

Contents

Acknowledgments	page vii
Introduction	I
1 Between Power and Vulnerability	21
1.1 Feeling for Others' Pain in the Greek Language	23
1.2 Josephus: Pity and Sympathy as Privilege	38
1.3 The Testament of Zebulun : Compassion as Vulnerability	49
1.4 Philo's Pity: Between Emotion and Virtue	57
1.5 When Vulnerability and Empowerment Intertwine	60
2 Found in Translation	64
2.1 Compassion in Biblical Hebrew?	66
2.2 The Greek Scriptures: A Linguistic Space for Emotions	78
2.3 Pity: Twists and Turns	89
2.4 Conclusion: An "Aura of Antiquity"	106
3 Within the Fabric of Society	109
3.1 Sirach: Pity as Negotiation of Status	111
3.2 Two Foundation Myths of Pity	119
3.3 Receiving Pity: An Experience of Humiliation and Emasculation	129
3.4 Feeling Pity: A Feminine and Feminizing Attitude	136
3.5 Reclaiming Masculinity by Withholding Sympathy	142
3.6 Conclusion: What Pity Does and Costs	149
4 Bonds in Flux	152
4.1 Tobit: The Invention of a Diaspora Community	157
4.2 Pity as Inclusion in a Common Humanity	160
4.3 Pity as a Dual Marker of Identity	165
4.4 A Gentle Emotion That Inspires Action	173
4.5 Conclusion: Why Is the Love Command Reshaped into Compassion?	182

5	In Dialogue with the Empire	185
5.1	Pity in Late Hellenistic and Early Imperial Narrative Literature	187
5.2	Imagining the Care for All Others in Philosophical Literature	193
5.3	Intersections: The Other's Suffering in an Ethic Focused on the Self	206
5.4	Echoes in Imperial Propaganda	214
5.5	A Minority Culture's Engagement with a Dominant Ideology	218
	Conclusion: A Discourse of the Other	226
	Bibliography	236
	Indexes
	Greek and Roman Sources	265
	Jewish and Christian Sources	267
	Subject Index	269