"Seeking to counter the caricature monsters presented in 'true crime' popular non-fiction, this important new work does what the best social science should always do: explores complicated human lives in their full, complex humanity. This contextualised, life-course analysis suggests that 'risk' resides more in the society we have created than inside any individual bogeyman."
Shadd Maruna, Professor of Criminology, Queen's University Belfast and President, American Society of Criminology

"Pathways to Ruin is a timely and authentic addition to the current scholarship on criminal offending across the life course. Gibbs Van Brunschot and Humphrey provide a masterful accounting of the significant early life trauma and triggers that shape the offending trajectories for high-risk offenders. The authors provide a compelling argument for reframing and re-directing responses to serious offenders with provision of more social support, compassion, and humanity earlier in an offending pathway. This book is essential reading for serious scholars and students alike."
