A History of the Guthrie Theater

TYRONE GUTHRIE

The Tyrone Guthrie Theatre opened on May 7, 1963, with a production of Hamlet directed by Sir Tyrone Guthrie, the theater's founder. The idea for the theater began in 1959 during a series of conversations among Guthrie and his colleagues — Oliver Rea and Peter Zeisler — who were disenchanted with Broadway. They envisioned a resident theater that would draw exceptional artists to perform the classics for audiences outside of New York City.

The Guthrie became a prototype for an important new kind of theater in contrast to the commercial environment of Broadway. There, the high costs associated with mounting a production increasingly mandated that shows must be immediately successful at high ticket prices. The Broadway atmosphere was conducive neither to producing the great works of literature nor to cultivating the artists' talents or nourishing the audience.

The idea of a major resident theater was introduced to the American public in a small paragraph on the drama page of The New York Times on September 30, 1959, which invited cities to indicate interest in Guthrie's idea. Seven cities responded: Waltham, Massachusetts; Cleveland; Chicago; Detroit; Milwaukee; San Francisco; and Minneapolis/St. Paul (which was not only interested but eager). Guthrie, Rea and Zeisler visited the seven cities but were drawn to Minneapolis/St. Paul because of its location in the heartland of America, the vitality of the cultural community, the presence of a large state university and many small colleges and the enthusiasm shown by the Upper Midwest for the new theater project.

In 1960, a steering committee that had been formed to bring the theater to the Twin Cities obtained a commitment from the T.B. Walker Foundation: They would donate the land behind the Walker Art Center for a building and contribute $400,000 for construction. The steering committee itself agreed to raise at least $900,000 from the community. Thus, the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre was born in Minneapolis/St. Paul, symbolizing the birth of the not-for-profit resident theater movement.

The steering committee was formally constituted as the Guthrie Theatre Foundation in summer 1960. (The committee consisted of H. Harvard Arnason, Pierce Butler III, John Cowles, Jr., Roger Kennedy, Otto Silha, Philip Von Blon, Frank Whiting and Louis Zelle.) With the help of hundreds of dedicated volunteers, a massive statewide fundraising effort was launched and more than $2.2 million was raised. The new theater was completed in 1963. It was planned by architect Ralph Rapson and included a 1,441-seat thrust stage designed by Tanya Moiseiwitsch. The stage area was a seven-sided asymmetrical platform about 32 by 35 feet, raised three steps above floor level. A professional company comprised of stage veterans Hume Cronyn, Jessica Tandy, Zoe Caldwell and young actors such as George Grizzard, Ellen Geer and Joan Van Ark performed in the inaugural season.

With support from the McKnight Foundation, the Guthrie and the University of Minnesota undertook a model program for engaging graduate students in the theater arts as interns in acting, directing, design, playwriting and management. Following the 10 years of McKnight Foundation funding, the Bush Foundation took over for an additional five years.

The theater opened with 22,000 season ticket holders and $300,000 in advance sales for its first May – September season of four plays. The Ford Foundation provided funds to offset operating losses for the first six years.

Tyrone Guthrie was artistic director from 1963 to 1966 and returned to direct each year until 1969. He passed away in 1971. In those beginning years, productions included Henry V, Saint Joan, The Caucasian Chalk Circle and Three Sisters. Guthrie's 1968 production of The House of Atreus brought the theater renewed honor and attention. In 1968, the Guthrie became the first resident theater to undertake a national tour, taking The House of Atreus and The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui to theaters in New York City and Los Angeles.

DOUGLAS CAMPBELL

In 1966, Guthrie's protegee, actor/director Douglas Campbell, took over as artistic director. Oliver Rea, who had shared administrative responsibilities at the theater, resigned the same year, leaving Peter Zeisler the sole managing director. When Campbell left in 1967, Zeisler emerged as the single leader of the theater and hired two producing directors to work under him: Edward Payson Call and Mel Shapiro. There would be no artistic director until 1971. When Zeisler left in 1969, Donald Schoenbaum was appointed managing director — a position he held until 1986.

In 1968, the Guthrie began presenting work on smaller stages — a tradition that has continued and evolved through the years. She Stoops to Conquer, Tango and Enrico IV were staged in the 1968 spring season at the 500-seat Crawford Livingston Theater in St. Paul. This was followed by a two-play season in 1969. The effort ended in 1971.

In addition, the Guthrie presented three seasons (1968–1971) at The Other Place, a 200-seat theater just two blocks away from the mainstage. The Other Place was an alternative theater that experimented with new plays and methods of production. Plays included Red Cross by Sam Shepard, Little Murders by Jules Feiffer, Landscape and Silence by Harold Pinter and Winners by Brian Friel. It proved to be an unqualified success for artists and audiences but added to the theater's financial burden.

In the late 1960s, the Walker Art Center needed to rebuild, which gave the Guthrie the opportunity to construct areas lost to budget cuts in the original construction — rehearsal space, a scene shop and administrative offices. The Guthrie received $1 million of the $6.3 million raised in the Walker/Guthrie Fund Drive. When the new facility opened in 1970, the two organizations shared an entrance and common lobby.

However, the theater began to face problems in 1969. The original company had left, there were no plans for artistic succession and play selection lacked direction. Attendance fell sharply, earnings at the Box Office diminished and deficits began to accumulate. In retrospect, the Guthrie had not spent its first six years building for the future. The funds provided by the Ford Foundation would not last forever, yet no substitute had been developed.

MICHAEL LANGHAM

As a result, the theater's financial problems were quite serious when Michael Langham became artistic director in 1971. A friend and respected colleague of Tyrone Guthrie, Langham came to the theater after 12 years as artistic director of Canada's Stratford Festival Theatre and a distinguished career in England directing for the Royal Shakespeare Company, National Theatre of Great Britain and on Broadway with The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie. Within his first few months, Langham proposed an ambitious first season, which the board had to accept or postpone. The board gave Langham the green light and resolved to secure the theater's financial future. Langham recruited leading actors with whom he had worked for his inaugural plays, Cyrano de Bergerac and The Taming of the Shrew, both of which were artistic and financial successes.

While announcing the Guthrie's 1971-1972 Season in the Minneapolis Tribune on March 18, 1971, Langham declared a name change and new American spelling for the theater. "We've also changed the name of the joint," said Langham. "We are now the Guthrie Theater Company in the Guthrie Theater directed by the Guthrie Theater Foundation." Previously, the Minnesota Theatre Company had been performing in the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre directed by the Guthrie Theatre Foundation. The theater retained the name and spelling changes and has been the Guthrie Theater ever since.

The Langham years, 1971-1977, were marked by deft stagings of familiar classics that enjoyed broad appeal. A central core of actors performed works including Oedipus the King, Love's Labour's Lost, The Matchmaker, She Stoops to Conquer and A Streetcar Named Desire. The season was expanded gradually, reaching 42 weeks in 1975.

The extended seasons produced the earned income required to maintain the organization and provide for artistic growth. The board of directors required the Guthrie to earn 70% of its budget, though the national average was 50%. Throughout the 1970s, the theater prided itself on ending each year free of deficit.

The touring program grew during this period as well. From a modest tour of Fables Here and Now in 1971, outreach programs grew through the 1970s and productions toured the Upper Midwest. In the 1980s, national tours reached new audiences and earned additional income.

In 1972, the Guthrie received a substantial grant from the Ford Foundation. The grant created a working capital reserve to alleviate seasonal cash flow problems, stimulate local fundraising and ensure the organization's fiscal integrity.

When The Other Place was torn down for urban renewal, The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation awarded a grant to Langham for another theater — the Guthrie 2, located on Washington Avenue near the University of Minnesota. Using the resources of the theater to encourage new writers and explore alternative production methods, Guthrie 2 helped the Guthrie fulfill its responsibility to the ongoing development of its artists and to the American theater. Audiences saw mainstage actors perform plays by Emily Mann, David Mamet and Mark Medoff. The Guthrie 2 program continued until 1978.

In 1976, the board and staff undertook a $7.5 million endowment drive, but only $4.5 million was raised. Corporations and foundations gave the first eight major gifts, totaling $2.65 million. The eight gifts were given by Dayton-Hudson Foundation, General Mills Foundation, Honeywell Foundation, McKnight Foundation, Star Tribune, National Endowment for the Arts, Pillsbury Foundation and The St. Paul Companies. The largest gift from an individual was $54,000.

ALVIN EPSTEIN

When Langham left in 1977, the board ventured in a new direction and appointed Alvin Epstein, the theater's first American artistic director. Epstein had worked as an actor and director primarily at Yale Repertory Theatre. During his 18-month tenure, he introduced many new programs and ideas to Guthrie audiences, including two new plays: Teibele and Her Demon by Isaac Bashevis Singer and Bonjour, La, Bonjour by Michael Tremblay. He arranged for the renowned Russian director Anatoly Efros to visit from Moscow and direct Marriage and Monsieur de Molière.

LIVIU CIULEI

In 1980, an international search for Epstein's successor resulted in the appointment of Liviu Ciulei, the former artistic director of Bulandra Theatre in Romania. Ciulei, described by Newsweek as "one of the boldest and most challenging figures on the international scene,” was known for his uniquely physical and daring theatrical interpretations. A world-class director, designer and architect, Ciulei began by redesigning the stage. The acting platform was modified so its size, shape and height were adjustable, thereby allowing stage designers greater freedom. Ciulei adjusted the stage to be more rectangular, and he opened up the backstage in order to create greater depth. The adjustable features of the stage included the moat (the area surrounding the stage that has screw jacks to adjust its height), booking accordion walls and interchangeable floor panels that allowed the stage surface to be redefined and reshaped for each production. Ciulei’s acclaimed production of The Tempest, which he had originally staged at the Bulandra, opened his inaugural season.

His great interest in reinterpreting the classics was strongly influenced by Tyrone Guthrie’s Hamlet, which he saw in 1963. Ciulei’s style was highly contemporary and international. He invited distinguished directors such as Andrei Serban, Lucian Pintilie and Richard Foreman to reinterpret the classics.

In 1982, the Guthrie received a Tony Award for its outstanding contribution to the American theater. During Ciulei’s years, favorable national and international attention was continually focused on the theater. Audiences saw Peer Gynt, The Marriage of Figaro, A Midsummer Night’s Dream, Candide, The Seagull and Tartuffe to name a few of the most nationally acclaimed productions.

In 1981, the theater recognized that the current endowment would not generate enough income to meet its artistic needs. The Guthrie incurred a deficit of $630,000 in its 1983 fiscal year, which depleted the working capital reserves created by the Ford Foundation. In order to strengthen the financial base and prepare the way for an endowment campaign, an effort was launched to expand the annual fundraising campaign. The number of contributors would grow from 3,000 in 1981 to 12,000 in 1986.

Throughout his tenure, Ciulei struggled with two major frustrations. First, he felt it was essential to have a second space to explore new work, create new plays, and present lesser-known plays by well-established writers or important classical works whose scale of production was inappropriate for the mainstage. He wanted to construct a small, well-equipped theater on the mainstage site. Second, Ciulei did not achieve his dream of creating an acting ensemble until his final season, when the theater returned to playing in rotating repertory — a tradition departed from two seasons earlier, primarily for financial reasons.

GARLAND WRIGHT

After Ciulei’s resignation in 1985, the board concluded that the next artistic director should be the single head or CEO of the organization and its operations. The board again launched an international search for an artistic director committed to a resident acting company, the classical repertory and a vision for the Guthrie to be a leader in American theater. On June 1, 1986, Garland Wright became the sixth artistic director of the Guthrie Theater.

Wright had served as associate artistic director alongside Ciulei from 1980–1983 and had been an artistic associate for Washington, D.C.’s Arena Stage from 1985–1986. Wright selected Edward A. Martenson, former theater program director for the National Endowment for the Arts and managing director for Yale Repertory Theatre, to serve as executive director in charge of the Guthrie’s administration.

In 1987, the board of directors adopted a Long Range Plan and simultaneously launched an ambitious program of artistic development and the $25 million Campaign for Artistic Excellence.

Establishing a resident acting company, consistently high levels of production quality and the return of a strong and increasingly loyal audience were the most visible accomplishments of this period. Among the more memorable productions were The Misanthrope, Leon & Lena (and Ienz), Richard III, The Wild Duck, Uncle Vanya, The Screens, Medea, As You Like It and a trilogy of Richard II, Henry IV (Part I and Part II) and Henry V.

Wright was also committed to the idea of a second performing space and created the Guthrie Lab located at 700 North First Street in the Minneapolis Warehouse District. The Guthrie Lab was established to provide a facility to explore and develop new work and performance techniques with the purpose of enhancing the actors' skills. Actors, writers, directors, teachers and scholars collaborated to explore new ideas, ways of performing and the creation of new works.

The works performed at the Guthrie Lab during Wright's tenure were most often a demonstration of a process rather than finished products. Wright wanted a place to seek new questions about "our art, ourselves and the nature of communicating." Wright also developed the Guthrie's two-year resident director program, which recognized the need to develop and encourage directors at the beginning of their careers. In the second year of the program, the resident director would direct a classical project produced in the Guthrie Lab. In addition, Wright continued developing new ways to reach out to young audiences by instilling the theatergoing habit in students, heightening the understanding of theater among high school and college level instructors and providing a multilevel program of continuing education for the general audience. He maintained Tyrone Guthrie's dream of establishing a theater with a resident acting company who would perform plays that illuminated the timeless themes found in the world's great literature in rotating repertory.

In 1992, the Guthrie successfully completed its five-year Campaign for Artistic Excellence and received more than $26 million in pledges — a record for any American theater at that time. The extraordinary feat was accomplished through the unprecedented participation of an astonishing 4,519 individual contributors. For the first time in any Guthrie campaign, more dollars were pledged by individuals than corporations.

The following year, the Guthrie received a long-awaited facelift, which took four months to complete. The renovation was a $3.5 million project, made possible through generous gifts to the Campaign for Artistic Excellence. Modifications included better acoustics, new wheelchair-accessible seating with accommodations for 15 wheelchairs, improved shielding of theater lighting, flexibility for flying props, general refurbishing and the reupholstery of the seats (keeping the confetti color scheme). Lobby renovations increased quality and comfort: an expanded women's restroom, redesigned food and beverage outlets, a lobby expansion that added 8 feet toward Vineland Place and an energy-efficient glass curtain wall. Within the theater, there were 1,298 seats surrounding the stage in a 180-degree arc. In order to maintain the intimacy between the actors and audience, no seat was more than 15 rows or 52 feet away from the stage (for comparison, the distance from a pitcher's mound to home plate is just over 60 feet).

JOE DOWLING

After Wright announced his resignation in 1994, a search for his successor began. In 1995, the Guthrie's board of directors named Joe Dowling the seventh artistic director. Dowling is an internationally known director and had long been associated with the Abbey Theatre of Ireland. As an acting student, he joined the Abbey's acting company and later founded the first Irish theater-in-education group, the Young Abbey. In 1974, he was named artistic director of the Peacock Theatre, the Abbey's second stage.

In 1978, Dowling became the youngest artistic director in the Abbey's history, beginning a seven-year term that brought about an artistic and institutional resurgence. He was particularly noted for encouraging the development of new plays and young playwrights as well as working with many distinguished writers, including Brian Friel, Hugh Leonard and Frank McGuinness. After leaving the Abbey in 1985, Dowling was the managing and artistic director of Dublin's oldest commercial theater, the Gaiety Theatre, where he founded and directed the Gaiety School of Acting, now widely regarded as Ireland's premier drama school. Since 1990, he has directed extensively in North America, with productions at Arena Stage, Long Wharf Theatre, The Public Theater, Stratford Festival and Shakespeare Theatre Company in Washington, D.C.

Executive Director Edward Martenson left the Guthrie in 1996, and Dowling appointed David Hawkanson as managing director of the theater. Hawkanson came to the Guthrie having served in many arts management arenas, including work as a consultant for the National Arts Stabilization Project and managing director of Hartford Stage.

Dowling's inaugural season included his signature production of A Midsummer Night's Dream; The Cherry Orchard; and Philadelphia, Here I Come!

Like many of his predecessors, Dowling felt the Guthrie needed a second space to present plays to complement the mainstage programming and introduce new work. The Guthrie Lab became the site for seasons of fully produced plays, including three in his inaugural season: Sam Shepard's Sympatico, Manuel Puig's Mystery of the Rose Bouquet and Femi Osofisan's Many Colors Make the Thunder-King. Programming at the Guthrie Lab continued through 2006, featuring works by contemporary playwrights such as Arthur Miller, Suzan-Lori Parks, John Guare, Warren Leight, Jane Martin and Julie Marie Myatt.

Among the notable achievements of Dowling's leadership was the establishment of two actor training programs. Dowling created a company development department, headed by Kenneth Washington, to develop and oversee programs designed to nurture relationships with young actors. In 1997, the department launched A Guthrie Experience, which introduced actors to the Guthrie and the Twin Cities as well as helped build a bridge between training and the profession. The program invited a dozen actors from advanced actor training programs to spend the summer before their final year of training at the Guthrie with the intention of retaining relationships with young artists as they launched their professional careers. In 2000, the Guthrie partnered with the University of Minnesota to form a B.F.A. program through the College of Liberal Arts that provides a conservatory actor training experience within a liberal arts setting. This undergraduate training program has graduated a class of young actors and scholars every year since 2004.

Dowling also forged new and lasting relationships with living playwrights during his tenure, and the Guthrie produced a number of world-premiere productions, including Resurrection Blues by Arthur Miller, His Girl Friday by John Guare, The Great Gatsby adapted by Simon Levy, The Falls by Jeffrey Hatcher, Boats on a River by Julie Marie Myatt, After a Hundred Years by Naomi Iizuka, The Intelligent Homosexual's Guide to Capitalism and Socialism With a Key to the Scriptures by Tony Kushner, Appomattox by Christopher Hampton and Nice Fish by Mark Rylance and Louis Jenkins.

The Guthrie has always been committed to bringing audiences theatrical experiences from around the globe. In 2001, this commitment was reinvigorated by the creation of the WorldStage Series, which introduced Minnesota audiences to acclaimed, innovative and socially diverse theater companies from countries such as Belgium, Poland, Ireland and the U.K.

Regional touring returned during Dowling's tenure with A Midsummer Night's Dream; Molly Sweeney; Ah, Wilderness!; The Stuff of Dreams; and Freezing Paradise, plus a national tour of Othello. In 2009, the Guthrie also partnered with The Acting Company in New York City to produce annual national tours, beginning with Henry V. Many B.F.A. graduates and alumni from A Guthrie Experience were cast in these touring productions.

Early in Dowling's tenure, he realized the Guthrie was quickly outgrowing its home on Vineland Place. In addition to the Guthrie Lab in the Warehouse District, the scene shop, development department and costume and props storage were housed in satellite buildings throughout the Twin Cities. The need for additional space and efficiency became more pronounced, and Dowling began to execute his vision to establish the Guthrie as a national center for theater art and theater education by expanding the range of performances and programs offered.

After discovering that expanding the Vineland Place location was not feasible, the organization chose a spot on the banks of the Mississippi River on the east side of downtown Minneapolis. The Guthrie on the River Capital Campaign was launched to raise $75 million from private contributions, and a $3 million appropriation from the State of Minnesota in 2000 allowed for architectural selection and site acquisition. On April 2, 2001, Dowling announced that internationally renowned French architect Jean Nouvel had been selected as the design architect for the new theater and Architectural Alliance, a local architectural partner, was chosen to work with Ateliers Jean Nouvel. A public presentation of the new building's design was made on February 7, 2002. After gubernatorial vetoes and disappointments in obtaining additional bonding support from the state legislature in previous sessions, the Guthrie's request was finally passed at the end of the 2003 legislative session, providing $25 million toward the new Guthrie's construction. Groundbreaking for the new structure began on September 8, 2003.

The Guthrie closed its doors on Vineland Place with a performance of Hamlet directed by Joe Dowling, featuring four graduates of the University of Minnesota/Guthrie Theater B.F.A. Actor Training Program in the cast, including Santino Fontana in the title role and three alumni from A Guthrie Experience. The final performance at Vineland Place was May 7, 2006 — 43 years to the day since the theater opened with Tyrone Guthrie's production of Hamlet.

The new Guthrie Theater opened on June 25, 2006, with a community day celebration that invited the public to visit the new facility and participate in and enjoy music performances, speakers, family activities, fireworks and a dance party. This architectural gem houses three stages: a thrust stage for grand-scale classics, a proscenium stage for modern, intimate classics and a studio theater for future classics. It also includes production and rehearsal facilities, administrative offices, an entire floor of classrooms for the theater's ever-expanding education programs and improved audience amenities. The total project cost $125 million and was completed on time and on budget. The first performances in the new building were The Great Gatsby on the Wurtele Thrust Stage, The Real Thing and a WorldStage Series presentation of DruidSyngé on the McGuire Proscenium Stage and The Falls in the Dowling Studio.

Recent productions range from Shakespeare to modern classics, including two theaterwide celebrations of playwrights Tony Kushner in 2009 and Christopher Hampton in 2012. H.M.S. Pinafore, which closed the 2010–2011 Season, was recorded and broadcast nationally in October 2011 as part of PBS Arts' Fall Festival. More than 30 local theater companies, including Pillsbury House Theatre, Walking Shadow Theatre Company, Flying Foot Forum, Theater Mu, Carlyle Brown & Company and Theater Latté Da, have presented their own work in the Dowling Studio, which has also been a performance space for the actor training programs.

JOSEPH HAJ

After nearly two decades as the Guthrie's artistic director, Dowling announced the 2014–2015 Season would be his last. On February 17, 2015, it was announced that Joseph Haj would become the Guthrie's eighth artistic director on July 1, 2015. With his appointment, Haj's professional journey came full circle, as he made his Guthrie debut as an actor during the theater's 1989–1990 season. Prior to joining the Guthrie, Haj served as producing artistic director at PlayMakers Repertory Company, the LORT theater company in residence at The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Haj has directed several productions at the Guthrie, including Cyrano de Bergerac (his own adaptation), Romeo and Juliet, Sunday in the Park With George, King Lear, South Pacific, Pericles and West Side Story, which was the highest-grossing production in Guthrie history.

In 2016, under Haj's leadership, the Guthrie was awarded a $1 million grant from The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation in support of a groundbreaking initiative for the Guthrie's ninth floor. The Level Nine Initiative supported the creation of theater that wrestles with urgent questions and inspires dialogue with audiences; expands the diversity of voices, visions and styles onstage; and engages community members currently underserved by the Guthrie. To ensure access for all, tickets to all performances on Level Nine were $9, and a director of community engagement was appointed to conceive, develop, implement and oversee community-based programming. Although the grant ended with the 2018–2019 Season, Haj's vision for Level Nine remained unchanged. The Dowling Studio continues to feature innovative work by local, national and international artists with tickets ranging from $9 to $32.

While the Guthrie's mission and artistic excellence have remained constant, much has changed over the past five decades. What began as a summer season of four productions supported by a minimal staff is now a complex organization operating year-round. Forever growing and changing, the Guthrie is a living organization reflecting the culture and human spirit of its founding community, neighbors and audiences.
