council accept the request of the three parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina that the United Nations supervise the heavy weapons which they had agreed to place under international supervision. He voiced, inter alia, two concerns touching on the relationship between the United Nations and regional organizations in the maintenance of international peace and security. First, he noted that Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations underlined the primary responsibility of the Council in such matters, providing, for instance, that in certain circumstances the Council could “utilize” regional organizations or agencies. There was no provision, on the other hand, for the reverse to occur. He observed that, in other instances, when the United Nations and a regional organization had both been involved in an international peace and security situation, care had been taken to ensure that the primacy of the United Nations had not been compromised. Secondly, the United Nations had not participated in the negotiation of the London Agreement. He stressed that it was most unusual for the United Nations to be asked to help to implement a political-military agreement in whose negotiation it had played no part. He added that his concern on those two points was heightened by the lack of clarity concerning the respective roles of the United Nations and the European Community in the implementation of the London Agreement.⁴⁰¹

In a presidential statement of 24 July 1992,⁴⁰² the Council concurred with the Secretary-General’s view that the conditions did not yet exist for the United Nations to supervise the heavy weapons in Bosnia and Herzegovina as envisaged in the London Agreement. Recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council invited the European regional arrangements and agencies concerned, particularly the European Community, to enhance their cooperation with the Secretary-General in their efforts to help to resolve the conflicts that continued to rage in the former Yugoslavia. The Council stated that it would welcome, in particular, the participation of the Secretary-General in any negotiations under European Community auspices. In a presidential statement of 2 September 1992,⁴⁰³ the Council took note of a letter from the Secretary-General, dated 28 August 1992, conveying the documents of the London stage of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, held on 26 and 27 August 1992, which the Secretary-General had co-chaired with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, President of the Council of Ministers of the European Community. The Council expressed its full support for the Statement of Principles adopted and the other agreements reached at the London Conference. The Council also noted with satisfaction that the London Conference had established the framework within which an overall political settlement of the crisis in the former Yugoslavia in all its aspects might be achieved. In addition, the Council welcomed the appointment of the two Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee who, under the overall direction of the Permanent Co-Chairmen of the International Conference on the former Yugoslavia, would direct the working groups and prepare the basis for a general settlement and associated measures. It noted with satisfaction that they would commence their work immediately and pursue it in continuous session at the United Nations Office at Geneva. Noting the urgency of the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council called on the parties to cooperate fully with the Co-Chairmen of the Steering Committee in achieving a comprehensive settlement. It reiterated this call in several subsequent resolutions.

In resolution 786 (1992) of 10 November 1992, by which the Council reaffirmed its ban on military flights in the airspace of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council welcomed the advance deployment of military observers of UNPROFOR and the European Community Monitoring Mission at airfields in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). By resolution 798 (1992) of 18 December 1992, the Council expressed its support for the initiative taken by the European Council on the rapid dispatch of a delegation to investigate the facts received concerning the abusive treatment and detention of women, in particular Muslim women, in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It requested the States members of the European Community to inform the Secretary-General of the work of the delegation, and invited the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council within 15 days of the adoption of the resolution on measures taken to support the delegation.

In the meantime, with regard to Croatia, the Council, by resolution 779 (1992) of 6 October 1992, had authorized UNPROFOR, in cooperation with the European Community Monitoring Mission, to assume responsibility for monitoring the arrangements agreed for the withdrawal of the Yugoslav Army from Croatia.

In connection with the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Council, by resolution 795 (1992) of 11 December 1992, welcomed the presence of a mission of CSCE in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Recalling Chapter VIII of the Charter, the Council authorized the Secretary-General to establish a presence of UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, as he had recommended, and urged the Force to coordinate closely with the CSCE mission there.

Elsewhere in Europe, in connection with the situation relating to Nagorny-Karabakh, in a presidential statement of 12 May 1992,⁴⁰⁴ the members of the Council commended and supported the efforts undertaken within the framework of CSCE aimed at assisting the parties in arriving at a peaceful settlement and at providing humanitarian assistance. In presidential statements of 26 August and 27 October 1992,⁴⁰⁵ the members of the Council strongly appealed to all parties and others concerned to support the efforts of the Minsk Conference on the question of Nagorny-Karabakh within the framework of CSCE, to cooperate closely with CSCE, and to participate positively in the Conference in order to reach an overall settlement of their disputes.

Middle East

In its first resolution adopted in connection with the situation between Iraq and Kuwait, resolution 660 (1990) of 2 August 1990, the Council called upon Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediately intensive negotiations for the resolution of their differences and expressed support for all efforts in that regard, especially those of the League of Arab States.

With regard to the situation in the Middle East, the members of the Council, in a number of presidential statements adopted in 1989, expressed support for efforts undertaken by LAS to find a solution to the crisis in Lebanon.⁴⁰⁶

C. Challenges to the appropriateness of Security Council action in the light of Article 52

The peaceful means by which the parties to a dispute, in accordance with Article 33 (1) of the Charter, shall first of all seek to settle their dispute include “resort to regional agencies or arrangements”. This is further emphasized in Article 52, which provides that Member States “shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council”; and that the Security Council “shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies”. During the period under review, Member States challenged the competence of the Security Council to consider a dispute on the basis of those provisions in the following two instances.

Case 24

Complaint by Nicaragua of violation of diplomatic premises in Panama

During the Council’s deliberations on a letter dated 3 January 1990 from the representative of Nicaragua to the President of the Security Council,⁴⁰⁷ alleging violation by the United States of Nicaragua’s diplomatic premises in Panama, two Council members objected to consideration of the incident by the Council on the ground, inter alia, that the matter had been fully dealt with by the appropriate regional agency, the Organization of American States.

The representative of the United States recalled that his Government had formally expressed its regret over the incident to the Government of Nicaragua through diplomatic channels and that, subsequently, OAS had reviewed the issue and pronounced itself on the question.⁴⁰⁸ While regrettable, the actions taken by the United States in regard to the premises of the Nicaraguan Embassy in Panama had not posed and did not pose any threat to international peace and security. He concluded that there was therefore no reason to insist that the Security Council debate the issue and, consequently, no reason for the Council to adopt a resolution in response to the Nicaraguan complaint.⁴⁰⁹ The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution before the Council because of its view that it related to an incident not appropriate for action by the Council. Referring expressly to Article 52 (2) of the Charter, he recalled that, by its terms, Members were urged to make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of disputes through regional arrangements or by regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council. That, in his view, was precisely what had happened over the incident under consideration: the question it raised had been well and truly dealt with in a resolution adopted by the appropriate regional agency — OAS — on 8 January. The matter was therefore closed and he saw no reason to re-open it in the Security Council.⁴¹⁰

A draft resolution, by which the Council would have expressed concern over the incident, was put to the vote but was not adopted.⁴¹¹ Speaking after the vote, the representative of Canada also referred to the OAS resolution. He expressed the view that, by adopting the draft resolution, the Security Council would have “appropriately added its voice to the voices of other international bodies” that had addressed the issue.⁴¹²

The situation between Iraq and Kuwait

Following the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq on 2 August 1990, various efforts aimed at securing a peaceful settlement of the conflict were undertaken by regional organizations, notably the League of Arab States. By resolution 660 (1990), adopted on the same day, the Security Council expressed its support for such efforts.⁴¹³ At subsequent meetings of the Council to consider how to bring the invasion and occupation of Kuwait to an end, the representative of Iraq contended that, in the light of those regional efforts, the Council’s involvement was premature. That argument was firmly rejected by the representative of Kuwait and other Member States.

At the Council’s meeting on 25 August 1990, at which it adopted resolution 665 (1990) providing for enforcement of the trade embargo against Iraq, the representative of Iraq stressed the importance of continuing diplomatic efforts, especially within an Arab context, and expressed concern that regional initiatives were not getting a fair hearing in the Council.⁴¹⁴ The representative of Kuwait, on the other hand, recalled that his Government had indeed sought to settle the problem within an Arab framework, both before and after the invasion and occupation of his country. Iraq had, however, rejected the demands that it withdraw its forces, unconditionally, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the League of Arab States on 2 August 1990 and the resolutions subsequently adopted by the Arab Summit and the Foreign Ministers of Muslim countries.⁴¹⁵ The representative of Oman, on behalf of the States members of the Gulf Cooperation Council, regretted that Iraq had failed to heed the LAS and OIC resolutions to work towards a peaceful solution of the situation by withdrawing from Kuwait and restoring the legitimate authority of Kuwait. That was why his Government had joined with other States in asking the Security Council to convene the current meeting and to look into necessary measures for the implementation of its relevant resolutions.⁴¹⁶

At the Council’s meeting on 29 October 1990, at which it adopted resolution 674 (1990), the representative of Iraq drew attention to that part of Article 52 of the Charter which states: “The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements ...”. He expressed regret that the Council had completely disregarded the Arab initiatives calling for a peaceful Arab solution of the Gulf crisis. He attributed this “disregard by the Security Council and its permanent members of Arab initiatives” to a deliberate policy that evidenced a determination not to permit any regional organization or Power to act independently of or apart from United States interests.⁴¹⁷ In response, the representative of Kuwait reiterated that it was Iraq that had rejected all Arab — and international — initiatives. He recalled that the Arab initiatives had included a resolution adopted at an emergency summit meeting of the League of Arab States,⁴¹⁸ which had embodied the Arab view on how the dispute should be resolved, namely, through the call of the Arab leaders for the unconditional and complete withdrawal of Iraq and the return to Kuwait of its legitimacy and full compensation for the losses it had sustained.⁴¹⁹

D. Authorization by the Security Council of the use of force by regional organizations

During the period under review, the Security Council for the first time authorized enforcement action by a regional organization. It authorized the use of force to implement measures under Article 41 in two instances — in the former Yugoslavia and in Somalia (see cases 26 and 27). The Council also authorized the use of force to facilitate the delivery by United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance, again in the case of the former Yugoslavia (case 28).

Case 26

Implementation of an arms and trade embargo: the former Yugoslavia

In response to the situation in Croatia and later in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Security Council imposed an arms embargo on the whole of the former Yugoslavia by resolution 713 (1991) of 25 September 1991. In May 1992, the Council imposed a wide-ranging economic embargo against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) by resolution 757 (1992). No express provision was made in either of those resolutions for the enforcement of their provisions. In November 1992, the Council took steps to reinforce those measures. By resolution 787 (1992), paragraph 12, the Council:

Acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, calls upon States, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures commensurate with the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Council to halt all inward and outward maritime shipping in order to inspect and verify their cargoes and destinations and to ensure strict implementation of the provisions of resolutions 713 (1991) and 757 (1992).⁴²⁰

The Council also, in paragraph 14 of the resolution, requested “the States concerned, acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to coordinate with the Secretary-General, inter alia, on the submission of reports to the Council regarding actions taken in pursuance of paragraphs 12 and 13 to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the present resolution”. In the debate in the Council leading to the adoption of resolution 787 (1992), one Council member indicated that the Council’s authority and control over the operation was of decisive importance for its support of the resolution.⁴²¹

Implementation of an arms embargo: Somalia

In response to the deterioration of the situation in Somalia and the heavy loss of life and widespread material damage resulting from the conflict in the country, the Council imposed an arms embargo on Somalia in January 1992 by resolution 733 (1992). At the end of the year, the Council reinforced those measures. By paragraph 16 of resolution 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, the Council:

⁴²⁰ Under that authorization, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Western European Union intercepted ships in the Adriatic and on the Danube (see the report of the Joint Inspection Unit entitled “Sharing responsibilities in peacekeeping: the United Nations and regional organizations”, 1995 (A/50/571-JIU/REP/95/4), para. 40.

Acting under Chapters VII and VIII of the Charter, calls upon States, nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements, to use such measures as may be necessary to ensure strict implementation of paragraph 5 of resolution 733 (1992).

The Council also imposed a reporting requirement. In paragraph 18 of the resolution, it requested the Secretary-General and, as appropriate, the States concerned to report to the Council on a regular basis, the first such report to be made no later than 15 days after the adoption of the resolution, on the implementation of the resolution.

Facilitation of delivery of humanitarian aid: the former Yugoslavia (Bosnia and Herzegovina)

In August 1992, the Council recognized, in resolution 770 (1992), that the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina constituted a threat to international peace and security and that the provision of humanitarian assistance there was an important element in the Council’s effort to restore international peace and security in the area. In response to the situation prevailing in Sarajevo, which had severely complicated the efforts of UNPROFOR to fulfil its mandate to ensure the security and functioning of Sarajevo airport and the delivery of humanitarian assistance in Sarajevo and other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, decided in paragraph 2 as follows:

Calls upon States to take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary to facilitate in coordination with the United Nations the delivery by relevant United Nations humanitarian organizations and others of humanitarian assistance to Sarajevo and wherever needed in other parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Council further, in paragraph 4, called upon States to report to the Secretary-General on measures they were taking in coordination with the United Nations to implement the resolution.
